ORACULUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a kind of decision given by the Roman emperors.

ORAL. Spoken, in contradistinction to written: as, oral evidence, which is evidence delivered verbally by a witness. Formally pleadings were put in viva voce, or orally; Kerr's Act. Law.

ORATOR. In Chancery Practice. The party who files a bill. Oratrix is used of a female plaintiff. These words are disused in England, the customary phrases now being plaintiff and petitioner; Brown.

In Roman Law. An advocate; Code, 1. 3. 33. 1.

ORDAIN. To ordain is to make an ordinance, to enact a law.

The preamble to the constitution of the United States declares that the people "do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." The third article of the same constitution declares that "the judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." See 1 Wheat. 304, 324; 4 id. 316, 402.

Ordination, in the Prot. Epis. church, is the conferring on a person the holy orders of priest or deacon. The custom is similar in the Methodist church; 4 Conn. 134.

ORDEAL. An ancient superstitious mode of trial.

When in a criminal case the accused was arraigned, he might select the mode of trial either by God and his country, that is, by jury, or by God only, that is, by ordeal.

The trial by ordeal was either by fire or by water. Those who were tried by the former passed barefooted and blindfolded over nine hot glowing ploughshares, or were to carry burning irons in their hands, and accordingly as they escaped or not they were acquitted or condemned. The water ordeal was performed either in hot or cold water. In cold water, the parties suspected were adjudged innocent if their bodies were not borne up by the water contrary to the course of nature; and if after putting their bare arms or legs into scalding water they came out unhurt, they were taken to be innocent of the crime.

It was supposed that God would, by the mere contrivance of man, exercise his power in favor of the innocent. 4 Bla. Com. 342; 2 Am. Jur. 280. For a detailed account of the trial by ordeal, see Herbert, Antiq. of the Inns of Court, 146.

ORDER. Command; direction.

An informal bill of exchange or letter of request requiring the party to whom it is addressed to deliver property of the person making the order to some one therein described.

A designation of the person to whom a bill of exchange or negotiable promissory note is to be paid. See 14 Conn. 445; 48 N. H. 45; 39 N. Y. 98.

This order, in the case of negotiable paper, is usually by indorsement, and may be either express, as, "Pay to C D," or implied merely, as by writing A B [the payee's name]. See INDORSEMENT.

In French Law. The act by which the rank of preferences of claim, among creditors who have liens over the price which arises out of the sale of an immovable subject, is ascertained. Dalloz, Dict.

In the Practice of Courts. An order is any direction of a court or judge made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment; N. Y. Code of Proc. § 400. For distinction between order and requisition, see 19 John. 7.

In Governmental Law. By this expression is understood the several bodies which compose the state. In ancient Rome, for example, there were three distinct orders: namely, that of the senators, that of the patricians, and that of the plebeians.

In the United States there are no orders of men; all men are equal in the eye of the law. See RANK.

ORDER OF DISCHARGE. In England, an order made under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, by a court of bankruptcy, the effect of which is to discharge a bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands provable under the bankruptcy; Robson, Bkcy.; Whart. Lex.

ORDER OF FILIATION. The name of a judgment rendered by two justices, having jurisdiction in such case, in which a man therein named is adjudged to be the putative father of a bastard child, and it is further adjudged that he pay a certain sum for its support.

The order must bear upon its face—first, that it was made upon the complaint of the township, parish, or other place where the child was born and is chargeable; second, that it was made by justices of the peace having jurisdiction; 1 Salk. 122, pl. 6; 2 Ld. Raym. 1197; third, the birthplace of the child; fourth, the examination of the putative father and of the mother, but it is said the presence of the putative father is not requisite if he has been summoned; Cald. 308; fifth, the judgment that the defendant is the putative father of the child; Sid. 363; Style, 154; Dalt. 52; Dougl. 662; sixth, that he shall maintain the child as long as he shall be chargeable to the township, parish, or other place, which must be named; 1 Salk. 121, pl. 2; Comb. 232; but the order may be that the father shall pay a certain sum weekly as long as the child is chargeable to the public; Style, 134; Ventr. 210; seventh, it must be dated, signed, and sealed by the justices. Such order cannot be vacated by two other justices; 15 Johns. 208. See 4 Cow. 253; 8 id. 623; 12 Johns. 195; 2 Blackf. 42.

ORDER OF REVIVOR. In English Practice. An order as of course for the continuance of an abated suit. It superseded the bill of revivor. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52. Whart. Lex.

ORDER NISI. A conditional order, which is to be confirmed unless something be done, which has been required, by a time specified. Eden, Inj. 122.

ORDERS. Rules made by a court or other competent jurisdiction. The formula is generally in these words: It is ordered, etc.

The instructions given by the owner to the captain or commander of a ship, which he is to follow in the course of the voyage.

ORDERS OF THE DAY. Matters which the House of Commons may have agreed beforehand to consider on any particular day, are called the "orders of the day," as opposed to original motions; May's Parl. Prac. Orders of the day are also known to the parliamentary practice of this country; Cush. 1512, 1513.

ORDINANCE. A law; a statute; a decree.

This word is more usually applied to the laws of a corporation than to the acts of the legislature: as, the ordinances of the city of Philadelphia. The following account of the difference between a statute and an ordinance is extracted from Bacon's Abridgment, Statute (A). "Where the proceeding consisted only of a petition from parliament and an answer from the king, these were entered on the parliament roll; and if the matter was of a public nature, the whole was then styled an ordinance: if, however, the petition and answer were not only of a public but a novel nature, they were then formed into an act by the king, with the aid of his council and judges, and entered on the statute roll." See Co. Litt. 159 b, Butler's note; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 146.

According to Lord Coke, the difference between a statute and an ordinance is that the latter has not had the assent of the king, lords, and commons, but is made merely by two of these powers. Co. 4th Inst. 25. See Barrington, Stat. 41, note (x).

ORDINARY. In Ecclesiastical Law. An officer who has original jurisdiction in his own right, and not by deputation.

In England, the ordinary is an officer who has immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical causes. Co. Litt. 344. Also a bishop, and an archbishop is the ordinary of the whole province; also an archdeacon; and an officer of the royal household.

In the United States, the ordinary possesses, in those states where such officer exists, powers identical with those usually vested in the courts of probate. In South Carolina, the ordinary was a judicial officer; 1 Const. So. C. 267; 2 id. 384; but no longer exists in South Carolina, where they have now a probate court. Georgia retains courts of ordinary.

ORDINARY CARE. That degree of care which men of ordinary prudence exercise in taking care of their own property. It can only be determined by the circumstances of each particular case whether ordinary care was used. This degree of care is that required of bailees for the mutual benefit of bailor and bailee; 8 Metc. 91; 2 Wisc. 316; 16 Ark. 308; 23 Conn. 443; 40 Me. 64; 19 Ga. 427; 28 Vt. 150, 458; 9 N. Y. 416; 26 Ala. N. S. 203; 1 Dutch. 556; 36 E. L. & E. 506; 4 Ind. 368. See BAILEE; 24 N. J. L. 268; 35 Penn. 60; 74 Ill. 232; 21 How. 356.

ORDINARY SKILL. Such skill as a person conversant with the matter undertaken might be reasonably supposed to have. 11 M. & W. 113; 20 Mart. La. 68, 75; 1 H. Blackst. 158, 161; 6 Ga. 213, 219; 8 B.

One who undertakes to act in a professional or other clearly defined capacity is bound to exercise the skill appropriate to such capacity, though the undertaking be gratuitous; 20 Penn. 136; 31 N. H. 119.

ORDINATION. The act of conferring the orders of the church upon an individual.

In the Presbyterian and Congregational churches, ordination means the act of establishing a licensed preacher over a congregation with pastoral charge and authority, or the act of conferring on a man the powers of a settled minister of the gospel, without the charge of a particular church, but with general powers wherever he may be called on to officiate; Whart. Lex. See ORDAIN.

ORDINIS BENEFICIUM. See BENEFICIUM ORDINIS.

ORDONNANCE DE LA MARINE. See CODE.

ORE TENUS (Lat.). Verbally; orally.

Formerly the pleadings of the parties were ore tenus; and the practice is said to have been retained till the reign of Edward III. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 95; Steph. Pl. 29. And see Bracton, 372 b.

In chancery practice, a defendant may demur at the bar ore tenus; 3 P. Wms. 370; if he has not sustained the demurrer on the record; 1 Swanst. 288; Mitf. Pl. 176; 6 Ves. 779; 8 id. 405; 17 id. 215, 216.

OREGON. One of the Pacific coast states of the American Union, and the thirty-third state admitted therein.

The territory called Oregon from the early name of its principal river—now called the Columbia—originally included all the country on the Pacific coast west of the Rocky mountains, and north of the 42d and south of the 49th parallel of north latitude. From 1818 to 1846, this country was subject to the joint occupancy of the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States, under a disputed claim of title, which was settled by the treaty of June 15, of the latter year, in favor of the United States (8 Stat. 249, 360; 9 Stat. 109, 869).

As early as 1841 the American and British occupants west of the Cascade mountains, commenced to organize a government for their protection. These efforts resulted in the establishment of the "Provisional government of Oregon" by a popular vote on July 5, 1845, consisting of an executive, legislative (one house), and judicial department, the officers of which were chosen and supported by the voluntary action of the citizens and subjects of both nations. On March 3, 1849, this government was superseded by the territorial government provided by congress in the act of August 14, 1848 (9 Stat. 323). On September 27, 1850, congress passed the "donation act" (9 Stat. 497), giving the settlers the land held by them under the provisional government—640 acres to a married man and his wife, and 320 to a single man.

In 1857 a state constitution was formed and ratified by the people, under which that portion of the territory included in the following boundaries was admitted into the Union on February 14, 1859 (11 Stat. 383), on an equal footing with the other states:—

Beginning one marine league at sea due west from the point where the forty-second parallel of north latitude intersects the same; thence northerly, at the same distance from the line of the coast lying west and opposite the state, including all islands within the jurisdiction of the United States, to a point due west and opposite the middle of the north ship-channel of the Columbia river; thence easterly to and up the middle channel of said river, and, where it is divided by islands, up the middle of the widest channel thereof, to a point near fort Walla-Walla, where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude crosses said river; thence east on said parallel to the middle of the main channel of the Shoshones or Snake river; thence up the middle of the main channel of said river to the mouth of the Owyhee river; thence due south to the parallel of latitude forty-two degrees north; thence west along said parallel to the place of beginning; including jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases upon the Columbia river and Snake river, concurrently with states and territories of which those rivers form a boundary in common with this state.

By the same act the navigable waters of the state were declared common highways, and forever free to the citizens of the United States.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative authority is vested in a legislative assembly, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senate is to consist of sixteen members, which number may be increased to thirty, elected for the term of four years by the electors of the districts into which the state is divided for the purpose. The senate is divided into two classes: so that one-half the number may be changed every two years.

The House of Representatives is to consist of thirty-four members, which number may be increased to sixty, chosen by the electors from the respective districts into which the state is divided for the purpose, for the term of two years.

Both houses now consist of the maximum number.

Senators and representatives must be twenty-one years old, citizens of the United States, and for a year at least preceding the election inhabitants of the county or district from which they were chosen. Sessions of the assembly are holden every second year.

Two-thirds of each house constitutes a quorum; and no bill can be passed without the votes of a majority of all the members elected to each house. No act can take effect until ninety days after the adjournment of the legislature, except in case of an emergency which must be declared therein. The power to pass special and local laws is denied in certain cases; and the reading of a bill by sections on its final passage cannot be dispensed with.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for the term of four years, by the qualified electors, at the time and places of choosing members of the assembly. He is commander-in-chief of the military and naval forces of the state; must take care that the laws are faithfully executed; may convene the legislative assembly on extraordinary occasions; may grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons, after convictions, for all offences but treason, subject to regulations prescribed by the assembly. He has the veto power, and must sign all commissions.

He must be thirty years old, a citizen of the United States, and must have been for three years preceding his election a resident in the state. In case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of the governor, the duties of his office devolve upon the secretary of state, and in case of his removal, death, resignation, or disability, upon the president of the senate, till a governor is elected.

A Secretary of State is elected, by the qualified electors, for the term of four years, who is also auditor of public accounts.

A Treasurer of State is elected, by the qualified electors, for the term of four years.

In each county, a county clerk, treasurer, sheriff, coroner, and surveyor are elected, for the term of two years.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power of the state is vested in a supreme court, circuit and county courts, and justices of the peace; and municipal courts may be created to administer the regulations of incorporated towns.

The Supreme Court originally consisted of four justices, which number was increased to five, chosen in districts, within which they held the circuit courts. But in 1878 the legislative assembly, in pursuance of § 10 of art. vii., of the constitution, provided for the election of justices of the supreme and circuit courts in separate classes; and now the supreme court is held by three justices elected by the electors of the whole state. A judge of the supreme court is elected for six years, and in addition to the usual oath of office is required to swear that he will not accept any other office, except a judicial one, during the term for which he is elected. He must be a citizen of the United States, and must have resided three years in the state. The court has jurisdiction only to revise the decisions of the circuit court. It holds two terms a year, at the seat of government, and the judges are required to file with the secretary of state concise written statements of their decisions.

The Circuit Courts have all jurisdiction not vested in any other court including appellate jurisdiction and supervisory control of all inferior tribunals and officers. There are five circuit judges who are elected by the electors of the districts in which they hold court, for the term of six years. Their qualifications are the same as the judges of the supreme court, including the oath not to accept a political office.

County Courts are held in each county, by a judge elected for the term of four years. They have the jurisdiction pertaining to courts of probate and county commissioners, and may have, by act of assembly, civil jurisdiction to the extent of five hundred dollars, and "criminal jurisdiction not extending to death or imprisonment in the penitentiary." The civil jurisdiction has been conferred but no criminal jurisdiction.

A county clerk and sheriff are elected in each county, for the term of two years, and in each district composed of one or more counties a prosecuting attorney, who is a law officer of the state, and of the counties within his district.

A judge of the supreme court, or prosecuting officer, may be removed from office by the governor, upon the joint resolution of the legislative assembly in which two-thirds of the members present concur, for incompetency, corruption, malfeasance, or delinquency in office, or other sufficient cause stated in such resolution.

Jurors are selected from the names of the persons on the assessment rolls, and out of the number in attendance upon the circuit court, seven are chosen by lot, who constitute the grand jury for the term, five of whom must concur to find an indictment. But the legislature may abolish the grand jury.

ORFGILD (Sax. orf, cattle, gild, payment. Also called cheapgild). A payment for cattle, or the restoring them. Cowel.

A restitution made by the hundred or county of any wrong done by one that was in pledge. Lambard, Archaion. 125, 126.

A penalty for taking away cattle. Blount.

ORIGINAL. An authentic instrument of something, and which is to serve as a model or example to be copied or imitated. It also means first, or not deriving any authority from any other source: as, original jurisdiction, original writ, original bill, and the like.

Originals are single or duplicate: single when there is but one; duplicate, when there are two. In the case of printed documents, all the impressions are originals, or in the nature of duplicate originals, and any copy will be primary evidence; 2 Stark. 130. But see 14 S. & R. 200; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2001.

When an original document is not evidence at common law, and a copy of such original is made evidence by an act of the legislature, the original is not therefore made admissible evidence by implication; 2 Campb. 121, n.

ORIGINAL BILL. In Chancery Practice. A bill relating to a matter not before brought before the court by the same parties, standing in the same interests. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 33; Willis, Pl. 13 et seq.

Proceedings in a court of chancery are either commenced by way of information, when the matter concerns the state or those under its protection, or by original petition or bill, when the matter does not concern the state or those under its protection. The original bill states simply the cause of complaint, and asks for relief. It is composed of nine parts; Story, Eq. Pl. 7, 8, and is the foundation of all subsequent proceedings before the court; see 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 351. See BILL.

ORIGINAL CHARTER. In Scotch Law. That one by which the first grant of land is made. Bell, Dict.

ORIGINAL CONVEYANCES (called, also, primary conveyances) are those conveyances by means whereof the benefit or estate is created or first arises: viz., feoffment, gift, grant, lease, exchange, partition. 2 Bla. Com. 309, 310*; 1 Steph. Com. 466.

ORIGINAL ENTRY. The first entry made by a merchant, tradesman, or other person in his account-books, charging another with merchandise, materials, work or labor, or cash, on a contract made between them.

Such an entry, to be admissible as evidence, must be made in a proper book. In general, the books in which the first entries are made, belonging to a merchant, tradesman, or mechanic, in which are charged goods sold and delivered or work and labor done, are received in evidence. There are many books which are not evidence, a few of which will be here enumerated. A book made up by transcribing entries made on a slate by a journeyman, the transcript being made on the same evening, or sometimes not until nearly two weeks after the work was done, was considered as not being a book of original entries; 1 Rawle, 435; 4 id. 408; 2 Watts, 451; 4 id. 258; 5 id. 432; 6 Whart. 189; 2 Miles, 268. A book purporting to be a book of original entries, containing an entry of the sale of goods when they were ordered, but before they were delivered, is not a book of original entries; 4 Rawle, 404. And unconnected scraps of paper, containing, as alleged, original entries of sales by an agent, on account of his principal, and appearing on their face to be irregularly kept, are not to be considered as a book of original entries; 13 S. & R. 126. See 2 Whart. 33; 4 M'Cord, 76; 20 Wend. 72; 1 Yeates, 198; 4 id. 341.

The entry must be made in the course of business, and with the intention of making a charge for goods sold or work done; they ought not to be made after the lapse of one day; 1 N. & McC. 130; 4 id. 77; 4 S. & R. 5; 9 id. 285; 8 Watts, 545. A book in which the charges are made when the goods are ordered is not admissible; 4 Rawle, 404; 3 Dev. 449.

The entry must be made in an intelligible manner, and not in figures or hieroglyphics which are understood by the seller only; 4 Rawle, 404. A charge made in the gross as "190 days work," 1 N. & McC. 130, or "for medicine and attendance," or "thirteen dollars for medicine and attendance on one of the general's daughters in curing the hooping-cough," 2 Cons. So. C. 476, were rejected. An entry of goods without carrying out any prices proves, at most, only a sale; and the jury cannot, without other evidence, fix any price; 1 South. 370. The charges should be specific, and denote the particular work or service charged as it arises daily, and the quantity, number, weight, or other distinct designation of the materials or articles sold or furnished, and attach the price and value to each item; 2 Const. So. C. 745; 1 N. & M'C. 130.

The entry must, of course, have been made by a person having authority to make it; 4 Rawle, 404; and with a view to charge the party; 8 Watts, 545.

The proof of the entry must be made by the person who made it. If made by the seller, he is competent to prove it from the necessity of the case, although he has an interest in the matter in dispute; 5 Conn. 496; 12 Johns. N. Y. 461; 1 Dall. 239. When made by a clerk, it must be proved by him. But in either case, when the person who made the entry is out of the reach of the process of the court, as in the case of death, or absence out of the state, the handwriting may be proved by a person acquainted with the handwriting of the person who made the entry; 2 W. & S. 137. But the plaintiff was not competent to prove the handwriting of a deceased clerk who made the entries; 1 Browne, App. liii.

The books and original entries, when proved by the supplementary oath of the party, is primâ facie evidence of the sale and delivery of goods, or of work and labor done; 1 Yeates, 347; Swift, Ev. 84; 3 Vt. 463; 1 M'Cord, 481; 2 Root, 59; 1 Cooke, 38. But they are not evidence of money lent or cash paid; 1 Day, 104; 1 Aik. 73, 74; Kirb. 289; nor of the time a vessel lay at the plaintiff's wharf; 1 Browne, 257; nor of the delivery of goods to be sold on commission; 2 Whart. 33.

These entries are evidence in suits between third parties; 8 Wheat. 326; 3 Campb. 305, 377; 2 P. & D. 573; 15 Mass. 380; 20 Johns. 168; 7 Wend. 160; 15 Conn. 206; 7 S. & R. 116; 16 id. 89; 2 Harr. & J. 77; 2 Rand. 87; 1 Y. & C. 53; and also in favor of the party himself; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 508; 4 id. 83; 2 Mass. 217; 1 Dall. 239; 2 Bay, 173, 362; 5 Vt. 313; 1 Phill. Ev. 266, Cowen & H. note.

ORIGINAL AND DERIVATIVE ESTATES. An original estate is the first of several estates, bearing to each other the relation of a particular estate and a reversion. It is contrasted with a derivative estate, which is a particular interest carved out of another estate of larger extent; 1 Pres. Est. *123.

ORIGINAL JURISDICTION. See JURISDICTION.

ORIGINAL WRIT. In English Practice. A mandatory letter issued in the king's name, sealed with his great seal, and directed to the sheriff of the county wherein the injury was committed or supposed to have been done, requiring him to command the wrongdoer, or party accused, either to do justice to the complainant, or else to appear in court and answer the accusation against him. This writ is deemed necessary to give the courts of law jurisdiction.

This writ is now disused, the writ of summons being the process prescribed by the Uniformity of Process Act for commencing personal actions; and under the Judicature Act, 1873, all suits, even in the court of chancery, are to be commenced by such writs of summons; Brown. But before this, in modern English practice, the original writ was often dispensed with, by recourse to a fiction, and a proceeding by bill substituted. In this country, our courts derive their jurisdiction from the constitution, and require no original writ to confer it. Improperly speaking, the first writ which is issued in a case is sometimes called an original writ; but it is not so in the English sense of the word. See 3 Bla. Com. 273; Walker, Am. Law, 514.

ORIGINALIA (Lat.). In English Law. The transcripts and other documents sent to the office of the treasurer-remembrancer in exchequer are called by this name to distinguish them from recorda, which contain the judgments of the barons. The treasurer-remembrancer's office was abolished in 1833.

ORNAMENT. An embellishment. In questions arising as to which of two things is to be considered as principal or accessory, it is the rule that an ornament shall be considered as accessory.

ORPHAN. A minor or infant who has lost both of his or her parents. Sometimes the term is applied to such a person who has lost only one of his or her parents. 3 Mer. 48; 2 S. & S. 93; Aso & M. Inst. b. 1, t. 2. c. 1; 40 Wisc. 276. See 14 Hazzard, Penn. Reg. 188, 189, for a correspondence between the Hon. Joseph Hopkinson and ex-president J. Q. Adams as to the meaning of the word orphan. See, also, Hob. 247.

ORPHANAGE. In English Law. The share reserved to an orphan by the custom of London.

By the custom of London, when a freeman of that city dies, his estate is divided into three parts, as follows: one-third part to the widow; another to the children advanced by him in his lifetime, which is called the orphanage; and the other third part may be by him disposed of by will. Now, however, a freeman may dispose of his estate as he pleases; but in cases of intestacy the Statute of Distribution expressly excepts and reserves the custom of London. Lovelace, Wills, 102, 104; Bacon, Abr. Customs of London (C).

ORPHANS' COURT. In American Law. Courts of more or less extended probate jurisdiction, in Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. See the accounts of the respective states.

ORPHANOTROPHI. In Civil Law. Persons who have the charge of administering the affairs of houses destined for the use of orphans. Clef des Lois Rom. Administrateurs.

OSTENSIBLE PARTNER. One whose name appears in a firm as a partner, and who is really such.

OSWALD'S LAW. The law by which was effected the ejection of married priests, and the introduction of monks into churches, by Oswald, bishop of Worcester, about A. D. 964; Whart. Lex.

OTHER WRONGS. See ALIA ENORMIA.

OTHESWORTHE (Sax. eoth, oath). Worthy to make oath. Bracton, 185, 192.

OUNCE. The name of a weight. See WEIGHTS.

OUSTER (L. Fr. outre, oultre; Lat. ultra, beyond). Out; beyond; besides; farther; also; over and more. Le ouster, the uppermost. Over: respondeat ouster, let him answer over. Britton, c. 29. Ouster le mer, over the sea. Jacob. Law Dict. Ouster eit, he went away. 6 Co. 41 b; 9 id. 120.

To put out; to oust. Il oust, he put out or ousted. Oustes, ousted. 6 Co. 41 b.

In Torts. The actual turning out or keeping excluded the party entitled to possession of any real property corporeal.

An ouster can properly be only from real property corporeal, and cannot be committed of any thing movable; 1 C. & P. 123; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2348; 1 Chitty, Pr. 148, n. r; nor is a mere temporary trespass considered as an ouster. Any continuing act of exclusion from the enjoyment constitutes an ouster, even by one tenant in common of his cotenant; Co. Litt. 199 b, 200 a. See 3 Bls. Com. 167; Archb. Civ. Pl. 6, 14; 1 Chitty, Pr. 374, where the remedies for an ouster are pointed out. In an action of quo-warranto, the judgment rendered, if against an officer or individuals, is called judgment of ouster; if against a corporation by its corporate name, it is ouster and seizure. See JUDGMENT OF RESPONDEAT OUSTER; Rosc. Real Actions, 502, 552, 574, 582; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 2454 a; 1 Woodd. Lect. 501; Washb. R. P.

OUSTER LE MAIN (L. Fr. to take out of the hand). In Old English Law. A delivery of lands out of the hands of the lord after the tenant came of age. If the lord refused to deliver such lands, the tenant was entitled to a writ to recover the same from the lord: this recovery out of the hands of the lord was called ouster le main. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24. Also, a livery of land out of the king's hands by judgment given in favor of the petitioner in a monstrans de droit; 3 Steph. Com. 657.

OUT OF COURT. A plaintiff in an action at common law sues to have declared within one year after the service of the summons, otherwise he was out of court, unless the court had, by special order, enlarged the time for declaring; see now Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. xxi. r. 1. Whart. Lex. Also a colloquial phrase applied to a litigant party, when his case breaks down, equivalent to saying, "he has not a leg to stand on;" Moz. & W.

OUT OF THE STATE. Beyond sea, which title see.

OUT OF TIME. In Marine Insurance. Missing. Generally speaking, a ship may be said to be missing or out of time when she has not been heard of after the longest ordinary time in which the voyage is safely performed. 1 Arnoult, Ins. 540; 2 Duer, Ins. 469, n.

OUTER BAR. See UTTER BARRISTER.

OUTER HOUSE. A department of the court of session in Scotland, consisting of five lords ordinary, sitting each separately, to decide causes in the first instance. Paterson; Moz. & W.

OUTFIT. An allowance made by the government of the United States to a minister plenipotentiary, or chargé d'affaires, on going from the United States to any foreign country.

The outfit can in no case exceed one year's full salary of such minister or chargé d'affaires. No outfit is allowed to a consul. Act of Congr. May 1, 1810, s. 1. See MINISTER.

As to the meaning of "outfit" in the whaling business, see 9 Metc. 354.

OUTHOUSES. Buildings adjoining or belonging to dwelling-houses.

Buildings subservient to, yet distinct from, the principal mansion-house, located either within or without the curtilage; 4 Conn. 46; 4 Gill & J. 402; 2 Cr. & D. 479.

It is not easy to say what comes within and what is excluded from the meaning of outhouse. It has been decided that a school-room, separated from the dwelling-house by a narrow passage about a yard wide, the roof of which was partly upheld by that of the dwelling-house, the two buildings, together with some other, and the court which inclosed them, being rented by the same person, was properly described as an outhouse; Russ. & R. Cr. Cas. 295. See, for other cases, Co. 3d Inst. 67; Burn, Just. Burning, II.; 1 Leach, 49; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1020, 1021; 5 C. & P. 555; 6 id. 402; 8 B. & C. 461; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 323, 336; 4 Conn. 446; 11 Ala. N. S. 594; 20 id. 30.

OUTLAW. In English Law. One who is put out of the protection or aid of the law. 22 Viner, Abr. 316; 1 Phill. Ev. Index; Bacon, Abr. Outlawry; 2 Sell. Pr. 277; Doctr. Plac. 331; 3 Bla. Com. 283, 284.

As used in the Ala. act of December 28, 1868, § 1, declaring counties liable for persons killed by an "outlaw," outlaw is not used in the strict common law sense of the term, but merely refers in a loose sense to the disorderly persons then roving through the state, committing acts of violence; 46 Ala. 118, 137. See 37 Me. 389.

OUTLAWRY. In English Law. The act of being put out of the protection of the law, by process regularly sued out against a person who is in contempt in refusing to become amenable to the court having jurisdiction. The proceedings themselves are also called the outlawry.

Outlawry may take place in criminal or in civil cases; 3 Bla. Com. 283; Co. Litt. 128; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4196.

In the United States, outlawry in civil cases is unknown, and if there are any cases of outlawry in criminal cases they are very rare; Dane, Abr. ch. 193 a, 34. See Bacon, Abr. Abatement (B), Outlawry; Gilbert, Hist. 196, 197; 2 Va. Cas. 244; 2 Dall. 92.

OUTRAGE. A grave injury; a serious wrong. This is a generic word which is applied to every thing which is injurious in a great degree to the honor or rights of another. 44 Iowa, 314.

OUTRIDERS. In English Practice. Bailiffs employed by the sheriffs and their deputies to ride to the farthest places of their counties or hundreds, to summon such as they thought good to attend their county or hundred court.

OUVERTURE DES SUCCESSIONS. In French law, the right of succession which arises to one upon the death, whether natural or civil, of another; Brown.

OVERDRAFT. See OVERDRAW.

OVERDRAW. To draw bills or checks upon an individual, bank, or other corporation, for a greater amount of funds than the party who draws is entitled to.

When a person has overdrawn his account without any intention to do so, and afterwards gives a check on a bank, the holder is required to present it, and on refusal of payment to give notice to the maker, in order to hold him bound for it; but when the maker has overdrawn the bank knowingly, having no funds there between the time the check is given and its presentment, the notice is not requisite; 2 N. & M'C. 433; 16 Me. 36.

An overdraft on a bank is in the nature of a loan. It is considered a fraud on the part of the depositor; 52 Penn. 206; see 10 Wall. 647. Indebitatus assumpsit will lie against the depositor to recover the overdraft; 9 Penn. 475.

A cashier who knowingly permits an overdraft is guilty of a breach of trust, and liable to an action to make good the amount even though the directors had been wont to countenance him in a custom of allowing good depositors to overdraw; Morse, Bank, 196.

OVERDUE. A bill, note, bond, or other contract for the payment of money at a particular day, when not paid upon the day, is overdue.

The indorsement of a note or bill overdue is equivalent to drawing a new bill payable at sight; 2 Conn. 419; 18 Pick. 260; 9 Ala. N. S. 153.

A note, when passed or assigned, when overdue is subject to all the equities between the original contracting parties; 6 Conn. 5; 10 id. 30, 55; 3 Harr. N. J. 222.

OVER-INSURANCE. See DOUBLE INSURANCE.

OVERPLUS. What is left beyond a certain amount; the residue; the remainder of a thing. The same as surplus.

The overplus may be certain or uncertain. It is certain, for example, when an estate is worth three thousand dollars, and the owner asserts it to be so in his will, and devises of the proceeds one thousand dollars to A, one thousand dollars to B, and the overplus to C, and in consequence of the deterioration of the estate, or from some other cause, it sells for less than three thousand dollars, each of the legatees, A, B, and C, shall take one-third. The overplus is uncertain where, for example, a testator does not know the value of his estate, and gives various legacies, and the overplus to another legatee: the latter will be entitled only to what may be left; 18 Ves. 466. See RESIDUE; SURPLUS.

OVERRULE. To annul; to make void.

This word is frequently used to signify that a case has been decided directly opposite to a former case; when this takes place, the first-decided case is said to be overruled as a precedent, and cannot any longer be considered as of binding authority.

Mr. Greenleaf has made a very valuable collection of overruled cases, of great service to the practitioner.

It also signifies that a majority of the judges having decided against the opinion of the minority, in which case the latter are said to be overruled.

OVERSEERS OF HIGHWAYS. So called in some of the states. See COMMISSIONERS OF HIGHWAYS.

OVERSEERS OF THE POOR. Persons appointed or elected to take care of the poor with moneys furnished to them by the public authority.

The duties of these officers are regulated by local statutes. In general, the overseers are bound to perform those duties, and the neglect of them will subject them to an indictment. See 1 Bla. Com. 360; 16 Viner, Abr. 150; 1 Mass. 459; 3 id. 436; 1 Penn. N. J. 6, 136; 77 N. C. 494; Comyns, Dig. Justice of the Peace (B 63-65).

OVERSMAN. In Scotch Law. A person commonly named in a submission, to whom power is given to determine in case the arbiters cannot agree in the sentence. Sometimes the nomination of the oversman is left to the arbiters. In either case the oversman has no power to decide unless the arbiters differ in opinion; Erskine, Inst. 4. 3. 16. The office of an oversman very much resembles that of an umpire.

OVERT. Open.

An overt act in treason is proof of the intention of the traitor, because it opens his designs: without an overt act, treason cannot be committed; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 40. An overt act, then, is one which manifests the intention of the traitor to commit treason; Archb. Cr. Pl. 379; 4 Bla. Com. 79; Co. 3d Inst. 12; 1 Dall. 33; 2 id. 346; 4 Cra. 75; 3 Wash. C. C. 234. In order to sustain a conviction for treason under the United States constitution, there must be the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act or a confession in open court. A conspirator can be tried in any place where his co-conspirators perform an overt act; Rev. Stat. § 440. The phrase is used in relation to the fugitive slave act in 5 How. 215.

In conspiracy, no overt act is needed to complete the offence; 11 Cl. & F. 155; 48 Md. 381; 49 Ind. 186. See 7 Biss. 175.

The mere contemplation or intention to commit a crime, although a sin in the sight of Heaven, is not an act amenable to human laws. The mere speculative wantonness of a licentious imagination, however dangerous or even sanguinary in its object, can in no case amount to a crime. But the moment that any overt act is manifest, the offender becomes amenable to the laws. See ATTEMPT; CONSPIRACY; Cro. Car. 577.

OWELTY. The difference which is paid or secured by one coparcener to another for the purpose of equalizing a partition. Littleton, § 251; Co. Litt. 169 a; 1 Watts, 265; 1 Whart. 292; Cruise, Dig. tit. 19, § 32; 1 Vern. 133; Plowd. 134; 16 Viner, Abr. 223, pl. 3; Brooke, Abr. Partition, § 5.

OWING. Something unpaid. A debt, for example, is owing while it is unpaid, and whether it be due or not.

In affidavits to hold to bail it is usual to state that the debt on which the action is founded is due, owing and unpaid; 1 Penn. L. J. 210.

OWLER. In English Law. One guilty of the offence of owling.

OWLING. In English Law. The offence of transporting wool or sheep out of the kingdom.

The name is said to owe its origin to the fact that this offence was carried on in the night, when the owl was abroad.

OWNER. He who has dominion of a thing, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal, which he has a right to enjoy and do with as he pleases,—even to spoil or destroy it, as far as the law permits, unless he be prevented by some agreement or covenant which restrains his right.

Although there can be but one absolute owner of a thing, there may be a qualified ownership of the same thing by many. Thus, a bailor has the general ownership of the thing bailed, the bailee the special ownership. See 2 Cra. C. C. 88. The right of the absolute owner is more extended than that of him who has only a qualified ownership: as, for example, the use of the thing. Thus, the absolute owner of an estate, that is, an owner in fee, may cut the wood, demolish the buildings, build new ones, and dig wherever he may deem proper for minerals, stone, plaster, and similar things, which would be considered waste and would not be allowed in a qualified owner of the estate, as a lessee or a tenant for life. The word owner, when used alone, imports an absolute owner; but it has been held in Ohio that the word owner, in the Mechanic Lien Law of that state, included the owner of the leasehold as well as of the reversion, on the ground that any other construction would be subversive of the policy and intent of the statute. 2 Ohio, 123.

The owner continues to have the same right although he perform no acts of ownership or be disabled from performing them, and although another perform such acts without the knowledge or against the will of the owner. But the owner may lose his right in a thing if he permit it to remain in the possession of a third person for a sufficient time to enable the latter to acquire a title to it by prescription or under the Statute of Limitations. See La. Civ. Code, b. 2, tit. 2, c. 1; Encyclopedie de M. d'Alembert, Proprietaire.

When there are several joint owners of a thing,—as, for example, of a ship,—the majority of them have the right to make contracts in respect of such thing in the usual course of business or repair, and the like, and the minority will be bound by such contracts; Holt, 586; 1 Bell, Com. 5th ed. 519; 5 Whart. 366. See, further, 22 Wall. 263; 76 Ill. 490; 64 Mo. 112; 57 N. H. 110; 36 N. J. L. 181; 13 N. Y. 553; 25 N. J. Eq. 284; 26 Penn. 238.

OWNERSHIP. The right by which a thing belongs to some one in particular, to the exclusion of all others. La. Civ. Code, art. 480.

OXGANG (fr. Sax. gang, going, and ox; Law Lat. bovata). In Old English Law. So much land as an ox could till. According to some, fifteen acres. Co. Litt. 69 a; Crompton, Jurisd. 220. According to Balfour, the Scotch oxengang, or oxgate, contained twelve acres; but this does not correspond with ancient charters. See Bell, Dict. Ploughgate. Skene says thirteen acres. Cowel.

OYER (Lat. audire; through L. Fr. oyer, to hear).

In Pleading. A prayer or petition to the court that the party may hear read to him the deed, etc., stated in the pleadings of the opposite party, and which deed is by intendment of law in court when it is pleaded with a profert. The same end is now generally attained by giving a copy of the deed of which oyer is asked, or, in other instances, by setting forth the instrument in full in the plaintiff's statement of his case. Oyer as it existed at common law seems to be abolished in England; 1 B. & P. 646, n. b; 3 id. 398; 25 E. L. & E. 304. Oyer may be demanded of any specialty or other written instrument, as, bonds of all sorts, deeds-poll, indentures, letters testamentary and of administration, and the like, which the adverse party is obliged to plead with a profert in curia. But pleading with a profert unnecessarily does not give a right to demand oyer; 1 Salk. 497; and it may not be had except when profert is made; Hempst. 265. Denial of oyer when it should be granted is ground for error; 1 Blackf. 126. In such cases the party making the claim should move the court to have it entered on record, which is in the nature of a plea, and the plaintiff may counterplead the right of oyer, or strike out the rest of the pleading following the oyer, and demur; 1 Saund. 9 b, n. 1; Bac. Abr. Pleas, 1; upon which the judgment of the court is either that the defendant have oyer, or that he answer without it; id.; 2 Lev. 142; 6 Mod. 28. See PROFERT IN CURIA.

After craving oyer, the defendant may set forth the deed or a part thereof, or not, at his election; 1 Chitty, Pl. 372; and may afterwards plead non est factum, or any other plea, without stating the oyer; 2 Stra. 1241; 1 Wils. 97; and may demur if a material variance appear between the oyer and declaration; 2 Saund. 366, n.

See, generally, Comyns, Dig. Pleader (P), Abatement (I 22); 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2890.

OYER AND TERMINER. See ASSIZE; COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER.

OYEZ (Fr. hear ye). The introduction to any proclamation or advertisement by public crier. It is wrongly and usually pronounced oh yes. 4 Bla. Com. 340, n.

P.

PACE. A measure of length, containing two feet and a half. The geometrical pace is five feet long. The common pace is the length of a step; the geometrical is the length of two steps, or the whole space passed over by the same foot from one step to another.

PACIFICATION (Lat. pax, peace, facere, to make). The act of making peace between two countries which have been at war; the restoration of public tranquillity.

PACK. To deceive by false appearances; to counterfeit; to delude: as, packing a jury. See JURY; Bacon, Abr. Juries (M); 12 Conn. 262.

PACKAGE. A bundle put up for transportation or commercial handling. A parcel is a small package; 1 Hugh. 529; 44 Ala. 468. Certain duties charged in the port of London on the goods imported and exported by aliens. Now abolished. Whart. Lex.

PACT. In Civil Law. An agreement made by two or more persons on the same subject, in order to form some engagement, or to dissolve or modify one already made: Conventio est duorum in idem placitum consensus de re solvendâ, id est faciendâ vel præstandâ. Dig. 2. 14; Clef des Lois Rom.; Ayliffe, Pand. 558; Merlin, Rép. Pacte.

PACTIONS. In International Law. Contracts between nations which are to be performed by a single act, and of which execution is at an end at once. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 100.

PACTUM CONSTITUTÆ PECUNIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement by which a person appointed to his creditor a certain day, or a certain time, at which he promised to pay; or it may be defined simply an agreement by which a person promises a creditor to pay him.

When a person by this pact promises his own creditor to pay him, there arises a new obligation, which does not destroy the former by which he was already bound, but which is accessory to it; and by this multiplicity of obligations the right of the creditor is strengthened. Pothier, Obl. pt. 2, c. 6, s. 9.

There is a striking conformity between the pactum constitutæ pecuniæ, as above defined, and our indebitatus assumpsit. The pactum constitutæ pecuniæ was a promise to pay a subsisting debt, whether natural or civil, made in such a manner as not to extinguish the preceding debt, and introduced by the prætor to obviate some formal difficulties. The action of indebitatus assumpsit was brought upon a promise for the payment of a debt: is not subject to the wager of law and other technical difficulties of the regular action of debt; but by such promise the right to the action of debt was not extinguished nor varied; 4 Co. 91, 95. See 1 H. Blacket. 550–555, 850; Dougl. 6, 7; 3 Wood, Inst. 168, 169, n. c; 1 Viner, Abr. 270; Brooke, Abr. Action sur le Case (pl. 7, 69, 72); Fitzh. N. B. 94 A, n. a, 145 G; 4 B. & P. 295; 1 Chitty, Pl. 89; Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 3, c. 4, nn. 388, 396.

PACTUM DE NON PETENDO (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement made between a creditor and his debtor that the former will not demand from the latter the debt due. By this agreement the debtor is freed from his obligation. This is not unlike the covenant not to sue, of the common law. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 755; Leake, Contr. 504.

PACTUM DE QUOTA LITIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement by which a creditor of a sum difficult to recover promises a portion—for example, one third—to the person who will undertake to recover it. In general, attorneys will abstain from making such a contract: yet it is not unlawful at common law.

PAGODA. In Commercial Law. A denomination of money in Bengal. In the computation of ad valorem duties it is valued at one dollar and ninety-four cents. Act of March 2, 1799, s. 61, 1 Story, U. S. Laws, 626. See FOREIGN COINS.

PAINE FORTE ET DURE. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE.

PAINS AND PENALTIES. See BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES.

PAIRING-OFF. A kind of system of negative proxies, in vogue both in parliament and in legislative bodies in this country, whereby a member agrees with a member on the opposite side, that they shall both be absent from voting during a given time, or upon a particular question. Said to have originated in the house of commons in Cromwell's time. See May's Parl. Prac.

PAIS, PAYS. A French word, signifying country. In law, matter in pais is matter of fact, in opposition to matter of record: a trial per pais is a trial by the country,—that is, by a jury.

PALACE COURT. In English Law. A court which had jurisdiction of all personal actions arising between any parties within twelve miles of Whitehall, not including the city of London.

It was erected in the time of Charles I., and was held by the steward of the household, the knight-marshal and steward of the court, or his deputy. It had its sessions once a week, in the borough of Southwark. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, § 13. See MARSHALSEA, COURT OF.

PALFRIDUS (L. Lat.) A palfrey; a horse to travel on. Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 93.

PALLIO COOPERIRE. (To cover with a cloak.) An ancient custom, where the parents of children born out of wedlock, afterwards intermarried, of the parents and children standing together under a cloth extended, while the marriage was solemnized, the act being in the nature of adoption; Toml.

PANDECTS. In Civil Law. The name of an abridgment or compilation of the civil law, made by Tribonian and others, by order of the emperor Justinian, and to which he gave the force of law A.D. 533.

It is also known by the name of the Digest, because in his compilation the writings of the jurists were reduced to order and condensed quasi digestæ. The emperor, in 530, published an ordinance entitled De Conceptione Digestorum, which was addressed to Tribonian, and by which he was required to select some of the most distinguished lawyers to assist him in composing a collection of the best decisions of the ancient lawyers, and compile them in fifty books, without confusion or contradiction. The instructions of the emperor were to select what was useful, to omit what was antiquated or superfluous, to avoid contradictions, and by the necessary changes, to produce a complete body of law. This work was a companion to the Code of Justinian, and was to be governed in its arrangement of topics by the method of the Code. Justinian allowed the commissioners, who were sixteen in number, ten years to compile it; but the work was completed in three years, and promulgated in 533. A list of the writers from whose works the collection was made, and an account of the method pursued by the commissioners, will be found in Smith's Dict. of Gr. & R. Antiq. About a third of the collection is taken from Ulpian; Julius Paulus, a contemporary of Ulpian, stands next: these two contributed one half of the Digest. Papinian comes next. The Digest, although compiled in Constantinople, was originally written in Latin, and afterwards translated into Greek.

The Digest is divided in two different ways: the first into fifty books, each book in several titles, and each title into several extracts or leges, and at the head of each series of extracts is the name of the lawyer from whose work they were taken.

The first book contains twenty-two titles. The subject of the first is De Justicia et Jure, of the division of person and things, of magistrates, etc. The second, divided into fifteen titles, treats of the power of magistrates and their jurisdiction, the manner of commencing suits, of agreements and compromises. The third, composed of six titles, treats of those who can and those who cannot sue, of advocates and attorneys and syndics, and of calumny. The fourth, divided into nine titles, treats of causes of restitution, of submissions and arbitrations, of minors, carriers by water, inn-keepers, and those who have the care of the property of others. In the fifth there are six titles, which treat of jurisdiction and inofficious testaments. The subject of the sixth, in which there are three titles, is actions. The seventh, in nine titles, embraces whatever concerns usufructs, personal servitudes, habitations, the uses of real estate and its appurtenances, and of the sureties required of the usu-fructuary. The eighth book, in six titles, regulates urban and rural servitudes. The ninth book, in four titles, explains certain personal actions. The tenth, in four titles, treats of mixed actions. The object of the eleventh book, containing eight titles, is to regulate interrogatories, the cases of which the judge was to take cognizance, fugitive slaves, of gamblers, of surveyors who made false reports, and of funerals and funeral expenses. The twelfth book, in seven titles, regulates personal actions in which the plaintiff claims the title of a thing. The thirteenth, in seven titles, and the fourteenth, in six titles, regulate certain actions. The fifteenth, in four titles, treats of actions to which a father or master is liable in consequence of the acts of his children or slaves, and those to which he is entitled, of the peculium of children and slaves, and of the actions on this right.

The sixteenth, in three titles, contains the law relating to the senatus-consultum Velleianum, of compensation or set-off, and of the action of deposit. The seventeenth, in two titles, expounds the law of mandates and partnership. The eighteenth book, in seven titles, explains the contract of sale. The nineteenth, in five titles, treats of the actions which arise on a contract of sale. The law relating to pawns, hypothecation, the preference among creditors, and subrogation, occupy the twentieth book, which contains six titles. The twenty-first book explains, under three titles, the edict of the ediles relating to the sale of slaves and animals, then what relates to evictions and warrantics. The twenty-second book, in six titles, treats of interest, profits, and accessories of things, proofs, presumptions, and of ignorance of law and fact. The twenty-third, in five titles, contains the law of marriage, and its accompanying agreements. The twenty-fourth, in three titles, and the twenty-fifth, in seven titles, regulates donations between husband and wife, divorces and their consequence. The twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh, each in two titles, contain the law relating to tutorship and curatorship. The twenty-eighth, in eight titles, and the twenty-ninth, in seven, contain the law on last will and testaments.

The thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second, each divided into two titles, contain the law of trusts and specific legacies.

The thirty-third, thirty-fourth, and thirty-fifth—the first divided into ten titles, the second into nine titles, and the last into three titles—treat of various kinds of legacies. The thirty-sixth, containing four titles, explains the senatus-consultum Trebellianum, and the time when trusts become due.

The thirty-seventh book, containing fifteen titles, has two objects,—to regulate successions and to declare the respect which children owe their parents and freedmen their patrons. The thirty-eighth book, in seventeen titles, treats of a variety of subjects: of successions, and of the degree of kindred in successions; of possession; and of heirs. The thirty-ninth explains the means which the law and the prætor take to prevent a threatened injury, and donations inter vivos and mortis causâ. The fortieth, in sixteen titles, treats of the state and condition of persons, and of what relates to freedmen and liberty. The different means of acquiring and losing title to property are explained in the forty-first book, in ten titles. The forty-second, in eight titles, treats of the res judicata, and of the seizure and sale of the property of a debtor. Interdicts, or possessory actions, are the object of the forty-third book, in three titles. The forty-fourth contains an enumeration of defences which arise in consequence of the res judicata, from the lapse of time, prescription, and the like. This occupies six titles; the seventh treats of obligations and actions. The forty-fifth speaks of stipulations, by freedmen or by slaves. It contains only three titles. The forty-sixth, in eight titles, treats of securities, novations and delegations, payments, releases, and acceptilations. In the forty-seventh book are explained the punishments inflicted for private crimes, de privatis delictis, among which are included larcenies, slander, libel, offences against religion and public manners, removing boundaries, and similar offences.

The forty-eighth book treats of public crimes, among which are enumerated those of lasæ-majestatis, adultery, murder, poisoning, parricide, extortion, and the like, with rules for procedure in such cases. The forty-ninth, in eighteen titles, treats of appeals, of the rights of the public treasury, of those who are in captivity, and of their repurchase. The fiftieth and last book, in seventeen titles, explains the rights of municipalities, and then treats of a variety of public officers.

These fifty books are allotted in seven parts: the first contains the first four books; the second, from the fifth to the eleventh book inclusive; the third, from the twelfth to the nineteenth inclusive; the fourth, from the twentieth to the twenty-seventh inclusive; the fifth, from the twenty-eighth to the thirty-sixth inclusive; the sixth commences with the thirty-seventh and ends with the forty-seventh book; and the seventh, or last, is composed of the last six books.

The division into digestum vetus (book first to and including title second of book twenty-fourth), digestum infortiatum (title third of book twenty-fourth, to and including book thirty-eighth), and digestum novum (from book thirty-ninth to the end), has reference to the order in which these three parts appeared.

The Pandects are more usually cited by English and American jurists by numbers, thus: Dig. 23. 3. 5. 6, meaning book 23, title 3, law or fragment 5, section 6; sometimes, also, otherwise, as, D. 23. 3. fr. 5. § 6. or fr. 5. § 6. D. 23. 3. The old mode of citing was by titles and initial words, thus: D. de jure dotium, L. profectitia, § si pater; or the same references in reverse order. From this afterwards originated the following: L. profectitia 5. § si pater 6. D. de jure dotium, and lastly, L. 5. § 6. D. de jure dotium,—which is the form commonly used by the continental jurists of Europe. 1 Mackeldy, Civ. Law, 54, 55, § 65. And see Taylor, Civ. Law, 24, 25. The abbreviation ff. was commonly used instead of Dig. or Pandects.

The Pandects—as well indeed as all Justinian's laws, except some fragments of the Code and Novels—were lost to all Europe for a considerable period. During the pillage of Amalfi, in the war between the two soi-disant popes Innocent II. and Anaclet II., a soldier discovered an old manuscript, which attracted his attention by its envelope of many colors. It was carried to the Emperor Clothaire, and proved to be the Pandects of Justinian. The work was arranged in its present order by Warner, a German, whose Latin name is Irnerius, who was appointed by that emperor Professor of Roman Law at Bologna. 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, 44, 46, 51. The style of the work is very grave and pure, and contrasts in this respect with that of the Code, which is very far from classical. On the other hand, the learning of the Digest stands rather in the discussing of subtle questions of law, and enumerations of the variety of opinions of ancient lawyers thereupon, than in practical matters of daily use, of which the Code so simply and directly treats. See Ridley, View, pt. i. ch. 1, 2.

While the Pandects form much the largest fraction of the Corpus Juris, their relative value and importance are far more than proportional to their extent. They are, in fact, the soul of the Corpus Juris. Hadley, Rom Law, 11.

PANEL (diminutive from either pane, apart, or page, pagella. Cowel). In Practice. A schedule or roll, containing the names of jurors summoned by virtue of a writ of venire facias, and annexed to the writ. It is returned into court whence the venire issued. Co. Litt. 158 b; 3 Bla. Com. 353; 40 Cal. 586.

In Scotch Law. The prisoner at the bar, or person who takes his trial before the court of justiciary for some crime. So called from the time of his appearance. Bell, Dict. Spelled, also, pannel.

PAPER BLOCKADE. An ineffective blockade. See BLOCKADE.

PAPER-BOOK. In Practice. A book or paper containing an abstract of all the facts and pleadings necessary to the full understanding of a case.

Courts of error, and other courts, on arguments, require that the judges shall each be furnished with such a paper-book. In the court of king's bench, in England, the transcript containing the whole of the proceedings filed or delivered between the parties, when the issue joined, in an issue in fact, is called the paper-book. Steph. Pl. 95; 5 Bla. Com. 317; 3 Chitt. Pr. 521; 2 Stra. 1131, 1266; 1 Chitty, Bail, 277; 2 Wils. 243; Tidd, Pr. 727.

In modern English practice under the Jud. Act of 1875, printed copies of every special case must now be delivered by the plaintiff (Ord. xxxiv. r. 3). And any party who enters an action for trial must deliver to the officer of the court a copy of the whole of the pleadings in the action for the use of the judge at the trial (Ord. xxxvi. r. 17).

PAPER-DAYS. In English Law. Days on which special arguments are to take place. Tuesdays and Fridays in term-time are paper-days appointed by the court. Lee, Dict. of Pr.; Archb. Pr. 101.

Since the Judicature Acts have come into force, similar arrangements continue to be made.

PAPER MONEY. The engagements to pay money which are issued by governments and banks, and which pass as money. Pardessus, Droit Com. n. 9. Bank-notes are generally considered as cash, and will answer all the purposes of currency; but paper money is not a legal tender if objected to. See LEGAL TENDER; NATIONAL BANKS.

PAPER OFFICE. An ancient office in the palace of Whitehall, wherein state papers are kept. Also an ancient office for the court records in the court of queen's bench, sometimes called the paper-mill; Moz. & W.

PAPERS. The constitution of the United States provides that the rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated. See SEARCH-WARRANT.

PAPIST. A term applied by Protestants to Roman Catholics. By the act of 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, known as the Catholic Emancipation Act, Roman Catholics were restored in general to the full enjoyment of all civil rights, except that of holding ecclesiastical offices and certain high appointments in the state. Before that act their condition had been much ameliorated by various statutes, beginning with 18 Geo. III. c. 60. As to the right of holding property for religious purposes, the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115, placed them on a level with Protestant dissenters, and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 49, repealed all enactments oppressive to Roman Catholics. See Whart. Lex.

PAR. In Common Law. Equal. It is used to denote a state of equality or equal value. Bills of exchange, stocks, and the like, are at par when they sell for their nominal value; above par, or below par, when they sell for more or less; 57 Ga. 324; 8 Paige, 527; 22 Penn. 479.

PAR OF EXCHANGE. The par of the currencies of any two countries means the equivalence of a certain amount of the currency of the one in the currency of the other, supposing the currency of both to be of the precise weight and purity fixed by their respective mints. The exchange between the two countries is said to be at par when bills are negotiated on this footing,—i. e. when a bill for £100 drawn on London sells in Paris for 2520 frs., and vice versâ. Bowen, Pol. Econ. 321. See 11 East, 267.

PARAGE. Equality of blood, name, or dignity, but more especially of land in the partition of an inheritance between co-heirs. Co. Litt. 166 b. Hence disparage, and disparagement. Blount.

In Feudal Law. Where heirs took of the same stock and by same title, but from right of primogeniture, or some other cause, the shares were unequal, the younger was said to hold of the elder, jure et titulo paragii, by right and title of parage being equal in everything but the quantity, and owing no homage or fealty. Calv. Lex.

PARAGIUM (from the Latin adjective par, equal; made a substantive by the addition of agium; 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 681). Equality.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The portion which a woman gets on her marriage. Ayl. Par. 386.

PARAMOUNT (par, by, mounter, to ascend). Above; upwards. Kelh. Norm. Dict. Paramount especifié, above specified. Plowd. 209 a.

That which is superior: usually applied to the highest lord of the fee of lands, tenements, or hereditaments Fitzh. N. B. 135. Where A lets lands to B, and he underlets them to C, in this case A is the paramount and B is the mesne landlord. See MESNE; 2 Bla. Com. 91; 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 484, n. 79, 485, n. 81.

PARAPHERNA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Goods brought by wife to husband over and above her dower (dos). Voc. Jur. Utr.; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 23, § 6; Mack. C. L. § 529.

PARAPHERNALIA. Apparel and ornaments of a wife, suitable to her rank and degree. 2 Bla. Com. 435.

These are subject to the control of the husband during his lifetime; 3 Atk. 394; but go to the wife upon his death, in preference to all other representatives; Cro. Car. 343; and cannot be devised away by the husband; Noy, Max. They are liable to be sold to pay debts on a failure of assets; 1 P. Wms. 730. See, also, 2 Atk. 642; 11 Vin. Abr. 176. The judge of probate is, in the practice of most states, entitled to make an allowance to the widow of a deceased person which more than takes the place of the paraphernalia. See 4 Bouv. Inst. 3996, 3997.

While a married woman may acquire title to articles of apparel by gift from her husband, yet her mere use and enjoyment of such articles purchased by her husband does not give title thereto as her separate property; 12 S. C. 180; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 508. See also 35 Ohio St. 514. In New York, by statute, a married woman may sue in her own name for injury to her paraphernalia; 48 N. Y. 212; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 543; but in the absence of proof of a gift to her, the husband can sue; 74 N. Y. 116; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 271.

PARATITLA (Lat.). In Civil Law. An abbreviated explanation of some titles or books of the Code or Digest.

PARATUM HABEO (Lat. I have ready). In Practice. A return made by the sheriff to a capias ad respondendum, which signified that he had the defendant ready to bring into court. This was a fiction, where the defendant was at large. Afterwards he was required, by statute, to take bail from the defendant, and be returned cepi corpus and bail-bond. But still he might be ruled to bring in the body; 7 Penn. 535.

PARAVAIL. Tenant paravail is the lowest tenant of the fee, or he who is the immediate tenant to one who holds of another. He is called tenant paravail because it is presumed he has the avails or profits of the land. Fitzh. N. B. 135; Co. 2d Inst. 296.

PARCEL. A part of the estate; '88 Iowa, 141; 1 Comyns, Dig. Abatement (H 51), Grant (E 10). To parcel is to divide an estate. Bacon, Abr. Conditions (O).

A small bundle or package.

The word "parcel" is not a sufficient description of the property alleged in an indictment to have been stolen. The prisoner was indicted for stealing "one parcel, of the value of one shilling, of the goods," etc. The parcel in question was taken from the hold of a vessel, out of a box broken open by the prisoner. Held an insufficient description; 7 Cox, C. C. 13.

PARCENARY. The state or condition of holding title to lands jointly by parceners, before the common inheritance has been divided. See COPARCENARY.

PARCENERS. The daughters of a man or woman seised of lands and tenements in fee-simple or fee-tail, on whom, after the death of such ancestor, such lands and tenements descend, and they enter. See COPARCENERS.

PARCHMENT. Sheepskins dressed for writing, so called from Pergamus, Asia Minor, where they were invented. Used for deeds, and was used for writs of summons in England previous to the Judicature Act, 1875. (Ord. v. r. 5). Whart. Lex.

PARCO FRACTO (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ against one who violently breaks a pound and takes from thence beasts which, for some trespass done, or some other just cause, were lawfully impounded.

PARDON. An act of grace, proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment the law inflicts for a crime he has committed. 7 Pet. 160.

Every pardon granted to the guilty is in derogation of the law: if the pardon be equitable, the law is bad; for where legislation and the administration of the law are perfect, pardons must be a violation of the law. But, as human actions are necessarily imperfect, the pardoning power must be vested somewhere, in order to prevent injustice when it is ascertained that an error has been committed.

An absolute pardon is one which frees the criminal without any condition whatever.

A conditional pardon is one to which a condition is annexed, performance of which is necessary to the validity of the pardon. 1 Bail. 283; 10 Ark. 284; 1 M'Cord, 176; 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 47.

A general pardon is one which extends to all offenders of the same kind. It may be express, as when a general declaration is made that all offenders of a certain class shall be pardoned, or implied, as in case of the repeal of a penal statute. 2 Over. 423.

The pardoning power is lodged in the executive of the United States and of the various states, and extends to all offences except in cases of impeachment. In some states a concurrence of one of the legislative bodies is required; in other states, boards of pardon have been provided, whose recommendation of a pardon to the executive is a prerequisite to the exercise of the power.

The power of pardon conferred by the constitution upon the president is unlimited, except in cases of impeachment. It extends to every offence known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. The power is not subject to legislative control. A pardon reaches the punishment prescribed for an offence, and the guilt of the offender. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attsching: if granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights. It gives him a new credit and capacity. There is only this limitation to its operation; it does not restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others, in consequence of the conviction and judgment; 4 Wall. 333.

There are several ways (as given by Judge Cooley) in which the pardoning power of the president may be exercised: 1. A pardon may be given to a person under conviction by name, and this will take effect from its delivery, unless otherwise provided therein. 2. It may be given to one or more persons named, or to a class of persons, before conviction, and even before prosecution begun. Such a pardon is rather in the nature of an amnesty. 3. It may be given by proclamation, forgiving all persons who may have been guilty of the specified offence, or offences; 4 Wall. 330, 380; 13 id. 128; and in this case the pardon takes effect from the time the proclamation is signed; 17 Wall. 191. 4. It may in any of these ways be made a pardon, on conditions to be first performed, in which case it has effect only on performance; or on conditions to be thereafter performed, in which case a breach in the condition will place the offender in the position occupied by him before the pardon was issued; 7 Pet. 150; 2 Caines, 57; 1 McCord, 176.

It is to be exercised in the discretion of the power with whom it is lodged. As to promises of pardon to accomplices, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 83; 1 Leach, 115.

In order to render a pardon valid, it must express with accuracy the crime intended to be forgiven; 4 Bla. Com. 400; 3 Wash. C. C. 335; 7 Ind. 359; 1 Jones, No. C. 1.

The effect of a pardon is to protect from punishment the criminal for the offence pardoned; 6 Wall. 766; 16 id. 147; 91 U. S. 474; but for no other; 10 Ala. 475; 1 Bay, 34. It seems that the pardon of an assault and battery, which afterwards becomes murder by the death of the person beaten, would not operate as a pardon of the murder; 12 Pick. 496. See Plowd. 401; 1 Hall, N. Y. 426. In general, the effect of a full pardon is to restore the convict to all his rights. But to this there are some exceptions. First, it does not restore civic capacity; 2 Leigh, 724. See 1 Strobh. 150; 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 451; 33 N. H. 388. Second, it does not affect a status of other persons which has been altered or a right which has accrued in consequence of the commission of the crime or its punishment; 10 Johns. 232; 2 Bay, 565; 5 Gilm. 214; or third persons who, by the prosecution of judicial proceedings, may have acquired rights to a share in penalties or to property forfeited and actually sold; 4 Wash. C. C. 64; 1 Abb. U. S. 110; 9 Fed. Rep. 645; but see 4 Biss. 336; 6 Wall. 766 (as to forfeiture to U. S.).

When the pardon is general, either by an act of amnesty, or by the repeal of a penal law, it is not necessary to plead it; because the court is bound, ex officio, to take notice of it; Baldw. 91; and the criminal cannot even waive such pardon, because by his admittance no one can give the court power to punish him when it judicially appears there is no law to do it. But when the pardon is special, to avail the criminal it must judicially appear that it has been accepted; and for this reason it must be specially pleaded; 7 Pet. 150, 162; and if he has obtained a pardon before arraignment, and instead of pleading it in bar he pleads the general issue, he shall be deemed to have waived the benefit of it, and cannot afterwards avail himself of it in arrest of judgment; 1 Rolle, 297. See 1 Dy. 34 a; Keilw. 58; T. Raym. 13; 3 Metc. Mass. 453.

The power to pardon extends to punishments for contempt; 7 Blatch. 23.

All contracts made for the buying or procuring a pardon for a convict are void; and such contracts will be declared null by a court of equity, on the ground that they are opposed to public policy; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3857.

See, generally, Bacon, Abr. Pardon; Comyns, Dig. Pardon; Viner, Abr. Pardon; 13 Peterad. Abr.; Dane, Abr.; Co. 3d Inst. 233–240; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 37; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 762–778; 2 Russ. Cr. 595; Stark. Cr. Pl. 368, 380.

PARENS PATRIÆ (Lat.). Father of his country. In England, the king; 3 Bla. Com. 427; 2 Steph. Com. 528; in America, the power is reserved to the states; 4 Kent, 508, n.; 17 How. 393.

PARENT AND CHILD. See FATHER; MOTHER.

PARENTAGE. Kindred in the direct ascending line. See 2 Bouv. Inst. n. 1955.

For a discussion of the subject in connection with Citizenship, see 2 Kent, 49; Morse on Citizenship; CITIZEN; NATURALIZATION.

PARENTS. The lawful father and mother of the party spoken of; 1 Murph. No. C. 336; 11 S. & R. 93.

The term parent differs from that of ancestor, the latter embracing not only the father and mother, but every person in an ascending line. It differs also from predecessor, which is applied to corporators. Wood, Inst. 68; 7 Ves. Ch. 522; 1 Murph. No. C. 336; 6 Binn. Penn. 255. See FATHER; MOTHER.

By the civil law, grandfathers and grandmothers, and other ascendants, were, in certain cases, considered parents. Dict. de Jur. Parente. See 1 Ashm. Penn. 55; 2 Kent, 159; 5 East, 223; Bouvier, Inst. Index.

PARES (Lat.). A man's equals; his peers; 3 Bla. Com. 349.

PARES CURIÆ (Lat.). In Feudal Law. Those vassals who were bound to attend the lord's court; Erskine, Inst. b. 2, tit. 3, s. 17; 1 Washb. R. P.

PARI DELICTO (Lat.). In Criminal Law. In a similar offence or crime; equal in guilt.

A person who is in pari delicto with another differs from a particeps criminis in this, that the former term always includes the latter, but the latter does not always include the former. 8 East, 381, 382.

PARI MATERIA (Lat.). Of the same matter; on the same subject: as, laws pari materia must be construed with reference to each other. Bacon, Abr. Statute (I 3).

PARI PASSU (Lat.) By the same gradation. Used especially of creditors who, in marshalling assets, are entitled to receive out of the same fund without any precedence over each other.

PARISH. A district of country, of different extents.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The territory committed to the charge of a parson, or vicar, or other minister. Ayl. Par. 404; 2 Bla. Com. 112; Hoffm. Eccl. Law.

Although, in the absence of a state church in this country, the status of parishes is comparatively unimportant, yet in the Prot. Epis. Church, at least, their boundaries and the rights of the clergy therein are quite clearly defined by canon. In the leading case of Stubbs and Boggs vs. Tyng, decided in New York, in March, 1868, the defendant was found guilty of violating a canon of the church, in having officiated, without the permission of plaintiffs within the corporate bounds of the city of New Brunswick, N. J., which then constituted the plaintiffs' parochial cure; Baum, 103–148.

In Louisiana. Divisions corresponding to counties. The state is divided into parishes.

In New England. Divisions of a town, originally territorial, but which now constitute quasi-corporations, consisting of those connected with a certain church. See 2 Mass. 501; 16 id. 457, 488, 492 et seq.; 1 Pick. 91.

In English Law. The children of parents unable to maintain them, who are apprenticed by the overseers of the poor of their parish, to such persons as may be willing to receive them; 2 Steph. Com. 230.

PARISH CLERK. In English Law. An officer, in former times often in holy orders, and appointed to officiate at the altar; now his duty consists chiefly in making responses in church to the minister. By common law he has a freehold in his office, but it seems now to be falling into desuetude; 2 Steph. Com. 700; Moz. & W.

PARISHIONERS. Members of a parish. In England, for many purposes they form a body politic. See PARISH.

PARISH CONSTABLE. See CONSTABLE.

PARISH COURT. In Louisiana the local courts in each parish, corresponding generally to county and probate courts, and, in some respects, justices' courts, in other states were formerly so called.

PARIUM JUDICIUM (Lat. the decision of equals). The right of trial by one's peers: i. e. by jury in the case of a commoner, by the house of peers in the case of a peer.

PARK (L. Lat. parcus). An inclosure; 2 Bla. Com. 38. A pound. Reg. Orig. 166; Cowel. An inclosed chase extending only over a man's own grounds. 13 Car. II. c. 10; Manw. For. Laws; Crompton, Jur. fol. 148; 2 Bla. Com. 38.

Pairk is still retained in Ireland for "pound."

PARLE HILL (also called Parling Hill). A hill where courts were held in olden times. Cowel.

PARLIAMENT (said to be derived from parler la ment, to speak the mind, or parum lamentum).

In English Law. The legislative branch of the government of Great Britain, consisting of the house of lords and the house of commons.

The parliament is usually considered to consist of the king, lords, and commons. See 1 Bla. Com. 147*, 157*, Chitty's note; 2 Steph. Com. 537. In 1 Woodd. Lect. 30, the lords temporal, the lords spiritual, and the commons are called the three estates of the realm: yet the king is called a part of the parliament, in right of his prerogative of veto and the necessity of his approval to the passage of a bill. That the connection between the king and the lords temporal, the lords spiritual, and the commons, who when assembled in parliament form the three estates of the realm, is the same as that which subsists between the king and those estates—the people at large—out of parliament, the king not being in either case a member, branch, or coestate, but standing solely in the relation of sovereign or head, see Colton, Records, 710; Rot. Parl. vol. iii. 623 a; 2 M. & G. 457, n.

Records of writs summoning knights, burgesses, and citizens to parliament are first found towards the end of the reign of Henry III., such writs having issued in the thirty-eighth and forty-ninth years of his reign. 4 Bla. Com. 425; Prynne, 4th Inst. 2. In the reign of Edward III. it assumed its present form. Id. Since the reign of Edward III. the history of England shows an almost constant increase in the power of parliament. Anne was the last sovereign who exercised the royal prerogative of veto; and, as this prerogative no longer practically exists, the authority of parliament is absolutely unrestrained. The parliament can only meet when convened by the sovereign, exept on the demise of the sovereign with no parliament in being, in which case the last parliament is to assemble. 6 Anne, c. 7. The sovereign has also power to prorogue and dissolve the parliament. May, Imperial Parliament. The origin of the English parliament seems traceable to the witena gemote of the Saxon kings. Encyc. Brit. See May's Law, Priv. and Proc. of Parliament; HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

law that no lawyer should be a member of it, at Coventry. 6 Hen. IV.; 1 Bla. Com. 177; Walsingham, 412, n. 30; Rot. Parl. 6 Hen. IV.

PARLOR CAR. See SLEEPING CAR.

PAROL (more properly, parole. A French word, which means, literally, word, or speech). A term used to distinguish contracts which are made verbally, or in writing not under seal, which are called parol contracts, from those which are under seal, which bear the name of deeds or specialties; 1 Chitty, Contr. 1; 7 Term, 350, 351, n.; 3 Johns. Cas. 60; 1 Chitty, Pl. 88. It is proper to remark that when a contract is made under seal, and afterwards it is modified verbally, it becomes wholly a parol contract; 2 Watts, 451; 9 Pick. Mass. 298; 13 Wend. 71.

Pleadings are frequently denominated the parol. In some instances the term parol is used to denote the entire pleadings in a cause: as, when in an action brought against an infant heir, on an obligation of his ancestors, he prays that the parol may demur, i. e. that the pleadings may be stayed till he shall attain full age; 3 Bla. Com. 300; 4 East, 485; 1 Hoffm. 178. See a form of a plea in abatement, praying that the parol may demur, in 1 Wentw. Pl. 43, and 2 Chitty, Pl. 520. But a devisee cannot pray the parol to demur; 4 East, 485.

PAROL DEMURRER. The staying of proceedings in a real action brought by or against an infant, until the infant should come of age. Abolished by Stat. 11 Geo. IV.; Moz. & W.

PAROL EVIDENCE. Evidence verbally delivered by a witness. As to the cases when such evidence will be received or rejected, see Stark. Ev. pt. 4, pl. 995–1055; 1 Phill. Ev. 466, c. 10, s. 1; Sugd. Vend. 97; 78 N. Y. 74; 24 Alb. L. J. 430; 5 Am. Rep. 241; 6 id. 678. See EVIDENCE; CONTRACT.

PAROL LEASE. An agreement made orally between parties, by which one of them leases to the other a certain estate.

By the English Statute of Frauds of 29 Car. II. c. 3, ss. 1, 2, 3, it is declared that "all leases, estates, or terms of years, or any uncertain interest in lands, created by livery only, or by parol, and not put in writing and signed by the party, should have the force and effect of leases or estates at will only, except leases not exceeding the term of three years, whereupon the rent reserved during the term shall amount to two third parts of the full improved value of the thing demised." "And that no lease or estate, either of freehold or term of years, should be assigned, granted, or surrendered unless in writing." The principles of this statute have been adopted, with some modifications, in nearly all the states of the Union. 4 Kent, 95; 1 Hill, Abr. 130.

PAROLE. In International Law. The agreement of persons who have been taken by an enemy that they will not again take up arms against those who captured them, either for a limited time or during the continuance of the war. Vattel, liv. 3, c. 8, § 151.

PARRICIDE (from Lat. pater, father, caedere to slay). In Civil Law. One who murders his father. One who murders his mother, his brother, his sister, or his children. Merlin, Rep. Parricide; Dig. 48. 9. 1. 3, 4.

This offence is defined almost in the same words in the penal code of China. Penal Laws of China, b. 1, s. 2, § 4.

The criminal was punished by being scourged, and afterwards sewed in a sort of sack, with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and then thrown into the sea or into a river; or, if there were no water, he was thrown in this manner to wild beasts. Dig. 48. 9. 9; Code, 9, 17. 1. 1. 4, 18, 6; Brown, Civ. Law, 423; Wood, Civ. Law, b. 3, c. 10, s. 9.

By the laws of France, parricide is the crime of him who murders his father or mother, whether they be the legitimate, natural, or adopted parents of the individual, or the murder of any other legitimate ascendant. Code Penal, art. 297. This crime is there punished by the criminal's being taken to the place of execution without any other garment than his shirt, barefooted, and with his head covered with a black veil. He is then exposed on the scaffold, while an officer of the court reads his sentence to the spectators; his right hand is then cut off, and he is immediately put to death. Id. art. 13.

The common law does not define this crime, and makes no difference between its punishment and the punishment of murder; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 380; Prin. Penal Law, c. 18, § 8, p. 243; Dalloz, Dict. Homicide, § 8.

PARS EINITIA (Lat.). In Old English Law. The share of the eldest daughter where lands were parted between daughters by lot, she having her first choice after the division of the inheritance. Co. Litt. 166 b; Glanv. lib. 7, c. 3; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 10, § in divisionem.

PARS RATIONABILIS (Lat. reasonable part). That part of a man's goods which the law gave to his wife and children. 2 Bla. Com. 492; Magn. Chart.; 9 Hen. III. c. 18; 2 Steph. Com. 228, 254.

PARSON. In Ecclesiastical Law. One that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church.

So called because the church, which is an invisible body, is represented by his person. In England he is himself a body corporate, in order to protect and defend the church (which he personates) by a perpetual succession; Co. Litt. 300.

The parson has, during life, the freehold in himself of the parsonage-house, the glebe, the tithes, and other dues, unless these are appropriated, i. e. given away, to some spiritual corporation, sole or aggregate, which the law esteems as capable of providing for the service of the church as any single private clergyman; 4 Bla. Com. 384; 1 Hagg. Cons. 162; Plowd. 493; 3 Steph. Com. 70.

The ecclesiastical or spiritual rector of a rectory. 1 Woodd. Lect. 311; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 18; Co. Litt. 300. Also, any clergyman having a spiritual preferment. Co. Litt. 17,

18. Holy orders, presentation, institution, and induction are necessary for a parson; and a parson may cease to be such by death, resignation, cession, or deprivation, which last may be for simony, non-conformity to canons, adultery, etc.; Co. Litt. 120; 4 Co. 75, 76.

PARSON IMPARSONA (Lat.). A persona, or parson, may be termed impersonata, or impersonee, only in regard to the possession he hath of the rectory by the act of another. Co. Litt. 300. One that is inducted and in possession of a benefice: e. g. a dean and chapter. Dy. 40, 221. He that is in possession of a church, be it presentative or appropriate, and with whom the church is full,—persona in this case meaning the patron who gives the title, and persona impersonata the parson to whom the benefice is given in the patron's right. Reg. Jud. 24; 1 Barb. 330; 1 Busb. Eq. 55; 10 Pet. 618; 70 Penn. 210.

PARSONAGE. The house set apart for the minister's residence. A portion of lands and tithes established by law for the maintenance of a minister. Toml.

PART. A share: a purpart. This word is also used in contradistinction to counterpart: covenants were formerly made in a script and rescript, or part and counterpart.

PART AND PERTINENT. In Scotch Law. A term in a conveyance including lands or servitudes held for forty years as part of, or pertinent to, lands conveyed, natural fruits before they are separated, woods and parks, etc.; but not steelbow stock, unless the lands have been sold on a rental. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 2. 5. 3 et seq.

PART-OWNERS. Those who own a thing together, or in common.

In Maritime Law. A term applied to two or more persons who own a vessel together, and not as partners.

In general, when a majority of the part-owners are desirous of employing such a ship upon a particular voyage or adventure, they have a right to do so upon giving security in the admiralty by stipulation to the minority, if required to bring her back and restore the ship, or, in case of her loss, to pay them the value of their respective shares; 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3780; Abb. Shipp. 70; 3 Kent, 151; Story, Partn. § 489; 11 Pet. 175. When the majority do not choose to employ the ship, the minority have the same right, upon giving similar security; 11 Pet. 175; 1 Hagg. Adm. 306; Jacobsen, Sea-Laws, 442.

Where part-owners are equally divided as to the employment upon any particular voyage, the courts of admiralty have manifested a disposition to support the right of the court to order a sale of the ship; Story, Partn. § 439; Bee, 2; Gilp. 10; 18 Am. Jur. 486. See Pars. Mar. L.

PARTES FINIS NIL HABUERUNT (Lat. the parties to the fine had nothing; i. e. nothing which they could convey). In Old English Pleading. The plea to a fine levied by a stranger, and which only bound parties and privies. 2 Bla. Com. 356*; Hob. 334; 1 P. Wms. 520; 1 Woodd. Lect. 315.

PARTIAL LOSS. A loss of a part of a thing or of its value, as contrasted with a total loss.

Where this happens by damage to an article, it is also called a particular average, which is to be borne by the owner, as distinguished from a general average loss, which is to be contributed for by the other interests exposed to the same perils; 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 1269, 1422. See AVERAGE; ABANDONMENT.

PARTICEPS CRIMINIS. A partner in crime.

PARTICULAR AVERAGE. Every kind of expense or damage, short of total loss, which regards a particular concern, and which is to be wholly borne by the proprietor of that concern or interest alone. See 3 Bosw. N. Y. 385; 14 Allen, 320; 2 Phill. Ins. § 354; 1 Pars. Marit. Law, 284; Gourlie, Gen. Average; AVERAGE.

PARTICULAR AVERMENT. See AVERMENT.

PARTICULAR CUSTOM. A custom which only affects the inhabitants of some particular district.

To be good, a particular custom must have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; must have been continued; must have been peaceable; must be reasonable; must be certain; must be consistent with itself; must be consistent with other customs. 1 Bla. Com. 74, 79.

PARTICULAR ESTATE. An estate which is carved out of a larger, and which precedes a remainder: as, an estate for years to A, remainder to B for life; or, an estate for life to A, remainder to B in tail: this precedent estate is called the particular estate, and the tenant of such estate is called the particular tenant; 2 Bla. Com. 165; 4 Kent, 226; 16 Vin. Abr. 216; 4 Comyns, Dig. 32; 5 id. 346. See REMAINDER.

PARTICULAR LIEN. A right which a person has to retain property in respect of money or labor expended on such particular property. See LIEN.

PARTICULAR STATEMENT. In Pennsylvania Pleading and Practice. A statement particularly specifying the date of a promise, book-account, note, bond (penal or single), bill, or all of them, on which an action is founded and the amount believed by the plaintiff to be due from the defendant. 6 S. & R. 21. It is founded on the provisions of a statute passed March 21, 1806. See 4 Sm. Penn. Laws, 328. It is an unmethodical declaration, not restricted to any particular form; 2 S. & R. 537; 3 id. 405; 8 id. 316, 567.

PARTICULARS. See BILL OF PARTICULARS.

PARTIES (Lat. pars, a part). Those who take part in the performance of an act, as, making a contract, carrying on an action. A party in law may be said to be those united in interest in the performance of an act: it may then be composed of one or more persons. Parties includes every party to an act. It is also used to denote all the individual separate persons engaged in the act,—in which sense, however, a corporation may be a party.

To Contracts. Those persons who engage themselves to do or not to do the matters and things contained in agreement.

In general, all persons may be parties to contracts. But no person can contract with himself in a different capacity, as there must be an agreement of minds; 1 Vern. 465; 9 Ves. Ch. 234; 13 id. 156; 2 Bro. C. C. 400; 1 Pet. C. C. 373; 3 Binn. 54; 13 S. & R. 210; 9 Paige, Ch. 238, 650; 2 Johns. Ch. 252; 4 How. 503. And no want, immaturity, or incapacity of mind, in the consideration of the law, disables a person from becoming a party. Such disability may be entire or partial, and must be proved; 2 Stark. 326; 1 Term, 648; 11 Ad. & E. 634; 17 L. J. Ex. 233.

Aliens were under greater disabilities at common law with reference to real than to personal property; 7 Co. 25 a; 1 Ventr. 417; 6 Pet. 102; 11 Paige, Ch. 292; 1 Cush. 531. The disability is now removed, in a greater or less degree, by statutes in the various states; 2 Kent, Lect. 25; and alien friends stand on a very different footing from alien enemies; 2 Sandf. Ch. 586; 2 W. & M. 1; 3 Stor. 458; 2 How. 65; 5 id. 103; 8 Cra. 110; 3 Dall. 199.

Bankrupts and insolvents are disabled to contract, by various statutes, in England, as well as by insolvent laws in the states of the United States.

Duress renders a contract voidable at the option of him on whom it was practised. See DURESS.

Excommunication can have no effect in the United States, as there is no national church recognized by the law.

Infants are generally incapable of contracting before the age of twenty-one years. This provision is intended for their benefit; and therefore most of their contracts are voidable, and not void. It is the infant's privilege at maturity to elect whether to avoid or ratify the contract he has made during minority. Though the infant is not bound, the adult with whom he may contract is. The infant may always sue, but cannot be sued; Stra. 937,—which seems to be an exception to the mutuality of contracts. The infant cannot avoid his contract for necessaries; 10 Vt. 225; 11 N. H. 51; 12 Metc. 559; 6 M. & W. 42.

Married women, at common law, were almost entirely disabled to contract, their personal existence being almost entirely merged in that of their husbands; 2 J. J. Marsh. 82; 23 Me. 305; 2 Chitty, Bail, 117; 5 Exch. 388; so that contracts made by them before marriage may be taken advantage of and enforced by their husbands, but not by themselves; 13 Mass. 384; 17 Me. 29; 2 Dev. 360; 9 Cow. 230; 14 Conn. 99; 6 T. B. Monr. 257. The contract of a feme covert is, then, generally void, unless she be the agent of her husband in which case it is the husband's contract, and not hers; 15 East, 607; 6 Mod. 171; 6 N. H. 124; 16 Vt. 390; 5 Binn. 285; 15 Conn. 347. See WIFE.

Non compotes mentis. At common law, formerly, in this class were included lunatics, insane persons, and idiots. It is understood now to include drunkards; 4 Conn. 203; 2 N. H. 435; 15 Johns. 503; 2 Harr. & J. 421; 11 Pick. 304; 1 Rice, 56; 5 Munf. 466; 3 Blackf. 51; 1 Green, N. J. 233; 1 Bibb, 168; 17 Miss. 94; 13 M. & W. 623. Spendthrifts under guardianship are not competent to make a valid contract for the payment of money; 13 Pick. 206. Seamen "are the wards of the admiralty, and though not technically incapable of entering into a valid contract, they are treated in the same manner as courts of equity are accustomed to treat young heirs, dealing with their expectancies, wards with their guardians, and cestuis que trust with their trustees." 2 Mas. 541. See 3 Kent, 193; 2 Dods. 504; 2 Sumn. 444.

Outlawry does not exist in the United States.

As to the character in which parties contract. They may act independently or severally, jointly, or jointly and severally. The decision of the question of the kind of liability incurred depends on the terms of the contract, if they are express, or, if not express, upon the intention of the parties as gathered from the circumstances of the case. Whenever, however, the obligation is undertaken by two or more, or a right given to two or more, it is a general presumption of law that it is a joint obligation or right; words of joinder are not necessary for this purpose; but, on the other hand, there should be words of severance in order to produce a several responsibility or a several right; 1 Taunt. 7; 13 M. & W. 499; 8 C. & P. 332; Shepp. Touchst. 375; 6 Wend. 629; 7 Mass. 58; 10 Barb. 385, 638; 14 id. 644; 1 Lutw. 695; Peake, N. P. 130; Holt, N. P. 474; 1 B. & C. 407; 12 Gill & J. 265. It may be doubted, however, whether any thing less than express words can raise at once a joint and several liability. Parties may act as the representatives of others, as agents, factors or brokers, servants, attorneys, executors, or administrators, and guardians. See these titles.

They may act in a collective capacity, as corporations, joint-stock companies, or as partnerships. See these titles.

New parties may be made to contracts already in existence, by novation, assignment, and indorsement, which see.

To Suits in Equity. The person who seeks a remedy in chancery by suit, commonly called the plaintiff, or complainant, and the person against whom the remedy is sought, usually denominated the defendant, are the parties to a suit in equity.

Active parties are those who are so involved in the subject-matter in controversy that no decree can be made without their being in court. Passive parties are those whose interests are involved in granting complete relief to those who ask it. 1 Wash. C. C. 517. See 3 Ala. 361.

Plaintiffs.

In general, all persons, whether natural or artificial, may sue in equity; and an equitable title only is sufficient; 10 Ill. 332. Incapacities which prevent suit are absolute, which disable during their continuance, or partial which disable the party to sue alone.

Alien enemies are under an absolute incapacity to sue. Alien friends may sue; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 129; Coop. Eq. Pl. 27; if the subject-matter be not such as to disable them; Co. Litt. 129 b; although a sovereign; 1 Sim. 94; 2 Gall. 105; 8 Wheat. 464; 4 Johns. Ch. 370; Adams, Eq. 314. In such case he must have been first recognized by the executive of the forum; Story, Eq. Pl. § 55; 3 Wheat. 324.

In such case the sovereign submits to the jurisdiction, as to the subject-matter, and must answer on oath; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 30; Adams, Eq. 313; 6 Beav. 1.

Attorney-general. Government (in England, the crown) may sue both in its own behalf, for its own political rights and interests, and in behalf of the rights and interests of those partaking of its prerogatives or claiming its peculiar protection; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 421–424; Coop. Eq. Pl. 21, 101; usually by the agency of the attorney-general or solicitor-general; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 7; Adams, Eq. 312. See INJUNCTION; QUO WARRANTO; TRUSTS.

Corporations, like natural persons, may sue; Grant, Corp. 198; although foreign; id. 200; but in such case the corporate act must be set forth; 1 Strs. 612; 1 Cr. M. & R. 296; 4 Johns. Ch. 327; as it must if they are domestic and created by a private act; 3 Conn. 199; 15 Viner, Abr. 198. All the members of a voluntary association must be joined; 15 Ill. 251; unless too numerous. 2 Pet. 566; 3 Barb. Ch. 362.

Idiots and lunatics may sue by their committees; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 29; Adams, Eq. 301. As to when a mere petition is sufficient, see 7 Johns. Ch. 24; 2 Ired. Eq. 294.

Infants may sue; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 25; and, if they be on the wrong side of the suit, may be transferred at any time, on suggestion; 3 Edw. Ch. 32. The bill must be filed by the next friend; Coop. Eq. Pl. 27; 1 Sm. Ch. Pr. 54; 2 Ala. 406; who must not have an adverse interest; 2 Ired. Eq. 478; and who may be compelled to give bail; 1 Paige, Ch. 178. If the infant have a guardian, the court may decide in whose name the suit shall continue; 12 Ill. 424.

A married woman is under partial incapacity to sue; 7 Vt. 369. Otherwise, when in such condition as to be considered in law a feme sole; 2 Hayw. 406. She may sue on a separate claim by aid of a next friend of her own choice; Story, Eq. Pl. § 61; Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 6, note p; 1 Freem. 215; but see 2 Paige, Ch. 454; and the defendant may insist that she shall sue in this manner; 2 Paige, Ch. 255; 4 Rand. 397.

Societies. A certain number of persons belonging to a voluntary society may sue on behalf of themselves and their associates for purposes common to them all; 2 Pet. 366.

Defendants.

Generally, all who are able to sue may be sued in equity. To constitute a person defendant, process must be prayed against him; 2 Bland, Ch. 106; 4 Ired. Eq. 175; 5 Ga. 251; 1 A. K. Marsh. 594. Those who are under incapacity may be made defendants, but must appear in a peculiar manner. One, or more, interested with the plaintiff, who refuse to join may be made defendants; 2 Bland, Ch. 264; 3 Des. 31; 10 Ill. 534; 15 id. 251.

Corporations must be sued by their corporate names, unless authorized to come into court in the name of some other person, as president, etc.; Story, Eq. Pl. § 70; 4 Ired. Eq. 195. Governments cannot, generally, be sued in their own courts; Story, Eq. Pl. § 69: yet the attorney-general may be made a party to protect its rights when involved; 1 Barb. Ch. 157; and the rule does not prevent suits against officers in their official capacity; 1 Dougl. Mich. 225.

Idiots and lunatics may be defendants and defend by committees, usually appointed guardians ad litem as of course; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 103; Story, Eq. Pl. § 70; Shelf. Lun. 425; 6 Paige, Ch. 237.

A guardian de facto may not have a bill against a lunatic for a balance due him, but must proceed by petition; 2 D. & B. Eq. 385; 2 Johns Ch. 242; 2 Paige, Ch. 422; 8 id. 609.

Infants defend by guardians appointed by the court; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 103; 9 Ves. 357; 11 id. 563; 1 Madd. 290; 8 Pet. 128; 12 Mass. 16; 2 Tayl. 125.

On becoming of age, an infant is allowed, as of course, to put in a new plea, or to demur on showing that it is necessary to protect his rights; 6 Paige, Ch. 353.

Married women may be made defendants, and may answer as if femes sole, if the husband is plaintiff, an exile, or an alien enemy, has abjured the realm or been transported under criminal sentence; Adams, Eq. 313; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 104.

She should be made defendant where her husband seeks to recover an estate held in trust for her separate use; 9 Paige, Ch. 225; and, generally, where the interests of her husband conflict with hers in the suit, and he is plaintiff; 3 Barb. Ch. 397. See, also, 11 Me. 145; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 104. See, generally, as to who may be defendants. JOINDER OF PARTIES.

At Law. In actions ex contractu.

Plaintiffs. In general, all persons who have a just cause of action may sue, unless some disability be shown; Dicey, Part. 1. An action on a contract, of whatever description, must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest is vested; 1 East, 497; Yelv. 25, n. 1; 1 Lev. 235; 3 B. & P. 147; 1 H. An assignee who is to execute trusts may sue in his own name; 4 Abb. 106. Cestuis que trustent cannot sue at law; 3 Bouvier, Inst. 135.

Civil death occurring in case of an outlaw, an attainted felon or one sentenced to imprisonment for life, incapacitates the person for suing as plaintiff during the continuance of the condition; Broom, Part. 85. And the servant is also liable; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 431, n. For wilful acts; 9 C. & P. 607; 3 Barb. 42; for those not committed while in the master's service; 26 Penn. 482; or not within the scope of his employment, he alone is liable.

Partners may be sued separately for acts of the firm, its agents or servants; 4 Gill, 406; 1 C. & M. 93; 17 Mass. 182; 1 Metc. Mass. 560; 11 Wend. 571; 18 id. 175.

PARTITION. The division which is made between several persons of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or of goods and chattels which belong to them as co-proprietors. The term is more technically applied to the division of real estate made between co-parceners, tenants in common, or joint tenants.

Voluntary partition is that made by the owners by mutual consent. It is effected by mutual conveyances or releases to each person of the share which he is to hold, executed by the other owners. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 6, § 14.

Compulsory partition is that which takes place without regard to the wishes of one or more of the owners.

At common law the right of compulsory partition existed only in cases of co-parcenary; Litt. § 264. By statutes of 31 Henry VIII. c. 1 and 32 id. c. 2, the right was extended to joint tenants and tenants in common. These statutes have been generally re-enacted or adopted in the United States, and usually with increased facilities for partition; 4 Kent, 362, etc.; Co. Litt. 175 a; 2 Bls. Com. 185, note c; 16 Vin. Abr. 217; Allnatt, Part. Partition at common law is effected by a judgment of the court and delivering up possession in pursuance of it, which concludes all the parties to it. In England the writ of partition has been abolished by stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, § 36.

Courts of equity also exercise jurisdiction in cases of partition where no adequate remedy could be had at law, as where the titles to the estates in question are such as are cognizable only in equity or where it is necessary to award owelty of partition. This jurisdiction was first settled in Elizabeth's time, and has increased largely on account of the peculiar advantages of the chancery proceeding; 1 Spence, Eq. 654. Nor have the increased facilities grafted by statute upon the common law proceeding ousted the jurisdiction; 1 Story, Eq. § 646, et seq.; 1 Fonbl. Eq. book 1, c. 1, § 3, note (b).

Partition in equity is effected by first ascertaining the rights of the several parties interested; and then issuing a commission to make the partition required; and finally on return of the commissioners and confirmation thereof by decreeing mutual conveyances between the parties; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 120; 2 Sc. & L. 371. For an abstract of the laws of the several states on this subject, see 1 Hill. R. P. c. 55.

PARTNERS. Members of a partnership.

Ostensible partners are those whose names appear to the world as partners, and who in reality are such.

Nominal partners are those who are held out as partners but who have no interest in the firm or business.

Dormant partners are those whose names and transactions as partners are professedly concealed from the world.

Special partners are those whose liabilities are limited by statute to the amount of their respective contributions. Ordinarily a special partner is associated with at least one general partner by whom the business is managed, but in the "partnerships limited" organized under recent statutes, all the parties have a limited liability.

Who may be.

General rule. Persons who have the legal capacity to make other contracts may enter into that of partnership; Lind. Part. *77; 1 Col. Part. § 11.

Aliens. An alien friend may be a partner; Lind. Part. *78; Co. Litt. 129 b. An alien enemy cannot enter into any commercial contract; 1 Kent, *66-69; 8 Term, 548; 16 Johns. 438; 7 Pet. 586.

Corporations. There is no general principle of law which prevents a corporation from being a partner with another corporation, or with ordinary individuals, except the principle that a corporation cannot lawfully employ its funds for purposes not authorized by its constitution; Lind. Part. *86; 46 Conn. 136; Grant, Corp. 5; 5 Gray, 58.

Firms. Two firms may be partners in one joint firm; 1 Ab. Pr. 243; 1 Fed. Rep. 800.

Infants. An infant may contract the relation of partner, as he may make any trading contract which is likely to prove for his advantage; 17 Gratt. 503; 8 Taunt. 35; 5 B. & Ald. 147. Such a contract made by a person during infancy is voidable and may be affirmed or disaffirmed by him at majority; Story, Part. § 7; 42 Mich. 134; but whether he may disaffirm before majority is doubtful; 31 Mich. 182; Ewell's Lead. Cas. 92, 96; Lind. Part. *80 n., and *83; unless he gives notice of disaffirmance, or in some manner repudiates this contract within a reasonable time after becoming of age, he will be presumed to have ratified it; 8 Taunt. 35; Story, Part. § 7; 9 Vt. 368; and his liability relates back to firm contracts made during his minority; 2 Hill, S. C. 479; 21 Mich. 304. As to what amounts to a ratification, see 2 Hill, S. C. 479; 123 Mass. 88. The person with whom the minor contracts will be bound by all the consequences; 2 Stra. 937; 2 Maule & S. 205; 1 Watts, 412; 3 Green, N. J. 343.

Lunatics. A lunatic is probably not absolutely incapable of being a partner; Lind. Part. *84; since the insanity of a partner does not per se dissolve the firm, but simply amounts to a sufficient cause for a court of equity to decree a dissolution; 1 Cox, Ch. 107; 2 M. & K. 125; 15 Johns. 57. Whether a contract by a lunatic to become a partner can in all cases be avoided by him, is, perhaps, unsettled; Story, Part. § 7, n. 1.

Married women. Married women, at common law, are incapable of becoming partners, since they are generally unable to contract or engage in trade; Story, Part. § 10; 3 De G. M. & G. *18; Lind. Part. *84. But where a married woman is authorized by custom, statute, or otherwise (e. g. because her husband is an alien, or on account of a divorce a mensa et thoro) to trade as a feme sole, she may probably be a partner; 52 Miss. 402; Story, Part. § 10; Pars. Part. 25. The mere consent of her husband to her trading as a feme sole does not necessarily permit her to become a partner; Story, Part. § 12. In some states a married woman may be a partner as to her separate estate; 74 Penn. 448. In 10 Paige, Ch. 82, it was held that a married woman, by acting as partner and continuing the business after her husband's death, created a partnership from the beginning.

Number of persons. Generally speaking, the common law imposes no restriction as to the number of persons who may carry on trade as partners; 1 Col. Part. § 10; 27 Ind. 399. But a partnership cannot consist of but one person; 46 Mich. 449.

Who are partners.

See PARTNERSHIP; 15 Am. L. Rev. 785.

Powers of partners.

General rule. It has been customary to derive the authority of a partner from an assumed relation of mutual agency between the members of the firm, and it is true that the firm is responsible for whatever is done by any of the partners while acting for it within the limits of the authority conferred by the nature of the business carried on; 6 Bing. 792; 8 H. L. C. 268; Lind. Part. *236; Poth. Part. c. 5, n. 90; 4 Exch. 623; 36 Penn. 498; 58 Mo. 532; 45 Miss. 499; 59 Ala. 386. It is perhaps more accurate to trace a partner's power to his standing as a co-principal, and to consider his agency an incident of this relation; 5 Ch. Div. 458; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. Whatever the source of a partner's power, it is as a rule limited to acts incident to carrying on, in the usual way, the particular business in which the firm is engaged, and each partner has the power to manage the ordinary business of the firm, and, consequently, to bind his co-partners, whether they be ostensible, dormant, actual, or nominal; 7 East, 210; 2 B. & Ald. 673; 1 Cr. & J. 316; by whatever he may do, in the course of such management, as entirely as to bind himself. But the acts of a partner wholly unconnected with the business of the partnership do not bind the firm; 4 Exch. 623; 2 B. & Ald. 678; 8 Me. 320; 15 Pick. 290; 3 Johns. Ch. 23; Story, Part. § 112–113 and n.

In special cases.

Accounts. One partner can bind his firm by rendering an account relating to a partnership transaction; 8 Cl. & F. 121; Lind. Part. *264.

Actions. One partner can bring an action on firm account in his own and his co-partners' names without their consent, but they are entitled to indemnity if he sues against their will; Lind. Part. *473; 2 Cr. & M. 318; 67 Mo. 568. This power of a partner survives the dissolution of the firm; 1 E. D. Sm. 423. One partner cannot, as a rule, sue in his own name for a firm debt; the suit must be in the names of all; Penn. N. J. 711.

Appearance, entering an. In an action against partners, one may enter an appearance for the rest, or authorize an attorney to do so; 7 Term, 207; 17 Vt. 531; 4 Kan. 240. But not after dissolution of the firm; 2 McCord, 311. Nor can one partner bind his co-partners personally and individually by entering an appearance for them when they are not within the jurisdiction, nor served with process; 9 Cush. 390; 11 How. 165.

Arbitration. As a general rule one partner cannot bind the firm by submitting any of its affairs to arbitration, whether by deed or parol; 3 Kent, 49; 3 Bingh. 101; 1 Cr. M. & R. 681; 3 C. & B. 742; 35 Mich. 5; 40 Vt. 460; 19 Johns. 137; 1 Pet. 221. The reason given being that such a power is unnecessary for carrying on the business in the ordinary way; Lind. Part. *266.

This rule has not been universally adopted, and in Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Illinois one partner may bind the firm by submission to arbitration, by an agreement not under seal; 89 Penn. 453; 3 T. B. Monr. 435; 25 Ill. 48; and see Wright, Ohio, 420.

Assignments. The right of a partner to dispose of the property of the firm extends to the assignment of at least a portion of it as security for antecedent debts, as well as for debts thereafter to be contracted on account of the firm; Story, Part. § 101; 5 Cra. 289; 58 Mo. 532; 17 Vt. 394. The assignment may be for the benefit of one or of several creditors; 4 Day, 428; 6 Pick. 360; 5 Watts, 22. Although the authorities differ, the better opinion seems to be that one partner cannot, without the knowledge or consent of his co-partners, assign all the property of the firm to a trustee for the benefit of creditors; 13 Minn. 43; 34 Mo. 329; 50 Ala. 251; 29 Ohio St. 441; 32 Wisc. 444; 17 Vt. 390; Lind. Part. *266 n.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes. A partner may draw, accept, and indorse bills and notes in the name, and for the use of the firm, for purposes within the scope of the partnership business; Story, Part. § 102; 7 Term, 210; 20 Miss. 226; 119 Mass. 215; 78 Ill. 284. A restriction of this power by agreement between the partners does not affect third persons unless they have notice of it; 27 La. An. 352; 44 Miss. 283. This power cannot be exercised after dissolution of the firm; 42 Mich. 110; 51 Cal. 531; unless such dissolution be without proper notice; 130 Mass. 591. A bill or note made by one partner in the name of the firm is prima facie evidence that it was executed for partnership purposes; 31 Mich. 373; 34 Penn. 344; 16 Wend. 505; 44 Miss. 283.

A partner has no implied authority to indorse a note made payable to a co-partner, although for firm account; 64 Ga. 221; nor to bind the firm as a party to a bill or note for the accommodation of or as a mere surety for another; 2 Cush. 300; 19 Johns. 154; 5 Conn. 574; 21 Miss. 122; 31 Me. 452; 3 Humph. 597; unless by special authority implied from the nature of the business or previous course of dealing; 3 Kent, 46; 3 Humph. 597; 4 Hill, N. Y. 261; and the burden is on the holder of the instrument to show such authority; 19 Johns. 154; 2 Cush. 314, 315; 2 Penn. 177; 21 Miss. 122; 22 Me. 188, 189. Direct or positive proof is not necessary; the authority or ratification may be inferred from circumstances; 2 Cush. 309; 22 Me. 188, 189; 14 Wend. 133; 2 Litt. 41; 10 Vt. 268.

Borrowing money. One partner may borrow money on the credit of the firm, when it is necessary for the transaction of the partnership business in the ordinary way; Lind. Part. *269; 8 Ves. 540; 115 Mass. 388; 62 Penn. 393; 75 Ill. 629; 61 Ala. 143.

Checks. One partner has the implied power to bind the firm by checks drawn on its bankers in the partnership name; 3 C. B. N. S. 442; Pars. Part. §§ 102–102 a. Such checks must not be post-dated; L. R. 6 Q. B. 209.

Compromise. A partner may compromise with the debtors or creditors of the firm; Story, Part. § 115; 30 Conn. 1; 7 Gill, 49; and see 10 Conn. 269.

Confession of judgment. One partner cannot, by confessing a voluntary judgment against the firm, bind his co-partners, unless actually brought into court by service of process against him and his co-partners. But a judgment so confessed will bind the partner who confessed it; 3 C. B. 742; Lind. Part. *474, notes; 36 Penn. 458; 13 Iowa, 496; 32 Vt. 709; 30 La. An. 692; but see 13 Ab. Pl. 192; 22 How. 209; and 32 La. An. 607; where it was held that a "commercial partner" has a right to confess judgment on behalf of the firm.

Contracts. A partner has the power to bind the firm by simple contracts within the scope of the partnership business; 15 Mass. 75; 5 Pet. 529; Lind. Part. *275 n.

It has been held, however, that a partner, without authority express or implied from circumstances, cannot bind the firm by a contract to convey the partnership real estate unless the contract is subsequently ratified; 5 Hill, N. Y. 107.

Debts. One partner may receive debts due the firm, and payment to him by the debtor extinguishes the claim; 12 Mod. 446; 1 Wash. Va. 77; 2 Blackf. 371; 14 La. An. 681; 4 Binn. 375; even after dissolution; 15 Ves. 198. A partner may also bind the firm by assenting to the transfer of a debt due to it, as the transfer of the firm's account from one banker to another; 2 H. & N. 326. But a partner cannot employ the partnership funds to pay his own pre-existing debt, without the express or implied consent of his co-partners; 18 Conn. 294; 12 Pet. 221; Lind. Part. *277 n. (2); 31 Ala. 532; 28 Ohio St. 55; 94 Penn. 31.

Deeds. One partner has no implied authority to bind his co-partners by a deed, even for a debt or obligation contracted in the ordinary course of commercial dealings within the scope of the partnership business; Story, Part. § 117; 7 Term, 207; 3 Kent, 47; 11 Ohio St. 223; 26 Vt. 154. Such an instrument binds the maker only; 62 Penn. 393; 7 Ohio St. 463. But a deed made by one partner in the name and for the use of the firm will bind the others if they assent to it, or subsequently adopt it; and this consent or adoption may be by parol; 26 Vt. 154; 11 Pick. 400. One partner may convey by deed property of the firm which he might have conveyed without deed. The seal in such a case would be surplusage; 2 Ohio St. 478; 5 Hill, N. Y. 107; 7 Metc. 244; 8 Leigh, 415; Lind. Part. 279 n.

Distress. Where a lease has been granted by the firm, any partner may distrain or appoint a bailiff to do so; 4 Bing. 562, and cases there cited.

Firm property. Each partner has the power to dispose of the entire right of his co-partners in the partnership effects, for the purposes of the partnership business and in the name of the firm; Story, Part. § 9. This power is held not to extend to real estate, which a single partner cannot transfer without special authority; Story, Part. § 101; 1 Brock. 456; 3 McLean, 27. Since the power to transfer the firm property must be exercised for the ordinary purposes of the partnership business, it is held that a partner's employment of firm capital in a new partnership, which he forms for his firm with third persons, charges him for a conversion of the fund to his own use; 25 Ohio St. 180.

Guarantees. A partner derives no authority from the mere relation of partnership to bind the firm as guarantor of the debt of another; 5 Q. B. 833; 4 Exch. 623; Lind. Part. *281; 31 Me. 454; 21 Miss. 122; 35 Penn. 517. If the contract of guaranty is strictly within the scope of the firm business, one partner may bind the firm by it; 41 Iowa, 518.

Insurance. One partner may effect an insurance of the partnership goods; 4 Camp. 66; 1 M. & G. 130. The assignment of a partner's interest in the firm stock without the insurer's consent, does not violate a policy of insurance upon it; 27 Ohio St. 1.

Leases. Inasmuch as a lease is under seal the rule is that a partner has no power to contract on behalf of the firm for a lease of a building for partnership purposes; Lind. Part. *284; 22 Beav. 606. But it is held that a partner may bind the firm for the rent of premises necessary for partnership purposes, and so used; 47 Conn. 26; 21 La. An. 21.

Majority, power of. The weight of authority seems to be in favor of the power of a majority of the firm, acting in good faith, to bind the minority in the ordinary transactions of the partnership business; 3 Kent, 45, and note; Story, Part. § 123, and notes; T. & R. 496; 33 Beav. 595; 4 Johns. Ch. 473; 46 Penn. 434; 27 Ala. 245; 49 Ga. 417. But see 6 Ves. 773; 16 Vin. Abr. 244; 1 Y. & J. 227; 57 Penn. 365. It is said by a learned writer that, in the absence of an express stipulation, a majority must decide as to the disposal of the partnership property; 3 Chitty, Com. Law, 234; but the power of the majority must be confined to the ordinary business of the partnership; 9 Hare, 326; 3 De G. & J. 123; 4 K. & J. 733; 2 Phill. 740; 14 Beav. 367; 2 De G. M. & G. 49; 3 Sm. & G. 176; it does not extend to the right to change any of the articles therein; Story, Part. § 125; 4 Johns. Ch. 573; 32 N. H. 9; nor to engage the partnership in transactions for which it was never intended; 3 Maule & S. 488; 1 Taunt. 241; 1 S. & S. 31. Where a majority is authorized to act, it must be fairly constituted and must proceed with the most entire good faith; T. & R. 525; 10 Hare, 493; 5 De G. & S. 310.

Mortgages. A partner has no implied power to make a legal mortgage of partnership real estate; Lind. Part. *284; 2 Humph. 534. But one party may execute a valid chattel mortgage of firm property, without the consent of his co-partners; 47 Wisc. 261; 18 Minn. 232; and see 116 Mass. 289. It has been held that a partner's mortgage of his separate estate to the firm is valid; 30 La. An. 869; also that where there are firm improvements on a partner's land, his mortgage of the land carries the improvements with it to the mortgagee without notice; 7 Barb. 263.

Pledges of firm property. As a natural consequence of a partner's power to borrow money for the firm, he may pledge its personal property for that purpose; 3 Kent, 46; 10 Hare, 453; 7 M. & G. 607; 3 Bradw. 261. It is thought that a partner's equitable mortgage of firm real estate, by depositing deeds of partnership property as a pledge, would be valid; Lind. Part. *285.

Purchases. A partner may bind the firm by purchasing on credit such goods as are necessary for carrying on the business in the usual way; 2 C. & K. 828; 5 W. & S. 564; 19 Ga. 520; 76 N. C. 139.

Receipts. The power of a partner to receipt for the firm is incident to his power to receive money for it; see debts; Story, Part. § 115.

Relative extent of each partner's power. In all ordinary matters relating to the partnership, the powers of the partners are coextensive, and neither has a right to exclude another from an equal share in the management of the concern or from the possession of the partnership effects; 2 Paige, Ch. 310; 16 Ves. 61; 2 J. & W. 558; Lind. Part. *540.

Releases. This rule that one partner cannot bind his co-partners by deed does not extend to releases; 10 Moore, 393; 2 Co. 68; 3 Johns. 68; 4 Gill & J. 310; 3 Kent, 48. As a release by one partner is a release by all; Lind. Part. *293; 2 Rolle, Abr. Release, 410 D; 21 Ill. 604; 37 Vt. 573; so a release to one partner is a release to all; 5 Gill & J. 314; 23 Pick. 444.

Sales. A partner has power to sell any of the partnership goods; Cowp. 445; 3 Kent, 44; see 2 Stark. 287; even the entire stock if the sale be free from fraud on the part of the purchaser; and such sale dissolves the firm, although the term for which it was formed has not expired; Lind. Part. *295, n.; 24 Pick. 89; 5 Watts, 22; 59 Ala. 538. See, contra, 8 Bosw. 495. A sale by one partner of his share of the stock dissolves the firm and gives the purchaser the right to an account; 50 Cal. 615. A bona fide sale of all the partnership effects by one partner to another is valid, and the property becomes separate estate of the purchaser, although the firm and both partners are at the time insolvent; 9 Cush. 553; 21 Conn. 130; 21 N. H. 462.

Servants. One partner has the implied power to hire servants for partnership purposes; 9 M. & W. 79; 74 Penn. 166; and probably to discharge them, though not against the will of his co-partner; Lind. Part. *296.

Specialties. As a rule, the relation of partnership gives a partner no authority to bind his co-partners by specialty; Story, Part. § 117; and see Deeds and Mortgages. But it has been held that a partner may bind his firm by an executed contract under seal, because the firm is really bound by the act, and the seal is merely evidence; 38 Penn. 231; and as stated above, a partner may bind his firm by a release under seal. A lender may disregard a specialty executed by one partner, for a loan, and recover from the firm in assumpsit; 98 Ill. 27.

Warranties. It is laid down as a general rule that a partner has no implied authority to bind the firm by a warranty; Parsons, Part. *217. But the question is always open to evidence, and a warranty by one partner is held to bind the firm, when it is shown to be incident to the business; 2 B. & Ald. 679.

Liabilities.

General rule. If an act is done by one partner on behalf of the firm, and it can be said to have been necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business in the ordinary way, the firm will primâ facie be liable, although in point of fact the act was not authorized by the other partners; but if the act cannot be said to have been necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business in the ordinary way, the firm will primâ facie not be liable; 10 B. & C. 128; 14 M. & W. 11; Lind. Part. *237. As to reason for such liability, see Powers, supra.

Concerning matters relating to admissions. It is laid down as a general rule that partners are bound by the admissions, representations, and acknowledgments of one of their number, concerning partnership transactions; Story, Part. § 107; Parsons, Part. 201; 1 Harr. N. J. 41. A better rule seems to be that the admissions of one partner with reference to a partnership transaction are evidence against the firm; Lind. Part. *264; 2 C. & P. 232; 1 Stark. 81; but not necessarily conclusive evidence; Lind. Part. *264; 2 K. & J. 491; 5 Stew. N. J. 828. It is held that the admission of one partner in legal proceedings is the admission of all; Story, Part. § 107; 1 Maule & S. 259; 1 Camp. 82; 40 Md. 499; 68 Ind. 110; 47 Mo. 346; 4 Conn. 326; 15 Mass. 44; 2 Wash. C. C. 388.

Agreements inter se. No arrangement between the partners themselves can limit or prevent their ordinary responsibilities to third persons, unless the latter assent to such arrangement; 2 B. & Ald. 679; 3 Kent, 41; 5 Mas. 187, 188; 5 Pet. 129; 3 B. & C. 427. But where the creditor has express notice of a private arrangement between the partners, by which either the power of one to bind the firm or his liability on partnership contracts is qualified or defeated, such creditor will be bound by the arrangement; 12 N. H. 275; 4 Ired. 129; 38 N. H. 287; 6 Pick. 372; 4 Johns. 251; 5 Conn. 597, 598; 1 Campb. 404; 5 Bro. P. C. 489.

Attachment. A partner's interest in a firm is liable to attachment by his creditors; Pars. Part. 382; 7 C. B. 229; 2 Johns. Ch. 548; 8 N. H. 252.

Contracts. See Powers, supra.

Contribution. A partner's contribution to the capital of his firm is a partnership debt for the repayment of which each partner is liable; 119 Mass. 38. Failure of a partner to pay his contribution in full does not entitle his co-partner to exclude him from the business without a dissolution; 3 C. E. Green, 385.

Debts. Each partner is liable to pay the whole partnership debts. In what proportion the partners shall contribute is a matter merely among themselves; Lord Mansfield, 5 Burr. 2613. Universally, whatever agreement may exist among the partners themselves, stipulating for a restricted responsibility, and however limited may be the extent of his own separate beneficial interest in, and however numerous the members of, the partnership, each individual member is liable for the joint debt to the whole extent of his property; 5 Burr. 2611; 9 East, 516; 1 V. & B. 157; 2 Des. 148; 6 S. & R. 333; 34 Ohio St. 187. In Louisiana, ordinary partners are bound in solido for the debts of the partnership; La. Civ. Code, art. 2843; each partner is bound for his share of the partnership debts, calculating such share in proportion to the number of partners, without attention to the proportion of the stock or profits each is entitled to; Id. art. 2844.

An incoming partner is not liable for the debts of the firm incurred before he became a member, unless he assumes them by agreement; 58 Penn. 179; 27 La. An. 352; 73 Ill. 381; 6 Munf. 118. But a retiring partner remains liable for the outstanding debts of the firm; 1 Taunt. 104; 4 Russ. 430.

Dormant partners. Dormant partners are, when discovered, equally liable with those who are held out to the world as partners, upon contracts made during the time they participate in the profits of the business; 1 Cr. & J. 316; 5 Mas. 176; 9 Pick. 272; 5 Pet. 529; 2 Harr. & G. 159; 5 Watts, 454; 1 Dougl. 371; 1 H. Blackst. 37; 3 Price, 538; 21 Miss. 656; 25 Ill. 359. This liability is said to be founded on their participation in the profits; 1 Stor. 371, 376; 5 Mas. 187, 188; 5 Pet. 574; 10 Vt. 170; 16 Johns. 40; 1 H. Blackst. 31; 2 id. 247. Another reason given for holding them liable is that they might otherwise receive usurious interest without any risk; Lord Mansfield, 1 Dougl. 371; 4 B. & Ald. 663; 3 C. B. 641, 650; 10 Johns. 226. But inasmuch as a dormant partner differs from an ostensible partner only in being unknown as such, the liability of each must be owing to the same cause, viz.: that they are principals in the business, the dormant partner being undisclosed; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. Sharing profits is simply evidence of this relation; 5 Ch. Div. 458; and the usurious interest theory is so palpably illogical that it has never been accepted to any extent; 2 W. Blackst. 997.

Dower. It has been held that a partner's widow is entitled to dower in firm lands subject to the equities of the parties; 3 Stew. (N. J.) 415. But see 1 Ohio St. 535. Firm debts are a lien on partnership lands paramount to a widow's right of dower; 8 Ohio St. 328.

Firm funds. A partner who withdraws firm funds from the business, thereby diminishing the stock, and applies them to his own use, is liable to the others for the injury; 1 J. J. Marsh. 507; 3 Stor. 101; and funds so used by a partner may be followed into his investments; 1 Stew. (N. J.) 595.

Fraud. One partner will be bound by the fraud of his co-partner in contracts relating to the affairs of the partnership, made with innocent third persons; 2 B. & Ald. 795; 1 Metc. Mass. 563; 6 Cow. 497; 2 Cl. & F. 250; 7 T. B. Monr. 617; 7 Ired. 4; 15 Mass. 75, 81, 331; 56 Ind. 406; 73 Ill. 381; Lind. Part. *314. This doctrine proceeds upon the ground that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, he shall suffer who has been the cause or the occasion of the confidence and credit reposed in such third person; 1 Metc. Mass. 562, 563. The liability, therefore, does not arise when there is collusion between the fraudulent partner and the party with whom he deals; 1 East, 48, 53; or the latter has reason to suppose that the partner is acting on his own account; Peake, 80, 81; 2 C. B. 821; 10 B. & C. 298.

Not only gross frauds, but intrigues for private benefit, are clearly offences against the partnership at large, and, as such, are relievable in a court of equity; 15 Ves. 227; 3 Kent, 51, 52; 1 Sim. 52, 89; 17 Ves. 298.

Insolvency. It has been held that the discharge of the partners in insolvency, as individuals, does not relieve them from liability for the firm debts; 56 Cal. 631.

Judgments. The rule is that a judgment obtained against one partner on a firm liability is a bar to an action against his co-partners on the same obligation; Lind. Part. *451; 3 De G. & J. 33; 4 McLean, 51; 11 Gill & J. 11; see contra, 14 Bush, 777; except when they are abroad and cannot be sued with effect; Ewell's Lind. Part. *451; 4 De G. & S. 199. But in Pennsylvania and other states this rule is changed by statute. Where one partner is sued and judgment is given for him, the creditor may still have recourse to the others; 2 H. & C. 717.

Mismanagement. As a rule, a partner is not liable to the firm for the mismanagement of its business; Penn. N. J. 717. Because it is unreasonable to hold a partner, who acts fairly and for the best interests of the firm according to his judgment, liable for a loss thus unwittingly occasioned; 3 Wash. C. C. 224.

Notice. A retiring ostensible partner remains liable to old customers of the firm who have no notice of his retirement; 51 Ala. 126; 57 Ind. 284; 83 Penn. 148. Actual notice is not necessary to escape liability to new customers; Wade, Notice, 226; even though the business is continued in the same firm name; 36 Ohio St. 135. As a general rule, notice to one partner of any matters relating to the business of the firm is notice to all; 40 Mich. 546; 5 Bosw. 319; Lind. Part. *287; 40 N. H. 267; 6 La. An. 684; 20 Johns. 176.

Surviving partner. The surviving partner stands chargeable with the whole of the partnership debts, he takes the partnership property by survivorship, for all purposes of holding and administering the estate, until the effects are reduced to money and the debts paid; 3 Kent, 37; 5 Metc. Mass. 576, 585; 10 Gill & J. 404; 30 Me. 386; 3 Paige, Ch. 527; 13 Miss. 44; 18 Conn. 294. See 1 Exch. 164; Year B. 38 Edw. III. f. 7, t. Accompt. The debts of the partnership must be collected in the name of the surviving partner; 6 Cow. 441; Story, Part. § 346; 3 Kent, 37; 4 Metc. Mass. 540. In Louisiana the surviving partner does not possess the right until he is authorized by the court of probate to sue alone for or receive partnership debts; 6 La. 194.

Torts. The firm is not liable for the torts of a partner committed outside of the usual course of the partnership business, unless they are assented to or adopted by its members; 42 N. H. 25; 87 Ill. 508; 2 Iowa, 580; 4 Blatch. 129; 32 Miss. 17. Otherwise, in regard to torts committed in conducting the affairs of the partnership or those assented to by the firm; Lind. Part. *299: as, for the negligent driving of a coach by a member of a firm of coach proprietors; 4 B. & C. 223; or for the negligence of a servant employed by the firm while transacting its business; 14 Gray, 191; or for the conversion of property by a partner to be appropriated to the use of the firm; 87 Ill. 508. Demand of, and a refusal by, one partner to deliver up property is evidence of a conversion by the firm; 4 Hill, N. Y. 13; 24 Wend. 169; 4 Rawle, 120.

Rights and Duties.

General rules. Good faith, reasonable diligence and skill, and the exercise of a sound judgment and discretion, lie at the very foundation of the relation of partnership. In this respect the same general rules apply to partners which are applicable to the other fiduciary relations; Story, Part. § 169; 14 Beav. 250; 10 Hare, 532; 1 Johns. Ch. 470; 53 Mo. 122; 81 Ill. 221; 80 Penn. 234. It becomes, therefore, the implied duty of each partner to devote himself to the interests of the business, and to exercise due diligence and skill for the promotion of the common benefit of the partnership. No partner has a right to engage in any business or speculation which must necessarily deprive the partnership of a portion of his skill, industry, or capital; 3 Kent, 51, 52; 1 Johns. Ch. 305; 1 S. & S. 133; nor to place himself in a position which gives him a bias against the discharge of his duty; Story, Part. § 175; 1 S. & S. 124; 9 Sim. 607; 11 S. & R. 41, 48; 3 Kent, 61; nor to make use of the partnership stock for his own private benefit; 6 Madd. 367; 4 Beav. 534; 16 id. 485; 1 Macn. & G. 294; 1 Sim. 52; 3 Stew. (N. J.) 254.

Concerning matters relating to account, suit in equity for. Every partner has a right to an account from his co-partner, which may be enforced by a suit in equity, whereby a partner is enabled to secure the application of partnership assets to the payment of firm debts and the distribution of the surplus among the members of the firm; 8 Beav. 106; 5 Ves. 792; 24 Conn. 279. A silent partner may have a bill for an account; 98 Mass. 118. It has been held that a partner's bill for an account will be barred by the statute of limitations; 3 C. E. Green, 457. But not for secret profits made by one partner in transacting firm business; 3 Stew. (N. J.) 254. A partner cannot maintain account against the co-partner for the profits of an illegal traffic; 120 Mass. 285.

Accounts. In order to give the partners an opportunity of seeing that the business is being carried on for their mutual advantage, it is the duty of each to keep an accurate account ready for inspection; 2 J. & W. 556; Story, Part. § 181; and see 104 Mass. 436; 16 Fla. 99; 1 De G. & S. 692; 12 Sim. 460; 3 Y. & C. 655; 20 Beav. 219.

Actions. As a general rule an action at law does not lie by one partner against his co-partners for money paid or liabilities incurred on account of the partnership, because without an account it is impossible to tell whether a partner is a debtor or creditor of the firm; Story, Part. § 219; 33 Mo. 557; 54 Barb. 353. See, contra, Gow, Part. c. 2, § 3. There are, however, many circumstances under which partners may sue each other; see Story, Part. § 219, note (2).

Articles of copartnership. Partners may enter into any agreements between themselves, which are not void as against statutory provisions or general principles of law, even though they do conflict with the ordinary rules of the law of partnership, and such engagements will be enforced between the parties; Pars. Part. *232; 28 E. L. & Eq. 7. But they do not bind third persons, unless adopted by them; 2 B. & Ald. 697; 8 M. & W. 703; 1 Dall. 269; 14 Ohio St. 592; 16 Wend. 505.

Claims against the firm. A partner may be a firm creditor and is entitled to payment of his claim before judgment creditors of the individual partners; 5 C. E. Green, 288.

Compensation. As it is the duty of partners to devote themselves to the interests of the business, it follows that they are not entitled to any special compensation for so doing, although the services performed by them are very unequal in amount and value, unless there is an express stipulation for remuneration; 7 Paige, Ch. 483; 4 Gill, 338; 2 D. & B. Eq. 123; Story, Part. 182; 44 Iowa, 428; 69 Penn. 30; nor for services performed prior to the partnership, although they enure to its benefit; 124 Mass. 305. A surviving partner has been held entitled to compensation for continuing the business, in order to save the good-will; 26 Ohio St. 190. See 118 Mass. 237.

Contribution. Since partners are co-principals and all liable for the firm debts, any partner who pays its liabilities is, in absence of agreement to the contrary, entitled to contribution from his co-partners; Lind. Part. *760; 6 De G. M. & G. 572; 3 Ill. 464; 18 Penn. 351.

Dissolution. A member of an ordinary partnership, the duration of which is indefinite, may dissolve it at any time; Lind. Part. *220; 51 Ind. 478; 76 N. Y. 373; 4 Col. 567. It will then continue only for purposes of winding up; 17 Ves. 298; 5 Leigh, 583. But a court of equity would perhaps interfere to prevent irreparable injury by an untimely dissolution; 1 Swanst. 512, note. Where there is an agreement to continue the business for a certain time, one partner has no right to have a dissolution except for special cause; 50 Barb. 169; s. c. 3 Abb. Pr. U. S. 163. In general, any circumstance which renders the continuance of the partnership, or the attainment of the end for which it was created, practically impossible, would seem sufficient to warrant a dissolution; Lind. Part. *222; 22 Beav. 471.

Exemption. The right of partners to statutory exemption out of firm property is a disputed point, and depends somewhat on the statutes of the several states. In Ohio and Pennsylvania it has been decided that they are not so entitled; 26 Ohio St. 317; 44 Penn. 442. Contra, 57 Ga. 229; 44 Mich. 86; 37 N. Y. 350; and see 67 N. C. 140; 101 Mass. 105; Thomps. Hom. & Ex. § 197.

Firm name, use of. It has been held that one partner has no right to use the firm name after dissolution; 7 South. 749; 7 Abb. Pr. 202; 7 Phila. 257; the reason given being that such a continued use of the firm name would impair the value of the good-will and might also subject the retired partners to additional liabilities; Lind. Part. 862. For cases contra see 3 Swanst. 490; 7 Sim. 421; 28 Beav. 586; 4 Denio, 559.

Firm property. Each partner has a claim, not to any specific share or interest in the property in specie, as a tenant in common has, but to the proportion of the residue which shall be found to be due to him upon the final balance of their accounts, after the conversion of the assets and the liquidation thereout of all claims upon the partnership; and therefore each partner has a right to have the same applied to the discharge and payment of all such claims before any one of the partners, or his personal representatives, or his individual creditors, can claim any right or title thereto; Story, Part. § 97; 7 Jarman, Conv. 68; Cowp 469; 1 Ves. Sen. 239; 4 Ves. 396; 6 id. 119; 17 id. 193.

Each partner has also a specific lien on the present and future property of the partnership, the stock brought in, and every thing coming in during the continuance and after the determination of the partnership, not only for the payment of debts due to third persons, but also for the amount of his own share of the partnership stock, and for all moneys advanced by him beyond that amount for the use of the partnership, as also for moneys abstracted by his co-partners beyond the amount of his share; Story, Part. §§ 97, 326, 441; 3 Kent, 65, 66; 8 Dana, 278; 10 Gill & J. 253; 20 Vt. 479; 9 Cush. 558; 9 Beav. 239; 20 id. 20; 25 id. 280. This lien attaches on real estate held by the partnership for partnership purposes, as well as upon the personal estate; 5 Metc. Mass. 562, 577–579, 585; and is coextensive with the transactions on joint account; 1 Dana, 58; 11 Ala. N. S. 412.

Upon a settlement of a partnership by an account, the assets are divided among the partners in proportion to their contributions; and each partner is liable for a deficit in proportion to his share of the profits; 120 Mass. 324.

Fraud. A partner has an equity to rescind the partnership and be indemnified for his co-partner's fraud in inducing him to enter the business; 126 Mass. 304; 3 De G. & J. 304; 1 Giff. 355. Where the partnership suffers from the fraud or wanton misconduct of any partner in transacting firm business, he will be responsible to his co-partners for it; Story, Part. § 169.

Interest. As a general rule partners are not entitled to interest on their respective capitals unless by special agreement, or unless it has been the custom of the firm to have such interest charged in its accounts; 3 De G. J. & S. 1; 6 Beav. 433; 89 Penn. 139; 119 Mass. 38; 20 Ala. 747; 92 Ill. 92. But a partner is entitled to interest on advances made by him to the firm; 6 Mad. 145; 4 De G. M. & G. 36; 129 Mass. 517; 14 N. J. Eq. 44; Lind. Part. *787; 17 Vt. 242; 79 N. Y. 366; and no express agreement is necessary; 1 McCart. Ch. 44. See, however, 8 Dana, 214; Pars. Part. *229, note (y); 24 Conn. 185.

Liquidating partner. It is the duty of those upon whom, by appointment or otherwise, it devolves, after the dissolution of a firm, to wind up the affairs of the partnership, to act for the best advantage of the concern, to make no inconsistent use of the property, and to seek no private advantage in the composition of debts or in any other transaction in the performance of this business; 1 Taunt. 104; 1 Swanst. 507; 2 id. 627. Nor, in this case, can any partner claim any commission for getting in the debts, or, in any other particular, reward or compensation for his trouble; 1 Knapp, P. C. 312; 3 Kent, 64, note; Story, Part. § 331 and note; 17 Pick. 519; 4 Gratt. 138; but in 16 Vt. 613, a partner who performed services in settling up the affairs of a firm after dissolution was allowed compensation for them. See Compensation, supra.

Litigation. A partner may recover the costs of carrying on litigation for the firm—but not compensation for conducting it, unless by express agreement; 2 Stew. N. J. 504.

Profits and losses, distribution of. As between the partners, they may by agreement stipulate for equal or unequal shares in the profit and loss of the partnership; Story, Part. § 23; but in the absence of any express agreement or stipulation between them, and of all controlling evidence and circumstances, the presumption has been held to be that they are interested in equal shares; Story, Part. § 24; 1 Mood. & R. 527; 6 Wend. 263; 9 Ala. N. s. 372; 13 id. 752; 2 Murph. 70; 5 Dana, 211; 1 Ired. Eq. 332; 1 J. J. Marsh. 506; 20 Beav. 98; 17 Ves. Ch. 49. And the circumstance that each partner has brought an unequal amount of capital into the common stock, or that one or more have brought in the whole capital and the others have only brought industry, skill, and experience, would not seem to furnish any substantial ground of difference as to the distribution; Story, Part. § 24; 3 Kent, 28, 29; 21 Me. 117.

It has sometimes been asserted, however, that it is a matter of fact, to be settled by a jury or by a court, according to all the circumstances, what would be a reasonable apportionment, uncontrolled by any natural presumption of equality in the distribution; Story, Partn. § 24; 2 Camp. 45; 7 Bligh, 432. The opinion in England seems divided; but in America the authorities seem decidedly to favor the doctrine of a presumed equality of interest. See American cases cited above; Story, Part. §§ 24–26.

Receiver, appointment of. To authorize a partner to demand the appointment of a receiver of a subsisting partnership, he must show such a case of gross abuse and misconduct on the part of his co-partner, that a dissolution ought to be decreed and the business wound up; Story, Part. §§ 228, 231; 2 Mer. 405; 8 C. E. Green, 208, 388. After dissolution a court of equity will appoint a receiver almost as a matter of course; Lind. Part. *1008; 1 Ch. Div. 600; 65 N. C. 162; 2 C. E. Green, 343; 20 Md. 30. But see 18 Ves. 281.

Set-off. It may be stated as a general rule in law and equity that there can be no set-off of joint debts against separate debts unless under a special agreement; Story, Part. § 396. Thus, a debt due by one of the members of a firm cannot be set off against a debt due the firm; 2 C. B. 821; 8 Scott, 257; 2 Bay, 146; 4 Wend. 583. Nor can a debt owing to a partner be set off against a debt due by the firm; 9 Exch. 153; 6 C. & P. 60; Lind. Part. *506; 1 South. 220.

Torts. If the partnership suffers loss from the gross negligence, unskilfulness, fraud, or other wanton misconduct of a partner in the partnership business, or from a known deviation from the partnership articles, he is ordinarily responsible over to the other partners for all losses and damages sustained thereby; 1 Sim. 89; Pothier, Part. n. 133; 3 Kent, 52, note; Story, Part. § 173 and note.

PARTNERSHIP. A relation founded upon a contract between two or more persons to do business as individuals on joint, undivided account.

A voluntary contract between two or more persons for joining together their money, goods, labor, and skill, or any or all of them, in some lawful commerce or business, under an understanding, express, or implied from the nature of the enterprise, that there shall be a communion of profit and loss between them, will constitute a partnership. Collyer, Part. § 2; 10 Me. 489; 3 Harr. N. J. 485; 5 Ark. 278.

An agreement that something shall be attempted with a view to gain, and that the gain shall be shared by the parties to the agreement, is the grand characteristic of every partnership, and is the leading feature in every definition of the term. See Ewell's Lind. Part. *1, *2, *3, where many definitions are collected.

There can be no doubt whatever that persons engaged in any trade, business, or adventure, upon the terms of sharing the profits and losses arising therefrom, are partners in that trade, business, or adventure. This is a true partnership, both between the parties and quoad third persons. 2 Bingh. N. C. 108; 3 Jur. N. s. 31, in the Rolls; Bissett, Part. Eng. ed. 7.

The law of partnership, as administered in England and in the United States, rests on a foundation composed of three materials,—the common law, the law of merchants, and the Roman law. Collyer, Part. § 1.

Partnership at the Roman law (societas) included every associated interest in property which resulted from contract; e. g. where two bought a farm together. Every other associated interest was styled communitas, e. g. where a legacy was left to two; Pothier, Droit Franc. III., 444; Ewell's Lind. Part. *58, note 2; 11 La. An. 277.

Partnership at the common law is an active notion. The relation implies a business and a turning of capital. It is to be contrasted with ownership, which is, whatever the tenancy, a passive notion; 1 Johns. 106; 54 Cal. 439. But there may be at the common law a joint purchase and an individual liability for the whole price without a partnership. In a purchase expressly by two the contract is prima facie joint with a consequent liability of each for the whole price. But this inference may be contradicted by circumstances known to the seller which indicate a division of title; Ewell's Lind. Part. *58 et seq.; 1 Wms. Saund. 291 c.; 4 Cow. 163, 232; 19 Ves. Jr. 441; 27 Iowa, 131; 9 Johns. 475; 15 Me. 17.

Partnership, in the Roman law, was in buying or selling. True partnership, at common law, is only in buying and selling. This peculiarity of the common law is due to the commercial origin of the relation and of the rules by which the relation is governed. The Roman societas was an outgrowth of the ancient tribal constitution. The common law partnership is an expedient of trade; 15 Wend. 187; 12 Wend. 386; 42 Ala. 179; Ewell's Lind. Part. *58 et seq.; 41 Me. 9; 1 Penn. 140; Camp. 793; 2 Johns. Cas. 329; 1 Johns. 106. Buying to sell again fixes the transaction as a joint one and establishes a partnership. The transaction is joint because the sale excludes the idea of division of title in the purchase. The property dealt in becomes the instrument of both parties in obtaining a totally distinct subject of distribution, i. e. the profit; 14 Wend. 187; 1 Hill, N. Y. 234; 3 Kent, *25. There must be an agreement, not a mere intention to sell jointly; 47 N. Y. 199.

In a partnership, the members do business in their unqualified capacity as men, without special privilege or exemption; they are treated in law as a number of individuals, occupying no different relation to the rest of the world than if each were acting singly; 7 Ves. 773; 3 V. & B. 180; Ewell's Lind. Part. *4, note. On the other hand, a corporation, though in fact but an association of individuals with special privileges and exemptions, is in contemplation of law a fictitious person distinct from the members who compose it; Ewell's Lind. Part. *4. Every unincorporated association for purposes of gain is a partnership; unless it can claim corporate privilege on the ground of a de facto standing; 27 Ind. 399; 66 N. Y. 425; 7 Penn. 165; Ewell's Lind. Part. *99, note; 65 Ill. 532; 4 Hun, 402. A club or association not for gain is not a partnership: it is not a commercial relation; Ewell's Lind. Part. *57; 6 Mo. App. 465; 22 Ohio St. 159; 97 Penn. 493.

Whether a partnership exists or not in a particular case is not a mere question of fact, but one mixed of law and fact. It is, nevertheless, generally to be decided by a jury. See 3 Harr. N. J. 358; 4 id. 190; 6 Conn. 347; 1 N. & M'C. 20; 1 Caines, 184; 2 Fla. 541; 3 C. B. N. S. 562, 563; 42 Ala. 179.

Elements of Partnership.

The elements of partnership are the contribution and a sharing in the profits. These two elements must be combined. Without contribution the alleged partner cannot be said to do business; unless he shares the profits, the business is not carried on for his account. Contribution without a share in the profits is a simple gift to the firm, by which firm creditors are enriched, not damaged. Sharing profits without contribution is a gift by the firm to the beneficiary, with which creditors may of course interfere by seizing the property and closing out the concern. In neither case, does the alleged partner enter into business relations with the customers and creditors of the firm; 3 Kent, *24, *25; 8 H. L. C. 286; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 8 Han, 189; L. R. 7 Exch. 218.

Contribution need not be made to the firm stock; any co-operation in the business will be enough; 4 East, 144; 16 Johns. 34; Story, Part. §§ 27, 40. A contribution must be kept in the concern, and takes the risk of the business; a loan, on the other hand, is made upon the personal credit of the partners merely, and may be used by them as they please; it is to be repaid at all events. Because of this difference, sharing profits in lieu of interest upon a loan does not create a partnership. The English statute to this effect has been decided to be merely declaratory; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 7 Ch. Div. 511; 62 N. Y. 508; 6 Pick. 372.

It has sometimes been said that sharing profits is the sole criterion of partnership: but this rule has been condemned. Again, it is called prima facie evidence of partnership, but a contribution will have the same effect. Each is an element in a relation not complete without both. Sharing profits without losses has been said to constitute a partnership as to third persons, a quasi-partnership; 1 Story, 371; 58 N. Y. 272; 13 Barb. 302. The doctrines by which a quasi-partnership results from merely sharing profits seem to find their root in decisions of a comparatively modern date. They are certainly not very clearly defined, and sometimes lead to great apparent injustice; Ewell's Lind. Part. *34 et seq.; 2 W. Blackst. 998; 18 C. B. 617; 3 N. H. 287, 307; 58 N. Y. 272.

It has been held that a quasi-partnership subsists between merchants who divide the commissions received by each other on the sale of goods recommended or "influenced" by the one to the other; 4 B. & Ald. 863. So between persons who agree to share the profits of a single isolated adventure; 9 C. B. 431; 1 Rose, 297; 4 East, 144; and between persons one of whom is in the position of a servant to the others, but is paid a share of the profits instead of a salary; 1 Deac. 341; 1 Rose, 92; and between persons one of whom is paid an annuity out of the profits made by the others; 17 Ves. 412; 8 Bingh. 469; or an annuity in lieu of any share in those profits; 2 W. Blackst. 999. So between the vendor and purchaser of a business, if the former guarantees a clear profit of so much a year, and is to have all profits beyond the amount guaranteed; 3 C. B. 641. The character in which a portion of the profits is received does not affect the result; see 1 Maule & S. 412; 10 Ves. 119; 21 Beav. 164; 5 Ad. & E. 28; 11 C. B. 406. Persons who share profits are quasi-partners although their community of interest may be confined to the profits; 2 B. & C. 401.

An agreement to share losses is not essential; that follows as an incident to the relation. Indeed all liability inter se may be guarded against by contract and a partnership may nevertheless subsist; 1 H. Blackst. 49; 3 M. & W. 357; 6 id. 119; 2 Bligh, 270; 3 C. B. 32, 39; Ewell's Lind. Part. *22; 7 Ala. 761; 5 La. An. 44. Partnership is a question of intention, and the intention which makes a partnership is to contribute to the business and share the profits. In this way, the parties became co-principals in a business carried on for their account. The law then creates a liability even against the express stipulations of the parties; L. R. 7 Exch. 218; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 8 H. L. C. 268. The question of intention is to be decided by a consideration of the whole agreement into which the parties have entered, and ought not to be made to turn upon a consideration of only a part of its provisions; 15 M. & W. 292; 2 B. & C. 401; 1 Stor. 371; 3 Kent, 27; 3 C. B. 250; Ewell's Lind. Part. *19.

An agreement to share profits, nothing being said about the losses, amounts primâ facie to an agreement to share losses also: so that an agreement to share profits is primâ facie an agreement for a partnership; and, accordingly, it is held that, unless an agreement to the contrary is shown, persons engaged in any business or adventure, and sharing the profits derived from it, are partners as regards that business or adventure. Still, it cannot be said that persons who share profits are necessarily and inevitably partners in the proper sense of the word; 1 Camp. 330; Ewell's Lind. Part. *19 note; 28 Ohio St. 319; 54 Mo. 525; 5 Gray, 59, 60; 12 Conn. 69; 12 N. H. 185; 15 Me. 284; 3 C. B. N. S. 562, 563. See 18 Johns. 34; 18 Wend. 175; 6 Conn. 347. Although a presumption of partnership would seem to arise in such a case; Collyer, Part. § 85; still, the particular circumstances of the case may be such as to repel this presumption. It may appear that the share of the profits taken was merely a compensation to one party for labor and service, or for furnishing the raw materials, or a mill-privilege, or a factory, or the like, from which the other is to earn profits; Story, Part. § 36; 5 Gray, 60; 8 Cush. 556, 562; 3 Kent, 33; 6 Halst. 181; 2 M'Cord, 421; but see 38 N. H. 289. Originally it was immaterial whether the profits were shared as gross or net; but the later cases have established a distinction. A division of gross returns is thought to be identical with a purchase for the purpose of division; the price represents the thing. There is no unity of interest; 1 Camp. 329; Story, Part. § 34; 3 Kent, 25, note; 3 M. & W. 357, 360, 361; 3 C. B. N. S. 544, 562; 4 Maule & S. 240; 5 N. Y. 186; 5 Denio, 68; Ewell's Lind. Part. *15 et seq. But the distinction is not absolutely decisive on the question of partnership; see 1 Camp. 330; 6 Vt. 119; 10 id. 170; 6 Pick. 335; 14 id. 193; 6 Metc. 91; 4 Me. 264; 12 Conn. 69; 38 N. H. 287, 304; Abbott, C. J., 4 B. & Ald. 663. The officers and crews of whaling and other fishing vessels, who are to receive certain proportions of the produce of the voyage in lieu of wages; 4 Esp. 182; 17 Mass. 206; 3 Pick. 435; 4 id. 234; 23 id. 495; 3 Stor. 112; 2 Y. & C. 61; captains of merchant-ships who, instead of wages, receive shares in the profits of the adventures on which they sail; 4 Maule & S. 240; or who take vessels under an agreement with the owners to pay certain charges and receive a share of the earnings; 6 Pick. 335; 16 Mass. 336; 7 Me. 261; persons making shipments on half-profits, and the like; 17 Mass. 206; 14 Pick. 195; have generally been held not to be partners with the owners. A clerk, of course, co-operates in the business; but his services are rendered to his employer and in the capacity of a subordinate. So long as his special function remains unchanged, the business may assume any complexion the employer pleases to give it. Hence sharing profits in lieu of wages is not a partnership. There is no true contribution; Ewell's Lind. Part. *20 et seq.; 69 Ill. 237; 16 Kan. 209; 118 Mass. 443; 34 Md. 49; 29 N. J. L. 270; 76 N. Y. 55; 14 Cal. 73; 43 Mo. 538; 44 Ga. 228. A factor, simple or del credere, may receive a portion of the profits in lieu of commissions without becoming a partner. His services are not contributed to the business as a whole, they are not co-ordinate with the investment of the consignor in the goods. The factor is agent for selling merely; 62 Penn. 374; 24 L. J. Ch. 58; 3 C. B. 32.

Where a business is assigned to trustees who are to manage it and pay creditors out of the profits, the creditors are not partners; they made no original contribution, and they do not strictly participate in the gain. The distribution of so-called profit is really the payment of a debt; 8 H. L. C. 268; but creditors who set up their insolvent debtor in business and share the profits with him, forbearing meanwhile to press their claims, are partners; 8 Hun, 189.

A distinction is made between a share in the profits and a commission equal to a certain per cent. on the profits. In the latter case there is no partnership, because no sharing in the profits as such. The rule is based upon authority, but is acknowledged to have no foundation in common sense. It is an attempt to escape from the rigidity of the supposition that a share in the profits must in all cases make a man a partner; L. R. 4 P. C. App. 419; 62 Penn. 374; 17 Ves. 404, 419; 18 Ves. 300; 12 Conn. 69; 6 Metc. 82; 5

Denio, 180; 3 Kent, 34; Ewell's Lind. Part. *37; 74 N. Y. 30.

In other cases, it is held that in order to render a man liable as partner he must have a specific interest in the profits as a principal trader; Collyer, Part. § 25; 12 Conn. 77, 78; 1 Denio, 337; 15 Conn. 73; 10 Metc. 303; 28 Ohio St. 319. But in reference to these positions the questions arise, When may a party be said to have a specific interest in the profits, as profits? when, as a principal trader?—questions in themselves very nice, and difficult to determine. See 6 Metc. 82; 12 Conn. 77.

Sometimes the partnership relation has been made dependent on the power to control the business. In strictness the only control necessary is the power to control the application of the contribution. A partner may have no power inter se to manage the business; 4 Sandf. 311; 1 Hem. & M. 85.

Again, partnership has been said to require that a partner have an initiative in the conduct of the business; but the proposition seems to lose sight of dormant partners; L. R. 4 P. C. 419.

Again, partnership has been made to depend on what is termed the legal title to the business: A was not a partner, though he shared in the profits of a business created solely by his contribution but assigned to B for A's protection; L. R. 1 C. P. 86. There are other cases in which considerable stress is laid on the right to an account of profits, as furnishing a rule of liability; 3 Kent, 25, note; 18 Wend. 184, 185; 3 C. B. N. S. 544, 561; Story, Partn. § 49. But, although it is true that every partner must have a right to an account, it seems not to be equally true that every party who has a right to an account is a partner; 5 Gray, 58.

Partnership has sometimes been styled a branch of the law and relation of principal and agent. But mutual agency is not the basis, it is the incident of partnership. Partners are co-principals, and the right and power of representation springs from this circumstance. A dormant partner is not at all the agent of the firm; L. R. 7 Ex. 227. The principal distinction between a partnership and a mere agency is that a partner has a community of interest with the other partners in the business and responsibilities of the partnership,—sometimes both in the stock and profits, and sometimes only in the profits,—whereas an agent, as such, has no interest in either; Story, Part. § 1; 16 Ves. 49; 17 id. 404; 4 B. & C. 67; 1 Deac. 341. The authority of a partner is much more extensive than that of a mere agent; 10 N. H. 16. See PARTNERS.

The formation of a contract of partnership does not require any particular formality. It is, in general, sufficient that it is formed by the voluntary consent of the parties, whether that be express or implied, whether it be by written articles, tacit approbation, or by parol contract, or even by mere acts; Story, Part. § 86; 3 Kent, 27; Daveis, 320; 4 Conn. 568. As a general rule a writing is unnecessary; 2 Barb. Ch. 336; Ewell's Lind. Part. *92. Under the Statute of Frauds, where there is an agreement that a partnership shall commence at some time more than a year from the making of the agreement, a writing is necessary; 5 B. & C. 108; as to partnership in lands, see infra.

Where there is no written agreement, the evidence generally relied upon to prove a partnership is the conduct of the parties, the mode in which they have dealt with each other, and the mode in which each has, with the knowledge of the others, dealt with other persons. This can be shown by the books of account, by the testimony of clerks, agents, and other persons, by letters and admissions, and, in short, by any of the modes in which facts can be established. As to the presumption arising from the joint retainer of solicitors, see 20 Beav. 98; 7 De G. M. & G. 239; 7 Hare, 159, 164. For cases in which partnership has been inferred from various circumstances, see 4 Russ. 247; 2 Bligh, N. S. 215; 3 Bro. P. C. 548; 5 id. 482; 1 Stark. 81; 2 Camp. 45. Though formed by deed, partnership may be dissolved by parol; Ewell's Lind. Part. *222.

Kinds. The Roman law recognized five sorts of partnership. First: societas universorum bonorum, a community of goods: probably a survival of the old tribal relation. Second: societas universorum quæ ex quæstu veniunt, or partnership in everything which comes from gain,—the usual form; Pothier, Part. nn. 29, 43. Such contracts are said to be within the scope of the common law; but they are of very rare existence; Story, Part. § 72; 5 Mas. 183. Third: societas vectigalium, a partnership in the collection of taxes. It was not dissolved by the death of a member; and if it was so agreed in the beginning, the heir immediately succeeded to the place of the ancestor. Fourth: societas negotiationis alicujus, i. e. in a given business venture. Fifth: societas certarum rerum vel unius rei, i. e. in the acquisition or sale of one or more specific things; Pothier, Part. *24 et seq.

At the French law, there are four principal classes of partnership; First: en nom collectif, the ordinary general partnership. Second: en commandite, an association corresponding to our limited partnership, composed of general and special partners in which the liability of the latter is limited to the fund invested by them. Third: anonyme, a joint stock company with limited liability. Fourth: en participation, simply a partnership with a dormant partner; Merlin, Rep. de Jur. tit. Societé; Mackenzie, Rom. Law, 217; Pothier, Part. *39 et seq; see Goiraud, Code, etc.

At the common law all partnership is for gain. General partnership is for a general line of business; 3 Kent, *25; Ewell's Lind. Part. *55, *56; Cowp. 814, 816. But where the parties are engaged in one branch of trade or business only, they would be usually spoken of as engaged in a general partnership; Story, Part. § 74. Special or particular partnership is one confined to a particular transaction. The extent or scope of the agreement is different in the two cases, but the character of the relation is the same. A partnership may exist in a single transaction as well as in a series; Davels, 323; 3 Kent, 30; 2 Ga. 18; 3 C. B. 641, 651; 9 id. 458; Ewell's Lind. Part. *36, *56; 49 Penn. 83. Special or limited partnership differs from the ordinary relation. It is composed of general partners to whom all the ordinary rules of partnership apply, and of limited partners with circumscribed power and liability limited to the amount of their contribution. The privilege is imparted by charter in England. In America it exists by statute; and unless the provisions of the act are strictly complied with, the association will be treated as a general partnership; 3 Kent, *35; 67 Penn. 330; 62 N. Y. 513; 91 Ill. 96. The special exemption of a limited partner will be recognized in other jurisdictions than the one in which the association is formed, though the firm has made the contract in the foreign jurisdiction; 69 N. Y. 24.

Another sort of association is styled "partnership limited." It is of recent, statutory origin and strongly resembles a corporation. The members incur no liability beyond the amount of their subscription; unless they violate in some manner the requirements of the statute under which they organize. It is a general requirement, that the word "limited" be in all cases added to the firm name.

There is still another class of partnerships, called "joint-stock companies." These generally embrace a large number of persons, but, except under express statute provisions, the members are liable to the same extent as in ordinary partnerships; Story, Part. § 164; 4 Metc. Mass. 535; 2 C. & P. 408, n.; 1 V. & B. 157; 63 Penn. 273; 24 Ill. 387; 37 Vt. 64.

Sub-Partnerships.

The delectus personæ, q. v., which is inherent in the nature of partnership, precludes the introduction of a stranger into the firm without the concurrence of all the partners; 7 Pick. 235, 238; 11 Me. 488; 1 Hill, N. Y. 234; 8 W. & S. 63; 16 Ohio, 166; 2 Rose, 254. Yet no partner is precluded from entering into a sub-partnership with a stranger: nam socii mei socius, meus socius non est. Dig. lib. 17, tit. 2, s. 20; Pothier, Part. ch. 5, § ii. n. 91. In such case the stranger may share the profits of the particular partner with whom he contracts; and although it has been decided that it is not true as a general proposition that such stranger will not be liable for the debts of the general partnership; 13 Gray, 468; still, it is quite evident that a mere participation in profits renders one responsible only for the debts and liabilities of those with whom he participates; and, inasmuch as such stranger shares the profits only of and with one of the partners, he can be held only as the partner of that partner; he cannot be held as a partner in the general partnership, because he does not share or participate with the other persons who compose it. See Rose, 255; 1 Jac. 284; 3 Kent, 52; 2 S. & S. 124; 1 B. & P. 546; M. & M'A. 445; 19 Ind. 113; 3 Ired. Eq. 226; 43 N. Y. S. Ct. 238. Besides, a sub-partner does not receive a certain share of the whole profits of the firm, but only a part of a share thereof; and he does not receive this part of a share, nor is he entitled to interfere with it at all, to say whether it shall be more or less in amount, until it has actually been set out and the time has come for a division between himself and the partner with whom he contracted. He does not draw out of the general concern any of its profits; he only draws from the profits of one who has previously drawn them from the general partnership. See 6 Madd. 5; 4 Russ. 285; 3 Ross, Com. Law, 697. If this stranger has caused damage to the partnership by his default, the party who has taken him into the partnership will be liable to the other partners the same as if he had done the damage himself; Pothier, Part. n. 93.

Any number of partners less than the whole may form an independent co-partnership, which, though not strictly a sub-partnership, is entitled to a separate standing in equity. In case of insolvency the subordinate co-partnership is treated as a distinct concern, and the assets are marshalled accordingly. Consequently, although the creditors of the smaller firm are strictly separate creditors when compared with the creditors of the larger firm; yet debts owing by one firm to the other are collected on insolvency for the benefit of the creditors of the creditor firm; Ewell's Lind. Part. *655; 11 Ves. 413; 1 B. & P. 539; 1 Cox, 140. Indeed, one partner may have this independent standing if the trade is distinct; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1229; Mont. 228. But the debts must arise in the ordinary course of trade; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1229; 3 M. D. & D. 433.

Quasi-Partnership.

This is simply the case of a man who without having any interest in or connection with the business holds himself out or suffers himself to be held out as a partner; he is estopped to deny his liability as a partner; 14 Vt. 540; 3 Kent, 32, 33; 27 N. H. 252; 2 Campb. 802; 2 McLean, 347; 10 B. & C. 140; 19 Ves. 459; 17 Vt. 449; 6 Ad. & E. 469. This rule of law arises not upon the ground of the real transaction between the partners, but upon principles of general policy, to prevent the frauds to which creditors would be liable if they were to suppose that they lent their money upon the apparent credit of three or four persons, when in fact they lent it only to two of them, to whom, without others they would have lent nothing; 2 H. Blackst. 235; 3 Kent, 32, 33; 6 S. & R. 259, 333; 16 Johns. 40; 2 Des. 148; 2

N. & M'C. 427; Ewell's Lind. Part. *47 et seq.

The term "holding one's self out as partner" imports, at least, the voluntary act of the party holding himself out; 3 Conn. 324; 2 Camp. 617; but no particular mode of holding himself out is requisite to charge a party. It may be express and either by direct assertion or by authority to a partner to use the stranger's name. It may result from negligence, as a failure to forbid the use of one's name by the firm; 2 Zab. 372; 61 N. Y. 456; 41 Penn. 30; Ewell's Lind. Part. *47, and note; 64 Ind. 545; 53 Ga. 98; 30 Md. 1; 32 Ark. 733; 53 Ga. 98.

Holding out is a question of fact; Ewell's Lind. Part. *53; 25 Mo. 341; 10 Ind. 475. The usual evidence to charge a party in such cases is that he has suffered the use of his name over the shop-door, in printed notices, bills of parcels, and advertisements, or that he has done other acts, or suffered his agents to do acts; 37 N. H. 9; no matter of what kind, sufficient to induce others to believe him to be a partner; 3 McLean, 364, 549; 3 Camp. 310; 1 Ball & B. 9; 4 M. & P. 713; 20 N. H. 453, 454; 39 Me. 157; 55 Ga. 116. A person is not relieved from liability though he was induced by the fraud of others to hold himself out as a partner with them. See 5 Bingh. 521; 1 Rose, 69. The holding out must have been before the contract with the third person was entered into, and must have been the inducement to it; 7 B. & C. 409; 10 id. 140; 1 F. & F. 344; 6 Bing. 776; 3 C. B. 32; 2 Camp. 617; 8 Ala. 560; 67 Ill. 161; 37 Me. 252.

It is not necessary that the creditor have personal knowlege of the individual whose name is used; 61 N. Y. 456; see 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. Engl. ed. 507; 10 B. & C. 140; 2 McLean, 347; 1 B. & Ald. 11; 8 Ala. N. S. 560; 7 B. Monr. 456. A person does not become liable as partner because he represents that he is willing or intends to become one; 9 B. & C. 632; 15 M. & W. 517.

One who holds himself out as a partner is responsible as such to strangers even though they know his true relation and that by agreement with the partners he is to share no loss; Ewell's Lind. Part. *48; contra, Camp. 404, note; 5 Bro. P. C. 489. How knowledge of the terms of the agreement under which parties are associated will affect third persons, see 6 Metc. 93, 94; 6 Pick. 372; 15 Mass. 339; 4 Johns. 251; 5 Cow. 489; 28 Vt. 108.

The Domain.

A partnership is primarily a commercial relation. The notion has, however, been gradually extended to include other associations than those for trade merely: e. g. partnerships between two attorneys at law; 6 Penn. 360; 8 Wend. 665; 13 Ark. 173. It is said by Mr. Collyer that "perhaps it may be laid down generally that a partnership may exist in any business or transaction which is not a mere personal office, and for the performance of which payment may be enforced." Collyer, Part. § 56.

The early law did not recognize partnerships for trading in land, because the land was all held by the barons who did not engage in trade. But in modern times, and especially in America, where the social conditions are different, land is largely held by speculators whose operations as partners the law must recognize; 21 Me. 421, 422; 7 Penn. 165; 10 Cush. 458; 4 Conn. 568; 4 Ohio St. 1; 54 N. Y. 1. In transferring title to and from the firm the ordinary rules of conveyancing must be observed. When the title is in all the partners, all must join in the deed; if in the name of one, he alone need execute; Story, Part. § 92, note; 15 Johns. 158; 15 Gratt. 11; 16 B. Monr. 631; 2 New 234.

Building operations are now upon the same footing as land speculations; 4 Cow. 282. But the tradition has been too strong to be impaired as yet in landlord and tenant cases. Farming on shares is no partnership. The owner of land may either receive a share in the produce as rent, or give such a portion to a laborer in lieu of wages; Lind. Part. Am. ed. *651, *652; 58 Ind. 379. But there may be a partnership in the development of land owned by one; 59 Ala. 587.

Firm Property.

Partners have, presumptively, the same interest in the stock that they have in the profits; 16 Hun, 163. Their shares are presumed to be equal both in capital and profits: Ewell's Lind. Part. *676, 795; 28 Cal. 427; 16 Hun, 163; 23 Cal. 427. But a joint stock is not essential to a partnership. The partner without capital is then interested, not in the fund, but in the adventure; 2 Bingh. 170; 7 Hun, 425; Ewell's Lind. Part. *648.

Sometimes a partnership exists between parties merely as the managers and disposers of the goods of others; 4 B. & Ald. 663; 15 Johns. 409, 422. So, it seems, two persons may be owners in common of property, and also partners in the working and management of it for their common benefit; 2 C. B. N. S. 357, 363; 8 C. & P. 345; 16 M. & W. 503; 3 Ross, Lead. Cas. 529.

Whether a partnership includes the capital stock, or is limited to the profit and loss, must be determined from the agreement and intention of the parties; 21 Me. 120. See 5 Taunt. 74; 4 B. & C. 867; Story, Part. § 26?

A partner may contribute but the use of his capital, retaining full control of the principal; and he may charge interest for the use whether profits are earned or not; Ewell's Lind. Part. *786. If, however, the firm funds are expended in repairing and improving the property thus placed at their disposal, it becomes partnership stock; Ewell's Lind. Part. *652, note; 49 Me. 252; 23 N. J. Eq. 247; 72 Penn. 142.

The partnership property consists of the original stock and the additions made to it in the course of trade. All real estate purchased for the partnership, paid for out of the funds thereof, and devoted to partnership uses and trusts, whether the legal title is in one or all of the partners, is treated in equity in the same manner as other partnership property until the partnership account is settled and the partnership debts are paid; Story, Part. § 98; 5 Ves. 189; 3 Swanst. 489; 10 Cush. 458; 4 Metc. Mass. 527; 5 id. 562; 3 Kent, 37; 27 N. H. 37; Ewell's Lind. Part. *642. Leases of real estate taken by one partner for partnership purposes, mines, and trade-marks are held to be partnership property; 17 Ves. 298; 1 Taunt. 250; 5 Ves. 308; Story, Part. § 98. The good-will of a business is an asset of the firm. It does not always have a salable value, however; Ewell's Lind. Part. *860; 9 Neb. 258; 4 Sandf. Ch. 405; 1 Hoff. Ch. 68; 3 Mer. 452, 455; 5 Ves. 539. But Chancellor Kent says, "the good-will of a trade is not partnership stock." 3 Kent, 64. The good-will of a professional partnership belongs, in the absence of express stipulations, exclusively to the survivors; Bissett, Part. 64; 3 Madd. 64; Collyer, Part. § 163. See GOOD-WILL. A ship, as well as any other chattel, may be held in strict partnership; 3 Kent, 154; 12 Mass. 54; 6 Me. 77; 15 id. 427. But ships are generally owned by parties as tenants in common; and they are not in consequence of such ownership to be considered as partners; 6 Me. 77; 6 Pick. 120; 24 id. 19; 14 Conn. 404; 14 Penn. 34, 38; 8 Gill, 92; 47 N. Y. 462. The same is true of any other species of property in which the parties have only a community of interest; Ewell's Lind. Part. *66 et seq., and note; 8 Exch. 825; 21 Beav. 536; 24 id. 283; 2 C. B. N. S. 357.

Partners hold land by a peculiar title. In one respect it most resembles an ancient joint tenancy. Neither partner can convey title to a moiety of the goods his assignee takes subject to claim of other partner to have firm debts paid out of that fund; he therefore can assign only his interest, i. e., a moiety of what is left after firm debts paid. Upon this principle depends also the special right of survivorship for the purposes of liquidation. With these qualifications the partner's title at law differs but slightly from a tenancy in common; Story, Part. §§ 90, 91, 97; 9 Me. 28; 5 Johns. Ch. 417.

A partner has the same title to the stationary capital of the firm that he has to its product in his hands for sale, but his power over it is less extensive. He can not sell the permanent capital stock. The power of a partner to sell results not from the title, but from the general partnership relation; 37 Penn. 217.

Partners may of course hold land as part of the firm assets. It has been held that in order to make the land really firm assets the title should be in the partners as a firm, otherwise, the partners would be mere tenants in common, and the land, as to purchasers and creditors, would be the individual estate of the partners, regardless of the funds by which it was purchased and the uses to which it was put; 81 Penn. 377; but as to the partners and their representatives, the land would belong to the firm, in such case; 5 Metc. Mass. 582; 89 Penn. 203. The rule is applied to cases of equitable, as well as legal, estates; 70 Penn. 79. In other cases it has been held that where land has been bought with firm money and is used for firm purposes, or where it has been dedicated to the firm, it must be regarded as partnership property without considering the record title; 64 N. Y. 479; 5 Metc. Mass. 562, 582; 55 Ill. 416; 14 Fla. 565; 17 Cal. 262. It has been thought necessary to resort to an equitable conversion of firm land into personalty in order to subject it to the rules governing partnership property; 7 J. Baxter, 212; 15 Gratt. 11; 74 Penn. 391. But this fiction seems unnecessary; see 25 Ala. 625; 3 Stew. (N. J.) 415; 2 Edw. Ch. 28; 11 Barb. 43. After liquidation, the lands or their surplus proceeds pass as real estate; 3 Stew. (N. J.) 415; 7 J. Baxt. 212; 11 Barb. 43; 74 Penn. 391; 6 Yerg. 20. If one partner buys land with firm money and takes title in his own name, a resulting trust arises to the firm; 21 Penn. 257; 39 id. 535; Ewell's Lind. Partn. *643.

Marshalling Assets.

The firm is not a corporation, and hence firm creditors are in theory separate creditors as well. But in administering bankrupt estates equity has established the "rule of convenience" that firm and separate creditors shall have priority upon, and be confined to, the firm and separate funds respectively. A surplus upon a separate fund is divided among firm creditors pro rata; a surplus upon a firm fund is divided among the separate creditors of the various partners in proportion to the shares of the partners therein; Ewell's Lind. Part. *655, *1053, *1054 and notes; Story, Part. § 376, note; Pars. Part. *480; 67 Ind. 485; 50 Miss. 300; 44 Penn. 503; 13 N. J. Eq. 126; 41 N. H. 12; 35 Vt. 44; 94 Ill. 271; 28 Ga. 371; 29 Ala. 172. If there is no firm fund, the firm creditors come in on an equal footing with separate creditors against the separate estate; Story, Part. § 380; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1234; 10 Cush. 592; contra, 15 Ind. 124; 46 N. H. 188. A very slight firm fund over and above costs will suffice to exclude firm creditors from the separate estate; five shillings has been said to be enough; 7 Am. L. Reg. 499; one dollar and a quarter was considered too little; Pars. Part. *483, note; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1235. A solvent partner, if living, is equivalent to a firm fund; 8 Conn. 584; Story, Part. § 380; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1234.

But though there is no separate estate, separate creditors can not come against the joint estate; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1224. Various explanations have been offered for this rule. Sometimes it is called a "rule of convenience;" sometimes a fundamental principle of equity; Ewell's Lind. Part. *655, *1053; 22 Pick. 450; 5 Johns. Ch. 60; Story, Part. § 377; 5 S. & R. 78; 44 Penn. 503. Sometimes it is said to depend on the principle of destination; the partners by gathering together a firm fund have dedicated it to the firm creditors. Upon this theory, the partnership stock becomes a trust fund. The firm creditors occupy a commanding position and restrain even the partners in dealing with the property; Ewell's Lind. Part. *655, note; 3 Biss. 122; 41 Barb. 307; 52 N. Y. 146; 5 How. Pr. 35. Usually it is declared to be the outgrowth of the partner's equity, i. e. his right to have firm funds applied first to the payment of firm debts; Ewell's Lind. Part. *655, note; 7 Md. 398; 32 Gratt. 481; 4 Bush, 25; 4 R. I. 173; 7 B. Monr. 210. Consequently where the partner gives up this right, the firm creditor loses his priority; Ewell's Lind. Part. *655; 3 Ired. L. 213; 59 Tenn. 167; 2 Disn. 286; 1 Woods, 127; 32 Gratt, 481. If insolvent partners divide the firm fund among their separate creditors in proportion to the interest of each in the partnership, firm creditors can not object; 39 Penn. 369; 77 N. Y. 195. If insolvent partners assign away firm funds for the benefit of the separate creditors of one only, firm creditors may object, at least to the action of the other partner; 20 N. H. 462; 20 How. Pr. 121. As a general rule, insolvency fixes the position of the different funds. A debt to a partner by the firm can not be collected for the benefit of separate creditors; a debt of a partner to the firm can not be collected for the benefit of firm creditors; because a man can not prove against his own creditors; 3 P. Wms. 180; 4 H. & McH. 167; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1236 et seq. What one partner owes his co-partner independently of the firm can be collected from the separate estate of the debtor for the benefit of the separate estate of the creditor: but this will not be allowed unless the situation is such that the firm creditors can derive no benefit even indirectly from the enforcement of the claim, i. e. there must be no surplus to go to them; Lind. Part. 4th ed. 1244; 4 De G. J. & S. 551. Contra, where both partners owe the firm one-half of the excess of one debt over the other it is payable to the firm creditors out of the estate of the greater debtor; 55 Penn. 252. Partners, before insolvency, may, by an executed agreement, change firm into separate property. Firm creditors have no lien to prevent the alteration; e. g. where one partner sells out to the others the fund becomes primarily liable to the claims of the creditors of the new firm; 20 N. J. Eq. 13; 6 Bosw. 533; 19 Ga. 190; 9 Cush. 553; 35 Iowa, 323; 21 Penn. 77; 6 Ves. 119.

Equity will not interfere to embarrass a vested legal right. Therefore if a firm creditor levies on separate estate, his execution has priority over the subsequent execution of a separate creditor; 24 Ga. 625; 22 Pick. 450; 9 N. J. Eq. 353; 17 N. Y. 300: If a separate creditor levies on firm property, his levy is subject to the paramount right of the co-partner, and he sells nothing but his debtor's interest. An execution against the firm, though subsequent in time, has priority, because it attaches this paramount right of the co-partner. But a firm creditor, without a legal lien has, in such case, no standing; 22 Cal. 194; 17 N. J. Eq. 259; 5 Johns. Ch. 417; 9 Me. 28. But where there is an execution against each partner and a subsequent execution against the firm, and the sheriff seizes and sells firm goods under the three, the proceeds are given first to the joint creditor, and the remainder to the separate creditors in proportion to partner's interest; 29 Penn. 90. So in the case of judgments against real estate. A separate judgment is no lien on the firm real estate but only on the partner's interest. But a firm judgment is a lien on partner's separate real estate, and takes priority over a subsequent separate judgment; Ewell's Lind. Part. *1054 and note; 17 N. Y. 300; 46 Iowa, 461.

Duration. Prima facie every partnership is determinable at will. But it may be entered into for a definite term by agreement express or implied; Ewell's Lind. Part. *218.

A partnership at will is presumed to continue so long as the parties are in life and of capacity to continue it; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 42; Story, Part. § 271; 9 Humphr. 750. A partnership for a term is presumed to continue during the term, provided the parties are in life and of legal capacity to continue it. See 7 Mo. 29; Collyer, Part. § 105. If a partnership be continued by express or tacit consent after the expiration of the prescribed period, it will be presumed to continue upon the old terms, but as a partnership at will; Ewell's Lind. Part. *219; 17 S. & R. 165. But in no case will the law presume a partnership to exist beyond the life of the parties; 1 Swanst. 521; 1 Wils. Ch. 181. When a partnership has been entered into for a definite term, it is nevertheless dissolved by death within the term; Story, Part. § 195; Ewell's Lind. Part. *832. The delectus personæ is so essentially necessary to the constitution of a partnership that even the executors or other representatives of partners themselves do not, in their capacity of executors or representatives, succeed to the state and condition of partners; 7 Pick. 237, 238; 3 Kent, 55, 56; 42 Ill. 342; 46 Mo. 197. The civilians carried this doctrine so far as not to permit it to be stipulated that the heirs or executors of partners should themselves be partners; Domat, lib. 1, tit. 8, s. 2; Pothier, Part. n. 145; though Pothier thinks it binding.

At the common law, the representatives of a deceased partner may be made partners in his stead either by original agreement or by testamentary direction; Ewell's Lind. Part. *231; 47 Tex. 481; 8 Am. L. Rec. 641. Clauses providing for the admission into the firm of a deceased partner's representatives will, in general, be construed as giving them an option to become partners, and not as constituting them partners absolutely; 7 Jarm. Conv. 120; 1 McCl. & Y. 569; 2 Russ. 62. In any event it must be a new partnership; Pars. Part. *439; contra, 46 Conn. 136.

Only the fund already invested or directed to be invested by the testator is subject to the claims of new creditors; 15 Gratt. 11; 10 Ves. 110, 121, 122; 47 Tex. 481; the direction to charge the general assets must be clear and unambiguous; 2 How. 577; 8 Am. L. Rec. 641; 48 Penn. 275.

The rule in England is clear that when an executor undertakes to participate in the business, whether in consequence of a testamentary direction or otherwise, he becomes personally liable to creditors as a partner, in addition to the liability of the estate. The common law relation of partnership will not admit of a qualified liability; Ewell's Lind. Part. *1060, note; 10 Ves. 119; 11 Moo. P. C. 198. But simply taking profits will not charge the executor; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. But in America, some authorities have declared that the executor is not personally liable when the testator has directed him to continue the business, but only when he does so of his own motion; 4 Ala. 588; 33 Md. 392; 39 How. Pr. 82; 48 Penn. 275; contra, for personal liability of executor; 8 Conn. 584. A simple direction to allow a fund to remain in a partnership may be construed as a loan to the survivors; Ewell's Lind. Part. *1064; 9 Hare, 141.

Dissolution. A partnership may be dissolved:—

First, by the act of the parties: as, by their mutual consent; Story, Part. § 268; 3 Kent, 54; Pothier, Part. n. 149; and where no specified period is limited for the continuance of the partnership, either party may dissolve it at any time; 4 Russ. 260; 1 Swanst. 508; 3 Kent, 53, 54; Story, Part. §§ 84, 272, 273. See 5 Ark. 280; Ewell's Lind. Part. *220, note. Whether a partnership for a certain time can be dissolved by one partner at his mere will and pleasure before the term has expired, seems not to be absolutely and definitively settled; Story, Part. § 275. In favor of the right of one partner in such cases, see 3 Kent, 55; 17 Johns. 525; 19 id. 538; 1 Hoffm. Ch. 534; 3 Bland, Ch. 674. Against it, see Story, Part. §§ 275, 276; 5 Ark. 281; 4 Wash. C. C. 234; Pothier, Part. 152; Ewell's Lind. Part. *222, note; 20 N. J. Eq. 172. See, also, 15 Me. 180; 1 Swanst. 495; 16 Ves. 56. As against third persons, a partner may certainly withdraw from a partnership at his pleasure; 3 C. B. N. S. 561.

Second, by the act of God: as, by the death of one of the partners; and this operates from the time of the death; 3 Mer. 610; 6 Cow. 441; 6 Conn. 184; 2 How. 560; 7 Ala. N. S. 19; 3 Kent, 55, 56; Story, Part. §§ 317, 319; 7 Pet. 594; 17 Pick. 519; 5 Gill, 1; 40 Mich. 343; unless there be an express stipulation to the contrary; 3 Madd. 251; 2 How. 560; Ewell's Lind. Part. *231, note; 42 Ill. 342.

A partnership dissolved by the death of one of the partners is dissolved as to the whole firm; 7 Pet. 586, 594; and the reason given for this rule is applicable not only to dissolution by death, but to every species of dissolution; Story, Part. §§ 317, 318; Ewell's Lind. Part. *231.

Third, by the act of law: as, by the bankruptcy of one of the partners; 4 Burr. 2174; Cowp. 448; 6 Ves. 126; 5 Maule & S. 340; Ewell's Lind. Part. *224; 45 Miss. 703; 59 Ala. 597.

Fourth, by a valid assignment of all the partnership effects for the benefit of creditors, either under insolvent acts; Collyer, Part. § 112; or otherwise; 41 Me. 373; but this is only prima facie evidence of dissolution which other circumstances may rebut; 1 Dall. 380; by a sale of the partnership effects under a separate execution against one partner; Cowp. 445; 2 V. & B. 300; 3 Kent, 59. But the mere insolvency of one or all of the members of a partnership, without a suspension or judicial process, etc., does not of itself operate a dissolution; 24 Pick. 89. See 1 Bland, Ch. 408; 2 Ashm. 305; Ewell's Lind. Part. *223; 28 Penn. 279.

Fifth, by the civil death of one of the partners; Pothier, Part. n. 147. But the absconding of a party from the state does not of itself operate a dissolution; 24 Pick. 89. See Story, Part. § 298.

Sixth, by the breaking out of war between two states in which the partners are domiciled and carrying on trade; 16 Johns. 438; 3 Kent, 62; 3 Bland, Ch. 674; 50 N. Y. 166.

Seventh, by the marriage of a feme sole partner; 4 Russ. 260; 3 Kent, 55; Ewell's Lind. Part. *230.

Eighth, by the extinction of the subject-matter of the joint business or undertaking; 16 Johns. 401, 402; Pothier, Part. nn. 5, 140–143; and by the completion of the business or adventure for which the partnership was formed; Story, Part. § 280.

Ninth, by the termination of the period for which a partnership for a certain time was formed; Collyer, Part. § 119.

Tenth, by the assignment of the whole of one partner's interest either to his co-partner or to a stranger; 3 Kent, 59; Story, Part. §§ 307, 308; 4 B. & Ad. 175; 17 Johns. 525; 1 Freem. Ch. 231; 8 W. & S. 262; where it does not appear that the assignee acts in the concern after the assignment; 17 Johns. 525; 8 Wend. 442; 5 Dana, 213; 1 Whart. 381; 2 Dev. Eq. 481. But in England this can occur only in partnerships at will. In partnerships for a term, assignment is a ground for dissolution by remaining co-partners, but probably not by the transferee. In America, the transferee always has a right to an account; Ewell's Lind. Part. *230;

60 Ala. 226; 50 Cal. 615. But see 14 Pick. 322, where it was held that such an assignment would not ipso facto work a dissolution.

Eleventh, by the award of arbitrators appointed under a clause in the partnership articles to that effect; see 1 W. Blackst. 475; 4 B. & Ad. 172.

A partnership for a term may be dissolved before the expiration of the term, by the decree of a court of equity founded on the wilful fraud or other gross misconduct of one of the partners; Collyer, Part. § 296; 4 Beav. 502; 21 id. 482; 2 V. & B. 299; 5 Ark. 270; so on his gross carelessness and waste in the administration of the partnership, and his exclusion of the other partners from their just share of the management; 1 J. & W. 592; 2 id. 206; 5 Ark. 278; 2 Ashm. 309, 310; 3 Ves. 74; so on the existence of violent and lasting dissensions between the partners; 1 Iowa, 537; Collyer, Part. § 297; see 4 Sim. 11; Story, Part. § 288; 4 Beav. 503; 14 Ohio, 315; 52 How. Pr. 41; where these are of such a character as to prevent the business from being conducted upon the stipulated terms; 3 Kent, 60, 61; Collyer, Part. § 297; and to destroy the mutual confidence of the partners in each other; 4 Beav. 502; 21 id. 482; 20 N. J. Eq. 172. But a partner cannot, by misconducting himself and rendering it impossible for his co-partners to act in harmony with him, obtain a dissolution on the ground of the impossibility so created by himself; 21 Beav. 493, 494; 3 Hare, 387; 84 Ill. 121. A partnership may be dissolved by decree when its business is in a hopeless state, its continuance impracticable, and its property liable to be wasted and lost; 3 Kent, 60; 1 Cox, 212; 2 V. & B. 290; 16 Johns. 491; 3 K. & J. 78; 13 Sim. 495; 8 Oreg. 84.

The confirmed lunacy of an active partner is sufficient to induce a court of equity to decree a dissolution, not only for the purpose of protecting the lunatic, but also to relieve his co-partners from the difficult position in which the lunacy places them; see 1 Cox, Ch. 107; 1 Swanst. 514, note; 2 My. & K. 125; 6 Beav. 324; 2 Kay & J. 441; 3 Kent, 58; 3 Y. & C. 184. The same may be said of every other inveterate infirmity, such as palsy, or the like, which has seized upon one of the partners and rendered him incompetent to act where his personal labor and skill were contracted for; Pothier, Part. n. 152; 3 Kent, 62. But lunacy does not itself dissolve the firm, nor do other infirmities; 3 Kent, 58; Story, Part. § 295; 3 Jur. 358. It is, however, contended by Mr. Justice Story and by Parker, C. J., that a clear case of insanity ought to effect that result; Story, Part. § 295; 10 N. H. 101. An inquisition of lunacy found against a member dissolves the firm; 6 Humph. 85. The court does not decree a dissolution on the ground of lunacy except upon clear evidence that the malady exists and is incurable; 3 Y. & C. 184; 2 K. & J. 441. A temporary illness is not sufficient; 2 Ves. Sen. 34; 1 Cox, 107. A dissolution by the court on the ground of insanity dates from the decree and not from a prior day; 1 Phill. 172; 2 Coll. 276; 1 K. & J. 765.

Actual notice of dissolution must be brought home to persons who have been in the habit of dealing with the firm; but as to all persons who have had no previous dealings with the firm, notice fairly given in the public newspapers is deemed sufficient; Collyer, Part. §§ 532–534. This notice is necessary to terminate the agency of each partner, and, consequently, his powers and liabilities as a member; 68 N. Y. 314; 25 Gratt. 321; 47 Wisc. 261; 67 Ill. 106; 83 Penn. 148; 7 Price, 193; 1 Camp. 402.

It is not necessary to give notice of the retirement of a dormant partner from the firm, if the fact of his being a partner be unknown to all the creditors of the firm; if it be known to some, notice to those must be given, but that will be sufficient; 1 Metc. Mass. 19; 1 B. & Ad. 11; 4 id. 179; 5 B. Monr. 170; 36 Penn. 325; 37 Ill. 76; see 35 Ala. 242; 87 Ill. 281; 3 N. Y. 168.

Notice of the dissolution is not necessary, in case of the death of one of the partners, to free the estate of the deceased partner from further liability; 3 Kent, 63; 3 Mer. 614; 17 Pick. 519; Ewell's Lind. Part. *404; 25 Gratt. 321; nor is notice, in fact, necessary in any case where the dissolution takes place by operation of law; 3 Kent, 63, 67; 15 Johns. 57; 16 id. 494; Ewell's Lind. Part. *405; Cowp. 445; 9 Exch. 145.

Effect of dissolution. The effect of dissolution, as between the partners, is to terminate all transactions between them as partners, except for the purpose of taking a general account and winding up the concern; 1 Penn. 274; 3 Kent, 62 et seq. As to third persons, the effect of a dissolution is to absolve the partners from all liability for future transactions, but not for past transactions of the firm; 53 Miss. 280; 51 Cal. 530; 61 Ind. 225; 57 Ill. 215; 3 Kent, 62 et seq.; 2 Cush. 175; 3 M'Cord, 378; 4 Munf. 215; 5 Mas. 56; Harp. 470; 4 Johns. 224; 41 Me. 376.

It is said that a firm, notwithstanding its dissolution, continues to exist so far as may be necessary for the winding up of its business; 11 Ves. 5; 15 id. 227; 16 id. 57; 2 Russ. 242; Ewell's Lind. Part. *411. The power of the partners subsists for many purposes after dissolution: among these are—first, the completion of all the unfinished engagements of the partnership; second, the conversion of all the property, means, and assets of the partnership existing at the time of the dissolution, for the benefit of those who were partners, according to their respective shares; third, the application of the partnership funds to the payment of the partnership debts; Story, Part. § 326; 3 Kent, 57; 17 Pick. 519. But although, for the purposes of winding up the concern and fulfilling engagements that could not be fulfilled during its existence, the power of the partners certainly subsists even after dissolution, yet, legally and strictly speaking, it subsists for those purposes only; 15 Ves. 227; 5 M. & G. 504; 4 M. & W. 461, 462; 10 Hare, 453; 4 De G. M. & G. 542; 61 N. Y. 222; 49 Iowa, 177; 45 Penn. 49.

Whether a dissolution of a partnership is per se a breach of a contract by the firm to employ a person in their service is questionable; 3 H. & N. 931.

PARTURITION. The act of giving birth to a child. See BIRTH.

PARTUS (Lat.). The child just before it is born, or immediately after its birth.

PARTY. See PARTIES.

PARTY-JURY. A jury de medietate linguæ, which title see.

PARTY-WALL. A wall erected on the line between two adjoining estates, belonging to different persons, for the use of both estates. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1615.

The phrase ordinarily means a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common. Emden, Building Leases, etc., 285.

There can be no available objection to the principle upon which a law of party-walls is based. It has constituted a part of the law of France for ages. The principle is no invasion of the absolute right of property, for that absolute implies a relative, etc. Per Lowrie, J., in 23 Penn. 36.

"The words party wall appear to me to express a meaning rather popular than legal, and they may, I think, be used in four different senses. They may mean, first, a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common, which is the most common and the primary meaning of the term. In the next place the term may be used to signify a wall divided longitudinally into two strips, one belonging to each of the neighboring owners. Then, thirdly, the term may mean a wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing wall between the two tenements. The term is so used in some of the building acts. Lastly, the term may designate a wall divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross-easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety." 14 Ch. Div. 192.

Party-walls are generally regulated by acts of the local legislatures. The principles of these acts generally are that the wall shall be built equally on the lands of the adjoining owners, at their joint expense, but when only one owner wishes to use such wall it is built at his expense, and when the other wishes to make use of it he pays one-half of its value. Each owner has a right to place his joists in it and use it for the support of his roof. See 4 Saudf. 480; 24 Mo. 69; 12 La. An. 785. When the party-wall has been built, and the adjoining owner is desirous of having a deeper foundation, he has a right to undermine such wall, using due care and diligence to prevent any injury to his neighbor; and, having done so, he is not answerable for any consequential damages which may ensue; 17 Johns. 92; 12 Mass. 220; 2 N. H. 534. See 1 Dall. 346; 5 S. & R. 1.

When such a wall exists between two buildings, belonging to different persons, and one of them takes it down with his buildings, he is required to erect another in its place in a reasonable time and with the least inconvenience; the other owner must contribute to the expense, if the wall required repairs, but such expense will be limited to the costs of the old wall; 3 Kent, 436; 6 Denio, 717. When the wall is taken down, it must be done with care; but it is not the duty of the person taking it down to shore up or prop the house of his neighbor to prevent it from falling. If, however, the work be done with negligence, by which injury accrues to the neighboring house, an action will lie; 1 M. & M. 362; 15 N. Y. 601. If one tenant in common of a party-wall excludes the other from the use of it by placing obstacles in it, the only remedy is to remove the obstruction; 14 Ch. Div. 192.

Where the owner of two contiguous lots erects a brick messuage, with a division wall, and sells to different purchasers, the wall is not a party-wall; 2 Miles, 247. The right to use a party-wall is not lost by lapse of time, even seventy-five years; 1 Phila. 366. A party-wall must be built without openings; 61 Penn. 118; 51 Tex. 480; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 627. A party-wall can only be built for mutual support; painting a sign on it is unlawful; 2 W. N. C. 333. The principle of party-walls is based upon mutual benefit, and does not extend to the interior of lots where the adjoining owner cannot be expected to build; 2 Pears. 324. Where one built a party-wall, which was defective and fell over, injuring the adjoining premises, he was held liable to the owner of the premises; 125 Mass. 232; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 224. Where a building having a party-wall is destroyed by fire, leaving the wall standing, the easement in the wall ceases; 57 Miss. 746.

PARVUM CAPE. See PETIT CAPE.

PASS. A certificate given to a slave, by his master or mistress, in which it is stated that he is permitted to leave his home with their authority. The paper on which such certificate is written.

In Practice. To be given or entered: as, let the judgment pass for the plaintiff.

To become transferred: thus, the title to goods passes by the sale whenever the parties have agreed upon the sale and the price, and nothing remains to be done to complete the agreement; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 939.

To decide upon. When a jury decide upon the rights of the parties, which are in issue, they are said to pass upon them.

PASS-BOOK. In Mercantile Law. A book used by merchants with their customers, in which an entry of goods sold and delivered to a customer is made.

It is kept by the buyer, and sent to the merchant whenever he wishes to purchase any article. It ought to be a counterpart of the merchant's books, as far as regards the customer's account.

Among English bankers, the term pass-book is given to a small book made up from time to time from the banker's ledger and forwarded to the customer: this is not considered as a statement of account between the parties: yet when the customer neglects for a long time to make any objection to the correctness of the entries, he will be bound by them; 2 Atk. 252; 2 D. & C. 534; 2 M. & W. 2.

PASSAGE-MONEY. The sum claimable for the conveyance of a person, with or without luggage, on the water.

The difference between freight and passage-money is this, that the former is claimable for the carriage of goods, and the latter for the carriage of the person. The same rules which govern the claim for freight affect that for passage-money; 3 Chitty, Com. Law, 424; 1 Pet. Adm. 126; 3 Johns. 335. See COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS.

PASSENGER. One who has taken a place in a public conveyance for the purpose of being transported from one place to another. One who is so conveyed from one place to another.

Any one may become a passenger by applying for transportation to a carrier of passengers. Every one holding himself out as a carrier of passengers must receive and carry such persons, unless he can show legal excuse for not so doing. Drunkenness, refusal to pay fare, the fact that there is no room in the conveyance, or that the person wishing a passage is affected with a contagious disease, or is fleeing from justice, or enters the carrier's conveyance with the intention of committing a crime, have all been held sufficient to excuse a carrier from receiving a person as a passenger; 11 Allen, 304; 4 Dill. 321; Thomp. Carr. of Pass. 29; 1 Blatchf. 569.

The relation of carrier and passenger can be created by the exhibition of a bona fide intention on the part of the passenger. Thus going into the depot of a railroad company and waiting for the train has been held sufficient to make a person a passenger, and to make the company responsible for his treatment as such; 40 Barb. 546.

The carrier may make reasonable rules for the conduct of passengers, and all such rules the passengers are bound to obey; 5 Mich. 520; Thomp. Carr. of Pass. 306.

Carriers of passengers are not like carriers of goods, liable for all injuries except those arising from act of God or the public enemy. They are not responsible for injuries happening to the person of a passenger by mere accident, as by fire or robbery, without fault on their part. They are liable only for want of due care or skill; 10 N. H. 481. But in the matter of care and foresight the law holds them to a strict account, and makes them responsible for every slight neglect; 11 Minn. 296; 23 Ill. 357; 36 N. Y. 378; 13 Conn. 319. In regard to the personal baggage of passengers, carriers of passengers are held to the same strict liability as carriers of goods; 19 Wend. 234.

See NEGLIGENCE; BAGGAGE; TICKET.

Full provisions for the health and safety of passengers by sea have been made by the United States laws. See Act of Congr. May 17, 1848, 11 U. S. Stat. at Large, 127; March 2, 1847, 11 id. 149; January 31, 1848, 11 id. 210. See Gilp. 334.

PASSIVE. All the sums of which one is a debtor.

It is used in contradistinction to active. By active debts are understood those which may be employed in furnishing assets to a merchant to pay those which he owes, which are called passive debts.

PASSPORT (Fr. passer, to pass, port, harbor or gate). In Maritime Law. A paper containing a permission from the neutral state to the captain or master of a ship or vessel to proceed on the voyage proposed. It usually contains his name and residence, the name, property, description, tonnage, and destination of the ship, the nature and quantity of the cargo, the place from whence it comes, and its destination, with such other matters as the practice of the place requires.

It is also called a sea-brief, or sea-letter. But Marshall distinguishes sea-letter from passport, which latter, he says, is pretended to protect the ship, while the former relates to the cargo, destination, etc. See Jacobs. Sea-Laws, 66, note.

This document is indispensably necessary in time of war for the safety of every neutral vessel; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 9, s. 6, 317, 406 b.

A Mediterranean pass, or protection against the Barbary powers. Jacobs. Sea-Laws, 66, note; Act of Congr. 1796.

A document granted in time of war to protect persons or property from the general operation of hostilities. Wheat. Int. Law, 475; 1 Kent, 161; 6 Wheat. 3.

In most countries of continental Europe passports are given to travellers. These are intended to protect them on their journey from all molestation while they are obedient to the laws. The secretary of state may issue, or cause to be issued in foreign countries by such diplomatic or consular officers of the United States, and under such rules as the president may prescribe, passports, but only to citizens of the United States; R. S. §§ 4075–4076. See 1 Kent, 162, 182; 9 Pet. 692; Merlin, Répert.

PASTURES. Lands upon which beasts feed themselves. By a grant of pastures the land itself passes. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 202.

PATENT. A grant of some privilege, property, or authority, made by the government or sovereign of a country to one or more individuals. Phillips, Pat. 1.

As the term was originally used in England, it signified certain written instruments emanating from the king and sealed with the great seal. These instruments conferred grants of lands, honors, or franchises; they were called letters patent, from being delivered open, and by way of contradistinction from instruments like the French lettres de cachet, which went out sealed.

In the United States, the word patent is sometimes understood to mean the title-deed by which a government, either state or federal, conveys its lands. But in its more usual acceptation it is understood as referring to those instruments by which the United States secures to inventors for a limited time the exclusive use of their own inventions.

The granting of exclusive privileges by means of letters patent was a power which for a long time was greatly abused by the sovereigns of England. The sole right of dealing in certain commodities was in that manner conferred upon particular individuals, either as a matter of royal favor or as a means of replenishing the royal treasury. These exclusive privileges, which were termed monopolies, became extremely odious, and, at an early date, met with the most determined resistance. One of the provisions of Magna Charta was intended to prevent the granting of monopolies of this character; and subsequent prohibitions and restrictions were enacted by parliament even under the most energetic and absolute of their monarchs. See Hallam, Const. Hist., Harp. ed. 153, 205; 7 Lingard, Hist. Eng. Dolman's ed. 247, 380; 9 id. 182.

Still, the unregulated and despotic power of the crown proved, in many instances, superior to the law, until the reign of James I., when an act was passed, in the twenty-first year of his reign, known as the Statute of Monopolies, which entirely prohibited all grants of that nature, so far as the traffic in commodities already known was concerned. But the king was permitted to secure by letters patent, to the inventor of any new manufacture, the sole right to make and vend the same for a term not exceeding fourteen years. Since that time the power of the monarch has been so far controlled by the law that the prohibition contained in the Statute of Monopolies has been fully observed, and under that statute has grown up the present system of British patent law, from which ours has to a great extent been derived.

The constitution of the United States confers upon congress the power to pass laws "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right of their respective writings or discoveries." U. S. Const. art. I. s. 6, cl. 8. This right can, accordingly, be conferred only upon the authors and inventors themselves; but it rests in the sound discretion of congress to determine the length of time during which it shall continue. Congress at an early day availed itself of the power.

The first act passed was that which established the patent office, on the 10th of April, 1790. There were several supplements and modifications to this law, namely, the acts passed February 7, 1793, June 7, 1794, April 17, 1800, July 3, 1832, July 13, 1832. These were all repealed, by an act passed July 4, 1836, and a new system was established. Subsequently other changes were made by the acts of March 3, 1837, March 3, 1839, August 29, 1842, May 27, 1848, March 3, 1849, February 18, 1861, March 2, 1861, July 16, 1862, March 3, 1863, June 25, 1864, and March 3, 1865. The act of July 8, 1870, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights" repealed all existing acts.

The present law does not, indeed, furnish any guarantee of the validity of the title conferred upon the patentee. The patent is, nevertheless, prima facie evidence of its own validity; 1 Stor. 336; 3 id. 172; 1 Mas. 153; 14 Pet. 458; 2 Blatchf. 229; 1 McAll. 171; as well for a defendant in an action as for a plaintiff; 15 How. 252. No provision is made by statute for setting it aside directly, however invalid it may prove, except in the special case of interference between two patents or an application and a patent. But, throughout its whole term of existence, whenever an action is brought against any one for having infringed it, he is permitted to show its original invalidity in his defence. The supreme court, however, while deciding that an individual cannot maintain a suit in equity in his own name to repeal a patent, except in interference cases, have more recently intimated that the proper remedy is in the name of the attorney-general, or of the United States; 14 Wall. 434; on the relation of the party interested; Curt. Pat. § 503. The exclusive right of the patentee did not exist at common law; it is created by acts of congress; and no rights can be acquired unless authorized by the statute and in the manner it prescribes; 10 How. 494; 19 id. 195; 3 N. Y. 9; 8 Pet. 658. The power granted by the patent is domestic in its character, and confined within the limits of the United States; consequently it does not extend to a foreign vessel lawfully entering one of our ports, where the patented improvement was placed upon her in a foreign port and authorized by the laws of the country to which she belongs; 19 How. 183.

We will now proceed to treat of some of the details of our present law on this subject.

Of the subject-matter of a patent. The act of July 8, 1870, sec. 24, provides for the granting of a patent to the first inventor or discoverer of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, not known or used by others in this country, and not patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof, and not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his application, unless the same is proved to have been abandoned. The distinction between a process and a machine is discussed in 15 How. 252. There are with us, according to the phraseology of the statute, four classes of inventions which may be the subjects of patents: first, an art; second, a machine; third, a manufacture; and, fourth, a composition of matter. In Great Britain, as we have seen, letters patent granting exclusive privileges can be issued only to the inventors of a "new manufacture." But the courts in defining the meaning of the term, have construed the word "manufacture" to be coextensive in signification with the whole of the four classes of inventions thus recognized by our law. An art or process, a machine, and a composition of matter are all regarded there as manufactures. The field of invention in Great Britain is, therefore, coincident with that provided by our law, and the legal subject-matter of patents is the same in each country; 2 B. & Ald. 349; 8 Term, 99; 2 H. Blackst. 492; 2 M. & W. 544; Webst. Pat. Cas. 237, 393, 459.

But, inasmuch as we have three other classes of inventions, the term "manufacture" has a more limited signification here than it receives in Great Britain. In this country it is understood to mean a new article of merchandise which has required the exercise of something more than ordinary mechanical skill and ingenuity in its contrivance; no new principle or combination of parts is necessary to render a patent of this kind valid. All that is requisite is that a substantially new commodity shall have been produced for the public use and convenience. A mere change in the form of a well-known article may sometimes justify the granting of a patent for the same, where such change adapts it to an essentially new use, and where something beyond the range of ordinary skill and ingenuity must have been called into exercise in its contrivance. See 11 How. 248.

The general rule, then, is that wherever invention has been exercised, there will be found the subject-matter of a patent; 1 McAll. 48; 5 Blatch. 46. And as the law looks to the fact, and not to the result by which it was accomplished, it is immaterial what amount of thought was involved in making the invention; 4 Mas. 6.

Although the word "discovery" is used in our statute as entitling the discoverer to a patent, still, every discovery is not a patentable invention. The discoverer of a mere philosophical principle, or abstract theory, or elementary truth of science, cannot obtain a patent for the same, unless he applies it to some directly useful purpose. The patent can only be for such a principle, theory, or truth reduced to practice and embodied in a particular structure or combination of parts; 1 Stor. 285; 1 Mas. 187; 4 id. 1; 1 Pet. C. C. 342; nor can there be a patent for a function or for an effect only, but for an effect produced in a given manner or by given means; 1 Holmes, 20; 2 Fisher, 229; 4 id. 275; or by a particular operation; 1 Gall. 480; 1 Mas. 476; 1 Stor. 270; 2 id. 164; 1 Pet. C. C. 394; 5 McLean, 76; 15 How. 62; 4 Fisher, 468; 11 Off. Gaz. 153. An idea is not patentable; a patent is valid only for the practical application of an idea; 3 Blatch. 535; 20 Wall. 498.

An invention, to be patentable, must not only be new, but must also be useful. But by this it is not meant that it must be more useful than any thing of the kind previously known, but that it is capable of use for a beneficial purpose. The word "useful" is also to be understood in contradistinction to "pernicious," or "frivolous." A contrivance directly and mainly calculated to aid the counterfeiter, the pickpocket, or the assassin, or which would in any way be directly calculated to be injurious to the morals, the health, or the good order of society, would not be patentable. Neither would a new contrivance which was of too trivial a character to be worthy of serious consideration; 1 Mas. 186, 303; 4 Wash. C. C. 9; 1 Paine, 203; 1 Blatch. 372, 488; 2 id. 132; 1 W. & M. 290; 2 McLean, 35; Baldw. 303; 13 N. H. 311; 5 Fisher, 396; 1 Biss. 362; 3 Fisher, 218, 536.

The patent itself is primâ facie evidence of utility; 9 Blatch. 77; s. c. 5 Fish. 48; 1 Bond, 212; and its use by the defendant and others is evidence of utility; 1 Holmes, 340.

In the trial of an action for infringement, evidence of the comparative utility of the plaintiff's machine and the defendant's is inadmissible, except for the purpose of showing a substantial difference between the two machines; 1 Stor. 336.

A mere application of an old device or process to the manufacture of an article is held to constitute only a double use, and not to be patentable. There must be some new process or machinery used to produce the effect; 2 Stor. 190, 408; Gilp. 489; 3 Wash. C. C. 443; 1 W. & M. 290; 2 McLean, 35; 4 id. 456; 2 Curt. 340; 2 Robb, 133; 12 Blatch. 101; 91 U. S. 37, 150. But where the new use is not analogous to the old and would not be suggested by it,—where invention is necessary in order to conceive of the new application, and experiment is required to test its success, and the result is a new or superior result,—there a patent may be obtained.

No patent can be granted in the United States for the mere importation of an invention brought from abroad; although it is otherwise in England. The constitution, as we have seen, only authorizes congress to grant these exclusive privileges to the inventors themselves. The mere fact of an inventor having obtained a patent for a device in a foreign country will not prevent his obtaining a patent for the same thing here, provided it shall not have been introduced into public use in the United States for more than two years prior to the application, and that the patent shall expire at the same time with the foreign patent, or if there be more than one, at the same time with the one having the shortest term. In no case shall such patent be in force more than seventeen years; sec. 25, Act of 1870.

Of caveats. Section 40 of the act of 1870 authorizes the inventor of anything patentable—provided he be a citizen, or an alien who has resided within the United States for one year next preceding his application and has made oath of his intention to become a citizen—to file a caveat in the patent office for his own security. This caveat consists in a simple statement of his invention, in any language which will render it intelligible. It is always well to attach a drawing to the description, in order that it may be more easily and thoroughly understood; but this is not indispensable.

The right acquired by the caveator in this manner is that of preventing the grant of any interfering patent, on any application filed within one year from the day when the caveat was lodged in the patent office, without his being notified of the application and having an opportunity of contesting the priority of invention of the applicant, by means of an "interference," which will be treated of hereafter. In this way an inventor can obtain a year to perfect his invention, without the risk of having the patent to which he is entitled granted to another in the mean time.

Upon application within one year by any other person for a patent that interferes in any way, it is the duty of the commissioner of patents to give notice of such application to the person filing the caveat, who shall within three months file his description, etc. The caveat is filed in the confidential archives of the office, and preserved in secrecy. See 1 Bond, 212; 1 Fisher, 479, 372; s. c. 4 Blatch. 362.

Of the application for a patent. When the invention is complete, and the inventor desires to apply for a patent, he causes a specification to be prepared, setting forth in clear and intelligible terms the exact nature of his invention, describing its different parts and the principle and mode in which they operate, and stating precisely what he claims as new, in contradistinction from those parts and combinations which were previously in use. This should be accompanied by a petition to the commissioner of patents, stating the general nature of his invention and the object of his application. One copy of drawings should be attached to the specification, where the nature of the case admits of drawings; and, where the invention is for a composition of matter, specimens of the ingredients and of the composition of matter should be furnished. The specification, as well as the drawings, must be signed by the applicant and attested by two witnesses; the drawings may be signed by an attorney in fact; and appended to the specification must be an affidavit of the applicant, stating that he verily believes himself to be the original and first inventor of that for which he asks a patent, and that he does not know and does not believe that the same was ever before known or used, and, also, of what country he is a citizen. The whole is then filed in the patent office. As to furnishing a model, see MODEL. R. S. §§ 4889, 4891.

Of the examination. As has been already observed, the act (sec. 31) provides for an examination whenever an application is completed in the prescribed manner. And if on such examination it appears that the claim of the applicant is invalid and would not be sustained by the courts, the application is rejected. In cases of doubt, however, the approved practice of the patent office is to grant the patent, and thus give the party an opportunity to sustain it in the courts if he can.

As a general rule, an invention is considered patentable whenever the applicant is shown to be the original and first inventor; and his own affidavit appended to the application is sufficient to raise a presumption that he is the first inventor, until the contrary is shown. But if it is ascertained by the office that the same thing had been invented by any other person in this country, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, prior to its invention by the applicant, a patent will be denied him. But a mere prior invention of the same thing in a foreign country, if not patented or described in some printed publication, will not affect his right to a patent here.

The rule that the applicant is entitled to a patent whenever he is shown to be the original and first inventor is subject to one important exception. If he has, either actually or constructively, abandoned his invention to the public, he can never afterwards recall it and resume his right of ownership; 4 Mas. 111; 4 Wash. C. C. 544; 2 Pet. 16; 6 id. 248; 7 id. 313; 1 How. 202; 5 Fisher, 189; 2 id. 531; 94 U. S. 92; 3 Fisher, 595; 3 Biss. 321; 1 Fisher, 252; 14 Off. Gaz. 308; 14 Blatch. 94.

Where an invention has been in public use or on sale for more than two years before the date of the application, a patent cannot be granted. See 97 U. S. 126; 94 id. 92; 12 Blatch. 149; 6 Fisher, 343; s. c. 3 Cliff. 563; 7 Wall. 583; 9 Reporter, 337; 1 Holmes, 503. (Under the earlier acts, such use, etc., did not prejudice an inventor's rights unless it occurred with the consent and allowance of the applicant.)

If the application for a patent is rejected, the specification may be amended and a second examination requested. If again rejected, an appeal may be taken, upon the payment of $10, to the examiners-in-chief. If rejected by them, an appeal lies to the commissioner in person, on payment of a fee of $20; and if rejected by him, an appeal may be taken to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting in banc, upon notice to the commissioner, and filing the reasons of appeal in writing. If all this proves ineffectual, the applicant may still file a bill in equity in the circuit court to compel the allowance of his patent; §§ 46–52, act of 1870.

All the proceedings before the patent office connected with the application for a patent are ex parte, and are kept secret, except in cases of conflicting claims, which will be referred to below.

Of the date of the patent. The patent usually takes date on the day it issues; every patent shall bear date as of a day not later than six months from its allowance and notice to the applicant; sec. 23.

The obtaining of foreign letters patent by an inventor entitled to obtain a patent in this country does not prevent the granting of a patent here. In such case the patent here expires with the foreign patent, or if more than one, with the one first expiring, but in no case can the patent here continue more than seventeen years.

Of interferences. The forty-second section of the act of 1870 provides that when an application is made which interferes with another pending application or with an unexpired patent, a trial shall be allowed for the purpose of determining who was the prior inventor, and a patent is directed to be issued or not accordingly.

Whenever there are interfering patents, any person interested in any one of such patents may have relief against the interfering patent by suit in equity against its owners; the court may thereupon adjudge either patent void in whole or in part, etc., but such judgment shall affect none but parties to the suit and those deriving title under them subsequently to the judgment; see 58, act of 1870.

Of the specification. The specification is required, by the act of 1870, § 26, to describe the invention in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it relates to make, construct, or use it. In the trial of an action for infringement, it is a question of fact for the jury whether this requirement has been complied with; 2 Brock. 298; 1 Mas. 182; 2 Stor. 432; 3 id. 122; 1 W. & M. 53. At the same time, the interpretation of the specification, and the ascertainment of the subject-matter of the invention from the language of the specification and from the drawings, is, as appears from the authorities just referred to, as well as from others, a matter of law exclusively for the court; 5 How. 1; 3 McLean, 250, 432; 2 Cliff. 507; 2 Fisher, 62; 4 Blatch. 61; 1 Fisher, 44; 289, 351. The specification will be liberally construed by the court, in order to sustain the invention; 1 Sumn. 482; 3 id. 514, 535; 1 Stor. 270; 5 McLean, 44: 5 Fisher, 153; 2 Bond, 189; 15 How. 341; 4 Blatch. 238; 14 id. 152; 2 Sawy. 461; s. c. 6 Fisher, 469; 1 Wall. 491. See 7 Off. Gaz. 385; but it must, nevertheless, identify with reasonable clearness and accuracy the invention claimed, and describe the manner of its construction and use so that the public from the specification alone may be enabled to practise it; and if the court cannot satisfactorily ascertain the meaning of the patent from its face, it will be void for ambiguity; 2 Blatch. 1; 2 Brock. 303; 1 Sumn. 482; 1 Mas. 182, 447. It will be construed in view of the state of the art; 2 Fisher, 477; 14 Blatch. 79; 1 Holmes, 445; 1 Biss. 87.

It is required to distinguish between what is new and what is old, and not mix them up together without disclosing distinctly that for which the patent is granted; 4 Wash. C. C. 68; 2 Brock. 298; 1 Stor. 273; 1 Mas. 188, 475; 1 Gall. 438, 478; 2 id. 51; 1 Sumn. 482; 3 Wheat. 534; 7 id. 356. If the invention consists of an improvement, the patent should be confined thereto, and should clearly distinguish the improvement from the prior machine, so as to show that the former only is claimed; 1 Gall. 438, 478; 2 id. 51; 1 Mas. 447; 3 McLean, 250. Ambiguous terms should be avoided; nothing material to the use of the invention should be omitted; and the necessity of trials and experiments should not be thrown upon the public.

Of re-issues. It often happens that errors, defects, and mistakes occur in the specification of a patent, by which it is rendered wholly or partially inoperative or perhaps invalid. To furnish a remedy in such cases, § 53 of the act of 1870 provides that when such errors or defects are the result of inadvertency, accident, or mistake, without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the patent may be surrendered by the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and a new patent issued in proper shape to secure the real invention intended to have been patented originally. The identity between the invention described in the re-issued and that in the original patent is a question of fact for the jury; 4 How. 380; 27 Penn. 517; 1 Wall. 531.

A re-issued patent has the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions for causes subsequently accruing, as though the patent had been originally issued in such corrected form. From this it appears that after a re-issue no action can be brought for a past infringement of the patent. But, as the bare use of a patented machine is (if unauthorized) an infringement of the rights of the patentee, a machine constructed and lawfully used prior to the re-issue may be an infringement of the patent if used afterwards. The re-issued patent will expire when the original patent would have expired.

For the principles applicable to a surrender and re-issue, and the extent to which the action of the commissioner of patents is conclusive, see 2 McLean, 35; 2 Stor. 432; 3 id. 749; 4 How. 380, 646; 15 id. 112; 17 id. 74; 6 Pet. 218; 7 id. 202; 1 W. & M. 248; 2 id. 121. All matters of fact relating to a re-issue are finally settled by the decision of the commissioner, granting the re-issue; but it may be shown that the commissioner has exceeded his authority in granting a re-issue for an invention different from the one embraced in the original patent; 11 Wall. 516; 9 id. 796; 8 Blatch. 513; s. c. 4 Fisher, 324; id. 468; Curt. Pat. § 282, b. The late case of Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co., 21 O. G. 201; 3 Morr. Transcr. 419, indicates some departure from the accepted rules on the subject. It was there said by Bradley, J., that where the only mistake suggested is that the claim is not so broad as it might have been, the mistake was apparent on the first inspection of the patent, and any correction desired should have been applied for immediately, and that the right to a correction may be lost by unreasonable delay. Further, that the claim of a specific device, and the omission to claim other devices apparent on the face of the patent, are in law a dedication to the public of that which was not claimed, and the legal effect of the patent cannot be revoked unless the patentee surrenders it and proves that the specification was so framed by real inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and this should be done with due diligence (and before adverse rights have accrued; 3 Morr. Transcr. 455). It was not the special purpose of the legislation upon re-issues to authorize re-issues with broader claims, though such a re-issue may be made, when it clearly appears that there has been a bona fide mistake such as chancery in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction would correct. The subject is discussed in 15 Am. L. Rev. 731; 16 id. 57, 296; Howson, Re-issued Patents. See, also, 1 Wall. 577. The re-issued patent is not a new patent; and an existing contract concerning the patent before its surrender applies equally to it after the surrender and re-issue; 11 Cush. 569.

Under the act of 1870, the application for a re-issue must be sworn to by the inventor, if living—and not by the assignee, if any, but this does not apply to patents issued and assigned prior to July 8, 1870; act of March 3, 1871. R. S. § 4895.

Of patents for designs. The act of 1870 permits any person to obtain a patent for a design, which shall continue in force for three and a half, seven, or fourteen years, at the option of the applicant, upon the payment of a fee of ten, fifteen, or thirty dollars, according to the duration of the patent obtained. These patents are granted wherever the applicant, by his own industry, genius, efforts, and expense, has invented or produced any new and original design for a manufacture, alto relievo, or bas-relief, or any new and original design for the printing of woollen, silk, cotton, or other fabrics; any new and original impression, ornament, pattern, print, or picture, to be printed, painted, cast, or otherwise placed on or worked into any article of manufacture, or any new and original shape or configuration of any article of manufacture, not known or used by others before his invention or production thereof, or patented or described in any printed publication.

The general method of making the application is the same as has been hereinbefore described, and the patent issues in a similar form.

Of disclaimers. Section 54, of the act of 1870, provides "that whenever a patentee has, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, claimed more than that of which he was the original or first inventor or discoverer, his patent shall be valid for all that part which is truly and justly his own, provided the same is a material or substantial part of the thing patented, and any such patentee, his heirs or assigns, whether of the whole or any sectional interest therein, may, on payment of the duty required by law (ten dollars), make disclaimer of such parts of the thing patented as he shall not claim to hold by virtue of the patent or assignment, stating therein the extent of his interest in such patent; said disclaimer shall be in writing, attested by one or more witnesses, and recorded in the patent office, and shall thereafter be considered as part of the original specification, to the extent of the interest possessed by the claimant, and by those claiming under him, after the record thereof. But no such disclaimer shall affect any action pending at the time of its being filed, except so far as may relate to the question of unreasonable neglect or delay in filing it."

To understand the object and purpose of some of these provisions, it must be known that by the fifteenth section of the act of 1836 it was provided that it should be a good defence to an action for infringement that the specification was too broad; and although this was modified by the ninth section of the act of 1837 so as to permit a patentee who, by mistake, accident, or inadvertence, and without any wilful intent, had claimed some things of which he was not the first inventor, to recover damages for the infringement of what was really his invention, where the parts invented could be clearly separated from the parts improperly claimed, yet in such cases the plaintiff was not entitled to recover costs unless previous to the commencement of the suit he had entered a disclaimer for that which was not his invention. But no person can avail himself of the benefits of this provision who has unreasonably neglected or delayed to enter his disclaimer. The act of 1870 follows substantially the act of 1837 in this respect. The provisions authorizing disclaimers, and their effect upon the question of costs, are discussed in 1 Stor. 273, 590; 1 Blatchf. 244, 445; 2 id. 194; 15 How. 121; 19 id. 96; 20 id. 378; 21 Wall. 112; 6 Blatchf. 96; 2 Fisher, 477; 3 N. Y. 9; 5 Denio, 314; a disclaimer by one owner will not affect the interest of any other owner.

Of the extension of a patent. Patents were formerly granted for fourteen years, the commissioner of patents being authorized in special cases to extend the same for seven years longer. But by the act of 1861 the length of time for the patent to run was extended to seventeen years, and the right to an extension on such patents was denied. Therefore no extensions hereafter will be granted, except by congress, of patents issued before March 2, 1861. R. S. § 4924.

Applications for extension were required to be filed with the commissioner, not more than six months, or less than ninety days before the expiration of the patent; no extension was granted after the expiration of the original term.

Notice of the application was required to be given through newspapers published in Washington, and in the section of the country interested adversely to the extension, for sixty days before the day set for the hearing. After paying a fee of fifty dollars, he was required, in accordance with the act of congress and the rules of the office, to file a sworn statement of the ascertained value of his invention or discovery, and of his receipts and expenditures, sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of loss and profit in any manner accruing to him by reason of said invention. Act of 1870, §§ 63–4–5–6.

Any person might appear and show cause against the extension of the patent. But if, after all was done, the commissioner was fully satisfied that, having due regard to the public interest, it was just and proper that the term of the patent should be extended, by reason of the patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, having failed to obtain from the use and sale of his invention a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same and the introduction thereof into use, it was his duty to grant the extension as prayed for. And thereupon the patent, as extended, had the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years. The extension enured only to the benefit of the patentee, and not of his assignees, unless he had contracted to convey to them an interest or right therein. But the assignee had a right to continue the use by himself of the patented machine which he was using at the time of the renewal; 4 How. 646, 709, 712; 19 id. 211; 3 McLean, 250; 4 id. 526; 1 Blatch. 167, 258; 2 id. 471; 3 Stor. 122, 171; and a purchaser might repair his own machine, when necessary, though the repair consisted in the replacement of an essential part of the combination patented; 9 How. 109.

The act of the commissioner in granting the extension was conclusive, in the absence of fraud or excess of jurisdiction; 2 Curt. C. C. 506; see 8 Blatch. 513; s. c. 4 Fisher, 324. As to the effect of an extension, see 3 Blatch. 48; 6 id. 165; 10 Wall. 367; 98 U. S. 596.

Of the assignment of patents. By § 36 of the act of 1870, every patent or an interest therein is assignable in law, by an instrument in writing; such assignments, etc., are void as against any purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration, without notice, unless recorded in the patent office within three months. See PATENT OFFICE.

Strictly speaking, the word "assignment" applies to the transfer of the entire interests of the inventor, or of a fraction of that entire interest running throughout the whole United States. A conveyance of an exclusive interest within and throughout any specified part or portion of the United States is more properly denominated a grant. A mere authority or permission to use, sell, or manufacture the thing patented, either in the whole United States or in any specific portion thereof, is known as a license. But all three are sometimes included under the general term of an assignment. As to the distinction between an assignment and license, see 4 Fisher, 221; 21 Wall. 205; 1 Holmes, 149; 10 How. 447. Where the assignment, however, is not of the patent itself, or of any undivided part thereof, or of any right therein limited to a particular locality, but constitutes merely a license or authority from the pantentee, not exclusive and not transferring any interest in the patent itself, it has been held that it need not be recorded; 2 Stor. 541. Acts in pais will sometimes justify the presumption of a license; 1 How. 202; 17 Pet. 228; 3 Stor. 402. As to a verbal license, see 1 Bond, 194; s. c. 1 Fisher, 380. As to the rights of licensees, see 12 Blatch. 202.

An assignment may be made prior to the granting of a patent. And when duly made and recorded, the patent may be issued to the assignee. See act of 1870, § 33. This, however, only applies to cases of assignments proper, as contradistinguished from grants or licenses. The application must, however, in such cases be made and the specification sworn to by the inventor. See 5 McLean, 131; 4 Wash. C. C. 71; 4 Mas. 15; 1 Blatch. 506. The assignment transfers the right to the assignee, although the patent should be afterwards issued to the assignor; 10 How. 477. See 1 Wash. C. C. 168; 4 Mas. 15.

Of joint inventors. The patent must in all cases issue to the inventor, if alive and if he has not assigned his interest. And if the invention is made jointly by two inventors, the patent must issue to them both. This is equally the case where one makes a portion of the invention at one time and another at another time. A failure to observe this rule may prove fatal to the validity of the patent; see 1 Mas. 447.

Of executors and administrators. The thirty-fourth section of the act of 1870 provides that, where an inventor dies before obtaining a patent, his executor or administrator may apply for and obtain such patent, holding it in trust for the heirs at law or devisees, accordingly as the inventor died intestate or testate. Nothing is said as to its being appropriated to the payment of debts; but, having once gone into the hands of the executors or administrators, it would perhaps become assets, and be used like other personal property. In England, a patent will pass as assets to assignees in bankruptcy; 3 B. & P. 565.

The right to make a surrender and receive a re-issue of a patent also vests by law in the executor or administrator. See act of 1870, § 53. The law further provides that the executor or administrator may make the oath necessary to obtain the patent,—differing in this respect from the case of an assignment, where, although the patent issues to the assignee, the inventor must make the oath.

The liability of a patent to be levied upon for debt. The better opinion is that letters patent cannot be levied upon and sold by a common law execution. The grant of privilege to the patentee would, from its incorporeal nature, seem to be incapable of manual seizure and of sale. Even if such a sale were made, there does not appear to be any provision in the acts of congress which contemplates the recording of a sheriff's deed; and without a valid record the patentee might nevertheless make a subsequent transfer to a bonâ fide purchaser without notice, which would be valid.

But this peculiar species of property may be subjected to the payment of debts through the instrumentality of a bill in equity. The chancellor can act upon the person. He can direct the patent to be sold, and by attachment can compel the patentee to execute a conveyance to the purchaser. It was so ruled in 23 Alb. L. J. 332 (S. C. of Dist. of Col.), which case was affirmed by the supreme court; 14 Cent. L. J. 326; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 469 (see 14 How. 528; 1 Paige, 637; 1 Gall. 485); where it was further held that the court might compel the holder of the patent to assign it, or appoint a trustee for that purpose. The right of a patentee will pass to his assignees in bankruptcy; 8 B. & P. 777; but not to a trustee in insolvency, in Massachusetts; 1 Holmes, 152.

How far a patent is retroactive. By the earlier law on this subject in the United States, a patent, when granted, operated retroactively: so that a machine covered by the terms of the patent, though constructed previously to the date of that instrument, could not be used after the issuing of the patent without subjecting the party so using it to an action for infringement. Of course the use of the machine previously to the date of the patent was not unlawful.

The 37th section of the act of 1870, following substantially the act of 1837, provides "that every person who may have purchased of the inventor, or with his knowledge and consent may have constructed any newly-invented or discovered machine, or other patentable article, prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, or sold or used one so constructed, shall have the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific thing so made or purchased, without liability therefor."

At present, therefore, property rightfully acquired in a specific machine, etc., cannot be affected by a patent subsequently applied for by the patentee. It has been held, however, that, under the general grant contained in the constitution, congress has power to pass a special act which shall operate retrospectively so as to give a patent for an invention already in public use; 3 Wheat. 454; 2 Stor. 164; 3 Sumn. 535. The infringement must be subsequent to the date of the patent; but on the question of novelty the patent will be considered as relating back to the original discovery; 4 Wash. C. C. 68, 703.

Marking patented articles. The thirty-eighth section of the act of 1870 declares that in all cases where an article is made or vended by any person under the protection of letters patent, it shall be the duty of such person to give sufficient notice to the public that said article is so patented, either by fixing thereon the word "patented," together with the day and year the patent was granted, or when, from the character of the article patented, that may be impracticable, by enveloping one or more of the said articles, and affixing a label to the package, or otherwise attaching thereto a label containing a like notice; on failure of which, in any suit for the infringement of letters patent by the party failing so to mark, no damage shall be recovered by the plaintiff, except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement, and continued after such notice, to make, use, or vend the article patented.

Penalties provided in certain cases. The thirty-ninth section of the act of 1870 provides a penalty of not less than $100 and costs for every person who shall mark, etc., any article for which he has not obtained a patent, with the name in imitation of the name of any person who has a patent thereupon, without his consent, etc., or who shall so mark the word "patent" or any word of similar import with intent to counterfeit the mark or device of the patentee, without consent; or who shall in any manner mark upon an unpatented article the word "patent," etc., for the purpose of deceiving the people. This penalty may be recovered in the district court where the offence was committed; one half goes to the person who sues for the penalty and the other to the United States.

A similar statute—that of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 83—exists in England, for observations upon which see Hindm. Pat. 366. It has been decided under that statute that where there has been an unauthorized use of the word "patent," it must be proved that the word was used with a view of imitating or counterfeiting the stamp of the patentee, and that it is no defence that the patented article imitated was not a new manufacture, the grant of the patent being conclusive on the defendant; 3 H. & N. 802. See 1 Fisher, 647; 2 Bond, 23; s. c. 3 Fisher, 72; id. 374; 5 id. 384; 5 Blatch. 494; 6 id. 33.

Of infringements. The criterion of infringement is substantial identity of construction or operation. Mere changes of form, proportion, or position, or substitution of mechanical equivalents, will not be infringements, unless they involve a substantial difference of construction, operation, or effect; 3 McLean, 250, 432; 1 Wash. C. C. 108; 15 How. 62; 1 Curt. 279; 1 McAll. 48. As a general rule, whenever the defendant has incorporated in his structure the substance of what the plaintiff has invented and properly claimed, he is responsible to the latter; 1 Wall. 531.

Where the patent is for a new combination of machines to produce certain effects, it is no infringement to use any of the machines separately, if the whole combination is not used; 1 Mas. 447; 2 id. 112; 1 Pet. C. C. 322; 1 Stor. 568; 2 id. 190; 16 Pet. 336; 3 McLean, 427; 4 id. 70; 6 id. 539; 14 How. 219; 24 Vt. 66; 1 Black, 427; 1 Wall. 78. But it is an infringement to use one of several improvements claimed, or to use a substantial part of the invention, although with some modification or even improvement of form or apparatus; 2 Mas.

112; 1 Stor. 273. Where the patent describes and claims a machine, it cannot be construed to be for a process or function, so as to make all other machines infringements which perform the same function; and no infringement will in such case take place where the practical manner of giving effect to the principle is by a different mechanical structure and mechanical action; 15 How. 252. If the patentee is the inventor of a device, he may treat as infringers all who make a similar device operating on the same principle and performing the same functions by analogous means or equivalent combinations, although the infringing machine may be an improvement of the original and patentable as such. But if the invention claimed is itself but an improvement on a known machine, by a mere change of form or combination of parts, it will not be an infringement to improve the original machine by the use of a different form or combination of parts performing the same functions. The doctrine of equivalents does not in such case apply, unless the subsequent improvements are mere colorable invasions of the first; 20 How. 405.

A sale of the thing patented to an agent of the patentee, employed by him to make the purchase on account of the patentee, is not per se an infringement, although, accompanied by other circumstances, it may be evidence of infringement; 1 Curt. 260.

The making of a patented machine for philosophical experiment only, and not for use or sale, has been held to be no infringement; 1 Gall. 429, 485; but a use with a view to an experiment to test its value is an infringement; 4 Wash. 580. The sale of the articles produced by a patented machine or process is not an infringement; 3 McLean, 295; 4 How. 709; 94 U. S. 568; nor is the bonâ fide purchase of patented articles from an infringing manufacturer; 10 Wheat. 359; nor a sale of materials by a sheriff; 1 Gall. 485; 1 Robb, 47. Selling the parts of a patented machine may be an infringement; 1 Holmes, 88. As to infringement by a railroad corporation, where its road was worked and its stock owned by a connecting road, see 17 How. 30. Ignorance by the infringer of the existence of the patent infringed is no defence, but may mitigate damages; 11 How. 587.

Of damages for infringements. The act of 1870, § 59, provides that damages may be recovered in any circuit court of U. S. etc., in the name of the party interested either as patentee, assignee, or grantee, and that in case of verdict for the plaintiff the court may enter judgment thereon for any sum above the amount found by the verdict as the actual damages sustained, according to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding three times the amount of such verdict, together with costs.

By § 55 of same act, a court of equity may award damages for infringement and increase the same in a similar manner. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The actual damage is all that can be allowed by a jury, as contradistinguished from exemplary, vindictive, and punitive damages. The amount of defendant's profits from the unlawful user is, in general, the measure of the plaintiff's damages; and this may be determined by the plaintiff's price for a license; 11 How. 607; 15 id. 546; 16 id. 480; 20 id. 198; 1 Gall. 476; 1 Blatch. 244, 405; 2 id. 132, 194, 229, 476. The rule of damages is different where a patent is only for an improvement on a machine and where it is for an entire machine; 16 How. 480. If there be a mere making and no user proved, the damages should be nominal; 1 Gall. 476.

Jurisdiction of cases under the patent laws. The act of 1870, § 55, gives original jurisdiction to the circuit courts of the United States and to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or of any territory, in all cases arising under the laws of the United States granting exclusive privileges to inventors. This jurisdiction extends both to law and equity, and is irrespective of the citizenship of the parties or the amount in controversy. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is exclusive of that of the state courts; 3 N. Y. 9; 40 Me. 430. But this is to be understood of cases arising directly under the acts of congress, and not of those where the patent comes collaterally in question: as, for instance, where it is the subject-matter of a contract or the consideration of a promissory note; 3 McLean, 525; 1 W. & M. 34; 16 Conn. 409. Hence, a bill to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a patent-right is not such a case arising under the patent laws as gives jurisdiction to the federal courts; 10 How. 477. By the same act, § 56, a writ of error or an appeal lies to the supreme court of the United States from all judgments or decrees of any circuit court, etc., in any suit under the patent law, without regard to the sum or value in controversy. See COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Patent-right, note given for a. In many of the states, laws have been passed making void all notes given in consideration of a patent-right unless the words "given for a patent-right" are prominently written on the face of the note. These laws have been decided in Michigan, 16 Alb. L. J. 330; Illinois, 70 Ill. 109; Indiana, 2 Bissell, 311; Minnesota, 9 Chic. Leg. News, 112; to be unconstitutional and void. The property in inventions exists by virtue of the laws of congress, and no state has a right to interfere with its enjoyment or annex conditions to the grant; 2 Biss. 314; 4 Bush, 311. In Pennsylvania, however, a distinction has been made, the statute of April 12, 1872, requiring the insertion of the words "given for a patent-right," merely having the effect of making the note or instrument in the hands of a purchaser subject to the same defence as if in the hands of the original owner or holder. By necessary implication, notes without such words inserted in them remain on the same footing as before the act, and innocent holders, who take such notes without notice, take them clear of all equities existing between the original parties.

As between the original parties to a note given for a patent-right, it is well settled that it is a good defence to show that the alleged patent was void, and therefore there was no consideration; 18 Penn. 465. All who take with notice of the consideration, take subject to the same defence; id. Sharswood, J., holds that there is nothing in this view which interferes with any just right of the holder of a valid patent under the acts of congress, nor in permitting the maker to show against a holder with such notice that the note was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; 86 Penn. 178.

To secure the insertion of the words, the act makes it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person "knowing the consideration of a note" to be the sale of a patent-right, to sell or transfer it without the words "given for a patent-right" inserted, as provided by the act; 26 Am. Rep. 514 and note, citing 43 Ind. 167; 23 Minn. 24; 53 Ind. 454; 54 id. 270.

PATENT OFFICE. The office through which applications for patents are made, and from which those patents emanate.

Some provision for the purpose of issuing patents is, of course, found in every country where the system of granting patents for inventions prevails; but nowhere else is there an establishment which is organized in all respects on the same scale as the United States Patent Office.

By the act of 1790, the duty of transacting this business was devolved upon the secretary of state, the secretary of war, and the attorney-general. In the provision for a board for this purpose found in the act of 1793, the secretary of war is omitted. From that time during a period of more than forty years all the business connected with the granting of patents was transacted by a clerk in the office of the secretary of state,—the duties of the secretary in this respect being little more than nominal, and the attorney-general acting only as a legal adviser.

The act of July 4, 1836, reorganized the office and gave it a new and higher position. A commissioner of patents was constituted. Provision was made for a library, which has since become one of the finest of the kind in the country.

The patent office is an office of record, in which assignments of patents are recordable, and the record is notice to all the world of the facts to be found on record. Under section four of the act of 1793, an assignment was not valid unless recorded in the office of the secretary of state; 4 Blackf. 183. The law on the subject of recording is thus stated in Curt. Pat. § 183: As against the patentee himself, an assignment vests a good title in the assignee, from the time of its execution, and recording within three months is not necessary to its validity. But as respects subsequent purchasers without notice and for a valuable consideration the prior assignment must be recorded within the three months. As against third persons, a suit may be maintained, in law or equity, by an assignee, provided he records his assignment at any time before the trial or hearing. See 1 Story, 273; 2 id. 609; 7 Blatch. 195.

Three cases only are said to be provided for by statute: first, an assignment of the whole patent; second, an assignment of an undivided part thereof; and, third, a grant or conveyance of an exclusive right under the patent within a specified part or portion of the United States; 2 Stor. 542; 2 Blatch. 148; 9 Vt. 177. A question may arise whether the act of 1860, in prescribing a tariff of fees for recording other papers, as agreements, etc., has not recognized the usage of the office in recording them as within the meaning of the acts of congress, and rendered them recordable. See, as to recording contracts relating to patents, Curt. Pat. § 183, n.

PATENT OFFICE, EXAMINERS IN. Upon the reorganization of the patent office, in 1836, under the act of July 4 of that year, a new and important principle was introduced. Prior to that date, any one was at liberty to take out his patent for almost any contrivance, if he was willing to pay the fees. At least, this was the practical operation of the system; for although a patent was not granted until it was allowed by certain heads of departments, still, as the examination in such cases went no further than merely to ascertain whether the contrivance was of sufficient importance to be worthy of a patent, without any inquiry as to who was the first inventor thereof, the allowance of the patent was rather a matter of course in almost every case. The applicant, at his own peril, decided for himself whether the subject-matter of the patent was new. If it was not so, the patent would be of no value, as it could never be enforced. The question of novelty could be raised whenever an action for infringement was brought; or a proceeding might be directly instituted to test the validity of the patent, and to annul it if the patentee was found not to be the orignal and first inventor. The law in these respects was like that of England and most other European countries.

But the act of 1836 provided for a thorough examination of every application, with a view of ascertaining whether the contrivance thus shown was novel as well as useful: so that no patent should issue which would not be sustained by the courts. In theory, this was to be done by the commissioner of patents; but the amount of business on his hands was such, even then, as to render it impossible for him to perform all that labor in person; and provision was accordingly made by law for an examining clerk to assist him in these examinations. Under the act of 1870 there are now, besides the commissioner and assistant commissioner, three examiners-in-chief, a chief clerk, an examiner in charge of interferences, twenty-two principal examiners, twenty-two first and twenty-two second assistant examiners.

The duty of these examiners is to determine whether the subject-matter of the respective patents which are applied for had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country, or had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, prior to the alleged invention thereof by the applicant. If not, and the invention is deemed useful within the meaning of the patent law, a patent is allowed, unless it clearly appears that the invention has been abandoned to the public. If the invention has been in public use more than two years with or without the consent of the inventor, that single circumstance amounts to a statutory abandonment of the invention; although it may be abandoned in various other methods. But, unless the fact of abandonment is very clear, the office does not assume to decide against the applicant, but leaves the matter to a court and jury. See PATENTS; PATENT OFFICE.

PATENT-ROLLS. Registers in which are recorded all letters patent granted since 1516; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 346; App. to First Rep. of Select Commit. on Pub. Rec. pp. 53, 84.

PATENT WRIT. A writ not closed or sealed up. Jacob, Law Dict.; Co. Litt. 289; 2 id. 39; 7 Co. 20.

PATENTEE. He to whom a patent has been granted. The term is usually applied to one who has obtained letters patent for a new invention.

PATER (Lat.). Father. The Latin term is considerably used in genealogical tables.

PATER-FAMILIAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who was sui juris, and not subject to the paternal power.

In order to give a correct idea of what was understood in the Roman law by this term, it is proper to refer briefly to the artificial organization of the Roman family,—the greatest moral phenomenon in the history of the human race. The comprehensive term familia embraced both persons and property: money, lands, houses, slaves, children, all constituted part of this artificial family, this juridical entity, this legal patrimony, the title to which was exclusively vested in the chief or pater-familias, who alone was capax dominii, and who belonged to himself, sui juris.

The word pater-familias is by no means equivalent to the modern expression father of a family, but means proprietor in the strongest sense of that term; it is he qui in domo dominium habet, in whom were centred all property, all power, all authority: he was, in a word, the lord and master, whose authority was unlimited. No one but he who was sui juris, who was pater-familias, was capable of exercising any right of property, or wielding any superiority or power over any thing; for nothing could belong to him who was himself alieni juris. Hence the children of the filii-familias, as well as those of slaves, belonged to the pater-familias. In the same manner, every thing that was acquired by the sons or slaves formed a part of the familia, and, consequently, belonged to its chief. This absolute property and power of the pater-familias only ceased with his life, unless he voluntarily parted with them by a sale; for the alienation by sale is invariably the symbol resorted to for the purpose of dissolving the stern dominion of the pater-familias over those belonging to the familia. Thus, both emancipation and adoption are the results of imaginary sales,—per imaginarias venditiones. As the daughter remained in the family of her father, grandfather, or great-grandfather, as the case might be, notwithstanding her marriage, it followed as a necessary consequence that the child never belonged to the same family as its mother: there is no civil relationship between them; they are natural relations,—cognati,—but they are not legally related to each other,—agnati; and therefore the child never inherits from its mother, nor the mother from her child. There was, however, a means by which the wife might enter into the family and subject herself to the power of her husband, in manu mariti, and thereby establish a legal relationship between herself and her husband. This marital power of the husband over the wife was generally acquired either coemptione, by the purchase of the wife by the husband from the pater-familias, or usu, by the prescription based on the possession of one year,—the same by which the title to movable property was acquired according to the principles governing the usucapio (usu capere, to obtain by use). Another mode of obtaining the same end was the confarreatio, a sacred ceremony performed by the breaking and eating of a small cake, farreum, by the married couple. It was supposed that by an observance of this ceremony the marital power was produced by the intervention of the gods. This solemn mode of celebrating marriages was peculiar to the patrician families. By means of these fictions and ceremonies the wife became in the eye of the law the daughter of her husband, and the sister of the children to whom she gave birth, who would otherwise have been strangers to her. Well might Gaius say, Fere nulli alii sunt homines qui talem in liberos habeant potestatem, qualem nos habemus.

There is some similarity between the agnatio, or civil relationship, of the Romans, and the transmission of the name of the father, under the modern law, to all his descendants in the male line. The Roman law says of the children, patris, non matris, familiam sequuntur; we say, patris, non matris, nomen sequuntur. All the members of the family who, with us, bear the same name, were under that law agnates, or constituted the agnatio, or civil family. Those children only belonged to the family, and were subject to the paternal power, who had been conceived in justis nuptiis, or been adopted. Nuptiæ, or matrimonium, was a marriage celebrated in conformity with the peculiar rules of the civil law. There existed a second kind of marriage, call concubinatus,—a valid union and a real marriage,—which has been often improperly confounded, even by high authority, with concubinage. This confusion of ideas is attributable to a superficial examination of the subject; for the illicit intercourse between a man and a woman which we call concubinage was stigmatized by the opprobrious term stuprum by the Romans, and is spoken of in the strongest terms of reprobation. The concubinatus was the natural marriage, and the only one which those who did not enjoy the jus connubii were permitted to contract. The Roman law recognized two species of marriage, the one civil, and the other natural, in the same manner as there were two kinds of relationship, the agnatio and cognatio. The justæ nuptiæ or justum matrimonium, or civil marriage, could only be contracted by Roman citizens and by those to whom the jus connubii had been conceded: this kind of marriage alone produced the paternal power, the right of inheritance, etc.

But the rapid rise and extraordinary greatness of the city attracted immense crowds of strangers, who, not possessing the jus connubii, could form no other union than that of the concubinatus, which, though authorized by law, did not give rise to those legal effects which flowed from the justæ nuptiæ. By adoption, the person adopted was transferred from one family to another; he passed from the paternal power of one pater-familias to that of another: consequently, no one who was sui juris could be adopted in the strict sense of that word. But there was another species of adoption, called adrogatio, by which a person sui juris entered into another family, and subjected himself to the paternal power of its chief. The effect of the adrogation was not confined to the person adrogated alone, but extended over his family and property. 1 Marcadé, 75 et seq.

This extraordinary organization of the Roman family, and the unlimited powers and authority vested in the pater-familias, continued until the reign of Justinian, who, by his 118th Novel, enacted on the 9th of August, 544, abolished the distinction between the agnatio and cognatio, and established the order of inheritance which, with some modifications, continues to exist at the present day in all countries whose jurisprudence is based on the civil law. See PATRIA POTESTAS.

PATERNA PATERNIS (Lat. the father's to the father's). In French Law. An expression used to signify that, in a succession, the property coming from the father of the deceased descends to his paternal relations.

PATERNAL. That which belongs to the father or comes from him: as paternal power, paternal relation, paternal estate, paternal line. See LINE.

PATERNAL POWER. The authority lawfully exercised by parents over their children. See FATHER.

PATERNAL PROPERTY. That which descends or comes from the father and other ascendants or collaterals of the paternal stock. Domat, Liv. Prél. tit. 3, s. 2, n. 11.

PATERNITY. The state or condition of a father.

The husband is primâ facie presumed to be the father of his wife's children born during coverture or within a competent time afterwards: pater is est quem nuptiæ demonstrant; 7 Mart. La. N. S. 553. So if the child is en ventre sa mere at time of marriage; Co. Litt. 123; 8 East, 192. In civil law the presumption holds in case of a child born before marriage as well as after; 1 Bla. Com. 446, 454; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 6. In cases of marriage of a widow within ten months after decease of husband, the paternity is to be decided by circumstances; Hargrave, note to Co. Litt. § 188, n. 190. Marriage within ten months after decease of husband was forbidden by Roman, Danish, and Saxon law, and English law before the Conquest; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 481; Brooke, Abr. Bastardy, pl. 18; Palm. 10; 1 Bla. Com. 456.

The presumption of paternity may always be rebutted by showing circumstances which render it impossible that the husband can be the father; 6 Binn. 283; 1 P. A. Browne, Appx. xlvii.; Hard. 479; 8 East, 193; Stra. 51, 940; 4 Term, 356; 2 Myl. & K. 349; 3 Paige, Ch. 139; 1 S. & S. 150; T. & R. 138; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 302 et seq.

The declarations of one or both of the spouses, however, cannot affect the condition of a child born during the marriage; 7 Mart. La. N. S. 553; 3 Paige, Ch. 139. See BASTARD; BASTARDY; LEGITIMACY; MATERNITY; PREGNANCY.

PATHOLOGY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The science or doctrine of diseases. In cases of homicides, abortions, and the like, it is of great consequence to the legal practitioner to be acquainted in some degree with pathology. 2 Chitty, Pr. 42, n.

PATRIA (Lat.). The country; the men of the neighborhood competent to serve on a jury; a jury. This word is nearly synonymous with pais, which see.

PATRIA POTESTAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The paternal power; the authority which the law vests in the father over the persons and property of his legitimate children.

One of the effects of marriage is the paternal authority over the children born in wedlock. In the early period of the Roman history, the paternal authority was unlimited: the father had the absolute control over his children, and might even, as the domestic magistrate of his family, condemn them to death. They could acquire nothing except for the benefit of the pater-familias (which see); and they were even liable to be sold and reduced to slavery by the author of their existence. But in the progress of civilization this stern rule was gradually relaxed; the voice of nature and humanity was listened to on behalf of the oppressed children of a cruel and heartless father. A passage in the 37th book, t. 12, § 5, of the Pandects, informs us that, in the year 870 of Rome, the emperor Trajan compelled a father to release his son from the paternal authority, on account of cruel treatment. The same emperor sentenced a father to transportation because he had killed his son in a hunting-party, although the son had been guilty of adultery with his stepmother; for, says Marcianus, who reports the case, patria potestas in pietate debet, non in atrocitate, consistere. Ulpianus says that a father is not permitted to kill his son without a judgment from the prefect or the president of the province. In the year 981 of Rome, the emperor Alexander Severus addressed a constitution to a father, which is found in the 8th book, t. 47, § 3, of the Justinian Code, in which he says, "Your paternal authority authorizes you to chastise your son; and if he persists in his misconduct, you may bring him before the president of the province, who will sentence him to such punishment as you may desire." In the same book and title of the Code we find a constitution of the emperor Constantine, dated in the year of Rome 1065, which inflicts the punishment denounced against parricide on the father who shall be convicted of having killed his son. The power of selling the child, which at first was unlimited, was also much restricted, and finally altogether abolished, by subsequent legislation, especially during the empire. Paulus, who wrote about the middle of the tenth century of Rome, informs us that the father could only sell his child in case of extreme poverty: contemplatione extremæ necessitatis aut alimentarum gratia. In 1039 of Rome, Diocletian and Maximian declare in a rescript that it is beyond doubt (manifestissimi juris) that a father can neither sell nor pledge nor donate his children. Constantine, in 1059, permitted the sale by the father of his child, at its birth and when forced to do so by abject poverty; propter nimiam paupertatem egestatemque victus; and the same law is re-enacted in the Code of Justinian. C. 4. 43, t. 2, 3.

The father, being bound to indemnify the party who had been injured by the offences of his child, could release himself from this responsibility by an abandonment of the offender, in the same manner as the master could abandon his slave for a similar purpose,—noxali causa mancipare. This power of abandonment continued to exist, with regard to male children, up to the time of Gaius, in the year 925 of Rome. But by the Institutes of Justinian it is forbidden. Inst. 4. 8. 7.

With regard to the rights of the father to the property the child might acquire, it was originally as extensive and absolute as if it had been acquired by a slave: the child could possess nothing nor acquire any thing that did not belong to the father. It is true, the child might possess a peculium; but of this he had only a precarious enjoyment, subject to the will and pleasure of the father. Under the first emperors a distinction was made in favor of the son as to such property as had been acquired by him in the army, which was called castrense peculium, to which the son acquired a title in himself. Constantine extended this rule by applying it to such property as the child had acquired by services in offices held in the state or by following a liberal profession: this was denominated quasi-castrense peculium. He also created the peculium adventitium, which was composed of all property inherited by the son from his mother, whether by will or ab intestat; but the father had the usufruct of this peculium. Arcadius and Honorius extended it to every thing the son acquired by succession or donations from his grandfather or mother or other ascendants in the maternal line. Theodosius and Valentinian embraced in it whatever was given by one of the spouses to the other; and Justinian included in it every thing acquired by the son, except such as was produced by property belonging to the father himself. It is thus seen that, by the legislation of Justinian and his predecessors, the paternal power with regard to property was almost entirely destroyed.

The pater-familias had not only under his paternal power his own children, but also the children of his sons and grandsons,—in fact, all his descendants in the male line; and this authority continued in full force and vigor no matter what might be the age of those subject to it. The highest offices in the government did not release the incumbent from the paternal authority. The victorious general or consul to whom the honors of a triumph were decreed by the senate was subject to the paternal power in the same manner and to the same extent as the humblest citizen. It is to be observed, however, that the domestic subjection did not interfere with the capacity of exercising the highest public functions in the state. The children of the daughter were not subject to the paternal authority of her father: they entered into the family of her husband. Women could never exercise the paternal power. And even when a woman was herself sui juris, she could not exercise the paternal power. It is for this reason, Ulpian observes, that the family of which a woman, sui juris, was the head, mater-familias, commenced and ended with her: mulier autem familiæ suæ et caput et finis est. 1 Ortolan, 191 et seq.

The modern civil law has hardly preserved any features of the old Roman jurisprudence concerning the paternal power. Article 233 of the Louisiana Code provides, it is true, that a child, whatever be its age, owes honor and respect to its father and mother; and the next article adds that the child remains under the authority of the father and mother until his majority or emancipation, and that in case of a difference of opinion between the parents the authority of the father shall prevail. In the succeeding article obedience is enjoined on the child to the orders of the parents as long as he remains subject to the paternal authority. But article 236 renders the foregoing rules in a great measure nugatory, by declaring that "a child under the age of puberty cannot quit the paternal house without the permission of his father and mother, who have a right to correct him, provided it be done in a reasonable manner." So that the power of correction ceases with the age of fourteen for boys and twelve for girls: nay, at these ages the children may leave the paternal roof in opposition to the will of their parents. It is seen that, by the modern law, the paternal authority is vested in both parents, but practically it is generally exercised by the father alone; for wherever there is a difference of opinion his will prevails. The great object to be attained by the exercise of the paternal power is the education of the children to prepare them for the battle of life, to make them useful citizens and respectable members of society. During the marriage, the parents are entitled to the enjoyment of the property of their minor children, subject to the obligation of supporting and educating them, and of paying the taxes, making the necessary repairs, etc. Donations made to minors are accepted by their parents or other ascendants. The father has under his control all actions which it may be necessary to bring for his minor children during the marriage. When the marriage is dissolved by the death of one of the spouses, the paternal power ceases, and the tutorship is opened: but the surviving parent is the natural tutor, and can at his death appoint a testamentary tutor to his minor children. See PATER FAMILIAS.

PATRICIDE. One guilty of killing his father. See PARRICIDE.

PATRIMONIAL. A thing which comes from the father, and, by extension, from the mother or other ancestor.

PATRIMONIUM. In Civil Law. That which is capable of being inherited.

Things capable of being possessed by a single person exclusively of all others are, in the Roman or civil law, said to be in patrimonio; when incapable of being so possessed, they are extra patrimonium.

Most things may be inherited; but there are some which are said to be extra patrimonium, or which are not in commerce. These are such as are common, as the light of heaven, the air, the sea, and the like; things public, as rivers, harbors, roads, creeks, ports, arms of the sea, the sea-shore, highways, bridges, and the like; things which belong to cities and municipal corporations, as public squares, streets, market-houses, and the like. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. nn. 421–446.

PATRIMONY. Any kind of property. Such estate as has descended in the same family; estates which have descended or been devised in a direct line from the father, and, by extension, from the mother or other ancestor.

The father's duty to take care of his children. Swinb. Wills, 235.

PATRINUS (Lat.). A godfather.

PATRON. In Ecclesiastical Law. He who has the disposition and gift of an ecclesiastical benefice.

In Roman Law. The former master of a freedman. Dig. 2. 4. 8. 1.

PATRONAGE. The right of appointing to office; as, the patronage of the president of the United States, if abused, may endanger the liberties of the people.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. 2 Bla. Com. 21.

PATRONUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A modification of the Latin word pater, father. A denomination applied by Romulus to the first senators of Rome, and which they always afterwards bore.

Romulus at first appointed a hundred of them. Seven years afterward, in consequence of the association of Tatius to the Romans, a hundred more were appointed, chosen from the Sabines. Tarquinius Priscus increased the number to three hundred. Those appointed by Romulus and Tatius were called patres majorum gentium, and the others were called patres minorum gentium. These and their descendants constituted the nobility of Rome. The rest of the people were called plebians, every one of whom was obliged to choose one of these fathers as his patron. The relation thus constituted involved important consequences. The plebeian, who was called cliens (a client), was obliged to furnish the means of maintenance to his chosen patron, to furnish a portion for his patron's daughters, to ransom him and his sons if captured by an enemy, and pay all sums recovered against him by judgment of the courts. The patron, on the other hand, was obliged to watch over the interests of his client, whether present or absent, to protect his person and property, and especially to defend him in all actions brought against him for any cause. Neither could accuse or bear testimony against the other, or give contrary votes, etc. The contract was of a sacred nature: the violation of it was a sort of treason, and punishable as such. According to Cicero (De Repub. ii. 9), this relation formed an integral part of the governmental system, Et habuit plebem in clientelas principum descriptum, which he affirms was eminently useful. Blackstone traces the system of vassalage to this ancient relation of patron and client. It was, in fact, of the same nature as the feudal institutions of the middle ages, designed to maintain order in a rising state by a combination of the opposing interests of the aristocracy and of the common people, upon the principle of reciprocal bonds for mutual interests. Dumazeau, Barreau Romain, § iii. Ultimately, by force of radical changes in the institution, the word patronus came to signify nothing more than an advocate. Id. iv.

PATROON. In New York. The lord of a manor. See MANOR.

PATRUELIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A cousin-german by the father's side; the son or daughter of a father's brother. Dig. 38. 10. 1.

PATRUUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An uncle by the father's side; a father's brother. Dig. 38. 10. 10. Patruus magnus is a grandfather's brother, grand-uncle. Patruus major is a great-grandfather's brother. Patruus maximus is a great-grandfather's father's brother.

PAUPER (Lat. poor). One so poor that he must be supported at the public expense.

The statutes of the several states make ample provisions for the support of the poor. It is not within the plan of this work even to give an abstract of such extensive legislation. See 16 Viner, Abr. 259; Botts, Poor-Laws; Woodf. Landl. & T. 201.

PAUPERIES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Poverty. In a technical sense, damnum absque injuria: i. e. a damage done without wrong on the part of the doer: e. g. damage done by an irrational being, as an animal. L. 1, § 3, D. si quod paup. fec.; Vicat. Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

PAVIAGE. A contribution or tax for paving streets or highways.

PAWN. A pledge. A pledge includes, in Louisiana, a pawn and an antichresis; but sometimes pawn is used as the general word, including pledge and antichresis. La. Civ. Code, art. 3101; Hennen, Dig. Pledge. See PLEDGE.

PAWNBROKER. One whose business it is to lend money, usually in small sums, upon pawn or pledge.

PAWNEE. He who receives a pawn or pledge. See PLEDGE.

PAWNOR. One who, being liable to an engagement, gives to the person to whom he is liable a thing to be held as a security for the payment of his debt or the fulfilment of his liability. See PLEDGE.

PAX REGIS (Lat.). The peace of the king. That peace or security for life and goods which the king promises to all persons under his protection. Bracton, lib. 3, c. 11; 6 Ric. II. stat. 1, c. 13.

In ancient times there were certain limits which were known by this name. The pax regis, or verge of the court, as it was afterwards called, extended from the palace-gate to the distance of three miles, three furlongs, three acres, nine feet, nine palms, and nine barleycorns, Crabb, C. L. 41; or from the four sides of the king's residence, four miles, three furlongs, nine acres in breadth, nine feet, nine barleycorns, etc. LL. Edw. Conf. c. 12, et LL. Hen. I.

PAYEE. The person in whose favor a bill of exchange is made payable. See BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

PAYMENT. The fulfilment of a promise, or the performance of an agreement.

The discharge in money of a sum due.

The word payment is not a technical term: it has been imported into law proceedings from the exchange, and not from law treatises. When payment is pleaded as a defence, the defendant must prove the payment of money, or something accepted in its stead, made to the plaintiff or to some person authorized in his behalf to receive it; 2 Greenl. Ev. 509.

Payment, in its most general acceptation, is the accomplishment of every obligation, whether it consists in giving or in doing: Solutio est prestatio ejus quod in obligatione est.

It follows, therefore, that every act which, while it extinguishes the obligation, has also for its object the release of the debtor and his exemption from liability, is not payment. Payment is doing precisely what the payer has agreed to do. Solvere dicitur cum qui fecit quod facere promisit.

However, practically, the name of payment is often given to methods of release which are not accompanied by the performance of the thing promised. Restrinximus solutiones ad compensationem, ad novationem, ad delegationem, et ad numerationem.

In a more restricted sense, payment is the discharge in money of a sum due. Numeratio est summarie solutio. 5 Massé, Droit commerciel, 229. That a payment may extinguish a debt, it must be made by a person who has a right to make it, to a person who is entitled to receive it, in something proper to be received both as to kind and quality, and at the appointed place and time.

In the civil law, it is said, where payment is something to be done, it must be done by the debtor himself. If I hire a skilful mechanic to build a steam-engine for me, he cannot against my will substitute in his stead another workman. Where it is something to be given, the general rule is that it can be paid by any one, whether a co-obliger, or surety, or even a third person who has no interest; except that in this last case subrogation will prevent the extinction of the debt as to the debtor, unless the payer at the time of payment act in the name of the debtor, or in his own name to release the debtor. See SUBROGATION.

What constitutes payment.

According to Comyns, payment by merchants must be made in money or by bill; Comyns, Dig. Merchant (F).

It is now the law for all classes of citizens that payment must be made by money, unless the obligation is, by the terms of the instrument creating it, to be discharged by other means. In the United States, congress has, by the constitution, power to decide what shall be a legal tender; that is, in what form the creditor may demand his payment or must receive it if offered; and congress has determined this by statutes. The same power is exercised by the governments of all civilized countries. As to the medium of payment in the United States, see LEGAL TENDER.

In England, Bank-of-England notes are legal tender. But the creditor may waive this right, and anything which he has accepted as satisfaction for the debt will be considered as payment.

Upon a plea of payment, the defendant may prove a discharge in bank-notes, negotiable notes of individuals, or a debt already due from the payee, delivered and accepted or discounted as payment; Phill. Ev. Cowen & H. ed. n. 387. Bank-notes, in conformity to usage and common understanding, are regarded as cash; 1 Burr. 452; 3 id. 1516; 9 Johns. 120; 6 Md. 37; unless objected to; 1 Metc. Mass. 356; 8 Ohio, 169; 10 Me. 475; 2 Cr. & J. 16, n.; 5 Yerg. 199; 3 Humphr. 162; 6 Ala. N. S. 226. Treasury notes are not cash; 3 Conn. 534. Giving a check is not considered as payment; but the holder may treat it as a nullity if he derives no benefit from it, provided he has not yet been guilty of negligence so as to cause injury to the drawer; 2 Campb. 515; 8 Term, 451; 2 B. & P. 518; 4 Ad. & E. 952; 4 Johns. 296; 30 N. H. 256. But see 14 How. 240.

Payment in forged bills is generally a nullity, both in England and this country; 10 Wheat. 333; 2 Johns. 455; 6 Hill, N. Y. 340; 7 Leigh, 617; 3 Hawks, 568; 2 Harr. & J. 368; 4 Gill & J. 463; 4 Ill. 392; 11 id. 137; 3 Penn. 330; 5 Conn. 71. So also of counterfeit coin; but an agreement to sell goods and accept specific money is good, and payment in these coins is valid even though they be counterfeit; 1 Term, 225; 14 S. & R. 51. And the forged notes must be returned in a reasonable time, to throw the loss upon the debtor; 7 Leigh, 617; 11 Ill. 137. Payment to a bank in its own notes which are received and afterwards discovered to be forged is a good payment; 1 Parsons, Contr. 220. A forged check received as cash and passed to the credit of the customer is good payment; 4 Dall. 234; S. C. 1 Binn. 27; 10 Vt. 141. Payment in bills of an insolvent bank, where both parties were innocent, has been held no payment; 7 Term, 64; 13 Wend. N. Y. 101; 11 Vt. 576; 9 N. H. 565; 22 Me. 85. On the other hand, it has been held good payment in 1 W. & S. 92; 6 Mass. 185; 12 Ala. 280; 8 Yerg. 175. The point is still unsettled, and it is said to be a question of intention rather than of law; Story, Pr. Notes, 125*, 477*, 641.

If a bill of exchange or promissory note be given to a creditor and accepted as payment, it shall be a good payment; Comyns, Dig. Merchant (F); 30 N. H. 540; 27 Ala. N. S. 254; 16 Ill. 161; 2 Du. N. Y. 133; 14 Ark. 267; 4 Rich. 600; 34 Me. 324. But regularly a bill of exchange or note given to a creditor shall not be a discharge of the debt till payment of the bill, unless so accepted; Skinn. 410; 1 Salk. 124.

If the debtor gives his own promissory note, it is held in England and the United States generally not to be payment, unless it be shown that it was so intended; 10 Pet. 567;

4 Mas. 336; 27 N. H. 244; 15 Johns. 247; 3 Wend. 66; 9 Conn. 23; 2 N. H. 525; 26 E. L. & E. 56.

And if payment be made in the note of a factor or agent employed to purchase goods, or intrusted with the money to be paid for them, if the note be received as payment it will be good in favor of the principal; 1 B. & Ald. 14; 7 B. & C. 17; but not if received conditionally; and this is a question of fact for the jury; 6 Cow. 181; 10 Wend. 271.

It is said that an agreement to receive the debtor's own note in payment must be expressed; 1 Cow. 359; 1 Wash. C. C. 328; and when so expressed it extinguishes the debt; 5 Wend. 85. Whether there was such an agreement is a question for the jury; 9 Johns. 310.

A bill of exchange drawn on a third person and accepted discharges the debt as to the drawer; 10 Mod. 37; and in an action to recover the price of goods, in England, payment by a bill not dishonored has been held a good defence; 4 Esp. Cas. 46; 3 Campb. 411; 1 M. & M. 28; 4 Bingh. 454; 5 Maule & S. 62.

Retaining a draft on a third party an unreasonable length of time will operate as payment if loss be occasioned thereby; 3 Wils. 553; 13 S. & R. 318; 2 Wash. C. C. 191.

In the sale of a chattel, if the note of a third person be accepted for the price, it is good payment; 3 Cow. 272; 1 D. & B. 291. Not so, however, if the note be the promise of one of the partners in payment of a partnership debt; 4 Dev 91, 460.

In Maine and Massachusetts, the presumption where a negotiable note is taken, whether it be the debtor's promise or that of a third person, is that it is intended as payment; 6 Mass. 143; 12 Pick. 268; 2 Metc. Mass. 168; 8 Me. 298; 18 id. 249; 37 id. 419. The fact that a note was usurious and void was allowed to overcome this presumption; 11 Mass. 361. Generally, the question will depend upon the fact whether the payment was to have been made in notes or the receiving them was a mere accommodation to the purchaser; 17 Mass. 1. And the presumption never attaches where non-negotiable notes are given; 11 Me. 381; 15 id. 340.

Payment may be made through the intervention of a third party who acts as the agent of both parties: as, for example, a stake-holder. If the money be deposited with him to abide the event of a legal wager, neither party can claim it until the wager is determined, and then he is bound to pay it to the winner; 4 Campb. 37. If the wager is illegal, the depositor may reclaim the money at any time before it is paid over; 4 Taunt. 474; 5 Term, 405; 8 B. & C. 221; 29 E. L. & E. 424; 31 id. 452. And at any time after notice given in such case he may hold the stake-holder responsible, even though he may have paid it over; see 2 Pars. Contr. 138.

An auctioneer is often a stake-holder, as in case of money deposited to be made over to the vendor if a good title is made out. In such case the purchaser cannot reclaim except on default in giving a clear title. But if the contract has been rescinded by the parties there need be no notice to the stake-holder in case of a failure to perform the condition; 2 M. & W. 244; 1 M. & R. 614.

A transfer of funds, called by the civil-law phrase a payment by delegation, is payment only when completely effected; 2 Pars. Contr. 137; and an actual transfer of claim or credit assented to by all the parties is a good payment; 4 Bingh. 112; 2 B. & Ald. 39; 5 id. 228; 7 N. H. 345, 397; 17 Mass. 400. This seems to be very similar to payment by drawing and acceptance of a bill of exchange.

Foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure a debt operates as payment made when the foreclosure is complete; but if the property mortgaged is not equal in value to the amount of the debt then due, it is payment pro tanto only; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 324; 3 Mass. 562; 2 Gall. 152; 3 Mas. 474; 10 Pick. 396; 11 Wend. 106. A legacy also is payment, if the intention of the testator that it should be so considered can be shown, and if the debt was liquidated at the death of the testator; 1 Esp. 187; 12 Mass. 391; 5 Cow. 368. See LEGACY.

When money is sent by letter, even though the money is lost, it is good payment, and the debtor is discharged, if he was expressly authorized or directed by the creditor so to send it, or if such authority can be presumed from the course of trade; Peake, 67; 11 M. & W. 233. But, even if the authority be given or inferred, at least ordinary diligence must be used by the debtor to have the money safely conveyed. See 3 Mass. 249; Ry. & M. 149; 1 Exch. 477; Peake, 186. Payment must be of the whole sum; and even where a receipt in full has been given for a payment of part of an ascertained sum, it has been held not to be an extinction of the debt; 5 Co. 117; 2 B. & C. 477; 3 N. H. 518; 11 Vt. 60; 26 Me. 88; 37 id. 361; 10 Ad. & E. 121; 4 Gill. & J. 305; 9 Johns. 333; 17 id. 169; 11 How. 100.

But payment of part may be left to the jury as evidence that the whole has been paid; 5 Cra. 11; 3 N. H. 518; and payment of a part at a different time; 2 Metc. Mass. 283; or place; 3 Hawks, 580; or in any way more beneficial to the creditor than that prescribed by the contract, is good; 15 M. & W. 23. Giving a chattel, though of less value than the debt, is a discharge; Dy. 75 a; 2 Litt. 49; 3 Barb. Ch. 621; or rendering certain services, with the consent of the creditor; 5 Day, 359; or assigning certain property; 5 Johns. 386; 13 Mass. 424. So if a stranger pay a part, or give his note for a part, and this is accepted, it is a good payment of the debt; 11 East, 390; 4 B. & C. 500; 13 Ala. N. S. 353; 14 Wend. 116; 2 Metc. Mass. 283. And where a creditor by process of law compels the payment of a part of his claim, by a suit for that part only, this is generally a discharge of the whole; 11 S. & R. 78; see 16 Johns. 121.

The payment must have been accepted knowingly. Many instances are given in the older writers to illustrate acceptance: thus, if the money is counted out, and the payee takes a part and puts it in a bag, this is a good payment, and if any be lost it is the payee's loss; 5 Mod. 398. Where A paid B £100 in redemption of a mortgage, and B bade C put it in his closet, and C did so, and A demanded his papers, which B refused to deliver, and A demanded back his money, and B directed C to give it to him, and C did, it was held to be a payment of the mortgage; Viner, Abr. Payment (E).

Generally, there can be but little doubt as to acceptance or non-acceptance, and the question is one of fact for the jury to determine under the circumstances of each particular case. Of course where notes or bank-bills are given in payment of a debt, the evidence that they were so given is to be the same as evidence of any other fact relating to payment.

Evidence of payment. Evidence that any thing has been done and accepted as payment is evidence of payment.

A receipt is prima facie evidence of payment: but a receipt acknowledging the reception of ten dollars and acquitting and releasing from all obligations would be a receipt for ten dollars only; 2 Ves. 310; 5 B. & Ald. 606; 18 Pick. 325; 1 Edw. Ch. 341. And a receipt is only prima facie evidence of payment; 2 Taunt. 241; 7 Cow. 334; 4 Ohio, 346. For cases explaining this rule, see, also, 2 Mas. 141; 11 Mass. 27; 9 Johns. 310; 4 H. & M'H. 219; 3 Caines, 14. And it may be shown that the particular sum stated in the receipt was not paid, and, also, that no payment has been made; 2 Term, 366; 26 N. H. 12; 9 Conn. 401; 2 N. J. 59; 10 Humphr. 188; 13 Penn. 46.

Payment may be presumed by the jury in the absence of direct evidence: thus, possession by the debtor of a security after the day of payment, which security is usually given upon payment of the debt, is prima facie evidence of payment by the debtor; 1 Stark. 374; 9 S. & R. 385.

If an acceptor produce a bill of exchange, this is said to afford in England no presumption of payment unless it is shown to have been in circulation after he accepted it; 2 Campb. 439. See, also, 14 M. & W. Exch. 379. But in the United States such possession is prima facie evidence of payment; 7 S. & R. 116; 4 Johns. 296; 2 Pick. 204. Payment is conclusively presumed from lapse of time. After twenty years' non-demand, unexplained, the court will presume a payment without the aid of a jury; 1 Campb. 27; 14 S. & R. 15; 6 Cow. 401; 2 Cra. 180. Facts which destroy the reason of this rule may rebut the presumption; 1 Pick. 60; 2 La. 481. And a jury may infer payment from a shorter lapse of time, especially if there be attendant circumstances favoring the presumption; 7 S. & R. 410. As to presumptions against the existence of the debt, see 5 Barb. 68.

A presumption may arise from the course of dealing between the parties, or the regular course of trade: thus, after two years it was presumed that a workman had been paid, as it was shown that the employer paid his workmen every Saturday night, and this man had been seen waiting among others; 1 Esp. 296. See, also, 3 Campb. 10.

A receipt for the last year's or quarter's rent is prima facie evidence of the payment of all the rents previously due; 2 Pick. 204. If the last instalment on a bond is paid in due form, it is evidence that the others have been paid; if paid in a different form, that the parties are acting under a new agreement.

Where receipts had been regularly given for the same amount, but for a sum smaller than was due by the agreement, it was held evidence of full payment; 4 Mart. La. 698.

Who may make payment. Payment may be made by the primary debtor, and by other persons from whom the creditor has a right to demand it.

An agent may make payment for his principal.

An attorney may discharge the debt against his client; 5 Bingh. 506. One of any number of joint and several obligors, or one of several joint obligors, may discharge the debt; Viner, Abr. Payment (B). Payment may be made by a third person, a stranger to the contract.

It may be stated, generally, that any act done by any person in discharge of the debt, if accepted by the creditor, will operate as payment. In the civil law there are many exceptions to this rule, introduced by the operation of the principle of subrogation. Most of these have no application in the common law, but have been adopted, in some instances, as a part of the law merchant. See SUBROGATION; CONTRIBUTION.

To whom payment may be made. Payment is to be made to the creditor. But it may be made to an authorized agent. And if made in the ordinary course of business, without notice requiring the payment to be made to himself, it is binding upon the principal; 11 East, 36; 6 M. & G. 166; Cowp. 257; 4 B. & Ald. 395; 3 Stark. Cas. 16; 1 Campb. 477. Payment to a third person by appointment of the principal will be substantially payment to the principal; 1 Phill. Ev. 200. Payment to an agent who made the contract with the payee (without prohibition) is payment to the principal; 1 Campb. 339; 16 Johns. 86; 2 Gall. 565; 10 B. & C. 755. But payment may be made to the principal after authority given to an agent to receive; 6 Maule & S. 156. Payment to a broker or factor who sells for a principal not named is good; 11 East, 36. Payment to an agent when he is known to be such will be good if made upon the terms authorized; 11 East, 36; if there be no notice not to pay to him; 3 B. & P. 485; 15 East, 65; and even after notice, if the factor had a lien on the money when paid; 5 B. & Ald. 27. If the broker sell goods as his own, payment is good though the mode varies from that agreed on; 11 East, 36; 1 Maule & S. 147; 2 C. & P. 49.

Payment to an attorney is as effectual as payment to the principal himself; 1 W. Blackst. 8; 1 Wash. C. C. 9; 1 Call, 147. So, also, to a solicitor in chancery after a decree; 2 Ch. Cas. 38. The attorney of record may give a receipt and discharge the judgment; 1 Call, 147; 1 Coxe, 214; 1 Pick. 347; 10 Johns. 220; 2 Bibb, 382; if made within one year; 1 Me. 257. Not so of an agent appointed by the attorney to collect the debt; 2 Dougl. 623. Payment by an officer to an attorney whose power had been revoked before he received the execution did not discharge the officer; 13 Mass. 465; 3 Yeates, 7. See, also, 1 Des. Ch. 461. Payment to one of two co-partners discharges the debt; 8 Wend. 542; 15 Ves. 198; 2 Blackf. 371; 1 Ill. 107; 6 Maule & S. 156; 1 Wash. C. C. 77; even after dissolution; 4 C. & P. 108. And see 7 N. H. 568. So payment to one of two joint creditors is good, though they are not partners; 4 J. J. Marsh. 367. But payment by a banker to one of several joint depositors without the assent of the others was held a void payment; 1 M. & R. 145; Ry. & M. 364; 4 E. L. & E. 342.

Payment to the wife of the creditor is not a discharge of the debt, unless she is expressly or impliedly his agent; 2 Scott, N. R. 372; 1 Add. 316; 2 Freem. 178; 22 Me. 335. An auctioneer employed to sell real estate has no authority to receive the purchase-money by virtue of that appointment merely; 1 M. & R. 326. Usually, the terms of sale authorize him to receive the purchase-money; 5 M. & W. 645. Payment was made to a person sitting in the creditor's counting-room and apparently doing his business, and it was held good; 1 M. & M. 200; 5 Taunt. 307; but payment to an apprentice so situated was held not to be good; 2 Cr. & M. 304. Generally, payment to the agent must be made in money, to bind the principal; 11 Mod. 71; 10 B. & C. 760. Power to receive money does not authorize an agent to commute; 1 Wash. C. C. 454; 1 Pick. 347; nor to submit to arbitration; 5 How. 891. See, also, Story, Ag. § 99.

An agent authorized to receive money cannot bind his principal by receiving goods; 4 C. & P. 501; or a note; 1 Salk. 442; 2 Ld. Raym. 928; 5 M. & W. 645; but a subsequent ratification would remedy any such departure from authority; and it is said that slight acts of acquiescence will be deemed ratification. Payment to one of several joint creditors of his part will not alter the nature of the debt so as to enable the others to sue separately; 4 Tyrwh. 488. Payment to one of several executors has been held sufficient; 3 Atk. 695. Payment to a trustee generally concludes the cestui que trust in law; 5 B. & Ad. 96. Payment of a debt to a marshal or sheriff having custody of the person of the debtor does not satisfy the plaintiff; 2 Show. 129; 14 East, 418; 4 B. & C. 32. Interest may be paid to a scrivener holding the mortgage-deed or bond, and also the principal, if he deliver up the bond; otherwise of a mortgage-deed as to the principal, for there must be a re-conveyance; 1 Salk. 157. It would seem, then, that in those states where no re-conveyance is needed, a payment of the principal to a person holding the security would be good, at least primâ facie.

When to be made. Payment must be made at the exact time agreed upon. This rule is held very strictly in law; but in equity payment will be allowed at a time subsequent, generally when damages can be estimated and allowed by way of interest; 8 East, 208; 3 Pick. 414; 5 id. 106, 187. Where payment is to be made at a future day, of course nothing can be demanded till the time of payment, and, if there be a condition precedent to the liability, not until the condition has been performed. And where goods had been sold "at six or nine months' credit," the debtor was allowed the option; 5 Taunt. 338.

Where no time of payment is specified, the money is to be paid immediately on demand; Viner, Abr. Payment (H); 1 Pet. 455; 4 Rand. 346. When payment is to be made at a certain time, it may be made at a different time if the plaintiff will accept; Viner, Abr. Payment (H); and it seems that the debtor cannot compel the creditor to receive payment before the debt is due.

Where to be made. Payment must be made at the place agreed upon, unless both the parties consent to a change. If no place of payment is mentioned, the payer must seek out the payee; Moore, P. C. 274; Shepp. Touchst. 378; 2 Br. & B. 165; 2 Maule & S. 120; 2 M. & W. 223; 20 E. L. & E. 498.

So, too, the creditor is entitled to call for payment of the whole of his claim at one time, unless the parties have stipulated for payment in parcels.

Questions often arise in regard to the payment of debts and legacies by executors and administrators. These questions are generally settled by statute regulations. See Distributions; Executor; Administrator.

As a general rule, debts are to be paid first, then specific legacies. The personal property is made liable for the testator's debts, and, after that is exhausted, the real estate, under restrictions varying in the different states.

In the payment of mortgages, if the mortgage was made by the deceased, the personal estate is liable to discharge the mortgage debts; 2 Cruise, Dig. 147. But where the deceased acquired the land subject to the mortgage, his real estate must pay the debt; 3 Will. Exec. 1699; 3 Johns. Ch. 252; 2 P. Wms. 664, n. 1; 2 Bro. C. C. 57; 5 Ves. 534; 24 Penn. 203. See MORTGAGE.

Effect of payment. The effect of payment is—first, to discharge the obligation; and it may happen that one payment will discharge several obligations by means of a transfer of the evidences of obligation; Pothier, Obl. 554, n. Second, payment does not prevent a recovery when made under a mistake of fact. The general rule is that mistake or ignorance of law furnishes no ground to reclaim money paid voluntarily under a claim of right; 2 Kent, 491; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 123. But acts done under a mistake or ignorance of an essential fact are voidable and relievable both in law and equity. Laws of a foreign country are matters of fact; Story, Const. §§ 407, 411; 9 Pick. 112; and the several United States are foreign to each other in this respect. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; FOREIGN LAWS. In Kentucky and Connecticut there is a power of recovery equally in cases of mistake of law and of fact; 19 Conn. 548; 3 B. Monr. 510; 4 id. 190. In Ohio it may be remedied in equity; 11 Ohio, 223. In New York a distinction is taken between ignorance of law and mistake of law, giving relief in the latter case; 18 Wend. 422; 2 Barb. Ch. 508. In England, money paid under a mistake of law cannot be recovered back; 4 Ad. & E. 858.

Third, part payment of a note will have the effect of waiver of notice as to the whole sum. Fourth, payment of part of the debt will bar the application of the Statute of Limitations as to the residue; 22 N. H. 219; 6 Md. 201; 8 Mass. 134; 28 E. L. & E. 454; even though made in goods and chattels; 2 Cr. M. & R. 337; 4 Ad. & E. 71; 4 Scott, N. R. 119. But it must be shown conclusively that the payment was made as part of a larger debt; 1 Cr. M. & R. 252; 2 Bingh. N. C. 241; 6 M. & W. 824; 20 Miss. 663; 24 id. 92; 9 Ark. 455; 11 Barb. 554; 24 Vt. 216. See, also, 2 Pars. Contr. 353–359.

In Pleading. The name of a plea by which the defendant alleges that he has paid the debt claimed in the declaration: this plea must conclude to the country. See Chitty, Plead.

See, also, generally, Parsons, Story, Leake, and Chitty, on Contracts; Greenleaf, Phillipps, and Starkie, on Evidence; Story, Parsons, and Byles, on Bills and Notes; Greenleaf's Cruise, on Real Property; Daniel, Neg. Inst.; Kent, vol. iii.; Massé, Droit, commerciel, vol. v. p. 229 et seq.; Domat, Civil Law; Pothier, on Obligation; Guyot, Répertoire Universelle, Payment; Comyns; Viner, Burn, and Dane, Abridgment, Payment.

PAYMENT INTO COURT. In Practice. Depositing a sum of money with the proper officer of the court by the defendant in a suit, for the benefit of the plaintiff and in answer to his claim.

It may be made in some states under statutory provisions; 18 Ala. 293; 7 Ill. 671; 1 Barb. 21; 5 Harr. Del. 17; 24 Ga. 211; 16 Tex. 461; 11 Ind. 532; and see 3 E. L. & E. 185; 7 id. 152; and in most by a rule of court granted for the purpose; 2 Bail. 28; 7 Ired. 201; 1 Swan, 92; in which case notice of an intention to apply must, in general, have been previously given.

The effect is to divest the defendant of all right to withdraw the money; 1 Wend. N. Y. 191; 1 E. D. Smith, 398; 3 Watts, 248; except by leave of court; 1 Coxe, 298; and to admit conclusively every fact which the plaintiff would be obliged to prove in order to recover the money; 1 B. & C. 3; 6 M. & W. 9; 2 Scott, N. S. 56; 9 Dowl. 21; 1 Dougl. Mich. 330; 24 Vt. 140; and see 7 Cush. 556; as, that the amount tendered is due; 1 Campb. 558; 2 id. 341; 5 Mass. 365; 2 Wend. 431; 7 Johns. 315; for the cause laid in the declaration; 5 Bingh. 28, 32; 2 B. & P. 550; 5 Pick. 285; 6 id. 340; to the plaintiff in the character in which he sues; 2 Campb. 441; the jurisdiction of the court; 5 Esp. 19; that the contract was made; 3 Campb. 52; 3 Taunt. 95; and broken as alleged; 1 B. & C. 3; but only in reference to the amount paid in; 7 Johns. 315; 3 E. L. & E. 548; and nothing beyond such facts; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 206. And see 2 M. & G. 208, 233; 5 C. & P. 247.

Generally, it relieves the defendant from the payment of costs until judgment is recovered for a sum larger than that paid in; 1 Wash. 10; 3 Cow. 36; 3 Wend. 326; 2 Miles, 65; 2 Rich. 64; 24 Vt. 140. As to the capacity in which the officer receiving the money acts, see 1 Coxe, 298; 2 Bail. 28; 17 Ala. 293.

PAYS. Country. Trial per pays, trial by jury (the country). See PAIS.

PEACE. The concord or final agreement in a fine of lands; 18 Edw. I. modus levandi finis.

The tranquillity enjoyed by a political society, internally by the good order which reigns among its members, and externally by the good understanding it has with all other nations. Applied to the internal regulations of a nation, peace imports, in a technical sense, not merely a state of repose and security as opposed to one of violence or warfare, but likewise a state of public order and decorum; Hamm. N. P. 139; 12 Mod. 566. See, generally, Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 4); Hale, Hist. Comm. Pleas, 160; 3 Taunt. 14; 1 B. & Ald. 227; Peake, 89; 1 Esp. 294; Harrison, Dig. Officer (V 4); 2 Benth. Ev. 319, note; GOOD BEHAVIOR; SURETY OF THE PEACE.

PEACE OF GOD. The words, "in the peace of God and the said commonwealth, then and there being," as used in indictments for homicide and in the definition of murder, mean merely that it is not murder to kill an alien enemy in time of war, provided such killing occur in the actual exercise of war; Whart. Cr. Law, § 310; 13 Minn. 341.

PEACE OF GOD AND THE CHURCH. The freedom from suits at law between the terms. Spelman, Gloss.; Jacob, Law Dict.

PECK. A measure of capacity, equal to two gallons. See MEASURE.

PECULATION. In Civil Law. The unlawful appropriation by a depositary of public funds, of the property of the government intrusted to his care, to his own use or that of others. Domat, Suppl. au Droit Public, 1. 3, tit. 5.

PECULIAR. In Ecclesiastical Law. A parish or church in England which has jurisdiction of ecclesiastical matters within itself and independent of the ordinary.

They may be either—

Royal, which includes the sovereign's free chapels;

Of the archbishops, excluding the jurisdiction of the bishops and archdeacons;

Of the bishops, excluding the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese in which they are situated;

Of the bishops in their own diocese, excluding archdiaconal jurisdiction;

Of deans, deans and chapters, prebendaries, and the like, excluding the bishop's jurisdiction in consequence of ancient compositions.

The court of peculiars has jurisdiction of causes arising in such of these peculiars as are subject to the metropolitan of Canterbury. In other peculiars the jurisdiction is exercised by commissaries. 1 Phill. Eccl. 202, n. 245; Skinn. 589; 3 Bla. Com. 65.

PECULIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The most ancient kind of peculium was the peculium profectitium of the Roman law, which signified that portion of the property acquired by a son or slave which the father or master allowed him, to be managed as he saw fit. In modern civil law there are other kinds of peculium, viz.: peculium castrense, which includes all movables given to a son by relatives and friends on his going on a campaign, all the presents of comrades, and his military pay and the things bought with it: peculium quasi-castrense, which includes all acquired by a son by performing the duties of a public or spiritual office or of an advocate, and also gifts from the reigning prince; peculium adventitium, which includes the property of a son's mother and relatives on that side of the house, and all which comes to him on a second marriage of his parents, and, in general, all his acquisitions which do not come from his father's property and do not come under castrense or quasi-castrense peculium.

The peculium profectitium remains the property of the father. The peculium castrense and quasi-castrense are entirely the property of the son. The peculium adventitium belongs to the son; but he cannot alien it nor dispose of it by will; nor can the father, unless under peculiar circumstances, alien it without consent of the son. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, §§ 557–559; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Inst. 2. 9. 1; Dig. 15. 1. 5. 3; Pothier, ad Pand. lib. 50, tit. 17, c. 2, art. 3.

A master is not entitled to the extraordinary earnings of his apprentices which do not interfere with his services so as to affect the master's profits. An apprentice was therefore decreed to be entitled to salvage, in opposition to his master's claim for it. 2 Cra. 270.

PECUNIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Property, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal. Things in general (omnes res). So the law of the Twelve Tables said, uti quisque pater familias legasset super pecuniâ tutelare rei suæ, ita jus esto: in whatever manner a father of a family may have disposed of his property or of the tutorship of his things, let this disposition be law. 1 Leçons Elém. du Dr. Civ. Rom. 288. But Paulus, in l. 5, D. de verb. signif., gives it a narrower sense than res, which he says means what is not included within patrimony, pecunia what is. Vicat, Voc. Jur. In a still narrower sense, it means those things only which have measure, weight, and number, and most usually strictly money. Id. The general sense of property occurs, also, in the old English law. Leg. Edw. Confess. c. 10.

Flocks were the first riches of the ancients; and it is from pecus that the words pecunia, peculium, peculatus, are derived. In old English law pecunia often retains the force of pecus. So often in Domesday: pastura ibidem pecuniæ villæ, i. e. pasture for cattle of the village. So vivæ pecuniæ, live stock. Leg. Edw. Confess. c. 10; Emendat. Willielmi Primi ad Leges Edw. Confess.; Cowel.

PECUNIA NUMERATA (Lat.). Money given in payment of a debt. Properly used of the creditor, who is properly said to number, i. e. count out, the money to the debtor which he must pay, and improperly of the debtor, who is said to number or count out the money to the creditor, i. e. to pay it. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

PECUNIA NON-NUMERATA (Lat.). Money not paid or numbered. The exceptio non-numeratæ pecuniæ (plea of money not paid) is allowed to the principal or surety by the creditor. Calvinus, Lex.

PECUNIA TRAJECTITIA (Lat.). A loan of money which, either itself or in the shape of goods bought with it, is to be carried over the sea, the lender to take the risk from the commencement of voyage till arrival at port of destination, and on that account to have higher interest; which interest is not essential to the contract, but, if reserved, is called fœnus nauticum. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 398 b. The term fœnus nauticum is sometimes applied to the transaction as well as the interest, making it coextensive with pecunia trajectitia.

PECUNIARY. That which relates to money.

PECUNIARY CAUSES. Causes in ecclesiastical courts where satisfaction is sought for withholding ecclesiastical dues or the doing or neglecting some act connected with the church. 3 Bla. Com. 88. For what causes are ecclesiastical, see 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 39.

PEDAGIUM (Lat. pes, foot). Money paid for passing by foot or horse through any forest or country. Pupilla oculi, p. 9, c. 7; Cassan de Coutum. Burgund. p. 118; Rot. Vasc. 22 Edw. III. m. 34.

PEDAULUS (Lat. pes, foot). In Civil Law. A judge who sat at the foot of the tribunal, i. e. on the lowest seats, ready to try matters of little moment at command of prætor. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat. Voc. Jur.

PEDIGREE. A succession of degrees from the origin: it is the state of the family as far as regards the relationship of the different members, their births, marriages, and deaths. This term is applied to persons or families who trace their origin or descent.

On account of the difficulty of proving in the ordinary manner, by living witnesses, facts which occurred in remote times, hearsay evidence has been admitted to prove a pedigree. See DECLARATION; HEARSAY.

PEDIS POSITIO (Lat. a planting or placing of the foot). A term used to denote an actual corporal possession. Possessio est quasi pedis positio: possession is as it were a planting of the foot. 3 Co. 42; 8 Johns. per Kent, C. J.; 5 Penn. 303; 2 N. & McC. 343. See PEDIS POSSESSIO.

PEDIS POSSESSIO (Lat.). A foothold; an actual possession. To constitute adverse possession, there must be pedis possessio, or a substantial inclosure. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2193; 2 N. & M'C. 343.

PEDLARS. Persons who travel about the country with merchandise for the purpose of selling it.

Persons, except those peddling newspapers, Bibles, or religious tracts, who sell, or offer to sell, at retail, goods, wares, or other commodities, travelling from place to place, in the street, or through different parts of the country. Act of Congr. July 1, 1862.

They are obliged, under the laws of perhaps all the states, and of the United States, to take out licenses, and to conform to the regulations which those laws establish.

If the provisions of a state license and tax act are designed by the legislature to discriminate against non-resident merchants, and against goods sold from other states, in favor of resident merchants, and goods held in the state for sale, and if such discrimination be the practical effect of the law, it is unconstitutional, null and void. But the payment of taxes in the same state of a merchant does not of itself entitle him to sell his goods in all other states free of taxation. Each state may determine its own policy as to the levying of license taxes, and its laws are valid so long as they do not discriminate against citizens of other states; 12 Fed. Rep. 538, note; 12 Wall. 430; 8 id. 123; 100 U. S. 134; 102 U. S. 123; 33 Gratt. 898. See COMMERCE; 12 Report. 650.

PEERS (Lat. pares). The vassals of a lord; the freeholders of a neighborhood, before whom livery of seisin was to be made, and before whom, as the jury of the county, trials were had. 2 Bla. Com. 316. Trial by a man's peers or equals is one of the rights reserved by Magna Charta. 4 Bla. Com. 349. These vassals were called pares curiæ, which title see. 1 Washb. R. P. 23.

The nobility of England, who, though of different ranks, viz., dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons, yet are equal in their privileges of sitting and voting in the house of lords: hence they are called peers of the realm.

They are created by writ summoning them to attend the house of lords by the title intended to be given, or by letters patent directly conferring the dignity. The former is the more ancient way; but the grant by patent is more certain. See Sullivan, Lect. 19 a; 1 Woodd. Lect. 37.

Peers are tried by other peers in cases of treason, felony, and misprision of the same. In cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, they have no privilege from arrest. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*, n. 11.

Bishops who sit in parliament are peers; but the word spiritual is generally added; e. g. "lords temporal and spiritual." 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*; n. 12.

Peerage may be for life, which does not make the peer a lord of parliament, i. e. entitle him to a seat in the house of lords; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*, n. 10. A peerage is not transferable, except with consent of parliament; Id. A peerage is lost by attainder; 1 Bla. Com. 412*.

PEINE FORTE ET DURE (L. Fr.). In English Law. A punishment formerly inflicted in England on a person who, being arraigned of felony, refused to plead and put himself on his trial, and stubbornly stood mute. He was to be laid down, naked, on his back, on the ground, his feet and head and loins covered, his arms and legs drawn apart by cords, and as much weight of iron or stone as he could bear placed on his chest. He was to have the next day three morsels of barley bread, without drink; the next, three draughts, as much each time as he could drink, of the nearest stagnant water to the prison, without bread; and such was to be his diet on alternate days, till he died. This punishment was vulgarly called pressing to death; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 134; 4 Bla. Com. 324; Cowel; Britton, c. 4. fol. 11*. This punishment was introduced between 31 Edw. III. and 8 Hen. IV; 4 Bla. Com. 324; Year B. 8 Hen. IV. 1. Standing mute is now, by statute, in England, equivalent to a confession or verdict of guilty; 12 Geo. III. c. 20. See MUTE.

The only instance in which this punishment has ever been inflicted in this country is that of Giles Cory, of Salem, who refused to plead when arraigned as a witch; Washb. Jud. Hist. 142; 1 Chandl. Cr. Tr. 122.

PELT WOOL. The wool pulled off the skin or pelt of a dead ram.

PENAL ACTION. An action for recovery of statute penalty. 3 Steph. Com. 535. See Hawk. Pl. Cr. Informatio. It is distinguished from a popular or qui tam action, in which the action is brought by the informer, to whom part of the penalty goes. A penal action or information is brought by an officer, and the penalty goes to the king; 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 25, note; 2 Archb. Pr. 188.

PENAL BILL. The old name for a bond with condition by which a person is bound to pay a certain sum of money or do a certain act, or, in default thereof, pay a certain sum of money by way of penalty. Jacob, Law Dict. Bill.

PENAL STATUTES. Those which inflict a penalty for the violation of some of their provisions.

It is a rule of law that such statutes must be construed strictly; 1 Bla. Com. 88; Espinasse, Pen. Actions, 1; Boscawen, Conv.; Cro. Jac. 415; 1 Comyns, Dig. 444; 5 id. 360; 1 Kent, 467. They cannot, therefore, be extended by their spirit or equity to other offences than those clearly described and provided for; 1 Paine, 32; 6 Cra. 171.

PENALTY. A clause in an agreement, by which the obligor agrees to pay a certain sum of money if he shall fail to fulfil the contract contained in another clause of the same agreement.

A penal obligation differs from an alternative obligation, for this is but one in its essence; while a penalty always includes two distinct engagements, and when the first is fulfilled the second is void. When a breach has taken place, the obligor has his option to require the fulfilment of the first obligation, or the payment of the penalty, in those cases which cannot be relieved in equity, when the penalty is considered as liquidated damages. Dalloz, Dict. Obligation avec Clause penale.

A distinction is made in courts of equity between penalties and forfeitures. In cases of forfeiture for the breach of any covenant other than a covenant to pay rent, relief will not be granted in equity, unless upon the ground of accident, fraud, mistake, or surprise, when the breach is capable of compensation; Eden, Inj. 22; 3 Ves. 692; 16 id. 403; 18 id. 58; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3915.

For the distinction between a penalty and liquidated damages, see LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

The penalty remains unaffected although the condition may have been partially performed: as, in a case where the penalty was one thousand dollars, and the condition was to pay an annuity of one hundred dollars, which had been paid for ten years, the penalty was still valid; 5 Vt. 356.

The punishment inflicted by a law for its violation. The term is mostly applied to a pecuniary punishment. See 6 Pet. 404; 7 Wheat. 18; 10 id. 246; 1 Wash. C. C. 1; 2 id. 323; 1 Paine, 661; 1 Gall. 26; 2 id. 515; 1 Mas. 243; 7 Johns. 72; 1 Pick. 451; 4 Mass. 433; 15 id. 488; 8 Comyns, Dig. 846; 16 Viner, Abr. 301; 1 Vern. 83, n.; 1 Saund. 58, n.; 1 Swanst. 318.

PENANCE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical punishment inflicted by an ecclesiastical court for some spiritual offence. Ayliffe, Parerg. 420.

PENCIL. An instrument made of plumbago, red chalk, or other suitable substance, for writing without ink.

It has been holden that a will written with a pencil could not on this account be annulled. 1 Phill. Eccl. 1; 2 id. 173. See WILL.

PENDENTE LITE (Lat.). Pending the continuance of an action; while litigation continues.

An administrator is appointed pendente lite, when a will is contested. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1557. See ADMINISTRATOR; LIS PENDENS.

PENDENTES (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fruits of the earth not yet separated from the ground; the fruits hanging by the roots. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, lit. 2, s. 4.

PENETRATION. The act of inserting the penis into the female organs of generation. 9 C. & P. 118. See 5 C. & P. 321; 8 id. 614; 9 id. 31. It was once held that in order to commit the crime of rape it is requisite that the penetration should be such as to rupture the hymen; 5 C. & P. 321. But this case has since been expressly overruled; 2 Mood. Cr. Cas. 90; 9 C. & P. 752.

This has been denied to be sufficient to constitute a rape without emission. The statute 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, § 18, enacts that the carnal knowledge shall be deemed complete upon proof of penetration only. Statutes to the same effect have been passed in some of the United States; but these statutes have been thought to be merely declaratory of the common law; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 210. See, on this subject, 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 628; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 437; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 386–395; 1 Russ. Cr. Law, 860; RAPE.

PENITENTIARY. A prison for the punishment of convicts.

There are two systems of penitentiaries in the United States, each of which is claimed to be the best by its partisans,—the Pennsylvania system and the New York system. By the former, convicts are lodged in separate, well-lighted, and well-ventilated cells, where they are required to work during stated hours. During the whole time of their confinement they are never permitted to see or speak with each other. Their usual employments are shoemaking, weaving, winding yarn, picking wool, and such like business. The only punishments to which convicts are subject are the privation of food for short periods, and confinement without labor in dark but well-aired cells: this discipline has been found sufficient to keep perfect order; the whip and all other corporeal punishments are prohibited. The advantages of the plan are numerous. Men cannot long remain in solitude without labor; convicts, when deprived of it, ask it as a favor, and, in order to retain it, use generally, their best exertions to do their work well; being entirely secluded, they are of course unknown to their fellow-prisoners, and can form no combination to escape while in prison, or associations to prey upon society when they are out; being treated with kindness, and afforded books for their instruction and amusement, they become satisfied that society does not make war upon them, and more disposed to return to it, which they are not prevented from doing by the exposure of their fellow-prisoners when in a strange place; the labor of the convicts tends greatly to defray the expenses of the prison. The disadvantages which were anticipated have been found to be groundless. Among these were that the prisoners would be unhealthy; experience has proved the contrary: that they would become insane; this has also been found to be otherwise: that solitude is incompatible with the performance of business: that obedience to the discipline of the prison could not be enforced. These, and all other objections to this system, are by its friends believed to be without force.

The New York system, adopted at Auburn, which was probably copied from the penitentiary at Ghent, in the Netherlands, called La Maison de Force, is founded on the system of isolation and separation, as well as that of Pennsylvania, but with this difference, that in the former the prisoners are confined to their separate cells during the night only; during the working-hours in the daytime they labor together in workshops appropriated to their use. They eat their meals together, but in such a manner as not to be able to speak with each other. Silence is also imposed upon them at their labor. They perform the labor of carpenters, blacksmiths, weavers, shoemakers, tailors, coopers, gardeners, woodsawyers, etc. The discipline of the prison is enforced by stripes, inflicted by the assistant keepers, on the backs of the prisoners; though this punishment is rarely exercised. The advantages of this plan are that the convicts are in solitary confinement during the night; that their labor, by being joint, is more productive; that, inasmuch as a clergyman is employed to preach to the prisoners, the system affords an opportunity for mental and moral improvements. Among the objections made to it are that the prisoners have opportunities of communicating with each other and of forming plans of escape, and, when they are out of prison, of associating together in consequence of their previous acquaintance, to the detriment of those who wish to return to virtue, and to the danger of the public; that the discipline is degrading, and that it engenders bitter resentment in the mind of the convict.

King, Shaler, and Wharton) on the Penal Code of Pennsylvania; De Beaumont and De Tocqueville, on the Penitentiary System of the United States; Mease on the Penitentiary System of Pennsylvania; Carey on ditto; Reports of the Boston Prison Discipline Society: Livingston's excellent Introductory Report to the Code of Reform and Prison Discipline, prepared for the state of Louisiana; Encycl. PENNSYLVANIA. One of the thirteen original states of the United States of America.

It received its name from a royal charter granted March 4, 1681, by Charles II. to William Penn. By that charter, Penn was constituted the proprietary and governor of the province, and vested with power to enact laws, with the consent of the freemen, to execute said laws, to appoint judges and other officers, incorporate towns, establish ports, levy customs, import and export goods, sell lands creating a tenure, levy troops, make war, and exercise other attributes of sovereign power. Appeals in judicial matters lay to the crown, and all laws were liable to be avoided by the crown.

The first frame of government was adopted and promulgated on April 25, 1682. The government was to be by the governor and freemen in a provincial council and general assembly. Both of the latter were chosen annually by the people. All laws were to originate with the council. A governor, judges, and other officers were to be appointed, during good behavior, by the governor from a double list presented by the council or assembly.

On April 2, 1683, a new frame was adopted, reducing the numbers both of the council and assembly. In 1693 the proprietary was deprived of his government and the province placed under the government of New York. But in 1694 Penn was duly reinstated.

A new frame of government adopted on October 28, 1696, made some material alterations in the existing order of things. The power of originating laws was thereby first conferred on the assembly.

The charter of privileges granted by the proprietary and accepted by the assembly on October 28, 1701, confirming the foregoing provisions and making numerous others, continued the supreme law of the province during the residue of the proprietary government.

In 1776, after the declaration of American independence, a constitution was formed adapted to the altered circumstances of the country, which continued in force until 1790, when a new one was substituted. This was amended in 1838 by the introduction of some very radical changes. Other amendments were made in 1850, in 1857, and in 1864. In 1874 a new constitution was adopted, which remains still in force.

The form of government established is republican. Legislative, executive, and judicial powers are committed to three distinct departments, neither of which can exercise the powers of any other department.

The legislative power is vested in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives, who sit in regular session every two years, beginning the first Tuesday of January, and at such other times as they are convened by the governor.

The supreme executive power is vested in a governor.

All judicial power is vested in a supreme court, in courts of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery, in courts of common pleas, orphans' courts, courts of quarter sessions of the peace, magistrate's courts, and in such other courts as the legislature may from time to time establish.

The members of the senate and house of representatives, the governor, and all judicial officers, are elected by the people, and hold their offices during limited periods. All elections by the citizens are made by ballot. Every male citizen twenty-one years of age, who shall have been a citizen of the United States at least one month, and who shall have resided in the state one year, and in the election district where he offers to vote two months immediately preceding the election, and who shall have within two years paid a state or county tax assessed at least two months, and paid at least one month, before the election, is entitled to the rights of an elector; and a citizen of the United States, who had previously been a qualified voter, or native born citizen, of the state, and removed therefrom and returned, is entitled to vote after a new residence within the state for six months, if he has resided in the election district and paid taxes as aforesaid. Citizens of the United States, between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-two, are entitled to vote without the payment of taxes, subject to the restrictions respecting residence already mentioned. For the purpose of voting, no person is deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of military or naval service, nor while a student in any institution of learning, nor while confined in any prison or other institution maintained at the puble expense. Qualified electors in actual military service of the United States or of the state, under a requisition from the president of the United States, or under authority of the commonwealth, are also entitled to vote, under regulations prescribed by law, without being present at their usual place of election.

The general election is held on the Tuesday next following the first Monday of November in every year, but this date is liable to be changed by legislative enactment. Elections for municipal, ward, borough, and township officers for regular terms of service are held on the third Tuesday of February. All laws regarding elections are uniform throughout the state. Election districts are formed and divided as necessity may arise by the courts of quarter sessions of the respective counties.

Bribery on the part of a candidate is punished by incapacity to hold offices of trust or profit and on the part of all concerned by a deprivation of the right of suffrage for a limited time.

Election officers are elected annually by the citizens of each district. No person is eligible who is in the service of the United States, or in that of the state, or any county thereof, except certain subordinate officers. Overseers of elections for each district may be appointed by the court of common pleas. All contested elections of public officers are tried by the courts of law.

The members of the general assembly are chosen every second year, and whenever a vacancy occurs in either house the presiding officer thereof issues his writ to fill such vacancy for the residue of the terms. No person is competent to serve who has been convicted of an infamous crime, or who is in the service of the United States, or of the commonwealth. Members of the senate must be at least twenty-five years old, and representatives twenty-one. They must have been citizens and inhabitants of the state four years, and inhabitants of their respective districts one year next before their election (unless absent on public business of the United States or of the state), and must reside in their respective districts during continuance in office. They are paid a fixed salary which can neither be increased nor diminished during their term of office.

The members of the house of representatives are apportioned and distributed every tenth year among the various counties throughout the state in proportion to the population, on a ratio obtained by dividing the total population of the state by two hundred. Every county is entitled to at least one representative, and every city containing one ratio or more, is entitled to elect separately its representatives.

Every city entitled to more than four representatives, or county containing over one hundred thousand inhabitants, is divided into districts which elect representatives according to their population, but no district is entitled to elect more than four representatives.

The term of office of a member of the house of representatives is two years.

The state is divided into fifty senatorial districts equal in population, each of which is entitled to elect one senator. Each county containing one or more senatorial ratios of population (such ratios to be estimated by dividing the total population of the state by fifty) is entitled to one senator for each ratio, and to an additional senator for a surplus of population exceeding three-fifths of a ratio. No county, however, forms a separate district unless it contains four-fifths of a ratio, except where adjoining counties are entitled to one or more senators, when such county is entitled to a senator on exceeding one-half a ratio. No county is divided unless entitled to two or more senators. No ward, borough, or township is divided in the formation of districts, nor is any city or county entitled to more than one-sixth of the total number of senators. The term of office of senators is four years.

The powers and privileges of the legislature do not differ materially from those which belong to the legislatures of the other states of the United States. The constitution imposes numerous restrictions upon the general power to legislate, notably prohibiting special legislation in many instances and putting bounds to the power of appropriating the public moneys to charitable objects. All laws relating to taxation and courts of justice are general and uniform in their operation throughout the state. Restrictions are laid upon the right of the state or of any municipality therein to contract debts. Most of the essential provisions of Magna Charta are embodied in the Declaration of Rights.

The supreme executive power of the state is vested in a governor, who is chosen by the electors qualified to elect members of the legislature. His term of office is four years from the third Tuesday of January next ensuing his election, and he is incapable of re-election to office for the next succeeding term. He must be at least thirty years of age; and he must have been a citizen and an inhabitant of the state seven years next before his election, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of the state. No member of congress or person holding any office under the United States or of the state can exercise the office of governor.

The governor is ex officio commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the commonwealth, and of the militia, except when they are called into the actual service of the United States. It is his duty to see that the laws of the commonwealth are executed. With the advice and consent of two thirds of the senate he appoints a secretary of the commonwealth and an attorney general during pleasure, and a superintendent of public instruction for four years. If vacancies in these offices occur during a recess of the senate, he may grant commissions to fill them to expire at the close of the next session. In cases of vacancies in the offices of auditor general, state treasurer, secretary of internal affairs, superintendent of public instruction, in a judicial office, or any other elective office he may be authorized to fill, he has power to fill the vacancy (the consent of the senate being necessary if in session) until the next general election, unless the vacancy occurs within three months before such election, in which case his nominee remains in office until the second succeeding general election. All commissions must be in the name and by authority of the commonwealth, and be sealed with the state seal and signed by the governor. The governor has also power to remit fines and forfeitures, and grant reprieves, commutations of sentence, and pardons, on recommendation of three or more of a board of pardons consisting of the lieutenant-governor, secretary of the commonwealth, attorney-general, and secretary of internal affairs. He may convene the legislature on extraordinary occasions, or the senate for the transaction of executive business, and in case of disagreement between the two houses with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he may think proper, not more remote than four months. He may require from the various heads of executive departments information as regards the duties of their respective offices, and it is made his duty to communicate to the legislature from time to time information of the state of the commonwealth, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he may deem expedient. He has a veto power over every bill passed by the legislature; but if, notwithstanding his objection, two-thirds of both houses agree to the bill after reconsideration, it becomes a law.

In case of the death or resignation of the governor, his removal from office, or other disability, the office devolves upon the lieutenant-governor, and in case of a vacancy in that office, on the president pro tem. of the senate.

Contested elections for governor or lieutenant-governor are decided by a committee from both houses of the assembly. The chief justice presides. In such cases the next preceding officers continue in office until their successors are duly qualified.

The other officers in the executive department consist of the lieutenant-governor, a secretary of internal affairs, each elected for four years, secretary of the commonwealth, attorney-general and superintendent of public instruction appointed as above stated, auditor-general elected for three years, and state treasurer elected for two years. No persons elected to the last two offices may hold the same office for two consecutive terms. The governor and all civil officers are liable to impeachment by the house of representatives. The senate have the exclusive right to try all impeachments. No person can be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of that body, nor can the judgment extend beyond removal from office and incapacity to hold offices of trust or profit under the state.

All appointed officers except judges and the superintendent of public instruction may be removed by the power who appointed them, and all officers elected by the people, except governor, lieutenant-governor, members of the assembly, and judges of the courts, may be removed by the governor on reasonable cause on address of two-thirds of the senate.

The supreme court is the highest judicial tribunal of the state. It is composed of seven judges elected by the qualified electors of the state at large. They hold their offices for the term of twenty-one years if they so long behave themselves well, but are not again eligible. They must during their term of office reside within the commonwealth. The jurisdiction of the court extends over the state, and the judges are, ex-officio, justices of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery in the several counties. The court is principally a court of errors and appeals, and its writs run to all other courts in the state. It has original jurisdiction only in cases of injunction where a party corporation is defendant, of habeas corpus, of mandamus to courts of inferior jurisdiction, and of quo warranto to officers whose jurisdiction extends over the whole state. In all cases of felonious homicide, and in such other criminal cases as are provided by law, the accused is entitled of right to remove the proceedings to this court for review. It holds its sessions once in each year at least, in Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and Harrisburg, for the adjudication of writs of error, appeals, etc. etc., and certiorari.

For the courts of common pleas, the state is divided into forty-four districts; these districts are subject to change by the legislature, but no more than four counties can at any time be included in one judicial district. Most civil issues are tried by the courts of common pleas, but their decisions are reviewable by the supreme court. All judges of these and every other court (except those of the supreme court) required to be learned in the law, are elected by the qualified electors of the district in which they are to preside, and hold office for ten years if they so long behave themselves well. They must reside within their respective districts during their terms of office, and are liable on sufficient cause to be removed by the governor on address of two-thirds of each house of the assembly. Every district is entitled to one court of common pleas, and one president judge learned in the law, and such additional judges as the general assembly may provide. In every county constituting a separate judicial district such associate judges must be learned in the law.

In Philadelphia there are four, and in Allegheny county two courts of common pleas of co-ordinate powers, but more may be created by the legislature. In each county the judges of the courts of common pleas are ex-officio justices of oyer and terminer, quarter sessions of the peace, and general gaol delivery, and of the orphans' court, and within their respective districts are justices of the peace as to criminal matters.

In Philadelphia and Allegheny counties the judges of the common pleas serve in rotation as judges of quarter sessions and oyer and terminer.

In counties exceeding in population one hundred and fifty thousand, separate orphans' courts may be established, to consist of one or more judges learned in the law. Only three such are now established, viz.: in Philadelphia, Allegheny, and Luzerne counties. The orphans' courts have general jurisdiction over the settlement of decedents' estates, and the accounts of executors, administrators, and guardians, subject, however, to an appellate jurisdiction in the supreme court. No new courts can be created to exercise the powers now vested in the courts of common pleas and orphans' courts. All judges are paid by fixed salaries, and can be called upon only to discharge judicial duties. Aldermen, justices of the peace, and magistrates are elected in the various counties for terms of five years. A register's office for the probate of wills and granting letters of administration, and also an office for recording deeds, are maintained in each county.

Civil writs issue, generally, from the offices of the prothonotaries or clerks of the courts in each county; and the style of all process is required to be "The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania."

PENNY. The name of an English coin, of the value of one-twelfth part of a shilling.

While the United States were colonies, each adopted a monetary system composed of pounds, shillings, and pence. The penny varied in value in the different colonies.

PENNYWEIGHT. A troy weight which weighs twenty-four grains, or one-twentieth part of an ounce. See WEIGHTS.

PENSION. A stated and certain allowance granted by the government to an individual, or those who represent him, for valuable services performed by him for the country. The government of the United States has, by general laws, granted pensions; (1) to any officer of the army, including regulars, volunteers, and militia, or any officer in the navy or marine corps, or any enlisted man however employed, in the military or naval service of the United States, whether regularly mustered or not, disabled by reason of any wound or injury received, or disease contracted, while in the service of the United States—and in the line of duty; (2) any master serving on a gunboat, or any pilot, engineer, sailor, or other person not regularly mustered, serving upon any gunboat or war vessel of the United States, disabled by any wound or injury received so as to be incapacitated for procuring subsistence by manual labor; (3) any volunteer, or person not an enlisted soldier, who was incapacitated while rendering service in any engagement under the order of an officer of the United States; (4) any acting assistant, or contract surgeon disabled by any wound or disease contracted in the line of duty; (5) any provost-marshal, deputy provost-marshal, or enrolling officer disabled in the line of his duty; R. S. § 4692. Provision is also made for the payment of pensions to the survivors of the wars of the revolution, of 1812, and with Mexico; to the widows and children of those who served in these wars; and also to those who served in the civil war and to their widows and children under specified conditions; R. S. 4692–4791. By the act of Jan. 25, 1879, ch. 23, it is provided that all pensions which have been or may hereafter be granted for a cause which originated in the service since March 4, 1861, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been granted, if the disability occurred prior to the discharge, and if the disability occurred after the discharge, then from the date of actual disability; R. S. Supp. p. 468.

PENSIONER. One who is supported by an allowance at the will of another. It is more usually applied to him who receives an annuity or pension from the government.

PEONIA. In Spanish Law. A portion of land which was formerly given to a simple soldier on the conquest of a country. It is now a quantity of land of different size in different provinces. In the Spanish possessions in America it measured fifty feet front and one hundred feet deep. 2 White, Rec. 49; 12 Pet. 444, notes.

PEOPLE. A state: as, the people of the state of New York. A nation in its collective and political capacity. 4 Term, 783. See 6 Pet. 467.

When the term the people is made use of in constitutional law or discussions, it is often the case that those only are intended who have a share in the government through being clothed with the elective franchise. Thus, the people elect delegates to a constitutional convention; the people choose the officers under the constitution, and so on. For these and similar purposes, the electors, though constituting but a small minority of the whole body of the community, nevertheless act for all, and, as being for the time the representatives of sovereignty, they are considered and spoken of as the sovereign people. But in all the enumerations and guaranties of rights the whole people are intended, because the rights of all are equal, and are meant to be equally protected. Cooley, Const. 267.

The word people occurs in a policy of insurance. The insurer insures against "detainments of all kings, princes, and people." He is not by this understood to insure against any promiscuous or lawless rabble which may be guilty of attacking or detaining a ship; 2 Marsh. Ins. 508. See BODY POLITIC; NATION.

PER. By. When a writ of entry is sued out against the alience, or descendant of the original dissesor, it is then said to be brought in the per, because the writ states that the tenant had not the entry but by the original wrong-doer. 3 Bla. Com. 181. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

PER ÆS ET LIBRAM (Lat. æs, brass, libram, scale). In Civil Law. A sale was said to be made per æs et libram when one called libripens held a scale (libra), which the one buying struck with a brazen coin (æs), and said, "I say, by the right of a Roman, this thing is mine," and gave the coin to the vendor, in presence of at least three witnesses. This kind of sale was used in the emancipation of a son or slave, and in making a will. Calvinus, Lex. Mancipatio; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Mancipatio.

PER ALLUVIONEM (Lat.). In Civil Law. By alluvion, or the gradual and imperceptible increase arising from deposit by water. Vocab. Jur. Utr. Alluvio; Angell & A. Waterc. 53–57.

PER ANNULUM ET BACULUM (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. The symbolical investiture of an ecclesiastical dignity was per annulum et baculum, i. e. by staff and crosier. 1 Bla. Com. 378, 379; 1 Burn, Eccl. Law, 209.

PER AVERSIONEM (Lat.). In Civil Law. By turning away. Applied to a sale not by measure or weight, but for a single price for the whole in gross: e. g. a sale of all the wine of a vineyard for a certain price. Vocab. Jur. Utr. Aversio. Some derive the meaning of the phrase from a turning away of the risk of a deficiency in the quantity from the seller to the buyer; others, from turning away the head, i. e. negligence in the sale; others think aversio is for adversio. Calvinus, Lex.; 2 Kent, 640; 4 id. 517.

PER CAPITA (Lat. by the head or polls). When descendants take as individuals, and not by right of representation (per stirpes), they are said to take per capita. For example, if a legacy be given to the issue of A

B, and A B at the time of his death shall have two children and two grandchildren, his estate shall be divided into four parts, and the children and grandchildren shall each have one of them. 3 Ves. 257; 13 id. 344; 2 Bla. Com. 218; 6 Cush. 158, 162; 2 Jarm. Wills, Perkins' Notes, 47; 3 Beav. 451; 4 id. 239; 2 Steph. Com. 253; 3 id. 197; 2 Woodd. Lect. 114.

PER AND CUI. When a writ of entry is brought against a second alienee or descendant from the disseisor, it is said to be in the per and cui, because the form of the writ is that the tenant had not entry but by and under a prior alienee, to whom the intruder himself demised it; 3 Bla. Com. 181. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

PER CURIAM (Lat. by the court). A phrase which occurs constantly in the reports. It distinguishes the opinion or decision of the court from that of a single judge; Abb. Law Dic. 353. It designates, in Pennsylvania, opinions written by the presiding justice.

PER FORMAM DONI (Lat. by the form of the gift). According to the line of descent prescribed in the conveyance of the ancestor or donor of estate-tail; 2 Bla. Com. 113*; 3 Harr. & J. 323; 1 Washb. R. P. 74, 81.

PER FRAUDEM (Lat.). A replication to a plea where something has been pleaded which would be a discharge if it had been honestly pleaded that such a thing has been obtained by fraud: for example, where, on debt on a statute, the defendant pleads a prior action depending, if such action has been commenced by fraud the plaintiff may reply per fraudem; 2 Chitty, Pl. *675.

PER INFORTUNIUM (Lat. by misadventure). In Criminal Law. Homicide per infortunium, or by misadventure, is said to take place when a man in doing a lawful act, without any intent to hurt, unfortunately kills another; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 11; Fost. Cr. Law, 258, 259; Co. 3d Inst. 56.

PER MINAS (Lat. by threats). When a man is compelled to enter into a contract by threats or menaces, either for fear of loss of life or mayhem, he may avoid it afterwards; 1 Bla. Com. 131; Bacon, Abr. Duress, Murder (A). See DURESS.

PER MY ET PER TOUT (Law Fr. by the moiety, or half, and by the whole). The mode in which joint tenants hold the joint estate, the effect of which, technically considered, is that for purposes of tenure and survivorship each is the holder of the whole, but for purposes of alienation each has only his own share, which is presumed in law to be equal; 1 Washb. R. P. 406; 2 Bla. Com. 182.

PER QUOD CONSORTIUM AMISIT (Lat. by which he lost her company). If a man's wife is so badly beaten or ill used that thereby he loses her company and assistance for any time, he has a separate remedy by an action of trespass (in the nature of an action on the case) per quod consortium amisit, in which he shall recover satisfaction in damages; 3 Bla. Com. 140; Cro. Jac. 501, 538; 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 59.

PER QUOD SERVITIUM AMISIT (Lat. by which he lost her or his service). Where a servant has been so beaten or injured that his or her services are lost to the master, the master has an action of trespass vi et armis, per quod servitium amisit, in which he must allege and prove the special damage he has sustained; 3 Bla. Com. 142. This action is commonly brought by the father for the seduction of his daughter, in which case very slight evidence of the relation of master and servant is necessary; but still some loss of service, or some expense, must be shown; 5 East, 45; 6 id. 391; 11 id. 23; T. Raym. 459; 2 Term, 4; 5 B. & P. 466; 1 Stark. 287; 2 id. 493; 5 Price, 641; 11 Ga. 603; 15 Barb. 279; 18 id. 212; 8 N. PER TOUT ET NON PER MY (Law Fr. by the whole and not by the moiety). Where an estate in fee is given to a man and his wife, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seized of the entirety, per tout et non per my. 2 Bla. Com. 182. PERAMBULATIONE FACIENDA, WRIT DE. In English Law. The name of a writ which is sued by consent of both parties when they are in doubt as to the bounds of their respective estates: it is directed to the sheriff to make perambulation, and to set the bounds and limits between them in certainty. Fitzh. N. B. 309.

"The writ de perambulatione faciendâ is not known to have been adopted in practice in the United States," says Professor Greenleaf, Ev. § 146, n.; "but in several of the states remedies somewhat similar in principle have been provided by statutes."

PERCEPTION (From per and capere). The taking possession of. For example, a lessee or tenant before perception of the crops, i. e. before harvesting them, has a right to offset any loss which may happen to them, against the rent; but after the perception they are entirely at his risk. Mackeldey, Civil Law, § 378. Used of money, it means the counting out and payment of a debt. Also used for food due to soldiers. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PERCH. The length of sixteen feet and a half; a pole or rod of that length. Forty perches in length and four in breadth make an acre of land.

PERCOLATION. See SUBTERRANEAN WATERS.

PERDONATIO UTLAGARIÆ (Lat.). In English Law. A pardon for a man who, for contempt in not yielding obedience to the process of the king's courts, is outlawed, and afterwards, of his own accord, surrenders.

PERDUELLIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. At first, an honorable enmity to the republic; afterwards, a traitorous enmity of a citizen; consisting in being of a hostile disposition towards the republic, e. g. treason aiming at the supreme power, violating the privileges of a Roman citizen by beating him, etc., attempting any thing against the person of the emperor, and, in general, any open hostility to the republic. Sometimes used for the enemy or traitor himself. Perduellio was distinguished from crimen imminutæ majestatis, as being an attempt against the whole republic, punishable in comitia centuriata, by crucifixion and by infamy after death. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PEREGRINI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Under the denomination of peregrini were comprehended all who did not enjoy any capacity of the law, namely, slaves, alien enemies, and such foreigners as belonged to nations with which the Romans had not established relations. Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 66.

PEREMPTORIUS (Lat. from perimere, to destroy). In Civil Law. That which takes away or destroys forever: hence, exceptio peremptoria, a plea which is a perpetual bar. See PEREMTORY. Bracton, lib. 4, c. 20; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 36, § 3; Calvinus, Lex.

PEREMPTORY. Absolute; positive. A final determination to act, without hope of renewing or altering. Joined to a substantive, this word is frequently used in law: as, peremptory action; Fitzh. N. B. 35, 38, 104, 108; peremptory nonsuit; id. 5, 11; peremptory exception; Bracton, lib. 4, c. 20; peremptory undertaking; 3 Chitty, Pract. 112, 793; peremptory challenge of jurors; Inst. 4. 13. 9; Code, 7. 50. 2; 8. 36. 8; Dig. 5. 1. 70. 73.

PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE. A challenge without cause given, allowed to prisoner's counsel in criminal cases, up to a certain number of jurors. 11 Chitty, Stat. 59, 689; 2 Hargr. St. Tr. 808; 4 id. 1; Fost. Cr. Law, 42; 4 Bla. Com. 353*.

PEREMPTORY DEFENCE. A defence which insists that the plaintiff never had the right to institute the suit, or that, if he had, the original right is extinguished or determined. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4206.

PEREMPTORY EXCEPTION. Any defence which denies entirely the ground of action; 1 White, Rec. 283. So of a demurrer; 1 Tex. 364.

PEREMPTORY MANDAMUS. A mandamus requiring a thing to be done absolutely. It is usually granted after failure to show satisfactory cause on an alternative mandamus. No other return will be permitted but absolute obedience; 3 Bla. Com. *110; Tapp. Mand. 400 et seq. See MANDAMUS.

PEREMPTORY PLEA. A plea which goes to destroy the right of action itself; a plea in bar or to the action; 3 Steph. Com. 576; 3 Woodd. Lect. 57; 2 Saunders, Pl. & Ev. 645; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2891.

PERFECT. Complete.

This term is applied to obligations in order to distinguish those which may be enforced by law, which are called perfect, from those which cannot be so enforced, which are said to be imperfect.

PERFIDY. The act of one who has engaged his faith to do a thing, and does not do it, but does the contrary. Wolff, § 390.

PERFORMANCE. The act of doing something. The thing done is also called a performance: as, Paul is exonerated from the obligation of his contract by its performance.

When a contract has been made by parol, which under the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries could not be enforced, because it was not in writing, and the party seeking to avoid it has received the whole or a part performance of such agreement, he cannot afterwards avoid it; 14 Johns. 15; 1 Johns. Ch. 273; and such part performance will enable the other party to prove it aliunde; 1 Pet. C. C. 380; 1 Rand. 165; 1 Blackf. 58; 2 Day, 255; 5 id. 67; 1 Des. 350; 1 Binn. 218; 1 Johns. Ch. 131, 146: 3 Paige, Ch. 545.

PERIL. The accident by which a thing is lost. Leçons Elém. Dr. Rom. § 911.

In Insurance. The risk, contingency, or cause of loss insured against, in a policy of insurance. See RISK; INSURANCE.

PERILS OF THE SEA. A phrase contained in bills of lading, and a class of dangers to goods carried, the effects of which the carriers do not undertake to insure against in virtue of their general undertaking.

Bills of lading generally contain an exception that the carrier shall not be liable for "perils of the sea." What is the precise import of this phrase is not, perhaps, very exactly settled. In a strict sense, the words perils of the sea denote the natural accidents peculiar to the sea; but in more than one instance they have been held to extend to events not attributable to natural causes. For instance, they have been held to include a capture by pirates on the high sea, and a case of loss by collision of two ships, where no blame is imputable to the injured ship; Ab. Shipp. pt. 3, c. 4, §§ 1–6; Park. Ins. c. 3; Marsh, Ins. b. 1, c. 7, p. 214; 1 Bell, Com. 579; 3 Kent, 299–307; 3 Esp. 67.

The burden of proof is upon the ship-owner to show that an injury was occasioned by one of the excepted perils; 28 Am. L. Reg. 310.

It has indeed been said that by perils of the sea are properly meant no other than inevitable perils or accidents upon the sea, and that by such perils or accidents common carriers are prima facie excused, whether there be a bill of lading containing the expression of "peril of the sea" or not; 1 Conn. 487.

It seems that the phrase perils of the sea, on the western waters of the United States, signifies and includes perils of the river; 8 Ala. 176.

If the law be so, then the decisions upon the meaning of these words become important in a practical view in all cases of maritime or water carriage.

It seems that a loss occasioned by leakage which is caused by rats gnawing a hole in the bottom of the vessel is not, in the English law, deemed a loss by peril of the sea or by inevitable casualty; 1 Wils. 281; 4 Campb. 203. But if the master had used all reasonable precautions to prevent such loss, as by having a cat on board, it seems agreed it would be a peril of the sea or inevitable accident; Abb. Shipp. pt. 3, c. 3, § 9. But see 3 Kent, 299–301. In conformity to this rule, the destruction of goods at sea by rats has, in Pennsylvania, been held a peril of the sea, where there has been no default in the carrier; 1 Binn. 592. But see 6 Cow. 266; 3 Kent, 248, n. c. On the other hand, the destruction of a ship's bottom by worms in the course of a voyage has, both in America and England, been deemed not to be a peril of the sea, upon the ground, it would seem, that it is a loss by ordinary wear and decay; Park, Ins. c. 3; 1 Esp. 444; 2 Mass. 429. But see 2 Caines, 85. See, generally, ACT OF GOD; FORTUITOUS EVENT; Marsh. Ins. ch. 7, ch. 12, § 1; Phill. Ins.; Pars. Marit. Law.

PERIPHRASIS. Circumlocution; the use of other words to express the sense of one.

Some words are so technical to their meaning that in charging offences in indictments they must be used or the indictment will not be sustained: for example, an indictment for treason must contain the word traitorously; an indictment for burglary, burglariously; and feloniously must be introduced into every indictment for felony; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 242; Co. 3d Inst. 15; Carth. 319; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 172, 184; 4 Bla. Com. 307; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 58; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 115; Bacon, Abr. Indictment (G 1); Comyns, Dig. Indictment (G 6); Cro. Car. c. 37

PERISH. To come to an end; to cease to be; to die.

What has never existed cannot said to have perished.

When two or more persons die by the same accident, as a shipwreck, no presumption arises that one perished before the other.

PERISHABLE GOODS. Goods which are lessened in value and become worse by being kept.

Losses due to the natural decay, deterioration, and waste of perishable goods in the hands of a carrier are excusable. Reference must always be had, however, to the nature and inherent qualities of the articles in question, their unavoidable exposure at the time and place, and under the general circumstances, while in the charge of a carrier of ordinary prudence, and their condition when entrusted to him; Shoul. Bail. 397; 31 Am. Rep. 567.

PERJURY. In Criminal Law. The wilful assertion as to a matter of fact, opinion, belief, or knowledge, made by a witness in a judicial proceeding as part of his evidence, either upon oath or in any form allowed by law to be substituted for an oath, whether such evidence is given in open court, or in an affidavit, or otherwise, such assertion being known to such witness to be false, and being intended by him to mislead the court, jury, or person holding the proceeding. 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1244.

The wilful giving, under oath, in a judicial proceeding or course of justice, of false testimony material to the issue or point of inquiry. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1015.

The intention must be wilful. The oath must be taken and the falsehood asserted with deliberation and a consciousness of the nature of the statement made; for if it has arisen in consequence of inadvertency, surprise, or mistake of the import of the question, there was no corrupt motive; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 2; Cro. Eliz. 492; 2 Show. 165; 4 McLean, 113; 3 Dev. 114; 7 Dowl. & R. 665; 5 B. & C. 346; 7 C. & P. 17; 11 Q. B. 1028; 1 Rob. Va. 729; 3 Ala. N. S. 602. But one who swears wilfully and deliberately to a matter which he rashly believes, which is false, and which he had no probable cause for believing, is guilty of perjury; 6 Binn. 249. See Baldw. 370; 1 Bail. 50; 4 McLean, 113.

The oath must be false. The party must believe that what he is swearing is fictitious; and if, intending to deceive, he asserts that which may happen to be done without any knowledge of the fact, he is equally criminal, and the accidental truth of his evidence will not excuse him; Co. 3d Inst. 166; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 6. See 4 Mo. 47; 4 Zabr. 455; 9 Barb. 567; 1 C. & K. 519. As, if a man swears that C D revoked his will in his presence, if he really had revoked it, but it was unknown to the witness that he had done so, it is perjury; Hetl. 97.

The party must be lawfully sworn. The person by whom the oath is administered must have competent authority to receive it; an oath, therefore, taken before a private person, or before an officer having no jurisdiction, will not amount to perjury. "For where the court hath no authority to hold plea of the cause, but it is coram non judice, there perjury cannot be committed;" 1 Ind. 232; 1 Johns. 498; 9 Cow. 30; 3 M'Cord, 308; 4 id. 165; 3 C. & P. 419; 4 Hawks, 182; 1 N. & M'C. 546; 3 M'Cord, 308; 2 Hayw. 56; 8 Pick. 453; 12 Q. B. 1026; Dearsl. C. C. 251; 2 Russ. Cr. 520; Co. 3d Inst. 166.

The proceedings must be judicial; 5 Mo. 21; 1 Bail. 595; 11 Metc. 406; 5 Humphr. 83; 1 Johns. 49; Wright, Ohio, 173; R. & R. 459; 24 Alb. L. J. 312. Proceedings before those who are in any way intrusted with the administration of justice, in respect of any matter regularly before them, are considered as judicial for this purpose; 2 Russ. Cr. 518; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 3. See 9 Pet. 238; 2 Conn. 40; 11 id. 408; 4 M'Cord, 165. Perjury cannot be committed where the matter is not regularly before the court; 4 Hawks, 182; 2 Hayw. 56; 3 M'Cord, 308; 8 Pick. 453; 1 N. & M'C. 546; 9 Mo. 824; 18 Barb. 407; 10 Johns. 167; 26 Me. 33; 7 Blackf. 25; 5 B. & Ald. 634; 1 C. & P. 258; 9 id. 513.

The assertion must be absolute. If a man, however, swears that he believes that to be true which he knows to be false, it will be perjury; 10 Q. B. 670; 3 Wils. 427; 2 W. Blackst. 881; 1 Leach, 232; 6 Binn. 249; Gilbert, Ev. Lofft ed. 662. It is immaterial whether the testimony is given in answer to a question or voluntarily; 3 Zabr. 49; 12 Metc. 225. Perjury cannot be assigned upon the valuation, under oath, of a jewel or other thing the value of which consists in estimation; Sid. 146; 1 Kebl. 510. But in some cases a false statement of opinion may become perjury; 10 Q. B. 670; 15 Ill. 357; 3 Ala. N. s. 602; 3 Strobh. 147; 1 Leach, C. C. 325.

The oath must be material to the question depending; 1 Term, 63; 12 Mass. 274; 3 Murph. 123; 4 Mo. 47; 2 Ill. 80; 9 Miss. 149; 6 Penn. 170; 2 Cush. 212. Where the facts sworn to are wholly foreign from the purpose and altogether immaterial to the matter in question, the oath does not amount to a legal perjury; 2 Russ. Cr. 521; Co. 3d Inst. 167; 8 Ves. 35; 2 Rolle, 41, 42, 369; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 8; Bacon, Abr. Perjury (A); 2 N. & M'C. 18; 2 Mo. 158. But every question in cross-examination which goes to the credit of a witness, as, whether he has been before convicted of felony, is material; 3 C. & K. 26; 2 Mood. C. C. 263; 1 C. & M. 655. And see 1 Ld. Raym. 257; 10 Mod. 195; 8 Rich. 456; 9 Mo. 824; 12 Metc. 225. False evidence, whereby, on the trial of a cause, the judge is induced to admit other material evidence, even though the latter evidence is afterwards withdrawn by counsel, or though it was not legally receivable, is indictable as perjury; 2 Den. C. C. 302; 3 C. & K. 302.

It is not within the plan of this work to cite all the statutes passed by the general government or the several states on the subject of perjury. It is proper, however, here to transcribe a part of the thirteenth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825, which provides as follows: "If any person in any case, matter, hearing, or other proceeding, when an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered under or by any law or laws of the United States, shall, upon the taking of such oath or affirmation, knowingly and willingly swear or affirm falsely, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding five years, according to the aggravation of the offence. And if any person or persons shall knowingly or willingly procure any such perjury to be committed, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of subornation of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding five years, according to the aggravation of the offence;" R. S. § 5392. See 4 Blackf. 146; 15 N. H. 83; 9 Pet. 238; 2 McLean, 135; 1 Wash. C. C. 84; 2 Mas. 69.

In general, it may be observed that a perjury is committed as well by making a false affirmation as a false oath. See, generally, 16 Viner, Abr. 307; Bacon, Abr.; Comyns, Dig. Justices of the Peace (B 102–106); 4 Bla. Com. 137–139; Co. 3d Inst. 163–168; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69; Russ. Cr. b. 5, c. 1; Whart. PERMANENT TRESPASS. A trespass consisting of trespasses of one and the same kind, committed on several days, which are in their nature capable of renewal or continuation, and are actually renewed or continued from day to day, so that the particular injury done on each particular day cannot be distinguished from what was done on another day. In declaring for such trespasses, they may be laid with a continuando; 3 Bla. Com. 212; Bacon, Abr. Trespass (B 2, I 2); 1 Saund. 24, n. 1. See CONTINUANDO; TRESPASS.

PERMISSION. A license to do a thing; an authority to do an act which without such authority would have been unlawful. A permission differs from a law: it is a check upon the operations of the law.

Express permissions derogate from something which before was forbidden, and may operate in favor of one or more persons, or for the performance of one or more acts, or for a longer or shorter time.

Implied permissions are those which arise from the fact that the law has not forbidden the act to be done.

PERMISSIVE. Allowed; that which may be done: as, permissive waste, which is the permitting real estate to go to waste. When a tenant is bound to repair, he is punishable for permissive waste; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2400. See WASTE.

PERMIT. A license or warrant to do something not forbidden by law: as, to land goods imported into the United States, after the duties have been paid or secured to be paid. Act of Congr. March 2, 1799, s. 49, cl. 2. See form of such a permit, Gordon, Dig. App. II. 46.

PERMUTATION. In Civil Law. Exchange; barter.

This contract is formed by the consent of the parties; but delivery is indispensable, for without it it is a mere agreement. Dig. 31. 77. 4; Code, 4. 64. 3.

Permutation differs from sale in this, that in the former a delivery of the articles sold must be made, while in the latter it is unnecessary. It agrees with the contract of sale, however, in the following particulars: that he to whom the delivery is made acquires the right or faculty of prescribing; Dig. 41. 3. 4. 17; that the contracting parties are bound to guarantee to each other the title of the things delivered; Code, 4. 64. 1; and that they are bound to take back the things delivered when they have latent defects which they have concealed; Dig. 21. 1. 63. See Aso & M. Inst. b. 2, t. 16, c. 1; MUTATION; TRANSFER.

PERNANCY (from Fr. prendre, to take). A taking or receiving.

PERNOR OF PROFITS. He who receives the profits of lands, etc. A cestui qui use, who is legally entitled and actually does receive the profits, is the pernor of profits.

PERPETUAL. That which is to last without limitation as to time: as, a perpetual statute, which is one without limit as to time, although not expressed to be so.

PERPETUAL CURACY. The office of a curate in a parish where there is no spiritual rector or vicar, but where the curate is appointed to officiate for the time by the impropriator. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 55.

The church of which the curate is perpetual. 2 Ves. Sen. 425, 429. See 2 Steph. Com. 76; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 55; 9 Ad. & E. 556. As to whether such curate may be removed, see 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 55.

PERPETUATING TESTIMONY. The act by which testimony is reduced to writing as prescribed by law, so that the same shall be read in evidence in some suit or legal proceedings to be thereafter instituted.

The origin of this practice may be traced to the cannon law, cap. 5, X ut lite non contestata, etc. Bockmer, n. 4; 8 Toullier, n. 22. Statutes exist in most of the states for this purpose. Equity also furnishes means, to a limited extent, for the same purpose.

PERPETUITY. Any limitation tending to take the subject of it out of commerce for a longer period than a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years beyond, and, in case of a posthumous child, a few months more, allowing for the term of gestation. Randell, Perp. 48. Such a limitation of property as renders it unalienable beyond the period allowed by law. Gilbert, Uses, Sugd. ed. 260, n.

Mr. Justice Powell, in Scattergood vs. Edge, 12 Mod. 278, distinguished perpetuities into two sorts, absolute and qualified; meaning thereby, as it is apprehended, a distinction between a plain, direct, and palpable perpetuity, and the case where an estate is limited on a contingency, which might happen within a reasonable compass of time, but where the estate nevertheless, from the nature of the limitation, might be kept out of commerce longer than was thought agreeable to the policy of the common law. But this distinction would not now lead to a better understanding or explanation of the subject; for whether an estate be so limited that it cannot take effect until a period too much protracted, or whether on a contingency which may happen within a moderate compass of time, it equally falls within the line of perpetuity, and the limitation is therefore void; for it is not sufficient that an estate may vest within the time allowed, but the rule requires that it must. Randell, Perp. 49. See Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 23; 1 Belt, Suppl. to Ves. Jr. 406; 2 Ves. 357; 3 Saund. 388; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (4 G 1); 3 Ch. Cas. 1; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1890.

PERQUISITES. In its most extensive sense, perquisites signifies any thing gotten by industry or purchased with money, different from that which descends from a father or ancestor. Bracton, l. 2, c. 30, n. 3; l. 4, c. 22. In a more limited sense, it means something gained by a place or office beyond the regular salary or fee.

PERSON. A man considered according to the rank he holds in society, with all the right to which the place he holds entitles him, and the duties which it imposes. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 137.

A corporation, which is an artificial person. 1 Bla. Com. 123; 4 Bingh. 669; Woodd. Lect. 116; 1 Mod. 164.

The term, as is seen, is more extensive than man,—including artificial beings, as corporations, as well as natural beings. But when the word "persons" is spoken of in legislative acts, natural persons will be intended, unless something appear in the context to show that it applies to artificial persons; 2 Ill. 178.

Natural persons are divided into males, or men, and females, or women. Men are capable of all kinds of engagements and functions, unless by reasons applying to particular individuals. Women cannot be appointed to any public office, nor perform any civil functions, except those which the law specially declares them capable of exercising; La. Civ. Code, art. 25.

They are also sometimes divided into free persons and slaves. Freemen are those who have preserved their natural liberty, that is to say, who have the right of doing what is not forbidden by the law. A slave is one who is in the power of a master to whom he belongs. Slaves are sometimes ranked not with persons, but things. But sometimes they are considered as persons: for example, while African slavery existed in the United States, a negro was in contemplation of law a person, so as to be capable of committing a riot in conjunction with white men; 1 Bay, 358. See MAN.

Persons are also divided into citizens and aliens, when viewed with regard to their political rights. When they are considered in relation to their civil rights, they are living or civilly dead, see CIVIL DEATH; outlaws; and infamous persons.

Persons are divided into legitimates and bastards, when examined as to their rights by birth.

When viewed in their domestic relations, they are divided into parents and children; husbands and wives; guardians and wards; and masters and servants.

For the derivation of the word person, as it is understood in law, see 1 Toullier, n. 168; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1890, note.

In Criminal Law. The question has arisen in a number of cases how far a court may go in compelling a prisoner in a criminal action to expose his person or a portion of it as to exhibit his personal peculiarities, e. g. the length of his foot, or marks on his body, in order to prove his identity. The better opinion is that such action is not permissible, as it in a manner compels the prisoner to testify against himself. This view is held in 45 How. Pr. 216; 3 Cr. L. Mag. 393; and in 22 Alb. L. J. 144, it is said that on principle a prisoner cannot be compelled to say anything, nor do anything, nor submit to any act addressed to his actual person, which may tend to criminate him. But see, contra, 71 N. C. 85; 25 La. An. 523; 14 Nev. 79; s. c. 33 Am. Rep. 540, n.; 74 N. C. 646; 5 Baxt. 619; 5 Jones, 259; 63 Ga. 667. The subject is treated in 15 Cent. L. J. 2.

PERSONA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Character, in virtue of which certain rights belong to a man and certain duties are imposed upon him. Thus, one man may unite many characters (personæ): as, for example, the characters of father and son, of master and servant. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 117.

In its original signification, a mask; afterwards, a man in reference to his condition or character (status). Vicat, Voc. Jur. It is used metaphorically of things, among which are counted slaves. It is often opposed to res: as, actio in personam and actio in rem.

Power and right belonging to a person in a certain character (pro jure et potestate personæ competente). Vicat, Voc. Jur. Its use is not confined to the living, but is extended to the dead and to angels. Id. A statue in a fountain whence water gushes.

PERSONAL. Belonging to the person.

This adjective is frequently employed in connection with substantives, things, goods, chattels, actions, right, duties, and the like: as, personal estate, put in opposition to real estate; personal actions, in contradistinction to real actions. Personal rights are those which belong to the person; personal duties are those which are to be performed in person.

PERSONAL ACTION. In Practice. In the Civil Law. An action in which one person (the actor) sues another (the reus) in respect of some obligation which he is under to the actor either ex contractu or ex delicto. It will be seen that this includes all actions against a person, without reference to the nature of the property involved. In a limited sense of the word action in the civil law, it includes only personal action, all others being called petitions. See REAL ACTION.

At the Common Law. An action brought for the recovery of personal property, for the enforcement of some contract or to recover damages for its breach, or for the recovery of damages for the commission of an injury to the person or property. Such arise either upon contracts, as account, assumpsit, covenant, debt, and detinue (see these words), or for wrongs, injuries, or torts, as trespass, trespass on the case, replevin, trover (see these words). Other divisions of personal actions are made in the various states; and in Vermont and Connecticut an action is in use called the action of book debt.

PERSONAL CHATTELS. Strictly, and properly speaking, things movable, which may be annexed to or attendant on the person of the owner, and carried about with him from one part of the world to another; 2 Bla. Com. 388.

PERSONAL CONTRACT. A contract as to personal property. A covenant (or contract) personal relates only to matters personal as distinguished from real, and is binding on the covenantor (contractor) during his life, and on his personal representatives after his decease, in respect of assets; 8 Coke, 22 a.

PERSONAL COVENANT. A covenant which binds only the covenantor and his personal representatives in respect to assets, and can be taken advantage of only by the covenantee.

A covenant which must be performed by the covenantor in person. Fitzh. N. B. 340.

All covenants are either personal or real; but some confusion exists in regard to the division between them. Thus, a covenant may be personal as regards the covenantor, and real as regards the covenantee; and different definitions have been given, according to whether the rights and liabilities of the covenantor or the covenantee have been in consideration. It is apprehended, however, that the prevalent modern usage is to hold a covenant real, if it is real,—that is, runs with the land so as to apply to an assignee, either as regards the covenantor or the covenantee. See Platt, Cov. 61; 4 Bla. Com. 304, n., 305, n.; 3 N. J. 260; 7 Gray, 83.

PERSONAL LIBERTY. See LIBERTY.

PERSONAL PROPERTY. The right or interest which a man has in things personal.

The right or interest less than a freehold which a man has in realty, or any right or interest which he has in things movable.

Personal property is to be distinguished from things personal. There may be, for example, a personal estate in realty, as chattels real; but the only property which a man can have in things personal must be a personal property. The essential idea of personal property is that of property in a thing movable or separable from the realty, or of perishability or possibility of brief duration of interest as compared with the owner's life in a thing real, without any action on the part of the owner. See 2 Bla. Com. 14 and notes, 384 and notes.

A crop growing in the ground is personal property so far as not to be considered an interest in land, under the Statute of Frauds; 11 East, 362; 12 Me. 337; 5 B. & C. 829; 9 id. 561; 10 Ad. & E. 753.

It is a general principle of American law that stock held in corporations is to be considered as personal property; Walker, Am. Law, 211; 4 Dane, Abr. 670; Sullivan, Land Tit. 71; 1 Hill. R. P. 18; though it was held that such stock was real estate; 2 Conn. 567; but the rule was then changed by the legislature.

Title to personal property is acquired—first, by original acquisition by occupancy: as, by capture in war, by finding a lost thing; second, by original acquisition by accession; third, by original acquisition by intellectual labor: as, copyrights and patents for inventions; fourth, by transfer, which is by act of law, by forfeiture, by judgment, by insolvency, by intestacy; fifth, by transfer by act of the party, by gift, by sale. See, generally, 16 Viner, Abr. 335; 8 Comyns, Dig. 474, 562; 1 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 49, 121, 160, 198, 255, 368, 369, 399, 412, 478; 2 id. 10, 40, 129, 290, 291, 341; 1 Vern. 3, 170, 412; 2 Salk. 449; 2 Ves. 59, 176, 261, 271, 336, 683; 7 id. 453; Wms. Pers. Prop. See PEW; PROPERTY; REAL PROPERTY.

PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES. The executors or administrators of the person deceased. 6 Mod. 155; 5 Ves. 402; 1 Madd. 108; 118 Mass. 198.

In wills, these words are sometimes construed to mean next of kin; 3 Bro. C. C. 224; 2 Jarm. Wills, 112; 1 Beav. 46; 1 R. & M. 587; that is, those who would take the personal estate under the Statute of Distributions. They have been held to mean descendants; 19 Beav. 448.

PERSONAL SECURITY. The legal and uninterrupted enjoyment by a man of his life, his body, his health, and his reputation. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 202.

PERSONAL STATUTE. A law whose principal, direct, and immediate object is to regulate the condition of persons.

The term is not properly in use in the common law, although Lord Mansfield, in 2 W. Blackst. 234, applied it to those legislative acts which respect personal transitory contracts, but it is occasionally used in the sense given to it in civil law and which is adopted as its definition. It is a law, ordinance, regulation, or custom, the disposition of which affects the person and clothes him with a capacity or incapacity which he does not change with his abode. See 2 Kent, 613.

PERSONALTY. That which is movable; that which is the subject of personal property and not of a real property.

PERSONATE. In Criminal Law. To assume the character of another without lawful authority, and, in such character, do something to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of another, without his will or consent.

The bare fact of personating another for the purpose of fraud is no more than a cheat or misdemeanor at common law, and punishable as such; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1010; 2 Russ. Cr. 479.

By statute punishment is inflicted in the United States courts for false personating of any person under the naturalization laws, and of any person holding a claim or debt against the government; R. S. §§ 5424, 5436. See, generally, 2 Johns. Cas. 293; 16 Viner, Abr. 336; Comyns, Dig. Action on the Case for a Deceit (A 3).

PERSUADE, PERSUADING. To persuade is to induce to act. Persuading is inducing others to act. Inst. 4. 6. 23; Dig. 11. 3. 1. 5.

In the act of the legislature which declared that "if any person or persons knowingly and willingly shall aid or assist any enemies at open war with this state, etc., by persuading others to enlist for that purpose, etc., he shall be adjudged guilty of high treason," the word persuading thus used means to succeed; and there must be an actual enlistment of the person persuaded in order to bring the defendant within the intention of the clause; 1 Dall. 39; 4 C. & P. 369; 9 id. 79; ADMINISTERING. See 2 Ld. Raym. 889. The attempt to persuade a servant to steal his master's goods, or other person to undertake a larceny or other crime, is an indictable misdemeanor, although the person approached declines the persuasion; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 767.

If one counsels another to suicide, and it is done in his presence, the adviser is as guilty as the principal. Accordingly, where two persons, agreeing to commit suicide together, employ means which take effect in one only, the survivor is a principal in the murder of the other; 8 C. & P. 418; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 652.

PERSUASION. The act of influencing by expostulation or request. While the persuasion is confined within those limits which leave the mind free, it may be used to induce another to make his will, or even to make it in his own favor. But if such persuasion should so far operate on the mind of the testator that he would be deprived of a perfectly free will, it would vitiate the instrument; 3 S. & R. 269; 5 id. 207; 13 id. 323.

PERTINENT (from Lat. pertineo, belong to). Which tends to prove or disprove the allegations of the parties. Willes, 319. Matters which have no such tendency are called impertinent; 8 Toullier, n. 22.

PERTURBATION. This is a technical word which signifies disturbance or infringement of a right. It is usually applied to the disturbance of pews or seats in a church. In the ecclesiastical courts, actions for these disturbances are technically called "suits for perturbation of seat." 1 Phill. Eccl. 323. See PEW.

PERVISE, PARVISE. The palace yard at Westminster.

A place where counsel used to advise with their clients.

An afternoon exercise or moot for the instruction of students. Cowel; Blount.

PESAGE. In England, a toll charged for weighing avoirdupois goods other than wool. 2 Chitty, Com. Law, 16.

PETIT (sometimes corrupted into petty). A French word signifying little, small. It is frequently used: as, petit larceny, petit jury, petit treason.

PETIT CAPE. When the tenant is summoned on a plea of land, and comes on the summons and his appearance is recorded, if at the day given him he prays the view, and, having it given him, makes default, then shall this writ issue from the king. Old N. B. 162; Reg. Jud. fol. 2; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 44. See GRAND CAPE.

PETIT, PETIT JURY. The ordinary jury of twelve, as opposed to the grand jury, which was of a larger number and whose duty it was to find bills for the petit jury to try; 3 Bla. Com. 351.

PETIT, PETTY LARCENY. Larceny to the amount of twelve pence or less; 4 Bla. Com. *229. See 1 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 378, 379. See LARCENY.

PETIT SERJEANTY. A tenure by which lands are held of the crown by the service of rendering yearly some small implement of war, as a lance, an arrow, etc. 2 Bla. Com. 82. Though the stat. 12 Car. II. took away the incidents of livery and primer seisin, this tenure still remains a dignified branch of socage tenure, from which it only differs in name on account of its reference to war. Such is the tenure of the grants to the dukes of Marlborough and Wellington.

PETIT TREASON. In English Law. The killing of a master by his servant, a husband by his wife, a superior by a secular or religious man. In the United States, this is like any other murder. See HIGH TREASON; TREASON.

PETITE ASSIZE. Used in contradistinction from the grand assize, which was a jury to decide on questions of property. Petite assize, a jury to decide on questions of possession. Britton, c. 42; Glanville, lib. 2, c. 6, 7, Horne, Mirror, lib. 2, c. de Novel Disseisin.

PETITION. An instrument of writing or printing, containing a prayer from the person presenting it, called the petitioner, to the body or person to whom it is presented, for the redress of some wrong or the grant of some favor which the latter has the right to give.

By the constitution of the United States, the right "to petition the government for a redress of grievances" is secured to the people. Amend. art. 1.

Petitions are frequently presented to the courts in order to bring some matters before them. It is a general rule in such cases that an affidavit should be made that the facts therein contained are true as far as known to the petitioner, and that those facts which he states as knowing from others he believes to be true.

PETITION OF RIGHT. In English Law. A proceeding in chancery by which a subject may recover property in the possession of the king.

This is in the nature of an action against a subject, in which the petitioner sets out his right to that which is demanded by him, and prays the king to do him right and justice; and, upon a due and lawful trial of the right, to make him restitution. It is called a petition of right because the king is bound of right to answer it and let the matter therein contained be determined in a legal way, in like manner as causes between subject and subject. The petition is presented to the king, who subscribes it with these words, soit droit fait al partie, and thereupon it is delivered to the chancellor to be executed according to law. Co. 4th Inst. 419, 422 b; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 30, 31; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 22, 23.

The modern practice is regulated by statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 34, which provides that the petition shall be left with the home secretary for Her Majesty's consideration, who, if she shall think fit, may grant her fiat that right be done, whereupon the fiat having been served on the solicitor of the treasury, an answer, plea, or demurrer shall be made in behalf of the crown, and the subsequent pleadings be assimulated as far as practicable to the course of an ordinary action; Mozl. & W.

The stat. 3 Car. I., being a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people. 1 Bla. Com. 128.

PETITORY. That which demands or petitions; that which has the quality of a prayer or petition; a right to demand.

A petitory suit or action is understood to be one in which the mere title to property is to be enforced by means of a demand, petition, or other legal proceeding, as distinguished from a suit where only the right of possession and not the mere right of property is in controversy. 1 Kent, 371; 7 How. 846; 10 id. 257. Admiralty suits touching property in ships are either petitory, in which the mere title to the property is litigated, or possessory, to restore the possession to the party entitled thereto.

The American courts of admiralty exercised unquestioned jurisdiction in petitory as well as possessory actions; but in England the courts of law, some time after the restoration in 1660, claimed exclusive cognizance of mere questions of title, until the statute of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. By that statute the court of admiralty was authorized to decide all questions as to the title to or ownership of any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof remaining in the registry in any cause of possession, salvage, damage, wages, or bottomry, instituted in such court after the passing of that act; Ware, 232; 18 How. 267; 2 Curt. C. C. 426.

In Scotch Law. Actions in which damages are sought.

This class embraces such actions as assumpsit, debt, covenant, and detinue, at common law. See Patterson, Comp. 1058, n.

PETTY AVERAGE (called, also, customary average). Several petty charges which are borne partly by the ship and partly by the cargo, such as the expense of tonnage, beaconage, etc. Abbott, Shipp. 7th ed. 404; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 312; 1 Bell, Com. 567; 2 Magens, 277; Gourlie, Gen. Av.

PETTY BAG OFFICE. In English Law. An office in the court of chancery, appropriated for suits against attorneys and officers of the court, and for process and proceedings by extent on statutes, recognizances ad quod damnum, and the like. Termes de la Ley.

PETTY CONSTABLE. The ordinary constable, as distinguished from the high constable of the hundred. 1 Bla. Com. 355; Bacon, Law Tr. 181, Office of Constable; Willcock, Cons. c. 1, § 1. For duties of constable in America, see NEW ENGLAND SHERIFF; Crocker, Sheriffs; Marsh, Const. Guide.

PETTIFOGGER. One who pretends to be a lawyer, but possesses neither knowledge of the law nor conscience.

An unprincipled practitioner of law, whose business is confined to petty cases.

PEW. A seat in a church, separated from all others, with a convenient place to stand therein.

It is an incorporeal interest in the real property. And although a man has the exclusive right to it, yet it seems he cannot maintain trespass against a person entering it; 1 Term, 430; but case is the proper remedy; 3 B. & Ald. 361; 8 B. & C. 294. In 3 Paige, Ch. 296, it was held that the owner of a pew can, if disturbed in its use, maintain trespass, case, or ejectment, according to the circumstances.

The right to pews is limited and usufructuary, and does not interfere with the right of the parish or congregation to pull down and rebuild the church; 4 Ohio, 541; 5 Cow. 496; 17 Mass. 435; 109 id. 21; 1 Pick. 102; 3 id. 344; 6 S. & R. 508; 9 Wheat. 445; 9 Cra. 52; 6 Johns. 41; 4 Johns. Ch. 596; 6 Term, 396; 3 How. 74; indemnifying those whose pews are destroyed; 17 Mass. 435. See Powell, Mortg. Index; 2 Bla. Com. 429; 1 Chitty, Pr. 208, 210; 1 Powell, Mortg. 17, n; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1; 9 Am. Dec. 161; 24 id. 230; Baum.

A pew may be used only for divine service and for meetings of the congregation held for temporal purposes. The pew-owner must preserve order while enjoying his pew; 34 N. Y. 149. The owner of a pew does not own the soil under it, nor the space above it; 17 Mass. 435.

In Connecticut, Maine, and Louisiana, pews are considered real estate. In Massachusetts and New Hampshire, they are personal property; Mass. Gen. Stat. c. 30, § 38; 1 Smith, St. 145. The precise nature of such property does not appear to be well settled in New York; 15 Wend. 218; 16 id. 28; 5 Cow. 494. See 10 Mass. 323; 17 id. 438; 33 La. An. 9; 7 Pick. 138; 4 N. PHYSICIAN. A person who has received the degree of doctor of medicine from an incorporated institution.

One lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine.

As used in a policy of life insurance, the term "family physician" has been held to mean the physician who usually attends, and is consulted by the members of a family, in the capacity of a physician, whether or not he usually attended on or was consulted by the insured himself; 17 Minn. 497; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 166.

Although the physician is civilly and criminally responsible for his conduct while discharging the duties of his profession, he is in no sense a warrantor or insurer of a favorable result, without an express contract to that effect; Elwell, Malp. 20; 7 C. & P. 81.

Every person who offers his services to the public generally impliedly contracts with the employer that he is in possession of the necessary ordinary skill and experience which are possessed by those who practise or profess to understand the art or science, and which are generally regarded by those most conversant with the profession as necessary to qualify one to engage in such business successfully. This ordinary skill may differ according to locality and the means of information; Elwell, Malp. 22–24, 201; Story, Bailm. 433; 3 C. & P. 629; 8 id. 475; 34 Iowa, 286; s. c. 11 Am. Rep. 141 n.; 34 Iowa, 300; 82 Ill. 379; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 328.

The physician's responsibility is the same when he is negligent as when he lacks ordinary skill, although the measure of indemnity and punishment may be different; Elwell, Malp. 27; Archb. Cr. Pl. 411; 2 Ld. Raym. 1583; 3 Maule & S. 14, 15; 5 id. 198; 1 Lew. C. C. 169; 2 Stark. Ev. 526; Broom, Leg. Max. 168, 169; 4 Denio, 464; 19 Wend. 345, 346.

In England, at common law, a physician could not maintain an action for his fees for any thing done as physician either while attending to or prescribing for a patient; but a distinction was taken when he acted as a surgeon or in any other capacity than that of physician, and in such cases an action for fees would be sustained; 1 C. & M. 227, 370; 3 G. & D. 198; 4 Term, 317; 3 Q. B. 928. But now by the act of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, a physician who is registered under the act may bring an action for his fees, if not precluded by any by-law of the college of physicians; 2 H. & C. 92.

In this country, the various states have statutory enactments regulating the collection of fees and the practice of medicine. In Georgia, a physician cannot recover for his services unless he shows that he is licensed as required by the act of 1839, or unless he is within the proviso in favor of physicians who were in practice before its passage; 8 Ga. 74. In New York, prior to the act repealing all former acts prohibiting unlicensed physicians from recovering a compensation for their services (Stat. of 1844, p. 406), an unlicensed physician could not maintain an action for medical attendance and medicines; 4 Denio, 60. Under the Maine statute of 1838, c. 53, a person who is not allowed by law to collect his dues for medical or surgical services as a regular practitioner cannot recover compensation for such services unless previous to their performance he obtained a certificate of good moral character in manner prescribed by that statute, nor can he recover payment for such services under the provision of the Revised Statute, c. 22, by having obtained a medical degree, in manner prescribed by that statute, after the performance of the service, though prior to the suit; 25 Me. 104.

In Alabama and Missouri, a non-licensed physician cannot recover for professional services; 21 Ala. N. s. 680; 15 Mo. 407. When A, the plantation physician of a planter, found a surgical operation necessary on one of the negroes, and requested the overseer to send for B, another physician, who came and performed the operation without any assistance from A, it was held that B could not maintain an action against A to recover for his service; 1 Strobh. 171. In Vermont, the employment of a physician, and a promise to pay him for his services, made on the Sabbath-day, is not prohibited by statute; 14 Vt. 332. In Massachusetts, an unlicensed physician or surgeon may maintain an action for professional service; 1 Metc. Mass. 154. See 2 Pars. Contr. *56 note.

Where the wife of the defendant, being afflicted with a dangerous disease, was carried by him to a distance from his residence and left under the care of the plaintiff as a surgeon, and after the lapse of some weeks the plaintiff performed an operation on her for the cure of the disease, soon after which she died, it was held, in an action by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover compensation for his services, that the performance of the operation was within the scope of the plaintiff's authority, if, in his judgment, it was necessary or expedient, and that it was not incumbent on him to prove that it was necessary or proper under the circumstances, or that before he performed it he gave notice to the defendant, or that it would have been dangerous to the wife to wait until notice could be given to the defendant; 19 Pick. 333. Where one who has received personal injury through the negligence of another uses reasonable and ordinary care in the selection of a physician, the damages awarded him will not be reduced because the more skilful medical aid was not secured; 32 Iowa, 324; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 200. In assumpsit by a physician for his services, the defendant cannot prove the professional character of the plaintiff; 3 Hawks, 105. Physicians can recover for the services of their students in attendance upon their patients; 4 Wend. 200. Partners in the practice of medicine are within the law merchant, which excludes the jus accrescendi between traders; 9 Cow. 631. An agreement between physicians whereby for a money consideration one promises to use his influence with his patrons to obtain their patronage for the other is lawful and not contrary to public policy; 39 Conn. 326; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 390. If a physician carries contagious disease into a family, on a suit for services this may be shown to reduce such claim; 12 B. Monr. 465. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

PICKERY. In Scotch Law. Stealing of trifles, punishable arbitrarily. Bell, Dict.; Tait, Inst. Theft.

PICKPOCKET. A thief; one who in a crowd or in other places steals from the pockets or person of another without putting him in fear. This is generally punished as simple larceny.

PIGNORATIO (Lat. from pignorare, to pledge). In Civil Law. The obligation of a pledge. L. 9. D. de pignor. Sealing up (obsignatio). A shutting up of an animal caught in one's field and keeping it till the expenses and damage have been paid by its master. New Decis. 1. 34. 13.

PIGNORATIVE CONTRACT. In Civil Law. A contract by which the owner of an estate engages it to another for a sum of money and grants to him and his successors the right to enjoy it until he shall be reimbursed, voluntarily, that sum of money. Pothier, Obl.

PIGNORIS CAPTIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. The name given to one of the legis actiones of the Roman law. It consisted chiefly in the taking of a pledge, and was, in fact, a mode of execution. It was confined to special cases determined by positive law or by custom, such as taxes, duties, rents, etc., and is comparable in some respects to distresses at common law. The proceeding took place in the presence of a prætor.

PIGNUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Pledge, or pawn. The contract of pledge. The right in the thing pledged.

"It is derived," says Gaius, "from pugnum, the fist, because what is delivered in pledge is delivered in hand." Dig. 50. 16. 238. 2. This is one of several instances of the failure of the Roman jurists when they attempted etymological explanations of words. The elements of pignus (pig) are contained in the word pan(g)-o and its cognate forms. See Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq.

Though pledge is distinguished from mortgage (hypotheca), as being something delivered in hand, while mortgage is good without possession, yet a pledge (pignus) may also be good without possession. Domat, Civ. Law, b. iii. tit. 1, § 5; Calvinus, Lex. Pignus is properly applied to movables, hypotheca to immovables; but the distinction is not always preserved. Id.

PILLAGE. The taking by violence of private property by a victorious army from the citizens or subjects of the enemy. This in modern times is seldom allowed, and then only when authorized by the commanding or chief officer at the place where the pillage is committed. The property thus violently taken belongs, in general, to the common soldiers. See Dalloz, Dict. Propriété, art. 3, § 5; Wolff, § 1201; BOOTY; PRIZE.

PILLORY. A wooden machine, in which the neck of the culprit is inserted.

This punishment has in most of the states been superseded by the adoption of the penitentiary system. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 797. The punishment of standing in the pillory, so far as the same was provided by the laws of the United States, was abolished by the act of congress of February 27, 1839, s. 5. See Barrington, Stat. 48, note.

PILOT. An officer serving on board of a ship during the course of a voyage, and having charge of the helm and of the ship's route. An officer authorized by law who is taken on board at a particular place for the purpose of conducting a ship through a river, road, or channel, or from or into port.

Pilots of the second description are established by legislative enactments at the principal seaports in this country, and have rights, and are bound to perform duties, agreeably to the provisions of the several laws establishing them.

Pilots have been established in all maritime countries. After due trial and experience of their qualifications, they are licensed to offer themselves as guides in difficult navigation; and they are usually, on the other hand, bound to obey the call of a ship-master to exercise their functions; Abbott, Shipp. 180; 1 Johns. 305; 4 Dall. 205; 5 B. & P. 82; 5 Rob. Adm. 308; 6 id. 316; Laws of Oleron, art. 23; Molloy, b. 2, c. 9, ss. 3, 7; Weskett, Ins. 395; Act of Congr. of August 7, 1789, s. 4; Merlin, Répert.; Pardessus, n. 637.

The master of a vessel may decline the services of a pilot, but in that event he must pay the legal fees; 1 Cliff. 492. A pilot who first offers his services, if rejected, is entitled to his fee; 2 Am. Law Rev. 458; Desty, Shipp. § 349.

PILOTAGE. The compensation given to a pilot for conducting a vessel in or out of port. Pothier, Des Avaries, n. 147.

Pilotage is a lien on the ship, when the contract has been made by the master or quasi-master of the ship or some other person lawfully authorized to make it; 1 Mas. 508; and the admiralty court has jurisdiction when services have been performed at sea; Id.; 10 Wheat. 428; 6 Pet. 682; 10 id. 108; 10 Fed. Rep. 135; 3 Morr. Transcr. 438. And see 1 Pet. Adm. Dec. 227. The statutes of the several states regulating the subject of pilotage are, in view of the numerous acts of congress recognizing and adopting them, to be regarded as constitutionally made, until congress by its own acts supersedes them; 12 How. 312; 13 Wall. 286.

PIN-MONEY. Money allowed by a man to his wife to spend for her own personal comforts.

It has been conjectured that the term pin-money has been applied to signify the provision for a married woman, because anciently there was a tax laid for providing the English queen with pins; Barrington, Stat. 131.

When pin-money is given to but not spent by the wife, on the husband's death it belongs to his estate; 4 Viner, Abr. 133, Baron & Feme (E a. 8); 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 156; 2 P. Will. 341; 3 id. 353; 1 Ves. 267; 2 id. 190; 1 Madd. 489, 490.

In England it was once adjudged that a promise to a wife, by the purchaser, that if she would not hinder the bargain for the sale of the husband's lands he would give her ten pounds, was valid, and might be enforced by an action of assumpsit instituted by husband and wife; Rolle, Abr. 21, 22.

In the French law, the term épingles, pins, is used to designate the present which is sometimes given by the purchaser of an immovable to the wife or daughters of the seller to induce them to consent to the sale. This present is not considered as a part of the consideration, but a purely voluntary gift. Dict. de Jur. Epingles.

PINT. A liquid measure, containing half a quart or the eighth part of a gallon.

PIOUS USES. See CHARITABLE USES; 3 Sandf. 377.

PIPE. In English Law. The name of a roll in the exchequer, otherwise called the Great Roll. A measure, containing two hogsheads: one hundred and twenty-six gallons is also called a pipe.

PIRACY. In Criminal Law. A robbery or forcible depredation on the high seas, without lawful authority, done animo furandi, in the spirit and intention of universal hostility. 3 Wheat. 610; 5 id. 153, 163; 3 Wash. C. C. 209. This is the definition of this offence by the law of nations; 1 Kent, 183.

Congress may define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations. Const. U. S. art. 1, s. 7, n. 10; 3 Wheat. 336; 5 id. 76, 153, 184. In pursuance of the authority thus given by the constitution, it was declared by the act of congress of April 30, 1790, s. 8, 1 Story, Laws, 84, that murder or robbery committed on the high seas, or in any river, haven, or bay out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, or any offence which if committed within the body of a county would by the laws of the United States be punishable with death, should be adjudged to be piracy and felony, and punishable with death. It was further declared that if any captain or mariner should piratically and feloniously run away with a vessel, or any goods or merchandise of the value of fifty dollars, or should yield up such vessel voluntarily to pirates, or if any seaman should forcibly endeavor to hinder his commander from defending the ship or goods committed to his trust, or should make revolt in the ship, every such offender should be adjudged a pirate and felon, and be punishable with death. Accessories before the fact are punishable as the principal; those after the fact, with fine and imprisonment.

By a subsequent act, passed March 3, 1819, 3 Story, Laws, 1739, made perpetual by the act of May 15, 1820, 1 Story, Laws, 1798, congress declared that if any person upon the high seas should commit the crime of piracy as defined by the law of nations, he should, on conviction, suffer death.

And again, by the act of May 15, 1820, s. 3, 1 Story, Laws, 1798, congress declared that if any person should upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any harbor, haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the tide ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery in or upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company of any ship or vessel, or the lading thereof, such person should be adjudged to be a pirate, and suffer death. And if any person engaged in any piratical cruise or enterprise, or being of the crew or ship's company of any piratical ship or vessel, should land from such ship or vessel, and, on shore, should commit robbery, such person should be adjudged a pirate, and suffer death. Provided that the state in which the offence may have been committed should not be deprived of its jurisdiction over the same, when committed within the body of a county, and that the courts of the United States should have no jurisdiction to try such offenders after conviction or acquittal, for the same offence, in a state court. The fourth and fifth sections of the last-mentioned act declare persons engaged in the slave-trade, or in forcibly detaining a free negro or mulatto and carrying him in any ship or vessel into slavery, piracy, punishable with death; R. S. § 5368–5382. See 1 Kent, 183; Beaussant, Code Maritime, t. 1, p. 244; Dalloz, Dict. Supp.; Dougl. 613; Park, Ins. Index; Bacon, Abr.; 16 Viner, Abr. 346; Ayl. Pand. 42; 11 Wheat. 39; 1 Gall. 247, 524; 3 Wash. C. C. 209, 240; 1 Pet. C. C. 118, 121.

In Torts. By piracy is understood the plagiarism of a book, engraving, or other work for which a copyright has been taken out.

When a piracy has been made of such a work, an injunction will be granted; 4 Ves. 681; 5 id. 709; 12 id. 270. See COPYRIGHT; MEMORIZATION.

PIRATE. A sea-robber, who, to enrich himself, by subtlety or open force, setteth upon merchants and others trading by sea, despoiling them of their loading, and sometimes bereaving them of life and sinking their ships. Ridley, View, pt. 2, c. 1, s. 3. One guilty of the crime of piracy. Merlin, Répert. See, for the etymology of this word, Bacon, Abr. Piracy.

PIRATICALLY. In Pleading. This is a technical word, essential to charge the crime of piracy in an indictment, which cannot be supplied by another word or any circumlocution; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 37, s. 15; Co. 3d Inst. 112; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, *244.

PISCARY. The right of fishing in the waters of another. Bacon, Abr.; 5 Comyns, Dig. 366. See FISHERY.

PISTAREEN. A small Spanish coin. It is not made current by the laws of the United States. 10 Pet. 618.

PIT. A hole dug in the earth, which was filled with water, and in which women thieves were drowned, instead of being hung. The punishment of the pit was formerly common in Scotland.

PIT AND GALLOWS (Law. Lat. fossa et furca). In Scotch Law. A privilege of inflicting capital punishment for theft, given by king Malcolm, by which a woman could be drowned in a pit (fossa) or a man hanged on a gallows (furca). Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 277, § 62.

PLACE. See VENUE.

PLACE OF BUSINESS. The place where a man usually transacts his affairs or business.

When a man keeps a store, shop, counting-room, or office, independently and distinctly from all other persons, that is deemed his place of business; and when he usually transacts his business at the counting-house, office, and the like, occupied and used by another, that will also be considered his place of business, if he has no independent place of his own. But when he has no particular right to use a place for such private purpose, as in an insurance-office, an exchange-room, a banking-room, a post-office, and the like, where persons generally resort, these will not be considered as the party's place of business, although he may occasionally or transiently transact business there; 1 Pet. 582; 2 id. 121; 10 Johns. 501; 11 id. 231; 16 Pick. 392.

It is a general rule that a notice of the non-acceptance or non-payment of a bill, or of the non-payment of a note, may be sent either to the domicil or place of business of the person to be affected by such notice; and the fact that one is in one town and the other in the other will make no difference, and the holder has his election to send to either. A notice to partners may be left at the place of business of the firm or of any one of the partners; Story, Pr. Notes, § 312; Dan. Neg. Instr. 503.

PLACITA COMMUNIA (Lat.). Common pleas. All civil actions between subject and subject. 3 Bla. Com. 38, 40*; Cowel, Plea. See PLACITUM.

PLACITA CORONÆ (Lat.). Pleas of the crown. All trials for crimes and misdemeanors, wherein the king is plaintiff, on behalf of the people. 3 Bla. Com. 40*; Cowel, Plea.

PLACITA JURIS (Lat.). Arbitrary rules of law. Bacon, Law Tr. 73; Bacon, Max. Reg. 12.

PLACITUM (Lat. from placere). In Civil Law. Any agreement or bargain. A law; a constitution or rescript of the emperor; the decision of a judge or award of arbitrators. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.; Dupin, Notions sur le Droit.

In Old English Law (Ger. plats, Lat. plateis, i.e. fields or streets). An assembly of all degrees of men, where the king presided and they consulted about the great affairs of the kingdom: first held, as the name would show, in the fields or street. Cowel.

So on the continent. Hinc. de Ordine Palatii, c. 23; Bertinian, Annals of France in the year 767: Const. Car. Mag. cap. ix.; Hinc. Epist. 197, 227; Laws of the Longobards, passim.

A lord's court. Cowel.

An ordinary court. Placita is the style of the English courts at the beginning of the record at nisi prius; in this sense, placita are divided into pleas of the crown and common pleas, which see. Cowel.

A trial or suit in court. Cowel; Jacobs.

A fine. Black Book of Exchequer, lib. 2, tit. 13; 1 Hen. I. cc. 12, 13.

A plea. This word is nomen generalissimum, and refers to all the pleas in the case. 1 Saund. 388, n. 6; Skinn. 554; Carth. 334; Yelv. 65. By placitum is also understood the subdivisions in abridgments and other works, where the point decided in a case is set down separately, and, generally, numbered. In citing, it is abbreviated as follows: Viner, Abr. Abatement, pl. 3.

Placitum nominatum is the day appointed for a criminal to appear and plead.

Placitum fractum. A day past or lost to the defendant. 1 Hen. I. c. 59.

PLAGIARISM. The act of appropriating the ideas and language of another and passing them for one's own.

When this amounts to piracy, the party who has been guilty of it will be enjoined when the original author has a copyright. See COPYRIGHT; PIRACY; QUOTATION; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 169.

PLAGIARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. He who fraudulently concealed a freeman or slave who belonged to another.

The offence itself was called plagium.

It differed from larceny or theft in this, that larceny always implies that the guilty party intended to make a profit, whereas the plagiarius did not intend to make any profit. Dig. 48. 15. 6; Code, 9. 20. 9, 15.

PLAGIUM (Lat.). Man-stealing; kidnapping. This offence is the crimen plagii of the Romans. Alison, Crim. Law, 280, 281.

PLAINT. In English Law. The exhibiting of any action, real or personal, in writing. The party making his plaint is called the plaintiff.

PLAINTIFF (Fr. pleyntife). He who complains. He who, in a personal action, seeks a remedy for an injury to his rights. 3 Bla. Com. 25; Hamm. Part.; 1 Chitty, Pl.; Chitty, Pr.; 1 Comyns, Dig. 36, 205, 308.

The legal plaintiff is he in whom the legal title or cause of action is vested.

The equitable plaintiff is he who, not having the legal title, yet is in equity entitled to the thing sued for. For example: when a suit is brought by Benjamin Franklin for the use of Robert Morris, Benjamin Franklin is the legal, and Robert Morris the equitable, plaintiff. This is the usual manner of bringing suits when the cause of action is not assignable at law but is so in equity. See Bouvier, Inst. Index, Parties.

The word plaintiff occurring alone means the plaintiff on record, not the real or equitable plaintiff. After once naming the plaintiff in pleading, he may be simply called the plaintiff. 1 Chitty, Pl. 266; 9 Paige, Ch. 226; 4 Hill, N. Y. 468; 5 id. 523, 548; 7 Term, 50.

PLAINTIFF IN ERROR. A party who sues out a writ of error; and this, whether in the court below he was plaintiff or defendant.

PLAN. The delineation or design of a city, a house or houses, a garden, a vessel, etc., traced on paper or other substance, representing the position and the relative proportions of the different parts.

A plan referred to in a deed describing land as bounded by a way laid down upon a plan may be used as evidence in fixing the locality of such way; 16 Gray, 374; and if a plan is referred to in the deed for description, and in it are laid down courses, distances, and other particulars, it is the same as if they were recited in the deed itself; 3 Washb. R. P. 430.

When houses are built by one person agreeably to a plan, and one of them, with windows and doors in it, is sold to a person, the owner of the others cannot shut up those windows, nor has his grantee any greater right; 1 Price, 27; 2 Ry. & M. 24; 1 Lev. 122; 2 Saund. 114, n. 4; 1 Mood. & M. 396; 9 Bingh. 305; 1 Leigh, N. P. 559. See 12 Mass. 159; Hamm. Nisi P. 202; 2 Hill. R. P. c. 12, n. 6–12; Comyns, Dig. Action on the Case for a Nuisance (A); ANCIENT LIGHTS; WINDOWS.

PLANTATIONS. Colonies; dependencies. 1 Bla. Com. 107.

In England, this word, as it is used in stat. 12 Car. II. c. 18, is never applied to any of the British dominions in Europe, but only to the colonies in the West Indies and America; 1 Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 3, § 2, p. 69.

PLAT. A map of a piece of land, on which are marked the courses and distances of the different lines, and the quantity of land it contains.

Such a plat may be given in evidence in ascertaining the position of the land and what is included, and may serve to settle the figure of a survey and correct mistakes; 5 T. B. Monr. 160. See 17 Mass. 211; 5 Me. 219; 7 id. 61; 4 Wheat. 444; 14 Mass. 149.

PLEA. In Equity. A special answer showing or relying upon one or more things as a cause why the suit should be either dismissed, or delayed, or barred. Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 219; Coop. Eq. Pl. 223; Story, Eq. Pl. § 649.

The modes of making defence to a bill in equity are said to be by demurrer, which demands of the court whether from the matter apparent from the bill the defendant shall answer at all; by plea, which, resting on the foundation of new matter offered, demands whether the defendant shall answer further; by answer, which responds generally to the charges of the bill; by disclaimer, which denies any interest in the matters in question; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 13; 2 Stor. 59; Story, Eq. Pl. § 437. Pleas are said to be pure which rely upon foreign matter to discharge or stay the suit, and anomalous or negative which consist mainly of denials of the substantial matters set forth in the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 651, 667; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 97, 110; Beames, Eq. Pl. 123; Adams, Eq. 236.

Pleas to the jurisdiction assert that the court before which the cause is brought is not the proper court to take cognizance of the matter.

Pleas to the person may be to the person of the plaintiff or defendant. Those of the former class are mainly outlawry, excommunication, popish recusant convict, which are never pleaded in America and very rarely now in England; attainder, which is now seldom pleaded; 2 Atk. 399; alienage, which is not a disability unless the matter respect lands, when the alien may not hold them, or he be an alien enemy not under license; 2 V. & B. 323; infancy, coverture, and idiocy, which are pleadable as at law (see ABATEMENT); bankruptcy and insolvency, in which case all the facts necessary to establish the plaintiff as a legally declared bankrupt must be set forth; 3 Mer. 667, though not necessarily as of the defendant's own knowledge; Younge, 331; 4 Beav. 554; 1 Y. & C. 39; want of character in which he sues, as that he is not an administrator; 2 Dick. 510; 1 Cox, Ch. 198; is not heir; 2 V. & B. 159; 2 Bro. C. C. 143; 3 id. 489; is not a creditor; 2 S. & S. 274; is not a partner; 6 Madd. 61; as he pretends to be; that the plaintiff named is a fictitious person, or was dead at the commencement of the suit; Story, Eq. Pl. § 727. Those to the person of the defendant may show that the defendant is not the person he is alleged to be, or does not sustain the character given by the bill; 6 Madd. 61; Rep. Finch, 334; or that he is bankrupt, to require the assignees to be joined; Story, Eq. Pl. § 732. These pleas to the person are pleas in abatement, or, at least, in the nature of pleas in abatement.

Pleas to the bill or the frame of the bill object to the suit as framed, or contend that it is unnecessary. These may be—the pendency of another suit, which is analogous to the same plea at law and is governed in most respects by the same principles; Story, Eq. Pl. § 736; 2 My. & C. 602; 1 Phill. 82; 1 Ves. 544; 4 id. 357; 1 S. & S. 491; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 248; see LIS PENDENS; and the other suit must be in equity, and not at law; Beames, Eq. Pl. 146–148; want of proper parties, which goes to both discovery and relief, where both are prayed for; Story, Eq. Pl. § 745; see 3 Y. & C. 447; but not to a bill of discovery merely; 2 Paige, Ch. 280; 3 id. 222; 3 Cra. 220; a multiplicity of suits; 1 P. Wms. 428; 2 Mas. 190; multifariousness, which should be taken by way of demurrer, when the joining or confession of the distinct matters appears from the face of the bill, as it usually does; Story, Ex. Pl. § 271.

Pleas in bar rely upon a bar created by statute; as, the Statute of Limitations; 1 S. & S. 4; 2 Sim. 45; 3 Sumn. 152; which is a good plea in equity as well as at law, and with similar exceptions; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 253; see LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF; the Statute of Frauds, where its provisions apply; 1 Johns. Ch. 425; 2 id. 275; 4 Ves. 24, 720; 2 Bro. C. C. 559; or some other public or private statute; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 768; matter of record or as of record in some court, as, a common recovery; 1 P. Wms. 754; 2 Freem. 180; 1 Vern. 13; a judgment at law; 1 Keen, 456; 2 My. & C. Ch. 602; Story, Eq. Pl. § 781, n.; the sentence or judgment of a foreign court or a court not of record; 12 Cl. & F. 368; 14 Sim. 265; 3 Hare, 100; 1 Y. & C. 464; especially where its jurisdiction is of a peculiar or exclusive nature; 12 Ves. 307; Ambl. 756; 2 How. 619; with limitations in case of fraud; 1 Ves. 284; Story, Eq. Pl. § 788; or a decree of the same or another court of equity; Cas. Talb. 217; 7 Johns. Ch. 1; 2 S. & S. 464; 2 Y. & C. 48; matters purely in pais, in which case the pleas may go to discovery, relief, or either, both, or a part of either, of which the principal (though not the only) pleas are: account, stated or settled; 2 Atk. 1; 13 Price, 767; 7 Paige, Ch. 573; 1 My. & K. 231; accord and satisfaction; 1 Hare, 564; award; 2 V. & B. 764; purchase for valuable consideration; 2 Sumn. 507; 2 Y. & C. 457; release; 3 P. Wms. 315; lapse of time, analogous to the Statute of Limitations; 1 Ves. 264; 10 id. 466; 1 Y. & C. 432, 453; 2 J. & W. 1; 1 Hare, 594; 1 Russ. & M. 453; 2 Y. & C. 58; 1 Johns. Ch. 46; 10 Wheat. 152; 1 Sch. & L. 721; 6 Madd. 61; 3 Paige, Ch. 273; 5 id. 26; 7 id. 62; title in the defendant; Story, Eq. Pl. § 812.

The same pleas may be made to bills seeking discovery as to those seeking relief; but matter which constitutes a good plea to a bill for relief does not necessarily to a bill for discovery merely. See Story, Eq. Pl. § 816; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 281, 282. The same kind of pleas may be made to bills not original as to original bills, in many cases, according to their respective natures. Peculiar defences to each may, however, be sometimes urged by plea; Story, Eq. Pl. § 826; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 288.

Effect of a plea. A plea may extend to the whole or a part, and if to a part only must express which part, and an answer overrules a plea if the two conflict; 3 Y. & C. 683; 3 Cra. 220. The plea may be accompanied by an answer fortifying it with a protest against waiver of the plea thereby; Story, Eq. Pl. § 695. A plea or argument may be allowed, in which case it is a full bar to so much of the bill as it covers, if true; Mitford, Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 301; or the benefit of it may be saved to the hearing, which decides it valid so far as then appears, but allows matter to be disclosed in evidence to invalidate it, or it may be ordered to stand for an answer, which decides that it may be a part of a defence; 4 Paige, Ch. 124; but is not a full defence, that the matter has been improperly offered as a plea, or is not sufficiently fortified by answer, so that the truth is apparent; 3 Paige, Ch. 459. See, generally, Story, Eq. Pl.; Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jeremy; Beames, Eq. Pl.; Cooper, Eq. Pl.; Blake, Ch. Pr.; Dan. Ch. Pr.; Barbour, Ch. Pr.; Langd. Eq. Pl.

At Law. The defendant's answer by matter of fact to the plaintiff's declaration, as distinguished from a demurrer, which is an answer by matter of law.

It includes as well the denial of the truth of the allegations on which the plaintiff relies, as the statement of facts on which the defendant relies. In an ancient use it denoted action, and is still used sometimes in that sense: as, "summoned to answer in a plea of trespass." Steph. Pl. 38, 39, n.; Warren, Law Stud. 272, note w; Oliver, Prec. 97. In a popular, and not legal, sense, the word is used to denote a forensic argument. It was strictly applicable in a kindred sense when the pleadings were conducted orally by the counsel. Steph. Pl. App. n. 1.

Pleas are either dilatory, which tend to defeat the particular action to which they apply on account of its being brought before the wrong court, by or against the wrong person, or in an improper form; or peremptory, which impugn the right of action altogether, which answer the plaintiff's allegations of right conclusively. Pleas are also said to be to the jurisdiction of the court, in suspension of the action, in abatement of the writ, in bar of the action. The first three classes are dilatory, the last peremptory. Steph. Pl. 63; 1 Chitty, Pl. 425; Lawes, Pl. 36.

Pleas are of various kinds. In abatement. See ABATEMENT. In avoidance, called, also, confession and avoidance, which admits, in words, or in effect, the truth of the matters contained in the declaration, and alleges some new matter to avoid the effect of it and show that the plaintiff is, notwithstanding, not entitled to his action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 540; Lawes, Pl. 122. Every allegation made in the pleadings subsequent to the declaration which does not go in denial of what is before alleged on the other side is an allegation of new matter. Gould, Pl. ch. iii. § 195.

Pleas in bar deny that the plaintiff has any cause of action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 407; Co. Lit. 303 b. They either conclude the plaintiff by matter of estoppel, show that he never had any cause of action, or, admitting that he had, insist that it is determined by some subsequent matter. 1 Chitty, Pl. 407; Steph. Pl. 70; Britt. 92. They either deny all or some essential part of the averments in the declaration, in which case they are said to traverse it, or, admitting them to be true, allege new facts which obviate and repel their legal effect, in which case they are said to confess and avoid. Steph. Pl. 70. The term is often used in a restricted sense to denote what are with propriety called special pleas in bar. These pleas are of two kinds; the general issue, and special pleas in bar. The general issue denies or takes issue upon all the material allegations of the declaration, thus compelling the plaintiff to prove all of them that are essential to support his action. There is, however, a plea to the action which is not strictly either a general issue or a special plea in bar, and which is called a special issue, which denies only some particular part of the declaration which goes to the gist of the action. It thus, on the one hand, denies less than does the general issue, and, on the other hand, is distinguished from a "special plea in bar" in this,—that the latter universally advances new matter, upon which the defendant relies for his defence, which a special issue never does; it simply denies. Lawes, Pl. 110, 112, 113, 145; Co. Litt. 126 a; Gould, Pl. ch. ii. § 88, ch. vi. § 8. The matter which ought to be so pleaded is now very generally given in evidence under the general issue. 1 Chitty, Pl. 415.

Special pleas in bar admit the facts alleged in the declaration, but avoid the action by matter which the plaintiff would not be bound to prove or dispute in the first instance on the general issue. 1 Chitty, Pl. 442; Ld. Raym. 88. They are very various, according to the circumstances of the defendant's case: as, in personal action the defendant may plead any special matter in denial, avoidance, discharge, excuse, or justification of the matter alleged in the declaration, which destroys or bars the plaintiff's action; or he may plead any matter which estops or precludes him from averring or insisting on any matter relied upon by the plaintiff in his declaration. The latter sort of pleas are called pleas in estoppel. In real actions, the tenant may plead any matter which destroys and bars the demandant's title; as, a general release. Steph. Pl. 115, 116.

The general qualities of a plea in bar are—first, that it be adapted to the nature and form of the action, and also conformable to the count. Co. Litt. 303 a; 285 b; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (I); 1 Rolle, 216. Second, that it answers all it assumes to answer, and no more. Co. Litt. 303 a; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (E 1, 36); 1 Saund. 28, nn. 1, 2, 3; 2 B. & P. 427; 3 id. 174. Third, in the case of a special plea, that it confess and admit the fact. 3 Term, 298; 1 Salk. 394; Carth. 380; 1 Saund. 28, n., 14, n. 3; 10 Johns. 289. Fourth, that it be single. Co. Litt. 307; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (K 1, 2); 2 Saund. 49, 50; Plowd. 150 d. Fifth, that it be certain. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (E 5–11, C 41). See CERTAINTY; PLEADING. Sixth, it must be direct, positive, and not argumentative. See 6 Cra. 126; 9 Johns. 313. Seventh, it must be capable of trial. Eighth, it must be true and capable of proof.

The parts of a plea are—first, the title of the court. Second, the title of the term. Third, the names of the parties in the margin. These, however, do not constitute any substantial part of the plea. The surnames only are usually inserted, and that of the defendant precedes the plaintiff's: as, "Roe vs. Doe." Fourth, the commencement, which includes the statement of the name of the defendant, the appearance, the defence, see DEFENCE, the actio non, see ACTIO NON. Fifth, the body, which may contain the inducement, the protestation, see PROTESTATION, ground of defence, quæ est eadem, the traverse. Sixth, the conclusion.

Dilatory pleas go to destroy the particular action, but do not affect the right of action in the plaintiff, and hence delay the decision of the cause upon its merits. Gould, Pl. ch. ii. § 33. This class includes pleas to the jurisdiction, to the disability of the parties, and all pleas in abatement. All dilatory pleas must be pleaded with the greatest certainty, must contain a distinct, clear, and positive averment of all material facts, and must, in general, enable the plaintiff to correct the deficiency or error pleaded to. 1 Chitty, Pl. 365. See ABATEMENT; JURISDICTION.

Pleas in discharge admit the demand of the plaintiff, and show that it has been discharged by some matter of fact. Such are pleas of judgment, release, and the like.

Pleas in excuse admit the demand or complaint stated in the declaration, but excuse the non-compliance with the plaintiff's claim, or the commission of the act of which he complains, on account of the defendant's having done all in his power to satisfy the former, or not having been the culpable author of the latter. A plea of tender is an example of the former, and a plea of son assault demesne an instance of the latter.

Foreign pleas go to the jurisdiction; and their effect is to remove the action from the county in which the venue is originally laid. Carth. 402. Previous to the statute of Anne, an affidavit was required. 5 Mod. 335; Carth. 402; 1 Saund. Pl. 98, n. 1; Viner, Abr. Foreign Pleas; 1 Chitty, Pl. 382; Bacon, Abr. Abatement (R).

Pleas of justification, which assert that the defendant has purposely done the act of which the plaintiff complains, and in the exercise of his legal rights. 8 Term, 78; 3 Wils. 71. No person is bound to justify who is not primâ facie a wrong-doer. 1 Leon. 301; 2 id. 83; Cowp. 478; 4 Pick. 126; 13 Johns. 443, 579; 1 Chitty, Pl. 436.

Pleas puis darrein continuance, which introduce new matter of defence, which has arisen or come to the plaintiff's knowledge since the last continuance. In most of the states, the actual continuance of a cause from one term to another, or from one particular day in term to another day in the same term, is practically done away with, and the prescribed times for pleading are fixed without any reference to terms of court. Still, this right of a defendant to change his plea so as to avail himself of facts arising during the course of the litigation remains unimpaired; and though there be no continuance, the plea is still called a plea puis darrein continuance, —meaning, now, a plea upon facts arising since the last stage of the suit. They are either in bar or in abatement. Matter which arises after purchase or issue of the writ, and before issue joined, is properly pleaded in bar of the further maintenance of the suit; 4 East, 502; 3 Term, 186; 5 Pet. 224; 4 Me. 582; 12 Gill & J. 358; see 7 Mass. 325; while matter subsequent to issue joined must be pleaded puis darrein continuance. 1 Chitty, Pl. 569; 30 Ala. N. S. 253; Hempst. 16; 40 Me. 582; 7 Gill, 415; 10 Ohio, 300. Their object is to present matter which has arisen since issue joined, and which the defendant cannot introduce under his pleadings as they exist, for the rights of the parties were at common law to be tried as they existed at the time of bringing the suit, and matters subsequently arising come in as it were by exception and favor. See 7 Johns. 194.

Among other matters, it may be pleaded that the plaintiff has become an alien enemy; 3 Camp. 152; that an award has been made after issue joined; 2 Esp. 504; 29 Ala. N. S. 619; that there has been accord and satisfaction; 5 Johns. 392; that the plaintiff has become bankrupt; Tidd, Pr. 800; 1 Dougl. Mich. 267; that the defendant has obtained a bankrupt-certificate, even though obtained before issue joined; 9 East, 82; see 2 H. Blackst. 553; 3 B. & C. 23; 3 Denio, 269; that a feme plaintiff has taken a husband; Bull. N. P. 310; 1 Blackf. 288; that judgment has been obtained for the same cause of action; 9 Johns. 221; 5 Dowl. & R. 175; that letters testamentary or of administration have been granted; 2 Str. 1106; 1 Saund. 265, n. 2; or revoked; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (I 4); that the plaintiff has released the defendant; 4 Cal. 331; 3 Sneed, 52; 17 Mo. 267. See 33 N. H. 179. But the defendant in ejectment cannot plead release from the lessor of the plaintiff; 4 Maule & S. 300; 7 Taunt. 9; and the release will be avoided in case of fraud; 7 Taunt. 48; 4 B. & Ad. 419; 4 J. B. Moore, P. C. 192; 23 N. H. 535.

As a general rule, such matters must be pleaded at the first continuance after they happen or come to the plaintiff's knowledge; 11 Johns. 424; 1 S. & R. 146; though a discharge in insolvency or bankruptcy of the defendant; 2 E. D. Smith, 396; 2 Johns. 294; 9 id. 255, 392; and coverture of the plaintiff existing at the purchase of the suit, are exceptions; Bull. N. P. 310; in the discretion of the court; 10 Johns. 161; 4 S. & R. 239; 5 Dowl. & R. 521; 2 Mo. 100. Great certainty is required in pleas of this description; Yelv. 141; Freem. 112; Cro. Jac. 261; 2 Wils. 130; 2 Watts, 451. They must state the day of the last continuance, and of the happening of the new matter; Bull. N. P. 309; 1 Chitty, Pl. 572; 7 Ill. 252; cannot be awarded after assizes are over; 2 M'Cl. & Y. 350; Freem. 252; must be verified on oath before they are allowed; 1 Stra. 493; 1 Const. So. C. 455; and must then be received; 5 Taunt. 333; 3 Term, 554; 1 Stark. 52; 1 Marsh. 70, 280; 15 N. H. 410. They stand as a substitute for former pleas; 1 Salk. 178; Hob. 81; Hempst. 16; 4 Wisc. 159; 1 Strobh. 17; and demurrers; 32 E. L. & E. 280; may be pleaded after a plea in bar; 1 Wheat. 215; Al. 67; Freem. 252; and if decided against the defendant, the plaintiff has judgment in chief; 1 Wheat. 215; Al. 67; Freem. 252.

Sham pleas are those which are known to the pleader to be false, and are entered for the purpose of delay. There are certain pleas of this kind which, in consequence of their having been long and frequently used in practice, have obtained toleration from the courts, and, though discouraged, are tacitly allowed: as, for example, the common plea of judgment recovered, that is, that judgment has been already recovered by the plaintiff for the same cause of action; Steph. Pl. 444, 445; 1 Chitty, Pl. 505, 506. See 14 Barb. 393; 2 Denio, 195. The later practice of courts in regard to sham pleas is to strike them out on motion, and give final judgment for the plaintiff, or impose terms (in the discretion of the court) on the defendant, as a condition of his being let in to plead anew. The motion is made on the plea itself, or on affidavits in connection with the plea.

Pleas in suspension of the action show some ground for not proceeding in the suit at the present period, and pray that the pleading may be stayed until that ground be removed. The number of these pleas is small. Among them is that which is founded on the nonage of the parties, and termed parol demurrer. Steph. Pl. 64.

See, generally, Bacon, Abr. Pleas (Q); Comyns, Dig. Abatement (I 24, 34); Doctrina Plac. 297; Buller, Nisi P. 309; Lawes, Civ. Plead. 173; 1 Chitty, Plead. 634; Stephen, Plead. 81; Gould, Plead.; Bouvier, Inst. Index.

In ecclesiastical courts, a plea is called an allegation. See ALLEGATION.

PLEAD, TO. To answer the indictment or, in a civil action, the declaration of the plaintiff, in a formal manner. To enter the defendant's defence upon record. In a popular use, to make a forensic argument. The word is not so used by the profession. Steph. Pl. App. n. I; Story, Eq. Pl. § 4, n.

PLEADING. In Chancery Practice. Consists in making the formal written allegations or statements of the respective parties on the record to maintain the suit, or to defeat it, of which, when contested in matters of fact, they propose to offer proofs, and in matters of law to offer arguments to the court. Story, Eq. Pl. § 4, n. The substantial object of pleading is the same, but the forms and rules of pleading are very different, at law and in equity.

In Civil Practice. The stating in a logical and legal form the facts which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action or the defendant's ground of defence: it is the formal mode of alleging that on the record which constitutes the support or the defence of the party in evidence. 3 Term, 159; Dougl. 278; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (A); Bacon, Abr. Pleas and Pleading; Cowp. 682. Pleading is used to denote the act of making the pleadings.

The object of pleading is to secure a clear and distinct statement of the claims of each party, so that the controverted points may be exactly known, examined, and decided, and the appropriate remedy or punishment administered. See Cowp. 682; Dougl. 159. Good pleading consists in good matter pleaded in good form, in apt time and due order; Co. Litt. 303. Good matter includes all facts and circumstances necessary to constitute the cause of complaint or ground of defence, and no more. It does not include arguments or matters of law. But some matters of fact need not be stated, though it be necessary to establish them as facts. Such are, among others, facts of which the courts take notice by virtue of their office: as, the time of accession of the sovereign; 2 Ld. Raym. 794; time and place of holding parliament; 1 Saund. 131; public statutes and the facts they ascertain; 1 Term, 45; including ecclesiastical, civil, and marine laws; Ld. Raym. 338; but not private; 2 Dougl. 97; or foreign laws; 2 Carth. 273; 4 R. I. 523; common-law rights, duties, and general customs; Ld. Raym. 1542; Co. Litt. 175; Cro. Car. 561; the almanac, days of the week, public holidays, etc.; Salk. 269; 6 Mod. 81; 4 Dowl. 48; 4 Fla. 158; political divisions; Co. 2d Inst. 557; 4 B. & Ald. 242; 6 Ill. 73; the meaning of English words and terms of art in ordinary acceptation; 1 Rolle, Abr. 86, 525; their own course of proceedings; 1 Term, 118; 2 Lev. 176; 10 Pick. 470; see 16 East, 39; and that of courts of general jurisdiction; 1 Saund. 73; 5 McLean, 167; 10 Pick. 470; 3 B. & P. 183; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 4–6; facts which the law presumes: as, the innocence of a party, illegality of an act, etc.; 4 Maule & S. 105; 1 B. & Ald. 463; 2 Wils. 147; 6 Johns. 105; 16 East, 343; 16 Tex. 335; 6 Conn. 130; matters which the other party should plead, as being more within his knowledge; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 293, n.; 8 Term, 167; 2 H. Blackst. 530; 2 Johns. 415; 9 Cal. 286; 1 Sandf. 89; 3 Cow. 96; mere matters of evidence of facts; 9 Co. 96; Willes, 130; 25 Barb. 457; 7 Tex. 603; 6 Blackf. 173; 1 N. Chipm. 293; unnecessary matter: as, a second breach of condition, where one is sufficient; 2 Johns. 443; 1 Saund. 58, n. 1; 33 Miss. 474; 4 Ind. 409; 23 N. H. 415; 12 Barb. 27; 2 Green, N. J. 577; see DUPLICITY; or intent to defraud, when the facts alleged constitute fraud; 16 Tex. 335; see 3 Maule & S. 182; irrelevant matter; 1 Chitty, Pl. 209. Such matter may be rejected without damage to the plea, if wholly foreign to the case, or repugnant; 7 Johns. 462; 3 Day, 472; 2 Mass. 283; 8 S. & R. 124; 11 Ala. 145; 16 Tex. 656; 7 Cal. 348; 23 Conn. 134; 1 Du. N. Y. 242; 6 Ark. 468; 8 Ala. N. S. 320; but in many cases the matter must be proved as stated, if stated; 7 Johns. 321; 3 Day, 283; Phill. Ev. 160. The matter must be true and susceptible of proof; but legal fictions may be stated as facts; 2 Burr. 667; 4 B. & P. 140.

The form of statement should be according to the established forms; Co. Litt. 303; 6 East, 351; 8 Co. 48 b. This is to be considered as, in general, merely a rule of caution, though it is said the courts disapprove a departure from the well-established forms of pleading; 1 Chitty, Pl. 212. In most of the states of the United States, and in England since 1852, many radical changes have been introduced into the law of pleading: still, it is apprehended that a reasonable regard to the old forms will be profitable, although the names of things may be changed. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 301, n.; 3 Cal. 196; 28 Miss. 766; 14 B. Monr. 83. In general, it may be said that the facts should be stated logically, in their natural order, with certainty, that is, clearly and distinctly, so that the party who is to answer, the court, and the jury may readily understand what is meant; Cowp. 682; 2 B. & P. 267; Co. Litt. 303; 13 East, 107; 33 Miss. 669; Hempst. 238; with precision; 13 Johns. 437; 19 Ark. 695; 5 Du. N. Y. 689; and with brevity; 36 N. H. 458; 1 Chitty, Pl. 212. The facts stated must not be insensible or repugnant; 1 Salk. 324; 7 Co. 25; 25 Conn. 431; 5 Blackf. 339; nor ambiguous or doubtful in meaning; 5 Maule & S. 38; Yelv. 36; nor argumentative; Co. The time within which pleas must be filed is a matter of local regulation, depending upon the court in which the action is brought. The order of pleading different matters is of importance as affecting the defendant, who may oppose the plaintiff's suit in various ways. The order is as follows:—

First, to the jurisdiction of the court.

Second, to the disability, etc. of the person: first, of the plaintiff; second, of the defendant.

Third, to the count or declaration.

Fourth, to the writ: first, to the form of the writ,—first, matter apparent on the face of it, secondly, matters dehors; second, to the action of the writ.

Fifth, to the action itself in bar.

This is said to be the natural order of pleading, because each subsequent plea admits that there is no foundation for the former; 13 La. An. 147; 41 Me. 102; 7 Gray, 38; 5 R. I. 235; 2 Bosw. 267; 1 Grant, Cas. Pa. 359; 4 Jones, No. C. 241; 3 Miss. 704; 20 id. 656; 1 Chitty, Pl. 425. See 16 Tex. 114; 4 Iowa, 158. An exception exists where matter is pleaded puis darrein continuance, see PLEA; and where the subject-matter is one over which the court has no jurisdiction, a failure to plead to the puis cannot confer jurisdiction; 10 S. & R. 229; 17 Tex. 52.

The science of pleading, as it existed at common law, has been much modified by statutory changes; but, under whatever names it is done,—whether under rules of court, or of the legislative power, by the parties, the court, or the jury,—it is evident that, in the nature of things, the end of pleading must be attained, namely, the production of one or more points of issue, where a single fact is affirmed by one party and denied by the other. By pleading at the common law, this was done by the parties; in the civil law, by the court.

In England, pleadings in actions are now governed by the provisions of the Judicature Act, ord. xix. which made a number of changes in the old common law methods. See Wharton, Dict.; JUDICATURE ACTS.

In Criminal Practice the rules of pleading are the same as in civil practice. There is, however, less liberty of amendment of the indictment. The order of the defendant's pleading is as follows:—first, to the jurisdiction; second, in abatement; third, special pleas in bar: as, autrefois acquit, autrefois attaint, autrefois convict, pardon; fourth, the general issue.

See, generally, Lawes, Chitty, Stephen, Gould, Pleading; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 301 et seq. and notes; Co. Litt. 303; Comyns, Dig. Pleader; Bacon, Abr. Plea and Pleading; Bates, Pleadings under the Code; Nash, Pl. & Pr.

PLEADING, SPECIAL. By special pleading is meant the allegation of special or new matter, as distinguished from a direct denial of matter previously alleged on the opposite side. Gould, Pl. c. 1, s. 18. See SPECIAL PLEADING.

PLEADINGS. In Chancery Practice. The written allegations of the respective parties in the suit. The pleadings in equity are less formal than those at common law.

The parts of the pleadings are—the bill, which contains the plaintiff's statement of his case, or information, where the suit is brought by a public officer in behalf of the sovereign; the demurrer, by which the defendant demands judgment of the court, whether he shall be compelled to answer the bill or not; the plea, whereby he shows some cause why the suit should be dismissed or barred; the answer, which, controverting the case stated by the bill, confesses and avoids it, or traverses and denies the material allegations in the bill, or, admitting the case made by the bill, submits to the judgment of the court upon it, or relies upon a new case or upon new matter stated in the answer, or upon both; disclaimer, which seeks at once a termination of the suit by the defendants, disclaiming all right and interest in the matter sought by the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. § 546; Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jer. 13, 106; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 108; 2 Story, 59.

In Civil Practice. The statements of the parties, in legal and proper manner, of the causes of action and grounds of defence. The result of pleading. They were formerly made by the parties or their counsel, orally, in open court, under the control of the judge. They were then called the parole; 3 Bla. Com. 293; 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law, 267.

The parts of the pleadings may be arranged under two heads: the regular, which occur in the ordinary course of a suit; and the irregular or collateral, which are occasioned by errors in the pleadings on the other side.

The regular parts are—the declaration or count; the plea, which is either to the jurisdiction of the court, or suspending the action, as in the case of a parol demurrer, or in abatement, or in bar of the action, or in replevin, an avowry or cognizance; the replication, and, in case of an evasive plea, a new assignment, or, in replevin, the plea in bar to the avowry or cognizance; the rejoinder, or, in replevin, the replication to the plea in bar; the sur-rejoinder, being in replevin the rejoinder; the rebutter; the sur-rebutter; Viner, Abr. Pleas and Pleading (C); Bacon, Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (A); pleas puis darrein continuance, when the matter of defence arises pending the suit.

The irregular or collateral parts of pleading are stated to be—demurrers to any part of the pleadings above mentioned; demurrers to evidence given at trials; bills of exceptions; pleas in scire facias; and pleas in error. Viner, Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (C); Bouvier, Inst. Index.

In Criminal Practice, the pleadings are—first, the indictment; second, the plea; and the other pleadings as in civil practice.

PLEAS OF THE CROWN. In English Law. A phrase now employed to signify criminal causes in which the king is a party. Formerly it signified royal causes for offences of a greater magnitude than mere misdemeanors. These were left to be tried in the courts of the barons; whereas the greater offences, or royal causes, were to be tried in the king's courts, under the appellation of pleas of the crown. 1 Robertson, Hist. Charles V. 48.

PLEAS ROLL. In English Practice. A record which contains the declaration, plea, replication, rejoinder, and other pleadings, and the issue. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 29, p. 111.

PLEBEIAN. One who is classed among the common people, as distinguished from the nobles.

PLEBISCITUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. A law established by the people (plebs), on the proposal of a popular magistrate, as a tribune. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, §§ 27, 37.

PLEDGE, PAWN. A bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement.

A pledge or pawn (Lat. pignus), according to Story, is a bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement. Story, Bailm. § 286, which see for the less comprehensive definitions of Sir Wm. Jones, Lord Holt, Pothier, etc. Domat broadly defines it as an appropriation of the thing given for the security of an engagement. But the term is commonly used as Sir Wm. Jones defines it: to wit, as a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept till the debt is discharged. Jones, Bailm. 117; 2 Ld. Raym. 909; Pothier, de Naut. art. prelim. 1; Code, Civ. 2071; Domat, b. 3, tit. 1, § 1, n. 1; La. Civ. Code, 3100; 6 Ired. 309. The pledgee secures his debt by the bailment, and the pledgeor obtains credit or other advantage. See 1 Pars. Contr. 591 et seq.

Delivery. The first essential thing to be done is a delivery to the pledgee. Without his possession of the thing, the transaction is not a pledge; 37 Me. 543. But a constructive possession is all that is required of the pledgee. Hence, goods at sea or in a warehouse pass by transfer of the muniments of title, or by symbolic delivery. Stocks and equitable interests may be pledged; and it will be sufficient if, by proper transfer, the property be put within the power and control of the pledgee; 12 Mass. 300; 20 Pick. 405; 22 N. H. 196; 2 N. Y. 403; 7 Hill, 497. Stocks are usually pledged by delivery of the company's certificate, together with a power of attorney to the pledgee to make the transfer, leaving the actual transfer to be made subsequently.

Primâ facie, if the pledgee redeliver the pledge to the pledgeor, third parties without notice might regard the debt as paid. Still, this presumption can be rebutted, in most states. In some states courts in effect hold that even in case of sale, as well as in case of pledge, possession of the vendor is fraud per se, and refuse to admit explanatory evidence. In such states, therefore, a vendee may always take the pledge if found in the vendor's possession; 5 N. H. 345; 14 Pick. 509; 4 Jones, No. C. 40, 43. The prevailing rule is, however, that a temporary redelivery to the pledgeor makes him only the agent or bailee of the pledgee, and the latter does not lose his special property or even his constructive possession; 5 Bingh. N. C. 136; 11 E. L. & E. 584; 3 Whart. 531; 5 Humphr. 308; 32 Me. 211; 1 Sandf. 248.

Subject of pledge. Any tangible personal property may be pledged except for the peculiar rules of maritime law which are applicable to shipping. Hence, not only goods and chattels and money, but also negotiable paper, may be put in pledge. So may choses in action, patent rights, coupon bonds, and manuscripts of various sorts; 1 Ves. 278; 2 Taunt. 268; 15 Mass. 389, 534; 2 Blackf. 198; 7 Me. 28; 4 Denio, 227; 2 N. Y. 443; 1 Stockt. 667; Story, Bailm. § 290. So may bonds secured by a mortgage on personal property and corporate franchises; 50 N. H. 57; and chattel mortgages of every description; 36 Wisc. 35, 946, and 734. Even a lease may be taken in pledge; 8 Cal. 145; L. R. 10 Eq. 92; for leases are but chattels real; or a mortgage of real estate, which before foreclosure, is now to be ranked with personal property; 9 Bosw. 322; Schoul. Bailm. 167. Incorporeal things could be pledged immediately, probably, under the civil law, and so in the Scotch law, or, at all events, by assignment; 1 Domat, b. 3, tit. 1, § 1; Pothier, de Naut. n. 6; 2 Bell, Com. 23. The laws of France and Louisiana require a written act of pledge, duly registered and made known, in order to be made good against third parties. In the civil law, property of which the pledgeor had neither present possession nor title could be pledged,—though this was rather a contract for pledge, called a hypothecation. The pledge became complete when the property was acquired by the pledgeor. The same rule holds in our law, where a hypothecary contract gives a lien which attaches when the property is vested; 1 Hare, 549; 13 Pick. 175; 14 id. 497; 21 Me. 86; 16 Conn. 276; Daveis, 199. And it has been held that a pledge may be made to secure an obligation not yet risen into existence; 12 La. An. 529. In an agreement to pledge a vessel not then completed, the intent of the parties governs in determining when the property passes; 8 Pick. 236; 24 E. L. & E. 220.

A life-policy of insurance may be pledged, or a wife's life-policy. The common law does not permit the pay and emoluments of officers and soldiers to be pledged, from public policy; 1 H. Blackst. 627; 4 Term, 248. Hence, probably, a fishing-bounty could not be pledged, on the ground that government pensions and bounties to soldiers, sailors, etc., for their personal benefit, cannot be pledged. A bank can pledge the notes left with it for discount, if it is apparent on the face of the notes that the bank is their owner.

Ordinary care. The pawnee is bound to take ordinary care of his pawn, and is liable only for ordinary neglect, because the bailment is for the mutual benefit of both parties. Hence, if the pledge is lost and the pledgee has taken ordinary care, he may still recover his debt. Such losses often result from casualty, superior force, or intrinsic defect against which a man of ordinary prudence would not have effectually guarded himself. If a pledgeor find it necessary to employ an agent, and he exercise ordinary caution in his selection of the agent, he will not be liable for the latter's neglect or misconduct; 1 La. An. 344; 10 B. Monr. 239; 4 Ind. 425; 8 N. H. 66; 14 id. 567; 6 Cal. 643.

Loss by theft is primâ facie evidence of a want of ordinary care, and the bailee must rebut the presumption. The facts in each case regulate the liablity. Theft is only evidence, in short, and not absolute presumption, of negligence. Perhaps the only safe rule is that, where the pledgee pleads loss by theft as ground for not performing his duty, to excuse himself he must show that the theft could not have been prevented by ordinary care on his part. If the bailor should assert in his declaration that the pledge was lost by the bailee's fault, he would be compelled to prove the charge as laid.

Use. The reasonable use of a pledge is allowed to a pledgee, according to Lord Holt, Sir Wm. Jones, and Story, provided it be of no injury or peril to the bailment. The reason given by Story is precise, namely, that where use of the pledge is beneficial to it, or cannot depreciate it, the consent of the pledgeor to such use may fairly be presumed; but not otherwise. Still, the word peril is somewhat broad. If the pawn be in its nature a charge upon the pawnee,—as a horse or cow,—he may use it, moderately, by way of recompense. For any unusual care he may get compensation from the owner, if it were not contemplated by the parties or implied in the nature of the bailment; Ld. Raym. 909; 2 Salk. 522; 1 Pars. Contr. 593. The pawnee is answerable in damages for an injury happening while he is using the pawn. Still, though he use it tortiously, he is only answerable by action. His pledgee's lien is not thereby forfeited; 4 Watts, 414. A pledgee can exercise a horse, but not loan it for hire. The rule is, that if he derive any profits from the pledge they must be applied to the debt; 2 Murph. 111.

The pledgee of shares of stock, in the absence of a specific agreement to the contrary, may transfer the stock to his own name on the books of the company, and when so transferred, the particular shares become undistinguishable from the common mass, and the pledgeor is not entitled to the return of the identical shares pledged; 11 Fed. Rep. 115; s. c. 21 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 452, and note citing 69 Penn. 409; 8 Nev. 345.

Property. The pledgee has at common law a special property in the pledge, and is entitled to the exclusive possession of it during the time and for the objects for which it is pledged. If a wrong-doer take the pledge from him, he is not thereby ousted from his right. His special property is enough for him to support replevin or trover against the wrong-doer. He has, moreover, a right to action, because he is responsible to his pledgeor for proper custody of the bailment. The pledgeor, also, may have his action against the wrong-doer, resting it on the ground of his general property. A judgment for either pledgeor or pledgee is a bar against a similar action by the other; 2 Bla. Com. 395; 6 Bligh. N. S. 127; 1 B. & Ald. 59; 5 Binn. 457; see 15 Conn. 302; 9 Gill, 7; 13 Me. 436; 13 Vt. 504.

The bailee, having a special property, recovers only the value of his special property as against the owner, but the value of the whole property as against a stranger, and the balance beyond the special property he holds for the owner; 15 Conn. 302. So if the owner brings the action and recovers the whole damages, including those for deprivation of possession, it must be with the consent of the pledgee.

A pledgee may bring replevin or trover against the pledgeor if the latter remove his pledge before paying the debt and thus injure the pledgee's rights, on the ground that the owner has parted with his absolute right of disposing of the chattel until he has redeemed it from its state of pledge; 2 Taunt. 268; 1 Sandf. 208; 22 N. H. 196; 11 N. Y. 150; 2 M'Cord, 126. Yet in trover the damages recovered cannot be greater than the amount of the debt, if the defendant derives title under the pledgeor; 4 Barb. 491; 13 Ill. 465.

Sale. If the pledgeor fail to pay the debt, the pledgee may sell the pledge. Formerly a decree of court was necessary to make the sale valid, and under the civil law it is still so in many continental countries. It is safer in a large pledge to proceed by bill in equity to foreclose; but this course is ordinarily too expensive. A demand of payment, however, must be made before sale; and if the pledgee mentions no time of sale, he may demand at once, and may sell in a reasonable time after demand; Glanville, lib. x. c. 6; 5 Bligh, N. S. 136; 9 Mod. 275; 2 Johns. Ch. 100; 1 Sandf. 351; 8 Ill. 423; 4 Denio, 227; 3 Tex. 119; 1 P. A. Browne, 176; 22 Pick. 40; 2 N. Y. 443. The pledge must be sold at public auction, and, if it be divisible, only enough must be sold to pay the debt. Even a sale at a brokers' board has been held improper; 40 Barb. 648. In general, also, the pledgee must not buy the pledge when put up at auction. Still, the purchase of the pledgee is probably not void per se, but voidable at the election of the pledgeor; and the latter may ratify the purchase by receiving the surplus over the debt, or avoid it by refusing to do so. The pledgee may charge the pledge with expenses rightfully incurred, as the costs of sale, etc. If the pledge when sold bonâ fide does not bring enough to pay the debt, the pledgee has still left a good claim against the pledgeor for the balance.

The pledgeor's bankruptcy after putting the thing in pledge will not impair the pledgee's right to make sale upon default; 95 U. S. 764.

In those states were strict foreclosure is allowed, an absolute transfer of title is made to a mortgagee, and hence there is never any inquiry into the matter of surplus after sale, because there is no right to reclaim. But in such states the mortgage law does not apply to pawns; for in pawns the surplus over the amount of debt after sale must be given back to the pledgeor. This last is also the law of mortgages in some states; but still, everywhere, pawns and mortgages of personal property are separate in law. In order to authorize any sale of a pledge without judicial proceedings, not only personal notice of the intent to redeem must be given, but also of the time, place, and manner of the intended sale; 12 Barb. 103; 4 Denio, 226; 14 N. Y. 392.

Buying and selling through a broker on deposit of a "margin" with him is held in New York to create the relation of pledgeor and pledgee; so that, on the pledgeor's failure to keep his "margin" good, the pledgee or broker cannot sell the stock, except upon the pledge formalities, for repayment of his advances and commissions; 41 N. Y. 285; 55 Barb. 59; Dos Passos, Stock-brokers, 114; Schoul. Bail. 211.

Negotiable paper. The law of pledge applies, probably, to promissory notes on demand, held in pledge. But it does not apply, in general, to other promissory notes and commercial paper pledged as collateral security. The holder of negotiable paper, even though it be accommodation paper, may pledge it for an antecedent debt, the rule governing pledges not being applicable to commercial property of this description; 3 Penn. 381; see 13 Mass. 105; 3 Cal. 151; 5 id. 260. Pledgees of negotiable paper have no right to sell it, but must wait until its maturity and then collect it; 25 Minn. 202; 82 Ill. 584; 22 Gratt. 262; 16 N. Y. 392.

See, upon the law of pledges in mercantile property, 28 N. H. 561; 26 Vt. 686; 13 B. Monr. 432; 1 Stockt. Ch. 667; 17 Barb. 492; 5 Du. N. Y. 29; 14 Ala. N. S. 65; 10 Md. 373; 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 25; 5 Tex. 318.

In most states, a pledgee cannot sell his pledge before default on the debt. And hence any pledgee who has stock put into his hands cannot sell it or operate with it as his own. If he do sell it, the pledgeor can recover of him the highest price the stock has reached at any time previous to adjudication; 2 Caines, Cas. 200; contra, i. e., up to the expiration of a reasonable time to replace it in, after notice; 53 N. Y. 211. A pledgeor may bring trover upon the sale of a pledge, or upon a tortious repledging of it.

Other debts. A pledge cannot, in general, be held for any other debt than that which it was given to secure, except on the special agreement and consent of the parties; 7

East, 224; 6 Term, 258; 2 Ves. 372; 6 id. 226; 7 Port. Ala. 466; 15 Mass. 389; 2 Leigh, 493; 14 Barb. 536. The civil law and Scotch law are otherwise; 2 Bell, Com. 22.

Pledgeor's transfer. The pledgeor may sell or transfer his right to a third party, who can bring trover against the pledgee if the latter, after tender of the amount of his debt, refuse to deliver the pawn; 9 Cow. 52; 13 M. & W. 480. A creditor of the pledgeor can only take his interest, and must pay the debt before getting the pawn. And now it is settled that the pledgeor's general property in the pawn may be sold at any time on execution, and the purchaser or assignee of the pledgeor succeeds to the pledgeor's rights, and may himself redeem. At common law, a pledge could not be taken at all in execution, 1 Ves. 278; 3 Watts, 258; 17 Pick. 85; 1 Const. 20; 1 Gray, 254. On an extent the king takes a pawn on paying the pawnee's debt; 2 Chit. Prerog. 285.

Factor. A factor cannot, at common law, pledge his principal's goods; and the principal may recover them from the pledgee's hands; 2 Stra. 1178; 6 Maule & S. 1; 3 Bingh. 139, 603; 2 Br. & B. 639; 4 B. & C. 5; 1 M'Cord, 1; 6 Metc. 68; 20 Johns. 421; 4 Hen. & M. 432; 18 Mo. 147, 191; 11 How. 209, 226. The question is very fully discussed in Pars. Marit. Law, 363. But statutes in England and in various states, as Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, etc., give the factor a power of pledging, with various modifications; 7 B. & C. 517; 6 M. & W. 572; 2 Mood. & R. 22; 3 Denio, 472; 4 id. 323; 2 Sandf. 68.

Co-pledgees. A pledgee may hold a pledge for another pledgee also, and it will be a good pledge to both. If the pledge be not large enough for both debts after sale, and no other arrangement be made, the prior pledgee will have the whole of his debt paid before any part of the proceeds is applied to the subsequent pledgee. If there is no priority of time, they will divide ratably. But an agreement between the parties will always determine the rights of two or more pledgees; 12 Mass. 321. Where possession is given to one of three pledgees, to hold for all three, the other two have a constructive possession, which is equally good, for the purpose of sharing, with an actual possession. Hence the mere manual possession of one pledge will not give a right to discharge the whole debt of the holder and a part only of that of his co-pledgees. So, by the rule of constructive possession, if the holder should lose the pledge by his own negligence, he would be liable to his co-bailees out of actual possession, as well as to his bailor.

There is a clear distinction between mortgages and pledges. In a pledge, the legal title remains in the pledgeor. In a mortgage, it passes to the mortgagee. In a mortgage, the mortgagee need not have possession. In a pledge, the pledgee must have possession, though it be only constructive. In a mortgage, at common law, the property on non-payment of the debt passes wholly to the mortgagee. In a pledge, the property is sold, and only so much of the proceeds as will pay his debt passes to the pledgee. A mortgage is a conditional conveyance of property, which becomes absolute unless redeemed at a specified time. A pledge is not strictly a conveyance at all, nor need any day of redemption be appointed for it. A mortgagee can sell and deliver the thing mortgaged, subject only to the right of redemption. A pledgee cannot sell and deliver his pawn until the debt is due and payment denied.

The civil law pignus was our pledge, and the hypotheca was our mortgage of chattels. In the former, possession was in the bailor; in the latter, in the bailee.

Pledge and mortgage, therefore, are diverse in law. Each of the following authorities recognizes one or another of the preceding distinctions: 3 Brown, C. C. 21; Yelv. 178; Prec. in Chanc. 419; 1 Ves. 358; 2 id. 372; 1 Bulstr. 29; Comyns, Dig. Mortgage; Ow. 123; 5 Johns. 260; 8 id. 97; 2 Pick. 607; 5 id. 60; 3 Penn. 208, 6 Mass. 425, 22 Me. 248; 6 Pet. 449; 2 Barb. 538; 4 Wash. C. C. 418, 2 Ala. N. s. 555; 9 Me. 82; 5 N. H. 545; 5 Blackf. 320; 3 Tex. 119; 1 Pars. Contr. 591; Schoul Bailm. 168; see CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

The distinction between mortgages and pawns is often observed strictly. Hence an instrument giving security upon a chattel for the future payment of a debt was held to be a mortgage and not a pledge, because it provided for the continuance of the possession of the debtor until payment, or on non-payment at the appointed day authorized the creditor to take possession; and this was held although instead of the ordinary terms of conveyance the words used were, "I hereby pledge and give a lien on," etc.; 9 Wend. 80. If a pledge is given with the understanding that if the debt be not paid within the stipulated time the pledgee shall have the pledge, the pledge does not pass to the pledgee on non-payment, unless the transaction be proved a mortgage and not a pledge; 3 Tex. 119; 2 Cow. 324. These decisions coincide, apparently, with the doctrines of the civil law and the French Code.

It has been seen that when no definite day is appointed the pledge may be redeemed at any time. Hence, if the pledgee himself do not give notice to the pledgeor to redeem, the latter has his whole lifetime in which to do so; and his right of redemption survives and goes to his representatives; 3 Mo. 316; 1 Call, 290. But for further discussion of pledge and hypothecation see 2 Ld. Raym. 982; 1 Atk. 165; 5 C. Rob. 218; 2 Curt. C. C. 404; 1 Pars. Marit. Law, 118; Schoul. Bailm. 158.

In Louisiana there are two kinds of pledges,—the pawn and the antichresis. The former relates to movable securities, and the latter to immovables. If a creditor have not a right to enter on the land and reap the fruits, the security is not an antichresis; 3 La. 157. A pledge of negotiable paper is not valid against third parties without transfer from debtor to creditor; 2 La. 387. See, in general, 13 Pet. 351; 5 Mart. La. N. s. 618; 18 La. 543; 1 La. An. 340; 2 id. 872.

PLEDGEE. He to whom a thing is pledged.

PLEDGEOR. The party who makes a pledge.

PLEDGES. In Pleading. Those persons who became sureties for the plaintiff's prosecution of the suit. Their names were anciently appended at the foot of the declaration. In time it became purely a formal matter, because the plaintiff was no longer liable to be amerced for a false claim, and the fictitious persons John Doe and Richard Roe became the universal pledges, or they might be omitted altogether; 1 Tidd, Pr. 455; Archb. Civ. Pl. 171; or inserted at any time before judgment; 4 Johns. 90; and are now omitted.

PLEGIIS ACQUIETANDIS, WRIT DE. The name of an ancient writ in the English law, which lies where a man becomes pledge or surety for another to pay a certain sum of money at a certain day; after the day, if the debtor does not pay the debt, and the surety be compelled to pay, he shall have this writ to compel the debtor to pay the same. Fitzh. N. B. 321.

PLENA PROBATIO. In Civil Law. A term used to signify full proof, in contradistinction to semi-plena probatio, which is only a presumption. Code, 4. 19. 5. etc.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 119.

PLENARTY. In Ecclesiastical Law. Signifies that a benefice is full. See AVOIDANCE.

PLENARY. Full; complete.

In the courts of admiralty, and in the English ecclesiastical courts, causes or suits in respect of the different course of proceedings in each are termed plenary or summary. Plenary, or full and formal, suits are those in which the proceedings must be full and formal; the term summary is applied to those causes where the proceedings are more succinct and less formal. 2 Chitty, Pr. 481.

PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT (Lat. he has fully administered). In Pleading. A plea in bar entered by an executor or administrator, by which he affirms that he had not in his possession at the time of the commencement of the suit, nor has had any time since, any goods of the deceased to be administered; when the plaintiff replies that the defendant had goods, etc. in his possession at that time, and the parties join issue, the burden of the proof will be on the plaintiff. See 15 Johns. 323; 6 Term, 10; 1 B. & Ald. 254; 11 Viner, Abr. 349; 12 id. 185; 2 Phill. Ev. 295; 3 Saund. (a) 315, n. 1; 6 Comyns, Dig. 311.

PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT PRÆTER (Lat. he has fully administered except). In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant executor or administrator admits that there is a balance remaining in his hands unadministered.

PLENE COMPUTAVIT (Lat. he has fully accounted). In Pleading. A plea in an action of account render, by which the defendant avers that he has fully accounted. Bacon, Abr. Accompt (E). This plea does not admit the liability of the defendant to account. 15 S. & R. 153.

PLENIPOTENTIARY. Possessing full powers: as, a minister plenipotentiary is one authorized fully to settle the matters connected with his mission, subject, however, to the ratification of the government by which he is authorized. See MINISTER.

PLENUM DOMINIUM (Lat.). The unlimited right which the owner has to use his property as he deems proper, without accountability to any one.

PLIGHT. An old English word, used sometimes for the estate with the habit and quality of the land. Co. Litt. 221. It extends to a rent-charge and to a possibility of dower. Id.; 1 Rolle, Abr. 447; Littleton, § 289.

PLOUGH-BOTE. An allowance made to a rural tenant of wood sufficient for ploughs, harrows, carts, and other instruments of husbandry.

PLOUGH-LAND. In Old English Law. An uncertain quantity of land. According to some opinions, it contains one hundred and twenty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a.

PLUNDER. The capture of personal property on land by a public enemy, with a view of making it his own. The property so captured is called plunder. See BOOTY; PRIZE.

PLUNDERAGE. In Maritime Law. The embezzlement of goods on board of a ship is known by the name of plunderage.

The rule of the maritime law in such cases is that the whole crew shall be responsible for the property thus embezzled, because there must be some negligence in finding out the depredator; Abbott, Shipp. 457; 3 Johns. 17; 1 Pet. Adm. 200, 239, 243; 4 B. & P. 347.

PLURAL. A term used in grammar, which signifies more than one.

Sometimes, however, it may be so used that it means only one: as, if a man were to devise to another all he was worth if he, the testator, died without children, and he died leaving one child, the devise would not take effect. See Dig. 50. 16. 148; Shelf. Lun. 504, 518.

PLURALITY. The greatest number of votes given for any one person.

Plurality has the meaning, as used in governmental law, given above. Thus, if there are three candidates, for whom four hundred, three hundred and fifty, and two hundred and fifty votes are respectively given, the one receiving four hundred has a plurality, while five hundred and one would be a majority of the votes cast. See MAJORITY.

PLURIES (Lat. many times.) A writ issued subsequently to a first and second (alias) of the same kind, which have proved ineffectual. The name is given to it from the word pluries in the Latin form of the writ: "we command you, as we have often (pluries) commanded you before," which distinguishes it from those which have gone before. Pluries is variously translated, in the modern forms of writs, by "formerly," "more than once," "often." The next writ to the pluries is called the second pluries; and so on. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 283, App. 15; Natura Brev. 33.

POACHING. Unlawful entering land, in night-time, armed, with intent to destroy game. 1 Russell, Crimes, 469; 2 Stephen, Comm. 82; 2 Chitty, Stat. 221–245.

POCKET SHERIFF. In English Law. A sheriff appointed by sole authority of the crown, not being one of the three nominated by the judges in the exchequer. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 342*.

POINDING. In Scotch Law. That diligence (process) affecting movable subjects by which their property is carried directly to the creditor. Poinding is real or personal. Erskine, Inst. 3. 6. 11.

POINDING, PERSONAL. Poinding of the goods belonging to the debtor, and of those goods only.

It may have for its warrant either letters of horning, containing a clause for poinding, and then it is executed by messengers; or precepts of poinding, granted by sheriffs, commissaries, etc., which are executed by their proper officers. No cattle pertaining to the plough, nor instruments of tillage, can be poinded in the time of laboring or tilling the ground, unless where the debtor has no other goods that may be poinded. Erskine, Inst. 3. 6. 11. This process is somewhat similar to distress.

POINDING, REAL. POINDING OF THE GROUND. Though it be properly a diligence, this is generally considered by lawyers as a species of real action, and is so called to distinguish it from personal poinding, which is founded merely on an obligation to pay.

Every debitum fundi, whether legal or conventional, is a foundation for this action. It is, therefore, competent to all creditors in debts which make a real burden on lands. As it proceeds on a real right, it may be directed against all goods that can be found on the lands burdened; but goods brought upon the ground by strangers are not subject to this diligence. Even the goods of a tenant cannot be poinded for more than his term's rent. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 3.

POINT. In Practice. A proposition or question arising in a case.

It is the duty of a judge to give an opinion on every point of law properly arising out of the issue which is propounded to him.

POINT RESERVED. A point or question of law which the court, not being fully satisfied how to decide, in the hurried trial of a cause, rules in favor of the party offering it, but subject to revision on a motion for a new trial. If, after argument, it be found to have been ruled correctly, the verdict is supported; if otherwise, it is set aside.

POINTS. Marks in writing and in print, to denote the stops that ought to be made in reading, and to point out the sense.

Points are not usually put in legislative acts or in deeds; Eunom. Dial. 2, § 33, p. 239; yet, in construing such acts or instruments, the courts must read them with such stops as will give effect to the whole; 4 Term, 65.

The points are—the comma, the semicolon, the colon, the full point, the point of interrogation, and the point of exclamation. Barrington, Stat. 294, n. See PUNCTUATION.

POISON. In Medical Jurisprudence. A substance having an inherent deleterious property which renders it, when taken into the system, capable of destroying life. Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 493; Tayl. Poisons.

The history of poisoning, and many remarkable early instances of a wide-spread use of poisons, are recorded in works on medical jurisprudence. See these, and also, especially, Taylor, Poisons; Archbold, Crim. Pract. Waterman's ed. 940; Wharton & Stillé, Med. Jur.; 1 Beekman, Hist. Jur. 74 et seq. The classification proposed by Mr. Taylor is as follows:—

IRRITANTS.	MINERAL	NON-METALLIC	Acids, Alkalies and their Salts. Metalloids.
		METALLIC (Arsenic).
	VEGETABLE (Savin).
	ANIMAL (Cantharides).
NARCOTICS.	CEREBRAL (Morphia).
	SPINAL (Strychnia).
	CEREBRO-SPINAL (Conia, Aconitina).
GASEOUS.

Irritant poisons, when taken in ordinary doses, occasion speedily violent vomiting and purging, preceded, accompanied, or followed by intense pain in the abdomen, commencing in the region of the stomach. The corrosive poisons, as distinguished from those in a more limited sense termed irritant, generally produce their result more speedily, and give chemical indications; but every corrosive poison acts as an irritant in the sense here adopted.

Narcotic poisons act chiefly on the brain or spinal marrow. Either immediately or some time after the poison has been swallowed, the patient suffers from headache, giddiness, paralysis, stupor, delirium, insensibility, and, in some instances, convulsions.

The effects of one class are, however, sometimes produced by the other,—more commonly as secondary, but sometimes even as primary symptoms.

The evidence of poisoning as derived from symptoms is to be looked for chiefly in the suddenness of their occurrence; this is perhaps the most reliable of all evidence derived from symptoms in cases of criminal poisoning; see Taylor, Pois. 107; Christison, Pois. 42; though none of this class of evidence can be considered as furnishing any thing better than a high degree of probability: the regularity of their increase; this feature is not universal, and exists in many diseases; uniformity in their nature; this is true in the case of comparatively few poisons; the symptoms begin soon after a meal; but sleep, the manner of administration, or certain diseases, may affect this rule in the case of some poisons; when several partake at the same time of the same poisoned food, all suffer from similar symptoms;

2 Park. C. C. 235; Taylor, Pois. 118; the symptoms first appearing while the body is in a state of perfect health; Archb. Cr. Pl. Waterman ed. 948.

Appearances which present themselves on post-mortem examinations are of importance in regard to some classes of irritant poisons; see The Hersey Case, Mass. 1861; Palmer's case, Taylor, Poisons, 697; 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 145; but many poisons leave no traces which can be so discovered.

Chemical analysis often results in important evidence, by discovering the presence of poison, which must then be accounted for; but a failure to detect it by no means proves that it has not been given. Christison, Poisons, 61, 62.

The evidence derived from circumstances differs in nothing in principle from that in case of commission of other crimes.

Homicide by poisoning is, of course, generally either accidental, so as not to amount to murder, or deliberate: yet it has been held that there may be a verdict of murder in the second degree under an indictment for poisoning; 19 Conn. 388. The doctrine of principal and accessory is also modified to some extent in its application to cases of poisoning; 2 Mood. Cr. Cas. 120; 9 C. & P. 356; 9 Co. 81. To constitute an administering of poison, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by hand; 4 C. & P. 356; 6 id. 161; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 651.

Intent to kill need not be specifically alleged in an indictment for murder by poison; 2 Stark. Cr. Pl. prec. 18; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 346; 3 Cox, C. C. 300; 8 C. & P. 418; 2 Allen, 173.

Many of the states have statutes inflicting severe penalties upon the administering of poisons with a malicious intent; see Archb. Cr. Pr. Waterman's ed. 942; 3 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 5th ed. 941, 944, 969, 975; Mich. Rev. Stat. c. 153, § 13; Mass. Gen. Stat. c. 160, § 32; Vt. Rev. Stat. 543; Wisc. Rev. Stat. c. 133, § 44, c. 144, § 39; Iowa Code, § 2728; N. J. Rev. Stat. 268; Ohio Stat. 1854 ed. c. 33, § 34.

POLE. A measure of length, equal to five yards and a half. See MEASURE.

POLICE. That species of superintendence by magistrates which has principally for its object the maintenance of public tranquillity among the citizens. The officers who are appointed for this purpose are also called the police. See 9 Cent. L. J. 353.

The word police has three significations. The first relates to the measures which are adopted to keep order, the laws and ordinances on cleanliness, health, the markets, etc. The second has for its object to procure to the authorities the means of detecting even the smallest attempts to commit crime, in order that the guilty may be arrested before their plans are carried into execution and delivered over to the justice of the country. The third comprehends the laws, ordinances, and other measures which require the citizens to exercise their rights in a particular form.

Police has also been divided into administrative police, which has for its object to maintain constantly public order in every part of the general administration; and judiciary police, which is intended principally to prevent crimes by punishing the criminals. Its object is to punish crimes which the administrative police has not been able to prevent.

POLICE JURY. In Louisiana. A name given to certain officers who collectively exercise jurisdiction in certain cases of police: as, levying taxes, regulating roads, etc.

POLICE POWER. The authority to establish, for the intercourse of the several members of the body politic with each other, those rules of good conduct and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with a corresponding enjoyment by others, is usually spoken of as the authority or power of police. This is a most comprehensive branch of sovereignty, extending as it does to every person, every public and private right, everything in the nature of property, every relation in the state, in society and in private life. Cooley, Const. 227. See also, Cooley, Const. Lim. 572; 4 Bla. Com. 162.

All property is held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the constitution, may think necessary and expedient. This is very different from the right of eminent domain, the right of a government to take and appropriate private property whenever the public exigency requires it, which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power; the power vested in the legislature to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth, and of the subjects of the same. It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its existence. Per Shaw, C. J., in 7 Cush. 84. See, also, 25 Barb. 370; 3 Bush, 597; 5 How. 583; 94 U. S. 113; 81 Penn. 80.

The exercise of this power has been left with the individual states; 11 Bush, 311; and cannot be taken from them and exercised, wholly or in part, under legislation in congress; Cooley, Const. Lim. 715; 9 Wall. 41; see, 92 U. S. 214, 542. But a state cannot, by police regulation, interfere with the control by congress over inter-state commerce; 95 U. S.

465; id. 485. All that the federal authority can do is to see that the states do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any power which the constitution has confided to the nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the federal constitution; Cooley, Const. Lim. 715; see 16 Wall. 36; 7 How. 283.

The power to establish police regulations may be conferred by the state upon municipal corporations; Cooley, Const. Lim. 148.

The rights insured to private corporations by their charters, and the manner of their exercise, are subject to such new regulations as from time to time may be made by the state with a view to the public protection, health, and safety, and in order to guard properly the rights of other individuals and corporations; but these regulations must not conflict with the charter, nor take from the corporation any of its essential rights and privileges; Cooley, Const. Lim. 718, citing 61 Mo. 24; 18 Conn. 53; 35 Wisc. 425. Thus a municipal corporation may regulate the speed of railway trains within its limits; 67 Ill. 113; 79 Penn. 33 (but only in the streets and public grounds of the municipality; 29 N. J. 170); a railroad company may be required to fence its tracks; 27 Vt. 156; a state may regulate the grade of railways and may prescribe how railways may cross each other, and apportion the expense of making the necessary crossings between the corporations owning the roads; 77 Penn. 173; 4 Allen, 198; and it may regulate the speed of trains at highway and other crossings; 72 Ill. 235; and establish regulations requiring railway companies to cause a bell to be rung or a whistle blown (67 Ind. 45) on locomotives before crossing highways at grade, and to station flagmen at dangerous crossings; 67 Ill. 37; Cooley, Const. Lim. 724; and a statute imposing a penalty on railroad conductors for failing to cause their trains to stop five minutes at every station is constitutional; 4 Tex. App. 545; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 166; and so is a statute directing the printing upon railroad tickets of any condition limiting the liability of the railroad company, in type of a specified size, and providing for the redemption by the company of tickets sold but not used; 63 Ind. 552; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 238.

Prohibitory liquor laws have been sustained as police regulations established by the legislature for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime; Cooley, Const. Lim. 727, citing 13 Gray, 26; 4 Mich. 244; 26 Conn. 179; even where a statute has provided legal process for the condemnation and destruction of liquor and the seizure and condemnation of the building in which the liquor is sold; 4 Green, Iowa, 172. The dealing in liquors even for lawful purpose may be confined to persons of approved moral character; 32 Iowa, 250.

Quarantine regulations and health laws of every description are within the police power of the state, even when they go to the extent of providing for the destruction of private property when infected with disease; Cooley, Const. Lim. 729; see 5 How. 632; 15 Wend. 397. For other exercises of this power, see COMMERCE.

A state law which grants to a corporation of that state the exclusive right for a term of years to control the slaughtering of cattle in and near one of its cities, and requires that all cattle and other animals intended for sale and slaughter in that district shall be brought to the yards and slaughter houses of the corporation, and authorizes the corporation to charge certain fees for the use of its yards, and for each animal landed or slaughtered, is constitutional, as coming within the police power of the state; 16 Wall. 36.

Proper regulations for the use of public highways and for their alteration are within the police power; Cooley, Const. Lim. 734; so is a law prohibiting beasts from running at large, under a penalty of being seized and sold; 30 Ill. 459; 4 Iowa, 296; and a law requiring the owners of urban property to construct and keep in repair sidewalks in front of it; 8 Mich. 309; 19 Ohio, 418; 4 R. I. 230, 445; 36 Barb. 226; 16 Pick. 504.

The general right to control and regulate the public use of navigable waters is unquestionably in the state, subject to the power of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the states; Cooley, Const. Lim. 737.

Laws compelling the owners of large unproductive tracts of land, which are sources of danger to health, to drain them, are also within the police power; 12 Rich. 702. A state law prescribing the maximum charges of a warehouse company is constitutional; 69 Ill. 80; 94 U. S. 113.

Regulations providing for the destruction of private property to prevent the spread of a fire, etc.; forbidding the erection of wooden buildings within the built-up parts of a city; 11 Mich. 425; 7 Cow. 352; and establishing wharf lines; 7 Cush. 53; are within the police power; Cooley, Const. Lim. 746. Cemeteries within the built-up parts of a city may be closed against further use; 5 Cow. 538; 66 Penn. 411; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 377. The keeping of gunpowder in cities or villages; 1 Gray, 27; the sale of poisonous drugs, unless labelled; allowing unmuzzled dogs to run at large; and the keeping for sale of unwholesome provisions; and carrying on offensive manufactures; 47 Barb. 64; are all subject to be forbidden under the police power; Cooley, Const. Lim. 748. But a law prohibiting the bringing of Texas cattle into a state, has been held to conflict with the power of congress to regulate commerce; 95 U. S. 585.

Regulations tending to preserve public morals, for instance, by forbidding the sale of indecent books, are within the power of a state; see 8 Gray, 488; 38 N. H. 426. The keeping of swine within the thickly populated portions of a city; 97 Mass. 221; or of a slaughter house; 109 Mass. 315; or carrying on any other business injurious to the public; 35 Wisc. 298; may be prohibited. Markets may be regulated; weights and measures established; 13 Iowa, 210; 56 Barb. 392; and certain persons, such as auctioneers etc., may be required to take out licenses and conform to such rules and regulations as are deemed important for the public convenience and protection; 38 Wisc. 428; s. c. 20 Am. Rep. 12; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 291–296. Laws may be passed regulating the hours of labor of women and children in factories; 120 Mass. 383.

"Whether the prohibited act or omission shall be made a criminal offence, punishable under the general laws, or subject to punishment under municipal by-laws, or, on the other hand, the party be deprived of all remedy for any right which, but for the regulation, he might have had against other persons, are questions which the legislature must decide." Cooley, Const. Lim. 750.

Other cases may be added. A statute exempting one dog to each family and taxing all others at a fixed rate is constitutional; 3 Tex. App. 489; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 152; a state may provide by contract that certain persons shall have exclusive privileges—as that to supply the common schools of the state with text-books of a specified character and price; 5 Sawy. 502.

This subject is treated with great learning and fulness by Judge Cooley in his admirable and learned work on Constitutional Limitation. See, also, Cooley's Constitutional Law, and an article by Mr. Wade in 6 So. L. Rev. N. s. 59.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE, COURT OF. A court established in pursuance of the statutes 43 Eliz. c. 12, and 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 23. Composed of the judge of the admiralty, the recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight merchants; any three of whom, one being a civilian or a barrister, could determine in a summary way causes concerning policies of assurance in London, with an appeal to chancery. No longer in existence. 3 Bla. Com. 74.

POLICY. In Insurance. The instrument whereby insurance is made by an underwriter in favor of an assured, expressed, implied, or intended, against some risk, peril, or contingency in reference to some subject. It is usually either marine, or against fire, or on a life.

It must show expressly, or by implication, in whose favor it is made. It may be upon a valuable property, interest, or contingency, or be a gaming or wagering policy on a subject in which the assured has no interest, or against risks in respect to which the assured has no interest except what arises from the contract itself. A wagering policy is valid or not, according as a wager is or is not recognized as a valid contract by the lex loci.

An interest policy is one where the insured has a real, substantial, assignable interest in the thing insured.

An open policy is one on which the value is to be proved by the assured. 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 4, 6, 7, 27, 439, 948, 1178. By an "open policy" is also sometimes meant, in the United States, one in which an aggregate amount is expressed in the body of the policy, and the specific amounts and subjects are to be indorsed from time to time; 12 La. An. 259; 19 N. Y. 305; 6 Gray, 214.

A valued policy is one where a value has been set on the ships or goods insured, and this value inserted in the policy in the nature of liquidated damages. In such a policy the value of the subject is expressly agreed, or is, as between the parties, the amount insured. Under an open policy, in case of loss, the insured must prove the true value of the property, while under a valued policy, the sum agreed upon is conclusive, except in case of fraud: 3 Camp. 319; 15 Mass. 341; 48 Penn. 372; May, Ins. § 30.

A wager policy is a pretended insurance, founded on an ideal risk, where the insured has no interest in the thing insured, and can therefore sustain no loss by the happening of any of the misfortunes insured against. These policies are strongly reprobated; 3 Kent, 225.

Records and documents expressly referred to in the policy are in effect, for the purpose of the reference, a part of the contract; 22 Conn. 235; 37 Me. 137; 20 Barb. 468; 23 Penn. 50; 23 E. L. & E. 514; 33 N. H. 203; 10 Cush. 337; 70 N. Y. 72; May, Ins. § 158. A policy may take effect on actual or constructive delivery; 1 Phill. Ins. ch. xi. sect. i.; 25 Ind. 537; 27 Penn. 268; 42 Me. 259; 25 Conn. 207; 5 Gray, 52; and may be retrospective, provided there is no concealment or misrepresentation by either party; Phill. Ins. § 925; 2 Dutch. 268; s. c. 3 id. 645.

Every policy, whether marine, against fire, or on life, specifies or imports parties, and specifies the subject or interest intended to be insured, the premium or other consideration, the amount insured, the risks and perils for which indemnity is stipulated, and the period of the risk or the terminus a quo and ad quem. The subject-matter is usually more minutely described in a separate paper—called an application. May, Ins. § 29.

The duration of the risk, under a marine insurance or one on inland navigation, is either from one geographical terminus to another, called a "Voyage Policy," or from a specified time, called a "Time Policy;" that of a fire-policy is for a specified time; one on life is either for life or a term of years, months, etc. It is a leading principle, as to the construction of a policy of insurance, that its distinguishing character as a contract of indemnity is to be favored; which is in conformity with the common maxim, ut res valeat magis quam pereat; 8 N. Y. 351; 18 id.

385; 8 Cush. 393; 10 id. 356; 17 Penn. 253; 23 id. 262; 32 id. 381; 29 E. L. & E. 111, 215; 33 id. 514; 2 Du. N. Y. 419, 554; 5 id. 517, 594; 14 Barb. 383; 20 id. 635; 16 Mo. 98; 22 id. 82; 22 Conn. 235; 13 B. Monr. 311; 16 id. 242; 3 Ind. 23; 11 id. 171; 28 N. H. 234; 29 id. 182; 2 Curt. C. C. 322, 610; 37 Me. 137; 4 Zabr. 447; 18 Ill. 553; 4 R. I. 159; 5 id. 426; see May, Ins. § 7; 94 U. S. 457.

In marine insurance the contract has necessarily more implied reference to customs and usages than most other contracts; or, in other words, a larger proportion of the stipulations are not specifically expressed in the instrument; 1 Phill. Ins. § 119; whence it has been thought to be an imperfect, obscure, confused instrument; 1 Phill. Ins. § 6, n. 3; 1 East, 579; 5 Cra. 342; 1 Burr. 347. But the difficulty in giving it a practical construction seems to arise more from the complication of the circumstances necessarily involved than from any remediable defects in its provisions and phraseology. New provisions are, however, needed, from time to time, to adapt the contract to new circumstances. A mistake in filling up a policy may be corrected by order of a court of equity; 5 B. & P. 322; 1 Wash. C. C. 415; 1 Ves. Sen. 317, 456; 2 Cra. 441; 2 Johns. 330; 1 Ark. 545; 1 Paige, Ch. 278; 2 Curt. C. C. 277. A marine policy is assignable without the consent of the insurers; May, Ins. § 377; while a fire policy is not; 16 Wend. 385; 2 Pet. 25; 4 Bro. P. C. 431; 18 Iowa, 319; 9 L. T. N. S. 688; 4 Term, 340. The better opinion seems to be that an out-standing and valid life policy is assignable without the insurer's consent, provided the sale is bona fide and not a device to evade the law; 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 83; 13 N. Y. 31; 29 Ind. 236; 98 Mass. 381; 26 Penn. 189; but see, contra, 41 Ind. 116.

See ABANDONMENT; AVERAGE; INSURABLE INTEREST; INSURANCE; SALVAGE; LOSS; TOTAL LOSS.

POLITICAL. Pertaining to policy, or the administration of the government. Political rights are those which may be exercised in the formation and administration of the government: they are distinguished from civil rights, which are the rights which a man enjoys as regards other individuals, and not in relation to the government. A political corporation is one which has principally for its object the administration of the government, or to which the powers of government, or a part of such powers, have been delegated. 1 Bouvier, Inst. nn. 182, 197, 198.

POLL. A head. Hence poll-tax is the name of a tax imposed upon the people at so much a head.

To poll a jury is to require that each juror shall himself declare what is his verdict. This may be done, at the instance of either party, at any time before the verdict is recorded, according to the practice in some states. See 3 Cow. 23; 18 Johns. 188; 1 Ill. 109; 7 id. 342; 9 id. 336. In some states it lies in the discretion of the judge; 1 M'Cord, 24, 525; 22 Ga. 431.

In Conveyancing. A deed-poll, or single deed, is one made by a single party, whose edges are polled, or shaved even, in distinction from an indenture, whose sides are indented, and which is executed by more than one party. 2 Bla. Com. 296. See DEED POLL.

POLL-TAX. A capitation tax; a tax assessed on every head, i. e. on every male of a certain age, etc., according to statute. Mass. Gen. Stat. 74, 75; Webster, Dict.; Wharton, Dict. 2d Lond. ed.

POLLICITATION. In Civil Law. An offer not yet accepted by the person to whom it is made. Langd. Contr. § 1.

It differs from a contract, inasmuch as the latter includes a concurrence of intention in two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who accepts, on his part, of such promise. Grotius, l. 2, c. 2: Pothier, Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 1, § 2.

POLLS. The place where electors cast in their votes.

POLYANDRY. The state of a woman who has several husbands.

Polyandry is legalized only in Thibet. It is inconsistent with the law of nature. See LAW OF NATURE.

POLYGAMY. The act or state of a person who, knowing that he has two or more wives, or that she has two or more husbands, marries another.

It differs from bigamy, which see. Comyns, Dig. Justices (S 5); Dict. de Jur.; Co. 3d Inst. 88. But bigamy is now commonly used even where polygamy would be strictly correct; 1 Russ. Cr. 186, n. On the other hand, polygamy is used where bigamy would be strictly correct; Mass. Gen. Stat. 1860, p. 817.

Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries another, whether married or single, in a territory or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of bigamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; R. S. § 5352; 103 U. S. 304.

POLYGARCHY. A term used to express a government which is shared by several persons; as, when two brothers succeed to the throne and reign jointly.

POND. A body of stagnant water; a pool. But see Call. Sew. 103.

Any one has a right to erect a fish-pond; the fish in it are considered as real estate, and pass to the heir, and not to the executor. Ow. 20. Where land bounding on a lake or pond is conveyed, the grant extends only to the water's edge if it is a natural pond (some cases say to low-water mark; 13 Pick. 261); but to the middle of the stream if it is artificial; Ang. Water Courses, § 41; see 3 Washb. R. P. 416.

PONE. (Lat. ponere, to put). In English Practice. An original writ issuing out of chancery, for the purpose of removing a plaint from an inferior court into the superior courts at Westminster. The word signifies "put:" put by gages, etc. The writ is called from the words it contained when in Latin, Pone per vadium et salvos plegios, etc.: put by gage and safe pledges, etc. See Fitzh. N. B. 69, 70 a; Wilkinson, Repl. Index.

The writ of certiorari is now used in its place.

PONENDIS IN ASSISIS. An old writ directing a sheriff to empanel a jury for an assize or real action. Moz. & W. Law Dic.; Whart. Law Lex.

PONENDUM IN BAILLIUM. A writ commanding that a prisoner be bailed in cases bailable; Whart. Law Lex.; Moz. & W. Law Dic.

PONENDUM SIGILLUM. A writ requiring justices to put their seals to exceptions, according to Stat. West. 2, 13 Ed. I. c. 31; Whart. Law Lex.; Moz. & W. Law Dic.

PONERE (Lat.). To put. The word is used in the old law in various connections, in all of which it can be translated by the English verb "put." See Glanville, lib. 2, c. 3.

PONIT SE (Lat. puts himself). In English Criminal Practice. When the defendant pleads "not guilty," his plea is recorded by the officer of the court, either by writing the words "po. se," an abbreviation of the words ponit se super patriam (puts himself upon his country), or, as at the central criminal court, non cul. 2 Den. C. C. 392. See ARRAIGNMENT.

PONTAGE. A contribution towards the maintenance, rebuilding, or repairs of a bridge. The toll taken for this purpose also bears this name. Obsolete. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 1, § 16.

PONTIBUS REPARANDIS. An old writ directed to the sheriff commanding him to charge one or more to repair a bridge. Cow. Inst.; Reg. Orig. fol. 153.

POOL. A small lake of standing water.

By the grant of a pool, it is said, both the land and water will pass; Co. Litt. 5. Undoubtedly the right to fish, and probably the right to use hydraulic works, will be acquired by such grant; 2 N. H. 259; Co. Litt. 5; Bacon, Abr. Grants (H 3); Comyns, Dig. Grant (E 5); 5 Cow. 216; Cro. Jac. 150; 1 Lev. 44; Pl. 161; Vaugh. 103.

POOR DEBTORS. By the constitutions of the several states and territories, or by the laws which exist for the relief of poor debtors, it is provided in general terms that there shall be no imprisonment for debt. But this is usually qualified by provisions for the arrest of debtors in certain enumerated cases of fraud. The statutes in the different states are very similar, and as a rule, require the creditor to make affidavit that the debtor is about to remove some of his property out of the jurisdiction of the court with intent to defraud his creditors, or that, for the same reason, he is about to or has disposed of his property, or that he is fraudulently concealing it; or that the debt, concerning which suit is brought, was fraudulently contracted. Such in general is the law in the following states and territories:—

Alabama, Const. art. 1, § 21; Arizona, Bill of Rights, § 18, and Comp. Laws, §§ 2508–9; Arkansas, Const. art. 1, § 14; California, Codes & Stats. § 10479; Dakota, Rev. Code, p. 536, § 149; Florida, Decl. Rights, § 13; Idaho, 2 Sess. L. p. 93; Illinois, Const. art. ii. § 12; Indiana, Rev. Stats. 1876, pp. 636–637; Iowa, Const. art. 1, § 19; Kansas, Comp. Laws, §§ 3675–6; Kentucky, Code, Pr. tit. 8, ch. 1; Maine, Rev. Stats. p. 792, § 2; Massachusetts, Gen. Stats. 124, § 5; Michigan, Comp. Laws, § 7177; Nebraska, Rev. Stats. p. 417, § 418; Nevada, Const. art. 1, § 14; New Hampshire, Gen. Laws, 522–3; New Jersey, Rev. Stats. (1877) p. 857, § 58; North Carolina, Const. art. 1, § 16; Ohio, Rev. Stats. §§ 5491–2–3; Oregon, Const. art. 1, No. 19; Pennsylvania, Pur. Dig. p. 49, §§ 51–53; Rhode Island, Gen. Stats. ch. 195; South Carolina, Civil C. Proced. § 119; Utah, Comp. Laws, 582, § 75; Vermont, Rev. Laws, 1476–1491; Virginia, Code, pp. 1016–1017; Washington, Gen. Stats. 1877, § 116; West Virginia, Code, ch. 106, § 37; Wisconsin, Rev. Stats. ch. 122, § 2689.

It may be stated generally, that the object of such statutes as exist in the states above mentioned is to induce the defendant to pay the debt, give security, or take advantage of the insolvent laws or of some enactments made especially for the relief of poor debtors. It follows therefore that in most of the states a person under arrest for debt may obtain his release in any of these ways. A poor debtor is of course usually compelled to resort to one of the two last mentioned, and, although the proceedings differ in the different states, yet as a rule he is released upon delivering his property to a trustee or taking oath that he has not more than ten or twenty dollars above the amount exempted by statute in the particular state in which he is confined; Rev. Stat. Illinois (1880), p. 601, §§ 1–35; Rev. Stat. Maine, p. 793, § 6; Public Stats. Massachusetts, p. 892, § 82; Genl. Laws New Hampshire, ch. 241; Rev. Stats. New Jersey, p. 497; Genl. Laws Oregon, pp. 627–628; Pennsylvania, Pur. Dig. p. 52, § 62; Rev. Stats. South Carolina, p. 690, §§ 9–35; Rev. Laws Vermont, §§ 1514–1528; Code of Virginia, p. 1017; Rev. Stats. Wisconsin, §§ 4307–4320.

In a few states the rule that there shall be no imprisonment for an ordinary contract debt is strictly adhered to; see Genl. Laws Colorado, p. 506; Rev. Stats. District Columbia, § 791; Code of Georgia, § 5010; Const. Maryland, art. 3, § 38; Const. Minnesota, art. 1, § 12; Const. Mississippi, art. 1, § 11; Const. Missouri, art. 2, § 16; Const. Ten- nessee, art. 1, § 18; Const. Texas, art. 1, § 15; Comp. Laws Wyoming, p. 429, § 196; and in others female debtors are not subject to arrest; see e. g. North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Dakota T., New Jersey.

POOR LAW BOARD. A government board appointed by statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 109, to take the place of poor law commissioners, who had general management of the poor and the funds for their relief. The poor law board is now superseded by the local government board, established under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 70; 3 Steph. Com. 49; Moz. & W.

POOR RATE. A rate levied by church authorities for the relief of the poor.

POPE. The bishop of Rome and head of the Roman Catholic church. He is elected by certain officers called cardinals, and remains in power during life. In the 9th Collation of the Authentics it is declared the bishop of Rome hath the first place of sitting in all assemblies, and the bishop of Constantinople the second. Ridley, Civ. & Eccl. Law, pt. 1, c. 3, § 10.

POPULAR ACTION. An action given by statute to any one who will sue for the penalty. A qui tam action. Dig. 47. 23. 1.

POPULISCITUM (Lat.). An act of the commons; same as plebiscitum. Ainsworth, Dict.

A law passed by the whole people assembled in comitia centuriata, and at the proposal of one of the senate, instead of a tribune, as was the case with a plebiscitum. Taylor, Civ. Law, 178; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, §§ 26, 37.

PORT. A place to which the officers of the customs are appropriated, and which includes the privileges and guidance of all members and creeks which are allotted to them. 1 Chitty, Com. Law, 726; Postlewaith, Com. Dict. According to Dalloz, a port is a place within land, protected against the waves and winds and affording to vessels a place of safety. By the Roman law a port is defined to be locus conclusus, quo importantur merces et unde exportantur. Dig. 50. 16. 59. See 7 Mart. La. N. S. 81.

A port differs from a haven, and includes something more. First, it is a place at which vessels may arrive and discharge or take in their cargoes. Second, it comprehends a ville, city, or borough, called in Latin caput corpus, for the reception of mariners and merchants, for securing the goods and bringing them to market, and for victualling the ships. Third, it is impressed with its legal character by the civil authority. Hale, de Portibus Mar. c. 2; 1 Hargrave, Tracts, 46, 73; Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 5); Comyns, Dig. Navigation (E); Co. 4th Inst. 148; Callis, Sewers, 56; 2 Chitty, Com. Law, 2; Dig. 50. 16. 59; 43. 12. 1. 13; 47. 10. 15. 7; 39. 4. 15.

PORT OF DELIVERY. This is sometimes used to distinguish the port of unlading or destination, from any port at which the vessel touches for other purposes. 2 Mas. 319.

PORT OF DESTINATION. As used in a time policy, the phrase has been held to mean any foreign port to which the vessel may be destined during the voyage, as well as her home port, and to include any usual stopping place for lading or unlading cargoes. 12 Gray, 501.

PORT OF DISCHARGE. The place where the substantial part of the cargo is discharged has been held to be such, although done with the intent to complete the discharge at another basin. 104 Mass. 510. Some cargo must be discharged to make the port of destination the port of discharge; 5 Mas. 414. See, further, 2 Cliff. 4; 1 Sprague, 485; 18 Law Rep. 94.

PORT TOLL. The toll paid for bringing goods into a port.

PORTATICA. (L. Lat.). In English Law. The generic name for port duties charged to ships. Hargr. Law Tracts, 64.

PORTER. The name of an ancient English officer who bore or carried a rod before the justices. The door-keeper of the English parliament also bears this name.

One who is employed as a common carrier to carry goods from one place to another in the same town is also called a porter. Such person is, in general, answerable as a common carrier. Story, Bailm. § 496.

PORTGREVE (from Sax. gerefa, reeve or bailiff, and port). A chief magistrate in certain maritime towns. The chief magistrate of London was anciently so called, as appears from a charter of king William I. Instead of this portgreve of London, the succeeding king appointed two bailiffs, and afterwards a mayor. Camden, Hist. 325.

PORTION. That part of a parent's estate, or the estate of one standing in loco parentis, which is given to a child. 1 Vern. 204. See 8 Comyns, Dig. 539; 16 Viner, Abr. 432; 1 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 34, 58, 303, 308; 2 id. 46, 370, 404.

PORTORIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Duties paid in ports on merchandise. Code, 4. 61. 3. Taxes levied in old times at city gates. Tolls for passing over bridges. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Spelman, Gloss.

PORTSALES. Auctions were anciently so called, because they took place in ports.

POSITIVE. Express; absolute; not doubtful. This word is frequently used in composition.

POSITIVE CONDITION. One in which the thing which is the subject of it must happen: as, if I marry. It is opposed to a negative condition, which is where the thing which is the subject of it must not happen: as, if I do not marry.

POSITIVE EVIDENCE is that which, if believed, establishes the truth or falsehood of a fact in issue, and does not arise from any presumption. It is distinguished from circumstantial evidence. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3057.

POSITIVE FRAUD is the intentional and successful employment of any cunning, deception, or artifice, to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 186; Dig. 4. 3. 1. 2; Dig. 2. 14. 7. 9. It is cited in opposition to constructive fraud.

POSITIVE LAW. Law actually ordained or established, under human sanctions, as distinguished from the law of nature or natural law, which comprises those considerations of justice, right, and universal expediency that are announced by the voice of reason or of revelation. Municipal law is chiefly, if not essentially, positive; while the law of nations has been deemed by many of the earlier writers as merely an application of the law of nature. That part of the law of nations which rests on positive law may be considered in a threefold point of view:—first, the universal voluntary law, or those rules which become law by the uniform practice of nations in general, and by the manifest utility of the rules themselves; second, the customary law, or that which, from motives of convenience, has, by tacit but implied agreement, prevailed, not necessarily among all nations, nor with so permanent a utility as to become a portion of the universal voluntary law, but enough to have acquired a prescriptive obligation among certain states so situated as to be mutually benefited by it; 1 Taunt. 241; third, the conventional law, or that which is agreed between particular states by express treaty, a law binding on the parties among whom such treaties are in force. 1 Chitty, Com. Law, 28.

POSSE. This word is used substantively to signify a possibility. For example, such a thing is in posse, that is, such a thing may possibly be. When the thing is in being, the phrase to express it is, in esse.

POSSE COMITATUS (Lat.). The power of the county.

The sheriff, or other peace officer, has authority by the common law, while acting under the authority of the writ of the United States, commonwealth, or people, as the case may be, and for the purpose of preserving the public peace, to call to his aid the posse comitatus.

But with respect to writs which issue in the first instance to arrest in civil suits, the sheriff is not bound to take the posse comitatus to assist him in the execution of them; though he may, if he pleases, on forcied resistance to the execution of the process; Co. 2d Inst. 193; Co. 3d Inst. 161.

Having the authority to call in the assistance of all, he may equally require that of any individual; but to this general rule there are some exceptions; persons of infirm health, or who want understanding, minors under the age of fifteen years, women, and perhaps some others, it seems, cannot be required to assist the sheriff, and are, therefore, not considered as a part of the power of the county; Viner, Abr. Sheriff, B.

A refusal on the part of an individual lawfully called upon to assist the officer in putting down a riot is indictable; 1 Carr. & M. 314. In this case will be found the form of an indictment for this offence.

Although the sheriff is acting without authority, yet it would seem that any person who obeys his command, unless aware of that fact, will be protected.

Whether an individual not enjoined by the sheriff to lend his aid would be protected in his interference, seems questionable. In a case where the defendant assisted sheriff's officers in executing a writ of replevin without their solicitation, the court held him justified in so doing; 2 Mod. 244. See Bacon, Abr. Sheriff (N); Hamm. N. P. 63; 5 Whart. 437, 440.

POSSESSED. This word is applied to the right and enjoyment of a termor, or a person having a term, who is said to be possessed, and not seized. Bac. Tr. 335; Poph. 76; Dy. 369.

POSSESSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The detention of a thing: divided into—first, natural, or the naked detention of a thing, without intention to acquire ownership; second, civil, or the detention of a thing to which one has a right, or with intention of acquiring ownership. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1288; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, §§ 210, 213.

In Old English Law. Possession; seisin. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; 2 Bla. Com. 227; Bracton, lib. 2, c. 17; Cowel, Possession. But seisina cannot be of an estate less than freehold; possessio can. New England Sheriff, 141; 1 Metc. Mass. 450; 6 id. 439.

POSSESSIO FRATRIS (Lat. the brother's possession). A technical phrase applied in the English law relating to descents, to denote the possession by one in such privity with a person as to be considered the person's own possession.

By the common law, the ancestor from whom the inheritance was taken by descent must have had actual seisin of the lands, either by his own entry, or by the possession of his own or his ancestor's lessee for years, or by being in the receipt of rent from the lessee of the freehold. But there are qualifications as to this rule, one of which arises from the doctrine of possessio fratris. The possession of a tenant for years, guardian, or brother, is equivalent to that of the party himself, and is termed in law possessio fratris; Littleton, sect. 8; Co. Litt. 15 a; 3 Wills. 516; 7 Term, 386.

In Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Virginia, and probably in other states, the real and personal estates of intestates are distributed among the heirs without any reference or regard to the actual seisin of the ancestor. Reeve, Desc. 377–379; 4 Mass. 467; 3 Day, 166; 2 Pet. 59. In Maryland, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Vermont, the doctrine of possessio fratris, it seems, still exists; 2 Pet. 625; Reeve, Desc. 377; 4 Kent, 384, 385.

POSSESSION. The detention or enjoyment of a thing which a man holds or exercises by himself, or by another who keeps or exercises it in his name.

By the possession of a thing we always conceive the condition in which not only one's own dealing with the thing is physically possible, but every other person's dealing with it is capable of being excluded. Thus, the seaman possesses his ship, but not the water in which it moves, although he makes each subserve his purpose.

Actual possession exists where the thing is in the immediate occupancy of the party. 3 Dev. 34.

Constructive possession is that which exists in contemplation of law, without actual personal occupation. 11 Vt. 129. And see 1 McLean, 214, 265; 2 Bla. Com. 116.

In order to complete a possession, two things are required: that there be an occupancy, apprehension, or taking; that the taking be with an intent to possess (animus possidendi): hence persons who have no legal wills, as children and idiots, cannot possess or acquire possession; Pothier; Etienne. See 1 Mer. 358; Abbott, Shipp. 9. But an infant of sufficient understanding may lawfully acquire the possession of a thing.

The failure to take possession is considered a badge of fraud, in the transfer of personal property. See SALE; MORTGAGE.

As to the effects of the purchaser's taking possession, see Sugd. Vend. 8, 9; 3 P. Wms. 193; 1 Ves. 226; 11 id. 464; 12 id. 27. Eliz. 777; 5 Co. 13; 7 Johns. 1.

In Louisiana. Civil possession exists when a person ceases to reside in a house or on the land which he occupied, or to detain the movable which he possessed, but without intending to abandon the possession. It is the detention of a thing by virtue of a just title and under the conviction of possessing as owner. La. Civ. Code, art. 3392, 3394.

Natural possession is that by which a man detains a thing corporeal: as, by occupying a house, cultivating ground, or retaining a movable in his possession. Natural possession is also defined to be the corporeal detention of a thing which we possess as belonging to us, without any title to that possession, or with a title which is void. La. Civ. Code, art. 3391, 3393.

Possession applies properly only to corporeal things, movables and immovables. The possession of incorporeal rights, such as servitudes and other rights of that nature, is only a quasi-possession, and is exercised by a species of possession of which these rights are susceptible. Id. art. 3395.

Possession may be enjoyed by the proprietor of the thing or by another for him: thus, the proprietor of a house possesses it by his tenant or farmer.

To acquire possession of a property, two things are requisite: the intention of possessing as owner; the corporeal possession of the thing. Id. art. 3399.

Possession is lost with or without the consent of the possessor. It is lost with his consent—when he transfers this possession to another with the intention to divest himself of it; when he does some act which manifests his intention of abandoning possession: as, when a man throws into the street furniture or clothes of which he no longer chooses to make use. Id. art. 3411. A possessor of an estate loses the possession against his consent—when another expels him from it, whether by force in driving him away, or by usurping possession during his absence, and preventing him from re-entering; when the possessor of an estate allows it to be usurped and held for a year, without during that time having done any act of possession or interfered with the usurper's possession. Id. art. 3412.

POSSESSION MONEY. An allowance to one put in possession of goods taken under writ of fieri facias. Holthouse, Dict.

POSSESSOR. He who holds, detains, or enjoys a thing, either by himself or his agent, which he claims as his own.

In general, the possessor of personal chattels is presumed to be the owner; and in case of real estate he has a right to receive the profits until a title adverse to his possession has been established, leaving him subject to an action for the mesne profits.

POSSESSORY ACTION. In Old English Law. A real action, in which the plaintiff, called the demandant, sought to recover the possession of land, tenements, and hereditaments. On account of the great nicety required in its management, and the introduction of more expeditious methods of trying titles by other actions, it has been laid aside. Finch, Laws, 257; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2640.

In admiralty law the term is still in use; see PETITIONS.

In Louisiana. An action by which one claims to be maintained in the possession of an immovable property, or of a right upon or growing out of it, when he has been disturbed; or to be reinstated to that possession, when he has been divested or evicted. 2 La. 227, 254.

In Scotch Law. An action by which the possession of heritable or movable property may be recovered and tried. An action of molestation is one of them. Paterson, Comp. § 1058, n.

POSSIBILITY. An uncertain thing which may happen. Lilly, Reg. A contingent interest in real or personal estate. 1 Madd. 549.

Possibilities are near, as when an estate is limited to one after the death of another; or remote, as that one man shall be married to a woman, and then that she shall die and he be married to another. 1 Fonbl. Eq. n. e; Viner, Abr.; 2 Co. 51 a.

Possibilities are also divided into—a possibility coupled with an interest. This may, of course, be sold, assigned, transmitted, or devised. Such a possibility occurs in executory devises, and in contingent, springing, or executory uses.

A bare possibility, or hope of succession. This is the case of an heir apparent during the life of his ancestor. It is evident that he has no right which he can assign, devise, or even release.

A possibility or mere contingent interest: as, a devise to Paul if he survive Peter. Dane, Abr. c. 1, a 5, § 2, and the cases there cited.

POST (Lat.). After. When two or more alienations or descents have taken place between an original intruder and the tenant or defendant in a writ of entry, the writ is said to be in the post, because it states that the tenant had not entry unless after the ouster of the original intruder. 3 Bla. Com. 182. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

POST-DATE. To date an instrument a time after that on which it is made. See DATE.

POST DIEM (Lat.). After the day; as, a plea of payment post diem, after the day when the money became due. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 W 29).

POST DISSEISIN. In English Law. The name of a writ which lies for him who, having recovered lands and tenements by force of a novel disseisin, is again disseised by a former disseisor. Jacob, Law Dict.

POST ENTRY. In Maritime Law. An entry made by a merchant upon the importation of goods, after the goods have been weighed, measured, or gauged, to make up the deficiency of the original or prime entry. The custom of making such entries has arisen from the fact that a merchant in making the entry at the time of importation is not or may not be able to calculate exactly the duties which he is liable to pay: he therefore makes an approximately correct entry, which he subsequently corrects by the post entry. See Chitty, Com. Law, 746.

POST FACTO (Lat.). After the fact. See EX POST FACTO.

POST LIMINIUM (Lat. from post, after, and limen, threshold). A fiction of civil law, by which persons or things taken by the enemy were restored to their former state on coming again under the power of the nation to which they formerly belonged. Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Kent, 108*. It is also recognized by the law of nations. But movables are not entitled to the benefit of this rule, by strict law of nations, unless promptly recaptured. The rule does not affect property which is brought into a neutral territory; 1 Kent, 108. It is so called from the return of the person or thing over the threshold or boundary of the country from which it was taken.

POST LITEM MOTAM (Lat.). After the commencement of the suit.

Declarations or acts of the parties made post litem motam are presumed to be made with reference to the suit then pending, and, for this reason, are not evidence in favor of the persons making them; while those made before an action has been commenced, in some cases, as when a pedigree is to be proved, may be considered as evidence; 4 Camp. 401.

POST-MARK. A stamp or mark put on letters in the post-office.

Post-marks are evidence of a letter's having passed through the post-office; 2 Camp. 620; 2 B. & P. 316; 15 East, 416; 1 Maule & S. 201; 15 Conn. 206.

POST MORTEM (Lat.). After death: as, an examination post mortem is an examination made of a dead body to ascertain the cause of death; an inquisition post mortem is one made by the coroner.

It is the duty of the coroner, after death by violence, to cause a post mortem examination to be made by a competent medical authority. A physician thus employed may, at common law, maintain an action against the county for trouble and labor expended in such examination; Gibson, C. J., in 4 Penn. 269.

POST-NATUS (Lat.). Literally, after born; it is used by the old law writers to designate the second son. See PUISNE; POST-NATI.

POST NOTES. A species of bank-notes payable at a distant period, and not on demand. 2 W. & S. 463. A kind of bank-notes intended to be transmitted at a distance by post. See 24 Me. 36.

POST-NUPTIAL. Something which takes place after marriage: as, a post-nuptial settlement, which is a conveyance made generally by the husband for the benefit of the wife.

A post-nuptial settlement is either with or without consideration. The former is valid even against creditors, when in other respects it is untainted with fraud; 4 Mas. 443; 2 Bail. 477. The latter, when made without consideration, if bona fide, and the husband be not involved at the time, and it be not disproportionate to his means, taking his debts and situation into consideration, is valid; 4 Mas. 443. See 4 Dall. 304; SETTLEMENT; VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE.

POST OBIT (Lat.). An agreement by which the obligor borrows a certain sum of money and promises to pay a larger sum, exceeding the lawful rate of interest, upon the death of a person from whom he has some expectation, if the obliger be then living. 7 Mass. 119; 6 Madd. 111; 5 Ves. 57; 19 id. 628.

Equity will, in general, relieve a party from these unequal contracts, as they are fraudulent on the ancestor. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 342; 2 P. Wms. 182; 2 Sim. 183, 192; 5 id. 524. But relief will be granted only on equitable terms; for he who seeks equity must do equity; 1 Fonbl. Ex. b. 1, c. 2, § 13, note p.; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 344. It has been held that the repeal of the usury laws in England has not altered the doctrine by which the court of chancery affords relief against improvident and extravagant bargains; L. R. 8 Ch. 484. In some of the United States the usurious excess above the lawful rate alone is void; 8 Phila. 84; Bisph. Eq. § 222. See CATCHING BARGAIN; MACEDONIAN DECREE.

The constitution has vested in congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads. Art. 1, § 8, n. 7. By virtue of this authority, several acts have been passed, the more important of which are those of March 3, 1825, 4 U. S. Stat. at Large, 102; July 2, 1836, 5 U. S. Stat. at Large, 84; March 3, 1851, 9 U. S. Stat. at Large, 598; March 3, 1853, 11 U. S. Stat. at Large, 255; March 3, 1863, June 8, 1872; R. S. 3829. Such existing roads as are adopted for the purpose are selected by congress as post-roads; and new ones are seldom constructed, though they have been made by express authority; Story, Const. § 1133.

POSTAGE. The money charged by law for carrying letters, packets, and documents by mail.

The rates of postage between places in the United States are fixed expressly by law; the rates of postage upon foreign letters are fixed by arrangements entered into by the postmaster-general, in pursuance of authority vested in him by congress for that purpose.

All mailable matter is divided into three classes: letters, embracing all correspondence wholly or partly in writing, except that mentioned in the third class; regular printed matter, embracing all mailable matter exclusively in print and regularly issued at stated periods, without addition by writing, mark, or sign; see 12 How. 284; 4 Opin. Atty.-Genl. 10; miscellaneous matter, embracing all other matter which is or may hereafter be by law declared mailable, including pamphlets, occasional publications, books, book-manuscripts, and proof-sheets, whether corrected or not, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, flexible patterns, samples and sample cards, phonographic paper, letter envelopes, postal envelopes or wrappers, cards, paper, plain or ornamental, photographic representations of different types, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, and scions.

The rate of postage on all domestic mailable matter, wholly or partially in writing, or so marked as to convey any other or further intelligence or information than is conveyed in the original print, in the case of printed matter, or which is sent in violation of law or regulations of the department touching the inclosure of matter which may be sent at less than letter rates, and on all matter introduced into the mails not otherwise provided for, excepting manuscript and corrected proof passing between authors and publishers, and memorandums of the expiration of subscriptions, receipts and bills for subscription, inclosed with or printed on regular publications by the publishers, is three cents for a half-ounce or less, avoirdupois, and three cents additional for each additional half-ounce or fraction.

The postage on all letters not transmitted through the mails but delivered through the post-office or by its carriers, is two cents for a half-ounce or less, and an additional rate for each additional half-ounce or fraction thereof.

The following mailable matter is subject to the rate of one cent for every two ounces, or fractional part thereof, and one cent for each additional two ounces or fractional part thereof, to wit: Books (printed and blank), transient newspapers and periodicals, circulars, and other matter wholly in print, proof-sheets and corrected proof-sheets and manuscript copy accompanying the same, prices-current, with prices filled out in writing, printed commercial paper filled out in writing (provided such writing is not in the nature of personal correspondence), such as papers of legal procedure, deeds of all kinds, way-bills, bills of lading, invoices, insurance policies and the various documents of insurance companies, handbills, posters, chromo-lithographs, engravings, envelopes with printing thereon, heliotypes, lithographs, photographic and stereoscopic views with title written thereon, printed blanks, and printed cards.

The following mailable matter is at the rate of one cent for each ounce or fractional part thereof, to wit: Blank cards, cardboard, and other flexible material, flexible patterns, letter envelopes and letter paper without printing thereon, merchandise models, ornamented paper, sample cards, samples of ores, metals, minerals, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, drawings, plans, designs, original paintings in oil or water colors, and any other matter not included in the first, second, or third classes, and which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail-bag, or harm the person of any one engaged in the postal service. R. S. § 3896.

The postmaster-general is authorized and directed to furnish and issue to the public, with postage stamps impressed upon them, "postal-cards," which cards shall be used as a means of postal intercourse, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the postmaster-general, and when so used shall be transmitted through the mails at a postage charge of one cent each. R. S. § 3916.

It is lawful to transmit through the mail free of postage, any letters, packages, or other matters, relating exclusively to the business of the government of the United States, provided that every such letter or package, to entitle it to pass free, shall bear over the words "official business," an endorsement showing also the name of the department and bureau or office, as the case may be, whence transmitted; R. S. Supp. p. 288.

Senators, representatives, and delegates in congress, the secretary of the senate, and clerk of the house of representatives, may send and receive through the mail, all public documents printed by order of congress; and the name of each senator, representative, delegate, secretary of the senate, and clerk of the house shall be written thereon, with the proper designation of the office he holds, and the provisions of this act apply to each of the persons named therein until the first of December following the expiration of his term of office; R. S. Supp. p. 288.

POSTAGE-STAMPS. The act of congress approved March 3, 1847, section 11, and the act of congress of March 3, 1841, sections 3, 4, provide that, to facilitate the transportation of letters in the mail, the postmaster-general be authorized to prepare postage-stamps, which when attached to any letter or packet shall be evidence of the payment of the postage chargeable on such letter. The same sections declare that any person who shall falsely or fraudulently make, utter, or forge any post-stamp, with the intent to defraud the post-office department, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And if any person shall use or attempt to use, in prepayment of postage, any postage-stamp which shall have been used before for like purposes, such person shall be subject to a penalty of fifty dollars for every such offence; to be recovered in the name of the United States, in any court of competent jurisdiction. See, also, Act of Mar. 3, 1851, 9 Stat. at L. 589; Act of Aug. 31, 1852, 10 Stat. at L. 141. It is made penal to sell stamps or stamped envelopes for a larger sum than that indicated on the stamp or than is charged by the department. Act of Mar. 3, 1855, 10 Stat. at L. 642; see R. S. § 5463.

POSTEA (Lat. afterwards). In Practice. The indorsement, on the nisi prius record purporting to be the return of the judge before whom a cause is tried, of what has been done in respect of such record.

It states the day of trial, before what judge, by name, the cause is tried, and also who is or was an associate of such judge; it also states the appearance of the parties by their respective attorneys, or their defaults, and the summoning and choice of the jury, whether those who were originally summoned, or those who were tales, or taken from the standers-by; it then states the finding of the jury upon oath, and, according to the description of the action, and the assessment of the damages, with the occasion thereof, together with the costs.

These are the usual matters of fact contained in the postea; but it varies with the description of the action. See Lee, Dict. Postea; 2 Lilly, Abr. 337; 16 Viner, Abr. 465; Bacon, Law Tr. 127.

When the trial is decisive, and neither the law nor the facts can afterwards be controverted, the postea is delivered by the proper officer to the attorney of the successful party, to sign his judgment; but it not unfrequently happens that after a verdict has been given there is just cause to question its validity: in such case the postea remains in the custody of the court. Eunomus, Dial. 2, § 33, p. 116.

POSTERIORES (Lat.). This term was used by the Romans to denote the descendants in a direct line beyond the sixth degree. It is still used in making genealogical tables.

POSTERIORITY. Being or coming after. It is a word of comparison, the correlative of which is priority: as, when a man holds lands from two landlords, he holds from his ancient landlord by priority, and from the other by posteriority. Co. 2d Inst. 392.

These terms, priority and posteriority, are also used in cases of liens: the first are prior liens, and are to be paid in the first place; the last are posterior liens, and are not entitled to payment until the former have been satisfied.

POSTERITY. All the descendants of a person in a direct line to the remotest generation. 8 Bush, 527.

POSTHUMOUS CHILD. One born after the death of its father; or, when the Cæsarean operation is performed, after that of the mother. The doctrine is universally adopted throughout the United States, that posthumous children inherit in the same manner as if born during the father's life; and this relates back to the conception of the child, if it is born alive; 3 Washb. R. P. *412; 4 Paige, 52; 30 Penn. 173. The court will allow a longer time than nine months for the birth of the child, when the opinion of physicians, or circumstances warrant it; 2 Greenl. Cruise, R. P. 140.

The issue of marriages deemed null in law or dissolved by a court, are nevertheless declared legitimate in Arkansas, Dig. Stat. (1858) c. 56, § 5; California, Wood, Dig. (1858) 424; Missouri, 1 Rev. Stat. (1855) c. 54, § 11; Ohio, Rev. Stat. (1854) c. 86, § 16; Virginia, Code (1849), 523. See 2 Washb. R. P. 413, 439; 4 Kent, 412; 7 Ga. 535; 12 Miss. 99.

When a father makes a will without providing for a posthumous child, the will is generally considered as revoked pro tanto; 2 Washb. R. P. 699, 412; 4 Kent, 412, 521, n., 525; 28 Am. Rep. 486.

POSTMAN. A senior barrister in court of exchequer, who has precedence in motions; so called from place where he sits. 2 Bla. Com. 28; Wharton, Dict. A letter-carrier. Webster, Dict.

POSTMASTER. An officer who keeps a post-office, attending to the receipt, forwarding, and delivery of letters and other matter passing through the mail.

Postmasters must reside within the delivery for which they are appointed. For those offices where the salary or compensation is less than a thousand dollars a year, the postmaster-general appoints; where it is more, the president. Postmasters are divided into five classes, exclusive of the postmaster at N. Y. city, according to the amount of salary; those of the first class receiving between three and four thousand, those of the fifth, less than two hundred; R. S. § 3852. They must give bond to the United States of America; see 19 How. 73; Gilp. 54; which remains in force, for suit upon violation during the term; 1 W. & M. 150; for three, formerly two, years after the expiration of the term of office; R. S. § 3838; 7 How. 681. See R. S. § 3836.

Where an office is designated as a money-order office, the bond of the postmaster shall contain an additional condition for the faithful performance of all duties and obligations in connection with the money-order business; R. S. § 3834.

Every postmaster is required to keep an office in the place for which he may be appointed; and it is his duty to receive and forward by mail, without delay, all letters, papers, and packets as directed, to receive the mails, and deliver, at all reasonable hours, all letters, papers, and packets to the persons entitled thereto.

Every person who, without authority from the postmaster-general, sets up any office bearing the title of post-office is liable to a penalty of $500 for each offence; R. S. § 3829.

Although not subject to all the responsibilities of a common carrier, yet a postmaster is liable for all losses and injuries occasioned by his own default in office; 3 Wils. 443; Cowp. 754; 5 Burr. 2709; 1 Bell, Com. 468; 2 Kent, 474; Story, Bailm. § 463.

Whether a postmaster is liable for the acts of his clerks or servants seems not to be settled; 1 Bell, Com. 468. In Pennsylvania it has been decided that he is not responsible for their secret delinquencies; though, perhaps, he is answerable for want of attention to the official conduct of his subordinates; 8 Watts, 453.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL. The chief officer of the post-office department of the executive branch of the government of the United States.

His duties, in brief, are, among other things, to establish post-offices and appoint postmasters, see POSTMASTER, at convenient places upon the post-roads established by law; to give instructions for conducting the business of the department; to provide for the carriage of the mails; to obtain from the postmasters balances due, with accounts and vouchers of expenses; to pay the expenses of the department, see 15 Pet. 377; to prosecute offences, and, generally, to superintend the business of the department in all the duties assigned to it. He is assisted by three assistants and a large corps of clerks,—the three assistants being appointed by the president. He must make ten several reports annually to congress, relating chiefly to the financial management of the department, with estimates of the expenses of the department for the ensuing year. He is a member of the cabinet; R. S. §§ 388–414.

POSTNATI (Lat.). Those born after. Applied to American and British subjects born after the separation of England and the United States; also to the subjects of Scotland born after the union of England and Scotland. Those born after an event, as opposed to antenati, those born before. 2 Kent, 56–59; 2 Pick. 394; 5 Day, 169*. See ANTENATI.

POSTULATIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. The name of the first act in a criminal proceeding.

A person who wished to accuse another of a crime appeared before the prætor and requested his authority for that purpose, designating the person intended. This act was called postulatio. The postulant (calumnium jurabat) made oath that he was not influenced by a spirit of calumny, but acted in good faith with a view to the public interest. The prætor received this declaration, at first made verbally, but afterwards in writing, and called a libel. The postulatio was posted up in the forum, to give public notice of the names of the accuser and the accused. A second accuser sometimes appeared and went through the same formalities.

Other persons were allowed to appear and join the postulant or principal accuser. These were said postulare subscriptionem, and were denominated subscriptores. Cic. in Cæcil. Divin. 15. But commonly such persons acted concurrently with the postulant, and inscribed their names at the time he first appeared. Only one accuser, however, was allowed to act; and if the first inscribed did not desist in favor of the second, the right was determined, after discussion, by judges appointed for the purpose. Cic. in Verr. i. 6. The preliminary proceeding was called divinatio, and is well explained in the oration of Cicero entitled Divinatio. See Aulus Gellius, Att. Noct. lib. ii. cap. 4.

The accuser having been determined in this manner, he appeared before the prætor, and formally charged the accused by name, specifying the crime. This was called nominis et criminis delatio. The magistrate reduced it to writing, which was called inscriptio, and the accuser and his adjuncts, if any, signed it, subscribebant. This proceeding corresponds to the indictment of the common law.

If the accused appeared, the accuser formally charged him with the crime. If the accused confessed it, or stood mute, he was adjudged to pay the penalty. If he denied it, the inscriptio contained his answer, and he was then in reatu (indicted, as we should say), and was called reus, and a day was fixed, ordinarily after an interval of at least ten days, according to the nature of the case, for the appearance of the parties. In the case of Verres, Cicero obtained one hundred and ten days to prepare his proofs; although he accomplished it in fifty days, and renounced, as he might do, the advantage of the remainder of the time allowed him.

At the day appointed for the trial, the accuser and his adjuncts or colleagues, the accused, and the judges, were summoned by the herald of the prætor. If the accuser did not appear, the case was erased from the roll. If the accused made default, he was condemned. If both parties appeared, a jury was drawn by the prætor or judex quæstionis. The jury was called jurati homines, and the drawing of them sortitio, and they were taken from a general list made out for the year. Either party had a right to object to a certain extent to the persons drawn; and then there was a second drawing, called subsortitio, to complete the number.

In some tribunals quæstiones (the jury) were editi (produced) in equal number by the accuser and the accused, and sometimes by the accuser alone, and were objected to or challenged in different ways, according to the nature of the case. The number of the jury also varied according to the tribunal (quæstio): they were sworn before the trial began. Hence they were called jurati.

The accusers, and often the subscriptores, were heard, and afterwards the accused, either by himself or by his advocates, of whom he commonly had several. The witnesses, who swore by Jupiter, gave their testimony after the discussions or during the progress of the pleadings of the accuser. In some cases it was necessary to plead the cause on the third day following the first hearing, which was called comperendinatio.

After the pleadings were concluded, the prætor or the judex quæstionis distributed tablets to the jury, upon which each wrote, secretly, either the letter A. (absolvo), or the letter C. (condemno), or N. L. (non liquet). These tablets were deposited in an urn. The president assorted and counted the tablets. If the majority were for acquitting the accused, the magistrate declared it by the words fecisse non videtur, and by the words fecisse videtur if the majority were for a conviction. If the tablets marked N. L. were so many as to prevent an absolute majority for a conviction or acquittal, the cause was put off for more ample information, ampliatio, which the prætor declared by the word amplius. Such, in brief, was the course of proceedings before the quæstiones perpetuæ.

The forms observed in the comitia centuriata and comitia tributa were nearly the same, except the composition of the tribunal and the mode of declaring the vote.

POSTULATIO ACTIONIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Demand of an action (actio) from the prætor, which some explain to be a demand of a formula, or form of the suit; others, a demand of leave to bring the cause before the judge. Taylor, Civ. Law, 80; Calvinus, Lex. Actio.

POT-DE-VIN. In French Law. A sum of money frequently paid, at the moment of entering into a contract, beyond the price agreed upon.

It differs from arrha in this, that it is no part of the price of the thing sold, and that the person who has received it cannot by returning double the amount, or the other party by losing what he has paid, rescind the contract. 18 Toullier, n. 52.

POTENTATE. One who has a great power over an extended country; a sovereign.

By the naturalization laws of the United States, an alien is required, before he can be naturalized, to renounce all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereign whatever.

POTESTAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Power; authority; domination; empire. Imperium, or the jurisdiction of magistrates. The power of the father over his children, patria potestas. The authority of masters over their slaves, which makes it nearly synonymous with dominium. See Inst. 1. 9. 12; Dig. 2. 1. 13. 1; 14. 1; 14. 4. 1. 4.

POUND. A place, enclosed by public authority, for the temporary detention of stray animals. 4 Pick. 258; 5 id. 514; 9 id. 14.

Weights. There are two kinds of weights, namely, the troy and the avoirdupois. The pound avoirdupois is greater than the troy pound in the proportion of seven thousand to five thousand seven hundred and sixty. The troy pound contains twelve ounces, that of avoirdupois sixteen ounces.

Money. The sum of twenty shillings. Previous to the establishment of the federal currency, the different states made use of the pound in computing money: it was of different value in the several states.

Pound sterling is a denomination of money of Great Britain. It is of the value of a sovereign (q. v.). In calculating the rates of duties, the pound sterling shall be considered and taken as of the value of four dollars and eighty-six cents and six and one half mills; R. S. § 3565.

The pound sterling of Ireland is to be computed, in calculating said duties, at four dollars and ten cents; id.

POUND-BREACH. The offence of breaking a pound in order to take out the cattle impounded. 3 Bla. Com. 146. The writ de parco fracto, or pound-breach, lies for recovering damages for this offence; also case. Id. It is also indictable.

POUNDAGE. In Practice. The amount allowed to the sheriff, or other officer, for commissions on the money made by virtue of an execution. This allowance varies in different states and to different officers.

POURPARLER. In French Law. The conversations and negotiations which have taken place between the parties in order to make an agreement. These form no part of the agreement. Pardessus, Dr. Com. 142.

POURSUIVANT. A follower; a pursuer. In the ancient English law, it signified an officer who attended upon the king in his wars, at the council-table, exchequer, in his court, etc., to be sent as a messenger. A poursuivant was, therefore, a messenger of the king.

POWER. The right, ability, or faculty of doing something.

Technically, an authority by which one person enables another to do some act for him. 2 Lilly, Abr. 339.

DERIVATIVE POWERS are those which are received from another. This division includes all the powers technically so called. They are of the following classes:—

Coupled with an interest, being a right or authority to do some act, together with an interest in the subject on which the power is to be exercised. Marshall, C. J., 8 Wheat. 203.

A power of this class survives the person creating it, and, in case of an excess in execution, renders the act valid so far as the authority extends, leaving it void as to the remainder only. It includes powers of sale conferred on a mortgagee.

Naked, being a right of authority disconnected from any interest of the donee in the subject-matter. 3 Hill, N. Y. 365.

INHERENT POWERS. Those which are enjoyed by the possessors of natural right, without having been received from another. Such are the powers of a people to establish a form of government, of a father to control his children. Some of these are regulated and restricted in their exercise by law, but are not technically considered in the law as powers.

The person bestowing a power is called the donor; the person on whom it is bestowed is called the donee. See CONTRACT; AGENT; AGENCY.

Powers under the Statute of Uses. An authority enabling a person, through the medium of the Statute of Uses, to dispose of an interest in real property, vested either in himself or another person.

Methods of causing a use, with its accompanying estate, to spring up at the will of a given person. Williams, R. P. 245; 2 Washb. R. P. 300.

The right to designate the person who is to take a use. Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note, 231, § 3, pl. 4.

A right to limit a use. 4 Kent, 334.

An authority to do some act in relation to lands, or the creation of estates therein, or of charges thereon, which the owner granting or reserving such power might himself lawfully perform. N. Y. Rev. Stat.

They are distinguished as—

Appendant. Those which the donee is authorized to exercise out of the estate limited to him, and which depend for their validity upon the estate which is in him. 2 Washb. R. P. 304. A life-estate limited to a man, with a power to grant leases in possession, is an example. Hardr. 416; 1 Caines, Cas. 15; Sugd. Pow. 107; Burton, R. P. § 179.

Of appointment. Those which are to create new estates. Distinguished from powers of revocation.

Collateral. Those in which the donee has no estate in the land. 2 Washb. R. P. 305.

General. Those by which the donee is at liberty to appoint to whom he pleases.

In gross. Those which give a donee, who has an estate in the land, authority to create such estates only as will not attach on the interest limited to him or take effect out of his own interest. 2 Cow. 236; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 293; Watk. Conv. 260.

Of revocation. Those which are to divest or abridge an existing estate. Distinguished from those of appointment; but the distinction is of doubtful exactness, as every new appointment must divest or revoke a former use. Sanders, Uses, 154.

As to the effect of the insertion of a power of revocation, either single or in connection with one of appointment, see Styles, 389; 2 Washb. R. P. 307.

Special. Those in which the donee is restricted to an appointment to or among particular objects only. 2 Washb. R. P. 307.

The person who receives the estate by appointment is called the appointee; the donee of the power is sometimes called the appointor.

The creation of a power may be by deed or will; 2 Washb. R. P. 314; by grant to a grantee, or reservation to the grantor; 4 Kent, 319; and the reservation need not be in the same instrument, if made at the same time; 1 Sugd. Pow. 158; by any form of words indicating an intention; 2 Washb. R. P. 315. The doubt whether a power is created or an estate conveyed can, in general, exist only in cases of wills; 2 Washb. R. P. 316; and in any case is determined by the intention of the grantor or devisor, as expressed in or to be gathered from the whole will or deed; 10 Pet. 532; 8 How. 10; 3 Cow. 651; 7 id. 187; 6 Johns. 73; 6 Watts, 87; 4 Bibb, 307. It must be limited to be executed, and must be executed within the period fixed by the rules against perpetuities; 5 Bro. P. C. 592; 2 Ves. 368; 13 Sim. 393; Lewis, Perpet. 483–485.

The interest of the donee is not an estate; Watk. Conv. 271; 2 Prest. Abstr. 275; N. Y. Rev. Stat. art. 2, § 68; but is sufficient to enable the donee to act, if the intention of the donor be clear, without words of inheritance; 3 Ves. 467; 1 Mod. 190; 1 P. Wms.

171; 7 Johns. Ch. 34; see Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note, 231; and may coexist with the absolute fee in the donee; 10 Ves. 255–257; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 241, n. As a general rule a power to sell does not include a power to mortgage; 3 Hill, N. Y. 361; but where it is for raising a particular charge, and the estate itself is settled or devised subject to that charge, then it may be proper under the circumstances to raise the money by mortgage, and the court will support it as a conditional sale; 1 De G. M. & G. 645; 3 Jur. N. S. 1143; Sugd. Powers, 425; and sale generally means a cash sale; 4 Kent, 331; 3 Hill, N. Y. 373.

As to exercising the power: if it be simply one in which no person is interested but the donee, it is a matter of election on his part whether to exercise it or not; 1 Sugd. Pow. ed. 1856, 158; see infra; but if coupled with a trust in which other persons are interested, equity will compel an execution; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1062; 2 Mas. 244, 251.

The execution must be in the manner prescribed, by the proper person, see APPOINTMENT, and cannot be by an assignee; 2 Washb. R. P. 321; unless authorized by the limitation; 4 Cruise, Dig. 211; or unless an interest be coupled with the power; 2 Cow. 236; 8 Wheat. 203; nor by a successor, as on the death of an executor; 13 Mete. 220. See 1 Bail. Eq. 392; 6 Rand. 593. As to whether a sale by a donee who has also an estate in the land is held to be an execution of the power, see 2 Washb. R. P. 325; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 306; 1 Atk. 440; 5 B. & C. 720; 6 Co. 18; 8 Watts, 203; 16 Penn. 25.

Where an exact execution is impossible under authority of court, it may be executed as near as may be (cy-près) to carrying out the donor's intention; 2 Term, 241; 4 Ves. 681; 5 Sim. 632; 3 Wash. C. C. 12.

It must be made at a proper time, and, where several powers are given over different parts of the same estate, in proper succession; 1 Co. 174; 1 W. Blackst. 281.

Equity will compel the donee to execute a power where it is coupled with a trust in which other persons are interested; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1062; and to correct a formal defect in the manner of execution; Ambl. 687; 2 P. Wms. 489, 622; 2 Mas. 251; 3 Edw. Ch. 175.

The suspension or destruction of a power may sometimes happen by a release by the donee, by an alienation of his estate, by his death, and by other circumstances.

An appendant power may be suspended by a conveyance of his interest by the donee; 4 Cruise, Dig. 221 Dougl. 477; Cro. Car. 472; 4 Bingh. N. C. 734; 2 Cow. 237; and may be extinguished by such conveyance; 2 B. & Ald. 93; 10 Ves. 246; or by a release; 1 Russ. & M. 431, 436, n.; 1 Co. 102 b; 2 Washb. R. P. 308.

A power in gross may be released to one having the freehold in possession, reversion, or remainder, and not by any other act of the donee; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 294; Burton, R. P. § 176; Chance, Pow. § 3172; Hardr. 416; 1 P. Wms. 777.

A collateral power cannot be suspended or destroyed by act of the donee; F. Moore, 605; 5 Mod. 457. And see 1 Russ. & M. 431; 13 Mete. 220.

Impossibility of immediate vesting in interest or possession does not suspend or extinguish a power; 2 Bingh. 144.

Consult Burton, Labor, Flintoff, Washburn, Williams, Real Property; Chance, Sugden, Powers; Fearne, Contingent Remainders; Tudor, Leading Cases; Cruise, Digest, Greenleaf's ed.; Gilbert, Sugden's ed.; Sanders, Uses; Kent, Commentaries; Watkins, Conveyancing.

For the distinction between political and judicial power, see 78 Ill. 261; 75 id. 152; 29 Mich. 451; 43 Iowa, 452; 114 Mass. 247; s. c. 19 Am. Rep. 341; 10 Bush, 72; Cooley, Const. Lim. 122.

POWER OF ATTORNEY. An instrument authorizing a person to act as the agent or attorney of the person granting it.

A general power authorizes the agent to act generally in behalf of the principal.

A special power is one limited to particular acts.

It may be parol or under seal; 1 Pars. Contr. 94. The attorney cannot, in general, execute a sealed instrument so as to bind his principal, unless the power be under seal; 7 Term, 259; 2 B. & P. 338; 5 B. & C. 355; 2 Me. 358. See 7 M. & W. 322, 331; 7 Cra. 299; 4 Wash. C. C. 471; 19 Johns. 60; 2 Pick. 345.

Powers of attorney are strictly construed; 6 Cush. 117; 5 Wheat. 326; 3 M. & W. 402; 8 id. 806; 5 Bingh. 442. General terms used with reference to a particular subject-matter are presumed to be used in subordination to that matter; 1 Taunt. 349; 7 B. & C. 278; 1 Y. & C. 394; 7 M. & W. 595; 5 Denio, 49; 7 Gray, 287. See, as to a power to collect a debt; 1 Blackf. 252; to settle a claim; 5 M. & W. 645; 8 Blackf. 291; to make an adjustment of all claims; 8 Wend. 494; 7 Watts, 716; 14 Cal. 399; 7 Ala. N. S. 800; to accept bills; 7 B. & C. 278.

Third parties dealing with an agent on the basis of a written letter of attorney are not prejudiced by any private instructions from the principal to the agent, unless such instructions are in some way referred to in the letter; 15 Johns. 44. Where an agent is acting under such a written letter, it is the duty of third persons to examine the instrument; Story, Agency, § 72. A failure to do this is negligence, and precludes a recovery unless the claim is based on fraud; 1 Pet. 264; Whart. Agency, § 227.

PRACTICE. The form, manner, and order of conducting and carrying on suits or prosecutions in the courts through their various stages, according to the principles of law and the rules laid down by the respective courts.

In its ordinary meaning it is to be distinguished from the pleadings. The term applies to a distinct part of the proceedings of the court. 10 Jur. N. S. 457. In a popular sense, the business which an attorney or counsellor does: as, A B has a good practice.

The books on practice are very numerous: among the most popular are those of Tidd, Chitty, Archbold, Sellon, Graham, Dunlap, Caines, Troubat & Haly, Blake, Impey, Daniell, Benedict, Colby, Curtis, Hall, Law, Day, Abbott.

A settled, uniform, and long-continued practice, without objection, is evidence of what the law is; and such practice is based on principles which are founded in justice and convenience; 2 Russ. 19, 570; 2 Jac. 232; 5 Term, 380; 1 Y. & J. 167, 168; 2 C. & M. 55; Ram, Judgm. c. 7.

With respect to criminal practice, it has been forcibly remarked by a learned judge that even where the course of practice in criminal law has been unfavorable to parties accused, and entirely contrary to the most obvious principals of justice and humanity, as well as those of law, it has been held that such practice constituted the law, and could not be altered without the authority of parliament. Per Maule, J., Scott, N. C. 599, 600.

PRACTICE COURT. In English Law. A court attached to the court of king's bench, which heard and determined common matters of business and ordinary motions for writs of mandamus, prohibition, etc.

It was usually called the bail court. It was held by one of the puisne justices of the king's bench.

PRACTICES. A succession of acts of a similar kind or in a like employment. Webst.

PRÆCEPTORES (Lat.). Heretofore masters in chancery were so called, as having the direction of making out remedial writs. Fleta, 76; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 251. A species of benefice, so called from being possessed by the principal templars (præceptores templi), whom the chief master by his authority created. 2 Mon. Ang. 543.

PRÆCIPE, PRECIPE (Lat.). A slip of paper upon which the particulars of a writ are written. It is lodged in the office out of which the required writ is to issue. Wharton, Dict. A written order to the clerk of a court to issue a writ.

PRÆCIPE QUOD REDDAT (Lat.). Command him to return. An original writ, of which præcipe is the first word, commanding the person to whom it is directed to do a thing or to show cause why he has not done it. 3 Bla. Com. 274; Old N. B. 13. It is as well applied to a writ of right as to other writs of entry and possession.

PRÆDA BELLICA (Lat.). Booty. Property seized in war.

PRÆDIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Lands.

Prædia urbana, those lands which have buildings upon them and are in the city.

Prædia rustica, those lands which are without buildings or in the country. Voc. Jur. Utr.

It indicates a more extensive domain than fundus. Calvinus, Lex.

PRÆDIAL. That which arises immediately from the ground: as, grain of all sorts, hay, wood, fruits, herbs, and the like.

PRÆDIUM DOMINANS (Lat. the ruling estate). In Civil Law. The name given to an estate to which a servitude is due: it is called the ruling estate.

PRÆDIUM RUSTICUM (Lat. a country estate). In Civil Law. By this is understood all heritages which are not destined for the use of man's habitation: such, for example, as lands, meadows, orchards, gardens, woods, even though they should be within the boundaries of a city.

PRÆDIUM SERVIENS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an estate which suffers or yields a service to another estate.

PRÆDIUM URBANUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. By this term is understood buildings and edifices intended for the habitation and use of man, whether they be built in cities or whether they be constructed in the country.

PRÆFECTUS VIGILIUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The chief officer of the night-watch. His jurisdiction extended to certain offences affecting the public peace, and even to larcenies. But he could inflict only slight punishments.

PRÆMUNIRE (Lat.). In order to prevent the pope from assuming the supremacy in granting ecclesiastical livings, a number of statutes were made in England, during the reigns of Edward I. and his successors, punishing certain acts of submission to the papal authority therein mentioned. In the writ for the execution of these statutes, the words præmunire facias (cause to be forewarned), being used to command a citation of the party, gave not only to the writ, but to the offence itself of maintaining the papal power, the name of præmunire. Co. Litt. 129; Jacob, Law Dict.

The penalties of præmunire were subsequently applied to other offences of various kinds. Wharton, Law Dict.

PRÆSUMPTIO JURIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A deduction from the existence of one fact as to the existence of another which admits of proof to the contrary. A rebuttable presumption. An intendment of law which holds good until it is weakened by proof or a stronger presumption. Best, Presump. 29.

PRÆSUMPTIO JURIS ET DE JURE (Lat.). In Roman Law. A deduction drawn, by reason of some rule of law, from the existence of one fact as to the existence of another, so conclusively that no proof can be admitted to the contrary. A conclusive presumption.

PRÆTOR. In Roman Law. A municipal officer of Rome, so called because (præ-iret populo) he went before or took precedence of the people.

The consuls were at first called prætors. Liv. Hist. lii. 55. He was a sort of minister of justice, invested with certain legislative powers, especially in regard to the forms or formalities of legal proceedings. Ordinarily, he did not decide causes as a judge, but prepared the grounds of decision for the judge, and sent to him the questions to be decided between the parties. The judge was always chosen by the parties, either directly, or by rejecting, under certain rules and limitations, the persons proposed to them by the prætor. Hence the saying of Cicero (pro Cluentia, 43) that no one could be judged except by a judge of his own choice. There were several kinds of officers called prætors. See Vicat, Voc.

Before entering on his functions, he published an edict announcing the system adopted by him for the application and interpretation of the laws during his magistracy. His authority extended over all jurisdictions, and was summarily expressed by the words do, dico, addico, i. e. do I give the action, dico I declare the law, I promulgate the edict, addico I invest the judge with the right of judging. There were certain cases which he was bound to decide himself, assisted by a council chosen by himself,—perhaps the decemvirs. But the greater part of causes brought before him he sent either to a judge, an arbitrator, or to recuperators (recuperatores), or to the centumvirs, as before stated. Under the empire, the powers of the prætor passed by degrees to the prefect of the prætorium or the prefect of the city: so that this magistrate, who at first ranked with the consuls, at last dwindled into a director or manager of the public spectacles or games.

PRAGMATIC SANCTION. In French Law. An expression used to designate those ordinances which concern the most important object of the civil or ecclesiastical administration. Merlin, Répert.; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, 24, 38, 39.

In Civil Law. The answer given by the emperors on questions of law, when consulted by a corporation or the citizens of a province or of a municipality, was called a pragmatic sanction. Leçons El. du Dr. Civ. Rom. § 53. This differed from a rescript.

PRAYER. In Equity Practice. The request in a bill that the court will grant the aid which the petitioner desires. That part of the bill which asks for relief. The word denotes, strictly, the request, but is very commonly applied to that part of the bill which contains the request.

Of Process. That part of the bill which asks that the defendant may be compelled to appear and answer the bill, and abide the determination of the court upon the subject.

It must contain the names of all the parties; 1 P. Wms. 593; 2 Dick. Ch. 707; 2 Johns. Ch. 245; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; although they are out of the jurisdiction; 1 Beav. 106; Smith, Ch. Pr. 45; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 164. The ordinary process asked for is a writ of subpœna; Story, Eq. Pl. § 44; and in case a distringas against a corporation; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; or an injunction; 2 S. & S. 219; 1 Sim. 50; is sought for, it should be included in the prayer.

For Relief, is general, which asks for such relief as the court may grant; or special, which states the particular form of relief desired. A special prayer is generally inserted, followed by a general prayer; 4 Madd. 408; 5 Ves. 495; 13 id. 119; 2 Pet. 595; 16 id. 195; 23 Vt. 247; 6 Gill, 105; 25 Me. 153; 10 Rich. Eq. 53; 7 Ind. 661; 15 Ark. 555. Unless the general prayer is added, if the defendant fails in his special prayer he will not be entitled to any relief; 2 Atk. 2; 1 Ves. 426; 12 id. 62; 3 Woodd. Lect. 55; 2 R. I. 129; 4 id. 173; 15 Ala. 9; except in case of charities and bills in behalf of infants; 1 Atk. 6, 355; 1 Ves. 418; 18 id. 325; 1 Russ. 235; 2 Paige, Ch. 396.

A general prayer is sufficient for most purposes; and the special relief desired may be prayed for at the bar; 4 Madd. 408; 2 Atk. 3, 141; 1 Edw. 26; Story, Eq. Pl. § 41; 31 N. H. 193; 2 Paine, 11; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 140, 466; 9 How. 390; 9 Mo. 201; 9 Gill & J. 80; see 13 Penn. 67; but where a special order and provisional process are required, founded on peculiar circumstances, a special prayer therefor is generally inserted; 6 Madd. 218; Hinde, Ch. Pr. 17; 3 Ind. 419.

Such relief, and such only, will be granted, either under a special prayer, whether at bar; 3 Swanst. 208; 2 Ves. 299; 3 id. 416; 4 Paige, Ch. 229; 25 Me. 153; 30 Ala. N. S. 416; 32 id. 508; or in the bill; 16 Tex. 399; 18 Ga. 492; 21 Penn. 131; or under a general prayer, as the case as stated will justify; 7 Ired. Eq. 80; 4 Sneed, 623; 18 Ill. 142; 5 Wisc. 117, 424; 24 Mo. 31; 7 Ala. N. S. 193; 16 id. 793; 13 Ark. 183; 3 Barb. Ch. 613; 3 Gratt. 518; 9 How. 390; and a bill framed apparently for one purpose will not be allowed to accomplish another, to the injury of the defendant; 16 Tex. 399; 21 Penn. 131; 6 Wend. 63. See 13 Gratt. 653.

And, generally, the decree must conform to the allegations and proof; 7 Wheat. 522; 10 id. 181; 19 Johns. 496; 2 Harr. Ch. 401; 1 H. & G. 11; 12 Leigh, 69; 1 Ired. Eq. 83; 5 Ala. 248; 8 id. 211; 14 id. 470; 6 Ala. N. S. 518; 4 Bibb, 376; 5 Day, 223; 13 Conn. 146. But a special prayer may be disregarded, if the allegations warrant under the general prayer; 15 Ark. 555; 4 Tex. 20; 2 Cal. 269; 22 Ala. N. S. 646; 8 Humphr. 230; 1 Blackf. 305; the relief granted must be consistent with the special prayer; 27 Ala. 507; 21 Penn. 131; 1 Jones, Eq. 100; 2 Ga. 413; 14 id. 52; 1 Edw. Ch. 654; 9 Gill & J. 80; 4 Des. Eq. 530; 9 Yerg. 301; 1 Johns. Ch. 111; 15 Ala. 9.

PREAMBLE. An introduction prefixed to a statute, reciting the intention of the legislature in framing it, or the evils which led to its enactment.

A preamble is said to be the key of a statute, to open the minds of the makers as to the mischiefs which are to be remedied and the objects which are to be accomplished by the provisions of the statute; Co. 4th Inst. 330; 6 Pet. 301. In modern legislative practice, preambles are much less used than formerly, and in some of the United States are rarely, if ever, now inserted in statutes. In the interpretation of a statute, though resort may be had to the preamble, it cannot limit or control the express provisions of the statute; Dwarris, Stat. 504–508; Wilberforce, Stat. Law, 277. Nor can it by implication enlarge what is expressly fixed; 1 Story, Const. b. 3, c. 6; 3 M'Cord, 293; 15 Johns. 89; Busb. 131; Davels, 38.

A recital inserted in a contract for the purpose of declaring the intention of the parties.

The facts recited in a preamble of a private statute are not evidence, as between the person for whose benefit the act passed and a third person; 3 Litt. 472; 7 Hill, 80; but the statement of legislative reasons in the preamble will not affect the validity of an act; 42 Conn. 583.

But a preamble reciting the existence of public outrages provision against which is made in the body of the act, is evidence of the facts it recites; see 4 Maule & S. 532; 1 Phill. Ev. 239; 2 Russ. Cr. 720. See, generally, Erskine, Inst. 1. 1. 18; Toullier, 1. 3, n. 318; 2 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 239; 4 La. 55; Barrington, Stat. 353, 370; Wilb. Stat.

PREBEND. In Ecclesiastical Law. The stipend granted to an ecclesiastic, in consideration of officiating in the church. It is in this distinguished from a canonicate, which is a mere title and may exist without stipend. The prebend may be a simple stipend, or a stipend with a dignity attached to it, in which case it has some jurisdiction belonging to it. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 88; Stra. 1082; 1 Term, 401; 2 id. 630; 1 Wils. 206; Dy. 273 a; 7 B. & C. 113; 8 Bingh. 490; 5 Taunt. 2.

PRECARIOUS RIGHT. The right which the owner of a thing transfers to another, to enjoy the same until it shall please the owner to revoke it.

If there is a time fixed during which the right may be used, it is then vested for that time, and cannot be revoked until after its expiration. Wolff, Inst. § 333.

PRECARIUM (Lat.). The name of a contract among civilians, by which the owner of a thing, at the request of another person, gives him a thing to use as long as the owner shall please. Pothier, n. 87. See Yelv. 172; Cro. Jac. 236; 9 Cow. 687; Rolle, 128; Bacon, Abr. Bailment (C); Erskine, Inst. 3. 1. 9; Wolff, Ins. Nat. § 333; Story, Bailm. §§ 227, 253 b.

A tenancy at will is a right of this kind.

PRECATORY WORDS. Expressions in a will praying or requesting that a thing shall be done.

Although recommendatory words used by a testator, of themselves, seem to leave the devisee to act as he may deem proper, giving him a discretion, as when a testator gives an estate to a devisee, and adds that he hopes, recommends, has a confidence, wish, or desire that the devisee shall do certain things for the benefit of another person, yet courts of equity have construed such precatory expressions as creating a trust; 8 Ves. Ch. 380; 18 id. 41; Bacon, Abr. Legacies (B); 98 Mass. 274; 35 Vt. 173; 4 Am. L. Rev. 617. See, contra, 20 Penn. 268; 1 McCart. 397; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1069.

But this construction will not prevail when either the objects to be benefited are imperfectly described, or the amount of property to which the trust should attach is not sufficiently defined; 1 Bro. C. C. 142; 1 Sim. 542, 556. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1070; Lewin, Trusts, 77; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3953.

PRECEDENCE. The right of being first placed in a certain order,—the first rank being supposed the most honorable.

In this country no precedence is given by law to men.

Nations, in their intercourse with each other, do not admit any precedence: hence, in their treaties, in one copy one is named first, and the other in the other. In some cases of officers when one must of necessity act as the chief, the oldest in commission will have precedence: as, when the president of a court is not present, the associate who has the oldest commission will have a precedence; or if their commissions bear the same date, then the oldest man.

In the army and navy there is an order of precedence which regulates the officers in their command. See RANK.

For rules of precedence in England, see Whart. Law Dic.

PRECEDENTS. In Practice. Legal acts or instruments which are deemed worthy to serve as rules or models for subsequent cases.

The word is similarly applied in respect to political and legislative action. In the former use, precedent is the word to designate an adjudged case which is actually followed or sanctioned by a court in subsequent cases. An adjudged case may be of any degree of weight, from that of absolute conclusiveness down to the faintest presumption: and one which is in fact disregarded is said never to have become a precedent. In determining whether an adjudication is to be followed as a precedent, the following considerations are adverted to. First, the justice of the principle which it declares, and the reasonableness of its application. Hob. 270. If a precedent is to be followed because it is a precedent, even when decided against an established rule of law, there can be no possible correction of abuses, because the fact of their existence would render them above the law. It is always safe to rely upon principles. See 16 Viner, Abr. 499; 2 Swanst. 163; 2 J. & W. 318; 3 Ves. 527; 2 Atk. 559; 2 P. Wms. 258; 2 Bro. C. C. 86; 1 Tex. 11; 2 Evans, Poth. 377, where the author argues against the policy of making precedents binding when contrary to reason. See, also, 1 Kent, 475–477; Livermore, Syst. 104, 105; Greal.

Eq. Ev. 300; 16 Johns. 402; 20 id. 722; Cro. Jac. 527; 33 Hen. VII. 41; Jones, Bailm. 46; 1 Hill, N. Y. 438; 9 Barb. 544; 50 N. Y. 451; Wells, Res. Adj. & St. Dec.; PRINCIPLE; REASON; STARE DECISIS.

According to Lord Talbot, it is "much better to stick to the known general rules than to follow any one particular precedent which may be founded on reasons unknown to us." Cas. Talb. 26. Blackstone, 1 Com. 70, says that a former decision is, in general, to be followed, unless "manifestly absurd or unjust;" and in the latter case it is declared, when overruled, not that the former sentence was bad law, but that it was not law. If an adjudication is questioned in these respects, the degree of consideration and deliberation upon which it was made; 4 Co. 94; the rank of the court, as of inferior or superior jurisdiction, which established it, and the length of time during which it has been acted on as a rule of property, are to be considered. The length of time which a decision has stood unquestioned is an important element; since where a rule declared to be law, even by an inferior tribunal, has been habitually adopted and acted upon by the community, and becomes thus imbedded in the actual affairs of men, it is frequently better to enforce it as it is, instead of allowing it to be re-examined and unsettled. It is said that in order to give precedents binding effect there must be a current of decisions; Cro. Car. 528; Cro. Jac. 386; 8 Co. 163; 10 Wisc. 370; and even then, injustice in the rule often prevails over the antiquity and frequency of its adoption, and induces the court to overrule it. But this is to be very cautiously done where it is a rule of property, or wherever a departure from it would unjustly affect vested rights; 8 Cal. 188; 47 Ind. 286; 30 Miss. 256; 23 Wend. 340.

Written forms of procedure which have been sanctioned by the courts or by long professional usage, and are commonly to be followed, are designated precedents. Steph. Pl. 392. And this term, when used as the title of a law-book, usually denotes a collection of such forms.

PRECEPT (Lat. precipio, to command). A writ directed to the sheriff, or other officer, commanding him to do something.

PRECINCT. The district for which a high or petty constable is appointed is, in England, called a precinct. Wilcox, Const. xii.

In daytime, all persons are bound to recognize a constable acting within his own precinct; after night, the constable is required to make himself known; and it is, indeed, proper he should do so at all times; id. n. 265, p. 93.

PRECIPUT. In French Law. An object which is ascertained by law or the agreement of the parties, and which is first to be taken out of property held in common by one having a right, before a partition takes place.

The preciput is an advantage or a principal part to which some one is entitled præcipium jus, which is the origin of the word preciput. Dalloz, Dict.; Pothier, Obl. By preciput is also understood the right to sue out the preciput.

PRECLUDI NON (Lat.). In Pleading. A technical allegation contained in a replication which denies or confesses and avoids the plea.

It is usually in the following form: "And the said A B, as to the plea of the said C D, by him secondly above pleaded, says that he, the said A B, by reason of any thing by the said C D in that plea alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against the said C D, because he says that," etc. 2 Wils. 42; 1 Chitty, Pl. 573; Steph. Pl. 398.

PRECOGNITION. In Scotch Law. The examination of witnesses who were present at the commission of a criminal act, upon the special circumstances attending it, in order to know whether there is ground for a trial, and to serve for direction to the prosecutor. But the persons examined may insist on having their declaration cancelled before they give testimony at the trial. Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. n. 49.

PRECONTRACT. An engagement entered into by a person which renders him unable to enter into another; as, a promise or covenant of marriage to be had afterwards. When made per verba de presenti, it is in fact a marriage, and in that case the party making it cannot marry another person; Bish. Mar. & D. § 53.

PREDECESSOR. One who has preceded another.

This term is applied in particular to corporators who are now no longer such, and whose rights have been vested in their successor; the word ancestor is more usually applicable to common persons. The predecessor in a corporation stands in the same relation to the successor that the ancestor does to the heir.

One who has filled an office or station before the present incumbent.

PRE-EMPTION. In International Law. The right of pre-emption is the right of a nation to detain the merchandise of strangers passing through her territories or seas, in order to afford to her subjects the preference of purchase. 1 Chitty, Com. Law, 103; 2 Bla. Com. 287.

This right is sometimes regulated by treaty. In the treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, bearing date the 19th day of November, 1794, ratified in 1795, it was provided, after mentioning that the usual munitions of war, and also naval materials, should be confiscated as contraband, that, "whereas the difficulty of agreeing on precise cases in which alone provisions and other articles not generally contraband may be regarded as such, renders it expedient to provide against the inconveniences and misunderstandings which might thence arise, it is further agreed that whenever any such articles so being contraband according to the existing laws of nations shall for that reason be seized, the same shall not be confiscated, but the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified; and the captors, or, in their default, the government under whose authority they act, shall pay to the masters or owners of such vessel the full value of all articles, with a reasonable mercantile profit thereon, together with the freight, and also the damages incident to such detention." See Mann. Com. b. 3, c. 8.

PRE-EMPTION-RIGHT. The right given to settlers upon the public lands of the United States to purchase them at a limited price in preference to others.

It gives a right to the actual settler who is a citizen of the United States, or who has filed a declaration of intention to become such, and has entered and occupied without title, to obtain a title to a quarter-section at the minimum price fixed by law, upon entry in the proper office and payment, to the exclusion of all other persons. It is an equitable title; 15 Miss. 780; 9 Mo. 683; 15 Pet. 407; and does not become a title at law to the land till entry and payment; 2 Sandf. Ch. 78; 11 Ill. 529; 15 id. 131. It may be transferred by deed; 9 Ill. 454; 15 id. 131; and descends to the heirs of an intestate; 2 Pet. 201; 12 Ala. N. s. 322. See 2 Washb. R. P. 532; Rev. Stat. U. S.; Zab. Land Law.

PREFECT. In French Law. A chief officer invested with the superintendence of the administration of the laws in each department. Merlin, Répert.

PREFER. To bring any matter before a court: as,—A preferred a charge of assault against B.

To apply or move: thus,—"to prefer for costs." Abb. Law Dict.

PREFERENCE. The paying or securing to one or more of his creditors, by an insolvent debtor, the whole or a part of their claim, to the exclusion of the rest. The right which a creditor has acquired over others to be paid first out of the assets of his debtor: as, when a creditor has obtained a judgment against his debtor which binds the latter's land, he has a preference.

A failing creditor may prefer any one creditor to the exclusion of others; 12 Pet. 178; 38 Penn. 446; 7 Hun, 146; 15 Mo. 378; 48 Ala. 377. In some states, assignments for creditors may create preferences in favor of certain creditors or classes of creditors.

Voluntary preferences are, however, forbidden by the insolvent laws of some of the states, and are in such cases void when made in a general assignment for the benefit of creditors; e. g. New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Ohio. See INSOLVENT; PRIORITY; Moses, Insolv. Laws; Burr. Assignments.

PREGNANCY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The state of a female who has within her ovary, or womb, a fecundated germ, which gradually becomes developed in the latter receptacle. Dunglison, Med. Dict. Pregnancy.

The signs of pregnancy. These acquire a great importance from their connection with the subject of concealed, and also of pretended, pregnancy. The first may occur in order to avoid disgrace, and to accomplish in a secret manner the destruction of offspring. The second may be attempted to gratify the wishes of a husband or relations, to deprive the legal successor of his just claims, to gratify avarice by extorting money, and to avoid or delay execution.

These signs and indications have a twofold division. First, those developed through the general system, and hence termed constitutional; second, those developed through the uterine system, termed local or sensible.

The first, or constitutional, indications regard—first, the mental phenomena, or change wrought in the temperament of the mother, evidenced by depression, despondency, rendering her peevish, irritable, capricious, and wayward; sometimes drowsiness and occasionally strange appetites and antipathies are present.

Second, the countenance exhibits languor, and what the French writers term decomposition of features,—the nose becoming sharper and more elongated, the mouth larger, the eyes sunk and surrounded with a brownish or livid areola, and having a languid expression.

Third, the vital action is increased; a feverish heat prevails, especially in those of full habit and sanguine temperament. The body, except the breasts and abdomen, sometimes exhibits emaciation. There are frequently pains in the teeth and face, heartburn, increased discharge of saliva, and costiveness.

Fourth, the mammary sympathies give enlargement and firmness to the breasts; but this may be caused by other disturbances of the uterine system. A more certain indication is found in the areola, which is the dark-colored circular disk surrounding the nipple. This, by its gradual enlargement, its constantly deepening color, its increasing organic action evidenced by its raised appearance, turgescence, and glandular follicles, is justly regarded as furnishing a very high degree of evidence.

Fifth, irritability of stomach, evidenced by sickness at the stomach, usually in the early part of the day.

Sixth, suppression of the menses, or monthly discharge arising from a secretion from the internal surface of the uterus. This suppression, however, may occur from diseases or from a vitiated action of the uterine system.

The second, termed local or sensible signs and indications, arise mainly from the development of the uterine system consequent upon impregnation. This has reference—

First, to the change in the uterus itself. The new principle introduced causes a determination of blood to that organ, which develops it first at its fundus, second in its body, and lastly in its cervix or neck. The latter constantly diminishes until it has become almost wholly absorbed in the body of the uterus. The os uteri in its unimpregnated state feels firm, with well-defined lips or margins. After impregnation the latter becomes tumid, softer, and more elastic, the orifice feeling circular instead of transverse.

Second, to the state of the umbilicus, which is first depressed, then pushed out to a level with the surrounding integuments, and at last, towards the close of the period, protruded considerably above the surface.

Third, to the enlargement of the abdomen. This commences usually by the end of the third month, and goes on increasing during the period of pregnancy. This, however, may result from morbid conditions not affecting the uterus, such as disease of the liver, spleen, ovarian tumor, or ascites.

Fourth, to quickening, as rendered evident by the fœtal motions. By the former we understand the feeling by the mother of the self-induced motion of the fœtus in utero, which occurs about the middle of the period of pregnancy. But as the testimony of the mother cannot be always relied upon, her interest being sometimes to conceal it, it is important to inquire what other means there may be of ascertaining it. These movements of the fœtus may sometimes be excited by a sudden application of the hand, having been previously rendered cold by immersion in water, on to the front of the abdomen. Another method is to apply one hand against the side of the uterine tumor, and at the same time to impress the opposite side quickly with the fingers of the other hand.

But the most reliable means consists in the application of auscultation, or the use of the stethoscope. This is resorted to for the purpose of discovering—

First, the souffle, or placental sound.

Second, the pulsations of the fœtal heart.

The first is a low, murmuring or cooing sound, accompanied by a slight rushing noise, but without any sensation of impulse. It is synchronous with the pulse of the mother, and varies not in its situation during the course of the same pregnancy. Its seat in the abdomen does vary in proportion to the progressive advance of the pregnancy, and it is liable to intermissions.

The second is quite different in its characteristics. It is marked by double pulsations, and hence very rapid, numbering from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and sixty in a minute. These pulsations are not heard until the end of the fifth month, and become more distinct as pregnancy advances. Their source being the fœtal heart, their seat will vary with the varying position of the fœtus. Auscultation, if successful, not only reveals the fact of pregnancy, but also the life of the fœtus.

There is still another indication of pregnancy; and that is a bluish tint of the vagina, extending from the os externum to the os uteri. It is a violet color, like lees of wine, and is caused by the increased vascularity of the genital system consequent upon conception. But any similar cause other than conception may produce the same appearance.

Independent of what may be found on this subject in works on medical jurisprudence and midwifery, that of Dr. Montgomery on the Signs and Indications of Pregnancy is the fullest and most reliable.

The laws relating to pregnancy concern the circumstances under and the manner in which the fact is ascertained. There are two cases where the fact whether a woman is or has been pregnant is important to ascertain. The one is when it is supposed she pretends pregnancy, and the other when she is charged with concealing it.

Pretended pregnancy may arise from two causes: the one when a widow feigns herself with child in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate. The presumptive heir may in such case have a writ de ventre inspiciendo, by which the sheriff is commanded to have such made, and the fact determined whether pregnancy exists or not, by twelve matrons, in the presence of twelve knights. If the result determine the fact of pregnancy, then she is to be kept under proper guard until she is delivered. If the pregnancy be negatived, the presumptive heir is admitted to the inheritance. 1 Bla. Com. 456; Cro. Eliz. 566; 4 Bro. C. C. 90; 2 P. Wms. 591; Cox, C. C. 297. A practice quite similar prevailed in the civil law.

The second cause of pretended pregnancy occurs when a woman is under sentence of death for the commission of a crime. At common law, in case this plea be made before execution, the court must direct a jury of twelve matrons, or discreet women, to ascertain the fact, and if they bring in their verdict quick with child (for barely with child, unless it be alive in the womb, is not sufficient), execution shall be stayed, generally till the next session of the court, and so from session to session, till either she is delivered or proves by the course of nature not to have been with child at all; 4 Bla. Com. 394, 395; 1 Bay, 497.

In Scotland, all that is necessary to be proved, to have execution delayed, is the fact of pregnancy, no difference being made whether she be quick with child or not. This is also the provision of the French penal code upon this subject. In this country, there is little doubt that clear proof that the woman was pregnant, though not quick with child, would at common law be sufficient to obtain a respite of execution until after delivery. The difficulty lies in making the proof sufficiently clear, the signs and indications being all somewhat uncertain, some of them wanting, all liable to variation, and conviction of the fact only fastening upon the mind when a number of them, inexplicable upon any other hypothesis, concur in that one result.

It has been recently held that pregnancy at the time of marriage by another than the husband is sufficient ground for divorce, provided the pregnancy was unknown to the husband and there was no reasonable ground of suspicion by him; 25 Alb. L. J. 383. This can hardly be laid down as an absolute rule; Bish. Mar. & D. § 180.

Pregnancy is seldom concealed except for the criminal purpose of destroying the life of the fœtus in utero, or of the child immediately upon its birth. Infant life is easily extinguished; while proof of the unnatural crime is hard to be furnished. This has led to the passage of laws, both in England and in this country, calculated to facilitate the proof and also to punish the very act of concealment of pregnancy and death of the child when if born alive it would have been illegitimate. In England, the very stringent act of 21 Jac. I. c. 27, required that any mother of such child who had endeavored to conceal its birth should prove by at least one witness that the child was actually born dead; and for want of such proof it arrived at the forced conclusion that the mother had murdered it. This cruel law was essentially modified, in 1803, by the passage of an act declaring that women indicted for the murder of bastard children should be tried by the same rules of evidence and presumption as obtain in other trials of murder.

The early legislation of Pennsylvania was characterized by the same severity. The act of May 31, 1781, made the concealment of the death of a bastard child conclusive evidence to convict the mother of murder. This was repealed by the act of 5th April, 1790, s. 6, which declared that the constrained presumption that the child whose death is concealed was therefore murdered by the mother shall not be sufficient to convict the party indicted, without probable presumptive proof is given that the child was born alive. The law was further modified by the Act of 22d April, 1794, s. 18, which declares that the concealment of the death of any such child shall not be conclusive evidence to convict the party indicted for the murder of her child, unless the circumstances attending it be such as shall satisfy the mind of the jury that she did wilfully and maliciously destroy and take away the life of such a child. The act also punishes the concealment of the death of a bastard child by fine and imprisonment. The act of 31 March, 1860, Pur. Dig. p. 341, § 136, now governs in Pennsylvania. It makes the concealment of the death of an illegitimate child a substantive offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and leaves the question of the murder of the child by its mother, subject to the mode of trial and punishment as ordinary cases of murder. Counts for murder and concealing the death of the child may, however, be united in the same indictment. The states of New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Georgia, Illinois, and Michigan, all have enactments on this subject,—the punishment prescribed being, generally, fine and imprisonment. For duration of pregnancy, see GESTATION.

PREGNANT. See AFFIRMATIVE PREGNANT; NEGATIVE PREGNANT.

PREJUDICE (Lat. præ, before, judicare, to judge).

A forejudgment. A leaning towards one side of a cause for some reason other than its justice.

PRELATE. The name of an ecclesiastical officer. There are two orders of prelates: the first is composed of bishops, and the second, of abbots, generals of orders, deans, etc.

PRELEVEMENT. In French Law. The portion which a partner is entitled to take out of the assets of a firm before any division shall be made of the remainder of the assets between the partners.

The partner who is entitled to a prélèvement is not a creditor of the partnership: on the contrary, he is a part-owner; for, if the assets should be deficient, a creditor has the preference over the partner; on the other hand, should the assets yield any profit, the partner is entitled to his portion of it, whereas the creditor is entitled to no part of it, but he has a right to charge interest when he is in other respects entitled to it.

PRELIMINARY. Something which precedes: as, preliminaries of peace, which are the first sketch of a treaty, and contain the principal articles on which both parties are desirous of concluding, and which are to serve as the basis of the treaty.

PRELIMINARY PROOF. In Insurance. Marine policies in the United States generally have a provision that a loss shall be payable in a certain time, usually sixty days, "after proof," meaning "preliminary proof," which is not particularly specified. Fire policies usually specify the preliminary proof. Life policies, like marine, usually make the loss payable sixty or ninety days after notice and proof; 2 Phill. Ins. ch. xx.; 11 Johns. 241; 16 Barb. 171; 31 Me. 325; 4 Mass. 88; 6 Gray, 396; 6 Cush. 342; 6 Harr. & J. 408; 8 Gill, 276; 2 Wash. Va. 61; 23 Wend. N. Y. 43; 1 La. 216; 11 Miss. 278; Stew. Low. C. 354; 14 Mo. 220; 10 Pet. 507; 6 Ill. 434; 13 id. 676; 5 Sneed, 139; 2 Ohio, 452; 6 Ind. 137; 30 Vt. 659.

PREMEDITATION. A design formed to commit a crime or to do some other thing before it is done.

Premeditation differs essentially from will, which constitutes the crime; because it supposes, besides an actual will, a deliberation, and a continued persistence which indicate more perversity. The preparation of arms or other instruments required for the execution of the crime are indications of a premeditation, but are not absolute proof of it; as these preparations may have been intended for other purposes, and then suddenly changed to the performance of the criminal act. Murder by poisoning must of necessity be done with premeditation.

PREMISES (Lat. præ, before, mittere, to put, to send).

That which is put before. The introduction. Statements previously made. See 1 East, 456.

In Conveyancing. That part of a deed which precedes the habendum, in which are set forth the names of the parties with their titles and additions, and in which are recited such deeds, agreements, or matters of fact as are necessary to explain the reasons upon which the contract then entered into is founded; and it is here, also, the consideration on which it is made is set down and the certainty of the thing granted. 2 Bla. Com. 298; 8 Mass. 174; 6 Conn. 289.

In Equity Pleading. The stating part of a bill. It contains a narrative of the facts and circumstances of the plaintiff's case, and the wrongs of which he complains, and the names of the persons by whom done and against whom he seeks redress. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 9; Barton, Suit in Eq. 27; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 43; Story, Eq. Pl. § 27.

Every material fact to which the plaintiff intends to offer evidence must be stated in the premises; otherwise, he will not be permitted to offer or require evidence of such fact; 1 Bro. C. C. 94; 3 Swanst. 472; 3 P. Wms. 276; 2 Atk. 96; 1 Vern. 483; 11 Ves. 240; 2 Hare, 264; 6 Johns. 565; 9 Ga. 148.

In Estates. Lands and tenements. 1 East, 453; 3 Maule & S. 169.

PREMIUM. In Insurance. The consideration for a contract of insurance.

A policy of insurance always expresses the consideration called the premium, which is a certain amount or a certain rate upon the value at risk, paid wholly in cash, or partly so and partly by promissory note or otherwise; 2 Parsons, Marit. Law, 182. By the charters of mutual fire insurance companies, the insured building is usually subject to a lien for the premium; 1 Phill. Ins. ch. vi.; 19 Miss. 53; 21 How. 35. The premium may be payable by service rendered; 5 Ind. 96.

In life insurance, the premium is usually payable periodically; 18 Barb. 541; and the continuance of the risk is usually made to depend upon the due payment of a periodical premium; 2 Dutch. 268. But if the practice of the company and its course of dealings with the insured, and others known to him, have been such as to induce a belief that so much of the contract as provides for a forfeiture upon non-payment at a fixed time will not be insisted on, the company will not be allowed to set up such a forfeiture, as against one in whom their conduct has induced such belief; May, Insurance, § 361; 95 U. S. 380. So far as the agreed risk is not run in amount or time under a marine policy, the whole or a proportional stipulated or customary part of the premium is either not payable, or, if paid, is to be returned unless otherwise agreed; 2 Phill. Ins. c. xxii.; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 185; 16 Barb. 280; 7 Gray, 246.

PREMIUM NOTE. In Insurance. A note given in place of payment of the whole or a part of the premium.

The premium, or a part of it, is not unfrequently paid wholly or in part by a promissory note, with a stipulation in the policy that the unpaid amount shall be set off and deducted in settling for a loss; 1 Phill. Ins. § 51. It is also usually collaterally secured by a stipulation in the policy for the forfeiture of the policy by non-payment of the premium note, or any amount due thereon by assessment or otherwise; 19 Barb. 440; 21 id. 605; 25 id. 109; 12 N. Y. 477; 2 Ind. 65; 3 Gray, 215; 6 id. 288; 36 id. 252; 19 Miss. 135; 35 N. H. 328; 29 Vt. 23; 2 N. H. 198; 32 Penn. 75; 34 Me. 451.

PREMIUM PUDICITIÆ (Lat. the price of chastity). The consideration of a contract by which a man promises to pay to a woman with whom he has illicit intercourse a certain sum of money.

When the contract is made as the payment of past cohabitation, as between the parties, it is good, and will be enforced, if under seal, but such consideration will not support a parol promise; 3 Q. B. 483; 1 Story, Contr. § 670. It cannot be paid on a deficiency of assets, until all creditors are paid, though it has a preference over the heir, next of kin, or devisee. If the contract be for future cohabitation, it is void. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 296; 5 Ves. 286; 11 id. 535; 3 E. & B. 642; 2 P. Wms. 432; 1 W. Blackst. 517; 3 Burr. 1568; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 4, § 4, and notes s and y; 1 Ball & B. 360; Roberts, Fraud. Conv. 428; Cas. Talb. 153, and the cases there cited; 6 Ohio, 21; 5 Cow. 253; Harp. 201; 3 T. B. Monr. 35; 11 Mass. 368; 2 N. & M'C. 251.

PRENDER, PRENDRE (L. Fr.). To take. This word is used to signify the right of taking a thing before it is offered: hence the phrase of law, it lies in render, but not in prender. See A PRENDRE; Gale & W. Easem.; Washb. Easem.

PRENOMEN (Lat.). The first or Christian name of a person. Benjamin is the prenomen of Benjamin Franklin. See Cas. Hardw. 286; 1 Tayl. 148.

PREPENSE. Aforethought. See 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, *784.

PREROGATIVE. In Civil Law. The privilege, pre-eminence, or advantage which one person has over another: thus, a person vested with an office is entitled to all the rights, privileges, prerogatives, etc. which belong to it.

In English Law. The royal prerogative is an arbitrary power vested in the executive to do good and not evil. Rutherforth, Inst. 279; Co. Litt. 90; Chitty, Prerog.; Bacon, Abr.

PREROGATIVE COURT. In English Law. An ecclesiastical court held in each of the two provinces of York and Canterbury before a judge appointed by the archbishop of the province.

Formerly in this court testaments were proved, and administrations granted where a decedent left chattels to the value of five pounds (bona notabilia) in two distinct dioceses or jurisdictions within the province, and all causes relating to the wills, administrations, or legacies of such persons were originally cognizable. This jurisdiction was transferred to the court of probate by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, § 4, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, and now, by the Judicature Acts, it is included in the supreme court of judicature.

An appeal lay formerly from this court to the king in chancery, by stat. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, afterwards to the privy council, by stat. 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92. 2 Steph. Com. 237, 238; 3 Bla. Com. 65, 66.

In American Law. A court having a jurisdiction of probate matters, in the state of New Jersey.

PREROGATIVE WRITS. Processes issued by an exercise of the extraordinary power of the crown on proper cause shown. They are the writs of procedendo, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, habeas corpus, and certiorari; 3 Steph. Com. 629. They differ from other writs in that they are never issued except in the exercise of the judicial discretion, and are directed generally not to the sheriff, but to the parties sought to be affected themselves; 3 Bla. Com. 132.

PRESCRIBABLE. To which a right may be acquired by prescription.

PRESCRIPTION. A mode of acquiring title to incorporeal hereditaments by immemorial or long-continued enjoyment.

The distinction between a prescription and a custom is that a custom is a local usage and not annexed to a person; a prescription is a personal usage confined to the claimant and his ancestors or grantors. The theory of prescription was that the right claimed must have been enjoyed beyond the period of the memory of man, which for a long time, in England, went back to the time of Richard I. To avoid the necessity of proof of such long duration, a custom arose of allowing a presumption of a grant on proof of usage for a long term of years.

The length of time necessary to raise a strict prescription was limited by statute 32 Hen. VIII. at sixty years; 8 Pick. 308; 7 Wheat. 59; 4 Mas. 402; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 539. See 9 Cush. 171; 29 Vt. 43; 24 Ala. N. S. 130; 20 Penn. 22. Grants of incorporeal hereditaments are presumed upon proof of enjoyment of the requisite character for a period of years equal to that fixed by statute as the period of limitation in respect of real actions; 3 Kent, 442; 12 Wend. 330; 19 id. 365; 27 Vt. 265; 2 Bail. 101; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 386; 13 N. H. 360; 4 Day, 244; 10 S. & R. 63; 9 Pick. 251. See 14 Barb. 511; 3 Me. 120; 1 B. & P. 400; 5 B. & Ald. 232.

Prescription properly applies only to incorporeal hereditaments; 3 Barb. 105; Finch, Law, 132; such as easements of water, light and air, way, etc.; 4 Mas. 397; 4 Rich. 536; 20 Penn. 331; 1 Cro. M. & R. 217; 1 Gale & D. 205, 210, n.; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 114; Washb. Easem.; a class of franchises; Co. Litt. 114; 10 Mass. 70; 10 S. & R. Penn. 401. See FERRY. As to the character of the use necessary to create a prescriptive right, see ADVERSE ENJOYMENT.

It has been held that corporations may exist by prescription; 2 Kent, *277; 12 Mass. 400. It is necessary in such case to presuppose a grant by charter or act of parliament, which has been lost; 35 Barb. 319.

PRESENCE. The being in a particular place.

In many contracts and judicial proceedings it is necessary that the parties should be present in order to render them valid: for example, a party to a deed, when it is executed by himself, must personally acknowledge it, when such acknowledgment is required by law, to give it its full force and effect, and his presence is indispensable, unless, indeed, another person represent him as his attorney, having authority from him for that purpose.

Actual presence is being bodily in the precise spot indicated.

Constructive presence is being so near to or in such relation with the parties actually in a designated place as to be considered in law as being in the place.

It is a rule in the civil law that he who is incapable of giving his consent to an act is not to be considered present although he be actually in the place. A lunatic, or a man sleeping, would not, therefore, be considered present; Dig. 41. 2. 1. 3. And so if insensible; 1 Dougl. 241; 4 Bro. P. C. 71; 3 Russ. 441; or if the act were done secretly so that he knew nothing of it; 1 P. Wms. 740.

The English Statute of Frauds, § 5, directs that all devises and bequests of any lands or tenements shall be attested or subscribed in the presence of said devisor. Under this statute it has been decided that an actual presence is not indispensable, but that where there was a constructive presence it was sufficient: as, where the testatrix executed the will in her carriage standing in the street before the office of her solicitor, the witness retired into the office to attest it, and it being proved that the carriage was accidentally put back, so that she was in a situation to see the witness sign the will, through the window of the office; Bro. C. C. 98. See 2 Curt. Eccl. 320, 331; 2 Salk. 688; 3 Russ. 441; 1 Maule & S. 294; 2 C. & P. 491.

In Criminal Law. In trials for cases in which corporal punishment is assigned, the defendant's appearance must ordinarily be in person, and must so appear on record. There can be no judgment of conviction taken by default; 6 Barr, 387; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 540. The prisoner's actual presence is not requisite at the making and arguing of motions of all kinds, though in motions for arrest of judgment and in error, the old practice was to require it; 88 Ill. 284; 63 Mo. 159. This is not now usually required in proceedings in error; 1 Park. C. C. 360. In felonies presence at the verdict is essential, and this right cannot be waived; 18 Penn. 103; 63 id. 386; but where a prisoner was voluntarily absent during the taking of a portion of the testimony in an adjoining room, he was considered as constructively present; 25 Alb. L. J. 303. See 88 Penn. 189. In trials for misdemeanors these rules do not apply; 9 Dana, 304; 7 Cow. 525; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 550.

PRESENT. A gift, or more properly, the thing given. It is provided by the constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 9, n. 7, that "no person holding any office of profit or trust under them [the United States] shall, without the consent of congress, accept of any present, emolument, or office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state."

PRESENTS. This word signifies the writing then actually made and spoken of: as, these presents; know all men by these presents; to all to whom these presents shall come.

PRESENTATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of a patron offering his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted in a church or benefice.

PRESENTEE. In Ecclesiastical Law. A clerk who has been presented by his patron to a bishop in order to be instituted in a church.

PRESENTMENT. In Criminal Practice. The written notice taken by a grand jury of any offence, from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the government. 4 Bla. Com. 301.

Upon such presentment, when proper, the officer employed to prosecute afterwards frames a bill of indictment, which is then sent to the grand jury, and they find it to be a true bill. In an extended sense, presentments include not only what are properly so called, but also inquisitions of office and indictments found by a grand jury. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 25, s. 1.

The difference between a presentment and an inquisition is this: that the former is found by a grand jury authorized to inquire of offences generally, whereas the latter is an accusation found by a jury specially returned to inquire concerning the particular offence. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 25, s. 6. See, generally, Comyns, Dig. Indictment (B); Bacon, Abr. Indictment (A); 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 163: 7 East, 387; 1 Meigs, 112; 11 Humphr. 12.

The writing which contains the accusation so presented by a grand jury. 1 Brock. 156.

In Contracts. The production of a bill of exchange or promissory note to the party on whom the former is drawn, for his acceptance, or to the person bound to pay either, for payment.

The holder of a bill is bound, in order to hold the parties to it responsible to him, to present it in due time for acceptance, and to give notice, if it be dishonored, to all the parties he intends to hold liable; 2 Pet. 170; 4 Mas. 336; 5 id. 118; 12 Pick. 399; 7 Gray, 217; 20 Wend. 321; 12 Vt. 401; 13 La. 357; 7 B. Monr. 17; 8 Mo. 268; 7 Blackf. 367; 1 M'Cord, 322; 7 Leigh, 179. And when a bill or note becomes payable, it must be presented for payment.

In general, the presentment for payment should be made to the maker of a note, or the drawee of a bill, for acceptance, or to the acceptor, for payment; 2 Esp. 509; but a presentment made at a particular place, when payable there, is, in general, sufficient. A personal demand on the drawee or acceptor is not necessary; a demand at his usual place of residence; 17 Ohio, 78; of his wife, or other agent, is sufficient; 17 Ala. N. s. 42; 1 Const. 367; 2 Esp. 509; 5 id. 265; Holt, 313.

When a bill or note is made payable at a particular place, a presentment, as we have seen, may be made there; 8 N. Y. 266; but when the acceptance is general, it must be presented at the house; 2 Taunt. 206; 1 M. & G. 83; 3 B. Monr. 461; or place of business, of the acceptor; 3 Kent, 64, 65; 4 Mo. 52; 11 Gratt. 260; 2 Camp. 596. See 14 Mart. La. 51[1].

The presentment for acceptance must be made in reasonable time; and what this reasonable time is depends upon the circumstances of each case; 7 Taunt. 197; 9 Bingh. 416; 9 Moore, P. C. 66; 2 H. Blackst. 565; 4 Mas. 336; 1 M'Cord, 322; 7 Gray, 217; 7 Cow. 205; 9 Mart. La. 326; 7 Blackf. 367. The presentment of a note or bill for payment ought to be made on the day it becomes due; 4 Term, 148; 8 Mass. 453; 3 N. H. 14; 12 La. 386; 22 Conn. 213; 20 Me. 109; 7 Gill & J. 75; 8 Iowa, 394; 1 Blackf. 81; 10 Ohio, 496; and notice of non-payment given (otherwise the holder will lose the security of the drawer and indorsers of a bill and indorsers of a promissory note); and in case the note or bill be payable at a particular place, it should be presented for payment at that place; 1 Wheat. 171; 1 Harr. Del. 10; 5 Leigh, 522; 5 Blackf. 215; 2 Jones, No. C. 23; 13 Pick. 465; 19 Johns. 391; 8 Vt. 191; 1 Ala. N. s. 375; 8 Mo. 336; and if the money be lodged there for its payment, the holder would probably have no recourse against the maker or acceptor if he did not present them on the day and the money should be lost; 5 B. & Ald. 244; 3 Me. 147; 27 id. 149.

The excuses for not making a presentment are general, and applicable to all persons who are indorsers; or they are special, and applicable to the particular indorser only.

Among the former are—inevitable accident or overwhelming calamity; Story, Bills, § 308; 3 Wend. 488; 2 Ind. 224. The prevalence of a malignant disease, by which the ordinary operations of business are suspended; 2 Johns. Cas. 1; 3 Maule & S. 267. The breaking out of war between the country of the maker and that of the holder; 1 Paine, 156. The occupation of the country where the note is payable, or where the parties live, by a public enemy, which suspends commercial operations and intercourse; 8 Cra. 155; 15 Johns. 57; 16 id. 438; 7 Pet. 586; 2 Brock. 20. The obstruction of the ordinary negotiations of trade by the vis major. Positive interdictions and public regulations of the state which suspend commerce and intercourse. The utter impracticability of finding the maker or ascertaining his place of residence; Story, Pr. Notes, §§ 205, 236, 238, 241, 264; 4 S. & R. 480; 6 La. 727; 14 La. An. 484; 3 M'Cord, 494; 1 Dev. 247; 2 Caines, 121.

Among the latter, or special excuses for not making a presentment, may be enumerated the following. The receiving the note by the holder from the payee, or other antecedent party, too late to make a due presentment: this will be an excuse as to such party; 16 East, 248; 7 Mass. 483; Story, Pr. Notes, §§ 201, 265; 2 Wheat. 373; 11 id. 431. The note being an accommodation note of the maker for the benefit of the indorser; Story, Bills, § 370. See 2 Brock. 20; 7 Harr. & J. 381; 1 H. & G. 468; 7 Mass. 452; 1 Wash. C. C. 461; 2 id. 514; 1 Hayw. 271; 4 Mas. 413; 1 Caines, 157; 1 Stew. Ala. 175; 5 Pick. 88; 21 id. 327. A special agreement by which the indorser waives the presentment; 8 Me. 213; 6 Wheat. 572; 11 id. 629; Story, Bills, §§ 371, 373. The receiving security or money by an indorser to secure himself from loss, or to pay the note at maturity. In this case, when the indemnity or money is a full security for the amount of the note or bill, no presentment is requisite; Story, Bills, § 374; Story, Pr. Notes, § 281; 4 Watts, 328; 9 Gill & J. 47; 7 Wend. 165; 2 Me. 207; 5 Mass. 170; 5 Conn. 175. The receiving the note by the holder from the indorser as a collateral security for another debt; Story, Pr. Notes, § 284; Story, Bills, § 372; 2 How. 427, 457.

A want of presentment may be waived by the party to be affected, after a full knowledge of the fact; 8 S. & R. 438. See 6 Wend. 658; 3 Bibb, 102; 5 Johns. 385; 4 Mass. 347; 7 id. 452; 8 Cush. 157; Bacon, Abr. Merchant, etc. (M). See, generally, 1 Hare & W. Sel. Dec. 214, 224; Story, Pr. Notes; Byles, Bills; Parsons, Bills; Dan. Neg. Instr.

PRESERVATION. Keeping safe from harm; avoiding injury. This term always presupposes a real or existing danger.

A jettison, which is always for the preservation of the remainder of the cargo, must therefore be made only when there is a real danger existing. See AVERAGE; JETTISON.

PRESIDENT. An officer of a company who is to direct the manner in which business is to be transacted. From the decision of the president there is an appeal to the body over which he presides.

PRESIDENT OF A BANK. This officer, under the banking system in the United States, is ordinarily a member of the board of directors of the bank, and is chosen by them. It is his duty to preside at all meetings of the board of directors; to exercise a constant, immediate, and personal supervision over the daily affairs of the bank; and to institute and carry on legal proceedings to collect demands or claims due the institution. This latter function is the most important of those attached to the office; Morse, Banks, 144, citing 2 Metc. (Ky.) 240; 5 How. 83; 28 Vt. 24. Mortgages to secure subscriptions to stock run in his name; 1 Sandf. Ch. 179; but he has no more control over the property of the bank than any other director; 7 Ala. 281; 1 Seld. 320; 9 P. C. L. J. 43. He has no authority to release the claims of the bank, without the authorization of the board of directors; 7 R. I. 224; 115 Mass. 547. See, generally, Ball, Nat. Banks, 58.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. The title of the chief executive officer of the United States.

The constitution directs that the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. Art. 2, s. 1.

No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years and been fourteen years a resident within the United States. Art. 2, s. 1, n. 5.

He is chosen by presidential electors (q. v.). See 1 Kent, Lect. xiii.; Story, Const. § 1410. The constitution, after providing for the transmission of the votes by the electoral colleges to the president of the senate, provides (Amendment xii.), that "the president of the senate shall, in the presence of the senate and the house of representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for president shall be president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as president, the house of representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the president. But in choosing the president, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the house of representatives shall not choose a president, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the vice-president shall act as president, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the president.

"The person having the greatest number of votes as vice-president shall be vice-president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the senate shall choose the vice-president; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of president shall be eligible to that of vice-president of the United States."

After his election, and before he enters on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm), that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States." Art. 2, s. 1, n. 8. He holds his office for the term of four years (art. 2, sec. 1, n. 1), and is re-eligible for successive terms, though no one has yet been elected for a third term.

In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice-president; and the congress may by law provide for the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the president and vice-president, declaring what officer shall then act as president; and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed or a president shall be elected. Art. 2, s. 1, n. 6. Congress have accordingly provided that, in case of the inability of both of said officers to serve, the president of the senate, or, if there is none, the speaker of the house for the time being, shall act as president, until the disability is removed or a president elected.

The president shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected; and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them. Art. 2, s. 1, n. 7. The act of March 3d, 1873, c. 226, fixed the salary of the president at fifty thousand dollars.

The powers of the president are to be exercised by him alone, or by him with the concurrence of the senate.

The constitution has vested in him alone the following powers: he is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officers of each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices; and he shall have the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. Art. 2, s. 2, n. 2. He shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session. Art, 2, s. 2, n. 3. He shall from time to time give congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all officers of the United States.

His power, with the concurrence of the senate, is as follows: to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur; nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not provided for in the constitution, and which have been established by law; but the congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they shall think proper in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. Art. 2, s. 2, n. 2. See 1 Kent, Lect. 13; Story, Const. b. 3, c. 36; Rawle, Const. Index; Serg. Const. L. Index; Cooley, Const.

The president and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Art 2, sec. 4.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS. Persons appointed in the different states whose sole duty it is to elect a president and vice-president of the United States. Each state appoints a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the state is entitled in congress, and it is within the power of the state legislature to direct how such electors shall be appointed. (Const. art. ii. sect. 1). The electors have frequently been appointed by the state legislatures directly, and they have been elected separately by congressional districts; but the more usual method of appointment is by general ballot, so that each voter in a state votes for the whole number of electors to which his state is entitled.

The constitution provides, Amend. art. 12, that "the electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for president and vice-president, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as president, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as vice-president; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as president, and of all persons voted for as vice-president, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the president of the senate." See PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

PRESS. By a figure, this word signifies the art of printing: the press is free.

All men have a right to print and publish whatever they may deem proper, unless by doing so they infringe the rights of another, as in the case of copyrights (q. v.), when they may be enjoined. For any injury they may commit against the public or individuals they may be punished, either by indictment or by a civil action at the suit of the party injured, when the injury has been committed against a private individual. See U. S. Const. Amendm. art. 1; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

PRESS COPIES. They are part of the original letters. The identity of the handwriting as shown on the impression is not destroyed, nor rendered unrecognizable by persons acquainted with its characteristics. A person having accurate knowledge can testify to the genuineness with as much accuracy as if the original sheets were before him. Such copies are the same as other writings partially obliterated by damp and exposure, which are admissible as evidence, if duly identified by testimony. They are not however satisfactory as standards of comparison of handwriting. Enough originality is left to be identified by a witness when its own originality is in question; 7 Allen, 561; 1 Cush. 217; to prove the contents of a lost letter, or where a party refused to give up the original; 6 S. & R. 420; 19 La. An. 91; 37 Conn. 555. The necessity of producing the original, or laying the foundation in the usual way for secondary evidence, is not obviated by the fact that a party keeps letter press copies; 44 N. Y. 171; so in 35 Md. 123. A copy, sworn to be correctly made from a press copy, of a letter is admissible as secondary evidence, to prove its contents, without producing the press copy; 102 Mass. 362. Press copies are admissible against a party when they appear to be in his handwriting and the originals cannot be produced; 7 Allen, 561. Strictly speaking, a letter-press copy is secondary to the document from which it is taken, and cannot be treated as an original; 3 Camp. 228; 4 McLean, 378; 35 Md. 123; 19 La. An. 91.

Photographs are admissible in evidence under similar rules, and in them also the accuracy of mechanical processes is judicially recognized as a means of producing true representations. They may be treated of here.

A photograph, if proved to be fairly taken from the disputed object, is clearly admissible; 45 N. Y. 215.

Upon a criminal trial, photographic likenesses taken after death, of persons whom it is material to identify, may be exhibited to witnesses acquainted with such persons in life as aids in the identification; 45 N. Y. 215. Where a mutilated body was found, the witness was allowed to testify that the face resembled a photograph of a person alleged to be the one found, though he had not known the man before death; 76 Penn. 340. The healthy condition of the deceased may be proved by a colored photograph taken a short time before death; 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) 369; and in an indictment for bigamy a photograph of the first husband may be shown to a witness to the first marriage to prove his identity with the person mentioned in the marriage certificate; 4 F. & F. 103. See 52 Ala. 115; 9 Am. L. Rev. 18, 173.

Photographs of places have been introduced as evidence to prove that a grotto mentioned by the witness as the place where the act was committed, was not such a spot as the parties would likely have chosen to commit the act; 2 Tichb. Tr. 640; to show to the jury the location and surroundings of premises injured by a change of grade in the street, to aid them in determining the effect of such change; 31 Wisc. 512; and where damages are sought to be recovered for injuries caused by neglect to repair the highway, a photograph of the place showing its condition at the time is competent evidence; 1 Abb. App. 451. To be admissible the photographs must first be shown to be true representations of the places; 118 Mass. 420; 31 Wisc. 512. The weight of authority is in favor of the admissibility of photographic copies of signatures, when the genuineness of a signature is in question, if the copies are accompanied by competent preliminary proof that they are accurate in all respects except as to size and coloring. They may be used by an expert to aid him as a basis of opinion as to the genuineness of the original signature. The doctrine that such an opinion is only entitled to little weight, and is at best only secondary evidence, is not supported by the cases; 16 Gray, 161; 45 N. Y. 213; 36 Conn. 218; 115 Mass. 481; 47 Tex. 503; s. c. 26 Am. Rep. 315; contra, 10 Abb. Pr. Rep. N. S. 300. Photographs of instruments and public records which can not be brought into court are admissible in evidence; but it is necessary to authenticate them by proof of handwriting; 2 Woods, 682; 6 Blatch. 137; 8 Eng. Rep. 481; s. c. L. R. 9 C. P. 187. The copyright in a photograph is protected and a penalty imposed for the violation of it; R. S. 4965. See 6 Fed. Rep. 178.

See Whart. Hom. §§ 708 and 709; Whart. Cr. Ev. §§ 544, 805; Whart. & St. Med. J. § 1231; 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 300; 2 Alb. L. J. 1; 7 id. 50; 8 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1. See Pop. Science Monthly (1875), 710.

PRESUMPTION. An inference affirmative or disaffirmative of the truth or falsehood of any proposition or fact drawn by a process of probable reasoning in the absence of actual certainty of its truth or falsehood, or until such certainty can be ascertained. Best, Presump. 4.

An inference affirmative or disaffirmative of the existence of a disputed fact, drawn by a judicial tribunal, by a process of probable reasoning, from some one or more matters of fact, either admitted in the cause or otherwise satisfactorily established. Best, Presump. 12.

A rule of law that courts and judges shall draw a particular inference from a particular fact, or from particular evidence, unless and until the truth of such inference is disproved. Steph. Ev. 4.

Conclusive presumptions are inferences which the law makes so peremptorily that it will not allow them to be overturned by any contrary proof, however strong. Best, Presump. 20. They are called, also, absolute and irrebuttable presumptions.

Disputable presumptions are inferences of law which hold good until they are invalidated by proof or a stronger presumption. Best, Presump. 29; 2 H. & M'H. 77; 4 Johns. Ch. 287.

Presumptions of fact are inferences as to the existence of some fact drawn from the existence of some other fact; inferences which common sense draws from circumstances usually occurring in such cases. 1 Phill. Ev. 599; 3 B. & Ad. 890; 3 Hawks, 122; 1 Wash. C. C. 372.

Presumptions of law are rules which, in certain cases, either forbid or dispense with any ulterior inquiry. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 14. Inferences or positions established, for the most part, by the common, but occasionally by the statute, law, which are obligatory alike on judges and juries. Best, Presump. 17. They are either conclusive or disputable.

The distinctions between presumptions of law and presumptions of fact are—first, that in regard to presumptions of law a certain inference must be made whenever the facts appear which furnish the basis of the inference; while in case of other presumptions a discretion more or less extensive is vested in the tribunal as to drawing the inference. See 9 B. & C. 643. Second, in case of presumptions of law, the court may draw the inference whenever the requisite facts are developed in pleading; Stephen, Plead. 4th ed. 382; while all other presumptions can be made only by the intervention of a jury. Presumptions of law are reduced to fixed rules, and form a part of the system of jurisprudence to which they belong; presumptions of fact are derived wholly and directly from the circumstances of the particular case, by means of the common experience of mankind. See 2 Stark. Ev. 684; 6 Am. Law Mag. 370; 35 Penn. 440.

In giving effect to presumptions of fact, it is said that the presumption stands until proof is given of the contrary; 1 Cr. M. & R. 895; 2 H. & M'H. 77; 2 Dall. 22; 4 Johns. Ch. 287. See BURDEN OF PROOF; ONUS PROBANDI. This contrary proof may be a conflicting presumption; and Mr. Best lays down the following rules for application in such cases: first, special presumptions take the place of general ones; see 8 B. & C. 737; 9 id. 643; 5 Taunt. 326; 1 Marsh. 68; second, presumptions derived from the ordinary course of nature are stronger than casual presumptions; 1 C. & K. 134; 4 B. & C. 71; Co. Litt. 373 a; third, presumptions are favored which tend to give validity to acts; 1 Leach, 412; 5 Esp. 230; 1 Mann. & R. 668; 3 Camp. 432; 2 B. & C. 814; 7 id. 573; 2 Wheat. 70; 1 South. 148; 3 T. B. Consult Greenleaf, Starkie, Phillips, Wharton, Stephen, on Evidence: Best, Matthews, on Presumptive Evidence; Russell on Crimes.

PRESUMPTIVE EVIDENCE. Any evidence which is not direct and positive. 1 Stark. Ev. 558. The proof of facts from which with more or less certainty, according to the experience of mankind of their more or less universal connection, the existence of other facts can be deduced. 2 Saunders, Pl. 673. The evidence afforded by circumstances, from which, if unexplained, the jury may or may not infer or presume other circumstances or facts. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13. See Peake, Ev. Morris ed. 45; Best, Pres. 4, § 3.

PRESUMPTIVE HEIR. One who if the ancestor should die immediately would, under existing circumstances of things, be his heir, but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born; as, a brother, who is the presumptive heir, may be defeated by the birth of a child to the ancestor. 2 Bla. Com. 208.

PRET A USAGE. (Fr. loan for use). A phrase used in the French law instead of commodatum.

PRETENSION. In French Law. The claim made to a thing which a party believes himself entitled to demand but which is not admitted or adjudged to be his.

The words rights, actions, and pretensions are usually joined; not that they are synonymous, for right is something positive and certain, action is what is demanded, while pretension is sometimes not even accompanied by a demand.

PRETERITION (Lat. præter and eo, to go by). In Civil Law. The omission by a testator of some one of his heirs who is entitled to a legitime (q. v.) in the succession.

Among the Romans, the preterition of children when made by the mother was presumed to have been made with design; the preterition of sons by any other testator, was considered as a wrong, and avoided the will, except the will of a soldier in service, which was not subject to so much form.

PRETEXT (Lat. prætextum, woven before). The reasons assigned to justify an act, which have only the appearance of truth, and which are without foundation, or which, if true, are not the true reasons for such act. Vattel, liv. 3, c. 3, § 32.

PRETIUM AFFECTIONIS (Lat.). An imaginary value put upon a thing by the fancy of the owner in his affection for it or for the person from whom he obtained it. Bell, Dict.

When an injury has been done to an article, it has been questioned whether in estimating the damage there is any just ground, in any case, for admitting the pretium affectionis. It seems that when the injury has been done accidentally by culpable negligence such an estimation of damages would be unjust, but when the mischief has been intentional it ought to be so admitted. Kames, Eq. 74, 75.

PREVARICATION. In Civil Law. The acting with unfaithfulness and want of probity. The term is applied principally to the act of concealing a crime. Dig. 47. 15. 6.

PREVENTION (Lat. prevenire, to come before). In Civil Law. The right of a judge to take cognizance of an action over which he has concurrent jurisdiction with another judge.

In Pennsylvania it has been ruled that a justice of the peace cannot take cognizance of a cause which has been previously decided by another justice. 2 Dall. 77, 114.

PRICE. The consideration in money given for the purchase of a thing.

There are three requisites to the quality of a price in order to make a sale.

It must be serious and such as may be demanded: if, therefore, a person were to sell me an article, and by the agreement, reduced to writing, he were to release me from the payment, the transaction would no longer be a sale, but a gift. Pothier, Vente, n. 18.

It must be certain and determinate; but what may be rendered certain is considered as certain: if, therefore, I sell a thing at a price to be fixed by a third person, this is sufficiently certain, provided the third person make a valuation and fix the price; Pothier, Vente, n. 23, 24; 2 Sumn. 539; 4 Pick. 179; 13 Me. 400; 2 Ired. 36; 3 Penn. 50; 2 Kent, 477. When the parties have not expressed any price in their contract, the presumption of law is that the thing is sold for the price it generally brings at the time and place where the agreement was made; 3 T. B. Monr. 133; 6 H. & J. 273; Coxe, 261; 10 Bingh. 376; 11 U. C. Q. B. 545; 6 Taunt. 108.

The third quality of a price is that it consists in money, to be paid down, or at a future time; for if it be of any thing else it will no longer be a price, nor the contract a sale, but exchange or barter; Pothier, Vente, n. 30; 16 Toullier, n. 147; 12 N. H. 390; 10 Vt. 457; contra, 54 N. Y. 173.

The true price of a thing is that for which things of a like nature and quality are usually sold in the place where situated, if real property, or in the place where exposed to sale, if personal; Pothier, Vente, n. 243. The first price or cost of a thing does not always afford a sure criterion of its value. It may have been bought very dear or very cheap: Marsh. Ins. 620 et seq.; Ayl. Parerg. 447; Merlin, Répert.; 4 Pick. 179; 8 id. 252; 16 id. 227.

In a declaration in trover it is usual, when the chattel found is a living one, to lay it as of such a price; when dead, of such a value; 8 Wentw. Pl. 372, n.; 2 Lilly, Abr. 629. See Bouvier, Inst. Index.

Lord Tenterden's act has substituted value for price in the English Statute of Frauds; 25 L. J. C. P. 257. See Campb. Sales, 162.

PRIMA FACIE (Lat.). At first view or appearance of the business: as, the holder of a bill of exchange, indorsed in blank, is primâ facie its owner.

Primâ facie evidence of fact is in law sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted; 6 Pet. 622, 632; 14 id. 334. See, generally 7 J. J. Marsh. 425; 3 N. H. 484; 7 Ala. 267; 5 Rand. 701; 1 Pick. 332; 1 South. 77; 1 Yeates, 347; 2 N. & M'C. 320; 1 Mo. 334; 11 Conn. 95; 2 Root, 286; 16 Johns. 66, 136; 1 Bail. 174; 2 A. K. Marsh. 244. For example, when buildings are fired by sparks emitted from a locomotive engine passing along the road, it has been held to be primâ facie evidence of negligence on the part of those who have the charge of it; 3 C. B. 229.

PRIMA TONSURA (Lat.). A grant of a right to have the first crop of grass. 1 Chitty, Pr. 181.

PRIMAGE. In Mercantile Law. A duty payable to the master and mariners of a ship or vessel,—to the master for the use of his cables and ropes to discharge the goods of the merchant, to the mariners for lading and unlading in any port or haven. Abbott, Shipp. 270.

This payment appears to be of very ancient date, and to be variously regulated in different voyages and trades. It is sometimes called the master's hat-money. 3 Chitty, Com. Law, 431.

PRIMARY. That which is first or principal: as, primary evidence, that evidence which is to be admitted in the first instance, as distinguished from secondary evidence, which is allowed only when primary evidence cannot be had.

PRIMARY EVIDENCE. The best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3053. See EVIDENCE.

PRIMARY OBLIGATION. An obligation which is the principal object of the contract: for example, the primary obligation of the seller is to deliver the thing sold, and to transfer the title to it. It is distinguished from the accessory or secondary obligation to pay damages for not doing so. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 702.

PRIMARY POWERS. The principal authority given by a principal to his agent: it differs from mediate powers. Story, Ag. § 58.

PRIMATE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An archbishop who has jurisdiction over one or several other metropolitans.

PRIMER ELECTION. A term used to signify first choice.

In England, when coparcenary lands are divided, unless it is otherwise agreed, the eldest sister has the first choice of the purparts: this part is called the enitia pars. Sometimes the oldest sister makes the partition; and in that case, to prevent partiality, she takes the last choice. Hob. 107; Littleton, §§ 243, 244, 245; Bacon, Abr. Coparceners (U).

PRIMER SEISIN. In English Law. The right which the king had, when any of his tenants died seised of a knight's fee, to receive of the heir, provided he were of full age, one whole year's profits of the lands, if they were in immediate possession; and half a year's profits, if the lands were in reversion, expectant on an estate for life. 2 Bla. Com. 66.

PRIMOGENITURE. The state of being first born; the eldest.

At common law, in cases of descent of land, primogeniture gave a title to the oldest son in preference to the other children. This unjust distinction has been generally abolished in the United States. Formerly in Pennsylvania, in cases of intestacy, the oldest son took a double portion of the real estate.

PRIMOGENITUS (Lat.). The first-born. 1 Ves. 290. And see 3 Maule & S. 25; 8 Taunt. 468; 3 Vern. 660.

PRIMUM DECRETUM (Lat.). In the courts of admiralty, this name is given to a provisional decree. Bacon, Abr. The Court of Admiralty (E).

PRINCE. In a general sense, a sovereign; the ruler of a nation or state. The son of a king or emperor, or the issue of a royal family: as, princes of the blood. The chief of any body of men.

By a clause inserted in policies of insurance, the insurer is liable for all losses occasioned by "arrest or detainment of all kings, princes, and people, of what nation, condition, or quality soever." 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1218.

PRINCIPAL. Leading; chief; more important.

This word has several meanings. It is used in opposition to accessary, to show the degree of crime committed by two persons. Thus, we say, the principal is more guilty than the accessary after the fact.

In estates, principal is used as opposed to incident or accessory: as in the following rule: "The incident shall pass by the grant of the principal, but not the principal by the grant of the incident: accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur suum principale." Co. Litt. 152 a.

It is used in opposition to agent, and in this sense it signifies that the principal is the prime mover.

It is used in opposition to interest: as, the principal being secured, the interest will follow.

It is used also in opposition to surety: thus, we say, the principal is answerable before the surety.

Principal is used also to denote the more important: as, the principal person.

In the English law, the chief person in some of the inns of chancery is called principal of the house. Principal is also used to designate the best of many things: as, the principal bed, the principal table, and the like.

In Contracts. One who, being competent sui juris to do any act for his own benefit or on his own account, confides it to another person to do for him. 1 Domat, b. 1, tit. 15, Introd.; Story, Ag. § 3.

Every one of full age, and not otherwise disabled, is capable of being a principal; for it is a rule that whenever a person has power, as owner, or in his own right, to do a thing, he may do it by another; Comyns, Dig. Attorney (C 1); Heineccius, ad Pand. p. 1, l. 3, tit. 1, § 424; 9 Co. 75 b; Story, Ag. § 6. Infants are generally incapable of appointing an agent; but under special circumstances they may make such appointments. For instance, an infant may authorize another to do any act which is beneficial to him, but not to do an act which is to his prejudice; 2 Kent, 233–243; 9 Co. 75, 76; 3 Burr. 1804; 6 Cow. 393; 10 Ohio, 37; 10 Pet. 58, 69; 14 Mass. 463. A married woman cannot, in general, appoint an agent or attorney; and when it is requisite that one should be appointed, the husband usually appoints for both. She may, perhaps, dispose of or incumber her separate property, through an agent or attorney; Cro. Car. 165; 2 Leon. 200; 2 Bulstr. 13; but this seems to be doubted; Cro. Jac. 617; Yelv. 1; 1 Brownl. 134; 2 id. 248; Adams, Ej. 174. Idiots, lunatics, and other persons sui juris are wholly incapable of appointing an agent; Story, Ag. § 6.

The rights to which principals are entitled arise from obligations due to them by their agents or by third persons.

The rights of principals in relation to their agents are—first, to call them to an account at all times in relation to the business of the agency; 2 Bouvier, Inst. 28. Second, when the agent violates his obligations to his principal, either by exceeding his authority, or by positive misconduct, or by mere negligence or omissions in the discharge of the functions of his agency, or in any other manner, and any loss or damage falls on his principal, the latter will be entitled to full indemnity; 1 Livermore, Ag. 398; Story, Ag. § 217 e; 12 Pick. 328; 20 id. 167; 6 Hare, 366; 7 Beav. 176. But the loss or damage must be actual, and not merely probable or possible; Story, Ag. § 222; Paley, Ag. 7, 8, 74, 75. But see id. 74, note 2. Third, where both the principal and agent may maintain a suit against a third person for any matter relating to the agency, the principal has a right to supersede the agent by suing in his own name; and he may by his own intervention intercept, suspend, or extinguish the right of the agent under the contract; Story, Ag. § 403; 4 Camp. 194; 3 Hill, N. Y. 72, 73; 6 S. & R. 27; 2 Wash. C. C. 283; 7 Taunt. 237, 243; 1 Maule & S. 576. But, as we shall presently see, an exception to this rule arises in favor of the agent, to the extent of any lien, or other interest, or superior right, he may have in the property; Story, Ag. §§ 393, 397, 407, 408, 424.

In general, the principal, as against third persons, has a right to all the advantages and benefits of the acts and contracts of his agent, and is entitled to the same remedies against such third persons, in respect to such acts and contracts, as if they were made or done with him personally; Story, Ag. §§ 418, 420; Paley, Ag. 323; 8 La. 296; 2 Stark. 443. But to this rule there are the following exceptions. First, when the instrument is under seal, and it has been exclusively made between the agent and the third person, as, for example, a charter-party or bottomry bond made by the master of a ship in the course of his employment, in this case the principal cannot sue or be sued on it; Story, Ag. § 422; Abbott, Shipp. pt. 3, ch. 1, § 2: 4 Wend. 285; 1 Paine, 252; 3 Wash. C. C. 560. Second, when an exclusive credit is given to and by the agent, and therefore the principal cannot be considered in any manner a party to the contract, although he may have authorized it and be entitled to all the benefits arising from it. The case of a foreign factor buying or selling goods is an example of this kind: he is treated, as between himself and the other party, as the sole contractor, and the real principal cannot sue or be sued on the contract. This, it has been well observed, is a general rule of commercial law, founded upon the known usage of trade; and it is strictly adhered to, for the safety and convenience of foreign commerce; Story, Ag. § 423; Smith, Merc. Law. 66; 15 East, 62; 9 B. & C. 87; 4 Taunt. 574. Third, when the agent has a lien or claim upon the property bought or sold, or upon its proceeds, which is equal to or exceeds the amount of its value, the principal cannot sue without the consent of the agent; Story, Ag. §§ 403, 407, 408, 424.

But contracts are not unfrequently made without mentioning the name of the principal: in such case he may avail himself of the agreement; for the contract will be treated as that of the principal as well as of the agent. If, however, the person with whom the contract was made bonâ fide dealt with the agent as owner, he will be entitled to set off any claim he may have against the agent, in answer to the demand of the principal; and the principal's right to enforce contracts entered into by his agent is affected by every species of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of the agent which would defeat it if proceeding from himself; Story, Ag. §§ 420, 421, 440; 2 Kent, 632; Paley, Ag. 324, 325; 3 B. & P. 490; 7 Term, 359, 360, note; 24 Wend. 458; 3 Hill, 72.

Where the principal gives notice to the debtor not to pay money to the agent, unless the agent has a superior right, from a lien or otherwise, the amount of any payment afterwards made to the agent may be recovered by the principal from the debtor; Story, Ag. § 429; 4 Camp. 60; 6 Cow. 181, 186. Money paid by an agent may also be recovered by the principal under any of the following circumstances: first, where the consideration fails; second, where money is paid by an agent through mistake; third, where money is illegally extorted from an agent in the course of his employment; fourth, where the money of the principal has been fraudulently applied by the agent to an illegal and prohibited purpose; Paley, Ag. 335–337. When goods are intrusted to an agent for a specific purpose, a delivery by him for a different purpose, or in a manner not authorized by the commission, passes no property in them, and they may, therefore, be reclaimed by the owner; Paley, Ag. 340, 341; 3 Pick. 495. Third persons are also liable to the principal from any tort or injury done to his property or rights in the course of the agency. If both the agent and third person have been parties to the tort or injury, they are jointly as well as severally liable to the principal, and he may maintain an action against both or either of them; Story, Ag. § 436; 3 Maule & S. 562.

The liabilities of the principal are either to his agent or to third persons. The liabilities of the principal to his agent are—to reimburse him all his advances, expenses, and disbursements lawfully incurred about the agency, and also to pay him interest upon such advances and disbursements whenever interest may fairly be presumed to have been stipulated for or to be due to the agent; Story,

Ag. §§ 335, 336, 338; Story, Bailm. 196, 197; Paley, Ag. 107, 108; second, to pay him his commissions as agreed upon, or according to the usage of trade, except in cases of gratuitous agency; Story, Ag. § 324; Paley, Ag. 100–107; third, to indemnify the agent when, without his own default, he has sustained damages in following the directions of his principal: for example, when the agent has innocently sold the goods of a third person, under the direction or authority of his principal, and a third person recovers damages against the agent, the latter will be entitled to reimbursement from the principal; Story, Ag. § 339; 9 Metc. Mass. 212.

The principal is bound to fulfil all the engagements made by the agent for or in the name of the principal, and which come within the scope of his usual employment, although the agent in the particular instance has in fact exceeded or violated his private instructions; Story, Ag. 443; Smith, Merc. Law, 56–59; 4 Watts, 222; 21 Vt. 129; 26 Me. 84; 1 Wash. C. C. 174. And where an exclusive credit is not given to the agent, the principal is liable to third persons upon contracts made by his agent within the scope of his authority, although the agent contracts in his own name and does not disclose his agency; Story, Ag. § 446. But if the principal and agent are both known, and exclusive credit be given to the latter, the principal will not be liable though the agent should subsequently become insolvent; Story, Ag. § 447. When goods are sold to a person who in fact is the agent of another, but the seller has no knowledge of the agency, the latter may elect to make the principal his debtor on discovering him; 48 Conn. 314. The same principle applies where the seller is informed at the time of the sale that the buyer is an agent, but is not informed who the principal is; 9 B. & C. 78; 2 Metc. Mass. 319. Where money is paid by a third person to the agent, by mistake or upon a consideration that has failed, the principal will be liable to repay it although he may never have received it from his agent; Story, Ag. § 451; Paley, Ag. 293; 2 Esp. 509.

The principal is not, in general, liable to a criminal prosecution for the acts or misdeeds of his agent, unless he has authorized or co-operated in such acts or misdeeds; Story, Ag. § 452; Paley, Ag. 303; 1 Mood. & M. 433. He is, however, civilly liable to third persons for the misfeasance, negligence, or omission of duty of his agent in the course of the agency, although he did not authorize or know of such misconduct, or even although he forbade it; Story, Ag. § 452; Paley, Ag 294–307; 26 Vt. 112, 123; 6 Gill & J. 291; 20 Barb. 507; 7 Cush. 385; and he is liable for the injuries and wrongs of sub-agents who are retained by his direction, either express or implied; Story, Ag. § 454; Paley, Ag. 296; 1 B. & P. 409. But the responsibility of the principal for the negligence or unlawful acts of his agent is limited to cases properly within the scope of the agency. Nor is he liable for the wilful acts of his agent whereby damage is occasioned to another, unless he originally commanded or subsequently assented to the act; Paley, Ag. 298, 299; Story, Ag. § 456; 9 Wend. 268; 23 Pick. 25; 20 Conn. 284.

In Criminal Law. The actor in the commission of a crime.

Principals are of two kinds, namely, principals in the first degree, and principals in the second degree.

A principal in the first degree is one who is the actual perpetrator of the act. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 233, 615; 15 Ga. 346. But to constitute him such it is not necessary that he should be actually present when the offence is consummated; 3 Denio, 190. For if one lay poison purposely for another, who takes it and is killed, the offender, though absent when it was taken, is a principal in the first degree; Fost. 349; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 31, § 7; 4 Bla. Com. 34; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 257. And the offence may be committed in his absence, through the medium of an innocent agent: as, if a person incites a child under the age of discretion, or any other instrument excused from the responsibility of his actions by defect of understanding, ignorance of the fact, or other cause, to the commission of crime, the inciter, though absent when the fact was committed, is ex necessitate liable for the act of his agent and a principal in the first degree; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 514; 2 Leach, 978. But if the instrument be aware of the consequences of his act, he is a principal in the first degree; the employer, in such case, if present when the fact is committed, is a principal in the second degree, and, if absent, an accessary before the fact; Russ. & R. 163; 1 C. & K. 589; 1 Archb. Cr. Law, 58–60.

Principals in the second degree are those who are present aiding and abetting the commission of the fact. 2 Va. Cas. 356. They are generally termed aiders and abettors, and sometimes, improperly, accomplices; for the latter term includes all the participes criminis, whether principals in the first or second degree or mere accessaries. A person to be a principal in the second degree need not be actually present, an ear or eye-witness of the transaction. The presence may be constructive. He is, in construction of law, present aiding and abetting if, with the intention of giving assistance, he be near enough to afford it should the occasion arise. If, for instance, he be outside the house watching to prevent surprise or the like, whilst his companions are in the house committing a felony, such constructive presence is sufficient to make him a principal in the second degree; Foster, Cr. Law, 347, 350; 1 Russ. Cr. Law, 27; 1 Hale, 555; Wright, Ohio, 75; 9 Pick. 496; 9 C. & P. 437; 15 Ill. 511. There must, however, be a participation in the act; for although a person be present when a felony is committed, yet if he does not consent to the felonious purpose or contribute to its execution, he will not be a principal in the second degree merely because he does not endeavor to prevent the felony or apprehend the felon; 1 Russ. Cr. 27; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 439; Foster, Cr. Law, 350; 9 Ired. 440; 3 Wash. C. C. 223; 1 Wisc. 159; 1 Archb. Cr. Law, 61, 62.

The law recognizes no difference between the offence of principals in the first and principals in the second degree. And so immaterial is the distinction considered in practice that, if a man be indicted as principal in the first degree, proof that he was present aiding and abetting another in committing the offence, although his was not the hand which actually did it, will support the indictment; and if he be indicted as principal in the second degree, proof that he was not only present, but committed the offence with his own hand, will support the indictment. So, when an offence is punishable by a statute which makes no mention of principals in the second degree, such principals are within the meaning of the statute as much as the parties who actually commit the offence; 1 Archb. Cr. Law, 66, 67.

In treason, and in offences below felony, and in all felonies in which the punishment of principals in the first degree and of principals in the second degree is the same, the indictment may charge all who are present and abet the fact as principals in the first degree, provided the offence permits of a participation, or specially, as aiders and abettors; Archb. Cr. Pl. 7; 11 Cush. 422; 1 C. & M. 187. But where by particular statutes the punishment is different, then principals in the second degree must be indicted specially as aiders and abettors; Archb. Cr. Pl. 7. If indicted as aiders and abettors, an indictment charging that A gave the mortal blow, and that B, C, and D were present aiding and abetting, will be sustained by evidence that B gave the blow, and that A, C, and D were present aiding and abetting; and even if it appears that the act was committed by a person not named in the indictment, the aiders and abettors may, nevertheless, be convicted; Dougl. 207; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 350. And the same though the jury say that they are not satisfied which gave the blow, if they are satisfied that one of them did, and that the others were present aiding and abetting; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 52; 2 C. & K. 382.

PRINCIPAL CHALLENGE. See CHALLENGE.

PRINCIPAL CONTRACT. One entered into by both parties on their own accounts or in the several qualities they assume.

PRINCIPAL OBLIGATION. That obligation which arises from the principal object of the engagement which has been contracted between the parties. It differs from an accessory obligation. For example, in the sale of a horse, the principal obligation of the seller is to deliver the horse; the obligation to take care of him till delivered is an accessory engagement. Pothier, Obl. n. 182. By principal obligation is also understood the engagement of one who becomes bound for himself, and not for the benefit of another. Pothier, Obl. n. 186.

PRINCIPLES. By this term is understood truths or propositions so clear that they cannot be proved nor contradicted unless by propositions which are still clearer.

That which constitutes the essence of a body or its constituent parts. 8 Term, 107. See PATENTS.

They are of two kinds: one when the principle is universal, and these are known as axioms or maxims: as, no one can transmit rights which he has not; the accessory follows the principal, etc. The other class are simply called first principles. These principles have known marks by which they may always be recognized. These are—first, that they are so clear that they cannot be proved by anterior and more manifest truths; second, that they are almost universally received; third, that they are so strongly impressed on our minds that we conform ourselves to them whatever may be our avowed opinions.

First principles have their source in the sentiment of our own existence, and that which is in the nature of things. A principle of law is a rule or axiom which is founded in the nature of the subject, and it exists before it is expressed in the form of a rule. Domat, Lois Civiles, liv. prél. t. 1, s. 2; Toullier, tit. prél. n. 17. The right to defend one's self continues as long as an unjust attack, was a principle before it was ever decided by a court: so that a court does not establish but recognizes principles of law.

PRINTING. The art of impressing letters; the art of making books or papers by impressing legible characters.

The right to print is guaranteed by law, and the abuse of the right renders the guilty person liable to punishment. See LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; PRESS.

PRIORITY. Precedence; going before.

He who has the precedency in time has the advantage in right, is the maxim of the law; not that time, considered barely in itself, can make any such difference, but because, the whole power over a thing being secured to one person, this bars all others from obtaining a title to it afterwards; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 320.

In the payment of debts, the United States is entitled to priority when the debtor is insolvent or dies and leaves an insolvent estate. The priority was declared to extend to cases in which the insolvent debtor had made a voluntary assignment of all his property, or in which his effects had been attached as an absconding or absent debtor, on which an act of legal bankruptcy had been committed; 1 Kent, 243; 1 Phil. Int. Law, 219, 251, and the cases there cited.

Among common creditors, he who has the oldest lien has the preference,—it being a maxim both of law and equity, qui prior est tempore, potior est jure; 2 Johns. Ch. 608. See INSOLVENCY.

But in respect to privileged debts, arising ex contractu, existing against a ship or vessel under the general admiralty law, the order of priority is most generally that of the inverse order of their creation,—thus reversing the order of priority generally adopted in the courts of common law. The ground of this inversion of the rule is that the services performed at the latest hour are more efficacious in bringing the vessel and her freightage to their final destination. Each foregoing incumbrance is, therefore, actually benefited by means of the succeeding incumbrance; 16 Bost. Law Rep. 1, 264; 17 id. 421. See MARITIME LIENS; ASSETS.

PRISON. A public building for confining persons, either to insure their production in court, as accused persons and witnesses, or to punish, as criminals.

The root is French, as is shown by the Norman prisons, prisoners; Kelham, Norm. Fr. Dict.; and Fr. prisons, prisons. Britton, c. 11, de Prisons. Originally it was distinguished from gaol, which was a place for confinement, not for punishment. See Jacob, Dict. Gaol. But at present there is no such distinction. See PENITENTIARY.

PRISON-BREAKING. The act by which a prisoner, by force and violence, escapes from a place where he is lawfully in custody. This is an offence at common law. This offence is to be distinguished from rescue (q. v.) which is a deliverance of a prisoner from lawful custody by a third person. 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1065.

To constitute this offence there must be—a lawful commitment of the prisoner on criminal process; Co. 2d Inst. 589; 1 Carr. & M. 295; 2 Ashm. 61; 1 Ld. Raym. 424; an actual breach with force and violence of the prison, by the prisoner himself, or by others with his privity and procurement; Russ. & R. 458; 1 Russ. Cr. 380; the prisoner must escape; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 18, s. 12. See 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 607; 4 Bla. Com. 130; Co. 2d Inst. 500; 1 Gabb. Cr. Law, 305; Alison, Scotch Law, 555; Dalloz, Dict. Effraction; 3 Johns. 449; 5 Metc. Mass. 559.

PRISONER. One held in confinement against his will.

Lawful prisoners are either prisoners charged with crimes or for a civil liability. Those charged with crimes are either persons accused and not tried; and these are considered innocent, and are therefore entitled to be treated with as little severity as possible, consistently with the certain detention of their persons; they are entitled to their discharge on bail, except in capital cases; or those who have been convicted of crimes, whose imprisonment, and the mode of treatment they experience, is intended as a punishment: these are to be treated agreeably to the requisitions of the law, and, in the United States, always with humanity. See PENITENTIARY. Prisoners in civil cases are persons arrested on original or mesne process, and these may generally be discharged on bail; and prisoners in execution, who cannot be discharged except under the insolvent laws.

Persons unlawfully confined are those who are not detained by virtue of some lawful, judicial, legislative, or other proceeding. They are entitled to their immediate discharge on habeas corpus. For the effect of a contract entered into by a prisoner, see 1 Salk. 402, n.; 6 Toullier, 82.

Prisoners charged with the commission of crimes under the United States laws are to be confined in the prisons of the states, or in proper places of confinement provided by the marshals; 9 Cra. 80.

PRISONER OF WAR. One who has been captured while fighting under the banner of some state. He is a prisoner although never confined in a prison.

In modern times, prisoners are treated with more humanity than formerly: the individual captor has now no personal right to his prisoner. Prisoners are under the superintendence of the government, and they are now frequently exchanged. See 1 Kent, 14.

It is a general rule that a prisoner is out of the protection of the laws of the state so far that he can have no civil remedy under them, and he can, therefore, maintain no action. But his person is protected against all unlawful acts. Bacon, Abr. Abatement (B 3), Aliens (D).

PRIVATE. Affecting or belonging to individuals, as distinct from the public generally. Not clothed with office.

PRIVATE ACT. An act operating only upon particular persons and private concerns, and rather an exception than a rule. Opposed to public act. 1 Bla. Com. 86; 1 Term, 125; Plowd. 28; Dy. 75, 119; 4 Co. Rep. 76. Private acts ought not to be noticed by courts unless pleaded. As to the constitutionality of statutes empowering guardians and trustees to sell lands, see Cooley, Const. Lim. 118.

PRIVATEER. A vessel owned by one or more private individuals, armed and equipped at his or their expense, for the purpose of carrying on a maritime war, by the authority of one of the belligerent parties.

For the purpose of encouraging the owners of private armed vessels, they are usually allowed to appropriate to themselves the property they capture, or, at least, a large proportion of it; 1 Kent, 96; Pothier, du Dr. de Propr. n. 90 et seq. See 2 Dall. 36; 3 id. 334; 4 Cra. 2; 1 Wheat. 46; 3 id. 546; 5 id. 338; 2 Gall. 19, 56, 526; 1 Mas. 365; 3 Wash. C. C. 209. On the 16th of April, 1856, most of the great maritime powers, assembled in congress at Paris, agreed that privateers should not be allowed in war.

Spain and Mexico, though represented, did not join in this portion of the Declaration of Paris. And the United States, although urged to accede to it, declined. During the civil war in America, congress authorized the president to issue letters of marque, but he did not do so. The Confederates offered their letters of marque to foreigners, but they were not accepted. The ostensibly Confederate vessels were commissioned as of its regular navy. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law, 429.

PRIVEMENT ENCEINTE (L. Fr.). A term used to signify that a woman is pregnant, but not quick with child. See Wood, Inst. 662; ENCEINTE; FŒTUS; PREGNANCY.

PRIVIES. Persons who are partakers or have an interest in any action or thing, or any relation to another. Wood, Inst. b. 2, c. 3, p. 255; Co. Litt. 271 a.

There are several kinds of privies: namely, privies in blood, as the heir is to the ancestor; privies in representation, as is the executor or administrator to the deceased; privies in estate, as the relation between the donor and donee, lessor and lessee; privies in respect to contracts; and privies on account of estate and contract together. Prest. Conv. 327–345. Privies have also been divided into privies in fact and privies in law. 8 Co. 42 b. See Viner, Abr. Privity; 5 Comyns, Dig. 347; Hamm. Part. 131; Woodf. Landl. & T. 279; 1 Dane, Abr. c. 1, art. 6.

PRIVIGNUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Son of a husband or wife by a former marriage; a stepson. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PRIVILEGE. In Civil Law. A right which the nature of a debt gives to a creditor, and which entitles him to be preferred before other creditors. La. Code, art. 3153; Dalloz, Dict. Privilege; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 2, t. 1, s. 4, n. 1.

Creditors of the same rank of privileges are paid in concurrence, that is, on an equal footing. Privileges may exist either in movables or immovables, or in both at once. They are general or special, on certain movables. The debts which are privileged on all the movables in general are the following, which are paid in this order. Funeral charges. Law charges, which are such as are occasioned by the prosecution of a suit before the courts. But this name applies more particularly to costs, which the party cast has to pay to the party gaining the cause. It is in favor of these only that the law grants the privilege. Charges, of whatever nature, occasioned by the last sickness, concurrently among those to whom they are due. See LAST SICKNESS. The wages of servants for the year past, and so much as is due for the current year. Supplies of provisions made to the debtor or his family during the last six months by retail dealers, such as bakers, butchers, grocers, and during the last year by keepers of boarding-houses and taverns. The salaries of clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind. Dotal rights due to wives by their husbands.

The debts which are privileged on particular movables are—the debt of a workman or artisan, for the price of his labor, on the movable which he has repaired or made, if the thing continues still in his possession; that debt on the pledge which is in the creditor's possession; the carrier's charges and accessory expenses on the thing carried; the price due on movable effects, if they are yet in the possession of the purchaser; and the like. See LIEN.

Creditors have a privilege on immovables or real estate in some cases, of which the following are instances: the vendor, on the estate by him sold, for the payment of the price, or so much of it as is due, whether it be sold on or without a credit; architects and contractors, bricklayers, and other workmen, employed in constructing, rebuilding, or repairing houses, buildings, or making other works on such houses, buildings, or works by them constructed, rebuilt, or repaired; those who have supplied the owner with materials for the construction or repair of an edifice or other work, which he has erected or repaired out of these materials, on the edifice or other work constructed or repaired. La. Code, art. 3216.

See, generally, as to privilege, La. Code, tit. 21; Code Civ. tit. 18; Dalloz, Dict. Privilege; LIEN; LAST SICKNESS; PREFERENCE.

In Maritime Law. An allowance to the master of a ship of the general nature with primage, being compensation, or rather a gratuity, customary in certain trades, and which the law assumes to be a fair and equitable allowance, because the contract on both sides is made under the knowledge of such usage by the parties.

PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST. Privilege from arrest on civil process.

It is either permanent, as in case of ambassadors, public ministers, and their servants, the royal family and servants, peers and peeresses, etc., or temporary, as in case of members of both houses of congress, and of the state legislature, who are privileged eundo, manendo, et redeundo; 1 Kent, 243; Cooley, Const. Lim. 163; 8 R. I. 43; see 2 Stra. 985; practising barristers, while actually engaged in the business of the court; 2 Dowl. 51; 5 id. 86; 1 H. Blackst. 636; 1 M. & W. 488; 6 Ad. & E. 623; a clergyman in England whilst going to church, performing service, and returning; 7 Bingh. 320; witnesses and parties to a suit and bail, eundo, manendo, et redeundo; 5 B. & Ad. 1078; 6 Dowl. 632; 1 Stark. 470; 1 Maule & S. 638; 1 M. & W. 488; 6 Ad. & E. 623; and other persons who are privileged by law. See ARREST.

In case of the arrest of a legislator contrary to law, the house of which he is a member may give summary relief, by ordering his discharge, and if this be not complied with, by punishing the persons concerned in such arrest, as for contempt of its authority. If the house neglect to interfere, the court from which the process issued should set it aside, on the fact being shown to it; and any court or officer having authority to issue writs of habeas corpus, may inquire into the case and release the party; Cooley, Const. Lim. 163; Cush. Parl. Pract. §§ 546–597.

By the constitutions of some of the states, the privilege has been enlarged, so as to exempt the persons of legislators from any service of civil process; e. g. Michigan, Kansas, Nebraska, California, Wisconsin, Indiana, Oregon, and others.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS. A communication made bonâ fide upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contain criminatory matter which without this privilege would be slanderous and actionable.

Duty, in this canon, cannot be confined to legal duties, which may be enforced by indictment, action, or mandamus, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation; 5 E. & B. 347. The proper meaning of a privileged communication, said Mr. Baron Parke, is only this: that the occasion on which the communication was made rebuts the inference primâ facie arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts it upon him to prove that there was malice in fact,—that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made; 2 Cr. M. & R. 573. So, also, in 16 N. Y. 373.

The law recognizes two classes of cases in which the occasion either supplies an absolute defence, or a defence subject to the condition that the party acted bonâ fide without malice. The distinction turns entirely on the question of malice. The communications last mentioned lose their privilege on proof of express malice. (12 Fed. Rep. 526.) The former depend in no respect for their protection upon the bona fides of the defendant. The occasion is an absolute privilege, and the only questions are whether the occasion existed, and whether the matter complained of was pertinent to the occasion; Heard, Lib. & S. § 89.

As to communications which are thus absolutely privileged, it may be stated as the result of the authorities that no person is liable, either civilly or criminally, in respect of any thing published by him as a member of a legislative body, in the course of his legislative duty, nor in respect of any thing published by him in the course of his duty in any judicial proceeding. This privilege extends not only to parties, counsel, witnesses, jurors, and judges in a judicial proceeding, but also to proceedings in legislative bodies, and to all who, in the discharge of public duty or the honest pursuit of private right, are compelled to take part in the administration of justice or in legislation. A fair report of any judicial proceeding or inquiry is also privileged; Heard, Lib. & S. §§ 90, 103, 110; Odger, Lib. & S. *185.

"A communication is privileged when made in good faith in answer to one having an interest in the information sought, and it will be privileged if volunteered, when the party to whom it is made has an interest in it and such party stands in such relation to him as to make it a reasonable duty, or at least proper, that he should give the information.

"The verbal statements of a mercantile agency, made in relation to the plaintiffs' business credit and standing as merchants, to its subscribers who had an interest in knowing the facts, and in answer to inquiries made by them, if made in good faith and upon information on which defendant relied, are privileged, and cannot be made the foundation of an action. But daily 'notification sheets' sent to all the subscribers of such an agency without regard to the question whether they have any interest in the persons there referred to or their business, cannot be considered privileged communications. (See 46 N. Y. 188.)

"A communication which would otherwise be privileged, if made with malice in fact or through hatred, ill-will, and a malicious design to injure, is not a privileged communication, but the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to show malice in fact." 12 Fed. Rep. 526.

Information furnished by a charity organization society at the request of a person not a member, but who was interested, is a privileged communication; 13 Cent. L. J. 432. So are communications to a near relative respecting the character of a person with whom the relative is negotiating for a marriage; 8 C. & P. 88; but not by a stranger; 5 Allen, 170; so where one communicated to an employer his suspicions of dishonest conduct in a servant towards himself; 8 C. B. N. S. 597. See Towns. Lib. & S.; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

PRIVILEGED COPYHOLDS. Those copyholds which are held according to the custom of the manor, and not according to the will of the lord. They include ancient demesne and customary freehold. See CUSTOMARY COPYHOLD. 2 Woodd. Lect. 33–49; Lee, Abs. 63; 1 Crabb, R. P. 709, 919; 2 Bla. Com. 100.

PRIVILEGED DEBTS. Those which an executor or administrator, assignee in bankruptcy, etc., may pay in preference to others, such as funeral expenses, servants' wages, and doctors' bills during last sickness, etc. See PRIVILEGE.

PRIVILEGED DEED. In Scotch Law. An instrument, for example, a testament, in the execution of which certain statutory formalities usually required are dispensed with, either from necessity or expediency. Erskine, Inst. 3. 2. 22; Bell, Dict.

PRIVILEGES OF CITIZENS. The federal constitution provides that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states."

These have been enumerated as some of the principal privileges: Protection by the government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through or reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise, to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, to institute and maintain actions of every kind in the courts of the state, to take, hold, and dispose of property, and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the citizens of other states, etc.; 4 Wash. C. C. 371. Other judges have preferred to leave the meaning of the phrase to be determined as each case arises; 94 U. S. 391. See Cooley, Const. 188.

The constitution also declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States."

A citizen of the United States has been said to have a right as such to participate in foreign and inter-state commerce, to have the benefit of the postal laws, to make use in common with others of the navigable waters of the United States, to pass from state to state and into foreign countries; he may petition the federal authorities, visit the seat of government without being subjected to the payment of a tax for the privilege (6 Wall. 35), be the purchaser of public lands on the same terms as others, participate in the government if he comes within the conditions of suffrage, and demand the protection of the government on the high seas or in foreign countries; Cooley, Const. 246; see 16 Wall. 36. A state may not impose a tax upon travellers passing by public conveyance out of the state; 6 Wall. 35; nor impose conditions upon the rights of citizens of other states to sue its citizens in the federal courts; 20 Wall. 445. See 37 Iowa, 145.

PRIVILEGIUM (priva lex, i. e. de uno homine). In Civil Law. A private law inflicting a punishment or conferring a reward. Calvinus, Lex.; Cicero, de Legs, 3, 19, pro Domo, 17; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Every peculiar right by which one creditor or class of creditors is preferred to another in personal actions. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Every privilege granted by law in derogation of common right. Mackeldey, §§ 188, 189. A claim or lien on a thing, which once attaching continued till waiver or satisfaction, and which existed apart from possession. So at the present day in maritime law: e. g. the lien of seamen on ship for wages. 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 561–563.

PRIVILEGIUM CLERICALE (Lat.). The same as benefit of clergy.

PRIVITY. The mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 189; 6 How. 60.

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT. The relation which subsists between two contracting parties.

From the nature of the covenant entered into by him, a lessee has both privity of contract and of estate; and though by an assignment of his lease he may destroy his privity of estate, still the privity of contract remains, and he is liable on his covenant notwithstanding the assignment; Dougl. 458, 764; Viner, Abr.; 6 How. 60.

PRIVITY OF ESTATE. Identity of title to an estate.

The relation which subsists between a landlord and his tenant.

It is a general rule that a termor cannot transfer the tenancy or privity of estate between himself and his landlord without the latter's consent: an assignee who comes in only in privity of estate is liable only while he continues to be legal assignee; that is, while in possession under the assignment; Bacon, Abr. Covenant (I 4); Woodf. Landl. & T. 279; Viner, Abr.; Washb. R. P.

PRIVY. One who is a partaker or has any part or interest in any action, matter, or thing.

PRIVY COUNCIL. The chief council of the sovereign, called, by pre-eminence, "the Council," composed of those whom the king appoints. 1 Bla. Com. 229–232.

By statute of Charles II. in 1679, the number was limited to thirty,—fifteen the chief officers of the state ex virtute officii, the other fifteen at the king's pleasure; the number is now indefinite. A committee of the privy council was a court of ultimate appeal in admiralty and ecclesiastical cases and cases of lunacy, and from all dominions of the crown except Great Britain and Ireland. Its jurisdiction in lunacy and admiralty is now transferred to the Court of Appeal. See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.

PRIVY SEAL. In English Law. A seal which the king uses to such grants or things as pass the great seal. Co. 2d Inst. 554.

PRIVY SIGNET. The seal which is first used in making grants, etc. of the crown. It is always in custody of the secretary of state. 2 Bla. Com. 347; 1 Woodd. Lect. 250; 1 Steph. Com. 571.

PRIVY TOKEN. By stat. 33 Henry VIII. c. 1, punishment is provided against those evil-disposed persons who devised how they might unlawfully get into their possession goods, chattels, and jewels of other persons by "privy tokens and counterfeit letters in other men's names," unto divers persons, their friends and acquaintances, by color whereof they have unlawfully obtained the same. A false privy token within the statute has generally been taken to denote some seal, visible mark or thing, as a key, a ring, etc.; 13 Viner, Abr. 460. When one makes use of a false token, he is indictable for the cheat, though the act is not larceny; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 585. But when the consent obtained covers no more than the possession, and the goods are converted to his own use, the offence becomes larceny; 1 Leach, 420; East, Pl. Cr. 691.

PRIVY VERDICT. One which is delivered privily to a judge out of court.

PRIZE. In Maritime Law. The apprehension and detention at sea of a ship or other vessel, by authority of a belligerent power, either with the design of appropriating it, with the goods and effects it contains, or with that of becoming master of the whole or a part of its cargo. 1 C. Rob. 228.

The vessel or goods thus taken.

Goods taken on land from a public enemy are called booty; and the distinction between a prize and booty consists in this, that the former is taken at sea and the latter on land.

In order to vest the title of the prize in the captors, it must ordinarily be brought with due care into some convenient port for adjudication by a competent court. But circumstances may render such a step improper; and of these the captor must be the judge. In making up his decision, good faith and reasonable discretion are required; 18 How. 110; 1 Kent, 101. The condemnation must be pronounced by a prize court of the government of the captor sitting in the country of the captor or his ally: the prize court of an ally cannot condemn.

Strictly speaking, as between the belligerent parties the title passes, and is vested when the capture is complete; and that was formerly held to be complete and perfect when the battle was over and the spes recuperandi was gone. But by the modern usage of nations this is not sufficient to change the property. A judicial tribunal must pass upon the case; and the property is not charged in favor of a neutral vendee or recaptor, so as to bar the original owner, until a regular sentence of condemnation; 1 Kent, 102. See Phill. Int. Law, Index, Prize; 1 Kent, 101; Ab. Sh.; 2 Brown, Civ. Law, 444; Merl. Répert.; INFRA PRÆSIDIA.

In Contracts. A reward which is offered to one of several persons who shall accomplish a certain condition; as, if an editor should offer a silver cup to the individual who shall write the best essay in favor of peace. In this case there is a contract subsisting between the editor and each person who may write such essay that he will pay the prize to the writer of the best essay; Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 675.

PRIZE COURT. In English Law. That branch of admiralty which adjudicates upon cases of maritime captures made in time of war. A special commission issues in England, in time of war, to the judge of the admiralty court, to enable him to hold such court. See ADMIRALTY.

Some question has been raised whether the prize court is or is not a separate court from the admiralty court. Inasmuch as the commission is always issued to the judge of that court, and the forms of proceeding are substantially those of admiralty, while the law applicable is derived from the same sources, the fact that the commission of prize is only issued occasionally would hardly seem to render the distinction a valid one.

In the United States, the admiralty courts discharge the duties both of a prize and an instance court.

PRIZE FIGHT. A public prize fight is an indictable offence. No concurrence of wills can justify a public tumult and alarm; therefore, persons who voluntarily engage in a prize fight and their abettors are all guilty of assault; 4 C. & P. 537; 1 Cox, C. C. 177; 2 Bish. C. L. § 35. All persons guilty of aiding and abetting a prize-fight are guilty of an assault, but mere voluntary presence at a prize-fight does not, as a matter of law, necessarily render a person so present guilty of an assault in aiding and abetting in such fight, though it is evidence for the jury; 8 Q. B. Div. 534; see, also, 108 Mass. 302.

PROAVUNCULUS (Lat.). A great-grandmother's brother. Ainsworth, Dict.

PROBABILITY. Likelihood; consonance to reason; for example, there is a strong probability that a man of good moral character, and who has heretofore been remarkable for truth, will, when examined as a witness under oath, tell the truth; and, on the contrary, that a man who has been guilty of perjury will not, under the same circumstances, tell the truth: the former will, therefore, be entitled to credit, while the latter will not.

PROBABLE. Having the appearance of truth; appearing to be founded in reason.

PROBABLE CAUSE. Such a state of facts as to make it a reasonable presumption that their supposed existence was the cause of action.

Such conduct on the part of the accused as may induce the court to infer that the prosecution was undertaken from public motives. 1 Greenl. 135; s. c. 10 Am. Dec. 48. See, also, 72 Ill. 262; 83 id. 548; 4 Vt. 363; 62 N. Y. 525.

Whether the circumstances relied on to prove the existence of probable cause be true or not is a fact to be found by the jury; but whether if found to be true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law; 2 Q. B. 169; 29 Cal. 644; 27 Me. 266; 10 N. Y. 240; 20 Ohio, 119.

When there are grounds for suspicion that a person has committed a crime or misdemeanor, and public justice and the good of the community require that the matter should be examined, there is said to be a probable cause for making a charge against the accused, however malicious the intention of the accuser may have been; Cro. Eliz. 70; 2 Term, 231; 1 Wend. 140, 345; 5 Humphr. 357; 3 B. Monr. 4. See 1 Penn. 284; 6 W. & S. 236; 1 Meigs, 84; 3 Brev. 94. And probable cause will be presumed till the contrary appears.

In an action, then, for a malicious prosecution, the plaintiff is bound to show total absence of probable cause, whether the original proceedings were civil or criminal; 5 Taunt. 580; 1 Camp. 199; 2 Wils. 307; 1 Chitty, Pr. 48; see MALICIOUS PROSECUTION; 7 Cra. 339; 1 Mas. 24; 11 Ad. & E. 483; 1 Pick. 524; 24 id. 81; 8 Watts, 240; 3 Wash. C. C. 31; 6 W. & S. 336; 2 Wend. 424; 1 Hill, So. C. 82; 3 Gill & J. 377; 9 Conn. 309; 3 Blackf. 445.

In cases of municipal seizure for the breach of revenue, navigation, and other laws, if the property seized is not condemned, the party seizing is exempted from liability for such seizure if the court before which the cause is tried grants a certificate that there was probable cause for the seizure. If the seizure was without probable cause, the party injured has his remedy at common law; see 7 Cra. 339; 2 Wheat. 118; 9 id. 362; 16 Pet. 342; 3 How. 197; 4 id. 251; 13 id. 498.

PROBATE OF A WILL. The proof before an officer authorized by law that an instrument offered to be proved or registered is the last will and testament of the deceased person whose testamentary act it is alleged to be.

Jurisdiction. In England, the ecclesiastical courts were the only tribunals in which, except by special prescription, the validity of wills of personal estate could be established or disputed. Hence in all courts, the seal of the ecclesiastical court is conclusive evidence of the factum of a will of personalty; from which it follows that an executor cannot assert or rely on his authority in any other court, without showing that he has previously established it in the spiritual court,—the usual proof of which is the production of a copy of the will by which he is appointed, certified under the seal of the ordinary. This is usually called the probate.

The ecclesiastical courts have no jurisdiction of devises of lands; and in a trial at common law or in equity the probate of a will is not admissible as evidence, but the original will must be produced, and proved the same as any other disputed instrument. This rule has been modified by statute in some of the United States. In New York, the record, when the will is proved by the subscribing witnesses, is prima facie evidence, and provision is made for perpetuating the evidence. See 12 Johns. 192; 14 id. 407. In Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Michigan, the probate is conclusive of its validity, and a will cannot be used in evidence till proved; 12 Allen, 1; 1 Gall. 622; 2 Mich. Comp. Laws (1871), 1375; Battle Rev. 849. In Pennsylvania, the probate is not conclusive as to lands, and, although not allowed by the register's court, it may be read in evidence; 5 Rawle, 80; but it becomes conclusive as to realty, unless within five years from probate those interested shall contest its validity. In South Carolina the will must be proved de novo in the court of common pleas, though allowed in the ordinary; 1 N. & M'C. 326. In New Jersey, probate is necessary, but it is not conclusive; 1 Penn. N. J. 42; except in actions not commenced within seven years from the probate; N. J. Rev. Stat. 1250. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The effect of the probate in this country, and the rules in regard to jurisdiction, are generally the same as in England; but, as no ecclesiastical courts exist in the United States, probate is granted by some judicial officer, who performs the part of the ordinary in England, but generally with more ample powers in relation to the administration of the estate. See SURROGATE; LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The proof of the will is a judicial proceeding, and the probate a judicial act. The party propounding the instrument is termed the proponent, and the party disputing, the contestant. In England, proof ex parte was called probate in common form, and proof on notice to the next of kin, proof in solemn form. In the United States, generally speaking, proofs are not taken until citation or notice has been issued by the judge to all the parties interested to attend. On the return of the citation, the witnesses are examined, and the trial proceeds before the court. If the judge, when both parties have been heard, decides in favor of the will, he admits it to probate; if against the will, he rejects it.

More than one instrument may be proved; and where the contents of two or more instruments are not wholly inconsistent with each other, they may all be admitted as together constituting the last will and testament of the deceased; Williams, Exec. 281.

On the probate the alleged will may be contested on any ground tending to impeach its validity: as, that it was not executed in due form of law and according to the requisite statutory solemnities; that it was forged, or was revoked, or was procured by force, fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence over a weak mind, or that the testator was incompetent by reason of idiocy or lunacy.

PROBATION. The evidence which proves a thing. It is either by record, writing, the party's own oath, or the testimony of witnesses. Proof. It also signifies the time of a novitiate; a trial. Nov. 5.

PROBATOR. In Old English Law. Strictly, an accomplice in felony who to save himself confessed the fact, and charged or accused any other as principal or accessary, against whom he was bound to make good his charge. It also signified an approver, or one who undertakes to prove a crime charged upon another. Jacob, Law Dict.

PROBATORY TERM. In the British courts of admiralty, after the issue is formed between the parties, a time for taking the testimony is assigned. This is called a probatory term.

This term is common to both parties, and either party may examine his witnesses. When good cause is shown, the term will be enlarged. 2 Brown, Civ. Law, 418; Dunlop, Adm. Pr. 217.

PROBI ET LEGALES HOMINES (Lat.). Good and lawful men; persons competent in point of law to serve on juries. Cro. Eliz. 654, 751; Cro. Jac. 635; Mart. & Y. 147; Hard. 63; Bacon, Abr. Juries (A).

PROCEDENDO (Lat.). In Practice. A writ which issues where an action is removed from an inferior to a superior jurisdiction by habeas corpus, certiorari, or writ of privilege, and it does not appear to such superior court that the suggestion upon which the cause has been removed is sufficiently proved; in which case the superior court by this writ remits the cause to the court from whence it came, commanding the inferior court to proceed to the final hearing and determination of the same. See 2 W. Blackst. 1060; 1 Stra. 527; 6 Term, 365; 4 B. & Ald. 535; 16 East, 387.

PROCEEDING. In its general acceptation, this word means the form in which actions are to be brought and defended, the manner of intervening in suits, of conducting them, the mode of deciding them, of opposing judgments, and of executing.

Ordinary proceedings intend the regular and usual mode of carrying on a suit by due course at common law.

Summary proceedings are those where the matter in dispute is decided without the intervention of a jury: these must be authorized by the legislature, except perhaps in cases of contempt, for such proceedings are unknown to the common law.

In Louisiana there is a third kind of proceeding, known by the name of executory proceeding, which is resorted to in the following cases: When the creditor's right arises from an act importing a confession of judgment and which contains a privilege or mortgage in his favor; or when the creditor demands the execution of a judgment which has been rendered by a tribunal different from that within whose jurisdiction the execution is sought. La. Code, art. 732.

In New York the code of practice divides remedies into actions and special proceedings. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which one party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offence. Every other remedy is a special proceeding.

PROCEEDS. Money or articles of value arising or obtained from the sale of property. Goods purchased with money arising from the sale of other goods, or obtained on their credit, are proceeds of such goods. 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 201, 202. The sum, amount, or value of goods sold, or converted into money. Wharton Dict.

PROCERES (Lat.). The name by which the chief magistrates in cities were formerly known. St. Armand, Hist. Eq. 88.

PROCES-VERBAL. In French Law. A true relation in writing, in due form of law, of what has been done and said verbally in the presence of a public officer, and what he himself does upon the occasion. It is a species of inquisition of office.

The procès-verbal should be dated, contain the name, qualities, and residence of the public functionary who makes it, the cause of complaint, the existence of the crime, that which serves to substantiate the charge, point out its nature, the time, the place, the circumstances, state the proofs and presumptions, describe the place,—in a word, every thing calculated to ascertain the truth. It must be signed by the officer. Dalloz, Dict.

PROCESS. In Practice. The means of compelling a defendant to appear in court, after suing out the original writ, in civil, and after indictment, in criminal, cases.

The method taken by law to compel a compliance with the original writ or commands of the court.

In civil causes, in all real actions and for injuries not committed against the peace, the first step was a summons, which was served in personal actions by two persons called summoners, in real actions by erecting a white stick or wand on the defendant's grounds. If this summons was disregarded, the next step was an attachment of the goods of the defendant, and in case of trespasses the attachment issued at once without a summons. If the attachment failed, a distringas issued, which was continued till he appeared.

Here process ended in injuries not committed with force. In case of such injuries, an arrest of the person was provided for. See ARREST. In modern practice some of these steps are omitted; but the practice of the different states is too various to admit tracing here the differences which have resulted from retaining different steps of the process.

In the English law, process in civil causes is called original process, when it is founded upon the original writ; and also to distinguish it from mesne or intermediate process, which issues pending the suit, upon some collateral interlocutory matter, as, to summon juries, witnesses, and the like; mesne process is also sometimes put in contradistinction to final process, or process of execution; and then it signifies all process which intervenes between the beginning and end of a suit. 3 Bla. Com. 279. See REGULAR PROCESS.

In Patent Law. The art or method by which any particular result is produced.

A process, eo nomine, is not made the subject of a patent in our act of congress. It is included under the general term "useful art." Where a result or effect is produced by chemical action, by the operation or application of some element or power of nature, or of one substance to another, such modes, methods, or operations are called processes. A new process is usually the result of discovery; a machine, of invention. The arts of tanning, dyeing, making water-proof cloth, vulcanizing india-rubber, smelting ores, and numerous others, are usually carried on by processes, as distinguished from machines. But the term process is often employed more vaguely in a secondary sense in which it cannot be the subject of a patent. Thus, we say that a board is undergoing the process of being planed, grain of being ground, iron of being hammered or rolled. Here the term is used subjectively or passively, as applied to the material operated on, and not to the method or mode of producing that operation, which is by mechanical means, or the use of a machine as distinguished from a process. In this use of the term it represents the function of a machine, or the effect produced by it on the material subjected to the action of the machine, and does not constitute a patentable subject-matter, because there cannot be a valid patent for the function or abstract effect of a machine, but only for the machine which produces it. 15 How. 267, 268. See 2 B. & Ald. 349.

Letters patent for a process irrespective of the particular mode or form of apparatus for carrying it into effect are admissible under the laws of the United States. Whoever discovers that a certain useful result will be produced in any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, by the use of certain means, is entitled to a patent for it, provided he specifies the means he uses in a manner so full and exact that any one skilled in the science to which it appertains can, by using the means he specifies, without any addition to or subtraction from them, produce precisely the result he discovers; 15 How. 62, 115; 102 U. S. 727, 728.

PROCESS OF GARNISHMENT. See GARNISHMENT.

PROCESS OF INTERPLEADER. A means of determining the right to property claimed by each of two or more persons, which is in the possession of a third.

Formerly when two parties concurred in bailment to a third person of things which were to be delivered to one of them on the performance of a covenant or other thing, and the parties brought several actions of detinue against the bailee, the latter might plead the facts of the case and pray that the plaintiffs in the several actions might interplead with each other: this was called process of interpleader. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, ch. 23; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jeremy ed. 141; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 802.

PROCESS OF LAW. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW; 3 Morr. Transcr. 88.

PROCESSION. A peaceable procession in the streets of a town, if lawful, and the streets are not obstructed more than is ordinarily the case under such circumstances, is not an indictable offence on the part of those composing it; 72 N. C. 25.

The peaceable procession in the streets of a religious body, known as the Salvation Army, has been held lawful, although the members were aware of the lawless intention of their opponents to make it the occasion of a riot; 26 Soli. Journ. 505. See 26 Alb. L. J. 22.

PROCESSIONING. In Tennessee. A term used to denote the manner of ascertaining the boundaries of land, as provided for by the laws of that state. 1 Tenn. Comp. Stat. § 2020. The term is also used in North Carolina. 3 Murph. 504; 3 Dev. 268.

PROCHEIN (L. Fr.). Next. A term somewhat used in modern law, and more frequently in the old law: as, prochein ami, prochein cousin. Co. Litt. 10.

PROCHEIN AMI (L. Fr.; spelled, also, prochein amy and prochain amy). Next friend. He who, without being appointed guardian, sues in the name of an infant for the recovery of the rights of the latter, or does such other acts as are authorized by law: as, in Pennsylvania, to bind the infant apprentice. 3 S. & R. 172; 1 Ashm. 27. For some of the rules with respect to the liability or protection of a prochein ami, see 3 Madd. 468; 4 id. 461; 2 Stra. 709; 1 Dick. Ch. 346; 1 Atk. 570; 1 Ves. 409; 7 id. 425; 10 id. 184; Edwards, Parties, 182–204.

PROCLAMATION. The act of causing some state matters to be published or made generally known. A written or printed document in which are contained such matters, issued by proper authority: as, the president's proclamation, the governor's, the mayor's proclamation. The word proclamation is also used to express the public nomination made of any one to a high office: as, such a prince was proclaimed emperor.

The president's proclamation may give force to a law, when authorized by congress: as, if congress were to pass an act, which should take effect upon the happening of a contingent event, which was to be declared by the president by proclamation to have happened, in this case the proclamation would give the act the force of law, which till then it wanted. How far a proclamation is evidence of facts, see Bacon, Abr. Evidence (F); Dougl. 594, n.; Bull. N. P. 226; 12 Mod. 216; 8 State Tr. 212; 4 Maule & S. 546; 2 Camp. 44; Dane, Abr. ch. 96, a. 2, 3, 4; 6 Ill. 577; Brooke, Abr.

In Practice. The declaration made by the crier, by authority of the court, that something is about to be done.

It usually commences with the French word Oyez, do you hear, in order to attract attention: it is particularly used on the meeting or opening of the court, and at its adjournment; it is also frequently employed to discharge persons who have been accused of crimes or misdemeanors.

PROCLAMATION OF EXIGENTS. In Old English Practice. On awarding an exigent, in order to outlawry, a writ of proclamation issued to the sheriff of the county where the party dwelt, to make three proclamations for the defendant to yield himself or be outlawed.

PROCLAMATION OF A FINE. The proclamation of a fine was a notice, openly and solemnly given at all the assizes held in the county where the lands lay. It was made within one year after engrossing the fine; and anciently consisted in the fine as expressed being openly read in court sixteen times,—four times in the term in which it was made, and four times in each of the three succeeding terms. This, however, was afterwards reduced to one reading in each term. These proclamations were upon transcripts of the fine, sent by the justices of the common pleas to the justices of assize and the justices of the peace. Abb. Law Dic. See 2 Bla. Com. 352.

PROCLAMATION OF REBELLION. In Old English Practice. When a party neglected to appear upon a subpœna, or an attachment in chancery, a writ bearing this name issued; and, if he did not surrender himself by the day assigned, he was reputed and declared a rebel.

PROCREATION. The generation of children: it is an act authorized by the law of nature. One of the principal ends of marriage is the procreation of children. Inst. tit. 2, in pr.

PROCTOR. One appointed to represent in judgment the party who empowers him, by writing under his hand called a proxy. The term is used chiefly in the courts of civil, ecclesiastical, and admiralty law. The proctor is somewhat similar to the attorney. Ayliffe, Parerg. 421. By the Judicature Acts, proctors now practise in all divisions of the supreme court of judicature.

PROCURATION. In Civil Law. The act by which one person gives power to another to act in his place, as he could do himself. A letter of attorney.

An express procuration is one made by the express consent of the parties. An implied or tacit procuration takes place when an individual sues another managing his affairs and does not interfere to prevent it. Dig. 17. 1. 6. 2; 50. 17. 60; Code, 7. 32. 2.

Procurations are also divided into those which contain absolute power, or a general authority, and those which give only a limited power. Dig. 3. 3. 58; 17. 1. 60. 4. Procurations are ended in three ways: first, by the revocation of the authority; second, by the death of one of the parties; third, by the renunciation of the mandatory, when it is made in proper time and place and it can be done without injury to the person who gave it. Inst. 3. 27; Dig. 17. 1; Code, 4, 35. See AUTHORITY; LETTER OF ATTORNEY; MANDATE.

PROCURATIONS. In Ecclesiastical Law. Certain sums of money which parish priests pay yearly to the bishops or archdeacons ratione visitationis. Dig. 3. 39. 25; Ayliffe, Parerg. 429; 17 Viner, Abr. 544.

PROCURATOR, FISCAL. In Scotch Law. A public prosecutor. Bell, Dict.

PROCURATOR LITIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who by command of another institutes and carries on for him a suit. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Procurator is properly used of the attorney of actor (the plaintiff), defensor of the attorney of reus (the defendant). It is distinguished from advocatus, who was one who undertook the defence of persons, not things, and who was generally the patron of the person whose defence he prepared, the person himself speaking it. It is also distinguished from cognitor, who conducted the cause in the presence of his principal, and generally in cases of citizenship; whereas the procurator conducted the cause in the absence of his principal. Calvinus, Lex.

PROCURATOR IN REM SUAM. In Scotch Law. A term which imports that one is acting as attorney as to his own property. When an assignment of a thing is made, as a debt, and a procuration or power of attorney is given to the assignee to receive the same, he is in such case procurator in rem suam. 3 Stair, Inst. 1. 2. 3, etc.; 3 Erskine, Inst. 3. 5. 2; 1 Bell, Dict. b. 5, c. 2, s. 1, § 2.

PROCURATORIUM (Lat.). The proxy or instrument by which a proctor is constituted and appointed.

PRODIGAL. In Civil Law. A person who, though of full age, is incapable of managing his affairs, and of the obligations which attend them, in consequence of his bad conduct, and for whom a curator is therefore appointed.

PRODITORIE (Lat.). Treasonably. This is a technical word formerly used in indictments for treason, when they were written in Latin. Tomlins.

PRODUCENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. He who produces a witness to be examined.

PRODUCTION OF SUIT (productio sectæ). The concluding clause of all declarations is, " and thereupon he brings his suit." In old pleading this referred to the production by the plaintiff of his secta or suit, i.e. persons prepared to confirm what he had stated in the declaration.

The phrase has remained ; but the practice from which it arose is obsolete ; 3 Bla. Com. 295 ; Steph. Pl. 428.

PROFANE. That which has not been consecrated. By a profane place is understood one which is neither sacred, nor sanctified, nor religious. Dig. 11. 7. 2. 4.

PROFANELY. In a profane manner. In an indictment, under the act of assembly of Pennsylvania, against profanity, it is requisite that the words should be laid to have been spoken profanely ; 11 S. & R. 394.

PROFANENESS, PROFANITY. In Criminal Law. A disrespect to the name of God or His divine providence. This is variously punished by statute in the several states. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 560, 588.

PROFECTITUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. That which descends to us from our ascendants. Dig. 23. 3. 5.

PROFERT IN CURIA (Lat. he produces in court : sometimes written profert in curiam, with the same meaning). In Pleading. A declaration on the record that a party produces the deed under which he makes title in court. In ancient practice, the deed itself was actually produced ; in modern times, the allegation only is made in the declaration, and the deed is then constructively in possession of the court ; 3 Salk. 119 ; 6 M. & G. 277 ; 11 Md. 322.

Profert is, in general, necessary when either party pleads a deed and claims rights under it, whether plaintiff ; 2 Dutch. 293 ; or defendant ; 17 Ark. 279 ; to enable the court to inspect and construe the instrument pleaded, and to entitle the adverse party to oyer thereof ; 10 Co. 92 b ; 1 Chitty, Pl. 414 ; 1 Archb. Pr. 164 ; and is not necessary when the party pleads it without making title under it ; Gould, Pl. c. 7, p. 2, § 47. But a party who is actually or presumptively unable to produce a deed may plead it without profert, as in suit by a stranger ; Comyns, Dig. Pleader, O 8 ; Cro. Jac. 217 ; Cro. Car. 441 ; Carth. 316 ; or one claiming title by operation of law ; Co. Litt. 225 ; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (I 12) ; 5 Co. 75 ; or where the deed is in the possession of the adverse party or is lost. In all these cases the special facts must be shown, to excuse the want of profert. See Gould, Pl. c. 8, p. 2 ; Lawes, Pl. 96 ; 1 Saund. 9 a, note. Profert and oyer are abolished in England by the Common Law Procedure Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76 ; and a provision exists, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, for allowing inspection of all documents in the possession or under the control of the party against whom the inspection is asked. See 25 E. L. & E. 304. In many of the states of the United States profert has been abolished, and in some instances the instrument must be set forth in the pleading of the party relying upon it. The operation of profert and oyer, where allowed, is to make the deed a part of the pleadings of the party producing it ; 11 Md. 322 ; 3 Cra. 234. See 7 Cra. 176.

PROFESSION. A public declaration respecting something. Code, 10. 41. 6. A state, art, or mystery : as, the legal profession. Dig. 1. 18. 6. 4 ; Domat, Dr. Pub. l. 1, t. 9, s. 1, n. 7.

An excess of the value of returns over the value of advances.

The excess of receipts over expenditures ; that is, net earnings. 15 Minn. 519.

The receipts of a business, deducting current expenses ; it is equivalent to net receipts. 94 U. S. 500.

This is a word of very extended signification. In commerce, it means the advance in the price of goods sold beyond the cost of purchase. In distinction from the wages of labor, it is well understood to imply the net return to the capital or stock employed, after deducting all the expenses, including not only the wages of those employed by the capitalist, but the wages of the capitalist himself for superintending the employment of his capital or stock. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nat. b. I. c. 6, and M'Culloch's Notes ; Mill, Polit. Econ. c. 15. After indemnifying the capitalist for his outlay there commonly remains a surplus, which is his profit, the net income from his capital. 1 Mill, Polit. Econ. c. 15. The word profit is generally used by writers on political economy to denote the difference between the value of advances and the value of returns made by their employment.

The profit of the farmer and the manufacturer is the gain made by the sale of produce or manufactures, after deducting the value of the labor, materials, rents, and all expenses, together with the interest of the capital employed,—whether land, buildings, machinery, instruments, or money. The rents and profits of an estate, the income or the net income of it, are all equivalent expressions. The income or the net income of an estate means only the profit it will yield after deducting the charges of management; 5 Me. 202; 35 id. 420.

Under the term profit is comprehended the produce of the soil, whether it arise above or below the surface: as, herbage, wood, turf, coals, minerals, stones; also fish in a pond or running water. Profits are divided into profits à prendre, or those taken and enjoyed by the mere act of the proprietor himself, and profits à vendre, namely, such as are received at the hands of and rendered by another. Hamm. N. P. 172.

Profits are divided by writers on political economy into gross and net,—gross profits being the whole difference between the value of advances and the value of returns made by their employment, and net profits being so much of that difference as is attributable solely to the capital employed. The remainder of the difference, or, in other words, the gross profits minus the net profits, has no particular name; but it represents the profits attributable to industry, skill, and enterprise. See Malthus, Def. in Polit. Econ.; M'Culloch, Polit. Econ. 563. But the word profit is generally used in a less extensive signification, and presupposes an excess of the value of returns over the value of advances.

Using profit in this more limited and popular sense, persons who share profits do not necessarily share losses; for they may stipulate for a division of gain, if any, and yet some one or more of them may, by agreement, be entitled to be indemnified against losses by the others: so that whilst all share profits, some only bear losses. Persons who share gross returns share profits in the sense of gain; but they do not by sharing the returns share losses, for these fall entirely on those making the advances. Moreover, although a division of gross returns is a division of profits if there are any, it is so only incidentally, and because such profits are included in what is divided: it is not a division of profits as such; and under an agreement for a division of gross returns, whatever is returned must be divided, whether there be profit or loss, or neither; 1 Lindl. Part. Engl. ed. 10. These considerations have led to the distinction between agreements to share profits and agreements to share gross returns, and to the doctrine that, whilst an agreement to share profits creates a partnership, an agreement to share gross returns does not; 1 Lindl. Part. Engl. ed. 11. See 10 Vt. 170; 12 Conn. 69; 1 Campb. 329; 2 Curt. C. C. 609; 38 N. H. 287, 304.

Commissions may be considered as profits, for some purposes. A participation in commissions has been held such a participation in profits as to constitute the participants partners; 2 H. Blackst. 235; 4 B. & Ald. 663. So, commissions received from the sales of a pirated map are profits which must be accounted for by the commission merchant on a bill by the proprietor of the copyright; 2 Curt. C. C. 608. As between partners, all gains which equitably belong to the firm, but which are clandestinely received by one partner, are accounted profits of the firm; Story, Part. § 174; 2 Curt. C. C. 608, 609.

Depreciation of buildings in which a business is carried on, though they were erected by expenditure of the capital invested, is not ordinarily or necessarily considered in estimating the profits; 94 U. S. 500.

A direction or power given in a will to raise money out of the rents and profits of an estate for the payment of debts and legacies, or to raise a portion within a definite period, within which it could not be raised out of the annual rents and profits, authorizes a sale; 2 Ch. Cas. 205; 1 Vern. 104; 2 id. 26, 310, 420, 424; 1 Ves. Sen. 491; 1 Atk. 550. And judges in latter times, looking to the inconvenience of raising a large sum of money in this manner, have inclined much to treat a trust to apply the rents and profits in raising a portion, even at an indefinite period, as authorizing a sale or mortgage; 2 Jarm. Wills, 282, 383; 1 Ves. 234; 1 Atk. 505; 1 Ves. Sen. 42. But, as a general rule, the question whether the money is to be raised by a sale or mortgage or out of the annual rents and profits will depend upon the nature of the purpose for which the money is to be raised, and the general tenor of the will; 2 Jarm. Wills, 383, 384; 3 Bro. P. C. 66; 8 Y. & J. 360; 1 Atk. 550; 1 Russ. & M. 590; 8 id. 97; 2 P. Wms. 63. The circumstances that have chiefly influenced the decisions are —the appointment of a time within which the charge cannot be raised by annual profits; the situation of the estate, where a sale or mortgage would be very prejudicial, as in the case of a reversion, especially if it would occasion any danger that the charge would not be answered in its full extent; the nature of the charge, as where it is for debts or portions, and, in the latter instance, the age or death of the child; 2 Ves. 480, n. 1; 1 Ch. Cas. 170; 2 id. 205; 1 Vern. 256; 2 id. 26, 72, 420; 2 P. Wms. 18, 650; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 440, n. (o); 1 Atk. 506, 550; 2 id. 358. But in no case where there are subsequent restraining words has the word profit been extended; Prec. Ch. 586, note, and the cases cited there; 1 Atk. 506; 2 id. 105.

A devise of the rents and profits of land is equivalent to a devise of the land itself, and will carry the legal as well as the beneficial interest therein; 1 Ves. Sen. 171; 2 B. & Ald. 42; Plowd. 540; 9 Mass. 372; 1 Cush. 93; 1 Ashm. 131; 1 Spenc. 142; 17 Wend. 393; 5 Me. 119; 35 id. 414; 1 Atk. 506; 2 id. 358; 1 Bro. C. C. 310. A direction by the testator that a certain person shall receive for his support the net profits of the land is a devise of the land itself, for such period of time as the profits were devised; 35 Me. 419.

An assignment of the profits of an estate amounts to an equitable lien and would entitle the assignee in equity to insist upon a mortgage. Thus, if a tenant for life of the real estate should, by covenant, agree to set apart and pay the whole or a portion of the annual profits of that estate to trustees for certain objects, it would create a lien in the nature of a trust on those profits against him and all persons claiming as volunteers or with notice under him; 2 Cox, Ch. 253; s. c. 1 Ves. 477; 3 Bro. C. C. 531, 538.

Profits expected to arise from merchandise employed in maritime commerce are a proper subject of insurance in England and in the United States; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, ch. 3, § 8; 3 Kent, 271; 16 Pick. 399; 5 Metc. Mass. 391; 1 Sumn. 451. So in Italy; Targa, cap. xliii. no. 5; Portugal; Santerna, part iii. no. 40; and the Hanse Towns; 2 Magnus, 213; Beneck, Ass. chap. 1, sect. 10. vol. 1, p. 170. But in France; Code de Comm. art. 347; Holland; Bynkershoeck, Quæst. Priv. Jur. lib. iv. c. 5; and in Spain, except to certain distant parts; Ordinanzas de Bilboa, ch. xxii. art. 7, 8, 11; it is illegal to insure expected profits. Such insurance is required by the course and interest of trade, and has been found to be greatly conducive to its prosperity; 3 Kent, 271; Lawrence, J., 2 East, 544; 1 Arnould, Ins. 204, 205. Sometimes the profits are included in a valuation of the goods from which they are expected to arise; sometimes they are insured as profits; 1 Johns. 433; 3 Pet. 222; 1 Sumn. 451; 6 E. & B. 312; 2 East, 544; 6 id. 316. They must be insured as profits; May, Ins. § 79. They may be insured equally by valued and by open policies; 1 Arnould, Ins. 205; 3 Camp. 267. But it is more judicious to make the valuation; 1 Johns. 433; 3 Kent, 273. The insured must have a real interest in the goods from which the profits are expected; 3 Kent, 271; but he need not have the absolute property in them; 16 Pick. 397, 400; see May, Ins. § 79.

A trustee, executor, or guardian, or other person standing in a like relation to another, may be made to account for and pay all the profits made by him in any of the concerns of his trust, as by embarking the trust funds in trade; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 465; 2 My. & K. 66, 672, note; 1 Ves. 32, 41, 42, 43, in note; 11 id. 61; 2 V. & B. 315; 1 J. & W. 122, 131; 2 Will. Exec. 1311; 1 S. & R. 245; 1 Maule & S. 412; 2 Bro. C. C. 400; 10 Pick. 77; Lind. Part.

The expected profits of a special contract may be reckoned as a part of the damages for a failure to fulfil it, where it appears that such profits would have accrued from the contract itself as the direct and immediate consequence of its fulfilment; 13 How. 307, 344; 7 Cush. 516, 522, 523; 8 Exch. 401; 16 N. Y. 489; Mayne, Damages, 15, 16; 2 C. B. N. s. 592. But where the profits are such only as were expected to result from other independent bargains actually entered into on the faith of such special contract, or for the purposes of fulfilling it, or are contingent upon future bargains or speculations or states of the market, they are too remote and uncertain to be relied upon as a proper basis of damages; 13 How. 307, 344; 38 Me. 361; 7 Cush. 516, 522, 523; 7 Hill, 61; 13 C. B. 353. See, also, 21 Pick. 378, 381; 1 Pet. C. C. 85, 94; 3 Wash. C. C. 184; 1 Pet. 172; 11 S. & R. 445.

A purchaser is entitled to the profits of the estate from the time fixed upon for completing the contract, whether he does or does not take possession of the estate; 2 Sugd. Vend. ch. 16, sect. 1, art. 1; 6 Dana, 298; 3 Gill, 82. See 12 M. & W. 761.

Under what circumstances a participation or sharing in profits will make one a partner in a trade or adventure, see PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

PROGRESSION (Lat. progressio; from pro and gredior, to go forward). That state of a business which is neither the commencement nor the end. Some act done after the matter has commenced and before it is completed. Plowd. 343. See CONSUMMATION; INCEPTION.

PROHIBITION (Lat. prohibitio; from pro and habeo, to hold back). In Practice. The name of a writ issued by a superior court, directed to the judge and parties of a suit in an inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution of the same, upon a suggestion that the cause originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognizance of some other court. 3 Bla. Com. 112; Comyns, Dig.; Bacon, Abr.; Saund. Index; Viner, Abr.; 2 Sell. Pr. 308; Ayliffe, Parerg. 434; 2 H. Blackst. 533.

The writ of prohibition may also be issued when, having jurisdiction, the court has attempted to proceed by rules differing from those which ought to be observed; Bull. N. P. 219; or when by the exercise of its jurisdiction, the inferior court would defeat a legal right; 2 Chitty, Pr. 355.

PROHIBITIVE IMPEDIMENTS. Those impediments to a marriage which are only followed by a punishment, but do not render the marriage null. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law, 44.

PROJET. In International Law. The draft of a proposed treaty or convention.

PROLES (Lat.). Progeny; such issue as proceeds from a lawful marriage; and, in its enlarged sense, it signifies any children.

PROLETARIUS. In Civil Law. One who had no property to be taxed, and paid a tax only on account of his children (proles); a person of mean or common extraction. The word has become, in French, prolétaire, signifying one of the common people.

PROLICIDE (Lat. proles, offspring, cædere, to kill). In Medical Jurisprudence. A word used to designate the destruction of the human offspring. Jurists divide the subject into fœticide, or the destruction of the fœtus in utero, and infanticide, or the destruction of the new born infant. Ryan, Med. Jur. 137.

PROLIXITY. The unnecessary and superfluous statement of facts in pleading or in evidence. This will be rejected as impertinent. 7 Price, 278, n.

PROLOCUTOR (Lat. pro and loquor, to speak before). In Ecclesiastical Law. The president or chairman of a convocation.

PROLONGATION. Time added to the duration of something.

When the time is lengthened during which a party is to perform a contract, the sureties of such a party are, in general, discharged, unless the sureties consent to such prolongation. See GIVING TIME.

In the civil law the prolongation of time to the principal did not discharge the surety; Dig. 2. 14. 27; 12. 1. 40.

PROLYTÆ (Lat.). In Roman Law. The term used to denominate students of law during the fifth and last year of their studies. They were left during this year very much to their own direction, and took the name (προλυτα) prolytæ omnino soluti. They studied chiefly the Code and the imperial constitutions. See Dig. Pref. Prim. Const. 2; Calvinus, Lex.

PROMATERTERA (Lat.). Great maternal aunt; the sister of one's grandmother. Inst. 3. 6. 3; Dig. 38. 10. 10. 14 et seq.

PROMISE (Lat. promitto, to put forward). An engagement by which the promisor contracts with another to perform or do something to the advantage of the latter.

When a promise is made, all that is said at the time in relation to it must be considered: if, therefore, a man promises to pay all he owes, accompanied by a denial that he owes any thing, no action will lie to enforce such a promise; 15 Wend. 187.

And when the promise is conditional, the condition must be performed before it becomes of binding force; 7 Johns. 36. See CONDITION; CONTRACTS; 5 East, 17; 2 Leon. 224; 4 B. & Ald. 595.

PROMISE OF MARRIAGE. A contract mutually entered into by a man and a woman that they will marry each other. Every marriage is necessarily preceded by an express or implied contract of this description, as a wedding cannot be agreed upon and celebrated at one and the same instant; Addison, Contr. 676.

A promise of marriage is not to be likened to an actual marriage. The latter, as has been seen in the article on marriage, is not a contract, but a legal relation; while the former is an executory contract in the strict sense of the term, and governed in general by the ordinary law of contracts, though it has certain peculiarities of its own. As in other contracts, the parties must be sui juris. If, therefore, the man or the woman be an infant, or labor under any other legal disability, he or she will not be bound by a promise of marriage; but if one of the parties be an infant and the other be an adult, the promise will be binding upon the latter; Stra. 937; 5 Cow. 475; 7 id. 22; 5 Sneed, 659; 1 D. Chipm. 252. A promise made during infancy may be ratified after the infant attains majority. A late English statute requires a new and distinct contract, after majority, in order to bind the infant on his promise to marry after he comes of age; but a new contract may be inferred from continued acceptance of the engagement; L. R. 5 C. P. 410; and see 4 C. P. Div. 485. Neither does it follow, as we shall see presently, that a promise of marriage is not binding because the parties to the promise cannot form a valid marriage; they may be competent to contract, though not competent to marry.

There must be a legal and valid consideration; but as there are always mutual promises, they are a sufficient consideration for each other. There must be a meeting of the minds of the parties, i.e. a request or proposition on the one side, and an assent on the other. If the communications between the parties are verbal, the only questions which usually arise relate to evidence and proof. The very words or time or manner of the promise need not be proved, but it may be inferred from the conduct of the parties, and from the circumstances which usually attend an engagement to marry: as, visiting, the understanding of friends and relations, preparations for marriage, and the reception of the man by the woman's family as a suitor; 3 Salk. 16; 15 Mass. 1; 2 D. & C. 282; 2 Penn. 80; 13 id. 331; 1 Ohio St. 26; 2 C. & P. 553; 1 Stark. 82; 6 Cow. 254; 26 Conn. 398; 4 Zabr. 291. But as to the evidence of a contract to marry, more direct proof is now commonly required than formerly, since modern statutes permit parties themselves to take the stand; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 43. Therefore a promise cannot be inferred from devoted attention, frequent visits, and apparently exclusive attention; 53 N. Y. 267; nor from mere presents or letters not to the point; see 2 Brewst. 487; nor from the plaintiff's wedding preparations, unknown to the defendant; 48 Ind. 562; 63 Ill. 41; nor from the woman's unexplained possession of an engagement ring; 2 Brewst. 487. See generally 53 N. Y. 267. When the parties are at a distance from each other, and the offer is made by letter, it will be presumed to continue for a reasonable time for the consideration of the party addressed; and if accepted within a reasonable time, and before it is expressly revoked, the contract is then complete; 1 Pars. Contr. b. 2, c. 2. No particular form of words is necessary; 53 N. Y. 267.

A promise of marriage is not within the third clause of the fourth section of the Statute of Frauds, relating to agreements made upon consideration of marriage; but if not to be performed within a year, it has been held to be within the fifth clause, and must, therefore, be in writing in order to be binding; 1 Stra. 34; 1 Ld. Raym. 387; 58 Ind. 29; 2 N. H. 515. But the latest cases are inclined to construe the statute so as not to affect promises to marry; 56 Me. 187; 20 Conn. 495; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 44; the marriage may be performed within a year, and that is enough; see 85 Ill. 222.

If no time be fixed and agreed upon for the performance of the contract, it is, in contemplation of law, a contract to marry within a reasonable period, considering the circumstances of the age, pecuniary means, etc., of the contracting parties, and either party may call upon the other to fulfil the engagement, and in case of default may bring an action for damages. If both parties lie by for an unreasonable period, and do not treat the contract as continuing, it will be deemed to be abandoned by mutual consent. If the parties are somewhat advanced in years, and the marriage is appointed to take place at a remote period of time, the contract would be voidable at the option of either party, as in restraint of marriage; Addison, Contr. 678.

Upon a refusal to marry, an action lies at once, although the time set for the marriage has not come; 42 N. Y. 246; so if a party puts it out of his power to perform his promise of marriage; 27 Mich. 217; 15 M. & W. 189. A refusal to fulfil the contract may be as well manifested by acts as by words. After the lapse of a reasonable time, if one party, without excuse, neglects or refuses to fulfil his promise, the other may consider this a breach and sue; 42 Mich. 346.

The defences which may be made to an action for a breach of promise of marriage are, of course, various; but it is only necessary to notice in this place such as are in some degree peculiar. Thus, if either party has been convicted of an infamous crime, or has sustained a bad character generally, and the other was ignorant of it at the time of the engagement, or if the woman has committed fornication, and this was unknown at the time to the man who promised to marry her, or if the woman prove unchaste subsequently; 77 Penn. 504; 51 Ill. 288; or if the woman is deeply involved in debt at the time of the engagement, and the fact is kept secret from her intended husband; Addison, Contr. 680; but see 1 E. B. & E. 7, 96; or if false representations are made by the woman, or by her friends in collusion with her, as to her circumstances and situation in life and the amount of her fortune and marriage portion, either of these will constitute a good defence; 1 C. & P. 350, 529; 3 Esp. 236; 44 Me. 164; 1 C. & K. 463; 3 Bingh. N. C. 54; 5 La. An. 316; 18 Ill. 44. But it has been held not to be a defence that the plaintiff at the time of the engagement was under an engagement to marry another person, unless the prior engagement was fraudulently concealed; 1 E. B. & E. 796. But see 1 Pars. Contr. 550. And the defendant's pre-engagement would be no defence; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 48.

If after the engagement either party is guilty of gross misconduct, inconsistent with the character which he or she was fairly presumed to possess, the other party will be released; 4 Esp. 256; so if either party is guilty of acts of unchastity after the making the promise, the other party will be absolved; 51 Ill. 288; 77 Penn. 504; but mutual improprieties and lewdness between the parties will not be allowed to bar the action or to go in mitigation or aggravation of damages; 3 Pittsb. 84. If the engagement is made without any agreement respecting the woman's property, and she afterwards disposes of any considerable portion of it without her intended husband's knowledge and consent, or if she insists upon having her property settled to her own separate use, it is said that this will justify him in breaking off the engagement; Addison, Contr. 680. So, if the situation and position of either of the parties as regards his or her fitness for the marriage relation is materially and permanently altered for the worse (whether with or without the fault of such party) after the engagement, this will release the other party. Thus, if one of the parties is attacked by blindness, or by an incurable disease, or any malady calculated permanently to impair and weaken the constitution, this will dispense with the performance of the contract on the part of the other party; Addison, Contr. 681; Pothier, Tr. du Mar. no. 1, 60, 61, 63. (In 1 Abb. app. sec. 282, it was held that evidence that the plaintiff drank intoxicating liquors to excess was not admissible as a defence.) Whether it will also constitute a defence for the party afflicted, is a question of much difficulty. In 1 E. B. & E. 746, 765, where it appeared that the defendant since the engagement had become afflicted with consumption, whereby he was rendered incapable of marriage without great danger of his life, it was held, by six judges against five, that this constituted no defence; though it seemed to be agreed that it would have been a good defence for the other party.

The common opinion that an agreement to marry between persons incapable of forming a valid marriage is necessarily void, is erroneous. If the disability pertains only to one of the parties, and the other party was ignorant of it at the time of the engagement, it will constitute no defence for the former. Thus, if a man who already has a wife living makes a promise of marriage to another woman who is ignorant of the former marriage, he will be liable in damages for a breach of his promise, although a performance is impossible; 2 C. & P. 553; 7 C. B. 999; 5 Exch. 775; 29 Barb. 22; 106 Mass. 339. Otherwise, if the woman knew at the time the engagement to marry was entered into, that the man was married; 39 N. J. L. 133; 63 Ill. 99. Knowledge that the man was married, obtained by the woman subsequently to the engagement to marry, is not a defence, but may go in mitigation of damages; 1 Heisk. 368.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage, the court will not interfere with the discretion of the jury as to the amount of damages, unless there has been some obvious error or misconception on their part, or it is made apparent that they have been actuated by improper motives; 1 C. B. N. S. 660; 1 Y. & J. 477; 26 Conn. 398. And if the defendant has undertaken to rest his defence, in whole or in part, on the general bad character or the criminal conduct of the plaintiff, and fails altogether in the proof, the jury may take this into consideration as enhancing the damages; 6 Cow. 254; 27 Mo. 600. Where such an action is brought by a woman, she may prove, in aggravation of damages, that the defendant, under color of a promise of marriage, has seduced her; 106 id. 395; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 838 n.; 42 Mich. 346; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 442; 37 Wisc. 46; 33 Md. 288; s. c. 3 Am. Rep. 174; L. R. 1 C. P. 331; 8 Barb. 323; 2 Ind. 402; 3 Mass. 73. But see, contra, 2 Penn. 80, commented on in 11 id. 316; 1 R. I. 493. And misconduct, showing that the plaintiff would be an unfit companion in married life, may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages; 1 Abb. App. Dec. 282. The defendant may show that his failure to marry the plaintiff proceeded from opposition by his mother to the marriage; 24 N. Y. 252; or that he was afflicted with an incurable disease at the time of his breach of the promise to marry, in mitigation of damages; 51 Ill. 288. Evidence that the general character of the plaintiff for chastity previously to the engagement, was bad, is admissible in mitigation of damages; 71 Penn. 240; 4 Mo. App. 94; 2 Bradw. 236; so is indelicate conduct (not criminal) of plaintiff before the promise was made; 7 Wend. 142. Evidence of the defendant's financial standing is admissible; 42 Mich. 346; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 442; so of his social position; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 49.

See 21 Alb. L. J. 327; Schouler, Husb. & W. §§ 40–51; 5 So. L. Rev. N. s. 57.

PROMISEE. A person to whom a promise has been made.

In general, a promisee can maintain an action on a promise made to him; but when the consideration moves not from the promisee, but some other person, the latter, and not the promisee, has a cause of action, because he is the person for whose use the contract was made; Latch, 272; Poph. 81; Cro. Jac. 77; 1 T. Raym. 271, 368; 4 B. & Ad. 435; 1 N. & M. 303; Cowp. 437; Dougl. 142. But see Carth. 5; 2 Ventr. 307; 9 M. & W. 92, 96.

PROMISES. When a defendant has been arrested, he is frequently induced to make confessions in consequence of promises made to him that if he will tell the truth he will be either discharged or favored: in such a case, evidence of the confession cannot be received, because, being obtained by the flattery of hope, it comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it; 1 Mass. 144; 1 Leach, 299. This is the principle; but what amounts to a promise is not so easily defined. See CONFESSION.

The promisor is bound to fulfil his promise, unless when it is contrary to law, as a promise to steal or to commit an assault and battery; when the fulfilment is prevented by the act of God, as where one has agreed to teach another drawing and he loses his sight, so that he cannot teach it; when the promisee prevents the promisor from doing what he agreed to do; when the promisor has been discharged from his promise by the promisee; when the promise has been made without a sufficient consideration; and perhaps in some other cases.

PROMISSORY NOTE. A written promise to pay a certain sum of money, at a future time, unconditionally. 7 W. & S. 264; 2 Humphr. 143; 10 Wend, 675; 1 Ala. 263; 7 Mo. 42; 2 Cow. 536; 6 N. H. 364; 7 Vern. 22.

An unconditional written promise, signed by the maker, to pay absolutely and at all events a sum certain in money, either to the bearer or to a person therein designated or his order. Benj. Chalm. Bills etc., Art. 271.

A promissory note differs from a mere acknowledgment of debt without any promise to pay, as when the debtor gives his creditor an I O U. See 2 Yerg. 50; 15 M. & W. 23. But see 2 Humphr. 143; 6 Ala. N. s. 373. In its form it usually contains a promise to pay, at a time therein expressed, a sum of money to a certain person therein named or to his order, for value received. It is dated and signed by the maker. It is never under seal; 9 Hun. 981; even when made by a corporation; 15 Wend. 265; 8 Fed. Rep. 408. But see L. R. 3 Ch. Ap. 758. No particular form of words is necessary: but there must be an intention to make a note; see 15 M. & W. 29; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., 274.

He who makes this promise is called the maker, and he to whom it is made is the payee; 3 Kent, 46. A writing in the form of a note payable to the maker's order, becomes a note by indorsement; 22 Penn. 89.

Although a promissory note in its original shape, bears no resemblance to a bill of exchange, yet when indorsed it is exactly similar to one; for then it is an order by the indorser of the note upon the maker to pay the indorsee. The indorser is as it were the drawer; the maker, the acceptor; and the indorsee, the payee; 4 Burr. 669; 4 Term, 148; 3 Burr. 1224.

Most of the rules applicable to bills of exchange equally affect promissory notes. No particular form is requisite to these instruments: a promise to deliver the money, or to be accountable for it, or that the payee shall have it, is sufficient; Chitty, Bills, 53, 54.

There are two principal qualities essential to the validity of a note: first, that it be payable at all events, not dependent on any contingency; 20 Pick. 132; 22 id. 132; nor payable out of any particular fund; 3 J. J. Marsh. 170, 542; 5 Ark. 441; 2 Blackf. 48; 1 Bibb, 503; 9 Miss. 393; 3 Pick. 541; 4 Hawks, 102; 5 How. 382. Second, it is required that it be for the payment of money only; 10 S. & R. 94; 47 Wisc. 551; 27 Mich. 191;

35 Me. 364; 11 Vt. 268; (though statutes in some states have made notes payable in merchandise negotiable) that is, in whatever is legal tender at the place of payment; 2 Ames, Bills, etc., 828, and not in bank-notes; though it has been held differently in the state of New York; 9 Johns. 129; 19 id. 144. The rule on this subject is said to be more strict in England than here, but to have been relaxed there in 2 Q. B. Div. 194. The same writer says that the tendency here is to use the term money in a very wide sense; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., 10.

A promissory note payable to order or bearer passes by indorsement, and, although a chose in action, the holder may bring suit on it in his own name. Although a simple contract, a sufficient consideration is implied from the nature of the instrument. See 5 Comyns, Dig. 133, n., 151, 472; Smith, Merc. Law, b. 3, c. 1; 4 B. & C. 235; 1 C. & M. 16. It has been urged that upon principle, negotiable instruments are contracts binding by their own force, and therefore not requiring any consideration; Langd. Contr. § 49.

A stipulation in an instrument, otherwise in the form of a promissory note, for the payment of an attorney's fee for the collection of the note in case of dishonor renders the instrument non-negotiable; 84 Penn. 470; 71 Mo. 622; contra, 33 Ill. 372; 32 Iowa, 184; 35 Ind. 103; 18 Kan. 433; 11 Bush, 180; per Miller, J., in U. S. C. C.; referred to in an article in 14 Cent. L. J. 88; see id. 266; 1 Dan. Neg. Instr. 54.

As to promises to pay a debt in specific articles; see 21 Am. Dec. 422.

See BILL OF EXCHANGE; INDORSEMENT: NOTICE; Dan. Neg. Instr.; Ames, Bills & Notes; Byles, Bills.

PROMOTERS. Those who in popular and penal actions, prosecute offenders in their own name and the king's. Persons or corporations at whose instance private bills are introduced into, and passed through parliament. Especially those who press forward bills for the taking of land for railways and other public purposes; who are then called promoters of the undertaking. Persons who assist in establishing joint-stock companies. Mozl. & W.

In this country the use of the term is in the sense last given; but it is not as much used here as in England.

As to the liability of a corporation in regard to any contract made by its promoters on its behalf (supposing the contract to be one which the corporation, after its organization, could legally have made), these rules have been laid down by a late writer in 16 Am. L. Rev. 281:—

I. As long as the contract remains executory on both sides, the party who contracted with the promoter cannot enforce the contract against the corporation, unless the corporation has ratified the same; and the corporation cannot enforce the contract against the other contracting party without carrying out all the engagements entered into with the other contracting party at the time of making the contract.

II. When a contract made by a promoter on behalf of a future corporation has been ratified and performed by the latter, it may force the party who contracted with the promoter to perform on his side.

III. When the contract has been executed by the other contracting party, the corporation should be held to perform on its side, if (1) it has ratified the contract, or (2) voluntarily accepted the benefit arising from the performance of the contract in such a manner as to estop the corporation from denying that it has ratified the contract. But on the other hand if the benefit from the contract came to the corporation without any voluntary action on its part, or on the part of those whose acts in regard to the subject-matter of the contract are to be regarded as the acts of the corporation, then there is no principle in law or in equity on which it can be compelled to carry out engagements entered into without its authority, and which it has never even impliedly ratified.

Ratification may be express, or may be implied from the voluntary acceptance of the benefit of the contract, whereby an estoppel is worked; see 12 N. H. 205; 15 Barb. 323. See, also, 7 Ch. Div. 368; L. R. 2 C. P. 174. A corporation cannot enforce a subscription to shares made before its formation on the faith of certain promises of its promoters, without fulfilling the promises; 10 N. Y. 550.

Promoters are personally liable on contracts made by them for the intended company when the latter proves abortive; L. R. 2 C. P. 174; and also for subscriptions paid in to an abortive company, and that without any deduction for expenses incurred; 3 B. & C. 814.

A promoter is not liable ex contractu to a person who has been induced by his fraud to take shares in a company, but he may be liable ex delicto; 2 E. & B. 476. A bill in equity lies to recover back money which a person has been induced, through fraud, to invest in a bubble; 2 P. Wms. 153. As against a person acting as promoter, the corporation is entitled to the full benefit of all acts done and contracts made by him while acting in that capacity; and the promoter, as between himself and the corporation, is entitled to no secret profits; he may not purchase property for the corporation, and then sell the same to the corporation at an advance; 61 Penn. 202; 5 Ch. Div. 73, 395; 6 id. 371. Where one has already purchased a certain property at a good bargain, it is no fraud to organize a company and sell the property to it at an advance; Thomp. Liab. of Off. 222. See 1 Ch. Div. 182; 4 Hun. 192. But if at the time of making the sale he occupies towards the corporation a position of trust, as promoter or otherwise, it would seem that he should not be allowed to sell at an exorbitant price; 16 Am. L. Rev. 289; but see 64 Penn. 43; and he should faithfully state to the company all material facts relating to the property which would influence it in deciding as to the purchase; Thomp. Liab. of Off. 219; L. R. 5 Eq. 464. See 2 Lind. Part. 580. See also, 8 App. Cas. 1218 (S. C. 4 Cent. L. J. 510); affirming 5 Ch. Div. 103.

The subject is fully treated by Judge Thompson in his work above cited, and by Mr. Taylor in 16 Am. L. Rev. 281.

PROMULGATION. The order given to cause a law to be executed, and to make it public: it differs from publication. 1 Bla. Com. 45; Stat. 6 Hen. VI. c. 4.

With regard to trade, unless previous notice can be brought home to the party charged with violating their provisions, laws are to be considered as beginning to operate in the respective collection districts only from the time they are received from the proper department by the collector; Paine, 32. See id. 23.

The promulgation of laws is an executive function. The mode may be presented by the legislature. It is the extrinsic act which gives a law, perfect in itself, executory force. Unless the law prescribes that it shall be executory from its passage, or from a certain date, it is presumed to be executory only from its passage; 17 La. An. 390. Formerly promulgation meant introducing a law to the senate; Aust. Jur. Lect. 28.

PROMUTUUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A quasi contract, by which he who receives a certain sum of money, or a certain quantity of fungible things, which have been paid to him through mistake, contracts towards the payer the obligation of returning him as much. Pothier, de l'Usure, pt. 3, s. 1, a. 1.

This contract is called promutuum, because it has much resemblance to that of mutuum. This resemblance consists in this: first, that in both a sum of money or some fungible things are required; second, that in both there must be a transfer of the property in the thing; third, that in both there must be returned the same amount or quantity of the thing received. But, though there is this general resemblance between the two, the mutuum differs essentially from the promutuum. The former is the actual contract of the parties, made expressly, but the latter is a quasi contract, which is the effect of an error or mistake. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1125, 1126.

PRONEPOS (Lat.). Great-grandson.

PRONEPTIS (Lat.). A niece's daughter. A great-granddaughter. Ainsworth, Dict.

PRONURUS (Lat.). The wife of a great-grandson.

PROOF. In Practice. The conviction or persuasion of the mind of a judge or jury, by the exhibition of evidence, of the reality of a fact alleged. Thus, to prove is to determine or persuade that a thing does or does not exist; 8 Toullier, n. 2; Ayliffe, Parerg. 442; 2 Phill. Ev. 44, n. a. Proof is the perfection of evidence; for without evidence there is no proof, although there may be evidence which does not amount to proof: for example, if a man is found murdered at a spot where another has been seen walking but a short time before, this fact will be evidence to show that the latter was the murderer, but, standing alone, will be very far from proof of it.

Ayliffe defines judicial proof to be a clear and evident declaration or demonstration of a matter which was before doubtful, conveyed in a judicial manner by fit and proper arguments, and likewise by all other legal methods: first, by proper arguments, such as conjectures, presumptions, indicia, and other adminicular ways and means; secondly, by legal methods, or methods according to law, such as witnesses, public instruments, and the like. Ayliffe, Parerg. 442; Axo & M. Inst. b. 3, t. 7.

PROPER. That which is essential, suitable, adapted, and correct.

Congress is authorized, by art. 1, s. 8, of the constitution of the United States, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution of the United States, in any department or officer thereof."

PROPERTY. The right and interest which a man has in lands and chattels to the exclusion of others. 6 Binn. 98; 4 Pet. 511; 17 Johns. 283; 11 East, 290, 518; 14 id. 370.

The term "property" embraces every species of valuable right and interest, including real and personal property, easements, franchises, and hereditaments; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 376 (N. Y. Sup. Ct.).

All things are not the subject of property: the sea, the air, and the like cannot be appropriated; every one may enjoy them, but he has no exclusive right in them. When things are fully our own, or when all others are excluded from meddling with them or from interfering about them, it is plain that no person besides the proprietor, who has this exclusive right, can have any claim either to use them, or to hinder him from disposing of them as he pleases: so that property, considered as an exclusive right to things, contains not only a right to use those things, but a right to dispose of them, either by exchanging them for other things, or by giving them away to any other person without any consideration, or even throwing them away. Rutherforth, Inst. 20; Domat, liv. prél. tit. 3; Pothier, des Choses; 18 Viner, Abr. 63; Comyns, Dig. Biens. See, also, 2 B. & C. 281; 9 id. 396; 3 Dowl. & R. 394; 1 C. & M. 39; 4 Call, 472; 18 Ves. 193; 6 Bingh. 630.

Property is said to be real and personal property. See those titles.

It is also said to be, when it relates to goods and chattels, absolute or qualified. Absolute property is that which is our own without any qualification whatever: as, when a man is the owner of a watch, a book, or other inanimate thing, or of a horse, a sheep, or other animal which never had its natural liberty in a wild state.

Qualified property consists in the right which men have over wild animals which they have reduced to their own possession, and which are kept subject to their power: as, a deer, a buffalo, and the like, which are his own while he has possession of them, but as soon as his possession is lost his property is gone, unless the animals go animo revertendi. 2 Bla. Com. 396; 3 Binn. 546.

But property in personal goods may be absolute or qualified without any relation to the nature of the subject-matter, but simply because more persons than one have an interest in it, or because the right of property is separated from the possession. A bailee of goods, though not the owner, has a qualified property in them; while the owner has the absolute property. See BAILEE; BAILMENT.

Personal property is further divided into property in possession, and property or choses in action. See CHOSE IN ACTION.

Property is again divided into corporeal and incorporeal. The former comprehends such property as is perceptible to the senses, as lands, houses, goods, merchandise, and the like; the latter consists in legal rights, as choses in action, easements, and the like.

Property is lost by the act of man by—first, alienation; but in order to do this the owner must have a legal capacity to make a contract; second, by the voluntary abandonment of the thing; but unless the abandonment be purely voluntary the title to the property is not lost: as, if things be thrown into the sea to save the ship, the right is not lost; Pothier, n. 270; 3 Toullier, n. 346. But even a voluntary abandonment does not deprive the former owner from taking possession of the thing abandoned at any time before another takes possession of it.

It is lost by operation of law—first, by the forced sale, under a lawful process, of the property of a debtor to satisfy a judgment, sentence, or decree rendered against him, to compel him to fulfil his obligations; second, by confiscation, or sentence of a criminal court; third, by prescription; fourth, by civil death; fifth, by capture of a public enemy. It is lost by the act of God, as in the case of the death of slaves or animals, or in the total destruction of a thing: for example, if a house be swallowed up by an opening in the earth during an earthquake.

It is proper to observe that, in some cases, the moment that the owner loses his possession he also loses his property or right in the thing: animals feræ naturæ, as mentioned above, belong to the owner only while he retains the possession of them. But, in general, the loss of possession does not impair the right of property, for the owner may recover it within a certain time allowed by law. See, generally, Bouvier, Inst. Index.

PROPINQUITY (Lat.). Kindred; parentage. See AFFINITY; CONSANGUINITY; NEXT OF KIN.

PROPIOR SOBRINA, PROPIOR SOBRINO (Lat.). The son or daughter of a great-uncle or great-aunt on the father's or mother's side. Calvinus, Lex.

PROPIOS, PROPRIOS. In Spanish Law. Certain portions of ground laid off and reserved when a town was founded in Spanish America, as the unalienable property of the town, for the purpose of erecting public buildings, markets, etc., or to be used in any other way, under the direction of the municipality, for the advancement of the revenues or the prosperity of the place. 12 Pet. 442, note.

PROPONENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who propounds a thing: as, "the party proponent doth allege and propound." 6 Eccl. 356, n.

PROPOSAL. An offer. A formal offer to perform some undertaking, stating the time and manner of performance and price demanded, or one or more of these particulars, either directly or by implied or direct reference to some announcement requesting such an offer. See 35 Ala. N. S. 33. A proposal of this character is not to be considered as subject to different rules from any other offer. Pierce, Am. Railw. Law, 364. See OFFER.

PROPOSITUS (Lat.). The person proposed. In making genealogical tables, the person whose relations it is desired to find out is called the propositus.

PROPOUND. To offer; to propose: as, the onus probandi in every case lies upon the party who propounds a will. 1 Curt. Eccl. 637; 6 Eccl. 417.

PROPRES. In French Law. The term propres or biens propres is used to denote that property which has come to an individual from his relations, either in a direct line, ascending or descending, or from a collateral line, whether the same have come by operation of law or by devise. Propres is used in opposition to acquêts. Pothier, Des Propres; 2 Burge, Confl. of Law, 61.

PROPRIA PERSONA (Lat. in his own person). It is a rule in pleading that pleas to the jurisdiction of the court must be pleaded in propriâ personâ, because if pleaded by attorney they admit the jurisdiction, as an attorney is an officer of the court, and he is presumed to plead after having obtained leave, which admits the jurisdiction. Lawes, Plead. 91.

An appearance may be in propriâ personâ, and need not be by attorney.

PROPRIETARY. In its strict sense, this word signifies one who is master of his actions, and who has the free disposition of his property. During the colonial government of Pennsylvania, William Penn was called the proprietary.

The domain which William Penn and his family had in the state was, during the revolutionary war, divested by the act of November 27, 1779, from that family, and vested in the commonwealth for the sum which the latter paid to them of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds sterling.

PROPRIETATE PROBANDA. See DE PROPRIETATE PROBANDA.

PROPRIETOR. The owner.

PROPRIO VIGORE (Lat.). By its own force or vigor: an expression frequently used in construction. A phrase is said to have a certain meaning proprio vigore.

PROPTER AFFECTUM (Lat.). For or on account of some affection or prejudice. A juryman may be challenged propter affectum: as, because he is related to the party, has eaten at his expense, and the like. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER DEFECTUM (Lat.). On account of or for some defect. This phrase is frequently used in relation to challenges. A juryman may be challenged propter defectum: as, that he is a minor, an alien, and the like. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER DELICTUM (Lat.). For or on account of crime. A juror may be challenged propter delictum when he has been convicted of an infamous crime. See CHALLENGE.

PROROGATED JURISDICTION. In Scotch Law. That jurisdiction which by the consent of the parties, is conferred upon a judge who, without such consent, would be incompetent. Erksine, Inst. 1. 2. 15.

At common law, when a party is entitled to some privilege or exemption from jurisdiction he may waive it, and then the jurisdiction is complete; but the consent cannot give jurisdiction.

PROROGATION (Lat.). Putting off to another time. It is generally applied to the English parliament, and means the continuance of it from one day to another: it differs from adjournment, which is a continuance of it from one day to another in the same session. 1 Bla. Com. 186.

In Civil Law. The giving time to do a thing beyond the term prefixed. Dig. 2. 14. 27. 1. See PROLONGATION.

PROSCRIBED (Lat. proscribo, to write before). In Civil Law. Among the Romans, a man was said to be proscribed when a reward was offered for his head; but the term was more usually applied to those who were sentenced to some punishment which carried with it the consequences of civil death. Code, 9. 49.

PROSECUTION (Lat. prosequor, to follow after). In Criminal Law. The means adopted to bring a supposed offender to justice and punishment by due course of law.

Prosecutions are carried on in the name of the government, and have for their principal object the security and happiness of the people in general. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 3; Bacon, Abr. Indictment (A 3).

In England, the modes most usually employed to carry them on are—by indictment; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 132; presentment of a grand jury; id. 133; coroner's inquest; id. 134; and by an information. In this country, the modes are—by indictment, by presentment, by information, and by complaint.

PROSECUTOR. In Practice. He who prosecutes another for a crime in the name of the government.

The public prosecutor is an officer appointed by the government to prosecute all offences: he is the attorney-general or his deputy.

A private prosecutor is one who prefers an accusation against a party whom he suspects to be guilty.

Every man may become a prosecutor; but no man is bound, except in some few of the more enormous offences, as treason, to be one; but if the prosecutor should compound a felony he will be guilty of a crime. The prosecutor has an inducement to prosecute, because he cannot, in many cases, have any civil remedy until he has done his duty to society by an endeavor to bring the offender to justice. If a prosecutor act from proper motives, he will not be responsible to the party in damages though he was mistaken in his suspicions; but if, from a motive of revenge, he institute a criminal prosecution without any reasonable foundation, he may be punished by being mulcted in damages, in an action for a malicious prosecution.

In Pennsylvania, a defendant is not bound to plead to an indictment, where there is a private prosecutor, until his name shall have been indorsed on the indictment as such, and on acquittal of the defendant, in all cases except where the charge is for a felony, the jury may direct that he shall pay the costs. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 1–10; 1 Phill. Ev.; 2 Va. Cas. 3, 20; 1 Dall. 5; 2 Bibb. 210; 6 Call, 245; INFORMER.

PROSOCER (Lat.). A father-in-law's father; grandfather of wife. Vicat. Voc. Jur.

PROSOCERUS (Lat.). A wife's grandmother.

PROSPECTIVE (Lat. prospicio, to look forward). That which is applicable to the future: it is used in opposition to retrospective. To be just, a law ought always to be prospective. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 116.

PROSPECTUS. A prospectus of an intended company ought not to omit actual and material facts, or to conceal facts material to be known, the misrepresentation or concealment of which may improperly influence the mind of the reader; for if he is thereby deceived into becoming an allottee of shares and suffers loss he may proceed against those who have misled him. The purpose of a prospectus is only to invite persons to become allottees of shares; when it has performed this office it is exhausted; L. R. 6 H. L. 377.

A prospectus is admissible in evidence in an action at law by a company against its promoters for secret profits; 61 Penn. 202. See Thomp. Liab. of Off. 309.

PROSTITUTION. The common lewdness of a woman for gain. The act of permitting a common and indiscriminate sexual intercourse for hire; 12 Metc. 97.

In all well-regulated communities this has been considered a heinous offence, for which the woman may be punished; and the keeper of a house of prostitution may be indicted for keeping a common nuisance.

So much does the law abhor this offence that a landlord cannot recover for the use and occupation of a house let for the purpose of prostitution; 1 Esp. Cas. 13; 1 B. & P. 340, n.

In a figurative sense, it signifies the bad use which a corrupt judge makes of the law, by making it subservient to his interest: as, the prostitution of the law, the prostitution of justice.

PROTECTION. In Mercantile Law. The name of a document generally given by notaries public to sailors and other persons going abroad, in which is certified that the bearer therein named is a citizen of the United States.

In Governmental Law. That benefit or safety which the government affords to the citizens.

In English Law. A privilege granted by the king to a party to an action, by which he is protected from a judgment which would otherwise be rendered against him. Of these protections there are several kinds. Fitzh. N. B. 65.

PROTEST. In Contracts. A notarial act, made for want of payment of a promissory note, or for want of acceptance or payment of a bill of exchange, by a notary public, in which it is declared that all parties to such instruments will be held responsible to the holder for all damages, exchanges, re-exchange, etc.

A formal notarial certificate attesting the dishonor of a bill of exchange or promissory note; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 176.

There are two kinds of protest, namely, protest for non-acceptance, and protest for non-payment. There is also a species of protest common in England, which is called protest for better security. Protest for non-acceptance or non-payment, when duly made and accompanied by notice to all the parties to the bill or note, has the effect of making all of them responsible to the holder for the amount of the bill or note, together with damages, etc.; 3 Kent, 63; Chitty, Bills, 278; Comyns, Dig. Merchant (F 8, 9, 10); Bacon, Abr. Merchant, etc. (M 7). Protest for better security may be made when the acceptor of a bill fails, becomes insolvent, or in any other way gives the holder just reason to suppose it will not be paid. It seems to be of doubtful utility, except that it gives the drawer of a bill on a foreign country an opportunity of availing himself of any attachment law there in force; 1 Ld. Raym. 745.

The protest is a formal paper signed and sealed by a notary wherein he certifies that on the day of its date he presented the original bill attached thereunto, or a copy of which is above written (a description of the bill is enough; 17 How. 606), to the acceptor, or the original note to the maker thereof, and demanded payment, or acceptance, which was refused, for reasons given in the protest, and that thereupon he protests against the drawer and indorsers thereof, for exchange, re-exchange, damages, costs, and interest. See Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 176; 2 Ames, Bills, etc., 863. It is usual, also, for the notary to serve notices of the protest on all the parties to the bill. The notice contains a description of the bill, including its date and amount, the fact of demand and refusal, and that the holder looks to the person notified for payment. Protest of foreign bills is proof of demand and refusal to pay or accept; 2 H. & J. 399; 4 id. 54; 8 Wheat. 333; 2 Pet. 179, 688. Protest is said to be part of the constitution of a foreign bill; and the form is governed by the lex loci contractus; 2 Hill, N. Y. 227; 11 La. 14; 2 Pet. 179, 180; Story, Bills, 176 (by the place where the protest is made; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 180). A protest must be made by a notary public or other person authorized to act as such; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 177; but it has been held that the duties of a notary cannot be performed by a clerk or deputy; 102 Mass. 141. Inland bills and promissory notes need not be protested; 6 How. 23. See ACCEPTANCE; BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

In Legislation. A declaration made by one or more members of a legislative body that they do not agree with some act or resolution of the body: it is usual to add the reasons which the protestants have for such a dissent.

In Maritime Law. A writing, attested by a justice of the peace, a notary public, or a consul, made and verified by the master of a vessel, stating the severity of a voyage by which a ship has suffered, and showing that it was not owing to the neglect or misconduct of the master. See Marsh. Ins. 715, 716; 1 Wash. C. C. 145, 238, 408, n.; 1 Pet. C. C. 119; 1 Dall. 6, 10, 317; 2 id. 195; 3 W. & S. 144.

The protest is not, in general, evidence for the master of the vessel or his owners in the English or American courts; yet it is often proper evidence against them; Abbott, Shipp. 465, 466; Bland. Shipp. § 285.

PROTEST, PAYMENT UNDER. A person who without the compulsion of legal process, or duress of goods or of the person, yields to the assertion of an invalid or unjust claim by paying it, cannot by mere protest, either in writing or oral, change its character from a voluntary to an involuntary payment. The payment overcomes and nullifies the protest; 4 Wait. Act. & Def. 493. Where an illegal tax is paid under protest to one having authority to enforce its collection, it is an involuntary payment and may be recovered back; 29 Iowa, 310; 21 Mich. 483; but see 34 id. 170; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 512.

A mere apprehension of legal proceedings to collect a tax is not sufficient to make the payment compulsory; there must be an immediate power or authority to institute them; 46 Md. 552.

An action will not lie to recover money voluntarily paid to redeem land sold upon a void tax judgment, when the party making the payment has at the time full knowledge of the character of the sale and all the facts affecting its validity; 26 Minn. 543.

The payment of illegal fees cannot generally be considered as voluntary, so as to preclude the plaintiff from recovering them back; 2 B. & C. 729; 2 B. & A. 562. Where money is paid under an illegal demand, colore officii, the payment can never be voluntary; 8 Exch. 625.

Where a railway company exacted from a carrier more than they charged to other carriers in breach of the acts of parliament, it was held that sums thus exacted could be recovered back; 7 M. & G. 253. Where a man pays more than he is bound to do by law for the performance of a duty which the law says is owed to him for nothing, or for less than he has paid, he is entitled to recover back the excess; L. R. 4 H. L. C. 249.

The object of the protest is to take from the payment its voluntary character; it serves as evidence that the payment was not voluntary, and in order to be efficacious, there must be actual coercion, duress or fraud, presently existing, or the payment will be voluntary in spite of the protest; 59 N. Y. 603; 115 Mass. 367. Whether actual protest, in case of the payment of money illegally demanded by a public officer is a condition precedent to a recovery by the party paying the money is not clearly settled; 4 Wait. Act. & Def. 495. Where the person demanding the money has notice of the illegality of the demand, a protest is not necessary, but otherwise it is necessary; 49 Cal. 624.

PROTESTANDO. See PROTESTATION.

PROTESTATION. In Pleading. The indirect affirmation or denial, by means of the word protesting (in the Latin form of pleadings, protestando), of the truth of some matter which cannot with propriety or safety be positively affirmed, denied, or entirely passed over. See 3 Bla. Com. 311.

The exclusion of a conclusion. Co. Litt. 124.

Its object was to secure to the party making it the benefit of a positive affirmation or denial in case of success in the action, so far as to prevent the conclusion that the fact was admitted to be true as stated by the opposite party, and at the same time to avoid the objection of duplicity to which a direct affirmation or denial would expose the pleading; 19 Johns. 96; 2 Saund. 103; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (N). Matter which is the ground of the suit upon which issue could be taken could not be protested; Plowd. 276; 2 Johns. 227. But see 2 Wms. Saund. 103, n. Protestations are no longer allowed; 3 Bla. Com. 312; and were generally an unnecessary form; 3 Lev. 125.

The common form of making protestations was as follows: "because protesting that," etc., excluding such matters of the adversary's pleading as are intended to be excluded in the protestando, if it be matter of fact; or, if it be against the legal sufficiency of his pleading, "because protesting that the plea by him above pleaded in bar" (or by way of reply, or rejoinder, etc., as the case might be) "is wholly insufficient in law." See generally, 1 Chitty, Pl. 534; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (N); Steph. Pl. 235.

In Practice. An asseveration made by taking God to witness. A protestation is a form of asseveration which approaches very nearly to an oath. Wolffius, Inst. § 375.

PROTHONOTARY. The title given to an officer who officiates as principal clerk of some courts. Viner, Abr.

In the ecclesiastical law, the name of prothonotary is given to an officer of the court of Rome. He is so called because he is the first notary,—the Greek word πρωτος signifying primus, or first. These notaries have pre-eminence over the other notaries, and are put in the rank of prelates. There are twelve of them. Dalloz, Dict. de Jur.

PROTOCOL. A record or register. Among the Romans, protocollum was a writing at the head of the first page of the paper used by the notaries or tabellions. Nov. 44.

In France the minutes of notarial acts were formerly transcribed on registers, which were called protocols. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 3, c. 6, s. 1, n. 413.

By the German law it signifies the minutes of any transaction. Encyc. Amer. Protocol. In the latter sense the word has of late been received into international law. Id.

PROTUTOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. He who, not being the tutor of a pupil or minor, has administered his property or affairs as if he had been, whether he thought himself legally invested with the authority of a tutor or not.

He who marries a woman who is tutrix becomes, by the marriage, a protutor. The protutor is equally responsible as the tutor.

PROUT PATET PER RECORDUM (Lat.). As appears by the record. This phrase is frequently used in pleading; as, for example, in debt on a judgment or other matter of record, unless when it is stated as an inducement, it is requisite, after showing the matter of record, to refer to it by the prout patet per recordum. 1 Chitty, Pl. *356; 10 Me. 127.

PROVER. In Old English Law. One who undertakes to prove a crime against another. 28 Edw. I.; 5 Hen. IV. One who, being indicted and arraigned for treason or felony, confesses before plea pleaded, and accuses his accomplices to obtain pardon; state's evidence. 4 Bla. Com 330*. To prove. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Britton, c. 22.

PROVINCE. Sometimes this signifies the district into which a country has been divided: as, the province of Canterbury, in England; the province of Languedoc, in France. Sometimes it means a dependency or colony: as, the province of New Brunswick. It is sometimes used figuratively to signify power or authority: as, it is the province of the court to judge of the law, that of the jury to decide on the facts.

PROVISION. In Common Law. The property which a drawer of a bill of exchange places in the hands of a drawee: as, for example, by remittances, or when the drawee is indebted to the drawer when the bill becomes due, provision is said to have been made. Acceptance always presumes a provision. See Code de Comm. art. 115–117.

In French Law. An allowance granted by a judge to a party for his support,—which is to be paid before there is a definite judgment. In a civil case, for example, it is an allowance made to a wife who is separated from her husband. Dalloz, Dict.

PROVISIONAL SEIZURE. In Louisiana. A term which signifies nearly the same as attachment of property.

It is regulated by the Code of Practice as follows, namely:—

The plaintiff may, in certain cases, hereafter provided, obtain the provisional seizure of the property which he holds in pledge, or on which he has a privilege, in order to secure a payment of his claim. La. Code, art. 284.

Provisional seizure may be ordered in the following cases: first, in executory proceedings, when the plaintiff sues on a title importing confession of judgment; second, when a lessor prays for the seizure of furniture or property used in the house, or attached to the real estate which he has leased; third, when a seaman, or other person, employed on board of a ship or water craft, navigating within the state, or person having furnished materials for or made repairs to such ship or water craft, prays that the same may be seized, and prevented from departing, until he has been paid the amount of his claim; fourth, when the proceedings are in rem, that is to say, against the thing itself which stands pledged for the debt, when the property is abandoned, or in cases where the owner of the thing is unknown or absent. La. Code, art. 285. See 6 Mart. La. N. S. 168; 7 id. 153; 8 id. 320; 1 Mart. La. 168; 12 id. 32.

PROVISIONS. Food for man; victuals.

As good provisions contribute so much to the health and comfort of man, the law requires that they shall be wholesome: he who sells unwholesome provisions may, therefore, be punished for a misdemeanor. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 822; 3 Maule & S. 10; 4 id. 214; 4 Camp. 10.

And in the sale of provisions the rule is that the seller impliedly warrants that they are wholesome. 3 Bla. Com. 166.

PROVISO. The name of a clause inserted in an act of the legislature, a deed, a written agreement, or other instrument, which generally contains a condition that a certain thing shall or shall not be done, in order that an agreement contained in another clause shall take effect.

It always implies a condition, unless subsequent words change it to a covenant; but when a proviso contains the mutual words of the parties to a deed, it amounts to a covenant; 2 Co. 72; Cro. Eliz. 242; Moore, 707.

A proviso differs from an exception; 1 B. & Ald. 99. An exception exempts, absolutely, from the operation of an engagement or an enactment; a proviso defeats their operation, conditionally. An exception takes out of an engagement or enactment something which would otherwise be part of the subject-matter of it; a proviso avoids them by way of defeasance or excuse; 8 Am. Jur. 242; Plowd. 361; 1 Saund. 234 a, note; Lilly, Reg., and the cases there cited. See, generally, Am. Jur. no. 16, art. 1; Bacon, Abr. Conditions (A); Comyns, Dig. Condition (A 1), (A 2), Dwarris, Stat. 660.

PROVISOR. He that hath the care of providing things necessary; but more especially one who sued to the court of Rome for a provision. Jacobs; 25 Edw. III. One nominated by the pope to a benefice before it became void, in prejudice of right of true patron. 4 Bla. Com. 111*.

PROVOCATION (Lat. provoco, to call out). The act of inciting another to do something.

Provocation simply, unaccompanied by a crime or misdemeanor, does not justify the person provoked to commit an assault and battery. In cases of homicide it may reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter. But when the provocation is given for the purpose of justifying or excusing an intended murder, and the party provoked is killed, it is no justification; 2 Gilb. Ev. by Lofft, 753.

The unjust provocation by a wife of her husband, in consequence of which she suffers from his ill usage, will bar her divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty; her remedy in such cases is to change her manners; 2 Lee, 172; 1 Hagg. Cons. 155. See CRUELTY; PERSUADE; 4 Russ. Cr. 434, 486; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 232–241.

PROVOST. A title given to the chief of some corporations or societies. In France, this title was formerly given to some presiding judges. The word is derived from the Latin præpositus.

PROXENETÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Among the Romans, these were persons whose functions somewhat resembled those of the brokers of modern commercial nations. Dig. 50. 14. 3; Domat, l. 1, t. 17, § 1, art. 1.

PROXIMATE CAUSE. See 23 Am. Rep. 21; 35 id. 649. CAUSA PROXIMA.

PROXIMITY (Lat.). Kindred between two persons. Dig. 38. 16. 8.

PROXY (contracted from procuracy, procurator). A person appointed in the place of another, to represent him.

The instrument by which a person is appointed so to act.

The right of voting at an election of an incorporated company by proxy is not a general right, and the party claiming it must show a special authority for that purpose; Ang. & A. Corp. § 128; 76 Penn. 42. At common law it was allowable only by the peers of England, and that is said to be in virtue of a special permission of the king; 1 Paige, 590.

Where there was no clause in the act of incorporation empowering the members of the company to vote by proxy, but a by-law provided that the shareholders may so vote, it was held in view of this by-law that a vote given by proxy should have been received; 5 Day, 329. The court did not say how they would have decided had there been no such by-law, but drew a clear distinction between public and moneyed corporations. In 2 Green, N. J. 222, it was held that it required legislative sanction before any corporation could make a by-law authorizing members to vote by proxy. So, also, in 3 Grant, Cas. 209. See 2 Kent, 294; 6 Wend. 509. Stockholders of national banks may vote by proxy, but no officer, clerk, teller, or book-keeper of a bank may act as proxy; R. S. § 5144; many of the states have passed statutes regulating the right to vote by proxy.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A judicial proctor, or one who is appointed to manage another man's law concerns, is called a proxy. Ayliffe, Parerg.

An annual payment made by the parochial clergy to the bishop, etc., on visitations. Tomlins Law Dict.

In Rhode Island and Connecticut the name of an election or day of voting for officers of government. Webst. Dict.

PUBERTY. In Civil Law. The age in boys of fourteen, and in girls of twelve years. Ayliffe, Pand. 63; Hall, Pract. 14; Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. tom. 5, p. 100; Inst. 1. 22; Dig. 1. 7. 40. 1; Code, 5. 60. 3; 1 Bla. Com. 436.

PUBLIC. The whole body politic, or all the citizens of the state. The inhabitants of a particular place: as, the New York public.

This term is sometimes joined to other terms, to designate those things which have a relation to the public: as, a public officer, a public road, a public passage, a public house.

A distinction has been made between the terms public and general: they are sometimes used as synonymous. The former term is applied strictly to that which concerns all the citizens and every member of the state; while the latter includes a lesser, though still a large, portion of the community. Greenl. Ev. § 128.

When the public interests and its rights conflict with those of an individual, the latter must yield. Co. Litt. 181. If, for example, a road is required for public convenience, and in its course it passes on the ground occupied by a house, the latter must be torn down, however valuable it may be to the owner. In such a case both law and justice require that the owner shall be fully indemnified. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

PUBLIC DEBT. That which is due or owing by the government.

The constitution of the United States provides, art. 6, s. 1, that "all debts contracted or engagements entered into before the adoption of this constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation." The fourteenth amendment provides that "the validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned."

PUBLIC ENEMY. This word, used in the singular number, designates a nation at war with the United States, and includes every member of such nation. Vattel, b. 3, c. 5, § 70.

To make a public enemy, the government of the foreign country must be at war with the United States; for a mob, how numerous soever it may be, or robbers, whoever they may be, are never considered as a public enemy; 2 Marsh. Ins. 508; 3 Esp. 131, 132.

A common carrier is exempt from responsibility whenever a loss has been occasioned to the goods in his charge by the act of a public enemy; but the burden of proof lies on him to show that the loss was so occasioned; 3 Munf. 239; 4 Binn. 127; 2 Bail. 157. See COMMON CARRIER.

In the late rebellion, the Federal troops were a public enemy, against whose acts a common carrier within the Confederate lines did not insure; 1 Heisk. 256.

PUBLIC HOUSE. A house kept for the entertainment of all who come lawfully and pay regularly; 3 Brewst. 344. It does not include a boarding house; id.; but under a statute a store house in the country is included by this term; 29 Ala. 40; and a barber shop; 30 id. 550; and a broker's office; 31 id. 371. A room to which persons generally are permitted to resort, to play cards, though not every one has access to it, is a public gambling-house. See many cases collected in 22 Alb. L. J. 24, and Abb. Dic.

PUBLIC LANDS. Such lands as are subject to sale or other disposition by the United States, under general laws; 92 U. S. 761. See 10 Nev. 260.

PUBLIC MONEY. As used in the U. S. statutes, the money of the federal government received from the public revenues, or intrusted to its fiscal officers, wherever it may be. It does not include money in the hands of the marshals and other officers of the courts, held to await the judgment of the court; 12 Ct. Cl. 281.

PUBLIC PASSAGE. A right to pass over a body of water. This term is synonymous with public highway, with this difference: by the latter is understood a right to pass over the land of another; by the former is meant the right of going over the water which is on another's land. Carth. 193; Hamm. N. P. 195. See PASSAGE.

PUBLIC PLACE. Under a statute against gaming, a steamboat carrying passengers and freight is a public place; 13 Ala. 602; so is an infirmary; 19 id. 551; so is a shoemaker's shop into which many went, but a few were excluded during the gaming; 17 id. 369. Under statutes against indecent exposure, a public omnibus is a public place; 3 C. & K. 360; so is a urinal in a public park; L. R. 1 C. C. 282; and a part of the sea beach, visible from inhabited houses; 2 Campb. 89. See many cases cited in 22 Alb. L. J. 24, and Abb. Dic. See PUBLIC HOUSE.

PUBLICAN. In Civil Law. A farmer of the public revenue; one who held a lease of some property from the public treasury; Dig. 39. 4. 1. 1; 39. 4. 12. 3; 39. 4. 13.

PUBLICATION. The act by which a thing is made public.

It differs from promulgation, which see; and see, also, Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. titre Préliminaire, n. 59, for the difference in the meaning of these two words.

Publication has different meanings. When applied to a law it signifies the rendering public the existence of the law; when it relates to the opening the depositions taken in a case in chancery, it means that liberty is given to the officer in whose custody the depositions of witnesses in a cause are lodged, either by consent of parties, or by the rules or orders of the court, to show the depositions openly, and to give out copies of them; Pract. Reg. 297; Blake, Ch. Pr. 143. And when spoken of a will, it signifies that the testator has done some act from which it can be concluded that he intended the instrument to operate as his will; 3 Atk. 161; 4 Me. 220; 3 Rawle, 15; Comyns, Dig. Estates by Devise (E 2). See Comyns, Dig. Chancery (Q). As to the publication of an award, see 6 N. H. 36.

Some of the state constitutions provide that general laws shall not take effect till published. The mode of publication is for the legislature to determine. A general law printed in a volume of private laws was held to have been published; 9 Wisc. 264: but an unauthorized publication is no publication; 10 Wisc. 136. In Pennsylvania, where the constitution did not require publication, it was held to be necessary before an act could be operative; but nevertheless that publication in the legislative journals was sufficient, and that neglect to publish an act in the pamphlet laws did not invalidate the act; 31 Penn. 432. An inaccuracy in the publication of a statute which does not change its substance or legal effect, will not invalidate the publication; 14 Wisc. 212; a joint resolution of a general nature must be published; 4 Kan. 261. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 161.

In law of libel. The communication of the defamatory words to a third party; Odg. Lib. & S. 150.

A libel may be published either by speaking or singing, as where it is maliciously repeated or sung in the presence of others, or by delivery, as when a libel, or a copy of it, is delivered to another. A libel may also be published by pictures or signs, as by painting another in an ignominious manner, or making the sign of a gallows, or other reproachful and ignominious sign, upon his door or before his house. If the libel is contained in a letter addressed to the plaintiff, this is not evidence of a publication sufficient to support a civil action; although it would be otherwise in an indictment for libel. But if the letter, though addressed to the plaintiff, was forwarded during his known absence, and with intent that it should be opened and read by his family, clerks, or confidential agents, and it is read by them, it is a sufficient publication. If it was not opened by others, even though it were not sealed, it is no publication; Heard, Lib. & S. §§ 264, 265. In a modern case the publication relied on was a sale of a copy of a newspaper to a person sent by the plaintiff to procure it, who, on receiving it, carried it to the plaintiff. It was held that this was a sufficient publication to the agent to sustain an action; 14 Q. B. 185. A sealed letter or other communication delivered to the wife of the plaintiff is a publication within the meaning of the law; 13 C. B. 836; Spenc. 209. If the libel be published in a newspaper, proof that copies were distributed, and that the clerk of the printer received payment for them, is evidence of publication; 3 Yeates, 128. Publication may be by telegraph; L. R. 9 C. P. 393; and by postal card; 4 L. R. Jur. 391. Having a letter copied by a clerk is publication; 1 Clarke (Ia.) 482. In criminal cases, the publication must be proved to have been made within the county where the trial is had. If it was contained in a newspaper printed in another state, yet it will be sufficient to prove that it was circulated, and read within the county; 3 Pick. 304. If it was written in one county and sent by post to a person in another, or if its publication in another county be otherwise consented to, this is evidence of a publication in the latter county; 7 East, 65; 12 How. St. Tr. 331, 932. If a libel is written in one county with intent to publish it in another, and it is accordingly so published, this is evidence sufficient to charge the party in the county in which it was written; 4 B. & Ald. 95.

Uttering slanderous words in the presence of the person slandered only is not a publication. It is immaterial that the words were spoken in a public place. The question for the jury is whether they were so spoken as to have been heard by third persons; 13 Gray, 304. It must also be shown that the words were spoken in the presence of some one who understood them. Words in a foreign language, whether spoken or written, must be proved to have been understood by those who heard or read them; otherwise there is no publication which is prejudicial to the plaintiff; Heard, Lib. & S. § 263. See Odg.; Towns. Lib. & S.

PUBLICIANA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an action introduced by the prætor Publicius, the object of which was to recover a thing which had been lost. Inst. 4. 6. 4; Dig. 6. 2. 1. 16 et 17. Its effects were similar to those of our action of trover.

PUBLICITY. The doing of a thing in the view of all persons who choose to be present.

The law requires that courts should be open to the public: there can therefore be no secret tribunal, except the grand jury (q. v.); and all judgments are required to be given in public.

Publicity must be given to the acts of the legislature before they can be in force; but in general their being recorded in a certain public office is evidence of their publicity.

PUBLISHER. One who by himself or his agent makes a thing publicly known; one engaged in the circulation of books, pamphlets, and other papers.

The publisher of a libel is responsible as if he were the author of it, and it is immaterial whether he has any knowledge of its contents or not; 9 Co. 59; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 73, § 10; 4 Mas. 115; and it is no justification to him that the name of the author accompanies the libel; 10 Johns. 447; 2 Mood. & R. 312.

When the publication is made by writing or printing, if the matter be libellous, the publisher may be indicted for a misdemeanor, provided it was made by his direction or consent; but if he was the owner of a newspaper merely, and the publication was made by his servants or agents, without any consent or knowledge on his part, he will not be liable to a criminal prosecution. But see 107 Mass. 199. In either case he will be liable to an action for damages sustained by the party aggrieved; 7 Johns. 260; 60 Ill. 51; 38 Mich. 10.

In order to render the publisher amenable to the law, the publication must be maliciously made; but malice will be presumed if the matter be libellous. This presumption, however, will be rebutted if the publication be made for some lawful purpose, as, drawing up a bill of indictment, in which the libellous words are embodied for the purpose of prosecuting the libeller; or if it evidently appear that the publisher did not, at the time of publication, know that the matter was libellous: as, when a person reads a libel aloud in the presence of others, without beforehand knowing it to be such; 9 Co. 59. See LIBEL; LIBELLER; PUBLICATION; Odg. Lib. & S.

PUDICITY. Chastity; the abstaining from all unlawful carnal commerce or connection. A married woman or a widow may defend her pudicity as a maid may her virginity. See CHASTITY; RAPE.

PUDZELD. In Old English Law. To be free from the payment of money for taking of wood in any forest. Co. Litt. 233 a. The same as Woodgeld.

PUER (Lat. a boy; a child). In its enlarged sense this word signifies a child of either sex; though in its restrained meaning it is applied to a boy only.

A case once arose which turned upon this question, whether a daughter could take lands under the description of puer; and it was decided by two judges against one that she was entitled; Dy. 337 b. In another case, it was ruled the other way; Hob. 33.

PUERILITY. In Civil Law. A condition which commenced at the age of seven years, the end of the age of infancy, and lasted till the age of puberty,—that is, in females till the accomplishment of twelve years, and in males till the age of fourteen years fully accomplished. Ayliffe, Pand. 63.

The ancient Roman lawyers divided puerility into proximus infantiæ, as it approached infancy, and into proximus pubertati, as it became nearer to puberty. 6 Toullier, n. 100.

PUERITIA. (Lat.). In Civil Law. Age from seven to fourteen. 4 Bla. Com. 22; Wharton, Dict. The age from birth to fourteen years in the male, or twelve in the female. Calvinus, Lex. The age from birth to seventeen. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PUFFER. A person employed by the owner of property which is sold at auction to bid it up, who does so accordingly, for the purpose of raising the price upon bonâ fide bidders.

This is a fraud, which, at the option of the purchaser, invalidates the sale. 3 Madd. 112; 2 Kent, 423; 3 Ves. 628; 2 Bro. C. C. 326; 11 S. & R. 89; 2 Hayw. 328; 4 H. & McH. 282; 2 Dev. 126. See AUCTION; BIDDER; BY BIDDER.

PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE (L. Fr. since last continuance). In Pleading. A plea which is put in after issue joined, for the purpose of introducing new matter, or matter which has come to the knowledge of the party pleading it subsequently to such joinder. See CONTINUANCE; PLEA.

PUISNE (L. Fr.). Younger; junior. Associate.

PUNCTUALITY. As a general rule, a railroad company is liable to damage accruing to a passenger for a negligent failure on its part to run its trains according to the company's time tables; but there must be proof of negligence. Neither time table nor advertisement is a warrant of punctuality. Whart. Negl. § 662.

The publication of the time table cannot amount to less than this, viz.: a representation that it is ordinarily practicable for the company, by the use of due care and skill, to run according to the table, and an engagement on their part that they will do all that can be done, by the use of due care and skill, to accomplish that result; 52 N. H. 596. See also 5 E. & B. 860. The company is undoubtedly liable for any want of punctuality which they could have avoided by the use of due care and skill; nor can they excuse a want of conformity to the time table for any cause, the existence of which was known to them, or ought to have been known to them, at the time of publishing the table; 52 N. H. 596.

See 8 E. L. & Eq. 362; 14 Allen, 433; 36 Miss. 660; L. R. 2 C. P. 339. In Ang. Carriers, 527 a, it is said that time tables are in the nature of a special contract, so that any deviation from them renders the company liable. But it does not appear that the cases go so far.

PUNCTUATION. The division of a written or printed instrument by means of points, such as the comma, semicolon, and the like.

In construing deeds, it is said that no regard is to be had to punctuation, and although stops are sometimes used, they are not to be regarded in the construction of the instrument; 3 Washb. R. P. 397. Punctuation is not allowed to throw light on printed statutes in England; 24 Beav. 330.

Where a comma after a word in a statute, if any force was attached to it, would give the section containing it broader scope than it would otherwise have, it was held that that circumstance should not have a controlling influence. Punctuation is no part of the statute; 4 Morr. Transcr. 613; in construing statutes, courts will disregard punctuation, or, if need be, repunctuate, to render the true meaning of the statute; 16 Ohio St. 432; approved in 4 Morr. Transcr. 613; also 65 Penn. 311; 9 Gray, 385.

Punctuation is a most fallible standard by which to interpret a writing; it may be resorted to when all other means fail, but the court will first ascertain the meaning from the four corners of the instrument; 11 Pet. 64.

Lord St. Leonards said "In wills and deeds you do not ordinarily find any stops; but the court reads them as if they were properly punctuated." 2 Dr. & War. 98.

Judges, in the later cases, have been influenced in construing wills by the punctuation of the original document; 2 M. & G. 679; 26 Beav. 81; 1 Phil. 528; 17 Beav. 589; 24 L. J. Ch. 523; but see 1 Mer. 651, where Sir William Grant refused to resort to punctuation as an aid to construction. See, also, 25 Barb. 405; 16 Can. L. J. 183.

PUNISHMENT. In Criminal Law. Some pain or penalty warranted by law, inflicted on a person for the commission of a crime or misdemeanor, or for the omission of the performance of an act required by law, by the judgment and command of some lawful court.

The right of society to punish is derived, by Beccaria, Mably, and some others, from a supposed agreement which the persons who composed the primitive societies entered into, in order to keep order, and, indeed, the very existence of the state. According to others, it is the interest and duty of man to live in society: to defend this right, society may exert this principle, in order to support itself; and this it may do whenever the acts punishable would endanger the safety of the whole. And Bentham is of opinion that the foundation of this right is laid in public utility or necessity. Delinquents are public enemies, and they must be disarmed and prevented from doing evil, or society would be destroyed. But, if the social compact has ever existed, says Livingston, its end must have been the preservation of the natural rights of the members; and therefore the effects of this fiction are the same with those of the theory which takes abstract justice as the foundation of the right to punish; for this justice, if well considered, is that which assures to each member of the state the free exercise of his rights. And if it should be found that utility, the last source from which the right to punish is derived, is so intimately united to justice that it is inseparable from it in the practice of law, it will follow that every system founded on one of these principles must be supported by the other.

To attain their social end, punishments should be exemplary, or capable of intimidating those who might be tempted to imitate the guilty; reformatory, or such as should improve the condition of the convicts; personal, or such as are at least calculated to wound the feelings or affect the rights of the relations of the guilty; divisible, or capable of being graduated and proportioned to the offence and the circumstances of each case; reparable, on account of the fallibility of human justice.

Punishments are either corporal or not corporal. The former are—death, which is usually denominated capital punishment; imprisonment, which is either with or without labor, see PENITENTIARY; whipping, in some states; and banishment.

The punishments which are not corporal are—fines; forfeitures; suspension or deprivation of some political or civil right; deprivation of office, and being rendered incapable to hold office; compulsion to remove nuisances.

The object of punishment is to reform the offender, to deter him and others from committing like offences, and to protect society. See 4 Bla. Com. 7; Rutherforth, Inst. b. 1, c. 18.

The constitution of the United States, Amendments, art. 8, forbids the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. This is intended only for congress and the federal courts; 12 S. & R. 220; 3 Cow. 686.

What punishment is suited to a specified offence must in general be determined by the legislature, and the case must be very extraordinary in which its judgment could be brought in question. A punishment may possibly be unlawful because it is so manifestly out of all proportion to the offence as to shock the moral sense with its barbarity, or because it is a punishment long disused for its cruelty until it has become unusual; Cooley, Const. 296. So, for example, is the punishment of depriving a native of China of his hair; 18 Am. L. Reg. 676. Whipping, as a punishment for stealing mules, is not contrary to this provision; 1 New Mex. 415. In New York, where a general law created a crime and fixed the maximum of its punishment, a special statute operating only in localities, or upon particular individuals, whereby, for no perceptible reason, the same identical crime, which consists in the violation of a statute applicable to the whole state, can therein or in those persons be punished with double the severity that it can be elsewhere in the same state, is within the prohibition of section five of article one, of the constitution of the state as to "cruel and unusual punishments." 61 How. Pr. 294.

PUPIL. In Civil Law. One who is in his or her minority. See Dig. 1. 7; 26. 7. 1. 2; 50. 16. 239; Code, 6. 30. 18. One who is in ward or guardianship.

PUPILLARIS SUBSTITUTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The nomination of another besides his son pupil to succeed, if the son should not be able or inclined to accept the inheritance, or should die before he came of age to make a testament.

If the child survived the age of puberty, though he made no testament, the substitute had no right of succession. See Bell, Dict. Substitution; Dig. 28. 6.

PUPILLARITY. In Civil Law. That age of a person's life which included infancy and puerility.

PUR. A corruption of the French word par, by or for. It is frequently used in old French law phrases: as, pur autre vie. It is also used in the composition of words: as, puparty; purlieu, purview.

PUR AUTRE VIE (old French, for another's life). An estate is said to be pur autre vie when a lease is made of lands or tenements to a man to hold for the life of another person. 2 Bla. Com. 259; 10 Viner, Abr. 296; 2 Belt, Suppl. Ves. Jr. 41.

PURCHASE. A term including every mode of acquisition of estate known to the law, except that by which an heir on the death of his ancestor becomes substituted in his place as owner by operation of law. 2 Washb. R. P. 401.

There are six ways of acquiring a title by purchase, namely, by deed; by devise; by execution; by prescription; by possession or occupancy; by escheat. In its more limited sense, purchase is applied only to such acquisitions of lands as are obtained by way of bargain and sale for money or some other valuable consideration; Cruise, Dig. tit. 30, §§ 1–4; 1 Dall. 20. In common parlance, purchase signifies the buying of real estate and of goods and chattels.

PURCHASER. A buyer; a vendee. See SALE; PARTIES; CONTRACTS.

PURCHASE-MONEY. The consideration which is agreed to be paid by the purchaser of a thing in money.

It is the duty of the purchaser to pay the purchase-money as agreed upon in making the contract; and in case of the conveyance of an estate before it is paid, the vendor is entitled, according to the laws of England, which have been adopted in several of the states, to a lien on the estate sold for the purchase-money so remaining unpaid. This is called an equitable lien. This doctrine is derived from the civil law; Dig. 18. 1. 19. The case of Chapman vs. Tanner, 1 Vern. 267, decided in 1684, is the first where this doctrine was adopted; 7 S. & R. 78. It was strongly opposed, but is now firmly established in England and in the United States; 6 Yerg. 50; 1 Johns. Ch. 308; 7 Wheat. 46, 50; 5 Monr. 287; 1 Harr. & J. 106; 4 Hawks, 256; 5 Conn. 468; 2 J. J. Marsh. 330.

But the lien of the seller exists only between the parties and those having notice that the purchase-money has not been paid; 3 J. J. Marsh. 557; 3 Gill & J. 425. See LIEN.

PURE DEBT. In Scotch Law. A debt actually due, in contradistinction to one which is to become due at a future day certain, which is called a future debt, and one due provisionally, in a certain event, which is called a contingent debt. 1 Bell, Com. 315.

PURE OBLIGATION. One which is not suspended by any condition, whether it has been contracted without any condition, or, when thus contracted, the condition has been performed. Pothier, Obl. n. 176.

PURE PLEA. In Equity Pleading. One which relies wholly on some matter dehors the bill, as, for example, a plea of a release on a settled account.

Pleas not pure are so called in contradistinction to pure pleas; they are sometimes also denominated negative pleas. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4275.

PURGATION. (Lat. purgo; from purum and ago, to make clean). The clearing one's self of an offence charged, by denying the guilt on oath or affirmation.

Canonical purgation was the act of justifying one's self, when accused of some offence, in the presence of a number of persons worthy of credit, generally twelve, who would swear they believed the accused. See COMPURGATOR; LAW OF WAGER.

Vulgar purgation consisted in superstitious trials by hot and cold water, by fire, by hot irons, by batell, by corsned, etc.

In modern times a man may purge himself of an offence in some cases where the facts are within his own knowledge; for example, when a man is charged with a contempt of court, he may purge himself of such contempt by swearing that in doing the act charged he did not intend to commit a contempt.

PURGED OF PARTIAL COUNSEL. In Scotland every witness, before making oath or affirmation, is purged of partial counsel, i. e. cleared by examination on oath of having instigated the plea, of having been present with the party for whom he testifies at consultations of lawyers, where it might be shown what was necessary to be proved, or of having acted as his agent in any of the proceedings. So, in a criminal case, he who is agent of prosecutor or who tampers with the panel cannot be heard to testify, because of partial counsel. Stair, Inst. p. 768, § 9; Bell, Dict. Partial Counsel.

PURLIEU. In English Law. A space of land near a forest, known by certain boundaries, which was formerly part of a forest, but which has been separated from it.

The history of purlieus is this. Henry II., on taking possession of the throne, manifested so great a taste for forests that he enlarged the old ones wherever he could, and by this means enclosed many estates which had no outlet to the public roads; forests increased in this way until the reign of king John, when the public reclamations were so great that much of this land was disforested,—that is, no longer had the privileges of the forests—and the land thus separated bore the name of purlieu.

PURPARTY. That part of an estate which, having been held in common by parceners, is by partition allotted to any of them. To make purparty is to divide and sever the lands which fall to parceners. Old N. B. 11.

PURPORT. In Pleading. The substance of a writing as it appears on the face of it to the eye that reads it. It differs from tenor. 2 Russ. Cr. 865; 1 East, 179.

PURPRESTURE. An enclosure by a private individual of a part of a common or public domain.

According to Lord Coke, purpresture is a close or enclosure, that is, when one encroaches or makes several to himself that which ought to be in common to many: as, if an individual were to build between high and low water mark on the side of a public river. In England this is a nuisance, and in cases of this kind an injunction will be granted, on ex-parte affidavits, to restrain such a purpresture and nuisance; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2382; 4 id. n. 3798; Co. 2d Inst. 28. And see Skene, Pourpresture; Glanville, lib. 9, ch. 11, p. 239, note; Spelman, Gloss. Purpresture; Hale, de Port. Mar.; Hargrave, Law Tracts, 84; 2 Anstr. 606; Calls, Sew. 174.

PURSER. The person appointed by the master of a ship or vessel, whose duty it is to take care of the ship's books, in which every thing on board is inserted, as well the names of mariners as the articles of merchandise shipped. Roccius, Ins. note.

By statute pursers in the navy are now called paymasters. R. S. § 1383.

PURSUER. The name by which the complainant or plaintiff is known in the ecclesiastical courts. 3 Eccl. 350.

PURVIEW. That part of an act of the legislature which begins with the words, "Be it enacted," etc., and ends before the repealing clause. Cooke, 330; 3 Bibb, 181. According to Cowel, this word also signifies a conditional gift or grant. It is said to be derived from the French pourvu, provided. It always implies a condition. Interpreter.

PUT. In Pleading. To select; to demand: as, "the said C D puts himself upon the country;" that is, he selects the trial by jury as the mode of settling the matter in dispute, and does not rely upon an issue in law. Gould, Pl. c. 6, part 1, § 19.

PUTATIVE. Reputed to be that which is not. The word is frequently used: as, putative father, putative marriage, putative wife, and the like. And Toullier, tome 7, n. 29, uses the words putative owner, propriétaire putatif. Lord Kames uses the same expression. Princ. of Eq. 391.

PUTATIVE FATHER. The reputed father.

This term is usually applied to the father of a bastard child.

The putative father is bound to support his children, and is entitled to the guardianship and care of them in preference to all persons but the mother. 1 Ashm. 55. And see 5 Esp. 131; 1 B. & Ald. 491; Bott, Poor Law, 499; 1 C. & P. 268; 3 id. 36; 1 Ball & B. 1.

PUTATIVE MARRIAGE. A marriage which is forbidden but which has been contracted in good faith and ignorance of the impediment on the part of at least one of the contracting parties.

Three circumstances must concur to constitute this species of marriage. There must be a bona fides. One of the parties at least must have been ignorant of the impediment, not only at the time of the marriage, but must also have continued ignorant of it during his or her life, because if he became aware of it he was bound to separate himself from his wife. The marriage must be duly solemnized. The marriage must have been considered lawful in the estimation of the parties or of that party who alleges the bona fides.

A marriage in which these three circumstances concur, although null and void, will have the effect of entitling the wife, if she be in good faith, to enforce the rights of property which would have been competent to her if the marriage had been valid, and of rendering the children of such marriage legitimate.

This species of marriage was not recognized by the civil law: it was introduced by the canon law. It is unknown to the law of the United States, and in England and Ireland. In France it has been adopted by the Code Civil, art. 201, 202. In Scotland the question has not been settled. Burge, Confl. Laws, 151, 152.

PUTTING IN FEAR. These words are used in the definition of a robbery from the person: the offence must have been committed by putting in fear the person robbed. Co. 3d Inst. 68; 4 Bla. Com. 243.

This is the circumstance which distinguishes robbery from all other larcenies. But what force must be used or what kind of fears excited are questions very proper for discussion. The goods must be taken against the will of the possessor.

There must either be a putting in fear or actual violence, though both need not be positively shown, for the former will be inferred from the latter, and the latter is sufficiently implied in the former. For example, when a man is suddenly knocked down, and robbed while he is senseless, there is no fear, yet in consequence of the violence, it is presumed; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 711; 4 Binn. 379; 3 Wash. C. C. 209.

In an indictment for robbery, at common law, it is not necessary to allege a putting in fear in addition to the allegation of force and violence; 7 Mass. 242; 8 Cush. 217.

Q.

QUACK. One who, without sufficient knowledge, study, or previous preparation, undertakes to practise medicine or surgery, under the pretence that he possesses secrets in those arts.

To call a regular physician a quack is actionable. A quack is criminally answerable for his unskilful practice, and also civilly to his patient in certain cases. See MALPRACTICE; PHYSICIAN.

QUADRANS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fourth part of the whole. Hence the heir ex quadrante; that is to say, of the fourth part of the whole.

QUADRIENNIUM UTILE (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The four years of a minor between his age of twenty-one and twenty-five years are so called. During this period he is permitted to impeach contracts made against his interest previous to his arriving at the age of twenty-one years. 1 Bell, Com. 135.

QUADRIPARTITE (Lat.). Having four parts, or divided into four parts: as, this indenture quadripartite, made between A B, of the one part, C D, of the second part, E F, of the third part, and G H, of the fourth part.

QUADROON. A person who is descended from a white person, and another person who has an equal mixture of the European and African blood. 2 Bail. 558. See MULATTO.

QUADRUPLICATION. In Pleading. Formerly this word was used instead of surrebutter. 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 469, n.

QUÆ EST EADEM (Lat. which is the same). In Pleading. A clause containing a statement that the trespass, or other fact mentioned in the plea, is the same as that laid in the declaration, where from the circumstances there is an apparent difference between the two. 1 Chitty, Pl. *582, Gould, Pl. c. 3, §§ 79, 80; 29 Vt. 455.

The form is as follows: "which are the same assaulting, beating, and ill-treating, the said John, in the said declaration mentioned, and whereof the said John hath above thereof complained against the said James." See 1 Saund. 14, 208, n. 2; 2 id. 5 a, n. 3; Arch. Civ. Pl. 217; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (E 31); Cro. Jac. 372.

QUÆRE (Lat.). Query; noun and verb. A word frequently used to denote that an inquiry ought to be made of a doubtful thing. 2 Lilly, Abr. 406. Commonly used in the syllabi of the reports, to mark points of law considered doubtful.

QUÆRENS NON INVENIT PLEGIUM (Lat.). In Practice. The plaintiff has not found pledge. The return made by the sheriff to a writ directed to him with this clause, namely, si A fecerit B securum de clamore suo prosequando, when the plaintiff has neglected to find sufficient security. Fitz. N. B. 38.

QUÆSTIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. A sort of commission (ad quærendum) to inquire into some criminal matter given to a magistrate or citizen, who was called quæsitor or quæstor, who made report thereon to the senate or the people, as the one or the other appointed him. In progress of time he was empowered (with the assistance of a counsel) to adjudge the case; and the tribunal thus constituted was called quæstio.

This special tribunal continued in use until the end of the Roman republic, although it was resorted to, during the last times of the republic, only in extraordinary cases.

The manner in which they were constituted was this. If the matter to be inquired of was within the jurisdiction of the comitia, the senate, on the demand of the consul, or of a tribune, or of one of its members, declared by a decree that there was cause to prosecute a citizen. Then the consul ex auctoritate senatus asked the people in comitia (rogabat rogatio) to enact this decree into a law. The comitia adopted it, either simply or with amendment, or they rejected it.

The increase of population and of crimes rendered this method, which was tardy at best, onerous, and even impracticable. In the year A. U. C. 604, or 149 B. C., under the consulship of Censorinus and Manilius, the tribune Calpurnius Piso procured the passage of a law establishing a quæstio perpetua, to take cognizance of the crime of extortion committed by Roman magistrates against strangers de pecuniis repetundis. Cicero, Brut. 27; de Off. ii. 21; in Verr. iv. 25.

Many such tribunals were afterwards established, such as Quæstiones de majestate, de ambitu, de peculatu, de vi, de sodalitiis, etc. Each was composed of a certain number of judges taken from the senators, and presided over by a prætor, although he might delegate his authority to a public officer, who was called judex quæstionis. These tribunals continued a year only; for the meaning of the word perpetuus is non interruptus, not interrupted during the term of its appointed duration.

The establishment of these quæstiones deprived the comitia of their criminal jurisdiction, except the crime of treason: they were, in fact, the depositories of the judicial power during the sixth and seventh centuries of the Roman republic, the last of which was remarkable for civil dissensions and replete with great public transactions. Without some knowledge of the constitution of the Quæstio perpetua, it is impossible to understand the forensic speeches of Cicero, or even the political history of that age. But when Julius Cæsar, as dictator, sat for the trial of Ligarius, the ancient constitution of the republic was, in fact, destroyed, and the criminal tribunals, which had existed in more or less vigor and purity until then, existed no longer but in name. Under Augustus, the concentration of the triple power of the consuls, pro-consuls, and tribunes in his person transferred to him, as of course, all judicial powers and authorities.

QUÆSTOR (Lat.). The name of a magistrate of ancient Rome.

QUALIFICATION. Having the requisite qualities for a thing: as, to be president of the United States, the candidate must possess certain qualifications. 64 Mo. 89.

QUALIFIED ELECTOR. A person who is legally qualified to vote. 28 Wisc. 358.

QUALIFIED FEE. One which has a qualification subjoined to it, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. A limitation to a man and his heirs on the part of his father affords an example of this species of estate. Littleton, § 254; 2 Bla. Com. 109.

QUALIFIED INDORSEMENT. A transfer of a bill of exchange or promissory note to an indorsee, without any liability to the indorser: the words usually employed for this purpose are sans recours, without recourse. 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 1138.

QUALIFIED PROPERTY. Property not in its nature permanent, but which may sometimes subsist and at other times not subsist. A defeasible and precarious ownership, which lasts as long as the thing is in actual use and occupation: e. g., first, property in animals ferœ naturæ, or in light, or air, where the qualified property arises from the nature of the thing; second, property in a thing held by any one as a bailee, where the qualified property arises not from the nature of the thing, but from the peculiar circumstances under which it is held; 2 Bla. Com. 391, 395*; 2 Kent, 347; 2 Woodd. Lect. 385.

Any ownership not absolute.

QUALIFY. To become qualified or fit for any office or employment. To take the necessary steps to prepare one's self for an appointment; as, to take an oath to discharge the duties of an office, to give the bond required of an executor, etc.

QUALITY. Persons. The state or condition of a person.

Two contrary qualities cannot be in the same person at the same time. Dig. 41. 10. 4. Every one is presumed to know the quality of the person with whom he is contracting. In the United States the people are all upon an equality in their civil rights.

In Pleading. That which distinguishes one thing from another of the same kind.

It is, in general, necessary, when the declaration alleges an injury to the goods and chattels, or any contract relating to them, that the quality should be stated; and it is also essential, in an action for the recovery of real estate, that its quality should be shown: as, whether it consists of houses, lands, or other hereditaments, whether the lands are meadow, pasture, or arable, etc. The same rule requires that, in an action for an injury to real property, the quality should be shown; Steph. Pl. 214, 215. See, as to the various qualities, Ayliffe, Pand. [CO].

It is often allowable to omit from the indictment, and it is seldom necessary to prove with precision, allegations of quality, or, in other words, those allegations which describe the mode in which certain acts have been done. Thus, if the charge is of a felonious assault with a staff, and the proof is of such an assault with a stone, or if a wound, alleged to have been given with a sword, is proved to have been inflicted by an axe, or if a pistol is stated to have been loaded with a bullet, and it turns out to have been loaded with some other destructive material, the charge is substantially proved, and no variance occurs; 1 East, Pl. C. 341; 5 C. & P. 128; 9 id. 525, 548.

QUAMDIU SE BENE GESSERIT (Lat. as long as he shall behave himself well). A clause inserted in commissions, when such instruments were written in Latin, to signify the tenure by which the officer held his office.

QUANDO ACCIDERINT (Lat. when they fall in).

In Practice. When a defendant, executor or administrator, pleads plene administravit, the plaintiff may pray to have judgment of assets quando acciderint; Bull. N. P. 169; Bacon, Abr. Executor (M).

By taking a judgment in this form the plaintiff admits that the defendant has fully administered to that time; 1 Pet. C. C. 442, n. See 11 Viner, Abr. 379; Comyns. Dig. Pleader (2 D 9).

QUANTI MINORIS (Lat.). The name of a particular action in Louisiana. An action quanti minoris is one brought for the reduction of the price of a thing sold, in consequence of defects in the thing which is the object of the sale.

Such action must be commenced within twelve months from the date of the sale, or from the time within which the defect became known to the purchaser; 3 Mart. La. N. S. 287; 11 Mart. La. 11.

QUANTITY. In Pleading. That which is susceptible of measure.

It is a general rule that, when the declaration alleges an injury to goods and chattels, or any contract relating to them, their quantity should be stated; Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 35. And in actions for the recovery of real estate the quantity of the land should be specified; Bracton, 431 a; 11 Co. 25 b, 55 a; Doctr. Plac. 85, 86; 1 East, 441; 8 id. 367; 13 id. 102; Steph. Pl. 314, 315.

QUANTUM DAMNIFICATUS (Lat.). In Equity Practice. An issue directed by a court of equity to be tried in a court of law, to ascertain by a trial before a jury the amount of damages suffered by the non-performance of some collateral undertaking which a penalty has been given to secure. When such damages have thus been ascertained, the court will grant relief upon their payment. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3913.

QUANTUM MERUIT (Lat.). In Pleading. As much as he has deserved.

When a person employs another to do work for him, without any agreement as to his compensation, the law implies a promise from the employer to the workman that he will pay him for his services as much as he may deserve or merit. In such case the plaintiff may suggest in his declaration that the defendant promised to pay him as much as he reasonably deserved, and then aver that his trouble was worth such a sum of money, which the defendant has omitted to pay. This is called an assumpsit on a quantum meruit. 2 Bla. Com. 162, 163; 1 Viner, Abr. 346.

When there is an express contract for a stipulated amount and mode of compensation for services, the plaintiff cannot abandon the contract and resort to an action for a quantum meruit on an implied assumpsit; 14 Johns. 326; 18 id. 169; 10 S. & R. 236. But see 7 Cra. 299; Stark. 277; Holt, N. P. 256; 10 Johns. 36; 12 id. 374; 13 id. 56, 94, 359; 14 id. 326; 5 M. & W. 114; 4 C. & P. 93; 4 Scott, N. S. 374; 4 Taunt. 475; 1 Ad. & E. 333. See COMMON COUNTS.

QUANTUM VALEBAT (Lat. as much as it was worth). In Pleading. When goods are sold without specifying any price, the law implies a promise from the buyer to the seller that he will pay him for them as much as they were worth.

The plaintiff may, in such case, suggest in his declaration that the defendant promised to pay him as much as the said goods were worth, and then aver that they were worth so much, which the defendant has refused to pay. See the authorities cited under the article QUANTUM MERUIT.

QUARANTINE. In Maritime Law. The space of forty days, or less, during which the crew of a ship or vessel coming from a port or place infected or supposed to be infected with disease are required to remain on board after their arrival, before they can be permitted to land. It was probably established by the Venetians in 1484. Baker, Quar. 3.

By act of congress of April 29, 1878, ch. 66, vessels from foreign ports where contagious, and other diseases exist, are forbidden to enter the United States, excepting subject to certain regulations prescribed.

The object of the quarantine is to ascertain whether the crew are infected or not. To break the quarantine without legal authority is a misdemeanor; 1 Russ. Cr. 133.

Quarantine regulations made by the states are sustainable as the exercise of the police power; Cooley, Const. Lim. 729; 95 U. S. 465.

In cases of insurance of ships, the insurer is responsible when the insurance extends to her being moored in port twenty-four hours in safety, although she may have arrived, if before the twenty-four hours are expired she is ordered to perform quarantine, if any accident contemplated by the policy occur; 1 Marsh. Ins. 264.

See Baker, Quarantine.

In Real Property. The space of forty days during which a widow has a right to remain in her late husband's principal mansion immediately after his death. The right of the widow is also called her quarantine.

In some, perhaps all, of the states of the United States, provision has been expressly made by statute securing to the widow this right for a greater or less space of time. See 4 Kent, 62; Walk. Am. Law, 231; 3

Washb. R. P. 272. Quarantine is a personal right, forfeited, by implication of law, by a second marriage; Co. Litt. 32. See Bacon, Abr. Dower (B); Co. Litt. 32 b, 34 b; Co. 2d Inst. 16, 17.

QUARE (Lat.). In Pleading. Wherefore.

This word is sometimes used in the writ in certain actions, but is inadmissible in a material averment in the pleadings, for it is merely interrogatory; and, therefore, when a declaration began with complaining of the defendant, "wherefore with force, etc. he broke and entered" the plaintiff's close, it was considered ill; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (B. 5, 4): Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 34.

QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT. See TRESPASS.

QUARE EJECIT INFRA TERMINUM. See EJECTMENT.

QUARE IMPEDIT (Lat. why he hinders). In English Law. A real possessory action which can be brought only in the court of common pleas, and lies to recover a presentation when the patron's right is disturbed, or to try a disputed title to an advowson. See DISTURBANCE; Mireh. Advow. 265; 2 Saund. 336 a.

QUARE OBSTRUXIT (Lat. why he obstructs). The name of a writ formerly used in favor of one who, having a right to pass through his neighbor's grounds, was prevented enjoying such right, because the owner of the grounds had obstructed the way.

QUARREL. A dispute; a difference. In law, particularly in releases, which are taken most strongly against the releasor, when a man releases all quarrel he is said to release all actions, real and personal; 8 Co. 153.

QUARRY. A place whence stones are dug for the purpose of being employed in building, making roads, and the like. In mining law it is said to be an open excavation where the works are visible at the surface. It is said to be derived from quadratarius, a stone-cutter or squarer. Bainbr. Mines, 2.

When a farm is let with an open quarry, the tenant may, when not restrained by his contract, take out the stone; but he has no right to open new quarries. See MINES; WASTE.

QUART. A liquid measure, containing one-fourth part of a gallon.

QUARTER. A measure of length, equal to four inches. See MEASURE.

QUARTER-DAYS. The four days of the year on which rent payable quarterly becomes due.

QUARTER-DOLLAR. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of twenty-five cents.

Previous to the act of Feb. 21, 1853, c. 79, 10 U. S. Stat. at Large, 160, the weight of the quarter-dollar was one hundred and three and one-eighth grains; but coins struck after the passage of that act were of the weight of ninety-six grains. The fineness was not altered by the act cited: of one thousand parts, nine hundred are pure silver and one hundred alloy. By the act of 12th of Feb. 1873, the weight of the quarter-dollar is fixed at one-half that of the half-dollar (twelve and one-half grams); R. S. § 3573; and by act of July 22, 1876, it is made legal tender in all sums public and private not exceeding ten dollars; Supplement R. S. p. 488.

See HALF-DOLLAR,—in which the change in the weight of silver coins is more fully noticed.

QUARTER-EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of two and a half dollars. See MONEY; COIN.

QUARTER-SALES. In New York a certain fraction of the purchase-money is often conditioned to be paid back on alienation of the estate; and this fine on alienation is expressed as a tenth-sales, a quarter-sales, etc. 7 Cow. 285; 7 Hill, 253; 7 N. Y. 490.

QUARTER SEAL. In Scotch Law. The seal kept by the director of the chancery in Scotland is so called. It is in the shape and impression of the fourth part of the great seal. Bell, Dict.

QUARTER SESSIONS. A court bearing this name, mostly invested with the trial of criminals. It takes its name from sitting quarterly, or once in three months.

The English courts of quarter sessions were erected during the reign of Edward III. See stat. 36 Edw. III.; Crabb, Eng. Law, 278.

QUARTER-YEAR. In the computation of time, a quarter-year consists of ninety-one days. Co. Litt. 135 b; 2 Rolle, Abr. 521, l. 40; N. Y. Rev. Stat. pt. 1, c. 19, t. 1, § 3.

QUARTERING. A barbarous punishment formerly inflicted on criminals by tearing them to pieces by means of four horses, one attached to each limb.

QUARTERING OF SOLDIERS. Furnishing soldiers with board or lodging or both. The constitution of the United States, Amendm. art. 3, provides that "no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law." See Cooley, Const. Lim. 378; Rawle, Const. 126.

QUARTEROON. One who has had one of his grandparents of the black or African race.

QUARTO DIE POST (Lat. fourth day after). Appearance-day, which is the fourth day inclusive from the return of the writ; and if the person summoned appears on that day, it is sufficient. On this day, also, the court begins to sit for despatch of business. These three days were originally given as an indulgence. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 278*; Tidd, New Pr. 134. But this practice is now altered. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76.

QUASH. In Practice. To overthrow or annul.

When proceedings are clearly irregular and void, the courts will quash them, both in civil and criminal cases: for example, when the array is clearly irregular, as, if the jurors have been selected by persons not authorized by law, it will be quashed. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3342.

In criminal cases, when an indictment is so defective that no judgment can be given upon it, should the defendant be convicted, the court, upon application, will, in general, quash it: as, if it have no jurisdiction of the offence charged, or when the matter charged is not indictable. 1 Burr. 516, 543; Andr. 226. It is in the discretion of the court to quash an indictment or to leave the defendant to a motion in arrest of judgment; 1 Cush. 189. When the application to quash is made on the part of the defendant, in English practice, the court generally refuses to quash the indictment when it appears some enormous crime has been committed; Comyns, Dig. Indictment (H); Wils. 325; 3 Term, 621; 5 Mod. 13; 6 id. 42; 3 Burr. 1841; Bacon, Abr. Indictment (K).

When the application is made on the part of the prosecution, the indictment will be quashed whenever it is defective so that the defendant cannot be convicted, and the prosecution appears to be bona fide. If the prosecution be instituted by the attorney-general, he may, in some states, enter a nolle prosequi, which has the same effect; 1 Dougl. 239, 240. The application should be made before plea pleaded; Leach, 11; 4 State Tr. 232; 1 Hale, 35; Fost. 231; and before the defendant's recognizance has been forfeited; 1 Salk. 380. See CASSETUR BREVE.

QUASI (Lat. as if, almost). A term used to mark a resemblance, and which supposes a difference between two objects. Dig. 11. 7. 1. 8. 1. It is exclusively a term of classification. Prefixed to a term of Roman law, it implies that the conception to which it serves as an index is connected with the conception with which the comparison is instituted by a strong superficial analogy or resemblance. It negatives the idea of identity, but points out that the conceptions are sufficiently similar for one to be classed as the equal of the other; Maine, Anc. Law, 332. Civilians use the expressions quasi-contractus, quasi-delictum, quasi-possessio, quasi-traditio, etc.

QUASI-AFFINITY. In Civil Law. The affinity which exists between two persons, one of whom has been betrothed to the kindred of the other, but who have never been married.

For example: my brother is betrothed to Maria, and afterwards, before marriage, he dies, there then exists between Maria and me a quasi-affinity.

The history of England furnishes an example of this kind. Catherine of Arragon was betrothed to the brother of Henry VIII. Afterwards, Henry married her, and under the pretence of this quasi-affinity he repudiated her, because the marriage was incestuous.

QUASI-CONTRACTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The act of a person, permitted by law, by which he obligates himself towards another, or by which another binds himself to him, without any agreement between them.

By article 2272 of the Civil Code of Louisiana, which is translated from article 1371 of the Code Civil, quasi-contracts are defined to be "the lawful and purely voluntary acts of a man, from which there results any obligation whatever to a third person, and sometimes a reciprocal obligation between the parties." In contracts, it is the consent of the contracting parties which produces the obligation; in quasi-contracts no consent is required, and the obligation arises from the law or natural equity, on the facts of the case. These acts are called quasi-contracts, because, without being contracts, they bind the parties as contracts do.

There is no term in the common law which answers to that of quasi-contracts; many quasi-contracts may doubtless be classed among implied contracts: there is, however, a difference to be noticed. For example: in case money should be paid by mistake to a minor, it may be recovered from him by the civil law, because his consent is not necessary to a quasi-contract; but by the common law, if it can be recovered, it must be upon an agreement to which the law presumes he has consented, and it is doubtful, upon principle, whether such recovery could be had.

Quasi-contracts may be multiplied almost to infinity. They are, however, divided into five classes; such as relate to the voluntary and spontaneous management of the affairs of another, without authority (negotiorum gestio); the administration of tutorship; the management of common property (communio bonorum); the acquisition of an inheritance; and the payment of a sum of money or other thing by mistake, when nothing was due (indebiti solutio).

Each of these quasi-contracts has an affinity with some contract: thus, the management of the affairs of another without authority, and tutorship, are compared to a mandate; the community of property, to a partnership; the acquisition of an inheritance, to a stipulation; and the payment of a thing which is not due, to a loan.

All persons, even infants and persons destitute of reason, who are consequently incapable of consent, may be obliged by the quasi-contract which results from the act of another, and may also oblige others in their favor; for it is not consent which forms these obligations: they are contracted by the act of another, without any act on our part. The use of reason is indeed required in the person whose act forms the quasi-contract, but it is not required in the person by whom or in whose favor the obligations which result from it are contracted. For instance, if a person undertakes the business of an infant or a lunatic, this is a quasi-contract, which obliges the infant or the lunatic to the person undertaking his affairs, for what he has beneficially expended, and reciprocally obliges the person to give an account of his administration or management.

Quasi-contracts are usually identified with implied contracts, but this is an error, for implied contracts are true contracts which quasi-contracts are not, inasmuch as the convention, the essential part of a contract, was wanting: Maine, Anc. Law, 332.

See, generally, Justinian, Inst. 3. 28; Dig. 3. 5; Ayl. Pand. b. 4, tit. 31; 1 Brown, Civil Law, 386; Erskine, Inst. 3. 3. 16; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 192 et seq.; Pothier, Obl. n. 113 et seq.; Merlin, Répert. Quasi-Contract.

QUASI-CORPORATIONS. A term applied to those bodies or municipal societies which, though not vested with the general powers of corporations, are yet recognized, by statutes or immemorial usage, as persons or aggregate corporations, with precise duties which may be enforced, and privileges which may be maintained, by suits at law. They may be considered quasi-corporations, with limited powers, coextensive with the duties imposed upon them by statute or usage, but restrained from a general use of the authority which belongs to those metaphysical persons by the common law. See 13 Mass. 192; L. R. 1 H. L. 293; Boone, Corp. § 10.

Among quasi-corporations may be ranked counties, and also towns, townships, parishes, hundreds, and other political divisions of counties, which are established without an express charter of incorporation; commissioners of a county, most of the commissions instituted for public use, supervisors of highways, overseers or guardians of the poor, loan officers of a county, trustees of a school fund, trustees of the poor, school districts, trustees of schools, judges of a court authorized to take bonds to themselves in their official capacity, and the like, who are invested with corporate powers sub modo and for a few specified purposes only. The governor of a state has been held a quasi-corporation sole; 8 Humph. 176; so has a trustee of a friendly society in whom, by statute, property is vested, and by and against whom suits may be brought; see 1 B. & Ald. 157; so if a levee district organized by statute to reclaim land from overflow; 51 Cal. 406; and fire departments having by statute certain powers and duties which necessarily invest them with a limited capacity to sue and be sued; 1 Sweeny, 224. It may be laid down as a general rule that where a body is created by statute possessing powers and duties which involve incidentally a qualified capacity to sue and be sued, such body is to be considered a quasi-corporation; id.; 51 Cal. 406. See, generally, Ang. & A. Corp. § 24; 13 Am. Dec. 524; but not such a body as the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, which has not the capacity to sue and be sued; 4 Whart. 531; Ang. & A. Corp. § 24.

QUASI-DELICT. In Civil Law. An act whereby a person, without malice, but by fault, negligence, or imprudence not legally excusable, causes injury to another.

A quasi-delict may be public or private: the neglect of the affairs of a community, when it is our duty to attend to them, may be a crime; the neglect of a private matter, under similar circumstances, may be the ground of a civil action. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law, c. 43, p. 265.

QUASI-DEPOSIT. A kind of involuntary bailment, which takes place where a person acquires possession of property lawfully, by finding. Story, Bailm. § 85.

QUASI-OFFENCES. Offences for which some person other than the actual perpetrator is responsible, the perpetrator being presumed to act by command of the responsible party.

Injuries which have been unintentionally caused. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

QUASI-PARTNERS. Partners of lands, goods, or chattels, who are not actual partners, are sometimes so called. Pothier, de Société, App. n. 184. See PART-OWNERS.

QUASI-POSTHUMOUS CHILD. In Civil Law. One who, born during the life of his grandfather or other male ascendant, was not his heir at the time he made his testament, but who by the death of his father became his heir in his lifetime. Inst. 2. 13. 2; Dig. 28. 3. 13.

QUASI-PURCHASE. This term is used in the civil law to denote that a thing is to be considered as purchased from the presumed consent of the owner of a thing: as, if a man should consume a cheese, which is in his possession and belonging to another, with an intent to pay the price of it to the owner, the consent of the latter will be presumed, as the cheese would have been spoiled by keeping it longer. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 691.

QUASI-TRADITIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A term used to designate that a person is in the use of the property of another, which the latter suffers and does not oppose. Leç. Elem. § 396. It also signifies the act by which the right of property is ceded in a thing to a person who is in possession of it; as, if I loan a boat to Paul, and deliver it to him, and afterwards I sell him the boat, it is not requisite that he should deliver the boat to me to be again delivered to him: there is a quasi tradition or delivery.

QUATUORVIRI (Lat. four men). In Roman Law. Magistrates who had the care and inspection of roads. Dig. 1. 2. 3. 30.

QUAY. A wharf at which to load or land goods. (Sometimes spelled key.)

In its enlarged sense the word quay means the whole space between the first row of houses of a city, and the sea or river; 5 La. 152, 215. So much of the quay as is requisite for the public use of loading and unloading vessels is public property, and cannot be appropriated to private use, but the rest may be private property.

QUE EST MESME (L. Fr.). Which is the same. See QUÆ EST EADEM.

QUE ESTATE (quem statum, or which estate). A plea by which a man prescribes in himself and those whose estate he holds. 2 Bla. Com. 270; 18 Viner, Abr. 133–140; Co. Litt. 121 a.

QUEAN. A worthless woman; a strumpet. The meaning of this word, which is now seldom used, is said not to be well ascertained. 2 Rolle, Abr. 296; Bacon, Abr. Slander (U 3).

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY. By stat. 2 Anne, c. 11, all the revenue of first-fruits and tenths was vested in trustees forever, to form a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings. 1 Bla. Com. 286; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 280–268.

QUEEN CONSORT. The wife of a reigning king. 1 Bla. Com. 218. She is looked upon by the law as a feme sole, as to her power of contracting, suing, etc. Id.

QUEEN DOWAGER. The widow of the king. She has most of the privileges belonging to a queen consort. 1 Bla. Com. 229.

QUEEN-GOLD. A royal revenue belonging to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and due from every person who has made a voluntary fine or offer to the king of ten marks or upwards, in consideration of any grant or privilege conferred by the crown. It is due of record on the recording of the fine. It was last exacted in the reign of Charles I. It is now quite obsolete. 1 Bla. Com. 220–222; Fortescue, de Laud. 398.

QUEEN REGNANT. She who holds the crown in her own right. She has the same duties and prerogatives, etc. as a king. Stat. 1 Mar. I. st. 3, c. 1; 1 Bla. Com. 218; 1 Woodd. Lect. 94.

QUERELA (Lat.). An action preferred in any court of justice. The plaintiff was called querens, or complainant, and his brief, complaint, or declaration was called querela. Jacob, Law Dict.

QUERELA INOFFICIOSI TESTAMENTI (Lat. complaint of an undutiful or unkind will). In Civil Law. A species of action allowed to a child who had been unjustly disinherited, to set aside the will, founded on the presumption of law, in such cases, that the parent was not in his right mind. Calvinus, Lex.; 2 Kent, 327; Bell, Dict.

QUESTION. In Criminal Law. A means sometimes employed, in some countries, by torture, to compel supposed great criminals to disclose their accomplices or to acknowledge their crimes.

This torture is called question because, as the unfortunate person accused is made to suffer pain, he is asked questions as to his supposed crime or accomplices. This is unknown in the United States. See Pothier, Procédure Criminelle, sect. 5, art. 2, § 3.

In Evidence. An interrogation put to a witness, requesting him to declare the truth of certain facts as far as he knows them.

Questions are either general or leading. By a general question is meant such a one as requires the witness to state all he knows, without any suggestion being made to him: as, Who gave the blow?

A leading question is one which leads the mind of the witness to the answer, or suggests it to him: as, Did A B give the blow?

The Romans called a question by which the fact or supposed fact which the interrogator expected or wished to find asserted in and by the answer was made known to the proposed respondent, a suggestive interrogation: as, Is not your name A B? See LEADING QUESTION.

In Practice. A point on which the parties are not agreed, and which is submitted to the decision of a judge and jury.

When the doubt or difference arises as to what the law is on a certain state of facts, this is said to be a legal question; and when the party demurs, this is to be decided by the court; when it arises as to the truth or falsehood of facts, this is a question of fact, and is to be decided by the jury.

QUÆSTORES CLASSICI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Officers intrusted with the care of the public money.

Their duties consisted in making the necessary payments from the ærarium, and receiving the public revenues. Of both they had to keep correct accounts in their tabulæ publicæ. Demands which any one might have on the ærarium, and outstanding debts, were likewise registered by them. Fines to be paid to the public treasury were registered and exacted by them. They were likewise to provide proper accommodations for foreign ambassadors and such persons as were connected with the republic by ties of public hospitality. Lastly, they were charged with the care of the burials and monuments of distinguished men, the expenses for which had been decreed by the senate to be paid by the treasury. Their number at first was confined to two; but this was afterwards increased as the empire became extended. There were questors of cities and of provinces, and questors of the army: the latter were in fact paymasters.

QUÆSTORES PARRICIDII (Lat.). In Roman Law. Public accusers, two in number, who conducted the accusation of persons guilty of murder or any other capital offence, and carried the sentence into execution. They ceased to be appointed at an early period. Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq.

QUI TAM (Lat. who as well). An action under a statute which imposes a penalty for the doing or not doing an act, and gives that penalty in part to whomsoever will sue for the same, and the other part to the commonwealth, or some charitable, literary, or other institution, and makes it recoverable by action. The plaintiff describes himself as suing as well for the commonwealth, for example, as for himself. Espinasse, Pen. Act, 5, 6; 1 Viner, Abr. 197; 1 Salk. ‡29, n.; Bacon, Abr.

QUIA (Lat.). In Pleading. Because. This word is considered a term of affirmation.

It is sufficiently direct and positive for introducing a material averment. 1 Saund. 117, n. 4; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 77).

QUIA EMPTORES (Lat.). A name sometimes given to the English Statute of Westminster 3, 13 Edw. I. c. 1, from its initial words. 2 Bla. Com. 91.

QUIA TIMET (Lat. because he fears). A term applied to preventive or anticipatory remedies. According to Lord Coke, "there be six writs of law that may be maintained quia timet, before any molestation, distress, or impleading: as, First, a man may have his writ or mesne before he be distrained. Second, a warrantia chartæ, before he be impleaded. Third, a monstraverunt, before any distress or vexation. Fourth, an audita querela, before any execution sued. Fifth, a curia claudenda, before any default of enclosure. Sixth, a ne injuste vexes, before any distress or molestation. And these are called brevia anticipantia, writs of prevention." Co. Litt. 100. And see 7 Bro. P. C. 125.

These writs are generally obsolete. In chancery, when it is contemplated to prevent an expected injury, a bill quia timet is filed. See BILL QUIA TIMET.

QUIBBLE. A slight difficulty raised without necessity or propriety; a cavil.

No justly eminent member of the bar will resort to a quibble in his argument. It is contrary to his oath, which is to be true to the court as well as to the client; and bad policy, because by resorting to it he will lose his character as a man of probity.

QUICK WITH CHILD. See QUICKENING.

QUICKENING. In Medical Jurisprudence. The sensation a mother has of the motion of the child she has conceived.

The period when quickening is first experienced varies from the tenth to the twenty-fifth, but is usually about the sixteenth week from conception; Denman, Midw. p. 129.

It was formerly supposed that either the child was not alive until the time of quickening, or that it had acquired some new kind of existence that it did not possess before: hence the presumption of law that dates the life of the child from that time.

The child is, in truth, alive from the first moment of conception, and, according to its age and state of development, has different modes of manifesting its life, and, during a portion of the period of gestation, by its motion. By the growth of the embryo, the womb is enlarged until it becomes of too great a size to be contained in the pelvis, it then rises to the abdomen, when the motion of the fœtus is for the first time felt. See 1 Leg. Gaz. Rep. (Pa.) 183.

Quickening as indicating a distinct point in the existence of the fœtus, has no foundation in physiology; for it arises merely from the relation which the organs of gestation bear to the parts that surround them: it may take place early or late, according to the condition of these different parts, but not from any inherent vitality for the first time manifested by the fœtus.

As life, by law, is said to commence when a woman first becomes quick with child, so procuring an abortion after that period is a misdemeanor. Before this time, formerly the law did not interfere to prevent a pregnant woman convicted of a capital offence from being executed; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 413. If, however, the humanity of the law of the present day would not allow a woman to be executed who is, as Blackstone terms it, privément enceinte, Com. 129, i. e. pregnant, although not quick, it would be but carrying out the same desire to interfere with long-established rules, to hold that the penalty for procuring abortion should also extend to the whole period of pregnancy.

"Quick with child is having conceived; with quick child is where the child has quickened." 8 C. & P. 265; approved in 1 Leg. Gaz. Rep. (Pa.) 183; 2 Whar. & St. Med. Jur. 1230. See 26 Am. Dec. 60, n.

QUID PRO QUO (Lat. what for what). A term denoting the consideration of a contract. See Co. Litt. 47 b; 7 M. & G. 998.

QUIDAM (Lat. some one; somebody). In French Law. A term used to express an unknown person, or one who cannot be named.

A quidam is usually described by the features of his face, the color of his hair, his height, his clothing, and the like, in any process which may be issued against him. Merlin, Répert.; Encyclopédie.

QUIET ENJOYMENT. The name of a covenant in a lease, by which the lessor agrees that the lessee shall peaceably enjoy the premises leased. This covenant goes to the possession, and not to the title; 3 Johns. 471; 5 id. 120; 2 Dev. 388; 3 id. 200. A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not extend as far as a covenant of warranty; 1 Aik. 233.

The covenant for quiet enjoyment is broken only by an entry, or lawful expulsion from, or some actual disturbance in, the possession; 3 Johns. 471; 8 id. 198; 15 id. 483; 7 Wend. 281; 2 Hill, N. Y. 105; 9 Metc. 63; 4 Whart. 86; 4 Cow. 340. But the tortious entry of the covenantor, without title, is a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment; 7 Johns. 376.

QUIETUS (Lat. freed or acquitted). In English Law. A discharge; an acquittance.

An instrument by the clerk of the pipe and auditors in the exchequer, as proof of their acquittance or discharge of accountants. Cowel.

Discharge of a judge or attorney-general. 3 Mod. 99*.

In American Law. The discharge of an executor by the probate court. 4 Mas. 131.

QUINTO EXACTUS (Lat.). In Old English Law. The fifth call or last requisition of a defendant sued to outlawry.

QUIT-CLAIM. In Conveyancing. A form of deed of the nature of a release containing words of grant as well as release. 2 Washb. R. P. 606.

The term is in constant and general use in American law to denote a deed substantially the same as a release in English law. It presupposes a previous or precedent conveyance or a subsisting estate and possession; Thornt. Conv. 44. It is a conveyance at common law, but differs from a release in that it is regarded as an original conveyance in American law, at least in some states; 6 Pick. 499; 3 Conn. 398; 9 Ohio, 96; 5 Ill. 117; Me. Rev. Stat. c. 73, § 14; Miss. Code 1857, p. 309, art. 17. The operative words are remise, release, and forever quit-claim; Thornt. Conv. 44. Covenants of warranty against incumbrances by the grantor are usually added. See a full article in 12 Cent. L. J. 127.

QUIT-RENT. A rent paid by the tenant of the freehold, by which he goes quit and free,—that is, discharged from any other rent. 2 Bla. Com. 42.

In England, quit-rents were rents reserved to the king or a proprietor, on an absolute grant of waste land, for which a price in gross was at first paid, and a mere nominal rent reserved as a feudal acknowledgment of tenure. Inasmuch as no rent of this description can exist in the United States, when a quit-rent is spoken of some other interest must be intended. 5 Call. 364. A perpetual rent reserved on a conveyance in fee-simple is sometimes known by the name of quit-rent in Massachusetts. See GROUND-RENT; RENT.

QUO ANIMO (Lat. with what intention). The intent; the mind with which a thing has been done: as, the quo animo with which the words were spoken may be shown by the proof of conversations of the defendant relating to the original defamation. 19 Wend. 296.

QUO JURE, WRIT OF. In English Law. The name of writ commanding the defendant to show by what right he demands common of pasture in the land of the complainant who claims to have a fee in the same. Fitzh. N. B. 299.

QUO MINUS (Lat.). The name of a writ. In England, when the king's debtor is sued in the court of the exchequer, he may sue out a writ of quo minus, in which he suggests that he is the king's debtor, and that the defendant has done him the injury or damage complained of, quo minus sufficiens existit, by which he is less able to pay the king's debt. This was originally requisite in order to give jurisdiction to the court of exchequer; but now this suggestion is a mere form. 3 Bla. Com. 46.

QUO WARRANTO (Lat. by what authority). In Practice. The name of a writ (and also of the whole pleading) by which the government commences an action to recover an office or franchise from the person or corporation in possession of it.

The writ commands the sheriff to summon the defendant to appear before the court to which it is returnable, to show (quo warranto) by what authority he claims the office or franchise. It is a writ of right, a civil remedy to try the mere right to the franchise or office, where the person in possession never had a right to it or has forfeited it by neglect or abuse; 3 Bla. Com. 262, 263.

The action of quo warranto was prescribed by the Statute of Gloster, 6 Edw. I., and is a limitation upon the royal prerogative. Before this statute, the king, by virtue of his prerogative, sent commissions over the kingdom to inquire into the right to all franchises, quo jure et quare nomine illi retinent, etc.; and, as they were grants from the crown, if those in possession of them could not show a charter, the franchises were seized into the king's hands without any judicial proceeding. Like all other original civil writs, the writ of quo warranto issued out of chancery, and was returnable alternatively before the king's bench or justices in eyre; Co. 2d Inst. 277, 494; 2 Term, 549.

The writ of quo warranto has given place to an information in the nature of quo warranto. This, though in form a criminal; see 14 Fla. 256; is in substance a civil, proceeding, to try the mere right to the franchise or office; 3 Bla. Com. 263; 1 S. & R. 382; Ang. & A. Corp. 469; 2 Kent, 312; 3 Term, 199; 23 Wend. 537, 591; but see 13 Ill. 66.

If the proceedings refer to the usurpation of the franchises of a municipal corporation, the right to file the information is in the state, at the discretion of the attorney-general; 14 Fla. 256; not of citizens; id. see 20 Penn. 518. Individuals cannot take proceedings to dissolve a corporation; 16 S. & R. 144; but in regard to the election of a corporate officer, the writ may issue at the suit of the attorney-general or of any person interested; 1 Zab. 9; 20 Penn. 415; but a private citizen must have some interest; 50 Mo. 97. The attorney-general may act without leave of court; 83 Penn. 105; 38 N. J. L. 282; 12 Fla. 190; but a private relator may not; 15 S. & R. 127; s. c. 16 Am. Dec. 531; and the court will use its discretion in granting the writ; 70 Ill. 25; 2 Johns. 184. Leave is granted on a petition or motion with affidavits, upon which a rule to show cause is granted; 70 Ill. 25. The writ lies against the corporate body, if it is to restrain a usurpation; 50 Mo. 56; or enforce a forfeiture; 57 N. H. 498; but if it is to inquire whether a corporation has been legally organized, the writ lies against the individuals; 15 Wend. 113; s. c. 30 Am. Dec. 34.

In New York a statutory action in the nature of a quo warranto, has been substituted. Code Civ. Proc. § 1983. This is a civil writ of legal, not equitable cognizance; 52 N. Y. 576. So in other states it is subject to the rules strictly applicable to civil proceedings; 50 Ala. 566; 44 Mo. 154; Boone, Corp. § 161. The terms "quo warranto" and "information in the nature of a quo warranto" are synonymous; 34 Wisc. 197; contra, 25 Mo. 555; 26 Ark. 281.

Although quo warranto proceedings will lie against a municipal corporation in this country, yet they are seldom employed. See a case in 32 Vt. 50; and see 56 Mo. 328. They will lie against members of a city council 70 Penn. 465; 80 N. Y. 117; contra, 47 Cal. 624; 20 Kans. 692; a county treasurer, 15 Ill. 517; a sheriff; 5 Mich. 146; 83 Penn. 105; a lieutenant-governor; 12 Fla. 265; a governor; 4 Wisc. 567; a judge of probate; 77 N. C. 18; a mayor; 55 N. Y. 525; an elector of president of the United States, proceedings being taken in the name of the United States; 8 S. C. 400; a major-general of militia; 5 R. I. 1; so of other militia officers; 26 Penn. 31; 2 Green, Law, 84. There must first be a user of the office; 83 Ill. 128; but taking the oath; id.; or exercising its functions without taking the oath; 52 Miss. 665; is enough.

Pleadings in quo warranto are anomalous. In ordinary legal proceedings, the plaintiff, whether he be the state or a person, is bound to show a case against the defendant. But in an information of quo warranto, as well as in the writ for which it is substituted, the order is reversed. The state is not bound to show any thing, but the defendant is bound to show that he has a right to the franchise or office in question; and if he fail to show authority, judgment must be given against him; 4 Burr. 2146, 2127; Ang. & A. Corp. 636. To the writ of quo warranto the defendant simply pleaded his charter, which was a full answer to the writ; just as before the statute of Edward I. the production of the charter to the king's commissioners was full authority for the possession of the franchise or office. But to an information of quo warranto the plea of the defendant consists of his charter, with an absque hoc denying that he usurped the franchise, and concludes with a verification. The plea is in form a special traverse, but in substance it is not such. The information was originally a criminal proceeding, to punish the usurpation of the franchise by a fine, as well as to seize the franchise; therefore the information charged usurpation, and the defendant was compelled to deny the usurpation, as well as to show his charter, which he did in the form of an absque hoc to his plea. But when the proceeding ceased to be criminal, and, like the writ of quo warranto, was applied to the mere purpose of trying the civil right to the franchise, the absque hoc denying the usurpation became immaterial, though it is still retained in the forms; 5 Jacob, Law Dict. 374; 4 Cow. 106, note. In Coke's Entries, 351; there is a plea to an information of quo warranto without the absque hoc. The absque hoc, being immaterial, should not be answered by the replication, as it must always be in a special traverse; but the charter, in the first part of the plea, though occupying the place of an inducement, must be denied by the replication, its existence and character being the sole question in controversy upon which the legality of the acts of the corporation turns; Gilb. Ev. 6–8, 145; 10 Mod. 111, 296.

Until the statute 32 Geo. III. c. 58, the defendant could not plead double in an information of quo warranto to forfeit an office or franchise; 1 P. Wms. 220; 4 Burr. 2146, n.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 479; 5 Bacon, Abr. 449; 4 Cow. 113, n.; 2 Dutch. 215.

In information of quo warranto there are two forms of judgment. When it is against an officer or against individuals, the judgment is ouster; but when it is against a corporation by its corporate name, the judgment was ouster and seizure. In the first case, there being no franchise forfeited, there is none to seize; in the last case, there is; consequently the franchise is seized; 2 Kent, 312, and note; 2 Term, 521, 550. Now, judgment is ouster and dissolution; 15 Wend. 113; s. c. 30 Am. Dec. 34; but there may be a judgment of ouster of a particular franchise, and not of the whole charter; 15 Wend. 113. See, as to the judgment, 32 Vt. 50; 4 Cow. 120. By such judgment of ouster and seizure the franchises are not destroyed, but exist in the hands of the state; but the corporation was destroyed, and ceased to be the owner or possessor of lands or goods, or rights or credits. The lands reverted to the grantor and his heirs, and the goods escheated to the state. But, later, it has been held that the judgment must be confined to seizure of the franchises: if it be extended to seizure of the property, so far it is erroneous; 1 Blackf. 267. See SCIRE FACIAS; 30 Barb. 588.

The principle of forfeiture is that the franchise is a trust; and all the terms of the charter are conditions of the trust; and if any one of the conditions of the trust be violated, it will work a forfeiture of the charter. And the corporate powers must be construed strictly, and must be exercised in the manner and in the forms and by the agents prescribed in the charter; 2 Kent, 298, 299; 1 Bla. Com. 485; 13 Viner, Abr. 511; 13 Pet. 587; 5 Wend. 211; 2 Term, 546; 4 Gill & J. 121.

Cases of forfeiture may be divided into two great classes. Cases of perversion: as, where a corporation does an act inconsistent with the nature and destructive of the ends and purposes of the grant. In such cases, unless the perversion is such as to amount to an injury to the public who are interested in the franchise; 34 Penn. 283; it will not work a forfeiture. Cases of usurpation: as, where a corporation exercises a power which it has no right to exercise. In such cases the cause of forfeiture is not determined by any question of injury to the public, but the abuse which will work a forfeiture need not be of any particular measure or extent; 3 Term, 216, 246; 23 Wend. 242; 34 Miss. 688; 21 Ill. 65. See 30 Ala. N. S. 66. In case of usurpation of an office or franchise by an individual, it must be of a public nature to be reached by this writ; 21 Ill. 65; 28 Vt. 594, 714; 9 Cush. 596.

In England, corporations are the creatures of the crown, and on dissolution their franchises revert to the crown; and they may be re-granted by the crown either to the old, or to the new, or to the old and new, corporators; and such grant restores the old rights, even to sue on a bond given to the old corporation, and the corporation is restored to the full enjoyment of its ancient liberties; and if it were a corporation by prescription it would still be so; 2 Term, 524, 543; 3 id. 241. In the United States, corporations are the creatures of the legislature, and on dissolution their franchises revert to the state; and the legislature can exercise the same powers by legislation over the franchises, and with the same effects, as the crown can in England; Ang. & A. Corp. 652.

By the statute of Anne, c. 20, an information in the nature of quo warranto may by leave of court be applied to disputes between party and party about the right to a corporate office or franchise; 4 Zabr. 529; 1 Dutch. 354; 32 Penn. 478; 33 Miss. 508; 7 Cal. 393, 432. And the person at whose instance the proceeding is instituted is called the relator; 3 Bla. Com. 264. The court will not give leave to private informers to use the king's name and suit to call in question the validity of a franchise, when such persons apply under very unfavorable circumstances; 4 Burr. 2123. As to where the burden falls of showing the lawful or unlawful character of a franchise or right, see 28 Penn. 383; 5 Mich. 146. The information, it is said, may be filed after the expiration of the term of office; 2 Jones, No. C. 124; but see High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 633.

See High, Extr. Leg. Rem.; 30 Am. Dec. 33 and full note Boone, Corp.; Ang. & A. Corp.

QUOAD HOC (Lat. as to this; with respect to this). A term frequently used to signify, as to the thing named, the law is so and so.

QUOD COMPUTET (Lat. that he account). The name of an interlocutory judgment in an action of account-render; also the name of a decree in the case of creditors' bills against executors or administrators. Such a decree directs the master to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors, to cause the creditors, upon due and public notice, to come before him to prove their debts, at a certain place and within a limited period, and also directs the master to take an account of all personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator; Story, Eq. Jur. § 548. See JUDGMENT QUOD COMPUTET; ACCOUNT.

QUOD CUM (Lat.). In Pleading. For that whereas. A form of introducing matter of inducement in those actions in which introductory matter is allowed to explain the nature of the claim: as, assumpsit and case. Hardr. 1; 2 Show. 180.

This form is not allowable to introduce the matter which constitutes the gravamen of the charge, as such matter must be stated by positive averment, while quod cum introduces the matter which depends upon it by way of recital merely. Hence in those actions, as trespass vi et armis, in which the complaint is stated without matter of inducement, quod cum cannot be properly used; 2 Bulstr. 214. But its improper use is cured by verdict; 1 P. A. Browne, 68; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 86).

QUOD EI DEFORCEAT (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ given by stat. Westm. 2, 13 Edw. 1. c. 4, to the owners of a particular estate, as for life, in dower, by the curtesy, or in fee-tail, who are barred of the right of possession by a recovery had against them through their default or non-appearance in a possessory action; by which the right was restored to him who had been thus unwarily deforced by his own default. 3 Bla. Com. 193.

QUOD PERMITTAT (Lat.). In English Law. That he permit. The name of a writ which lies for the heir of him who is disseised of his common of pasture, against the heir of the disseisor, he being dead. Termes de la Ley.

QUOD PERMITTAT PROSTERNERE (Lat. that he give leave to demolish). In English Law. The name of a writ which commands the defendant to permit the plaintiff to abate the nuisance of which complaint is made, or otherwise to appear in court and to show cause why he will not. On proof of the facts, the plaintiff is entitled to have judgment to abate the nuisance and to recover damages. This proceeding, on account of its tediousness and expense, has given way to a special action on the case.

QUOD PROSTRAVIT (Lat.). The name of a judgment upon an indictment for a nuisance, that the defendant abate such nuisance.

QUOD RECUPERET. See JUDGMENT QUOD RECUPERET.

QUORUM. Used substantively, quorum signifies the number of persons belonging to a legislative assembly, a corporation, society, or other body, required to transact business. There is a difference between an act done by a definite number of persons, and one performed by an indefinite number; in the first case a majority is required to constitute a quorum, unless the law expressly directs that another number may make one; in the latter case any number who may be present may act, the majority of those present having, as in other cases, the right to act; 7 Cow. 402; 9 B. & C. 856; 34 Vt. 316; 27 Miss. 517.

Where articles of association did not prescribe the number of directors necessary for a quorum, it was held that the number who usually transacted the business constituted a quorum; L. R. 4 Eq. 233. A single shareholder was held not to constitute a meeting; 2 Q. B. Div. 26. A majority of a board of directors is a quorum, and a majority of such quorum can act; 19 N. J. Eq. 402; so of a board of selectmen of a town; Maine Laws (1880), 225.

Sometimes the law requires a greater number than a bare majority to form a quorum.

In such case no quorum is present until such a number convene.

When an authority is confided to several persons for a private purpose, all must join in the act, unless otherwise authorized; 6 Johns. 38; 17 Abb. Pr. 201; otherwise if the trust is a continuous public duty; 17 Abb. Pr. 201. See AUTHORITY; MAJORITY; PLURALITY; MEETING.

QUOT. In Scotch Law. The twentieth part of the movables, computed without computation of debts, was so called.

Formerly the bishop was entitled, in all confirmations, to the quot of the testament. Erskine, Inst. 3. 9. 11.

QUOTA. That part which each one is to bear of some expense: as, his quota of this debt; that is, his proportion of such debt.

QUOTATION. In Practice. The allegation of some authority or case, or passage of some law, in support of a position which it is desired to establish.

The transcript of a part of a book or writing from a book or paper into another.

If the quotation is fair, and not so extensive as to extract the whole value or the most valuable part of an author, it will not be a violation of the copyright. It is mostly difficult to define what is a fair quotation. When the quotation is unfair, an injunction will lie to restrain the publication. See 17 Ves. 424; 1 Bell, Com. 121.

"That part of a work of one author found in another," observed Lord Ellenborough, "is not of itself piracy, or sufficient to support an action; a man may adopt part of the work of another; he may so make use of another's labors for the promotion of science and the benefit of the public." 1 Camp. 94. See Curtis, Copyr. 242; 3 Myl. & C. 737; 17 Ves. 422; 2 Stor. 100; 2 Beav. 6; ABRIDGMENT; COPYRIGHT.

QUOUSQUE. A Latin adverb, which signifies how long, how far, until.

In old conveyances it is used as a word of limitation; 10 Co. 41.

In practice, it is the name of an execution which is to have force until the defendant shall do a certain thing. Of this kind is the capias ad satisfaciendum, by virtue of which the body of the defendant is taken into execution, and he is imprisoned until he shall satisfy the execution; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3371.

R.

RACHETUM (Fr. racheter, to redeem). In Scotch Law. Ransom: corresponding to Saxon weregild, a pecuniary composition for an offence. Skene; Jacob, Law Dict.

RACK. An engine with which to torture a supposed criminal, in order to extort a confession of his supposed crime and the names of his supposed accomplices.

It is unknown in the United States, but, known by the nickname of the Duke of Exeter's daughter, was in use in England. Barrington, Stat. 366; 12 S. & R. 227.

RACK RENT. In English Law. The full extended value of land left by lease, payable by a tenant for life or years. Wood, Inst. 192.

RADOUR. In French Law. A term including the repairs made to a ship, and a fresh supply of furniture and victuals, munitions, and other provisions required for the voyage. Pardessus, n. 602.

RAILROAD. A road graded and having rails of iron or other material for the wheels of railroad cars to run upon.

Railroads in their present form first began to be extensively constructed after the successful experiments in the use of locomotives in 1829. They had been in use in a rude form as early as 1676. These earlier railroads were of limited extent, built by private persons on their own land or upon the land of others, by special license, called way-leave. In their modern form, railroads are usually owned by a corporation; 2 Col. 673; 18 Penn. 187; which is authorized to exercise some important privileges, such as a right of eminent domain, etc. But a private individual may construct and work a railroad if he can obtain a right of way by purchase; 70 Penn. 210; L. R. 4 H. L. 171; 30 Vt. 182. Within recent years, another class of railroads, namely, those laid in the streets of towns and cities, have become very numerous.

As to a distinction between railroads and railways, see 89 Penn. 210.

The charter of a public railway requires the grant of the supreme legislative authority of the state; 3 Engl. Railw. Cas. 65; 2 Railw. Cas. 177; 3 N. Y. 430. It is usually conferred upon a private corporation, but sometimes upon a public one, where the stock is owned and the company controlled by the state; Redf. Railw. § 17; 1 Ohio St. 657; 21 Conn. 304; 10 Leigh, 454; 4 Wheat. 668; 8 Watts, 316. Such charter, when conferred upon a private company or a natural person, as it may be, is in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions to the contrary, irrevocable, and only subject to general legislative control, the same as other persons natural or artificial; 4 Wheat. 668; 2 Kent, 275; 27 Vt. 140; 11 La. An. 253; 2 Gray, 1; 3 Sneed, 609; 26 Penn. 287; 32 N. H. 215. See infra.

The right of way is generally obtained by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. This can only be done in strict conformity to the charter or grant; 4 Engl. Railw. Cas. 235, 513, 524; 6 Gill, 363. Statute in England; 7 Hare, 264; and in this country, in many cases, the provision of the charter; 25 Vt. 49; enable companies to obtain land by purchase. The company may enter upon lands for the purpose of making preliminary surveys, by legislative permission, without becoming trespassers, and without compensation; 34 Me. 247; 9 Barb. 449; Wright, Ohio, 132; but compensation must be made before the permanent occupation of the lands; see 6 Biss. 168; 27 Ind. 260. See 47 Cal. 528.

A company may not take land for speculation, or to prevent competition; 43 N. Y. 137; or to build a car factory; 34 Vt. 484; or dwelling houses for its employees; id.; but it may take land for turn-outs, depots, engine-houses, etc.; 54 Penn. 103; 49 Mo. 165; repair shops; id. One company may be authorized to condemn the property of another company upon making compensation therefor; 121 Mass. 124; Peirce, Railr. Law, 152; even though the latter company was chartered by the U. S.; 3 Fed. Rep. 106, 702. A company may acquire by condemnation water fronts and land through which public streets run and land for reasonable storehouses. They may thus acquire land by way of a reasonable provision for future needs. The fact that real estate was at the time of condemnation very depressed will be considered in estimating damages; 77 N. Y. 248. If the necessity exist and a reasonable discretion has been exercised, courts will not interfere; id.

The company acquire only a right of way, the fee remaining in the former owner. The company can take nothing from the soil, except for the purpose of construction; 68 N. Y. 1; 38 Iowa, 316; 59 Penn. 290; 50 Mo. 496; 2 Gray, 574; 25 Vt. 151; 2 D. & B. 457; 20 Barb. 644; 34 N. H. 282; 16 Ill. 198; 1 Sumn. 21. But in Vermont the title is ordinarily the fee; 42 Vt. 265; and it has been held that companies may acquire the absolute fee in land by purchase, and sell and convey the same, when no longer needed; 56 N. Y. 526.

The mode of estimating compensation to the land-owners varies in different states. The more general mode is to award such a sum as will fairly compensate the actual loss, i. e. to give a sum of money which being added to the land remaining will make it as valuable as the whole would have been if none of it had been taken; 13 Barb. 171; Redf. Railw. § 71; 9 Hun, 104. Remote and indefinite damages should not be considered; 60 Me. 290; in general all inconveniences caused by embankments, excavations, and obstruction to the free use of buildings, and inconveniences from the sounding of whistles, ringing of bells, rattling of trains, jarring the ground, and from smoke, so far as they severally arose from the use of the strip of land taken, may be considered; Boone, Corp. § 249; see 71 Ill. 361; 79 Penn. 447; 118 Mass. 546; 8 Nev. 165; 50 Cal. 90. The increased danger of fire to buildings may be included in the damages; 55 N. H. 413; s. c. 20 Am. Rep. 220; contra, 33 Penn. 426. And so of the expense of erecting additional fences made necessary; 74 N. C. 220; 1 Bush, 325.

The company may lay their road across a highway, but not without making compensation to the owner of the fee for the additional servitude thus imposed upon the land; 26 N. Y. 526; 75 Ill. 74; 41 Cal. 256; 1 Exch. 723; 21 Mo. 580; 27 Penn. 339; 9 Cush. 1.

The legislature may authorize a railroad to be constructed under, as well as upon, highways; and when so constructed, the rights of the land-owners are determined upon the same principles as if they were built upon the surface; Peirce, Railr. 248; 42 Md. 117. It may also authorize elevated railroads, or railroads built upon structures raised above the highway; Peirce, Railr. 248. See 70 N. Y. 327, 361; 6 Blatch. 487; 43 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 292; 82 N. Y. 95; 25 Alb. L. J. 406. The owner of a house on a street in New York city may recover for any injury received by him by reason of the construction and operation of an elevated railroad on the street in front of his house; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 376. The superstructure, etc. of such a railroad is within the terms "land," "real estate," used in a statute with reference to taxation; 82 N. Y. 459.

The construction of the road must be within the prescribed limits of the charter. The right of deviation secured by the charter or general laws is lost when the road is once located; 1 Myl. & K. 154; 2 Ohio St. 235; 31 N. J. L. 205. See 2 Rich. 434; 1 Cl. & F. 252; 86 Penn. 468, 509; 3 Mo. App. 315; 10 Conn. 157; 2 Swan, 282, 284; 1 Gray, 340. The location can then be changed only by act of legislature; 35 Barb. 373. Distance, having reference either to the length of the line or to deviation, is to be measured in a straight line through a horizontal plane; Redf. Railw. § 106; 9 Q. B. 76; 27 Vt. 766; 36 E. L. & E. 114. But charters must be taken to allow such discretion in the location of the route as is incident to an ordinary practical survey thereof, with reference to the nature of the country; Boone, Corp. § 251; 6 Minn. 150. In crossing highways, public safety undoubtedly requires that it should not be at grade, or, if so, that the crossing should be protected by gates; 20 Law Jour. 428. Such is the common practice in England though not in this country.

Injuries to domestic animals. A railway company is not bound at common law to fence its tracks or erect cattle guards; 44 Ill. 76; 43 Miss. 279; but statutes have been passed in some states requiring them to do so; L. R. 3 Q. B. 549; 81 N. Y. 190. In default of these precautions, if so required, they are liable for injuries to animals, whether due to the negligence of the company's servants or not; 61 N. Y. 353; 50 Mo. 78. In the absence of such statutes the company are not liable for any injury to domestic animals straying upon their track, or while crossing it, in the highway, unless they have been guilty of some neglect in building fences or in the management of their trains; 21 N. H. 363; 29 Me. 307; 6 Penn. 472; 6 Ind. 141; 4 Ohio St. 424; 33 E. L. & E. 193; 25 Vt. 150.

Liability for the acts of contractors, subcontractors, and agents. The company are not liable for the act of the contractor or subcontractor, or their agents, except in doing precisely what is contemplated in the contract; 6 M. & W. 499; 12 Ad. & E. 737; 24 Barb. 355; 3 Gray, 349; Redf. Railw. § 168.

Railroad companies are liable for the acts of their agents and sub-agents within the range of their employment; and it has been the purpose of the courts to give such agents a large discretion, and hold the companies liable for all acts of their agents within the most extensive range of their charter-powers; 14 How. 483; 27 Vt. 110; 7 Cush. 385. But the company are not liable for the wilful acts of their agents, out of the range of their employment, unless directed by the company or subsequently adopted by them; 2 Harr. N. J. 514; 1 Fla. 136. See this subject further discussed in Redf. Railw. § 169, and notes. The company are not liable for injuries to servants through the neglect of their fellow-servants or defects in machinery, unless they were themselves in fault in employing incompetent servants or purchasing imperfect machinery for the road; 3 M. & W. 1; 4 Metc. Mass. 49; 6 Hill, N. Y. 592; 9 N. Y. 175. See MASTER.

Railroad companies are liable for any injury accruing to the person or property of another through any want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of their agents or employees. This occurs from the omission of the requisite signals at road-crossings, and from want of care in other respects in crossing highways; 2 Cush. 539; 10 id. 562. See, also, 28 Vt. 185; 18 Ga. 679; 8 Gray, 45. It is the duty of the company to use on its cars, etc., all the improvements in machinery commonly used; 65 Barb. 92; 76 N. C. 454. The conduct of railway trains is so far matter of science and skill that it is proper to receive the testimony of experts in regard to it; 23 Vt. 394, 395; 17 Ill. 509, 580. Railway companies, like other corporations, cannot be bound by any contract of their agents beyond their charter-power, or, as it is called, ultra vires, although assumed by their express direction or consent; 7 E. L. & E. 505; 16 id. 180; 30 id. 120.

Express business. They are bound, as common carriers, to allow express companies to do business on their roads, and to provide such conveniences, by special cars or otherwise, as are required for the safe and proper transportation of express matter; and they are bound to extend the use of such facilities on equal terms to all who are engaged in the express business. Railroad companies are entitled to fair compensation for such services, which, in case of a disagreement, will be fixed by the courts. A railroad company cannot fix an absolute rate of compensation therefor, and insist upon being paid that rate in advance, or at the end of each trip; 10 Fed. Rep. 210; s. c. 14 Ch. L. N. 201 (U. S. C. C., Miller, C. J.).

Street railways. A street railway company owns the structure laid by it in the highway, and has a superior right to the space covered by its track; Peirce, Railr. 252; see 14 Gray, 69: 76 N. Y. 530; 34 Iowa, 527. The public, on foot or in carriages, may cross its track, and travel on the spaces covered by it, and even incidentally drive ordinary carriages on the rails. But a person driving a carriage on the track should leave it without retarding the cars; 76 N. Y. 530; 69 Ill. 388. Its rails cannot be used by other competing common carriers driving railway or other carriages, without special legislative authority; 72 N. Y. 930; 4 Stew. N. J. 525; 81 Ill. 523. A company may remove snow from its track to another part of the street, but in so doing, it must avoid unnecessary injury to the owners of property; 50 Md. 73. See Peirce, Railr. 252–3.

A street railway company must exercise a high degree of care towards its passengers; 36 N. Y. 135; 62 Ill. 238; cars should come to a full stop to enable passengers to alight; 75 Penn. 83; and it is negligence to start the car before a passenger has stepped off or had time to do so; 61 N. Y. 621. See STREET.

Constitutional questions. These have reference chiefly to the inviolability of charter rights under the United States constitution, and rest mainly upon the doctrines and principles of the Dartmouth College case, 4 Wheat. 518. The provision in the United States constitution referred to is that prohibiting the several states from passing "any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

A corporate charter is regarded as a legislative grant of certain franchises and immunities involving pecuniary value, and, consequently, not revocable, or subject to legislative control in any other sense than as all rights of property are liable to be affected by general legislation; 4 Wheat. 518; 27 Vt. 140; Redfield, Railw. § 231; see POLICE POWERS.

The essential franchise of a private corporation, being private property, cannot be taken for public use without adequate compensation; 15 Vt. 745; 16 id. 476; 27 id. 140; 6 How. 507.

But to be thus inviolable it is essential that the franchises in question shall be such as are indispensable to the existence and just operation of the corporation, or else that they be expressly secured to the corporation in its charter; 11 Pet. 420.

These exclusive grants are to be strictly construed in favor of the corporation, and liberally expounded in favor of public rights and interests; 11 Pet. 420; 13 How. 71; 1 La. An. 253.

It makes no difference in regard to the rights of the corporation that it may have received large grants of land or other property from the state or sovereignty conferring the charter. Unless the stock is owned by the state, or the appointment and control of the principal officers are retained by the state, so as to create it a public corporation, its essential franchises are inviolable to the same extent as other private rights of a pecuniary character, and its functions are equally independent of legislative control as are those of any natural person; 14 Miss. 599; 6 Penn. 86; 13 Ired. 75; 9 Mo. 507; 27 Miss. 517; 13 B. Monr. 1; 4 Barb. 64. See, also, 18 How. 331, 380; Redf. Railw. § 232.

See BONDS; COMMON CARRIERS; ROLLING STOCK; PASSENGERS; PUNCTUALITY; TICKET.

RAIN-WATER. The water which naturally falls from the clouds.

No one has a right to build his house so as to cause the rain-water to fall over his neighbor's land; 1 Rolle, Abr. 107; 1 Stra. 643; Fortesc. 212; Bacon, Abr. Action on the Case (F); 5 Co. 101; unless he has acquired a right by a grant or prescription.

When the land remains in a state of nature, said a learned writer, and by the natural descent the rain-water would descend from the superior estate over the lower, the latter is necessarily subject to receive such water; 1 Lois des Batimens, 15, 16. See 2 Rolle, 140.

RAISE. To create. A use may be raised; i. e. a use may be created. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 449.

RANGE. A word used in the land-laws of the United States to designate the order of the location of public lands. In patents from the United States to individuals for public lands, they are described as being within a certain range.

RANGER. A sworn officer of the forest to inquire of trespasses, and to drive the beasts of the forest out of the deforested ground into the forest. Jacob, Law Dict.

RANK. The order or place in which certain officers are placed in the army and navy, in relation to others.

It is a maxim that officers of an inferior rank are bound to obey all the lawful commands of their superiors, and are justified for such obedience.

Army and navy. In 1868, a retiring board found a colonel incapacitated from the result of wounds received in battle while commanding a division with the brevet rank of major-general. He was thereupon retired by the President, under the act of July 18, 1866, with the full rank of major-general. Subsequently his retired rank was changed by the character of the act of March 3, 1875, to that of brigadier-general. It was held that he was not appointed to the office of major-general; that he still retained on the retired list the office of colonel; that the rank conferred upon him by act of congress was in no sense a constitutional appointment to a new office; and that the same power that gave him his rank could take it away. Rank is often used to express something different from office. It then becomes a designation or title of honor, dignity, or distinction conferred upon an officer in order to fix his relative position in reference to other officers in matter of privilege, precedence, and sometimes of command, or by which to determine his pay and emoluments. This is the case with the staff officers of the army. See R. S. §§ 1122, 1128, 1131, 1168, for instances.

The distinction between rank and office is more clearly apparent with reference to staff officers than to officers of the line, because in the latter case the words used to designate the rank and the office are usually the same, while in the former case they are always different.

In some cases, officers of the line have a rank assigned to them different from the title of their office; see R. S. §§ 1096, 1097. Selections under these sections are usually made from among officers whose rank is raised to a higher degree by the service assigned to them, but the new rank does not confer a new office.

In the army, all officers, except chaplains, are paid according to their rank; in the navy, the pay of staff officers does not depend upon their rank; and there rank only determines matter of precedence, etc., among officers.

Grade is a step or degree in either office or rank. See 15 Ct. Cl. 151, per Richardson, J., from which the above is taken.

RANKING. In Scotch Law. Determining the order in which the debts of a bankrupt ought to be paid.

RANSOM BILL. A contract for payment of ransom of a captured vessel, with stipulations of safe conduct if she pursue a certain course and arrive at a certain time. If found out of time or course, the safe-conduct is void; Wheaton, Int. Law, 107. The payment cannot be enforced in England, during the war, by an action on the contract, but can in this country; 1 Kent, 104, 105; 4 Wash. C. C. 141; 2 Gall. 325.

RAPE (Lat. rapere, to snatch, to seize with violence). In Criminal Law. The carnal knowledge of a woman by a man forcibly and unlawfully against her will.

The statute of Westminster 2, c. 34, defines the crime to be where "a man do ravish a woman, married, maid, or other, where she did not consent neither before nor after." And this statute definition has been adopted in several very recent cases. Addenda to 1 Den. Cr. Cas.; 1 Bell, Cr. Cas. 63, 71.

Much difficulty has arisen in defining the meaning of carnal knowledge, and different opinions have been entertained,—some judges having supposed that penetration alone is sufficient, while others deemed emission an essential ingredient in the crime; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 41, s. 3; 12 Co. 37; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 638; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 810. But in modern times the better opinion seems to be that both penetration and emission are not necessary; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 439; Add. Pa. 143; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 410; 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1127; contra, 14 Ohio, 222; but later cases in that state intimated that if the question were new, the decision would be the other way; 22 Ohio St. 102, 541. See 65 N. C. 466. By statute in England carnal knowledge is completely proved by proof of penetration. It is to be remarked, also, that very slight evidence may be sufficient to induce a jury to believe there was emission; Add. Pa. 143; 2 Const. 351; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 140; 4 Chitty, Bla. Com. 213, note 8. In Scotland, emission is not requisite; 1 Swint. 93. See EMISSION; PENETRATION.

By the term man in this definition is meant a male of the human species, of the age of fourteen years and upwards; for an infant under fourteen years is supposed by law incapable of committing this offence; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 631; 8 C. & P. 738. But this presumption has been held by some authorities not to be conclusive, but capable of removal by proof; 5 Lea, 352. But not only can an infant under fourteen years, if of sufficient mischievous discretion, but even a woman may be guilty as principal in the second degree. And the husband of a woman may be a principal in the second degree of a rape committed upon his wife; as, where he held her while his servant committed the rape; 1 Hargr. St. Tr. 388.

The knowledge of the woman's person must be forcibly and against her will; and if her consent has not been voluntarily and freely given (when she has the power to consent), the offence will be complete, nor will any subsequent acquiescence on her part do away the guilt of the ravisher. A consent obtained from a woman by actual violence, by duress or threats of murder, or by the administration of stupefying drugs, is not such a consent as will shield the offender or turn his crime into adultery or fornication; and if the connection took place when she was in a state of insensibility from liquor, having been made drunk by the prisoner, though the liquor was given only for the purpose of exciting her, it is a rape; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 89; 1 C. & K. 746; 12 Cox, C. C. 311. Having carnal knowledge of a woman by a fraud which induces her to suppose it is her husband, does not amount to a rape; 8 C. & P. 265, 286; 1 C. & K. 415. But there can be no doubt that the party is liable in such case to be indicted for an assault.

It has been decided that if a physician professing to take steps to cure a woman of disease, induces her to submit to sexual intercourse with him, under the impression that it is a necessary portion of her medical treatment, this does not amount to rape. To constitute rape there must be an actual resistance of the will on the part of the woman; 19 L. J. M. C. 174; 1 Den. C. C. 580; 12 Am. Rep. 283, n.; s. c. 25 Mich. 356. Some authorities have held that the woman's resistance is not sufficient to render the crime rape, if finally she consent through fear, duress, or fraud. It must appear that she showed the utmost reluctance and resistance; 50 Wisc. 518; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 856; 59 N. Y. 374. But this is not the general rule, the better opinion being that a consent obtained by fear of personal violence is no consent—and though a man puts no hand on a woman, yet if, by the array of physical force, he so overpowers her mind that she dares not resist, he is guilty of rape; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1125; 36 Am. Rep. 860, n.; s. c. 50 Wisc. 518.

The matrimonial consent of the wife cannot be retracted; and, therefore, her husband cannot be guilty of a rape on her, as his act is not unlawful. But, as already observed, he may be guilty as principal in the second degree.

As a child under ten years of age is incapable in law to give her consent, it follows that the offence may be committed on such a child whether she consent or not. See stat. 18 Eliz. c. 7, s. 4.

It has been questioned whether rape was a felony at common law, or was made one by a statute in the reign of Edward I. The benefit of clergy was first taken away by a statute of Elizabeth. By a statute of Victoria, the offence is no longer punishable with death, but, at most, with transportation for life; previously to that statute, the capital punishment was almost invariably enforced.

See, as to the possibility of committing a rape, and as to the signs which indicate it, 1 Beck, Med. Jur. c. 12; Merlin, Repert. Viol.; Biessy, Manuel Médico-Légal, etc., 149; Parent-Duchatellet, De la Prostitution, etc., c. 3, § 5; 9 C. & P. 752; 2 Pick. 380; 12 S. & R. 69; 7 Conn. 54.

In English Law. A division of a county similar to a hundred, but oftentimes containing in it more hundreds than one.

RAPINE. In Criminal Law. The felonious taking of another man's personal property, openly and by violence, against his will. The civilians define rapine to be the taking with violence the movable property of another, with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it to one's own use. Leç. El. Dr. Rom. § 1071.

RAPPORT A SUCCESSION (Fr.; similar to hotchpot). In Louisiana. The reunion to the mass of the succession of the things given by the deceased ancestor to his heir, in order that the whole may be divided among the co-heirs.

The obligation to make the rapport has a triple foundation. First, it is to be presumed that the deceased intended, in making an advancement, to give only a portion of the inheritance. Second, it establishes the equality of a division, at least, with regard to the children of the same parent, who all have an equal right to the succession. Third, it preserves in families that harmony which is always disturbed by unjust favors to one who has only an equal right. Dalloz, Dict. See ADVANCEMENT; COLLATION; HOCTHPOT.

RASCAL. An opprobrious term, applied to persons of bad character. The law does not presume that a damage has arisen because the defendant has been called a rascal, and therefore no general damages can be recovered for it: if the party has received special damages in consequence of being so called, he can recover a recompense to indemnify him for his loss.

RASURE. The scratching or scraping a writing, so as to prevent some part of it from being read. The word writing here is intended to include printing.

RATE. A public valuation or assessment of every man's estate; or the ascertaining how much tax every one shall pay. See Pow. Mortg.; 1 Hopk. Ch. 37.

RATE OF EXCHANGE. In Commercial Law. The price at which a bill drawn in one country upon another may be sold in the former.

RATIFICATION. An agreement to adopt an act performed by another for us.

Express ratifications are those made in express and direct terms of assent. Implied ratifications are such as the law presumes from the acts of the principal: as, if Peter buy goods for James, and the latter, knowing the fact, receive them and apply them to his own use.

By ratifying a contract a man adopts the agency altogether, as well what is detrimental as what is for his benefit; 2 Stra. 859; 7 East, 164; 16 Mart. La. 105; 1 Ves. 509; Story, Ag. § 250; 9 B. & C. 59.

As a general rule, the principal has the right to elect whether he will adopt the unauthorized act or not. But having once ratified the act, upon a full knowledge of all the material circumstances, the ratification cannot be revoked or recalled, and the principal becomes bound as if he had originally authorized the act; Story, Ag. § 250; 3 Chitty, Com. Law, 197.

Where there has been actual and positive fraud, or the adverse party has acted mala fide, there can be no such thing as a confirmation; 8 W. & S. 36. The ratification of the signing of a bond by an obligor whose signature has been forged, does not render him liable thereon, there being no new consideration; 67 Penn. 391; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 445, n.; 33 Ohio St. 405; s. c. 31 Am. Rep. 546, n. But if a contract be merely against conscience, then if a party, being fully informed of all the circumstances of it and objections to it, voluntarily confirms it, his ratification will stand; 67 Penn. 217; 62 Ill. 483; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 106. A forged note cannot be ratified; L. R. 6 Ex. 49; 92 Penn. 447; but see 4 Allen, 447.

The ratification of a lawful contract has a retrospective effect, and binds the principal from its date, and not only from the time of the ratification, for the ratification is equivalent to an original authority, according to the maxim that omnis ratihabitio mandato æquiparatur; Pothier, Obl. n. 75; 2 Ld. Raym. 930; 5 Burr. 2727; 1 B. & P. 316; 13 Johns. 367; 2 Mass. 106.

Such ratification will, in general, relieve the agent from all responsibility on the contract, when he would otherwise have been liable; 2 Br. & B. 452. See 16 Mass. 461; 8 Wend. 494. See ASSENT; Ayliffe, Pand. *386; 18 Viner, Abr. 156; Story, Ag. § 239.

An infant is not, in general, liable on his contracts; but if, after coming of age, he ratify the contract by an actual or express declaration, he will be bound to perform it, as if it had been made after he attained full age. The ratification must be voluntary, deliberate, and intelligent, and the party must know that without it he would not be bound; 3 Penn. 428; see 12 Conn. 551; 10 Mass. 137; 4 Wend. 403; and now in England must be in writing. But a confirmation or ratification of a contract may be implied from acts of the infant after he becomes of age, as, by enjoying or claiming a benefit under a contract he might have wholly rescinded; 1 Pick. 221; and an infant partner will be liable for the contracts of the firm, or at least such as were known to him, if he, after becoming of age, confirm the contract of partnership by transacting business of the firm, receiving profits, and the like; 2 Hill, So. C. 479; 1 J. B. Moore, 289.

RATIFICATION OF TREATIES. See TREATY.

RATIHABITION. Confirmation; approbation of a contract; ratification.

RATIO (Lat.). A reason; a cause; a reckoning of an account.

RATIONALIBUS DIVISIS, WRIT DE. The name of a writ which lies properly when two men have lands in several towns or hamlets, so that the one is seized of the land in one town or hamlet, and the other of the other town or hamlet by himself, and they do not know the bounds of the town or hamlet, nor of their respective lands. This writ lies by one against the other, and the object of it is to fix the boundaries. Fitzh. Nat. B.

RAVISHED. In Pleading. A technical word necessary in an indictment for rape.

No other word or circumlocution will answer. The defendant should be charged with having "feloniously ravished" the prosecutrix, or woman mentioned in the indictment; Bacon, Abr. Indictment (G 1); Comyns, Dig. Indictment (G 6); Hawk. Pl. Cr. 2, c. 25. s. 26; Cro. Car. 37; Co. Litt. 184, n. p; Co. 2d Inst. 180; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 447. The words "feloniously did ravish and carnally know" imply that the act was done forcibly and against the will of the woman; 12 S. & R. 70. See 3 Chitty, Cr. Law, 812.

RAVISHMENT. In Criminal Law. An unlawful taking of a woman, or of an heir in ward. Rape.

RAVISHMENT OF WARD. In English Law. The marriage of an infant ward without the consent of the guardian. It is punishable by statute Westminster 2, c. 35.

READING. The act of pronouncing aloud, or of acquiring by actual inspection a knowledge of, the contents of a writing or of a printed document.

In order to enable a party to a contract, or a devisor, to know what a paper contains, it must be read, either by the party himself or by some other person to him. When a person signs or executes a paper, it will be presumed that it has been read to him; 14 Penn. 496; 82 id. 203; but this presumption may be rebutted.

In the case of a blind testator, if it can be proved that the will was not read to him, it cannot be sustained; 3 Wash. C. C. 580.

REAL. At Common Law. A term which is applied to land in its most enlarged signification. Real security, therefore, means the security of mortgages or other incumbrances affecting lands; 2 Atk. 806; s. c. 2 Ves. Sen. 547.

In Civil Law. That which relates to a thing, whether it be movable or immovable, lands or goods: thus, a real injury is one which is done to a thing, as a trespass to property, whether it be real or personal in the common-law sense. A real statute is one which relates to a thing, in contradistinction to such as relate to a person.

REAL ACTION. In Practice. IN THE CIVIL LAW. One by which a person seeks to recover his property which is in the possession of another. Dig. 50. 16. 16. It is to be brought against the person who has possession.

AT THE COMMON LAW. One brought for the specific recovery of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. Stephen, Pl. 3.

They are droitural when they are based upon the right of property, and possessory when based upon the right of possession. They are either writs of right; writs of entry upon disseisin (which lie in the per, the per et cui, or the post), intrusion, or alienation; writs ancestral possessory, as mort d'ancestor, aiel, besaiel, cosinage, or nuper obiit. Comyns, Dig. Actions (D 2).

These actions were always local, and were to be brought in the county where the land lay; Bracton, 189, 414. They are now pretty generally laid aside in practice, upon account of the great nicety required in their management, and the inconvenient length of their process,—a much more expeditious method of trying titles being since introduced by other actions, personal and mixed. See Stearns, Booth, Real Act.; Bacon, Abr. Actions; Comyns, Dig. Actions; 3 Bla. Com. 118.

REAL CONTRACT. At Common Law. A contract respecting real property. 3 Rep. 22, a.

In Civil Law. Those contracts which require the interposition of a thing (res) as the subject of them.

Contracts are divided into those which are formed by the mere consent of the parties, and therefore are called consensual, such as sale, hiring, and mandate; and those in which it is necessary that there should be something more than mere consent, such as the loan of money, deposit or pledge, which, from their nature, require the delivery of the thing; whence they are called real. Pothier, Obl. p. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2.

REAL COVENANT. A covenant whereby a man binds himself to pass a real thing, as lands or tenements; as a covenant to levy a fine, etc. Shepp. Touchst. 161; Fitzh. N. B. 145; Co. Litt. 384 b.

A covenant, the obligation of which is so connected with the realty that he who has the latter is either entitled to the benefit of or liable to perform the other. 2 Bla. Com. 304, Coleridge's note; Stearns, Real Act. 134; 4 Kent, 472.

A covenant by which the covenantor binds his heirs. 2 Bla. Com. 304.

Very considerable confusion exists among the authorities in the use of the term real covenants. The definition of Blackstone which determines the character of covenants from the insertion or non-insertion of the word "heir" by the covenantor, is pretty generally rejected. Of the other definitions, that which makes a real covenant an obligation to pass realty is the most ancient. The second definition is that now ordinarily understood when the term "real covenant" is employed. The benefit of such covenants will always run with the land and can be enforced by any vendee, no matter how remote. The burden, however, will not run with the land so as to be capable of enforcement unless there be privity either of contract or estate between the plaintiff and the defendant; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 115. These covenants are of various kinds. Some are used in lieu of the ancient warranty. Of these the most common are covenants of warranty, both general and special, covenants of seisin, that the vendor has a good right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, for freedom from incumbrances, and for further assurance. Wms. R. P. 447. In regard to all these, it may be said that in England the right of action passes to and vests in the party in whose time the substantial breach occurs and who ultimately sustains injury; Rawle, Cov. 324. In the United States, however, the covenants for seisin, for right to convey, and against incumbrances are usually construed to be broken as soon as made and cannot enure to the advantage of subsequent grantees. Covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment are, however, prospective, and no breach occurs until eviction, actual or constructive; id. 313. See COVENANT, and the various titles thereunder.

Other real covenants now in use are as follows: either to preserve the inheritance, as to keep in repair; 9 B. & C. 505; 17 Wend. 148; 1 Dall. 210; 6 Yerg. 512; 6 Vt. 276; 38 E. L. & E. 462; to keep buildings insured, and reinstate them if burned; 5 B. & Ald. 1; 6 Gill & J. 372; to continue the relation of landlord and tenant, as to pay rent; 1 Dougl. 183; 2 Rawle, 159; 1 Wash. C. C. 375; to do suit to the lessor's mill; 5 Co. 18; 1 B. & C. 410; to grind the tenant's corn; 2 Yeates, 74; for the renewal of leases; Moor. 159; or to protect the tenant in his enjoyment of the premises, as to warrant and defend, never to claim or assert title; 7 Me. 97; 3 Metc. 121; to release suit and service; Co. Litt. 384 b; to produce title-deeds in defence of the grantee's title; Dig. tit. xxxii. c. 27, § 99; 10 Law Mag. 353–357; 1 S. & S. 449; to supply water to the premises; 4 B. & Ald. 266; to draw water off from a mill-pond; 19 Pick. 449; not to establish another mill on the same stream; 17 Wend. 136; not to erect buildings on adjacent land; 4 Paige, Ch. 510; to use the land in a specified manner; 13 Sim. 228; generally to create or preserve easements for the benefit of the land granted; 4 E. D. Sm. 122; 1 Bradf. 40. See 2 Greenl. Ev. § 240; 2 Washb. R. P. 648; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 115.

REAL LAW. At Common Law. A popular term used to denote such parts of the system of common law as concern or relate to real property.

In Civil Law. A law which relates to specific property, whether movable or immovable.

If real law in any given case relate to immovable property, it is limited in its operation to the territory within which that property is situate, real estate being, both by the common and continental laws, subject exclusively to the laws of the government within whose territory it is situate; Story, Confl. Laws, 426. See REI SITÆ.

REAL PROPERTY. Land, and generally whatever is erected or growing upon or affixed to land, also rights issuing out of, annexed to, and exercisable within or about the same. Such property has the quality of passing on the death of the owner to the heir and not the executor. It may either be corporeal or incorporeal.

In respect to property, real and personal correspond very nearly with immovables and movables of the civil law. By the latter "biens" is a general term for property; and these are classified into movable and immovable, and the latter are subdivided into corporeal and incorporeal. Guyot, Repert. Biens.

By immovables the civil law intended property which could not be removed at all, or not without destroying the same, together with such movables as are fixed to the freehold, or have been so fixed and are intended to be again united with it, although at the time severed therefrom. Taylor, Civ. Law, 475.

Real property includes also some things not strictly land or rights exercised or engaged in reference thereto, such are offices and dignities, which are so classed because in ancient times such titles were annexed to the ownership of various lands; Wms. R. P. 8. Corodies and annuities are also sometimes classed as real property. Shares of stock in railway and canal companies are in England real property unless made personalty by act of parliament. In the United States the better opinion is that they are personalty independent of statutory enactment; Ang. & A. Corp. § 557; 2 Kent, 340 n. Some interests in lands are regarded as personal property, and are governed by the rules relating thereto—such are terms of years of lands. Such interests are known as chattels real; 2 Bla. Com. 386.

Though the term real, as applied to property, in distinction from personal, is now so familiar, it is one of a somewhat recent introduction. While the feudal law prevailed, the terms in use in its stead were lands, tenements, or hereditaments. These acquired the epithet of real from the nature of the remedy applied by law for the recovery of them, as distinguished from that provided in case of injuries, contracts broken, and the like. In the one case the claimant or demandant recovered the real thing sued for,—the land itself,—while, ordinarily, in the other he could only recover recompense in the form of pecuniary damages.

The term, it is said, as a means of designation, did not come into general use until after the feudal system had lost its hold, nor till even as late as the commencement of the seventeenth century. One of the earliest cases in which the courts applied the distinctive terms of real and personal to estates, without any words of explanation, is said to have been that of Wind ex. Jekyl, 1 P. Wms. 575; Wms. R. P. 6, 7, note c.

Corporeal hereditaments comprise land and whatever is erected or growing upon or affixed thereto, including whatever is beneath or above the surface, "usque ad orcum" as well as "usque ad cœlum;" 2 Bla. Com. 17–19; Co. Litt. 4 a. Houses, trees, growing crops, and other articles fixed to the soil, though usually classed as realty, may under certain circumstances and for certain purposes acquire the character of personalty. Thus if one erect a building on the land of another with the latter's consent, it is the personal estate of the builder and may be levied on by his creditors as such; 6 N. H. 555; 6 Me. 452; 8 Pick. 402. So if a nurseryman plant trees upon land leased for the purpose of growing them for the market, the trees are deemed personalty; 1 Metc. 27; 4 Taunt. 316. So where the owner of land sells growing trees (not on a nursery) to be cut by the vendee, they will be deemed to pass as personalty where the contract gives no right to the vendee to allow them to remain upon the land; 4 Metc. Mass. 580; 9 B. & C. 561. But where there is an understanding, express or implied, that the trees may remain upon the land and be cut at the pleasure of the vendee, then the property in the trees is deemed real; 4 Mass. 266; 7 N. H. 522. So crops, while growing, planted by the owner of the land, are a part of the real estate; but if sold by him when fit for harvesting, they become personalty; 5 B. & C. 829; and a sale of such crops, though not fit for harvest, has been held good as personalty; 4 M. & W. 343; 2 Dana, 206; 2 Rawle, 161. See EMBLEMENTS.

There are a large number of articles known as fixtures, which, though originally wholly movable and personal in their nature, have acquired, by having been affixed to real estate or applied to use in connection with it, the character of realty. Such articles pass from the vendor to the vendee of the land as realty; 2 Kent, 345; 2 Sm. L. C. 228; 20 Wend. 636; even though they may be at the time temporarily disconnected. Such are keys to locks fastened upon doors, mill stones and irons, though taken out of the mill for repairing, and window blinds, though temporarily removed from the house; 11 Co. 50; 2 W. & S. 116; 41 N. H. 505; 36 Barb. 483; 11 Iowa, 535. And the same rule applies between mortgagor and mortgagee; 19 Barb. 317; 4 Metc. Mass. 306; 3 Edw. Ch. 246; 3 Fost. 46. The same is the rule as between heir and executor upon the death of the ancestor, and between debtor and creditor upon a levy made by the latter upon the land of the former; 10 Paige, Ch. 158; 7 Mass. 432; 30 Penn. 185. But many such fixtures as between landlord and tenant are personalty, and may be removed by the latter as such, unless left by him attached to the realty at the close of his term, in which case they become a part of the realty; Smith, Land. & T. 264; 2 Pet. 137; 4 Gray, 256; 16 Vt. 124. And the tenant is particularly favored in cases of trade fixtures; 1 Salk. 368; 4 Tyrwh. 121; 20 John. 29; 7 Cow. 319.

Manure made upon a farm in the usual manner by consumption of its products would be a part of the real estate; while if made from products purchased and brought on to the land by the tenant, as in case of a livery-stable, it would be personal; 21 Pick. 367; 3 N. H. 503; 6 Me. 222; 2 N. Chipm. 115; 11 Conn. 525; 15 Wend. 169; 30 N. H. 558. See MANURE; FIXTURES.

Equity will, in many instances, for the sake of enforcing and preserving the rights of parties interested, regard realty as converted into personalty and personalty as converted into realty, although no such change may actually have taken place. So where realty is devised by a testator to his executors with imperative directions to sell, the devolution of the property, even before actual conversion, will be controlled by the rules relating to personalty; 1 Bro. C. C. 497; 3 Wheat. 563; 72 Penn. 417. So where money is directed to be laid out in lands, it will be deemed realty for purposes of descent even before the purchase; 1 Bro. C. C. 503. But such direction must be imperative, otherwise no such result ensues; 3 Atk. 255; L. R. 7 Eq. 226; 10 Penn. 131. So realty owned by a partnership will be deemed personalty for the purposes of the partnership; 3 Kent, 39; 81 Penn. 377; 1 Black, 346; 7 Conn. 11. See PARTNERSHIP; CONVERSION; INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

REAL RIGHT. In Scotch Law. That which entitles him who is vested with it to possess the subject as his own, and, if in the possession of another, to demand from him its actual possession.

It is distinguished from a personal right, which is that of action against a debtor, but without any right in the subject which the debtor is obliged to transfer to him. Real rights affect the subject itself; personal are founded in obligation. Erskine, Int. 479.

By analogy, the right which a claimant in an action of replevin seeks to enforce at common law would be a real one, while the compensation which a plaintiff seeks in an action of assumpsit or of trover, being a pecuniary one, would be personal.

REALM. A kingdom; a country. 1 Taunt. 270; 4 Camp. 289; Rose, 387.

REALTY. A term sometimes used as a collective noun for real property or estate—more generally to imply that that of which it is spoken is of the nature or character of real property or estate.

REASON. That power by which we distinguish truth from falsehood and right from wrong, and by which we are enabled to combine means for the attainment of particular ends. Encyclopédie; Shelf. Lun. Introd. xxvi. Ratio in jure æquitas integra.

A man deprived of reason is not, in many cases, criminally responsible for his acts, nor can he enter into any contract.

Reason is called the soul of the law; for when the reason ceases the law itself ceases. Co. Litt. 97, 183; 1 Bla. Com. 70; 7 Toullier, n. 566; MAXIMS, Cessante ratione, etc.

REASONABLE. Conformable or agreeable to reason; just; rational.

An award must be reasonable; for if it be of things nugatory in themselves, and offering no advantage to either of the parties, it cannot be enforced; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2096. See AWARD.

REASONABLE ACT. This term signifies such an act as the law requires. When an act is unnecessary, a party will not be required to perform it as a reasonable act; 9 Price, 43; Yelv. 44; Platt, Cov. 342, 157.

REASONABLE DOUBT. See DOUBT; 2 Green, Cr. Cas. 434; 10 Am. L. Rev. 642; 14 Cent. L. J. 446; 47 Ala. 78.

REASONABLE TIME. The English law, which in this respect has been adopted by us, frequently requires things to be done within a reasonable time; but what a reasonable time is, it does not define: quam longum debet esse rationabile tempus, non definitur in lege, sed pendet ex discretione justiciariorum; Co. Litt. 50.

The question of reasonable time is left to be fixed by circumstances and the usages of business. A bill of exchange must be presented within a reasonable time; Chitty, Bills, 197–202. An abandonment must be made within a reasonable time after advice received of the loss; Marsh. Ins. 589.

The commercial code of France fixes a time in both these cases, which varies in proportion to the distance. See Code de Com. l. 1, t. 8, s. 1, § 10, art. 160; id. l. 5, t. 10, s. 3, art. 373. See NOTICE OF DISHONOR; PROTEST.

Where the facts are admitted or clearly proved, what is a reasonable time is a question of law for the court; in cases where the facts are controverted or doubtful, it is for the jury to determine the facts, and the court to apply the law in determining the question; Wells, Law & Fact, 135.

REASSURANCE. When an insurer is desirous of lessening his liability, he may procure some other insurer to insure him from loss for the insurance he has made: this is called reassurance.

REBATE. In Mercantile Law. Discount; the abatement of interest in consequence of prompt payment.

REBEL. A citizen or subject who unjustly and unlawfully takes up arms against the constituted authorities of the nation, to deprive them of the supreme power, either by resisting their lawful and constitutional orders in some particular matter, or to impose on them conditions. Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, § 328. In another sense, it signifies a refusal to obey a superior or the commands of a court.

REBELLION. In Criminal Law. The taking up arms traitorously against the government. The forcible opposition and resistance to the laws and process lawfully issued.

If the rebellion amount to treason, it is punished by the laws of the United States with death. If it be a mere resistance of process, it is generally punished by fine and imprisonment. See Dalloz, Dict.; Code Penal, 209.

When a rebellion has broken out in any state, the rebel cruisers may be treated as pirates by the established government, if the rebel government has not been recognized as belligerent by the parent state, or by foreign nations; but the right ceases to exist on the recognition of the rebels as belligerents; 2 Black, 273; 11 Wall. 268; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law, 169.

REBELLION, COMMISSION OF. In Old English Practice. A writ issuing out of chancery to compel the defendant to appear.

REBOUTER. To repel or bar. The action of the heir by the warranty of his ancestor is called to rebut or repel.

REBUT. To contradict: to do away. Thus, every homicide is presumed to be murder, unless the contrary appears from evidence which proves the death; and this presumption it lies on the defendant to rebut, by showing that it was justifiable or excusable. Alison, Sc. Law, 48.

REBUTTER. In Pleading. The name of the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's surrejoinder. It is governed by the same rules as the rejoinder. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (K). See PLEADINGS.

REBUTTING EVIDENCE. That evidence which is given by a party in the cause to explain, repel, counteract, or disprove facts given in evidence on the other side. The term rebutting evidence is more particularly applied to that evidence given by the plaintiff to explain or repel the evidence given by the defendant.

It is a general rule that any thing may be giving as rebutting evidence which is a direct reply to that produced on the other side; 2 M'Cord, 161; and the proof of circumstances may be offered to rebut the most positive testimony; 1 Pet. C. C. 235.

But there are several rules which exclude all rebutting evidence. A party cannot impeach his own witness, though he may disprove, by other witnesses, matters to which he has testified; 3 Litt. 465; nor can he rebut or contradict what a witness has sworn to which is immaterial to the issue; 16 Pick. 153; 2 Bail. 118.

Parties and privies are estopped from contradicting a written instrument by parol proof; but this rule does not apply to strangers; 10 Johns. 229. But the parties may prove that before breach the agreement was abandoned, or annulled by a subsequent agreement not in writing; 4 N. H. 196. And when the writing was made by another, as where the log-book stated a desertion, the party affected by it may prove that the entry was false or made by mistake; 4 Mas. 541. See ESTOPPEL.

RECALL. In International Law. To deprive a minister of his functions; to supersede him.

RECALL A JUDGMENT. To reverse a judgment on a matter of fact. The judgment is then said to be recalled or revoked; and when it is reversed for an error of law it is said simply to be reversed, quod judicium reversetur.

RECAPTION. The act of a person who has been deprived of the custody of another, to which he is legally entitled, by which he regains the peaceable custody of such person; or of the owner of personal or real property who has been deprived of his possession, by which he retakes possession peaceably.

In each of these cases the law allows the recaption of the person or of the property, provided he can do so without occasioning a breach of the peace or an injury to a third person who has not been a party to the wrong. Co. 3d Inst. 134; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; 3 Bla. Com. 5.

The right of recaption of a person is confined to a husband, in retaking his wife; a parent, his child, of whom he has the custody; a master, his apprentice; and, according to Blackstone, a master, his servant,—but this must be limited to a servant who assents to the recaption: in these cases, the party injured may peaceably enter the house of the wrong-doer, without a demand being first made, the outer door being open, and take and carry away the person wrongfully detained. He may also enter peaceably into the house of a person harboring, who was not concerned in the original abduction; 8 Bingh. 186.

The same principles extend to the right of recaption of personal property. In this sort of recaption too much care cannot be observed to avoid any personal injury or breach of the peace.

In the recaption of real estate, the owner may, in the absence of the occupier, break open the outer-door of a house and take possession: but if in regaining his possession the party be guilty of a forcible entry and breach of the peace, he may be indicted; but the wrong-doer, or person who had no right to the possession, cannot sustain any action for such forcible regaining possession merely; 1 Chitty, Pr. 546.

RECAPTURE. The recovery from the enemy, by a friendly force, of a prize by him captured.

It seems incumbent on fellow-citizens, and it is of course equally the duty of allies, to rescue each other from the enemy when there is a reasonable prospect of success; 3 C. Rob. 224.

By the British law, vessels belonging to British subjects recaptured, are restored to their owners on payment of a fixed rate of salvage, unless they shall appear to have been sent forth by the enemy as vessels of war. In the United States, vessels are restored to their former owners, upon payment of salvage, unless they have been condemned as a prize by competent authority. By the French law, if a French vessel be retaken from the enemy after being in his hands more than twenty-four hours, it is a good prize to the recaptor. But if retaken by a public ship after twenty-four hours, it is restored to the owner on payment of salvage; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law, 443.

RECEIPT (Lat. receptum, received: through Fr. receit). A written acknowledgment of payment of money or delivery of chattels.

It is executed by the person to whom the delivery or payment is made, and may be used as evidence against him, on the general principle which allows the admission or declaration of a party to be given in evidence against himself. As an instrument of evidence, the receipt of one person is, in general, inoperative against another, although often useful as a voucher in the private settlement of accounts; and the statutes of some states make receipts for small payments made by executors, etc. evidence of the payment on a settlement of their accounts. And receipts of public officers are sometimes admissible per se; 1 Ill. 45. It is essential to a receipt that it acknowledge the payment or delivery referred to; Russ. & R. 227; 7 C. & P. 549. And under the stamp laws a delivery or payment must be stated; 1 Camp. 499. Also the receipt must, from the nature of the case, be in writing, and must be delivered to the debtor; for a memorandum of payment made by the creditor in his own books is no receipt; 2 B. & Ald. 501, n.; 1 Spears, 53.

Receipts, effect of. The mere acknowledgment of payment made is not treated in law as binding or conclusive in any high degree. So far as a simple acknowledgment of payment or delivery is concerned, it is presumptive evidence only; 1 Pet. C. C. 182; 1 Rich. 32; 1 Harr. Del. 5; 16 Wend. 460; 16 Me. 475; 5 Ark. 61; 11 Mass. 27, 363; 3 McLean, 265; 6 B. Monr. 199; 1 Perr. & D. 437; 8 Gill, 179; 3 Jones, No. C. 501; and is, in general, open to explanation; 2 Johns. 378; 8 Ala. N. s. 59; 4 Vt. 308; 3 McLean, 387; 4 Barb. 265; 5 J. J. Marsh. 79; 5 Mich. 171; being an exception to the general rule that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict or vary a written instrument; 5 Johns. 68; 2 Metc. Mass. 283. Thus, a party may always show, in explanation of a receipt limited to such acknowledgment, the actual circumstances under which it was made; 8 Johns. 389; e.g. that it was obtained by fraud; Wright, Ohio, 764; 4 H. & M'H. 219; or given under a mistake; 6 Barb. 58; 3 Dana, 427; or that, in point of fact, no money was actually paid as stated in it; 2 Strobh. 390; 3 N. Y. 168; 10 Vt. 96. But see 1 J. J. Marsh. 583. A receipt is an admission only; 3 B. & Ad. 318; it is but prima facie evidence against the creditor, and may be explained, unless executed with the formalities of a deed; Leake, Contr. 901; in law as well as equity; L. R. 6 Ch. 534.

Receipts "in full." When, however, we find a receipt acknowledging payment "in full" of a specified debt, or "in full of all accounts" or of "all demands," the instrument is of a much higher and more conclusive character. It does not, indeed, like a release, operate upon the demand itself, extinguishing it by any force or virtue in the receipt, but it is evidence of a compromise and mutual settlement of the rights of the parties. The law infers from such acknowledgment an adjustment of the amount due, after consideration of the claims of each party, and a payment of the specified sum as a final satisfaction; 10 Vt. 491; 2 Dev. 247; Wright, Ohio, 764; 21 N. H. 85. This compromise thus shown by the receipt will often operate to extinguish a demand, although the creditor may be able to show he did not receive all that he justly ought. See ACCORD AND SATISFACTION. If the rights of a party are doubtful, are honestly contested, and time is given to allow him to satisfy himself, a receipt in full, though given for less than his just rights, will not be set aside. Thus, in general, a receipt in full is conclusive when given with a knowledge of the circumstances, and when the party giving it cannot complain of any misapprehension as to the compromise he was making, or of any fraud; 5 Vt. 520; 1 Camp. 392; 2 Strobh. 203. But receipts of this character are not wholly exempt from explanation: fraud or misrepresentation may be proved, and so may such mistake as enters into and vitiates the compromise of the demand admitted; Brayt. 75; 1 Camp. 394; Coxe, N. J. 48; 2 Brev. 223; 4 H. & M'H. 219; 4 Barb. 265; 2 Harr. Del. 392; 2 C. & P. 44. The evidence in explanation must be clear and full, and addressed to the point that there was not in fact an intended and valid compromise of the demand. For if the compromise was not binding, the receipt in full will not aid it. The receipt only operates as evidencce of a compromise which extinguished the claim; 26 Me. 88; 4 Denio, 166; 2 M'Cord, 320; 4 Wash. C. C. 562.

Receipts in deeds. The effect to be given to a receipt for the consideration-money, so frequently inserted in a deed of real property, has been the subject of numerous and conflicting adjudications. The general principle settled by weight of authority is that for the purpose of sustaining the conveyance as against the vendor and his privies the receipt is conclusive: they are estopped to deny that a consideration was paid sufficient to sustain the conveyance; 1 Binn. 502; 26 Mo. 56; 4 Hill, N. Y. 643. But in a subsequent action for the purchase-money or upon any collateral demand, e.g. in an action to recover a debt which was in fact paid by the conveyance, or in an action for damages for breach of a covenant in the deed, and the like, the grantor may show that the consideration was not in fact paid—that an additional consideration to that mentioned was agreed for, etc.; 16 Wend. 460; 10 Vt. 96; 4 N. H. 229, 397; 1 M'Cord. 514; 7 Pick. 533; 1 Rand. 219; 4 Dev. 355; 6 Me. 364; 5 B. & Ald. 606; 5 Ala. 224; 2 Harr. Del. 354; 13 Miss. 238; 5 Conn. 113; 1 Harr. & G. 139; 2 Humphr. 584; 1 J. J. Marsh. 387; 3 Ind. 212; 15 Ill. 230; 1 Stockt. Ch. 492. But there are many contrary cases. See 1 Me. 2; 7 Johns. 341; 3 M'Cord, 552; 1 Harr. & J. 252; 1 Hawks, 64; 4 Hen. & M. 113; 2 Ohio, 182; 1 B. & C. 704. And when the deed is attacked for fraud, or is impeached by creditors as voluntary and therefore void, or when the object is to show the conveyance illegal, the receipt may be explained or contradicted; 3 Zabr. 465; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 461; 21 Penn. 480; 20 Pick. 247; 12 N. H. 248. See Assumpsit Deed; Recital.

With this exception of receipts inserted in a sealed instrument having some other purpose, to which the receipt is collateral, a receipt under seal works an absolute estoppel, on the same principles and to the same general extent as other specialties; Ware, 496; 4 Hawks, 22. Thus, where an assignment of seamen's wages bore a sealed receipt for the consideration-money, even though the attesting witness testified that no money was paid at the execution of the papers, and defendant offered no evidence of any payment ever having been made, and refused to produce his account with the plaintiff (the assignor), on the trial, it was held that the receipt was conclusive; 2 Taunt. 141. See Seal; Specialty.

Receipt embodying contract. A receipt may embody a contract; and in this case it is not open to the explanation or contradiction permitted in the case of a simple receipt; 4 Gray, 186. The fact that it embodies an agreement brings it within the rule that all matters resting in parol are merged in the writing. See Evidence. Thus, a receipt which contains a clause amounting to an agreement as to the application to be made of the money paid—as when it is advanced on account of future transactions—is not open to parol evidence inconsistent with it; 5 Ind. 109; 14 Wend. 116; 12 Pick. 40, 562; 15 id. 437. A bill of parcels with prices affixed, rendered by a seller of goods to a purchaser, with a receipt of payment executed at the foot, was held in one case to amount to a contract of sale of the goods, and therefore not open to parol explanation; while in another case a similar bill was held merely a receipt, the bill at the head being deemed only a memorandum to show to what the receipt applied; 3 Cra. 311; 1 Bibb, 271. A bill of lading, which usually contains words of receipt stating the character, quantity, and condition of the goods as delivered to the carrier, is the subject of a somewhat peculiar rule. It is held that so far as the receipt is concerned it may be explained by parol; 6 Mass. 422; 7 id. 297; 3 N. Y. 321; 10 id. 529; 1 Abb. Adm. 209, 397. But see 1 Bail. 174.

But as respects the agreement to carry and deliver, the bill is a contract, to be construed, like all other contracts, according to the legal import of its terms, and cannot be varied by parol; 25 Barb. 16; 3 Sandf. 7. In this connection may also be mentioned the receipt customarily given in the New England states, more particularly for goods on which an attachment has been levied. The officer taking the goods often, instead of retaining them in his own manual control, delivers them to some third person, termed the "receiptor," who gives his receipt for them, undertaking to redeliver upon demand. This receipt has in some respects a peculiar force. The receiptor having acknowledged that the goods have been attached cannot afterwards object that no attachment was actually made, or that it was insufficient or illegal; 11 Mass. 219, 317; 24 Pick. 196. Nor can he deny that the property was that of the debtor, except in mitigation of damages or after re-delivery; 12 Pick. 562; 13 id. 139; 15 id. 40. And, in the absence of fraud, the value of the chattels stated in the receipt is conclusive upon the receiptor; 12 Pick. 362.

Where the payment is made in some particular currency or medium, as doubtful bank-bills, a promissory note of another person, etc., clauses are often inserted in the receipts specifying the condition in which such mode of payment is accepted. The rule of law in most of our states is that negotiable paper given in payment is presumed to have been accepted on the condition that it shall not work a discharge of the demand unless the paper shall ultimately produce satisfaction; and if an intent to accept it absolutely does not affirmatively appear, the creditor is entitled, in case the paper turned out to him is dishonored, to return it and claim to be paid anew. See PAYMENT. If the receipt is silent on that subject, it is open to explanation, and the creditor may rebut it by proof that the payment admitted was in fact made by a note, bill, check, bank-notes afterwards ascertained to be counterfeit, or notes of a bank in fact insolvent though not known to be so to the parties, etc.; 1 Wash. C. C. 338; 1 W. & S. 521; 2 Johns. Cas. 438; 13 Wend. 101; 3 McLean, 265; 5 J. J. Marsh. 78. But see 3 Caines, Cas. 14; 1 Munf. 460; 1 Metc. Mass. 156. But if the agreement of the parties is specified in the receipt, the clause which contains it will bind the parties, as being in the nature of a contract; 4 Vt. 555; 1 Rich. 111; 16 Johns. 277; 23 Wend. 345; 2 Gill & J. 493; 3 B. Monr. 353. A receipt for a note taken in payment of an account will not, in general, constitute a defence to an action on the account, unless it appears by proof that the creditor agreed to receive the note as payment and take the risk of its being paid; 10 Md. 27.

Receipts, uses of. A receipt is often useful as evidence of facts collateral to those stated in it. It proves the payment; and whatever inference may be legally drawn from the fact of the payment described will be supported by the receipt. Thus, receipts for rent for a given term have been held prima facie evidence of the payment of all rent previously accrued; 15 Johns. 479; 1 Pick. 332. And they have been admitted on trial of a writ of right, as showing acts of ownership on the part of him who gave them; 7 C. B. 21. A receipt given by A to B for the price of a horse, afterwards levied on as property of A, but claimed by B, has been admitted as evidence of ownership against the attaching creditor; 2 Harr. N. J. 78. A receipt "in full of all accounts," the amount being less than that called for by the accounts of the party giving it, was held in his favor evidence of a mutual settlement of accounts on both sides, and of payment of the balance ascertained to be due after setting off one account against the other; 9 Wend. 332. A receipt given by an attorney for securities he was to collect and account for has been held presumptive evidence of the genuineness and justness of the securities; 14 Ala. 500. And when a general receipt is given by an attorney for an evidence of debt then due, it will be presumed he received it in his capacity as attorney for collection; and it is incumbent on him to show he received it for some other purpose, if he would avoid an action for neglect in not collecting; 3 Johns. N. Y. 185.

Receipts, larceny and forgery of. A receipt may be the subject of larceny; 2 Abb. Pr. 211; or of forgery; Russ. & R. 227; 7 C. & P. 459. And it is a sufficient "uttering" of a forged receipt to place it in the hands of a person for inspection with intent fraudulently to induce him to make an advance on the faith that the payment mentioned in the spurious receipt has been made; 14 E. L. & Eq. 556. See FORGERY.

RECEIPTOR. In Practice. A name given to the person who, on a trustee process being issued and goods attached, becomes surety to the sheriff to have them forthcoming on demand, or in time to respond to the judgment, when the execution shall be issued; upon which the goods are bailed to him. Story, Bailm. § 124. The term is used in New York and New Hampshire; 11 N. H. 557; and Maine; 14 Me. 414. See ATTACHMENT; RECEIPT.

As to whether a receiptor is estopped to show property in himself, see 31 Am. Dec. 62; s. c. 14 Me. 414; 25 Am. Dec. 426, n.; 116 Mass. 454; 28 Am. Dec. 695; 24 Am. Dec. 108. He may defend by showing that the property has been taken from him; 11 N. H. 570.

RECEIVER. In Practice. One who receives money to the use of another to render an account. Story, Eq. Jur. § 446. Receivers were at common law liable to the action of account-render for failure in the latter portion of their duties.

In equity. A person appointed by a court possessing chancery jurisdiction, to receive the rents and profits of land, or the profits or produce of other property in dispute.

A receiver is an indifferent person between the parties appointed by the court to collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits of land, or the produce of personal estate, or other things which it does not seem reasonable to the court that either party should do; or where a party is incompetent to do so, as in the case of an infant. The remedy of the appointment of a receiver is one of the very oldest in the court of chancery, and is founded on the inadequacy of the remedy to be obtained in the court of ordinary jurisdiction; Bisph. Eq. 606.

He is a ministerial officer of the court itself; 1 Ball & B. 74; 2 S. & S. 98; 1 Cox, Ch. 422; 9 Ves. 335; 11 Ga. 413; with no powers but those conferred by his order of appointment and the practice of the court; 6 Barb. 589; 2 Paige, Ch. 452; which do not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the court which appoints him; 17 How. 322; appointed on behalf of all parties who may establish rights in the cause; 1 Hog. 234; 3 Atk. 564; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 278; 4 Madd. 80; 4 Sandf. Ch. 417; and after his appointment neither the owner nor any other party can exercise any acts of ownership over the property; 2 S. & S. 96. Neither party is responsible for his acts; 2 Wall. 519. His custody is that of the court, and leaves the right of the parties concerned to be controlled by the ultimate decree of the court; 10 Bank. Reg. 517.

A receiver is appointed only in those cases where in the exercise of a sound discretion it appears necessary that some indifferent person should have charge of the property; 1 Johns. Ch. 57; 25 Alb. N. S. 81; only during the pendency of a suit; 1 Atk. 578; 2 Du. N. Y. 632; except in extreme cases; 2 Atk. 315; 2 Dick. Ch. 580; as when a fund in litigation is in peril; 2 Blatch. 78; and ex parte; 14 Beav. 423; 8 Paige, Ch. 373; or before answer; 13 Ves. 266; 4 Price, 346; 4 Paige, Ch. 574; 2 Swanst. 146; in special cases only; and, generally, not till all the parties are before the court; 2 Russ. Ch. 145; 1 Hog. Ir. 93. The action of the court in the appointment of a receiver is not reviewable on appeal; 1 Bond, 422; 1 Biss. 198.

One will not be appointed, except under special circumstances making a strong case, where a party is already in possession of the property under a legal title; 19 Ves. 59; 1 Ambl. 311; 2 Y. & C. 351; as a trustee; 2 Bro. C. C. 158; 1 V. & B. 183; 1 My. & C. 163; 16 Ga. 406; 2 J. & W. 294; an executor; 13 Ves. 266; tenant in common; 2 Dick. Ch. 800; 4 Bro. C. C. 414; 2 S. & S. 142; a mortgagee; 4 Abb. Pr. 235; 13 Ves. 377; 1 J. & W. 176, 627; 1 Hog. Ir. 179; or a mortgagor when the debt is not wholly due; 5 Paige, Ch. 38; a director of a corporation in a suit by a stockholder; 2 Halst. Ch. 374; where the property is or should be already in the possession of some court, as during the contestation of a will in the proper court; 2 Atk. 378; 6 Ves. 172; 2 V. & B. 85, 95; 7 Sim. 512; 1 My. & C. 97; but see 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 278; when admiralty is the proper forum; 5 Barb. 209; or where there is already a receiver; 1 Hog. Ir. 199; 10 Paige, Ch. 43; 1 Ired. Eq. 210; 11 id. 607; nor, on somewhat similar grounds, where salaries of public officers are in question; 1 Swanst. 1; 2 Sim. 560; 10 Beav. 602; 2 Paige, Ch. 333; or where a public office is in litigation; 9 Paige, Ch. 507; where the equitable title of the party asking a receiver is incomplete as made out, as where he has delayed asking for one; 1 Hog. Ir. 118; 1 Donn. Min. Cas. 71; or where the necessity is not very apparent, as on account merely of the poverty of an executor; 12 Ves. 4; 1 Madd. 142; 18 Beav. 161; see 4 Price, 346; pending the removal of a trustee; 16 Ga. 406; where a trustee mixes trust-money with his own; 1 Hopk. Ch. 429.

Generally any stranger to the suit may be appointed receiver. The court will not appoint attorneys and solicitors in the cause; 1 Hog. Ir. 322; masters in chancery; 6 Ves. 427; an officer of the corporation; 1 Paige, Ch. 517; though it is sometimes done; a mortgagee; 2 Term, 238; 9 Ves. 271; a trustee; 3 Ves. 516; 8 id. 72; see 3 Mer. 695; a party in the cause; 2 J. & W. 255.

One who has a legal cause of action sounding merely in tort against a receiver appointed by a court of chancery has a right to pursue his redress by an action at law. Such action cannot be brought without the chancellor's permission, but this cannot be refused, unless the claim preferred be manifestly unfounded; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 553; 16 Wall. 218. See 25 Alb. L. J. 46.

He has no power without the previous direction of the court to incur any expenses, except those absolutely necessary for the preservation and use of the property; 93 U. S. 352.

He is responsible for good faith and reasonable diligence. When the property is lost or injured by any negligence or dishonest execution of the trust, he is liable in damages; but he is not as of course responsible because there has been an embezzlement or theft. He is bound to such ordinary diligence as belongs to a prudent and honest discharge of his duties, and such as is required of all persons who receive compensation for their services; Story, Bailm. §§ 620, 621; see 80 N. Y. 458; but he is not the agent of an insolvent railroad company, and hence the company is not liable for damages occasioned by his negligence in operating the road; 58 N. Y. 61; nor is he personally liable; 63 N. Y. 281; but he is liable for loss as a carrier of goods; 38 Vt. 402; 99 Mass. 395. It is held that where an injury results from the fault or misconduct of a receiver appointed by a court of equity, the court may in its discretion either take cognizance of the question of the receiver's liability, and determine it, or permit the aggrieved party to sue at law; 11 C. E. Green, 474; 4 Hun, 373; 14 Cent. L. J. 347; 12 Am. Law Rev. 660. See, generally, Edwards, Kerr, Receivers.

A receiver cannot sue outside of the jurisdiction which appointed him; 17 How. 322; but see, contra, 48 Conn. 401; 8 Baxt. 580; art. in 6 Cent. L. J. 143; nor be sued in any other court without the consent of that which commissioned him; 25 Alb. L. J. 46 (S. C. of U. S.). See RECEIVERS' CERTIFICATES.

RECEIVER OF STOLEN GOODS. In Criminal Law. By statutory provision, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, may be punished as the principal, in perhaps all the United States.

To make this offence complete, the goods received must have been stolen, they must have been received by the defendant, and the receiver must know that they had been stolen.

A boy stole a chattel from his master, and after it had been taken from him in his master's presence, it was, with the master's consent, restored to him again, in order that he might sell it to the defendant, to whom he had been in the habit of selling similar stolen articles. He accordingly sold it to the defendant, who, being indicted for feloniously receiving it of an evil-disposed person, knowing it to be stolen, was convicted, and, notwithstanding objection made, sentenced; Car. & M. 217. But this case has since been held not to be law, and a defendant not to be liable to conviction under such circumstances, inasmuch as at the time of the receipt the goods were not stolen goods; Dearsl. 468.

The goods stolen must have been received by the defendant. Primâ facie, if stolen goods are found in a man's house, he, not being the thief, is a receiver; per Coleridge, J., 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 501. And though there is proof of a criminal intent to receive, and a knowledge that the goods were stolen, if the exclusive possession still remains in the thief, a conviction for receiving cannot be sustained; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 37. So a principal in the first degree, particeps criminis, cannot at the same time be treated as a receiver; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 459. Where a prisoner is charged in two counts with stealing and receiving, the jury may return a verdict of guilty on the latter count, if warranted by the evidence, although the evidence is also consistent with the prisoner having been a principal in the second degree in the stealing; Bell, Cr. Cas. 20. But a person having a joint possession with the thief may be convicted as a receiver; Dearsl. 494. The actual manual possession or touch of the goods by the defendant, however, is not necessary to the completion of the offence of receiving; it is sufficient if they are in the actual possession of a person over whom the defendant has a control, so that they would be forthcoming if he ordered it; Dearsl. Cr. Cas. 494. Husband and wife were indicted jointly for receiving. The jury found both guilty, and found, also, that the wife received the goods without the control or knowledge of the husband, and apart from him and that "he afterwards adopted his wife's receipt." It was held that this finding did not warrant the conviction of the husband; Dearsl. & B. 329.

It is almost always difficult to prove guilty knowledge; and that must, in general, be collected from circumstances. If such circumstances are proved which to a person of common understanding and prudence, and situated as the prisoner was, must have satisfied him that they were stolen, this is sufficient. For example, the receipt of watches, jewelry, large quantities of money, bundles of clothes of various kinds, or personal property of any sort, to a considerable value, from boys or persons destitute of property and without any lawful means of acquiring them, and specially if bought at untimely hours, the mind can arrive at no other conclusion than that they were stolen. This is further confirmed if they have been bought at an under-value, concealed, the marks defaced, and falsehood resorted to in accounting for the possession of them; Alison, Cr. Law, 330; 2 Russ. Cr. 253; 1 Foet. & F. 51.

At common law, receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, is a misdemeanor; 2 Russ. Cr. 253. But in Massachusetts it has been held to partake so far of the nature of felony that if a constable or other peace-officer has reasonable grounds to suspect one of the crime of receiving or aiding in the concealment of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, he may without warrant arrest the supposed offender, and detain him for a reasonable time, for the purpose of securing him to answer a complaint for such offence; 5 Cush. 281. See RECENT POSSESSION, ETC.

RECEIVERS' CERTIFICATES. Certificates of indebtedness issued by receivers in possession of property and having the first lien upon such property.

A court of chancery has power after notice to interested parties to authorize the issue even of negotiable certificates of indebtedness, creating a first lien, displacing other liens to that extent, on the property of a railroad which it is operating through its receiver, whenever it is necessary to raise money for the economical management and conservation of the property. In order to complete a railroad, equity will not create liens upon its property, which will displace an older lien (but where it was necessary to complete a railroad before a certain date, in order to secure a line grant, which was a very material part of the security of the bondholders, a receiver was authorized to borrow money and complete the road; 2 Dill. 448; but this was a case of great exigency. See 2 Woods, 506; 54 Iowa, 200). A chancellor cannot authorize a receiver to borrow money by selling interest-bearing receivers' certificates of indebtedness at less than their face value; 53 Ala. 237; but see, as to this last point, 2 Woods, 506.

A lien for a receivership debt which shall take precedence over existing liens should not be created or upheld, except when expressly ordered in advance, with the consent of the prior incumbrancers, and in a case of absolute necessity for the preservation of the property and securities; 12 Am. Railw. Rep. 497 (S. C. of Vt.).

Where a dilapidated railroad is in possession of receivers, under proceedings brought by trustees of a first mortgage, and it is necessary to borrow money to preserve the road and complete some inconsiderable portion thereof, the court may authorize the receivers to borrow money for such purposes, and make the sum so borrowed a lien on the property superior to the first mortgage. The certificates issued here were payable to bearer and referred to the order of court under which they were issued; it was held that they were not commercial paper, and that persons who bought them were not bound to see to the application of the purchase money; 2 Woods, 506; see 95 Ill. 134.

Courts of equity have authority without the consent of mortgagees, to order receivers to borrow money and bind the property in their hands for the payment of the loans; 53 Ala. 237. See, generally, 12 Am. L. Rev. 660; RECEIVER.

RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY. In Criminal Law. Possession of the fruits of crime recently after its commission is prima facie evidence of guilty possession; and if unexplained, either by direct evidence, or by the attending circumstances, or by the character and habits of life of the possessor, or otherwise, it is usually regarded by the jury as conclusive; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 122. See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 34.

It is manifest that the force of this rule of presumption depends upon the recency of the possession as related to the crime, and upon the exclusiveness of such possession.

If the interval of time between the loss and the finding be considerable, the presumption, as it affects the party in possession of the stolen property, is much weakened, and the more especially so if the goods are of such a nature as, in the ordinary course of things, frequently to change hands. From the nature of the case, it is not possible to fix any precise period within which the effect of this rule of presumption can be limited: it must depend not only upon the mere lapse of time, but upon the nature of the property and the concomitant circumstances of each particular case. Thus, where two ends of woollen cloth in an unfinished state, consisting of about twenty yards each, were found in the possession of the prisoner two months after they had been stolen, Mr. Justice Patteson held that the prisoner should explain how he came by the property; 7 C. & P. 551. But where the only evidence against a prisoner was that certain tools had been traced to his possession three months after their loss, Mr. Justice Parke directed an acquittal; 3 C. & P. 600. And Mr. Justice Maule pursued a similar course on an indictment for horse-stealing, where it appeared that the horse was not discovered in the custody of the accused until after six months from the date of the robbery; 3 C. & K. 318. So where goods lost sixteen months before were found in the prisoner's house, and no other evidence was adduced against him, he was not called upon for his defence; 2 C. & P. 459.

It is obviously essential to the just application of this rule of presumption that the house or other place in which the stolen property is found, be in the exclusive possession of the prisoner. Where they are found in the apartments of a lodger, for instance, the presumption may be stronger or weaker according as the evidence does or does not show an exclusive possession. Indeed, the finding of stolen property in the house of the accused, provided there were other inmates capable of committing the larceny, will of itself be insufficient to prove his possession, however recently the theft may have been effected, though, if coupled with proof of other suspicious circumstances, it may fully warrant the prisoner's conviction even though the property is not found in his house until after his apprehension; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 122; 3 Dowl. & R. 572; 2 Stark. 139.

The force of this presumption is greatly increased if the fruits of a plurality or of a series of thefts be found in the prisoner's possession, or if the property stolen consist of a multiplicity of miscellaneous articles, or be of an uncommon kind, or, from its value or other circumstances, be inconsistent with or unsuited to the station of the party.

The possession of stolen goods recently after their loss may be indicative not of the offence of larceny simply, but of any more aggravated crime which has been connected with theft. Upon an indictment for arson, proof that property which was in the house at the time it was burnt was soon afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner was held to raise a probable presumption that he was present and concerned in the offence. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1035. A like inference has been raised in the case of murder accompanied by robbery; Wills, Circ. Ev. 72, 241; in the cases of burglary and shopbreaking; 4 B. & Ald. 122; 9 C. & P. 364; 1 Mass. 106; and in the case of the possession of a quantity of counterfeit money; Russ. & R. 308; Dearsl. 552.

Upon the principle of this presumption, a sudden and otherwise inexplicable transition from a state of indigence, and a consequent change of habits, is sometimes a circumstance extremely unfavorable to the supposition of innocence; 11 Metc. 534. See 1 Gray, 101.

But this rule of presumption must be applied with caution and discrimination; for the bare possession of stolen property, though recently stolen, uncorroborated by other evidence, is sometimes fallacious and dangerous as a criterion of guilt. Sir Matthew Hale lays it down that "if a horse be stolen from A, and the same day B be found upon him, it is a strong presumption that B stole him; yet," adds that excellent lawyer, "I do remember before a learned and very wary judge, in such an instance, B was condemned and executed at Oxford assizes, and yet, within two assizes after, C, being apprehended for another robbery, and convicted, upon his judgment and execution confessed he was the man that stole the horse, and, being closely pursued, desired B, a stranger, to walk his horse for him while he turned aside upon a necessary occasion, and escaped; and B was apprehended with the horse, and died innocently." 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 289.

The rule under discussion is occasionally attended with uncertainty in its application, from the difficulty attendant upon the positive identification of articles of property alleged to have been stolen: and it clearly ought never to be applied where there is reasonable ground to conclude that the witnesses may be mistaken, or where, from any other cause, identity is not satisfactorily established. But the rule is nevertheless fairly and properly applied in peculiar circumstances, where, though positive identification is impossible, the possession of the property cannot without violence to every reasonable hypothesis but be considered of a guilty character: as in the case of persons employed in carrying sugar and other articles from ships and wharves. Cases have frequently occurred of convictions of larceny, in such circumstances, upon evidence that the parties were detected with property of the same kind upon them recently after coming from such places, although the identity of the property as belonging to any particular person could not otherwise be proved.

It is seldom, however, that juries are required to determine upon the effect of evidence of the mere recent possession of stolen property: from the very nature of the case, the fact is generally accompanied by other corroborative or explanatory circumstances of presumption. If the party have secreted the property; if he deny it is in his possession, and such denial is discovered to be false; if he cannot show how he became possessed of it; if he give false, incredible, or inconsistent accounts of the manner in which he acquired it, as that he had found it, or that it had been given or sold to him by a stranger or left at his house; if he has disposed of or attempted to dispose of it at an unreasonably low price; if he has absconded or endeavored to escape from justice; if other stolen property, or picklock keys, or other instruments of crime, be found in his possession; if he were seen near the spot at or about the time when the act was committed, or if any article belonging to him be found at the place or in the locality where the theft was committed, at or about the time of the commission of the offence: if the impression of his shoes or other articles of apparel correspond with marks left by the thieves; if he has attempted to obliterate from the articles in question marks of identity, or to tamper with the parties or the officers of justice: these and all like circumstances are justly considered as throwing light upon and explaining the fact of possession; and render it morally certain that such possession can be referrible only to a criminal origin, and cannot otherwise be rationally accounted for. 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 371, where this subject is fully considered.

RECEPTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name sometimes given to an arbitrator, because he had been received or chosen to settle the differences between the parties. Dig. 4. 8; Code, 2. 56.

RECESSION. A re-grant; the act of returning the title of a country to a government which formerly held it, by one which has it at the time: as, the recession of Louisiana, which took place by the treaty between France and Spain, of October 1, 1800. See 2 White Rec. 516.

RECIDIVE. In French Law. The state of an individual who commits a crime or misdemeanor, after having once been condemned for a crime or misdemeanor; a relapse.

Many statutes provide that for a second offence punishment shall be increased: in those cases the indictment should set forth the crime or misdemeanor as a second offence.

The second offence must have been committed after the conviction for the first: a defendant could not be convicted of a second offence, as such, until after he had suffered a punishment for the first. Dalloz, Dict.

RECIPROCAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One by which the parties enter into mutual engagements.

They are divided into perfect and imperfect. When they are perfectly reciprocal, the obligation of each of the parties is equally a principal part of the contract, such as sale, partnership, etc. Contracts imperfectly reciprocal are those in which the obligation of one of the parties only is a principal obligation of the contract: as, mandate, deposit, loan for use, and the like. In all reciprocal contracts the consent of the parties must be expressed. Pothier, Obl. n. 9; La. Civ. Code, art. 1758, 1759.

RECIPROCITY. Mutuality; state, quality, or character of that which is reciprocal.

The states of the Union are bound to many acts of reciprocity. The constitution requires that they shall deliver to each other fugitives from justice; that the records of one state, properly authenticated, shall have full credit in the other states; that the citizens of one state shall be citizens of any state into which they may remove. In some of the states, as in Pennsylvania, the rules with regard to the effect of a discharge under the insolvent laws of another state are reciprocated; the discharges of those courts which respect the discharges of the courts of Pennsylvania are respected in that state.

RECITAL. The repetition of some former writing, or the statement of something which has been done. It is useful to explain matters of fact which are necessary to make the transaction intelligible. 2 Bla. Com. 298.

In Contracts. The party who executes a deed is bound by the recitals of essential facts contained therein. Comyns, Dig. Estoppel (A 2); Metc. Yelv. 227, n.; 2 Co. 33; 8 Mod. 311.

The amount of consideration received is held an essential averment, under this rule, in England; 2 Taunt. 141; 5 B. & Ald. 606; 1 B. & C. 704; 2 B. & Ad. 544; otherwise in the United States; 20 Pick. 247; 5 Cush. 431; 6 Me. 364; 7 id. 175; 10 Vt. 96; 4 N. The recitals in a deed of conveyance bind parties and privies thereto, whether in blood, estate, or law; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 23; and see 3 Ad. & E. 265; 7 Dowl. & R. 141; 4 Pet. 1; 6 id. 611. See ESTOPPEL. The recital of the payment of the consideration money is evidence of payment against subsequent purchasers from the same grantor; 54 Penn. 19; but not against third parties, when it is necessary for the party claiming under the deed to show full payment before receiving notice of an adverse equity; 28 Penn. 425. A deed of defeasance which professes to recite the principal deed must do so truly; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 7, § 28. See 3 Penn. R. 324; 3 Ch. Cas. 101; Co. Litt. 352; Comyns, Dig. Fait (E 1).

In Pleading. IN EQUITY.

The decree formerly contained a recital of the pleadings. This usage is now abolished; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4448.

AT LAW.

Recitals of deeds or specialties bind the parties to prove them as recited; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 W. 18); 4 East, 585; 3 Denio, 356; 9 Penn. 407; Hempst. 294; 13 Md. 117; see 6 Gratt. 130; and a variance in an essential matter will be fatal; 18 Conn. 395; even though the variance be trivial; Hempst. 294; 1 Chitty, Pl. 424. Recitals of private statutes must be made; 10 Wend. 75; 1 Mo. 593; and the statutes proved by an exemplified copy unless admitted by the opposite party; Steph. Pl. 347; 10 Mass. 91; but not if a clause be inserted that it shall be taken notice of as a public act; 10 Bingh. 404; 1 Cr. M. & R. 44, 47; 5 Blackf. 170; contra, 1 Mood. & M. 421. Pleading a statute is merely stating the facts which bring a case within it, without making any mention or taking any notice of the statute itself; 6 Ired. 352; 7 Blackf. 359. Counting upon a statute consists in making express reference to it, as by the words "against the form of the statute [or "by force of the statute"] in such case made and provided." Reciting a statute is quoting or stating its contents; Steph. Pl. 347; Gould, Pl. 4th ed. 46, n. 3.

Recital of a record on which the action is based must be correct, and a variance in a material point will be fatal; 9 Mo. 742; 12 id. 484; 2 Paine, 209; 29 Ala. N. S. 112; 30 Miss. 126; 17 Ark. 371; 19 Ill. 637; otherwise where it is offered in evidence merely; 12 Ark. 760, 766, 768.

RECLAIM. To demand again; to insist upon a right; as, when a defendant for a consideration received from the plaintiff has covenanted to do an act, and fails to do it, the plaintiff may bring covenant for the breach, or assumpsit to reclaim the consideration. 1 Caines, 47.

RECLAIMING BILL. In Scotch Law. A petition for review of an interlocutor, pronounced in a sheriff's or other inferior court. It recites verbatim the interlocutor, and, after a written argument, ends with a prayer for the recall or alteration of the interlocutor, in whole or in part. Bell, Dict. Reclaiming Petition; Shaw, Dig. 394.

RECOGNITION. An acknowledgment that some thing which has been done by one man in the name of another was done by authority of the latter.

A recognition by the principal of the agency of another in the particular instance, or in similar instances, is evidence of the authority of the agent, so that the recognition may be either express or implied. As an instance of an implied recognition may be mentioned the case of one who subscribes policies in the name of another, and, upon a loss happening, the latter pays the amount; 1 Campb. 43, n. a; 4 id. 88; 1 Esp. Cas. 61.

RECOGNITORS. In English Law. The name by which the jurors empanelled on an assize are known. 17 S. & R. 174.

RECOGNIZANCE. An obligation of record, entered into before a court or officer duly authorized for that purpose, with a condition to do some act required by law, which is therein specified. 2 Bla. Com. 341.

The liability of bail above in civil cases, and of the bail in all cases in criminal matters, must be evidenced by a recognizance, as the sheriff has no power to discharge upon a bail-bond being given to him in these cases. See 4 Bla. Com. 297.

The bail-bond may be considered as furnishing the sheriff with an excuse for not complying strictly with the requirements of the writ; its work is performed in securing the appearance at court of the defendant. The object of a recognizance is to secure the presence of the defendant to perform or suffer the judgment of the court. In some of the United States, however, this distinction is not observed, but bail in the form of a bail-bond is filed with the officer, which is at once bail below and above, being conditioned that the party shall appear and answer to the plaintiff in the suit, and abide the judgment of the court.

In civil cases they are entered into by bail, conditioned that they will pay the debt, interest, and costs recovered by the plaintiff under certain contingencies, and for other purposes under statutes.

In criminal cases they are either that the party shall appear before the proper court to answer to such charges as are or shall be made against him, that he shall keep the peace or be of good behavior. The presence of witnesses may also be secured in the same manner; 6 Hill, 506.

Who may take. In civil cases recognizances are generally taken by the court; 15 Vt. 9; 7 Blackf. 221; or by some judge of the court in chambers, though other magistrates may be authorized therefor by statute, and are in many of the states; 6 Whart. 359; 4 Humphr. 213. See 2 Dev. 555; 3 Gratt. 82.

In criminal cases the judges of the various courts of criminal jurisdiction and justices of the peace may take recognizances; 6 Ohio, 251; 19 Pick. 127; 14 Conn. 206; 6 Blackf. 284, 315; 18 Miss. 626; 26 Ala. N. s. 81; 3 Mich. 42; see 2 Curt. C. C. 41; the sheriff, in some cases; 5 Ark. 265; 11 Ala. 676; but in case of capital crimes the power is restricted usually to the court of supreme jurisdiction. See BAIL.

In cases where a magistrate has the power to take recognizances it is his duty to do so, exercising a judicial discretion, however; 7 Blackf. 611. In form it is a short memorandum on the record, made by the court, judge, or magistrate having authority, which need not be signed by the party to be found; 5 S. & R. 147; 9 Mass. 520; 4 Vt. 488; 1 Dana, 523; 6 Ala. 465; 2 Wash. C. C. 422; 6 Yerg. 354. It is to be returned to the court having jurisdiction of the offence charged, in all cases; 7 Leigh, 371; 9 Conn. 350; 4 Wend. 387; 14 Vt. 64. See 27 Me. 179.

Discharge and excuse under. A surrender of the defendant at any time anterior to a fixed period after the sheriff's return of non est to a ca. sa., or taking the defendant on a ca. sa.; 1 Hawks, 51; 6 Johns. 97; discharges the bail (see FIXING BAIL); as does the death of the defendant before the return of non est; 1 N. & M'C. 251; 3 Conn. 84; or a loss of custody and control by act of government or of law without fault of the bail prior to being fixed; 3 Dev. 157; 18 Johns. 335; 5 Metc. Mass. 380; 2 Ga. 33; 14 Gratt. 698; see 8 Mass. 264; 5 Sneed, 623; 2 Wash. C. C. 464; including imprisonment for life or for a long term of years in another state; 18 John. 35; 6 Cow. 599; but not voluntary enlistment; 11 Mass. 146, 234; or long delay in proceeding against bail; 2 Mass. 485; 1 Root, 428; see 4 Johns. 478; or a discharge of the principal under the bankrupt or insolvent laws of the state; 2 Bail. 492; 1 Harr. & J. 101, 156; 21 Wend. 670; 1 Mass. 292; 1 Harr. Del. 367, 466; 1 McLean, 226; 1 Gill, 259; and see, also, 2 Penn. 492; and, of course, performance of the conditions of the recognizance by the defendant, discharge the bail. And see BAIL-BOND; FIXING BAIL.

The formal mode of noting a discharge is by entering an exoneration; 5 Binn. 332; 1 Johns. Cas. 329; 2 id. 101, 220; 7 Conn. 439; 1 Gill, 529; 2 Ga. 331.

The remedy upon a recognizance is by means of a scire facias against the bail; 1 H. & G. Md. 154; 1 Ala. 34; 7 T. B. Monr. 130; 4 Bibb, Ky. 181; 7 Leigh, 371; 4 Iowa, 289; 3 Blackf. 344; 6 Halst. 124; 19 Pick. 127; 2 Harr. N. J. 446; or by suit, in some cases; 13 Wend. 33; 5 Ark. 691; 14 Conn. 329.

RECOGNIZE. To try; to examine in order to determine the truth of a matter. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. App. No. III. § 4; Bracton, 179.

To enter into a recognizance.

RECOGNIZEE. He for whose use a recognizance has been taken.

RECOGNIZOR. He who enters into a recognizance.

RECOLEMENT. In French Law. The reading and re-examination by a witness of a deposition, and his persistence in the same, or his making such alteration as his better recollection may enable him to do after having read his deposition. Without such re-examination the deposition is void. Pothier, Procéd. Cr. s. 4, art. 4.

RECOMMENDATION. The giving to a person a favorable character of another.

When the party giving the character has acted in good faith, he is not responsible for the injury which a third person, to whom such recommendation was given, may have sustained in consequence of it, although he was mistaken.

But when the recommendation is knowingly untrue, and an injury is sustained, the party recommending is civilly responsible for damages; 3 Term, 51; 7 Cra. 69; 7 Wend. 1; 14 id. 126; 6 Penn. 310; whether it was done merely for the purpose of benefiting the party recommended or the party who gives the recommendation. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

And in case the party recommended was a debtor to the one recommending, and it was agreed, prior to the transaction, that the former should, out of the property to be obtained by the recommendation, be paid, or in case of any other species of collusion to cheat the person to whom the credit is given, they may both be criminally prosecuted for the conspiracy. See CHARACTER; Fell, Guar. c. 8; 6 Johns. 181; 13 id. 224; 1 Day, 22; 5 Mart. La. N. s. 443.

RECOMPENSATION. In Scotch Law. An allegation by the plaintiff of compensation on his part made in answer to a compensation or set-off pleaded by the defendant in answer to the plaintiff's demand.

RECOMPENSE. A reward for services; remuneration for goods or other property.

In maritime law there is a distinction between recompense and restitution. When goods have been lost by jettison, if at any subsequent period of the voyage the remainder of the cargo be lost, the owner of the goods lost by jettison cannot claim restitution from the owners of the other goods; but in the case of expenses incurred with a view to the general benefit, it is clear that they ought to be made good to the party, whether he be an agent employed by the master in a foreign port, or the ship-owner himself.

RECOMPENSE OF RECOVERY IN VALUE. A phrase applied to the matter recovered in a common recovery, after the vouchee has disappeared and judgment is given for the demandant. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2093.

RECONCILIATION. The act of bringing persons to agree together, who before had had some difference.

A renewal of cohabitation between husband and wife is proof of reconciliation; and such reconciliation destroys the effect of a deed of separation; 4 Eccl. 238.

RECONDUCTION. In Civil Law. A renewing of a former lease; relocation. Dig. 19. 2. 13. 11; Code Nap. art. 1737–1740.

RECONSTRUCTION. This term has been widely used to describe the measures adopted by congress, at the close of the civil war in the United States, to regulate the admission of the representatives from the states lately in rebellion, the re-establishment of the Federal authority within their borders, and the changes in their internal government, in order to adapt them to the condition of affairs brought about by the war. See 1 Am. L. Rev. 238.

RECONVENTION. In Civil Law. An action brought by a party who is defendant against the plaintiff before the same judge. 4 Mart. La. N. S. 439. To entitle the defendant to institute a demand in reconvention, it is requisite that such demand, though different from the main action, be nevertheless necessarily connected with it and incidental to the same. La. Code of Pr. art. 375; 11 La. 309; 7 Mart. La. N. S. 282; 8 id. 516. The reconvention of the civil law was a species of cross-bill. Story, Eq. Plead. § 402. See CONVENTIO.

RECORD. A written memorial made by a public officer authorized by law to perform that function, and intended to serve as evidence of something written, said, or done. 6 Call, 78; 1 Dana, 595.

Records may be either of legislative or judicial acts. Memorials of other acts are sometimes made by statutory provisions.

Legislative acts. The acts of congress and of the several legislatures are the highest kind of records. The printed journals of congress have been so considered; 1 Whart. Dig. Evidence, pl. 112. And see Dougl. 598; Cowp. 17.

The proceedings of the courts of common law are records. But every minute made by a clerk of a court for his own future guidance in making up his record is not a record; 4 Wash. C. C. 698. See 10 Penn. 157; 2 Pick. 448; 4 N. H. 450; 5 Ohio St. 545; 3 Wend. 267; 2 Vt. 573; 5 Day, 363; 3 T. B. Monr. 63.

Proceedings in courts of chancery are said not to be, strictly speaking, records; but they are so considered; Gresl. Ev. 101. And see 8 Mart. La. N. S. 303; 1 Rawle, 381; 8 Yerg. 142; 1 Pet. C. C. 352.

Statutes of the several states have made the enrolment of certain deeds and other documents necessary in order to perpetuate the memory of the facts they contain, and declared that the copies thus made should have the effect of records.

The fact of an instrument being recorded is held to operate as a constructive notice to all subsequent purchasers of any estate, legal or equitable, in the same property; 1 Johns. Ch. 394. And even if not recorded, if it has been filed for record and its existence is necessarily implied from the existence of another instrument already of record, purchasers will be deemed to have had notice of its existence; 14 Cent. L. J. 374.

But all conveyances and deeds which may be de facto recorded are not to be considered as giving notice: in order to have this effect, the instruments must be such as are authorized to be recorded, and the registry must have been made in compliance with the law, otherwise the registry is to be treated as a mere nullity, and it will not affect a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer unless he has such actual notice as would amount to a fraud; 2 Sch. & L. 68; 4 Wheat. 466; 1 Binn. 40; 1 Johns. Ch. 300; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 403, 404; 5 Me. 272; but where a statute makes it discretionary to record an instrument, the effect of recording is in no wise lessened, but is deemed a constructive notice the same as if the recording had been required; 77 Penn. 373; 25 Alb. L. J. 249. Where a proper book is kept for the purpose of showing when an instrument is left for record, delay or negligence in entering it in other books will not affect it as a lien upon the property; 82 Penn. 116. See as to recording acts; 3 Law Mag. & Rev. 4th sec. 412; Judge Cooley's Paper in 4th Rep. Am. Bar Association (1881); Lecture of W. H. Rawle before the Law Dept. Univ. of Pa., 1881.

As to giving full faith and credit to judicial proceedings, under the U. S. Constitution, see JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

RECORD OF NISI PRIUS. In English Law. A transcript from the issue-roll: it contains a copy of the pleadings and issue. Steph. Pl. 105.

RECORDARI FACIAS LOQUELAM. In English Practice. A writ commanding the sheriff that he cause the plaint to be recorded which is in his county, without writ, between the parties there named, of the cattle, goods, and chattels of the com-plaintiff taken and unjustly distrained as it is said, and that he have the said record before the court on a day therein named, and that he prefix the same day to the parties, that then they may be there ready to proceed in the same plaint. 2 Sell. Pr. 166. Now obsolete.

RECORDATUR (Lat.). An order or allowance that the verdict returned on the nisi prius roll be recorded. Bacon, Abr. Arbitration, etc., D.

RECORDER. A judicial officer of some cities, possessing generally the powers and authority of a judge. 3 Yeates, 300; 4 Dall. 299. But see 1 Const. So. C. 45.

Anciently, recorder signified to recite or testify on recollection, as occasion might require, what had previously passed in court; and this was the duty of the judges, thence called recordeurs. Steph. Pl. note 11.

An officer appointed to make record or enrolment of deeds and other legal instruments authorized by law to be recorded.

RECORDING DEEDS. See RECORD.

RECOUPEMENT (Fr. recouper, to cut again). The right of the defendant, in the same action, to claim damages from the plaintiff, either because he has not complied with some cross-obligation of the contract upon which he sues, or because he has violated some duty which the law imposed upon him in the making or performance of that contract. 4 Wend. N. Y. 483; 8 id. 109: 10 Barb. N. Y. 55; 13 N. Y. 151; 3 Ind. 72, 265; 4 id. 533; 7 id. 200; 9 id. 470; 7 Ala. N. S. 753; 13 id. 587; 16 id. 221; 27 id. 574; 12 Ark. 699; 16 id. 97; 17 id. 270; 6 B. Monr. 528; 13 id. 239; 15 id. 454; 3 Mich. 281; 4 id. 619; 39 Me. 382; 16 Ill. 495; 11 Mo. 415; 18 id. 368; 25 id. 430.

This is not a new title in the law, the term occurring from the 14th to the 16th centuries, although it seems of late years to have assumed a new signification, and the present doctrine is said to be still in its infancy; 7 Am. L. Rev. 389. Originally it implied a mere deduction from the claim of the plaintiff, on account of payment in whole or in part, or a former recovery, or some analogous fact; 3 Co. 65; 4 id. 94; 5 id. 2, 31; 11 id. 51, 52. See note to Icily vs. Grew, 6 Nev. & M. 467; Viner, Abr. Discount, pl. 3, 4, 9, 10; 28 Vt. 413. This meaning has been retained in many modern cases, but under the name of deduction or reduction of damages; 11 East, 232; 1 Maule & S. 318, 323; 5 id. 6, 10; 4 Burr. 2133; 2 M. & G. 241; 7 M. & W. 314; 12 id. 772; 2 Taunt. 170; 2 Term, 97; 1 Stark. 343; 20 Conn. 204; 21 Wend. 610; 20 id. 267; 24 id. 304; 3 Dana, 489; 6 Mass. 20; 14 Pick. 356; 18 id. 283; 3 Metc. Mass. 9; 13 id. 269. The word recoupement has also been applied to cases very similar to the above; 4 Denio, 227; 20 Wend. 267. See 7 Am. L. Rev. 389, where recoupement is fully treated.

Recoupement as now understood seems to correspond with the Reconvention of the civil law, sometimes termed demandes incidentes by the French writers, in which the reus, or defendant, was permitted to exhibit his claim against the plaintiff for allowance, provided it arose out of, or was incidental to, the plaintiff's cause of action. Œuvres de Pothier, 9 vol. p. 39; 1 White, New Rec. 285; Voet, tit. de Judiciis, n. 78; La. Code Pr. art. 375; 4 Mart. N. S. 439; 6 id. 671; 7 id. 517; 10 La. 185; 14 id. 385; 12 La. An. 114, 170; 6 Tex. 406; 2 Hennen, Dig. Recoupement, pl. 8, b.

In England, as well as in some of the United States, the principles of recoupement as defined above have been recognized only in a restricted form. Under the name of reduction of damages, the defendant is allowed to show all such violations of his contract by the plaintiff as go to render the consideration less valuable, but he is compelled to resort to an independent action for any immediate or consequential damages affecting him in other respects; 8 M. & W. 858; 1 Stark. 107, 274; 3 Campb. 450; 1 C. & P. 384; 2 id. 113; 6 Barb. 387; 6 B. Monr. 528; 12 Conn. 129; 11 Johns. 547; 14 id. 377; 12 Pick. 330; 22 id. 512; 8 Humphr. 678; 9 How. 231. But these restrictions are all gradually disappearing, and the law is assuming the form expressed in the cases cited under the definition of modern recoupement, the main reason upon which the doctrine now rests being the avoidance of circuity of action.

There are some limitations and qualifications to the law of recoupement, as thus established. Thus, it has been held that the defendant is not entitled to any judgment for the excess his damages in recoupement may have over the plaintiff's claim, nor shall he be allowed to bring an independent action for that excess; 6 N. H. 481; 14 Ill. 424; 3 Mich. 281; 12 Ala. N. S. 643; 3 Hill, N. Y. 171; 17 Ark. 270. If recoupement is put upon the ground of a cross-action and not a mere defence for the reduction of damages, there is no reason why he should not have judgment to the extent of his injury. Such seems to be the practice in Louisiana, under the name of reconvention; 12 La. An. 170; and such will probably be the practice under those systems of pleading which authorize the court, in any action which requires it, to grant the defendant affirmative relief; 2 E. D. Sm. 317. See, also, 3 W. & S. 472; 17 S. & R. 385; 12 How. Pr. 310.

The damages recouped must be for a breach of the same contract upon which suit is brought; 3 Hill, N. Y. 171; 2 Wend. 240; 4 Sandf. 147; 10 Ind. 329. They may be for a tort; but it seems that the tort must be a violation of the contract, and they are to be measured by the extent of this violation, and no allowance taken of malice; 10 Barb. 55; 17 Ill. 38; 4 S. & R. 249; 5 id. 122; 3 Binn. 169. The language of some cases would seem to imply that recoupement may be had for damages connected with the subject-matter or transaction upon which the suit is brought, but which do not constitute a violation of any obligation imposed by the contract, or of any duty imposed by the law in the making or performance of the contract; 14 Ill. 424; 17 id. 38. But these cases will be found to be decided with reference to statutes of counter-claim. And even in the construction of such statutes it has been doubted whether it is not better to confine the damages to violations of the contract; 8 Ind. 399; 2 Sandf. 120.

It is well established, in the absence of statutory provisions, that it is optional with the defendant whether he shall plead his cross-claim by way of recoupement, or resort to an independent action; 14 Johns. 379; 13 Wend. 277; 3 Sandf. 743; 12 Ala. N. s. 643; 3 Ind. 59; 4 id. 585; 21 Mo. 415. Nor does the fact of a suit pending for the same damages estop him from pleading them in recoupement, although he may be compelled to choose upon which action he shall proceed; 3 E. D. Sm. 135; 1 W. & S. 58; 5 Watts, 116. Payment after action brought, although never pleadable in answer to the action, was usually admitted in reduction of damages; 4 N. H. 557; 6 Ind. 26; 2 Bingh. N. C. 88; 7 C. & P. 1; 1 M. & W. 463. But the defendant can never recoup for damages accruing since action brought; 20 E. L. & E. 277; 4 Barb. 256; 2 Binn. 287.

It has been maintained by some courts that the law of recoupement is not applicable to real estate. Accordingly, they have denied the defendant the right, when sued for the purchase-money, to recoup for a partial failure of title. 11 Johns. 50; 2 Wheat. 13; 12 Ark. 709; 17 id. 254. But most of these cases will be found denying him that right only before eviction. A confusion has been introduced by regarding failure of title and failure of consideration as convertible terms. The consideration of a deed without covenants is the mere delivery of the instrument; Rawle, Cov. 588. A failure of title in such case, is not a failure of consideration, and it therefore affords no ground for recoupement. The consideration of a deed with covenants does not fail till the covenantee has suffered damages on the covenants, which in most cases does not happen till eviction, either actual or constructive. After this has happened, his right to recoup is now pretty generally admitted. This is nothing more than allowing him to recoup as soon as he can sue upon the covenants; 21 Wend. 131; 25 id. 107; 19 Johns. 77; 13 N. Y. 151; 8 Barb. 11; 3 Pick. 459; 14 id. 293; 6 Gratt. 305; Dart, Vend. 381; Rawle, Cov. 583.

It has been more generally admitted that where there is a failure of the consideration as to the quantity or quality of the land, the purchaser may recoup upon his covenants; 12 Ark. 699; 17 id. 254; 2 Kent, 470; 18 Mo. 368; 20 id. 443.

Under the common-law system of pleading, the evidence of a recoupement, if going to a total failure of consideration, might be given under the general issue without notice, but if it went only to a partial failure, notice was required to prevent surprise; 6 Barb. 386; 7 id. 53; 2 N. Y. 157; 6 N. H. 497; 3 Ind. 265; 6 id. 489. This is the only way it could be admitted, for it could not be pleaded, a partial defence constituting neither a plea in bar nor in abatement. Under a notice it was admitted to aid in sustaining the general denial.

But under the new systems of practice fashioned more or less after the New York Code, there being no general issue to which the notice was subsidiary, the defendant is required to plead his defence whether it is in answer of the whole demand or only in reduction of damages; 6 How. Pr. 433; 8 id. 441; 11 N. Y. 352; 16 id. 297; 12 Wend. 246; 18 Mo. 368.

The effect to be given to the law of recoupement will depend, in many of the states, upon the statutes of counter-claim and offset in force. In Missouri, for instance, it is provided that if any two or more persons are mutually indebted in any manner whatever, and one of them commence an action against the other, one debt may be set off against the other, although such debts are of a different nature; 1 R. S. § 3867. The term counter-claim under this statute is held to include both set-off and recoupement; 49 Mo. 570; the distinction between the two terms being important only from the fact that the former must arise from contract, and can only be used in an action founded on contract; while the latter may spring from a wrong provided it arose out of the transaction set forth in the petition, or was connected with the subject of the action; id. In the case of actions arising out of contracts, it has been held that nothing would be allowed by way of recoupement unless it worked a violation of some obligation imposed by the contract, or some duty imposed by the law in the making or performance of it; 2 Sandf. 120; 8 Ind. 399.

RECOVERER. The demandant in a common recovery, after judgment has been given in his favor, assumes the name of recoverer.

RECOVERY. The restoration of a former right, by the solemn judgment of a court of justice. 3 Murph. 169.

A common recovery is a judgment obtained in a fictitious suit, brought against the tenant of the freehold, in consequence of a default made by the person who is last vouched to warranty in such suit. Bacon, Tracts, 148.

A true recovery, usually known by the name of recovery simply, is the procuring a former right by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction: as, for example, when judgment is given in favor of the plaintiff when he seeks to recover a thing or a right.

Common recoveries are considered as mere forms of conveyance or common assurances: although a common recovery is a fictitious suit, yet the same mode of proceeding must be pursued, and all the forms strictly adhered to, which are necessary to be observed in an adversary suit. The first thing, therefore, necessary to be done in suffering a common recovery is that the person who is to be the demandant, and to whom the lands are to be adjudged, should sue out a writ or præcipe against the tenant of the freehold; whence such tenant is usually called the tenant to the præcipe. In obedience to this writ the tenant appears in court, either in person or by his attorney; but, instead of defending the title to the land himself, he calls on some other person, who upon the original purchase is supposed to have warranted the title, and prays that the person may be called in to defend the title which he warranted, or otherwise to give the tenant lands of equal value to those he shall lose by the defect of his warranty. This is called the voucher vocatia, or calling to warranty. The person thus called to warrant, who is usually called the vouchee, appears in court, is impleaded, and enters into the warranty, by which means he takes upon himself the defence of the land. The defendant then desires leave of the court to imparl, or confer with the vouchee in private, which is granted of course. Soon after the demandant returns into court, but the vouchee disappears or makes default, in consequence of which it is presumed by the court that he has no title to the lands demanded in the writ, and therefore cannot defend them; whereupon judgment is given for the demandant, now called the recoverer, to recover the lands in question against the tenant, and for the tenant to recover against the vouchee lands of equal value in recompense for those so warranted by him, and now lost by his default. This is called the recompense of recovery in value; but as it is customary for the crier of the court to act, who is hence called the common vouchee, the tenant can only have a nominal and not a real recompense for the land thus recovered against him by the demandant. A writ of habere facias is then sued out, directed to the sheriff of the county in which the lands thus recovered are situated; and on the execution and return of the writ the recovery is completed. The recovery here described is with single voucher; but a recovery may be, and is frequently, suffered with double, treble, or further voucher, as the exigency of the case may require, in which case there are several judgments against the several vouchees.

Common recoveries were invented by the ecclesiastics in order to evade the statute of mortmain, by which they were prohibited from purchasing, or receiving under the pretence of a free gift, any land or tenements whatever. They have been used in some states for the purpose of breaking the entail of estates. See, generally, Cruise, Digest, tit. 36; 2 Wms. Saund. 42, n. 7; 4 Kent, 487; Pigot, Comm. Rec. passim.

All the learning in relation to common recoveries is nearly obsolete, as they are out of use. Rey, a French writer, in his work Des Institutions Judiciaires de l'Angleterres, tom. ii. p. 221, points out what appears to him the absurdity of a common recovery. As to common recoveries, see 3 S. & R. 435; 9 id. 330; 1 Yeates, 244; 4 id. 413; 1 Whart. 139, 151; 2 Rawle, 168; 6 Penn. 45; 2 Halst. 47; 5 Mass. 438; 6 id. 328; 8 id. 34; 3 Harr. & J. 292.

RECREANT. A coward; a poltroon. 3 Bla. Com. 340.

RECRIMINATION. In Criminal Law. An accusation made by a person accused against his accuser, either of having committed the same offence or another.

In general, recrimination does not excuse the person accused nor diminish his punishment, because the guilt of another can never excuse him. But in applications for divorce on the ground of adultery, if the party defendant can prove that the plaintiff or complainant has been guilty of the same offence, the divorce will not be granted; 1 Hagg. Cons. 144; 4 Eccl. 360. The laws of Pennsylvania contain a provision to the same effect. See 1 Hagg. Eccl. 790; 3 id. 77; 1 Hagg. Cons. 147; 2 id. 297; Shelf. Marr. & Div. 440; Dig. 24. 3. 39; 48. 3. 13. 5; 1 Add. Eccl. 411; COMPENSATION; CONDONATION; DIVORCE.

RECTIFIER. As used in the internal revenue laws, this term is not confined to a person who runs spirits through charcoal; but is applied to any one who rectifies or purifies spirits in any manner whatever, or who makes a mixture of spirits with anything else, and sells it under any name; 3 Ben. 73; s. c. 2 Am. L. T. Rep. 23.

RECTOR. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who rules or governs: a name given to certain officers of the Roman church. Dict. Canonique.

In English Law. He that hath full possession of a parochial church. A rector (or parson) has for the most part the whole right to all the ecclesiastical dues in his parish; where, as in theory of law, a vicar has an appropriator over him, entitled to the best part of the profits, to whom the vicar is, as it were, perpetual curate, with a standing salary; Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 384; 2 Steph. Com. 677.

RECTORY. In English Law. Corporeal real property, consisting of a church, glebe-lands, and tithes. 1 Chitty, Pr. 163.

RECTUS IN CURIA (Lat. right in court). The condition of one who stands at the bar, against whom no one objects any offence or prefers any charge.

When a person outlawed has reversed his outlawry, so that he can have the benefit of the law, he is said to be rectus in curia. Jacob, Law Dict.

RECUPERATORES (Lat.). In Roman Law. A species of judges originally established, it is supposed, to decide controversies between Roman citizens and strangers concerning the right to the possession of property requiring speedy remedy, but gradually extended to questions which might be brought before ordinary judges.

After the enlargement of their powers, the difference between them and judges, it is supposed, was simply this:—if the prætor named three judges, he called them recuperatores; if one, he called him judex. But opinions on this subject are very various. Colman, De Romano judicio recuperatorio. Cicero's oration pro Cæcin. 1, 3, was addressed to recuperatores.

RECUSANTS. In English Law. Persons who wilfully absent themselves from their parish church, and on whom penalties were imposed by various statutes passed during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.; Whart. Dict.

Those persons who separate from the church established by law. Termes de la Ley.

RECUSATION. In Civil Law. A plea or exception by which the defendant requires that the judge having jurisdiction of the cause should abstain from deciding, upon the ground of interest, or for a legal objection to his prejudice.

A recusation is not a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, but simply to the person of the judge. It may, however, extend to all the judges, as when the party has a suit against the whole court. Pothier, Procéd. Civ. 1ère part. ch. 2, s. 5. It is a personal challenge of the judge for cause. See 2 La. 390; 6 id. 134.

The challenge of jurors. La. Code Pract. art. 499, 500. An act, of what nature soever it may be, by which a strange heir, by deeds or words, declares he will not be heir. Dig. 29. 2. 95. See, generally, 1 Hopk. Ch. 1; 5 Mart. La. 292.

RED BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER. An ancient record, wherein are registered the holders of lands per baroniam in the time of Henry III., the number of hides of land in certain counties before the conquest, and the ceremonies on the coronation of Eleanor, wife of Henry III.: compiled by Alexander de Swenford, archdeacon of Salop and treasurer of St. Paul's, who died in 1246. 21 Hen. III.; Jacob, Law Dict.; Cowel.

REDDENDO SINGULA SINGULIS (Lat.). Referring particular things to particular persons. For example: when two descriptions of property are given together in one mass, both the next of kin and the heir cannot take, unless in cases where a construction can be made reddendo singula singulis, that the next of kin shall take the personal estate, and the heir-at-law the real estate. 14 Ves. 490. See 11 East, 513, n.; Bacon, Abr. Conditions (L).

REDDENDUM (Lat.). That clause in a deed by which the grantor reserves something new to himself out of that which he granted before. It usually follows the tenendum, and is generally in these words, "yielding and paying." In every good reddendum or reservation these things must concur: namely, it must be in apt words; it must be of some other thing issuing or coming out of the thing granted, and not a part of the thing itself nor of something issuing out of another thing; it must be of a thing on which the grantor may resort to distrain; it must be made to one of the grantors, and not to a stranger to the deed. See 2 Bla. Com. 299; Co. Litt. 47; Shepp. Touchst. 80; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 24, s. 1; Dane, Abr. Index.

REDDIDIT SE (Lat. he has rendered himself.). In English Practice. An endorsement made on the bail-piece when a certificate has been made by the proper officer that the defendant is in custody. Comyns, Dig. Bail (Q. 4).

REDEMPTION (Lat. re, red, back, emptio, a purchase).

A purchase back by the seller from the buyer. It is applied to denote the performance of the conditions upon performance of which a conditional sale is to become ineffective as a transfer of title, or, more strictly, a right to demand a reconveyance becomes vested in the seller. In the case of mortgages, this right is a legal right until a breach of conditions, when it becomes an equitable right, and is called the equity of redemption. See MORTGAGE; EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

REDEMPTIONES (Lat.). Heavy fines. Distinguished from MISERICORDIA, which see.

REDHIBITION. In Civil Law. The avoidance of a sale on account of some vice or defect in the thing sold, which renders its use impossible or so inconvenient and imperfect that it must be supposed that the buyer would not have purchased it had he known of the vice. La. Civ. Code, art. 2496.

This is essentially a civil-law right. The effect of the rule expressed by the maxim caveat emptor is to prevent any such right at common law, except in cases of express warranty. 2 Kent, 374; Sugd. Vend. 222.

REDHIBITORY ACTION. In Civil Law. An action instituted to avoid a sale on account of some vice or defect in the thing sold which renders its use impossible or so inconvenient and imperfect that it must be supposed the buyer would not have purchased it had he known of the vice. La. Civ. Code, 2496.

REDITUS ALBI (Lat.). A rent payable in money; sometimes called white rent, or blanche farm. See ALBA FIRMA.

REDITUS NIGRI (Lat.). A rent payable in grain, work, and the like: it was also called black mail. This name was given to it to distinguish it from reditus albi, which was payable in money.

REDOBATORES (L. Lat.). Those that buy stolen cloth and turn it into some other color or fashion, that it may not be recognized. Redubbers, q. v. Barrington, Stat. 2d ed. 87, n.; Co. 3d Inst. 134; Britton, c. 29.

REDRAFT. In Commercial Law. A bill of exchange drawn at the place where another bill was made payable and where it was protested, upon the place where the first bill was drawn, or, when there is no regular commercial intercourse rendering that practicable, then in the next best or most direct practicable course. 1 Bell, Com. 406. See RE-EXCHANGE.

REDRESS. The act of receiving satisfaction for an injury sustained. For the mode of obtaining redress, see REMEDIES; 1 Chitty, Pr. Anal. Table.

REDUBBERS. In Criminal Law. Those who bought stolen cloth and dyed it of another color to prevent its being identified were anciently so called. Co. 3d Inst. 134. See REDOBATORES.

REDUNDANCY. Matter introduced in an answer or pleading which is foreign to the bill or articles.

The respondent is not to insert in his answer any matter foreign to the articles he is called upon to answer, although such matter may be admissible in a plea; but he may, in his answer, plead matter by way of explanation pertinent to the articles, even if such matter shall be solely in his own knowledge, and to such extent incapable of proof; or he may state matter which can be substantiated by witnesses; but in this latter instance, if such matter be introduced into the answer, and not afterwards put in the plea, or proved, the court will give no weight or credence to such part of the answer. Per Lushington, 3 Curt. Eccl. 543.

A material distinction is to be observed between redundancy in the allegation and redundancy in the proof. In the former case, a variance between the allegation and the proof will be fatal, if the redundant allegations are descriptive of that which is essential. But in the latter case, redundancy cannot vitiate because more is proved than is alleged, unless the matter superfluously proved goes to contradict some essential part of the allegation; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 67; 1 Stark. Ev. 401.

RE-ENTRY. The act of resuming the possession of lands or tenements in pursuance of a right which the party exercising it reserved to himself when he quit his former possession.

Conveyances in fee reserving a ground-rent, and leases for a term of years, usually contain a clause authorizing the proprietor to re-enter in case of the non-payment of rent, or of the breach of some covenant in the lease, which forfeits the estate. Without such reservation he would have no right to re-enter for the mere breach of a covenant, although he may do so upon the breach of a condition which, by its terms, is to defeat the estate granted; 3 Wils. 127; 2 Bingh. 13; 1 M. & Ry. 694; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 290.

When a landlord is about to enforce his right to re-enter for the non-payment of rent, he must make a specific demand of payment, and be refused, before the forfeiture is complete, unless such demand has been dispensed with by an express agreement of the parties; 18 Johns. 451; 8 Watts, 51; 6 S. & R. 151; 13 Wend. 524; 6 Halst. 270; 7 Term, 117; 5 Co. 41. In the latter case, a mere failure to pay, without any demand, constitutes a sufficient breach, upon which an entry may at any time subsequently be made; 2 N. Y. 147; 2 N. H. 164; 2 Dougl. 477; 2 B. & C. 490.

The requisites of a demand upon which to predicate a forfeiture for the non-payment of rent, at common law, are very strict. It must be for the payment of the precise sum due upon the day when, by the terms of the lease, it becomes payable; if any days of grace are allowed for payment, then upon the last day of grace; Co. Litt. 203; 7 Term, 117; Comyns, Dig. Rent (I 7); 2 N. Y. 147; at a convenient time before sunset, while there is light enough to see to count the money; 17 Johns. N. Y. 66; 1 Saund. 287; at the place appointed for payment, or if no particular place has been specified in the lease, then at the most public place on the land, which, if there be a dwelling-house, is the front door; 4 Wend. 313; 18 Johns. 450; 1 How. 211; Co. Litt. 202 a; notwithstanding there be no person on the land to pay it; Bacon, Abr. Rent (I); and if the re-entry clause is coupled with the condition that no sufficient distress be found upon the premises, the landlord must search the premises to see that no such distress can be found; 15 East, 286; 6 S. & R. 151; 8 Watts, 51. See Jacks. & Gross, Landl. & T. § 236.

But the statutes of most of the states, following the English statute of 4 Geo. II. c. 28, now dispense with the formalities of a common-law demand, by providing that an action of ejectment may be brought as substitute for such a demand in all cases where no sufficient distress can be found upon the premises. And this latter restriction disappears entirely from the statutes of such of the states as have abolished distress for rent.

The clause of re-entry for non-payment of rent operates only as a security for rent; for at any time before judgment is entered in the action to recover possession the tenant may either tender to the landlord, or bring into the court where the action is pending, all the rent in arrear at the time of such payment, and all costs and charges incurred by the landlord, and in such case all further proceedings will cease. And in some states, even after the landlord has recovered possession the tenant may in certain cases be reinstated upon the terms of the original lease, by paying up all arrearages and costs; Tayl. Landl. & T. 302.

But the courts will not relieve against a forfeiture which has been wilfully incurred by a tenant who assigns his lease, or neglects to repair or to insure, contrary to his express agreement, or if he exercises a forbidden trade, or cultivates the land in a manner prohibited by the lease; for in all such cases the landlord, if he has reserved a right to re-enter, may at once resume his former possession and avoid the lease entirely; 2 Price, 206, n.; 2 Mer. 459; 9 C. & P. 706; 1 Dall. 210; 9 Mod. 112; 3 V. & B. 29; 12 Ves. 291.

REEVE. An ancient English officer of justice, inferior in rank to an alderman.

He was a ministerial officer appointed to execute process, keep the king's peace, and put the laws in execution. He witnessed all contracts and bargains, brought offenders to justice and delivered them to punishment, took bail for such as were to appear at the county court, and presided at the court or folcmote. He was also called gerefa.

There were several kinds of reeves: as, the shire-gerefa, shire-reeve or sheriff; the heh-gerefa, or high-sheriff, tithing-reeve, burgh- or borough-reeve.

RE-EXAMINATION. A second examination of a thing. A witness may be re-examined, in a trial at law, in the discretion of the court; and this is seldom refused. In equity, it is a general rule that there can be no re-examination of a witness after he has once signed his name to the deposition and turned his back upon the commissioner or examiner. The reason of this is that he may be tampered with, or induced to retract or qualify what he has sworn to; 1 Mer. 130.

RE-EXCHANGE. The expense incurred by a bill being dishonored in a foreign country where it is made payable and returned to that country in which it was made or indorsed and there taken up. 11 East, 265; 2 Campb. 65.

The loss resulting from the dishonor of a bill of exchange in a country different from that in which it was drawn or indorsed. It is ascertained by proof of the sum for which a sight bill (drawn at the time and place of dishonor at the then rate of exchange at the place where the drawer or indorser sought to be charged resides) must be drawn in order to realize at the place of dishonor the amount of the dishonored bill and the expenses consequent on its dishonor. The holder may draw a sight bill for such sum on either the drawer or one of the indorsers. Such bill is a 're-draft;' Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 221. See L. R. 3 App. Cas. 146.

The drawer of a bill is liable for the whole amount of re-exchange occasioned by the circuitous mode of returning the bill through the various countries in which it has been negotiated, as much as for that occasioned by a direct return; 2 H. Blackst. 378; 11 East, 265; 3 B. & P. 335. And see 10 La. 562; 24 Mo. 65; 8 Watts, 545; 10 Metc. 375; 7 Cra. 500; 4 Wash. C. C. 310; 2 How. 711, 764; 9 Exch. 25; 6 Moo. P. C. 314.

In some states legislative enactments have been made which regulate damages on re-exchange. These damages are different in the several states; and this want of uniformity, if it does not create injustice, must be admitted to be a serious evil. See 2 Am. Jur. 79; 23 Penn. 137; 4 Johns. 119; 12 id. 17; 4 Cal. 395; 3 Ind. 53; 9 id. 233; 8 Ohio, 292; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

REFALO. A word composed of the three initial syllables re. fa. lo., for recordari facias loquelam. 2 Sell. Pr. 160; 8 Dowl. 514.

REFECTION (Lat. re, again, facio, to make). In Civil Law. Reparation; re-establishment of a building. Dig. 19. 1. 6. 1.

REFEREE. A person to whom has been referred a matter in dispute, in order that he may settle it. His judgment is called an award. See ARBITRATOR; REFERENCE.

REFERENCE. In Contracts. An agreement to submit to certain arbitrators matters in dispute between two or more parties, for their decision and judgment. The persons to whom such matters are referred are sometimes called referees.

In Mercantile Law. A direction or request by a party who asks a credit to the person from whom he expects it, to call on some other person named, in order to ascertain the character or mercantile standing of the former.

In Practice. The act of sending any matter by a court of chancery, or one exercising equitable powers, to a master or other officer, in order that he may ascertain facts and report to the court. That part of an instrument of writing where it points to another for the matters therein contained. For the effect of such reference, see 1 Pick. 27; 15 id. 66; 17 Mass. 443; 7 Halst. 25; 14 Wend. 619; 10 Conn. 422; 3 Me. 393; 4 id. 14, 471. The thing referred to is also called a reference.

REFERENDARIUS (Lat.). An officer by whom the order of causes was laid before the Roman emperor, the desires of petitioners made known, and answers returned to them. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

REFERENDUM (Lat.). In International Law. A note addressed by an ambassador to his government, submitting to its considerations propositions made to him touching an object over which he has no sufficient power and is without instructions. When such a proposition is made to an ambassador, he accepts it ad referendum; that is, under the condition that it shall be acted upon by his government, to which it is referred.

REFORM. To reorganize; to rearrange. Thus, the jury "shall be reformed by putting to and taking out of the persons so impannelled." Stat. 3 Hen. VIII. c. 12; Bacon, Abr. Juries (A).

To reform an instrument in equity is to make a decree that a deed or other agreement shall be made or construed as it was originally intended by the parties, when an error or mistake as to a fact has been committed. A contract has been reformed although the party applying to the court was in the legal profession and he himself drew the contract, it appearing clear that it was framed so as to admit of a construction inconsistent with the true agreement of the parties; 1 S. & S. 210; 3 Russ. 424. But a contract will not be reformed in consequence of an error of law; 1 Russ. & M. 418; 1 Chitty, Pr. 124.

A person who seeks to rectify a deed on the ground of mistake must establish in the clearest and most satisfactory manner, that the alleged intention to which he desires it to be made conformable, continued concurrently in the minds of all the parties down to the time of its execution; and also must be able to show exactly and precisely the form to which the deed ought to be brought; 4 De G. & J. 265. Where the mistake has been on one side only, the utmost that the party desiring relief can obtain is rescission, not reformation; 14 N. H. 175. But if there is mistake on one side and fraud on the other, there is a case for reformation; 44 N. Y. 325. Bisph Eq. § 469.

REFRESHING THE MEMORY. To revive the knowledge of a subject by having a reference to something connected with it.

A witness has a right to examine a memorandum or paper which he made in relation to certain facts when the same occurred, in order to refresh his memory; but the paper or memorandum itself is not evidence; 5 Wend. 301; 12 S. & R. 328; 6 Pick. 222; 1 A. K. Marsh. 188; 2 Conn. 213; 1 Const. 336, 373.

Where the witness after referring to the paper, speaks from his own memory and depends upon his own recollection of the facts to which he testifies, he is allowed to use the paper without regard to the time when, or the person by whom, it was made; but where he relies upon the paper and testifies only because he finds the facts contained therein, he cannot use it unless it is an original paper made by himself and contemporaneously with the transaction referred to; 14 Cent. L. J. 119.

REFUND. To pay back by the party who has received it, to the party who has paid it, money which ought not to have been paid.

On a deficiency of assets, executors and administrators cum testamento annexo are entitled to have refunded to them legacies which they may have paid, or so much as may be necessary to pay the debts of the testator; and in order to insure this they are generally authorized to require a refunding bond. See Bacon, Abr. Legacies (H).

REFUNDING BOND. See REFUND.

REFUSAL. The act of declining to receive or to do something.

A grantee may refuse a title, see ASSENT; one appointed executor may refuse to act as such. In some cases, a neglect to perform a duty which the party is required by law or his agreement to do will amount to a refusal.

REGARDANT (French, regardant, seeing or vigilant). A villein regardant was one who had the charge to do all base services within the manor, and to see the same freed of annoyances. Co. Litt. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 93.

REGENCY. The authority of the person in monarchical countries invested with the right of governing the state, in the name of the monarch, during his minority, absence, sickness, or other inability.

REGENT. A ruler; a governor. The term is usually applied to one who governs a regency, or rules in the place of another.

In the canon law, it signifies a master or professor of a college. Dict. du Dr. Can.

It sometimes means simply a ruler, director, or superintendent; as in New York, where the board who have the superintendence of all the colleges, academies, and schools are called the regents of the University of the state of New York.

REGIAM MAJESTATEM (Lat.). An ancient book purporting to contain the law of Scotland, and said to have been compiled by king David, who reigned 1124–1153. It is not part of the law of Scotland, though it was ordered to be revised with other ancient laws of Scotland by parliaments of 1405 and 1407. Stair, Inst. 12, 508. So Craig, Inst. 1. 8. 11; Scott, Border Antiq. prose works, 7, 30; but Erskine, Inst. b. 1, tit. 1, § 32, and Ross, 60, maintain its authenticity. It is cited in some modern Scotch cases. 2 Swint. 409; 3 Bell, Hou. L. It is, according to Dr. Robertson, a servile copy of Glanville. Robertson, Hist. Charles V. 262.

REGICIDE (Lat. rex, king, cædere, to kill, slay). The killing of a king, and, by extension, of a queen. Théorie des Lois Criminelles, vol. 1, p. 300.

REGIDOR. In Spanish Law. One of a body, never exceeding twelve, who formed a part of the ayuntamiento, or municipal council, in every capital of a jurisdiction in the colonies of the Indies. The office of regidor was held for life; that is to say, during the pleasure of the supreme authority. In most places the office was purchased; in some cities, however, they were elected by persons of the district, called capitulares. 12 Pet. 442, note.

REGIMIENTO. In Spanish Law. The body of regidores, who never exceeded twelve, forming a part of the municipal council, or ayuntamiento, in every capital of a jurisdiction. 12 Pet. 442, note.

REGISTER. In Evidence. A book containing a record of facts as they occur, kept by public authority: a register of births, marriages, and burials.

Although not originally intended for the purposes of evidence, public registers are in general admissible to prove the facts to which they relate. In Pennsylvania, the registry of births, etc., made by any religious society in the state is evidence, by act of assembly, but it must be proved as at common law; 6 Binn. 416. A copy of the register of births and deaths of the Society of Friends in England, proved before the lord mayor of London by an ex parte affidavit, was allowed to be given in evidence to prove the death of a person; 1 Dall. 2; and a copy of a parish register in Barbadoes, certified to be a true copy by the rector, proved by the oath of a witness, taken before the deputy secretary of the island and notary public, under his hand and seal, was held admissible to prove pedigree, the handwriting and office of the secretary being proved; 10 S. & R. 383.

In North Carolina, a parish register of births, marriages, and deaths, kept pursuant to the statute of that state, is evidence of pedigree; 2 Murph. 47. In Connecticut, a parish register has been received in evidence; 2 Root, 99. See 15 Johns. 226; 1 Phill. Ev. 305; 1 Curt. 755; 6 Eccl. 452.

In Common Law. The certificate of registry granted to the person or persons entitled thereto, by the collector of the district, comprehending the port to which any ship or vessel shall belong; more properly, the registry itself. For the form, requisites, etc., of certificate of registry, see Acts of Cong. Dec. 31, 1792, 1 Stat. at L. 287, § 9, May 6, 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 69, § 4; Desty, Com. & Nav. § 4155; 3 Kent, 141. See 1 Cra. 158; 9 Pet. 682; 19 How. 76; 3 Wheat. 601; 1 Newb. 309; 1 Wash. C. C. 125; 1 Mas. 306; 1 Blatch. & H. 52.

REGISTER, REGISTRAR. An officer authorized by law to keep a record called a register or registry: as, the register for the probate of wills.

REGISTER'S COURT. In American Law. A court in the state of Pennsylvania which has jurisdiction in matters of probate. See PENNSYLVANIA.

REGISTER OF WRITS. A book preserved in the English court of chancery, in which were entered, from time to time, all forms of writs once issued. Stat. Westm. 2, c. 25.

It is spoken of as one of the most ancient books of the common law. Co. Litt. 159; Co. 4th Inst. 150; 8 Co. Pref.; 3 Shars. Bla. Com. 183*. It was first printed and published in the reign of Hen. VIII. This book is still an authority, as containing, in general, an accurate transcript of the forms of all writs as then framed, and as they ought still to be framed in modern practice.

But many of the writs now in use are not contained in it. And a variation from the register is not conclusive against the propriety of a form, if other sufficient authority can be adduced to prove its correctness. Steph. Pl. 7, 8.

REGISTRARIUS (Lat.). An ancient name given to a notary. In England this name is confined to designate the officer of some court the records or archives of which are in his custody.

REGISTRATION OF DEEDS. See RECORD.

REGISTRUM BREVIUM (Lat.). The name of an ancient book which was a collection of writs. See REGISTER OF WRITS.

REGISTRY. A book, authorized by law, in which writings are registered or recorded.

REGNAL YEARS. See KING.

REGNANT. One having authority as a king; one in the exercise of royal authority.

REGRATING. In Criminal Law. Every practice or device, by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other merchandise, is so denominated. Co. 3d Inst. 196; 1 Russell, Cr. 169.

REGULAR CLERGY. Monks who lived according to the rules of their respective houses or societies, in contradistinction to the parochial clergy, who did their duties "in seculo," and hence were called secular clergy. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 387, n.

REGULAR DEPOSIT. One where the thing deposited must be returned. It is distinguished from an irregular deposit.

REGULAR PROCESS. Regular process is that which has been lawfully issued by a court or magistrate having competent jurisdiction.

When the process is regular, and the defendant has been damnified, as in the case of a malicious arrest, his remedy is by an action on the case, and not trespass; when it is irregular, the remedy is by action of trespass.

If the process be wholly illegal or misapplied as to the person intended to be arrested, without regard to any question of fact, or whether innocent or guilty, or the existence of any debt, then the party imprisoned may legally resist the arrest and imprisonment, and may escape, be rescued, or even break prison; but if the process and imprisonment were in form legal, each of these acts would be punishable, however innocent the defendant might be, for he ought to submit to legal process and obtain his release by due course of law; 1 Chitty, Pr. 637; 5 East, 304, 308; 2 Wils. 47; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 310; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2. c. 19, ss. 1, 2. See ESCAPE; ARREST; ASSAULT.

When a party has been arrested on process which has afterwards been set aside for irregularity, he may bring an action of trespass, and recover damages as well against the attorney who issued it as the party; though such process will justify the officer who executed it; 8 Ad. & E. 449; 15 East, 615, note c; 2 Conn. 700; 11 Mass. 500; 6 Me. 421; 3 Gill & J. 377; 1 Bail. 441; 2 Litt. 234; 3 S. & R. 139; 12 Johns. 257. And see MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

REHABERE FACIAS SEISINAM (Lat. do you cause to regain seisin). When a sheriff in the "habere facias seisinam" had delivered seisin of more than he ought, this judicial writ lay to make him restore seisin of the excess. Reg. Jud. 13, 51, 54.

REHABILITATION. The act by which a man is restored to his former ability, of which he had been deprived by a conviction, sentence, or judgement of a competent tribunal.

REHEARING. A second consideration which the court gives to a cause on a second argument.

A rehearing takes place principally when the court has doubts on the subject to be decided; but it cannot be granted by the supreme court after the cause has been remitted to the court below to carry into effect the decree of the supreme court; 7 Wheat. 58. See REOPENING CASE.

REI INTERVENTUS (Lat.). When a party is imperfectly bound in an obligation, he may, in general, annul such imperfect obligation; but when he has permitted the opposite party to act as if his obligation or agreement were complete, such things have intervened as to deprive him of the right to rescind such obligation: these circumstances are the rei interventus; 1 Bell, Com. 328, 329, 5th ed.; Burton, Man. 128.

REINSURANCE. Insurance effected by an underwriter upon a subject against certain risks with another underwriter, on the same subject, against all or a part of the same risks, not exceeding the same amount. In the original insurance, he is the insurer; in the second, the assured. His object in reinsurance is to protect himself against the risks which he has assumed. There is no privity of contract between the original assured and the reinsurer, and the reinsurer is under no liability to such original assured; 3 Kent, 227; 1 Phill. Ins. § 78 a, 404; 20 Barb. 468; 23 Penn. 250; 9 Ind. 443; 13 La. An. 246.

REISSUABLE NOTES. Bank-notes which, after having been once paid, may again be put into circulation.

They cannot properly be called valuable securities while in the hands of the maker, but, in an indictment, may properly be called goods and chattels; Ry. & M. 218. See 5 Mas. 537; 2 Russ. Cr. 147. And such notes would fall within the description of promissory notes; 2 Leach, 1090, 1093.

REISSUE; REISSUED PATENT. See PATENT.

REJOINDER. In Pleading. The defendant's answer to the plaintiff's replication.

It must conform to the plea; 16 Mass. 1; 2 Mod. 343; be triable, certain, direct, and positive, and not by way of recital, or argumentative; 1 H. & M'H. 159; must answer every material averment of the declaration; 23 N. H. 198. It must not be double; 6 Blackf. 421; 3 McLean, 163; and there may not be several rejoinders to the same replication; 1 How. Miss. 139; 1 Wms. Saund. 337, n.; nor repugnant or insensible; see Co. Litt. 304; Archb. Civ. Pl. 278; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (R).

REJOINING GRATIS. Rejoining within four days from the delivery of the replication, without a notice to rejoin or demand of rejoinder. 1 Archb. Pr. 280, 317; 10 M. & W. 12. But judgment cannot be signed without demanding; 3 Dowl. 537.

RELATION (Lat. re, back, fero, to bear). In Civil Law. The report which the judges made of the proceedings in certain suits to the prince were so called.

These relations took place when the judge had no law to direct him, or when the laws were susceptible of difficulties; it was then referred to the prince, who was the author of the law, to give the interpretation. They were made in writing, and contained the pleadings of the parties and all the proceedings, together with the judge's opinion, and prayed the emperor to order what should be done. This ordinance of the prince thus required was called a rescript. Their use was abolished by Justinian, Nov. 125.

In Contracts. When an act is done at one time, and it operates upon the thing as if done at another time, it is said to do so by relation: as, if a man deliver a deed as an escrow, to be delivered, by the party holding it, to the grantor, on the performance of some act, the delivery to the latter will have relation back to the first delivery. Termes de la Ley. Again, if a partner be adjudged a bankrupt, the partnership is dissolved, and such dissolution relates back to the time when the commission issued; 3 Kent, 33. See Litt. 462–466; 2 Johns. 510; 15 id. 309; 2 Harr. & J. 151; FICTION.

RELATIONS. A term which, in its widest sense, includes all the kindred of the person spoken of. It has long been settled that in the construction of wills it includes those persons who are entitled as next of kin under the statute of distribution; 2 Jarm. Wills. 661; 54 Me. 291; L. R. 20 Eq. 410; in the interpretation of a statute, the term was held not to include a stepson; 108 Mass. 382; or a wife; 101 id. 36.

A legacy to "relations" generally, or to "relations by blood or marriage," without enumerating any of them, will, therefore, entitle to a share such of the testator's relatives as would be entitled under the statute of distributions in the event of intestacy; 1 Madd. 45; 1 Bro. C. C. 33. The same rule extends to devises of real estate; 1 Taunt. 263.

Relations to either of the parties, even beyond the ninth degree, have been holden incapable to serve on juries; 3 Chitty, Pr. 795, note c. Relationship or affinity is no objection to a witness, unless in the case of husband and wife. See WITNESS.

RELATIVE. One connected with another by blood or affinity; a relation; a kinsman or kinswoman. In an adjective sense, having relation or connection with some other person or thing: as, relative rights, relative powers.

RELATIVE POWERS. Those which relate to land: so called to distinguish them from those which are collateral to it.

These powers are appendant: as, where a tenant for life has a power of making leases in possession. They are in gross when a person has an estate in the land, with a power of appointment, the execution of which falls out of the compass of his estate, but, notwithstanding, is annexed in privity to it, and takes effect in the appointee out of an interest appointed in the appointer. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1930.

RELATIVE RIGHTS. Those to which a person is entitled in consequence of his relation with others; such as the rights of a husband in relation to his wife; of a father as to his children; of a master as to his servant; of a guardian as to his ward.

In general, the superior may maintain an action for an injury committed against his relative rights. See 2 Bouvier, Inst. nn. 2277–2296; 3 id. n. 3491; 4 id. nn. 3615–3618; ACTION.

RELATOR. A rehearser or teller. One who, by leave of court, brings an information in the nature of a quo warranto.

At common law, strictly speaking, no such person as a relator to an information is known, he being a creature of the statute of Anne, c. 20. In this country, even where no statute similar to that of Anne prevails, informations are allowed to be filed by private persons desirous to try their rights, in the name of the attorney-general, and these are commonly called relators; though no judgment for costs can be rendered for or against them; 5 Mass. 231; 3 S. & R. 52; 15 id. 127; Ang. Corp. 470. In chancery, the relator is responsible for costs; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4022.

RELEASE. The giving up or abandoning a claim or right to the person against whom the claim exists or the right is to be exercised or enforced.

Releases may either give up, discharge, or abandon a right of action, or convey a man's interest or right to another who has possession of it or some estate in the same. Shepp. Touchst. 320: Littleton, 444; Nelson, Abr.; Bacon, Abr.; Viner, Abr.; Rolle, Abr. In the former class a mere right is surrendered; in the other not only a right is given up, but an interest in the estate is conveyed and becomes vested in the release.

An express release is one directly made in terms by deed or other suitable means.

An implied release is one which arises from acts of the creditor or owner, without any express agreement. See Pothier, Obl. nn. 608, 609.

A release by operation of law is one which, though not expressly made, the law presumes in consequence of some act of the releasor; for instance, when one of several joint obligors is expressly released, the others are also released by operation of law; 3 Salk. 298; Hob. 10, 66; 4 Mod. 380; 7 Johns. 207.

Releases of claims which constitute a cause of action acquit the releasee, and remove incompetency as a witness resulting from interest.

Littleton says a release of all demands is the best and strongest release; sect. 508. Lord Coke, on the contrary, says claims is a stronger word; Co. Litt. 291 b.

In general, the words of a release will be restrained by the particular occasion of giving it; 1 Lev. 235; 3 id. 273; T. Raym. 399.

The reader is referred to the following cases where a construction has been given to the expressions mentioned. A release of "all actions, suits, and demands;" 3 Mod. 277; "all actions, debts, duties, and demands;" id. 1, 64; 8 Co. 150 b; 2 Saund. 6 a; "all demands;" 5 Co. 70 b; 1 Lev. 99; Salk. 578; 2 Rolle, 20; 2 Conn. 120; "all actions, quarrels, trespasses;" Dy. 2171, pl. 2; Cro. Jac. 487; "all errors, and all actions, suits, and writs of error whatsoever;" T. Raym. 399; "all suits;" 8 Co. 150; "of covenants;" 5 Co. 70 b.

A release by a witness where he has an interest in the matter which is the subject of the suit, or release by the party on whose side he is interested, renders him competent; 1 Phill. Ev. 102, and the cases cited in n. a. See Chitty, Bail. 329; 1 Dowl. & R. 361.

In Estates. The conveyance of a man's interest or right which he hath unto a thing to another that hath the possession thereof or some estate therein. Shepp. Touchst. 320. The relinquishment of some right or benefit to a person who has already some interest in the tenement, and such interest as qualifies him for receiving or availing himself of the right or benefit so relinquished. Burton, R. P. 15*.

The words generally used in such conveyance are "remised, released, and forever quit-claimed." Littleton, § 445.

Releases of land are, in respect of their operation, divided into five sorts: releases that enure by way of passing the estate, or mitter l'estate (q. v.), e. g. a release by joint-tenant to co-joint-tenant, which conveyance will pass a fee without words of limitation. Releases that enure by way of passing the right, or mitter le droit: e.g. by disseisee to disseisor. Releases that enure by enlargement of the estate.

Here there must be an actual privity of estate at the time between releasor and releasee, who must have an estate actually vested in him capable of enlargement.

Releases that enure by way of extinguishment: e. g. a lord releasing his seignorial rights to his tenant.

Releases that enure by way of feoffment and entry: e.g. if there are two disseisors, a release to one will give him a sole estate, as if the disseisee had regained seisin by entry and enfeoffed him. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 325*. See 4 Cruise, Dig. 71; Gilb. Ten. 82; Co. Litt. 264; 3 Brock. 185; 2 Sumn. 487; 8 Pick. 143; 5 Harr. & J. 158; 2 N. H. 402; 10 Johns. 456.

The technicalities of English law as to releases are not generally applicable in the United States. The corresponding conveyance is a quit-claim deed. 2 Bouvier, Inst. 416; 21 Ala. N. s. 125.

RELEASEE. A person to whom a release is made.

RELEASOR. He who makes a release.

RELEGATIO (Lat.). A kind of banishment known to the civil law, which did not take away the rights of citizenship, which deportatio did.

Some say that relegatio was temporary, deportatio perpetual; that relegatio did not take away the property of the exile, and that deportatio did; but these distinctions do not seem always to exist. There was one sort of relegatio for slaves, viz. in agras; another for freemen, viz. in provincias. Relegatio only exiled from certain limits; deportatio confined to a particular place (locus pœnæ). Calvinus, Lex.

RELEVANCY. Applicability to the issue joined. That quality of evidence which renders it properly applicable in determining the truth and falsity of the matters in issue between the parties to a suit. See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49; Steph. Ev.

RELICTA VERIFICATIONE (Lat. his pleading being abandoned).

In Pleading. A confession of judgment made after plea pleaded: viz. a cognovit actionem accompanied by a withdrawal of the plea.

RELICTION (Lat. relinquo, to leave behind). An increase of the land by the retreat or recession of the sea or a river.

Lands left dry by the sudden and sensible recession of the sea, or of a river which flows and re-flows with the tide, belong to the sovereign or state, unless the property in the land so relicted has been granted to individuals. In other words, the right of property in the soil is not changed by such change of the water. But where the recession is gradual and insensible, or where it takes place in fresh-water rivers, the soil of which belongs to the riparian proprietors, the lands so relicted belong to the proprietors of the estates which are thereby increased; Woolr. Wat. 29–36; Schultes, Aqu. Rights, 138; Ang. Tide-Wat. 264–267; 3 B. & C. 91; 9 Conn. 41; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 485; 13 N. Y. 296; 5 Bingh. 163. But this reliction must be from the sea in its usual state; for if it should inundate the land and then recede, this would be no reliction; Ang. Tide-Wat. ub. sup.; Hargr. Tracts, 15; 16 Viner, Abr. 574. See RIVER.

Where the sea cut off the sea front of the main land between certain points and afterwards a beach was reformed outside the main land, and divided from it by a bay of navigable water, it was held that the title to the new formation was in the owners of the part cut off; 61 How. Pr. 197.

In this country it has been decided that if a navigable lake recede gradually and insensibly, the derelict land belongs to the adjacent riparian proprietors; but if the recession be sudden and sensible, such land belongs to the state; 1 Hawks, 56; 1 Gill & J. 249. See AVULSION; ALLUVION.

RELIEF. A sum payable by the new tenant, the duty being incident to every feudal tenure, by way of fine or composition with the lord for taking up the estate which was lapsed or fallen in by the death of the last tenant. At one time the amount was arbitrary; but afterwards the relief of a knight's fee became fixed at one hundred shillings. 2 Bla. Com. 65.

RELIGION (Lat. re, back, ligo, to bind). Real piety in practice, consisting in the performance of all known duties to God and our fellow-men. The constitution of the United States provides that "congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This provision and that relating to religious tests (q. v.) are limitations upon the power of congress only; Cooley, Const. 205; perhaps the fourteenth amendment may give additional securities if needful; id. By establishment of religion is meant the setting up of a state church, or at least the conferring upon one church of special favors which are denied to others; 1 Tuck. Bla. Com. App. 296; 2 id. App. n. G. The Christian religion is, of course, recognized by the government, yet not so as to draw invidious distinctions between different religious beliefs, etc.; Cooley, Const. 206. With the exception of these provisions, the preservation of religious liberty is left to the states. The various state guarantees may be summed up as follows: 1. They establish a system, not of toleration merely, but of religious equality. 2. They exempt all persons from compulsory support of religious worship, and from compulsory attendance on the same. 3. They forbid restraints upon the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, or upon the free expression of religious opinions; Cooley, Const. 206. See Cooley, Const. Lim. ch. 13. See CHARITIES; CHARITABLE USES; RELIGIOUS TEST.

RELIGIOUS MEN (L. Lat. religiosi). Such as entered into some monastery or convent. In old English deeds, the vendee was often restrained from aliening to "Jews or religious men," lest the lands should fall into mortmain. Religious men were civilly dead. Blount.

RELIGIOUS TEST. The constitution of the United States declares that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." This clause was introduced for the double purpose of satisfying the scruples of many respectable persons who feel an invincible repugnance to any religious test or affirmation, and to cut off forever every pretence of any alliance between church and state in the national government. Story, Const. § 1841. See RELIGION.

RELIGIOUS USE. See CHARITABLE USES.

RELINQUISHMENT. In Practice. A forsaking, abandoning, or giving over a right: for example, a plaintiff may relinquish a bad count in a declaration, and proceed on a good; a man may relinquish a part of his claim in order to give a court jurisdiction.

RELOCATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A renewal of a lease on its determination on like terms as before. It may be either express or tacit; the latter is when the tenant holds over with the knowledge and without objection of the landlord. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 379.

REMAINDER. The remnant of an estate in land, depending upon a particular prior estate created at the same time and by the same instrument and limited to arise immediately on the determination of that estate and not in abridgment of it. 4 Kent, 197.

A contingent remainder is one which is limited to an uncertain or dubious person or which is to take effect on an event or condition which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding particular estate. A vested remainder is one by which a present interest passes to the party, though perhaps to be enjoyed in future, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate has been spent. See CONTINGENT REMAINDER; CROSS-REMAINDER; EXECUTORY DEVISE; LIMITATION; REVERSION.

REMAINDER-MAN. One who is entitled to the remainder of the estate after a particular estate carved out of it has expired.

REMAND (Lat. re, back, mando, to command). When a prisoner is brought before a judge on a habeas corpus, for the purpose of obtaining his liberty, the judge hears the case, and either discharges him or not: when there is cause for his detention, he remands him.

REMANDING A CAUSE. In Practice. The sending it back to the same court out of which it came, for the purpose of having some action on it there. March, 100.

REMANENT PRO DEFECTU EMPTORUM (Lat. remanent, they remain, pro defectu, through lack, emptorum, of buyers). In Practice. The return made by the sheriff to a writ of execution when he has not been able to sell the property seized, that the same remains unsold for want of buyers; in that case the plaintiff is entitled to a venditioni exponas. Comyns, Dig. Execution (C 8).

REMANET (Lat.). In Practice. The causes which are entered for trial, and which cannot be tried during the term, are remanets. Lee, Dict. Trial; 1 Sell. Pr. 434; 1 Phillipps, Ev. 4.

REMEDIAL. That which affords a remedy: as, a remedial statute, or one which is made to supply some defects or abridge some superfluities of the common law. 1 Bla. Com. 86. The term remedial statute is also applied to those acts which give a new remedy. Esp. Pen. Act. 1.

REMEDY. The means employed to enforce a right or redress an injury.

Remedies for non-fulfilment of contracts are generally by action, see ACTION; ASSUMPSIT; COVENANT; DEBT; DETINUE; or in equity, in some cases, by bill for specific performance. Remedies for the redress of injuries are either public, by indictment, when the injury to the individual or to his property affects the public, or private, when the tort is only injurious to the individual. See INDICTMENT; FELONY; MERGER; TORTS; CIVIL REMEDY.

Remedies are preventive which seek compensation, or which have for their object punishment. The preventive, or removing, or abating remedies may be by acts of the party aggrieved or by the intervention of legal proceedings: as in the case of injuries to the person or to personal or real property, defence, resistance, recaption, abatement of nuisance, and surety of the peace, or injunction in equity, and perhaps some others. Remedies for compensation may be either by the acts of the party aggrieved, or summarily before justices, or by arbitration, or action, or suit at law or in equity. Remedies which have for their object punishments or compensation and punishments are either summary proceedings before magistrates, or indictment, etc.

Remedies are specific and cumulative: the former are those which can alone be applied to restore a right or punish a crime: for example, where a statute makes unlawful what was lawful before, and gives a particular remedy, that is specific, and must be pursued, and no other; Cro. Jac. 644; 1 Salk. 45; 2 Burr. 803. But when an offence was antecedently punishable by a common-law proceeding, as by indictment, and a statute prescribes a particular remedy, there such particular remedy is cumulative, and proceedings may be had at common law or under the statute; 1 Saund. 134, n. 4.

The maxim ubi jus, ibi remedium, has been considered so valuable that it gave occasion to the first invention of that form of action called an action on the case; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 472. The novelty of the particular complaint alleged in an action on the case, is no objection, provided there appears to have been an injury to the plaintiff cognizable by law; 2 Wils. 146; 3 Term, 63; Willes, 577; 2 M. & W. 519.

REMEMBRANCERS. In English Law. Officers of the exchequer, whose duty it is to remind the lord-treasurer and the justices of that court of such things as are to be called and attended to for the benefit of the crown.

REMISE, RELEASE, AND QUIT-CLAIM. The ordinary effective words in a release. These words are, in this country, sufficient to pass the estate in a primary conveyance; 7 Conn. 250; 24 N. H. 460; 21 Ala. N. S. 125; 7 N. Y. 422. Remise is a French word synonymous with release. See QUIT-CLAIM.

REMISSION (Lat. re, back, mitto, to send).

In Civil Law. A release of a debt.

It is conventional when it is expressly granted to the debtor by a creditor having a capacity to alienate; or tacit, when the creditor voluntarily surrenders to his debtor the original title, under private signature constituting the obligation. La. Civ. Code, art. 2195.

Forgiveness or pardon of an offence.

It has the effect of putting back the offender into the same situation he was before the commission of the offence. Remission is generally granted in cases where the offence was involuntary or committed in self-defence. Pothier, Pr. Civ. sect. 7, art. 2, § 2.

At Common Law. The act by which a forfeiture or penalty is forgiven. 10 Wheat. 246.

REMIT. To annul a fine or forfeiture.

This is generally done by the courts where they have a discretion by law: as, for example, when a juror is fined for non-attendance in court, after being duly summoned, and, on appearing, he produces evidences to the court that he was sick and unable to attend, the fine will be remitted by the court.

In Commercial Law. To send money, bills, or something which will answer the purpose of money.

REMITTANCE. In Commercial Law. Money sent by one merchant to another, either in specie, bill of exchange, draft, or otherwise.

REMITTEE. A person to whom a remittance is made. Story, Bailm. § 75.

REMITTER. To be placed back in possession.

When one having a right to lands is out of possession, and afterwards the freehold is cast upon him by some defective title, and he enters by virtue of that title, the law remits him to his ancient and more certain right, and, by an equitable fiction, supposes him to have gained possession under it; 3 Bla. Com. 190; Comyns, Dig. Remitter.

REMITTIT DAMNA (Lat. he releases damages). An entry on the record, by which the plaintiff declares that he remits the damages or a part of the damages which have been awarded him by the jury, is so called.

In some cases a misjoinder of actions may be cured by the entry of a remittit damna; Chitty, Pl. 207.

REMITTITUR DAMNUM or DAMNA. In Practice. The act of the plaintiff upon the record, whereby he abates or remits the excess of damages found by the jury beyond the sum laid in the declaration. See 1 Saund. 285, n. 6; 4 Conn. 109.

REMITTITUR OF RECORD. After a record has been removed to the supreme court, and a judgment has been rendered, it is to be remitted or sent back to the court below, for the purpose of re-trying the cause, when the judgment has been reversed, or of issuing an execution when it has been affirmed. The act of so returning the record, and the writ issued for that purpose, bear the name of remittitur.

REMITTOR. A person who makes a remittance to another.

REMONSTRANCE. A petition to a court or deliberative or legislative body, in which those who have signed it request that something which is in contemplation to perform shall not be done.

REMOTE. At a distance; afar off. See CAUSA PROXIMA; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES. It is provided by statute that causes may be removed from state to federal courts where the amount in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars, in the following cases:—

1. Where the suit is against an alien, or is by a citizen of the state wherein it is brought and against a citizen of another state, it may be removed on petition of the defendant.

2. Where the suit is against an alien and a citizen of the state wherein it is brought, or is by a citizen of such state against a citizen of the same and a citizen of another state, it may be removed as against such alien or citizen of another state on his petition, and the case may proceed in the state court as against the other defendant or defendants.

3. Where the suit is between a citizen of the state in which it is brought and a citizen of another state, it may be removed on petition of the latter, be he plaintiff or defendant, on his filing an affidavit that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court; Acts of Sept. 24, 1879; July 27, 1866; March 2, 1867; May 3, 1875; R. S. § 639. Also, any suit commenced against any corporation other than a banking corporation organized under a law of the United States, or against any member thereof, as such member, for any alleged liability of such corporation; or such member as a member thereof may be removed on petition of the defendant, verified by oath, stating such defendant has a defence arising under or by virtue of the constitution, or any treaty or law of the United States; Act of July 27, 1866; July 27, 1868; R. S. § 640.

Also, when any civil suit or criminal prosecution is commenced in any state court, for any cause whatsoever, against any person who is denied or cannot enforce in the judicial tribunals of the state, or in the part of the state where such suit or prosecution is pending, any right secured to him, by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens of the United States, or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, or against any officer, civil or military, or other person, for any arrest or imprisonment, or other trespasses or wrongs, made or committed by virtue of or under color of authority derived from any law providing for equal rights as aforesaid, or for refusing to do any act on the ground that it would be inconsistent with such law,—such suit or prosecution may, upon the petition of the defendant, filed in said state court at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause, stating the facts, and verified by oath, be removed for trial into the next circuit court to be held in the district where it is pending; Acts Mar. 3, 1863; April 9, 1866; May 11, 1866; May 31, 1870; R. S. § 641.

Also, when any suit or criminal prosecution is commenced in any court of a state against any officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States, or against any person acting under or by authority of such officer on account of any act done under color of his office or of any such law, or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed by such officer or person under such law, or is commenced against any person holding property or estate by title derived from any such officer, and affects the validity of any such revenue law, or is commenced against any officer of the United States, or other person, on account of any act done under the provisions of the laws of congress respecting the elective franchise, or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed by such officer or other person under any of said provisions,—such suit or prosecution may be removed for trial into the circuit court of the United States for the district, upon the petition of the defendant setting forth the nature of the suit or prosecution, and duly verified; Acts Mar. 2, 1833; July 13, 1866; Feb. 28, 1871; Mar. 3, 1875; R. S. § 643.

Also, whenever a personal action is brought in any state court by an alien against a citizen of a state who is, or when the action accrued was, a civil officer of the United States, being a non-resident of the state where suit is brought, the action may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the district, in the manner provided for the cases last above mentioned. A subsequent section makes provision for the removal of a cause from the state court where the party claims land in dispute under a grant from another state than that in which suit is brought; Acts Mar. 30, 1872; Mar. 3, 1875; Sept. 29, 1789; R. S. §§ 644, 647.

The cognizance over cases removed to the federal court has been referred to the appellate jurisdiction; on the ground that the suit is not instituted in that court by original process; 1 Wheat. 304; but this jurisdiction has been more accurately characterized as "original jurisdiction acquired indirectly by a removal from the state court;" 5 Blatchf. 336; 6 id. 362. The validity of the legislation on this subject has been repeatedly affirmed; 92 U. S. 10; 100 id. 257; 77 N. C. 530; 28 Ohio St. 208. And it has been further decided that when the terms upon which the right is given have been complied with, the right of removal cannot be defeated by state legislation; 20 Wall. 445. But a state has the right to impose conditions, not in conflict with the constitution or the laws of the United States, on the transaction of business within its territory by a foreign corporation, or having given a license, to revoke it with or without cause; it may therefore require foreign corporations to forego their right of removal, or cease to do business within the state; 94 U. S. 535; 40 Wisc. 220.

When the controversy about which a suit in the state court is brought is between citizens of one or more states on one side, and citizens of other states on the other side, either party may remove the suit to the circuit court, without regard to the position they occupy as plaintiffs or defendants; 100 U. S. 457. In order to bar the right of removal upon the ground that the trial in the state court has commenced, it must appear that such trial is actually in progress, when the application is made; id. A party who, failing to obtain a removal of the suit, is forced to trial, loses none of his rights; 19 Wall. 214; 100 U. S. 457; 101 id. 184, 289, 610; 1 Fed. Rep. 541.

The right of removal under R. S. § 641, supra, is authorized only upon petition setting forth infractions of the 14th amendment to the constitution previous to the trial and final hearing of the cause, and has no applicability to those occurring after the trial or final hearing has commenced. This section was drawn only with reference to state action, and has no reference to individual violations of rights; 100 U. S. 313.

If the case, whether civil or criminal, be one to which the judicial power of the United States extends, its removal to the federal court does not invade state jurisdiction. A case arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, wherever its correct decision as to the right, privilege, claim, protection, or defence of a party, in whole or in part, depends upon the construction of either. It is in the power of congress to give the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of such a case, although it may involve other questions of fact or law; Dillon, Rem. Causes, 47; 100 U. S. 257.

A motion under a state statute as to corporations, for execution against a stockholder, cannot be removed; 5 Dillon, 223. A proceeding by mandamus to compel the register of the transfer of stock may be removed; id. 489; but not on a plea which raises the issue of title to an office; 29 La. An. 899; nor an action in the nature of quo warranto to determine the title to office of presidential electors; 8 So. C. 382. Suits by attachment may be removed; 5 Blatchf. 107; 2 Curt. C. C. 212; ejectment actions; 3 Wall. Jr. 258, 263; a bill in equity to reform an insurance policy; 6 Blatchf. 208; a suit to annul a will; 92 U. S. 10; a railway foreclosure suit; 6 Biss. 529. An action of tort against several defendants for a conspiracy cannot be removed by a part of them; 40 Ala. 639. Where the suit is in its nature an equitable proceeding, it must proceed as such in the federal court, and in accordance with the rules governing equity cases in such court without regard to the system in the state court; 18 How. 268; 23 id. 484. Where the suit unites legal and equitable questions of relief or defence, a repleader is necessary after removal; 1 Dillon, 290; 8 Blatchf. 299; 15 id. 432; 15 Wall. 573. The circuit court may issue a certiorari to bring in the record from the state courts; 4 Dillon, 1. It is not sufficient that the value in dispute be precisely $500; it must exceed that sum; 4 Wall. 163; 47 Ind. 532. Under the act of 1789, the petition must be filed at the time of entering appearance; 6 Wall. 139; under the acts of 1866 and 1867, the petition may be filed at any time before final trial or hearing; Dillon, Rem. Causes, § 59; even after a new trial granted; 21 Wall. 41; but see 112 Mass.

339. Under the act of 1875, it must be filed before or at the term at which the cause could be first tried and before the trial thereof.

When the state court asserts jurisdiction after a proper application for removal, the question is not waived by the party entitled to the removal by reason of his appearing and contesting the matter in dispute; 19 Wall. 214. He may take an appeal, should the decision be against him, to the highest court of the state, and failing there, to the supreme court of the United States. In the event of his obtaining a decision in favor of removal there, the judgment of the state court will be reversed and an order made to transfer the case to the circuit court for trial on the merits; 92 U. S. 10. If a cause be improperly removed and the circuit court entertains jurisdiction improperly, its judgment will be reversed by the supreme court with directions to the circuit court to remand the same to the state court; 20 Wall. 117. See Dillon, Rem. of Causes; Cooley, Const. 122.

REMOVAL FROM OFFICE. A deprivation of office by the act of a competent officer or of the legislature. It may be express, that is, by a notification that the officer has been removed, or implied, by the appointment of another person to the same office; Wall. Jr. 118. See 13 Pet. 130; 1 Cra. 137.

REMOVER. In Practice. A transfer of a suit or cause out of one court into another, which is effected by writ of error, certiorari, and the like. 11 Co. 41.

REMUNERATION. Reward; recompense; salary. Dig. 17. 1. 7.

RENDER. To yield; to return; to give again: it is the reverse of prender.

RENDEZVOUS. A place appointed for meeting. Especially used of places appointed for the meeting of ships and their convoy, and for the meeting of soldiers.

RENEWAL. A change of something old for something new; as, the renewal of a note; the renewal of a lease. See NOVATION; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 800.

RENOUNCE. To give up a right: for example, an executor may renounce the right of administering the estate of the testator; a widow, the right to administer to her intestate husband's estate.

RENOUNCING PROBATE. Giving up the right to be executor of a will, wherein he has been appointed to that office, by refusing to take out probate of such will. 1 Will. Exec. 230, 231; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, § 79; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94, § 16.

RENT. (Lat. reditus, a return.) A return or compensation for the possession of some corporeal inheritance, and is a certain profit, either in money, provisions, or labor, issuing out of lands and tenements, in return for their use.

The compensation, either in money, provisions, chattels, or labor, received by the owner of the soil from the occupant thereof. Jacks. & Gross, Landl. & T. § 38.

It has been held that a rent may issue out of lands and tenements corporeal, and also, out of them and their furniture, in this case a dairy farm with its stock and utensils; 31 Penn. 20; see as to furnished lodgings; 5 B. & P. 224; 5 Co. 16 b.

Some of its common-law properties are that it must be a profit to the proprietor, certain in its character, or capable of being reduced to a certainty, issuing yearly, that is, periodically, out of the thing granted, and not be part of the land or thing itself; Co. Litt. 47; 2 Bla. Com. 41.

At common law there were three species of rent: rent service, having some corporeal service attached to the tenure of the land, to which the right of distress was necessarily incident; rent charge, which was a reservation of rent, with a clause authorizing its collection by distress; and rent seek, where there was no such clause, but the rent could only be collected by an ordinary action at law. These distinctions, however, for all practical purposes, have become obsolete, in consequence of various statutes both in England and in this country, allowing every kind of rent to be distrained for without distinction. See Tayl. Landl. & T. § 370.

The payment of rent is incident to every tenancy where the relation of landlord and tenant subsists, except as to mere tenancies at will or by sufferance, where this relation cannot be said to exist. And no tenant can resist a demand for rent unless he shows that he has been evicted or become otherwise entitled to quit the premises, and has actually done so, before the rent in question became due. By the strictness of the common law, when a tenant has once made an agreement to pay rent, nothing will excuse him from continuing to pay, although the premises should be reduced to a ruinous condition by some unavoidable accident of fire, flood, or tempest; 6 Mass. 63; 4 Harr. & J. 564; 72 Penn. 285; 39 Cal. 151; 3 Johns. 44; 1 Term, 310; 2 Ld. Raym. 1477; 9 Price, 294.

But this severity of the ancient law has been somewhat abated in this country, and in this respect conforms to the more reasonable provisions of the Code Napoléon, art. 1722, which declares that if the thing hired is destroyed by fortuitous events, during the continuance of the lease, the contract of hiring is rescinded, but if it be only destroyed in part, the lessee may, according to circumstances, demand either a diminution of the rent or a rescission of the contract itself. The same provision is to be found substantially in the Code of Louisiana, art. 2667, and in the act of the legislature of New York of 1860. In South Carolina and Pennsylvania it was decided that a tenant who had been dispossessed by a public enemy ought not to pay rent for the time the possession was withheld from him; and in Maryland it has been held that where a hurricane rendered a house untenable it was a good defence to an action for rent. But these cases are evidently exceptions to the general rule of law above stated; 1 Bay, 499; 5 Watts, 517; 4 M'Cord, 447. Where land has been swept away or gained upon by the sea, the lessee is no longer liable for rent; Bac. Abr. 63; Rolle, Abr. 236.

The quiet enjoyment of the premises, unmolested by the landlord, is an implied condition to the payment of rent. If, therefore, he ousts the tenant from any considerable portion of the premises, or erects a nuisance of any description upon or so near to them as to oblige the tenant to remove, or if the possession of the land should be recovered by a third person, by a title superior to that of the landlord, the dispossession in either case amounts to an eviction, and discharges the obligation to pay rent; 2 Ired. 350; 3 Harr. N. J. 364; 4 Wend. 432; 4 Leigh, 484; 4 N. Y. 217; 1 Ld. Raym. 77; 1 M. & W. 747; 91 Penn. 322; 106 Mass. 201; 54 N. H. 426; 49 Vt. 109; 31 Ala. 412. By retaining possession of premises in spite of such acts of his landlord as would otherwise amount to an eviction, a tenant waives his right to withhold the rent; 112 Mass. 8; 20 N. Y. 32.

As rent issues out of the land, it is said to be incident to the reversion, and the right to demand it necessarily attaches itself to the ownership, and follows a transfer of the premises, and the several parts thereof, without the consent of the occupant. Every occupant is chargeable with rent by virtue of his occupation, whether he be the tenant or an assignee of the tenant. The original tenant cannot avoid his liability by transferring his lease to another, but his assignee is only liable so long as he remains in possession, and may discharge himself by the simple act of assigning over to some one else; 14 Wend. N. Y. 63; 1 N. & M'C. 104; 12 Pick. 460; 4 Leigh, 69; 2 Ohio, 221; 1 Wash. C. C. 375; 1 Rawle, 155; 3 B. & Ald. 396; 11 Ad. & E. 403; Cro. Eliz. 256; Co. Litt. 46 b; 2 Atk. 546; 3 Campb. 394. When rent will be apportioned, see APPORTIONMENT; LANDLORD AND TENANT.

The day of payment depends, in the first instance, upon the contract: if this is silent in that respect, rent is payable quarterly or half-yearly, according to the custom of the country; but if there be no usage governing the case, it is not due until the end of the term. Formerly it was payable before sunset of the day whereon it was to be paid, on the reasonable ground that sufficient light should remain to enable the parties to count the money; but now it is not considered due until midnight or the last minute of the natural day on which it is made payable; 36 Penn. 272. This rule, however, may be varied by the custom of different places; Co. Litt. 202 a; 15 Pick. 147; 5 S. & R. 432. And see FORFEITURE; RE-ENTRY.

Interest accrues on rent from the time it is due, but cannot be included in a distress; 17 S. & R. 390.

When rent is payable in money, it must strictly be paid in legal-tender money; with respect to foreign coin he may decline to receive it except by its true weight and value. Bank-notes constitute part of the currency of the country, and ordinarily pass as money, and are a good tender, unless specially objected to by the creditor at the time of the offer; 10 Wheat. 347. Payment may be made in commodities, when so reserved. If the contract specifies a place of payment, a tender of rent, whether in money or in kind, must be made at that place; but, if no place is specified, a tender of either on the land will be sufficient to prevent a forfeiture; 16 Term, 222; 10 N. Y. 80; 4 Taunt. 555; DISTRESS; RE-ENTRY; GROUND-RENT.

RENT CHARGE. A rent reserved with a power of enforcing its payment by distress.

RENT ROLL. A list of rents payable to a particular person or public body.

RENT SECK. A rent collectible only by action at law in case of non-payment.

RENT SERVICE. A rent embracing some corporal service attendant upon the tenure of the land. Distress was necessarily incident to such a rent.

RENT, ISSUES, AND PROFITS. The profits arising from property generally. This phrase in the Vermont statute has been held not to cover "yearly profits;" 26 Vt. 741.

RENTAL. A roll or list of the rents of an estate, containing the description of the lands let, the names of the tenants, and other particulars connected with such estate. This is the same as rent-roll, from which it is said to be corrupted.

RENTE. In French Law. A word nearly synonymous with our word annuity.

RENTE FONCIERE. In French Law. A rent which issues out of land; and it is of its essence that it be perpetual, for if it be made but for a limited time it is a lease. It may, however, be extinguished. La. Civ. Code, art. 2750, 2759; Pothier. See GROUND-RENT.

RENTE VIAGERE. In French Law. An annuity for life. La. Civ. Code, art. 2764; Pothier, Rente, n. 215.

RENUNCIATION. The act of giving up a right.

It is a rule of law that any one may renounce a right which the law has established in his favor. To this maxim there are many limitations. A party may always renounce an acquired right: as, for example, to take lands by descent; but one cannot always give up a future right before it has accrued, nor the benefit conferred by law, although such advantage may be introduced only for the benefit of individuals.

For example, the power of making a will, the right of annulling a future contract on the ground of fraud, and the right of pleading the act of limitations, cannot be renounced. The first, because the party must be left free to make a will or not; and the latter two, because the right has not yet accrued.

This term is usually employed to signify the abdication or giving up of one's country at the time of choosing another. The act of congress requires from a foreigner who applies to become naturalized a renunciation of all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof such alien may at the time be a citizen or subject. See Morse, Citizenship; CITIZEN; EXPATRIATION; NATURALIZATION.

REOPENING CASE. A court of equity, in the exercise of a sound discretion, has full power to reopen a case, and allow the correction of mistakes in testimony. Such applications are not favored, however, and, when granted, must be based upon strong circumstances to justify a deviation from the general rule; 93 Penn. 214; Adams, Eq. 372; 8 Phila. 380. See REHEARING.

REPAIRS. That work which is done to an estate to keep it in good order.

What a party is bound to do, when the law imposes upon him the duty to make necessary repairs, does not appear to be very accurately defined. Natural and unavoidable decay in the buildings must always be allowed for, when there is no express covenant to the contrary; and it seems the lessee will satisfy the obligation the law imposes on him by delivering the premises at the expiration of his tenancy in a habitable state. Questions in relation to repairs most frequently arise between the landlord and tenant.

When there is no express agreement between the parties, the tenant is always required to do the necessary repairs; Woodf. Landl. & T. 244; 6 Cow. 475. He is, therefore, bound to put in windows or doors that have been broken by him, so as to prevent any decay of the premises; but he is not required to put a new roof on an old worn-out house; 2 Esp. 590.

An express covenant on the part of the lessee to keep a house in repair, and leave it in as good a plight as it was when the lease was made, does not bind him to repair the ordinary and natural decay; Woodf. Landl. & T. 256. See 7 Gray, 550. And it has been held that such a covenant does not bind him to rebuild a house which had been destroyed by a public enemy; 1 Dall. 210; but where in a lease there is an express and unconditional agreement to repair and keep in repair, the tenant is bound to do so, though the premises be destroyed by fire or accident; 91 Penn. 88; 2 Wall. 1.

Repair means to restore to its former condition, not to change either the form or material of a building; 63 Penn. 162. When a landlord covenants to repair, he is bound only to restore to a sound state either what has become decayed or dilapidated, or better, what has been partially destroyed; his covenant does not extend to improvements, nor to new buildings erected by the tenant; 4 Penn. 364. See 1 Dy. 33 a.

As to the time when the repairs are to be made, it would seem reasonable that when the lessor is bound to make them he should have the right to enter and make them, when a delay until after the expiration of the lease would be injurious to the estate; but when no such damage exists, the landlord should have no right to enter without the consent of the tenant. See 18 Toullier, n. 297. When a house has been destroyed by accidental fire, neither the tenant nor the landlord is bound to rebuild, unless obliged by some agreement so to do; 4 Paige, Ch. 355; 1 Term, 708. See 6 Term, 650; 4 Camp. 275; 3 Ves. Ch. 34; Co. Litt. 27 a, note 1; 3 Johns. 44; 6 Mass. 63; Platt, Cov. 266; Comyns, Dig. Condition (L 12); La. Civ. Code, 2070; 1 Saund. 322, n. 1, 323, n. 7; 2 id. 158 b. n. 7 & 10; Jackson & Gross, Landl. & T.

REPARATION. The redress of an injury; amends for a tort inflicted. See REMEDY.

REPARATIONE FACIENDA, WRIT DE (Lat.). The name of an ancient writ, which lies by one or more joint tenants against the other joint tenants, or by a person owning a house or building against the owner of the adjoining building, to compel the reparation of such joint property. Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 295.

REPEAL. The abrogation or destruction of a law by a legislative act.

A repeal is express, as, when it is literally declared by a subsequent law, or implied, when the new law contains provisions contrary to or irreconcilable with those of the former law.

A law may be repealed by implication, by an affirmative as well as by a negative statute, if the substance is inconsistent with the old statute; 1 Ohio, 10; 2 Bibb, 96; Harp. 101; 4 Wash. C. C. 691; and a repeal by implication has been effected even where two inconsistent enactments have been passed in the same session; 2 B. & Ald. 818; or where two parts of the same act have proved repugnant to each other; 4 C. B. Div. 29; but this will be presumed only in extreme cases; 13 C. B. 461. A repeal by implication is not favored, the leaning of the courts is against the doctrine, if it be possible to reconcile the two acts together; 1 Black, 470.

It is a general rule that when a penal statute punishes an offence by a certain penalty, and a new statute is passed imposing a greater or a lesser penalty for the same offence, the former statute is repealed by implication; 5 Pick. 168; 3 Hulst. 48; 3 A. K. Marsh. 70. See 1 Binn. 601; Bacon, Abr. Statute (D); but subsequent statutes which add accumulative penalties do not repeal former statutes; 1 Cowp. 297; 6 Mod. 141.

By the common law, when a statute repeals another, and afterwards the repealing statute is itself repealed, the first is revived; 2 Blackf. 32. In some states this rule has been changed, as in Ohio and Louisiana; La. Civ. Code, art. 23.

It has been held that when the repealing clause in an unconstitutional statute repeals all inconsistent acts, the repealing clause is to stand and have effect, notwithstanding the invalidity of the act; 11 Ind. 489. But other cases hold that such repealing clause is to be understood as designed to repeal all conflicting provisions, in order that those of the new statute can have effect, and that if the statute is invalid, nothing can conflict with it, and therefore nothing is repealed; 6 Wisc. 605; 35 Barb. 264; Cooley, Const. Lim. 186.

When a law is repealed, it leaves all the civil rights of the parties acquired under the law unaffected; 3 La. 337; 4 id. 191; 2 South. 689; Breese, 29; 2 Stew. Ala. 160; 2 Wall. 450. An action for penalties cannot be sustained when the statute inflicting them has been repealed before judgment; 13 How. 429; nor an action for the recovery of money paid in violation of law, under similar circumstances; 5 Blatch. 229.

When a penal statute is repealed or so modified as to exempt a class from its operation, violations committed before the repeal are also exempted, unless specifically reserved, or unless there has been some private right vested by it; 2 Dana, 330; 4 Yeates, 392; 5 Rand. 657; 1 Wash. C. C. 84; 2 Va. Cas. 382. See, generally, Dwarris, Wilberforce, Statutes.

REPERTORY. In French Law. A word used to denote the inventory or minutes which notaries are required to make of all contracts which take place before them. Dalloz, Dict.

REPETITION. In Civil Law. The act by which a person demands and seeks to recover what he has paid by mistake or delivered on a condition which has not been performed. Dig. 12. 4. 5.

The name of an action which lies to recover the payment which has been made by mistake, when nothing was due.

Repetition is never admitted in relation to natural obligations which have been voluntarily acquitted, if the debtor had capacity to give his consent. 6 Toullier, 386.

In order to entitle the payer to recover back money paid by mistake, it must have been paid by him to a person to whom he did not owe it, for otherwise he cannot recover it back,—the creditor having, in such case, the just right to retain the money. Repetitio nulla est ab eo qui suum recepit.

How far money paid under a mistake of law is liable to repetition has been discussed by civilians; and opinions on this subject are divided. 2 Pothier, Obl. Evans ed. 369, 408–437; 1 Story, Eq. Pl. § 111, note 2.

In Scotch Law. The act of reading over a witness's deposition, in order that he may adhere to it or correct it, at his choice. The same as recolement (q. v.) in the French law. 2 Benth. Ev. 239. See LEGACY.

REPLEADER. In Pleading. Making a new series of pleadings.

Judgment of repleader differs from a judgment non obstante veredicto in this: that it is allowed by the court to do justice between the parties where the defect is in the form or manner of stating the right, and the issue joined is on an immaterial point, so that it cannot tell for whom to give judgment; 7 Mass. 312; 3 Pick. 124; 19 id. 419; while judgment non obstante is given only where it is clearly apparent to the court that the party who has succeeded has, upon his own showing, no merits, and cannot have by any manner of statement; 1 Chitty, Pl. 568. See 19 Ark. 194.

It may be ordered by the court for the purpose of obtaining a better issue, if it will effect substantial justice where issue has been reached on an immaterial point; 3 B. & P. 353; 2 Johns. 388; 16 id. 230; 3 Hen. & M. 118, 161; as, a plea of payment on a given day to an action on a bond conditioned to pay on or before that day; 2 Stra. 994. It is not to be allowed till after trial for a defect which is aided by verdict; 2 Saund. 319 b; Bacon, Abr. Pleas. If granted or denied where it should not be, it is error; 2 Salk. 579. See 9 Ala. N. S. 198.

The judgment is general, and the parties must begin at the first fault which occasioned the immaterial issue; 1 Ld. Raym. 169; entirely anew, if the declaration is imperfect; 1 Chitty, Pl. 568; that the action must be dismissed in such case; 1 Wash. Va. 135; with the replication, if that be faulty and the bar be good; 3 Keb. 664; 1 Wash. Va. 155. No costs are allowed to either side; 2 Ventr. 196; 6 Term, 131; 2 B. & P. 376.

It cannot be awarded after a default at nisi prius; 1 Chitty, Pl. 568; nor where the court can give judgment on the whole record; Willes, 532; nor after demurrer; 2 Mass. 81; unless, perhaps, where the bar and replication are bad; Cro. Eliz. 318; 7 Me. 302; nor after writ of error, without the consent of the parties; 3 Salk. 306; nor at any time in favor of the person who made the first fault; 1 Ld. Raym. 170; 1 Hempst. 268; 1 Humphr. 85; 6 Blackf. 375; see 3 Hen. & M. 388; nor after judgment; 1 Tyl. Vt. 146. The same end is secured in many of the states by statutes allowing amendments. See, generally, Tidd. Pr. 813, 814; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (R. 18); Bacon, Abr. Pleas (M).

REPLEGIARE (Lat.). To replevy; to redeem a thing detained or taken by another, by putting in legal sureties.

REPLEGIARE DE AVERIIS (Lat.). A writ brought by one whose cattle are impounded or distrained, upon security given to the sheriff to pursue or answer the action at law. 7 Hen. VIII. c. 4; Fitzh. N. B. 68; New Book of Entries, Replevin; Dy. 173; Reg. Orig. 81.

REPLEGIARE FACIAS (Lat.). A writ of replevin, which issued out of chancery, commanding the sheriff to deliver the distress to the owner, and afterwards to do justice in regard to the matter in his own county court. It was abolished by statute of Marlbridge (q. v.), which provided a shorter process. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 147*.

REPLEVIN. In Practice. A form of action which lies to regain the possession of personal chattels which have been taken from the plaintiff unlawfully.

The action originally lay for the purpose of recovering chattels taken as a distress, but has acquired a much more extended use. In England and most of the states of the United States it extends to all cases of illegal taking, and in some of the states it may be brought wherever a person wishes to recover specific goods to which he alleges title. See infra.

By virtue of the writ, the sheriff proceeds at once to take possession of the property therein described and transfer it to the plaintiff, upon his giving pledges which are satisfactory to the sheriff to prove his title, or return the chattels taken if he fail so to do. It is said to have laid formerly in the detinuit, which is the only form now found at common law, and also in the detinet, where the defendant retained possession, and the sheriff proceeded to take possession and deliver the property to the plaintiff after a trial and proof of title; Bull. N. P. 52; Chitty, Pl. 145; 3 Bla. Com. 146; DETINET; DETINUIT.

It differs from detinue in this: that it requires an unlawful taking as the foundation of the action; and from all other personal actions in that it is brought to recover the possession of the specific property claimed to have been unlawfully taken.

The action lies to recover personal property; 19 Penn. 71; including parish records; 11 Pick. 492; trees after they have been cut down; 2 Barb. 613; 9 Mo. 259; 13 Ill. 192; records of a corporation; 5 Ind. 165; articles which might be fixtures under some circumstances; 4 N. J. 287; which can be specifically distinguished from all other chattels of the same kind by indicia or ear-marks; 18 Ill. 286; including money tied up in a bag and taken in that state; 2 Mod. 61; trees cut into boards; 30 Me. 370; 13 Ill. 192; but does not lie for injuries to things annexed to the realty; 4 Term. 504; 2 M'Cord, 329; 17 Johns. 116; 10 B. Monr. 72; nor to recover such things, if dissevered and removed as part of the same act; 3 S. & R. 509. 6 Me. 427; 8 Cow. 220; nor for writings concerning the realty; 1 Brownl. 168.

A general property with the right to immediate possession gives the plaintiff sufficient title to maintain it; 3 Wend. 280; 15 Pick. 63; 9 Gill & J. 220; 2 Ark. 315; 4 Blackf. 304; 8 Dana, 268; 27 Miss. 198; 2 Swan, 358; as do a special property and actual possession; 2 Watts, 110; 2 Ark. 315; 4 Blackf. 304; 10 Mo. 277; 9 Humphr. 739; 2 Ohio St. 82.

It will not lie for the defendant in another action to recover goods belonging to him and taken on attachment; 5 Co. 99; 20 Johns. 470; 2 N. H. 412; 2 B. Monr. 18; 3 Md. 54; nor, generally, for goods properly in the custody of the law; 2 N. & M'C. 456; 3 Md. 54; 7 Watts, 173; 4 Ark. 525; 8 Ired. 387; 16 How. 622; 3 Mich. 163; Hempst. 10; 2 Wisc. 92; 1 Sneed, 390; but this rule does not prevent a third person, whose goods have been improperly attached in such suit, from bringing this action; 4 Pick. 167; 14 Johns. 84; 20 id. 465; 6 Hals. 370; 2 Blackf. 172; 7 Ohio, 133; 19 Me. 255; 9 Gill & J. 220; 24 Vt. 371.

As to the rights of co-tenants to bring this action as against each other, see 1 Harr. & G. 308; 12 Conn. 331; 15 Pick. 71; as against strangers, see 4 Mas. 515; 12 Wend. 131; 15 Me. 245; 2 N. J. 552; 27 N. H. 220; 6 Ind. 414.

The action lies, in England and most of the United States, wherever there has been an illegal taking; 18 E. L. & E. 280; 7 Johns. 140; 5 Mass. 283; 6 Binn. 2; 3 S. & R. 562; 1 Mas. 319; 11 Me. 28; 27 id. 453; 2 Blackf. 415; 1 Const. 401; 3 N. H. 36; 10 Johns. 369; 6 Hals. 370; 1 Ill. 130; 1 Mo. 345; 6 T. B. Monr. 421; 6 Ark. 18; 4 Harr. Del. 327; and in some states wherever a person claims title to specific chattels in another's possession; 2 Harr. & J. 429; 4 Me. 306; 15 Mass. 359; 17 id. 606; 1 Penn. 238; 11 Me. 216; 4 Harr. N. J. 160; 4 Mo. 93; 8 Blackf. 244; Hempst. 10; 4 R. I. 539; while in others it is restricted to a few cases of illegal seizure; 9 Conn. 140; 3 Rand. 448; 16 Miss. 279; 4 Mich. 295. The object of the action is to recover possession; and it will not lie where the property has been restored. And when brought in the detinet the destruction of the articles by the defendant is no answer to the action; 3 Bla. Com. 147.

The declaration must describe the place of taking. Great accuracy was formerly required in this respect; 2 Wms. Saund. 74 b; 10 Johns. 58; but now a statement of the county in which it occurred is said to be sufficient; 1 P. A. Browne, 60.

The chattels must be accurately described in the writ; 6 Hals. 179; 1 Harr. & G. 252; 4 Blackf. 70; 1 Mich. 92.

The plea of non cepit puts in issue the taking, and not the plaintiff's title; 6 Ired. 38; 25 Me. 464; 3 N. Y. 506; 2 Fla. 42; 12 Ill. 378; and the plea, not guilty; 9 Mo. 256; cepit in alio loco, and property in another, are also of frequent occurrence.

An avowry, cognizance, or justification are often used in defence. See those titles.

The judgment, when the action is in the detinuit, if for the plaintiff, confirms his title, and is also for damages assessed by the jury for the injurious taking and detention; 1 W. & S. 513; 20 Wend. 172; 15 Me. 20; 1 Ark. 557; 5 Ired. 192.

See JUDGMENT; Morris, Repl.; Jacks. & Gross, Landl. & T.

REPLEVY. To re-deliver goods which have been distrained to the original possessor of them, on his giving pledges in an action of replevin. It signifies also the bailing or liberating a man from prison, on his finding bail to answer. See REPLEVIN.

REPLIANT. One who makes a replication.

REPLICATION (Lat. replicare, to fold back).

In Pleading. The plaintiff's answer to the defendant's plea or answer.

In Equity. The plaintiff's avoidance or denial of the answer or defence. Story, Eq. Pl. § 877.

A general replication is a general denial of the truth of the defendant's plea or answer, and of the sufficiency of the matter alleged in it to bar the plaintiff's suit, and an assertion of the truth and sufficiency of the bill. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 329, 330.

A special replication was one which introduced new matter to avoid the defendant's answer. It might be followed by rejoinder, surrejoinder, and rebutter. Special replications have been superseded by the practice of amending bills; 1 How. Intr. 55; 17 Pet. App. 68. A replication must be made use of where the plaintiff intends to introduce evidence, and a subpœna to the defendant to rejoin must be added, unless he will appear gratis; Story, Eq. Pl. § 879.

A replication may be filed nunc pro tunc after witnesses have been examined under leave of court; Story, Eq. Pl. § 881; Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jeremy, 323.

At Law. The plaintiff's reply to the defendant's plea. It contains a statement of matter, consistent with the declaration, which avoids the effect of the defendant's plea or constitutes a joinder in issue thereon.

It is, in general, governed by the plea, whether dilatory or in bar, and most frequently denies it. When the plea concludes to the country, the plaintiff must generally reply by a similiter. See SIMILITER; Hempst. 67. When it concludes with a verification, the plaintiff may either conclude the defendant by matter of estoppel, deny the truth of the plea in whole or in part, confess and avoid the plea, or new assign the cause of action in case of an evasive plea. Its character varies with the form of action and the facts of the case. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 519.

As to the form of the replication:

The title contains the name of the court, and the term of which it is pleaded, and in the margin the names of the plaintiff and defendant. 2 Chitty, Pl. 641.

The commencement is that part which immediately follows the title, and contains a general denial of the effect of the defendant's plea. When the plea is to the jurisdiction, it contains a statement that the writ ought not to be quashed, or that the court ought not to be ousted of their jurisdiction. Rastell, Entr. 101. When misnomer is pleaded, no such allegation is required; 1 B. & P. 61.

When matter in estoppel is replied, it is, in general, in the words "and the said plaintiff saith that the said defendant."

When the replication denies or confesses and avoids the plea, it contains a precludi non, which see.

The body should contain—

Matter of estoppel, which should be set forth in the replication if it does not appear from the previous pleadings: as, if the matter has been tried upon a particular issue in trespass and found by the jury; 3 East, 346; 4 Mass. 443; 4 Dana, 73; denial of the truth of the plea, either of the whole plea, which may be by a denial of the fact or facts constituting a single point in express words; 12 Barb. 573; 36 N. H. 232; 28 Vt. 279; 1 Humphr. 524; or by the general replication and injuria, etc., according to the form of action; 8 Co. 67; 1 B. & P. 79; 13 Ill. 80; 19 Vt. 329; or of a part of the plea, which may be of any material fact; 20 Johns. 406; 13 T. B. Monr. 288; and of such only; 20 N. H. 323; 37 E. L. & E. 479; 9 Gill, 310; 3 Pet. 31; or of matter of right resulting from facts; 1 Saund. 23 a, n. 5; 10 Ark. 147; see 2 Iowa, 120; and see TRAVERSE; a confession and avoidance; 23 N. H. 535; 2 Denio, 97; 10 Mass. 226; see CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE; a new assignment, which see.

The conclusion should be to the country when the replication denies the whole of the defendant's plea containing matter of fact; 2 McLean, 92; 7 Pick. 117; 1 Johns. 516; as well where the plea is to the jurisdiction; Clifton, Entr. 17: 1 Chitty, Pl. 385; as in bar; 1 Chitty, Pl. 554; but with a verification when new matter is introduced; 1 Saund. 103, n.; 17 Pick. 87; 1 Brev. 11; 11 Johns. 56. See 5 Ind. 264. The conclusions in particular cases are stated in 1 Chitty, Pl. 615; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (F 5). See 1 Saund. 103, n.; 1 Johns. 516; 2 id. 428; Archb. Civ. Pl. 258; 19 Viner, Abr. 29; Bacon, Abr. Trespass (I 4).

As to the qualities of a replication. It must be responsive to the defendant's plea, 17 Ark. 865; 4 McLean, 521; answering all which it professes to answer; 12 Ark. 183; 8 Ala. N. s. 375; and if bad in part is bad altogether; 1 Saund. 338; 7 Cra. 156; 32 Ala. N. s. 506; directly; 10 East, 205; see 7 Blackf. 481; without departing from the allegations of the declaration in any material matter; 2 Watts, 306; 4 Munf. 205; 2 Root, 388; 22 N. H. 303; 5 Blackf. 306; 4 M'Cord, 93; 1 Ill. 26; see DEPARTURE; with certainty; 6 Fla. 25; see CERTAINTY; and without duplicity; 4 Ill. 423; 2 Halst. 77; Daveis, 236; 14 N. H. 373; Hempst. 238; 26 Vt. 397; 4 Wend. 211; see DUPLICITY.

REPLY. In England in public prosecutions for felony or misdemeanor, instituted by the Crown, the law officers have a general right of reply, whether the defendant has introduced evidence or not; but prosecuting counsel in ordinary cases have not this right. See 6 Law Mag. & Rev. 4 Ser. 102. See OPENING AND CLOSING; RIGHT TO BEGIN.

REPORTS. A printed or written collection of accounts or relations of cases judicially argued and determined.

In the jurisprudence of nearly every civilized country, the force of adjudicated precedents is to a greater or less degree acknowledged. But in no countries are they so deferentially listened to and, indeed, so implicitly obeyed as in England and in those countries which, like our own, derive their systems of judicial government from her. The European systems are composed, much more than either ours or the English, of Codes; and their courts rely far more than ours upon the opinions of eminent text-writers. With us we pay no implicit respect to any thing but a "case in point;" and, supposing the case to be by an authoritative court, when that is cited, it is generally taken as conclusive on the question in issue. Hence both the English and American jurisprudence is filled with books of Reports; that is to say, with accounts of cases which have arisen, and of the mode in which they have been argued and decided. These books, which until the last half-century were not numerous, have now become, as will be seen in the list appended, or are becoming, almost infinite in number,—so much so that the profession has taken refuge in the system of Leading Cases, which, in the forms of Smith's Leading Cases, The American Leading Cases, and White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, and many others, have now obtained a place in most good libraries.

Of these late years, in the United States at least, it is usual for the courts to write out their opinions and to deliver them to the reporter: so that usually the opinion of the court is correctly given. At the same time, the volumes of different reporters, even of quite modern times, are very different in character,—the accounts of what the cases were being often so badly presented as to render the opinion of the courts, even when the opinions themselves are good, comparatively worthless. In addition to this, an immense proportion of the reports—especially of the American—are by courts of no great eminence or ability, while in England, with their system of rival reporters, we have at times been borne down with such a multitude of "Reports" that the cases are fairly buried in their own masses.

A late writer estimates the entire number of reports published, on April 1, 1882, exclusive of numerous periodicals, at 5232. See 16 Am. L. Rev. 429.

We are speaking here of the business of reporting as practised say since the year 1800. Prior to this date there were only one or two American Reports. In England, however, there were even then very many, and among the English Reports prior to the date of which we speak are many of the highest authority, and which are constantly cited at this day both in England and America. There are, however, many also of very bad authority, and, indeed, of no authority at all; and against these the lawyer must be upon his guard. They are all called "Reports" alike, and in many cases have the name of some eminent person attached to them, when, in fact, they are mere forgeries so far as that person is concerned. Nothing can be so various, as respects their grade of merit, as the English Reports prior to about the year 1776; and the lawyer should never rely on any one of them without knowing the character of the volume which he cites. They are often mere note-books of lawyers or of students, or copies hastily and very inaccurately made from genuine manuscripts. In some instances one part of a book is good, when another is perfectly worthless. This is specially true of the early Chancery Reports, which were generally printed as booksellers' "jobs."

Great judicial mistakes have arisen, even with the most able courts, from want of attention to the different characters of the old reporters. One illustration of this—not more striking, perhaps, than others—occurred in the supreme court of our own country. "It is well known," says Mr. J. W. Wallace, in his work entitled "The Reporters," "that, in a leading case, Chief-Justice Marshall, some years since, gave an opinion which had the effect of almost totally subverting, in two states of our Union, the entire law of charitable uses. And though some other states did not adopt the conclusions of the chief-justice, his venerated name was seized in all quarters of the country to originate litigation and uncertainty, and deeply to wound the whole body of trusts for religious, charitable, and literary purposes. For a quarter of a century the influences of his opinion were yet active in evil,—when, in 1844, an endeavor to subvert a large foundation brought the subject again before the court, in the Girard College case, and caused a more careful examination into it. The opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall was in review, and was overruled. Mr. Binney showed at the bar that as to the principal authority cited by the chief-justice, from one of the old books, there were no less than four different reports of it, all variant from each other; that, as to one of the reporters, the case had been decided thirty years before the time of his report; that he was not likely to know anything personally about it; that 'he certainly knew nothing about it accurately;' that another reporter gave two versions of the case 'entirely different,' not only from that of his co-reporter, but likewise from another of his own; that a fourth account, by a yet distinct reporter, was 'different from all the rest;' that 'nothing is to be obtained from any of these reports, except perhaps the last that is worthy of any reliance as a true history of the case;' and that even this, the best of them, had been rejected in modern times, as 'being contrary to all principle.' After such evidence that these judicial historians, like others of the title, were full of nothing so much as of 'most excellent differences,' the counsel might very well observe that it is 'essentially necessary to guard against the indiscriminate reception of the old reporters, especially the Chancery Reporters, as authority;' and certainly a knowledge less than that which Chief-Justice Marshall possessed in some other branches of the law would have reminded him that most of his authorities enjoyed a reputation but dubiously good, while the character of one of them was notoriously bad."

Among the English Reporters the following possess little authority; Noy, Godbolt, Owen, Popham, Winch, March, Hutton, Ley, Lane, Hetley, Carter, J. Bridgman, Keble, Siderfin, Latch, several volumes of the "Modern" Reports, 3d Salkeld, Gilbert's Cases in Law and Equity, the 1st and 2d parts of "Reports in Chancery," Chancery Cases, Reports temp. Finch, "Gilbert's Reports," 8th Taunton, Peake's Nisi Prius Reports. See comments, infra, under some of the old reports, and the articles in So. L. Rev. referred to infra. But even in books of the worst authority there are occasionally cases well reported. The fullest account which has yet been given of the Reporters—their chronological order, their respective merits, the history, public and private, of the volumes, with biographical sketches of the authors—is presented in an American work, "The Reporters, Chronologically Arranged; with Occasional Remarks on their Respective Merits." The author (Mr. Wallace) spent a considerable time at Lincoln's Inn, and at the Temple, London, from the libraries of which he collected much history hitherto not generally known. In the case of Farrall vs. Hilditch, 5 C. B. N. S. 854, the work received from the judges of the court of common pleas, sitting in banc at Westminster, the characterization of "highly valuable and interesting," and one to which, "they could not refrain from referring" on a question involving the reputation of one of the early English reporters.

See an interesting article on Reports, Reporters, and Reporting, in 5 So. Law Rev. N. S. 53; and a series of articles by F. F. Heard, on the Reporters, etc., in 1 So. Law Rev. N. S. 86, 223, 497, 3 id. 268. A series of articles in 3 Alb. L. J. et seq. gives accounts of various state reports and reporters. See Marvin's Legal Bibliography.

The following list of reports is based upon the list in the preceding edition of this work, prepared by Prof. Theodore W. Dwight, of Columbia College, New York. Numerous additions, made necessary by the publication of subsequent volumes of reports, and such corrections as were found necessary, have been made with the assistance of W. D. Findlay, formerly assistant to the present editor in charge of the Philadelphia Law Library, now of Boston. A very valuable list of reports by N. C. Moak may be found in the law catalogue of William Gould & Son, Albany.

Barnardiston (Thomas). High Ct. of Ch., 1740–41. 1 vol. Lord Mansfield (2 Burr. 1142) forbade the citing of this book, as it would be only misleading the students to put them upon reading it. He said it was marvellous, however, to those who knew the sergeant, and his manner of taking notes, that he should so often stumble upon what was right; but that there was not one case in his book which was so throughout. Lord Eldon, however, in 1 Bligh, N. R. 538, says, "in that book there are reports of very great authority."

Barnardiston (Thomas). K. B., 1726–34. 2 vols. A book which for many years was very little esteemed, the author having been reputed a careless fellow who let the wags scribble what they liked in his note-book while he was asleep. However, where his accuracy has been tested, as it has been of later times, it has come out pretty fairly; and now both the K. B. and Ch. reports of Barnardiston are reasonably respected. Benloe (Gulielme) & Dalison (Gulielme). C. P. Benloe contains cases from 1532 to 1579, and Dalison from 1546 to 1574. 1 vol. of each, bound together. There is very great confusion in the citations of the reports of Benloe and Dalison. Some cases of Benloe's are given at the end of Keilway's Reports and of Ashe's Tables. It is supposed that the title New Benloe was given to the volume here given as Bendloes to distinguish it from the cases in Keilway and Ashe. The volume given as Benloe & Dalison consists in reality of two separate series of reports, paged independently, although bound together, and the modes of reference are very various, being sometimes to Dalison when Benloe is intended, and vice versa. A full account is given in Wallace's Report. 80–85, 93, of these reports, and of the various mistakes made in citation.

Vernon (Thomas). High Ct. of Ch., 1680–1719. 2 vols. Vernon was a very eminent chancery lawyer; but his reports were posthumously published from notes found in his study after his death. They were loose, and on that account unsatisfactory and inaccurate. A very highly improved edition was published in 1806, 1807, by Mr. Raithby, under the auspices of Lord Eldon. The manuscript reports of Vernon were the subject of an entertaining chancery suit between his widow, his heir-at-law, and his residuary legatee. No one of the parties, however, succeeded; and the case was ended by the lord chancellor's keeping the manuscript himself. See Wallace, Report. 493.

REPRESENT. To exhibit, to expose before the eyes. To represent a thing is to produce it publicly. Dig. 10. 4. 2. 8.

REPRESENTATION. In Insurance. The stating of facts by either of the parties to a policy of insurance, to the other, whether in writing or orally, expressly or by plain implication, preliminary and in reference to making the insurance, obviously tending to influence the other as to entering into the contract. 12 Md. 348; 11 Cush. 324; 2 N. H. 551; 6 Gray, 221.

A statement incidental to the contract, relative to some fact having reference thereto, and upon the faith of which the contract is made. May, Ins. 190. It may be affirmative or promissory.

The distinction between representation and warranty must be carefully observed; the latter is a part of the contract, the former is but a statement incidental thereto. In an action on the policy the plaintiff must show facts sufficient to bring him within the terms of the warranty, while the burden of proving the untruthfulness of representations, if any, is on the defendant. Further, representations need not be strictly and literally complied with, but only in material points; while in cases of warranty, the question of materiality does not arise; May, Ins. § 183. Representations in writing are, ipso facto, material; 4 H. L. C. 484; 98 Mass. 381; 31 Iowa, 216. Misrepresentations are material though the fact represented may not relate directly to the risk; 20 N. Y. 32.

Doctrines respecting representation and concealment usually have reference to those by the assured, upon whose knowledge and statement of the facts the insurance is usually made; but the doctrine on the subject is equally applied to the underwriter, so far as facts are known to him; 3 Burr. 1905.

A misrepresentation though made unintentionally, or through mistake, makes the insurance void, notwithstanding its being free of fraud; 1 Du. N. Y. 747; 18 Eng. L. & Eq. 427.

The material falsity of an oral promissory representation, without fraud, is no defence in an action on a policy. If made with the intent to deceive, the policy may be thereby avoided. Promissory representations, reduced to writing and made a part of the contract, become substantial warranties; May, Ins. § 182; see 9 Allen, 540.

A substantial compliance with a representation is sufficient,—the rule being less strict than in case of a warranty; 3 Metc. Mass. 114; 4 Mas. 439; 31 Iowa, 216; 34 Md. 582; see 98 Mass. 381. The substantial truth of the statement is for the jury, but not its materiality; May, Ins. § 187.

Insurance against fire and on life rests upon the same general conditions of good faith as maritime insurance; but in the first two classes the contract is usually based mainly upon statements by the applicant in written replies to numerous inquiries expressly referred to in the policy, which answers are thus made express warranties, and must, accordingly, be strictly true whether their being so is or is not material to the risk. The inquiries are intended to cover all material circumstances, subject, however, to the principle, applicable to all contracts, that fraud by either party will exonerate the other from his obligations, if he so elects; 7 Barb. 570; 10 Pick. 535; 6 Gray, 288; 2 Rob. La. 266; 24 Penn. 320; 3 Md. 341; 2 Ohio, 452; 21 Conn. 19; 6 Humphr. 176; 6 McLean, 324; 8 How. 235; 2 M. & W. 505. See CONCEALMENT; MISREPRESENTATION; WARRANTY.

In Scotch Law. The name of a plea or statement presented to a lord-ordinary of the court of sessions, when his judgment is brought under review.

REPRESENTATION OF PERSONS. A fiction of the law, the effect of which is to put the representative in the place, degree, or right of the person represented.

The heir represents his ancestor; Bacon, Abr. Heir and Ancestor (A); the devisee, his testator; the executor, his testator; the administrator, his intestate; the successor in corporations, his predecessor; and, generally speaking, they are entitled to the rights of the persons whom they represent, and bound to fulfil the duties and obligations which were binding upon them in those characters.

Representation was unknown to the Romans, and was invented by the commentators and doctors of the civil law. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 1, c. 3, n. 180. See Ayliffe, Pand. 397; Dalloz, Dict. Succession, art. 4, § 2.

REPRESENTATIVE. One who represents or is in the place of another.

In legislation, it signifies one who has been elected a member of that branch of the legislature called the house of representatives.

A representative of a deceased person, sometimes called a "personal representative," or "legal personal representative," is one who is executor or administrator of the person described. 6 Madd. 159; 5 Ves. 402. See PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES.

REPRESENTATIVE DEMOCRACY. A form of government where the powers of the sovereignty are delegated to a body of men, elected from time to time, who exercise them for the benefit of the whole nation. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 31.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS. Those who, at the commencement of every new parliament, are elected to represent Scotland and Ireland in the British House of Lords; sixteen for the former and twenty-eight for the latter country. Brown, Dic.

REPRIEVE (from Fr. reprendre, to take back). In Criminal Practice. The withdrawing of a sentence for an interval of time, which operates in delay of execution. 4 Bla. Com. 394.

It is granted by the favor of the pardoning power, or by the court who tried the prisoner. Reprieves are sometimes granted ex necessitate legis; for example, when a woman is convicted of a capital offence, after judgment she may allege pregnancy in delay of execution. In order, however, to render this plea available, she must be quick with child, q. v., the law presuming—perhaps absurdly enough—that before that period life does not commence in the fœtus; Co. 3d Inst. 17; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 368; 2 id. 413; 4 Bla. Com. 395.

The judge is also bound to grant a reprieve when the prisoner becomes insane; 4 Hargr. St. Tr. 205, 206; Co. 3d Inst. 4.

The president, under the constitution, art. II. § 2, has the power to grant reprieves. A reprieve is said to be a withdrawal or withholding of punishment for a time after conviction and sentence, in the nature of a stay of execution. Cooley, Const. 102. See PARDON.

REPRIMAND. The censure which in some cases a public officer pronounces against an offender.

This species of punishment is used by legislative bodies to punish their members or others who have been guilty of some impropriety of conduct towards them. The reprimand is usually pronounced by the speaker.

REPRISALS. The forcibly taking a thing by one nation which belonged to another, in return or satisfaction for an injury committed by the latter on the former. Vattel, b. 2, c. 18, s. 342; 1 Bla. Com. c. 7.

General reprisals take place by virtue of commissions delivered to officers and citizens of the aggrieved state, directing them to take the persons and property belonging to the offending state wherever found.

Negative reprisals take place when a nation refuses to fulfil a perfect obligation which it has contracted, or to permit another state to enjoy a right which it justly claims.

Positive reprisals consist in seizing the persons and effects belonging to the other nation, in order to obtain satisfaction.

Special reprisals are such as are granted in times of peace to particular individuals who have suffered an injury from the citizens or subjects of the other nation.

Reprisals are used between nation and nation to do themselves justice, when they cannot otherwise obtain it. Congress have the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal. U. S. Const. art. 1, s. 8. cl. 11. See LETTERS OF MARQUE.

Reprisals are made in two ways, either by embargo, in which case the act is that of the state, or by letters of marque and reprisals, in which case the act is that of the citizen, authorized by the government. See 2 Brown, Civ. Law, 334.

The property seized in making reprisals is preserved while there is any hope of obtaining satisfaction or justice; as soon as that hope disappears, it is confiscated, and then the reprisal is complete; Vattel, b. 2, c. 18, § 342. See Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law.

REPRISES. The deductions and payments out of lands, annuities, and the like are called reprises, because they are taken back: when we speak of the clear yearly value of an estate, we say it is worth so much a year ultra reprises, besides all reprises.

In Pennsylvania, lands are not to be sold under an execution when the rents can pay the debt and interest and costs in seven years, beyond all reprises.

REPROBATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The propounding exceptions either against facts, persons, or things: as to allege that certain deeds or instruments have not been duly and lawfully executed; or that certain persons are such that they are incompetent as witnesses; or that certain things ought not, for legal reasons, to be admitted.

REPROBATUR, ACTION OF. An action in Scotch law for the purpose of convicting a witness of perjury. Bell.

REPUBLIC. A commonwealth: that form of government in which the administration of affairs is open to all the citizens. In another sense, it signifies the state, independently of its form of government. 1 Toullier, n. 28, and n. 202, note.

REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT. A government in the republican form; a government of the people; a government by representatives chosen by the people. Cooley, Const. 194. It is usually put in opposition to a monarchical or aristocratic government. But it is said to be, strictly speaking, by no means inconsistent with monarchical forms; Cooley, Const. 194; there can be no doubt that in the light of the fact that the Revolution was intended to throw off monarchical forms, a republican form of government in the constitution means a government in which the people choose, directly or indirectly, the executive.

The fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution directs that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government." The form of government is to be guaranteed, which supposes a form already established; and this is the republican form of government the United States have undertaken to protect. See Story, Const. § 1807.

A republican government, once established, may be endangered so as to call for the action of congress: 1. By the hostile action of some foreign power, and taking possession of the territory of some state, and setting up a government therein not established by the people. 2. By the revolutionary action of the people themselves in forcibly rising against the constituted authorities and setting the government aside, or attempting to do so, for some other. In either of the above cases, it will be the duty of the general government to protect the people of the state by the employment of military force. Cooley, Const. 196; see 7 Wall. 700; 7 How. 1. 3. Even in strict accordance with the forms prescribed for amending a state constitution, it would be possible for the people of the state to effect such changes as would deprive it of its republican character. It would then be the duty of congress to intervene. In any case there could be no appeal from the decision of congress. Cooley, Const. 196.

REPUBLICATION. An act done by a testator, from which it can be concluded that he intended that an instrument which had been revoked by him should operate as his will; or it is the re-execution of a will by the testator, with a view of giving it full force and effect.

The republication is express when there has been an actual re-execution of it; 1 Ves. 440; 2 Rand. 192; 9 Johns. 312; it is implied when, for example, the testator by a codicil executed according to the statute of frauds, reciting that he had made his will, added, "I hereby ratify and confirm my said will, except in the alterations after mentioned." 3 Bro. P. C. 85. The will might be at a distance or not in the power of the testator, and it may be thus republished; 1 Ves. Sen. 437; 1 Ves. 486; 4 Bro. C. C. 2.

The republication of a will has the effect—first, to give it all the force of a will made at the time of the republication: if, for example, a testator by his will devise "all his lands in A," then revokes his will, and afterwards buys other lands in A, the republication, made after the purchase, will pass all the testator's lands in A; Cro. Eliz. 493. See 1 P. Wms. 275. Second, to set up a will which had been revoked. See, generally, Will. Exec.; Jarm. Wills.

REPUDIATE. To express in a sufficient manner a determination not to accept a right, when it is offered.

He who repudiates a right cannot by that act transfer it to another. Repudiation differs from renunciation in this, that by the former he who repudiates simply declares that he will not accept; while he who renounces a right does so in favor of another. Renunciation is, however, sometimes used in the sense of repudiation. See RENOUNCE; RENUNCIATION; Wolff, Inst. § 339.

REPUDIATION. In Civil Law. A term used to signify the putting away of a wife or a woman betrothed.

Properly, divorce is used to point out the separation of married persons; repudiation, to denote the separation either of married people, or those who are only affianced. Divortium est repudium et separatio maritorum; repudium est renunciatio sponsalium, vel etiam est divortium. Dig. 50. 16. 101.

A determination to have nothing to do with any particular thing: as, a repudiation of a legacy is the abandonment of such legacy, and a renunciation of all right to it.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The refusal to accept a benefice which has been conferred upon the party repudiating.

REPUGNANCY (Lat. re, back, against, pugnare, to fight). In Contracts. A disagreement or inconsistency between two or more clauses of the same instrument. In deeds, and other instruments inter vivos, the earlier clause prevails, if the inconsistency be not so great as to avoid the instrument for uncertainty; 2 Taunt. 109; 15 Sim. 118; 2 C. B. 830; 13 M. & W. 584.

In wills, the latter clause prevails, under the same exceptions; Co. Litt. 112 b; Plowd. 541; 6 Ves. 100; 2 My. & K. 149; 1 Jarm. Wills, 411; see, however, 18 Ch. Div. 17.

Repugnancy in a condition renders it void; 2 Mod. 285; 11 id. 191; 1 Hawks, 20; 7 J. J. Marsh. 192. And see, generally, 3 Pick. 272; 4 id. 54; 6 Cow. 677.

In Pleading. An inconsistency or disagreement between the statements of material facts in a declaration or other pleading: as, where certain timber was said to be for the completion of a house already built; 1 Salk. 213. Repugnancy of immaterial facts, or of redundant and unnecessary matter, if it does not contradict material allegations, will not, in general, vitiate the pleadings; Co. Litt. 303 b; 10 East, 142; 1 Chitty, Pl. 233. See Steph. Pl. 378.

REPUTATION (Lat. reputo, to consider). The opinion generally entertained in regard to the character or condition of a person by those who know him or his family. The opinion generally entertained by those who may be supposed to be acquainted with a fact.

In general, reputation is evidence to prove a man's reputation in society; a pedigree; 14 Camp. 416; 1 S. & S. 153; certain prescriptive or customary rights and obligations; matters of public notoriety. But as such evidence is in its own nature very weak, it must be supported, when it relates to the exercise of a right or privilege, by proof of acts of enjoyment of such right or privilege within the period of living memory; 1 Maule & S. 679; 5 Term, 32. Afterwards, evidence of reputation may be given. The fact must be of a public nature; it must be derived from persons likely to know the facts; 9 B. Monr. 88; 4 B. & Ald. 53. The facts must be general, and not particular; they must be free from suspicion; 1 Stark. Ev. 54.

Injuries to a man's reputation by circulating false accounts in relation thereto are remediable by action and by indictment. See LIBEL; SLANDER; CHARACTER.

REPUTED OWNER. In English Practice. A bankrupt trader who has in his apparent possession goods, which he holds with the consent of the true owner is called the reputed owner. The Bankruptcy Act of 1869, sec. 15, § 5, provides that such goods in his possession at the commencement of his bankruptcy, pass to his trustee; but things in action, other than debts due to him in the course of his trade or business, are not deemed goods and chattels within the meaning of that clause; Whart. Dict.; 2 Steph. Com. 166; Robson, Bkcy. 2d ed. 412–440.

REQUEST. (Lat. requiro, to ask for). In Contracts. A notice of a desire on the part of the person making it, that the other party shall do something in relation to a contract. Generally, when a debt is payable immediately, no request need be made; 10 Mass. 230; 3 Day, 327; 1 Johns. Cas. 319.

In some cases, the necessity of a request is implied from the nature of the transaction: as, where a horse is sold to A, to be paid for on delivery, A must show a request; 5 Term, 409; or impossibility on the part of the vendor to comply, if requested; 5 B. & Ad. 712; previous to bringing an action; or on a promise to marry; 2 Dowl. & R. 55. See DEMAND. And if the contract in terms provides for a request, it must be made; 1 Johns. Cas. 327. It should be in writing, and state distinctly what is required to be done; 1 Chitty, Pr. 497.

In Pleading. The statement in the plaintiff's declaration that a demand or request has been made by the plaintiff of the defendant to do some act which he was bound to perform, and for which the action is brought.

A general request is that stated in the form "although often requested so to do" (licet sæpe requisitus), generally added in the common breach to the money counts. Its omission will not vitiate the declaration; 1 B. & P. 59; 1 Johns. Cas. 100.

A special request is one provided for by the contract, expressly or impliedly. Such a request must be averred; 5 Term, 409; 3 Camp. 549; 2 B. & C. 685; and proved; 1 Saund. 32, n. 2. It must state time and place of making, and by whom it was made, that the court may judge of its sufficiency; 1 Stra. 89. See Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 69, 70); 1 Saund. 33, n.; DEMAND.

REQUESTS, COURTS OF. See COURTS OF REQUESTS.

REQUEST NOTES. In English Law. Certain notes or requests from persons amenable to the excise laws, to obtain a permit for removing any excisable goods or articles from one place to another.

REQUISITION. The act of demanding a thing to be done by virtue of some right.

The demand made by the governor of one state on the governor of another for a fugitive, under the provision of the United States constitution. See EXTRADITION.

REQUISITIONS OF TITLE. Written inquiries made by the solicitor of an intending purchaser of land, to the vendor's solicitor, in respect of some apparent insufficiency in the abstract of title. Moz. & W.

RES (Lat. things).

The terms Res, Bona, Biens, used by jurists who have written in the Latin and French languages, are intended to include movable or personal, as well as immovable or real, property. 1 Burge, Confl. Laws, 19. See BIENS; BONA; THINGS.

RES ADJUDICATA. See RES JUDICATA.

RES COMMUNES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which, though a separate share of them can be enjoyed and used by every one, cannot be exclusively and wholly appropriated: as, light, air, running water. Mackeldy, Civ. Law, § 156; Erskine, Inst. 1. 1. 5, 6.

RES GESTÆ (Lat.). Transaction; thing done; the subject-matter.

When it is necessary in the course of a cause to inquire into the nature of a particular act, or the intention of the person who did the act, proof of what the person said at the time of doing it is admissible evidence as part of the res gestæ, for the purpose of showing its true character. On an indictment for a rape, for example, what the girl said so recently after the fact as to exclude the possibility of practising on her, has been held to be admissible evidence as a part of the transaction; East, Pl. Cr. 414; 2 Stark. 241; 1 Phill. Ev. 4th Am. ed. 185.

In the United States the tendency is to extend, rather than to narrow the scope of the doctrine of res gestæ. Although generally the declarations must be contemporaneous with the event sought to be proved, yet, where there are connecting circumstances, they may, even when made some time afterwards, form a part of the whole res gestæ; 8 Wall. 397; 55 Penn. 402; 57 Mo. 93; 47 id. 239; 1 Cush. 181. In England the decision of Cockburn, C. J., in Bedingfield's case, 14 Cox C. C. 341, is directly contrary, holding that the declaration must be contemporaneous with the event to be admissible. This decision has been vigorously opposed by Mr. Taylor and others. See 14 Am. L. Rev. 817; 15 id. 1, 71; 34 Am. Rep. 479.

RES INTEGRA (Lat. an entire thing; an entirely new or untouched matter). A term applied to those points of law which have not been decided, which are untouched by dictum or decision. 3 Mer. 269; 1 Burge, Confl. Laws, 241.

RES INTER ALIOS ACTA (Lat.). A technical phrase which signifies acts of others or transactions between others.

Neither the declarations nor any other acts of those who are mere strangers, or, as it is usually expressed, any res inter alios acta, are admissible in evidence against any one: when the party against whom such acts are offered in evidence was privy to the act, the objection ceases: it is no longer res inter alios; 1 Stark. Ev. 52; 3 id. 1300; 4 Mann. & G. 282. See 1 Metc. Mass. 55; MAXIMS.

RES JUDICATA (Lat. things decided). In Practice. A legal or equitable issue which has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction.

It is a general principle that such dicision is binding and conclusive upon all other courts of concurrent power. This principle pervades not only our own, but all other systems of jurisprudence, and has become a rule of universal law, founded on the soundest policy. If, therefore, Paul sue Peter to recover the amount due to him upon a bond, and on the trial the plaintiff fails to prove the due execution of the bond by Peter, —in consequence of which a verdict is rendered for the defendant, and judgment is entered thereupon,—this judgment, till reversed on error, is conclusive upon the parties, and Paul cannot recover in a subsequent suit, although he may then be able to prove the due execution of the bond by Peter, and that the money is due to him; for, to use the language of the civilians, res judicata facit ex albo nigrum, ex nigro album, ex curvo rectum, ex recto curvum (a decision makes white black; black, white; the crooked, straight; the straight, crooked).

The constitution of the United States and the amendments to it declare that no fact once tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examinable in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

But in order to make a matter res judicata there must be a concurrence of the four conditions following, namely: identity in the thing sued for; 5 M. & W. 109; 7 Johns. 20; 1 Hen. & M. 449; 1 Dana, 434; identity of the cause of action: if, for example, I have claimed a right of way over Blackacre, and a final judgment has been rendered against me, and afterwards I purchase Blackacre, this first decision shall not be a bar to my recovery when I sue as owner of the land, and not for an easement over it which I claimed as a right appurtenant to my land Whiteacre; 6 Wheat. 109; 2 Gall. 216; 17 Mass. 237; 2 Leigh, 474; 8 Conn. 268; 1 N. & M'C. So. C. 329; 16 S. & R. 282; 3 Pick. 429; identity of persons and of parties to the action; 7 Cra. 271; 1 Wheat. 6; 14 S. & R. 435; 4 Mass. 441; 2 Yerg. 10; 5 Me. 410; 8 Gratt. 68; 16 Mo. 168; 12 Ga. 271; 21 Ala. N. S. 813; 28 Barb. 464; this rule is a necessary consequence of the rule of natural justice, ne inauditus condemnetur; identity of the quality in the persons for or against whom the claim is made; for example, an action by Peter to recover a horse, and a final judgment against him, is no bar to an action by Peter, administrator of Paul, to recover the same horse; 5 Co. 32 b; 6 Mann. & G. 164; 4 C. B. 884. See Wells, Res Adjudicata, etc.; FORMER JUDGMENT.

RES MANCIPI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Those things which might be sold and alienated, or of which the property might be transferred from one person to another.

The division of things into res mancipi and res nec mancipi was one of ancient origin, and it continued to a late period in the empire. Res mancipi (Ulp. Frag. xix.) are prædia in italico solo, both rustic and urban; also, jura rusticorum prædiorum or servitutes, as via, iter, aquæductus; also slaves, and four-footed animals, as oxen, horses, etc., quæ collo dorsove domantur. Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq. To this list may be added children of Roman parents, who were, according to the old law, res mancipi. The distinction between res mancipi and nec mancipi was abolished by Justinian in his Code. Id.; Cooper, Inst. 442.

RES NOVA (Lat.). Something new; something not before decided.

RES NULLIUS (Lat.). A thing which has no owner. A thing which has been abandoned by its owner is as much res nullius as if it had never belonged to any one.

The first possessor of such a thing becomes the owner: res nullius fit primi occupantis Bowy. Com. 97.

RES PERIIT DOMINO (Lat. the thing is lost to the owner). A phrase used to express that when a thing is lost or destroyed it is lost to the person who was the owner of it at the time. For example, an article is sold; if the seller have perfected the title of the buyer so that it is his, and it be destroyed, it is the buyer's loss; but if, on the contrary, something remains to be done before the title becomes vested in the buyer, then the loss falls on the seller.

RES PRIVATÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things the property of one or more individuals. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 157.

RES PUBLICÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things the property of the state. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 157; Erskine, Inst. 2. 1. 5. 6.

RES RELIGIOSÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things pertaining to religion. Places where the dead were buried. Thevenot Dessaules, Dict. du Dig. Chose.

RES SACRÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which had been publicly consecrated.

RES SANCTÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which were especially protected against injury of man.

RES UNIVERSITATIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which belonged to cities or municipal corporations. They belonged so far to the public that they could not be appropriated to private use: such as public squares, market-houses, streets, and the like. Inst. 2. 1. 6.

RESALE. A second sale made of an article: as, for example, when A, having sold a horse to B, and the latter, not having paid for him, and refusing to take him away, when by his contract he was bound to do so, again sells the horse to C. The effect of a resale is in this case, that B would be liable to A for the difference of the price between the sale and resale; 4 Bingh. 722; 4 Mann. & G. 898; Blackb. Sales, 336.

RESCEIT, RECEIT. The admission or receiving of a third person to plead his right in a cause formerly commenced between two other persons: as, when an action is brought against a tenant for life or years, or any other particular tenant, and he makes default, in such case the reversioner may move that he may be received to defend his right and to plead with the demandant. Jacob, Law Dict.; Cowel.

The admittance of a plea when the controversy is between the same two persons. Co. Litt. 192.

RESCISSION OF CONTRACTS. The abrogation or annulling of contracts.

It may take place by mutual consent; and this consent may be inferred from acts; 4 Mann. & G. 898; 7 Bingh. 266; 1 Pick. 57; 4 id. 114; 5 Me. 277. It may take place as the act of one party, in consequence of a failure to perform by the others; 2 C. B. 905; 4 Wend. 285; 2 Penn. 454; 3 id. 445; 28 N. H. 561; 9 La. An. 31; not so, ordinarily, where the failure is but partial; 4 Ad. & E. 599; 1 M. & W. 231; on account of fraud, even though partially executed; 5 Cush. 126; 15 Ohio, 200; 23 N. H. 519. See 25 Alb. L. J. 69.

A contract cannot, in general, be rescinded by one party unless both parties can be placed in the same situation and can stand upon the same terms as existed when the contract was made; 2 Y. & J. 278; 4 Mann. & G. 903; 1 M. & W. 231; 3 Me. 30; 1 Denio, 69; 22 Pick. 283; 4 Blackf. 515; 2 Watts, 433; 10 Ohio, 142; 3 Vt. 442; 1 N. H. 17. It must be done at the time specified, if there be such a time: otherwise, within a reasonable time; 2 Camp. 530; 14 Me. 57; 22 Pick. 546; in case of fraud, upon its discovery; 1 Denio, 69; 5 M. & W. 83. The right may be waived by mere lapse of time; 3 Stor. 612; see 6 Cl. & F. 234; or other circumstances; 9 B. & C. 59; 4 Denio, N. Y. 554; 4 Mass. 502; Baldw. 331.

The equity for the rescission and cancellation of agreements, securities, deeds, and other instruments arises when a transaction is vitiated by illegality or fraud, or by reason of its having been carried on in ignorance or mistake of facts material to its operation. The jurisdiction of the court of equity is exercised upon the principle of quia timet; that is, for fear that such agreements, securities, deeds, and other instruments may be vexatiously or injuriously used against the party seeking relief, when the evidence to impeach them may be lost; or that they may throw a cloud or suspicion over his interest or title; or where he has a defence good in equity which cannot be made available at law. The cases in which this relief will be granted on account of misrepresentation and fraud may be divided into four classes: first, where there is actual fraud in the party defendant in which the party plaintiff has not participated; 13 Pet. 26; secondly, where there is constructive fraud against public policy and the party plaintiff has not participated therein; see 4 Munf. 316; thirdly, where there is a fraud against public policy and the party plaintiff has participated therein, but public policy would be defeated by allowing it to stand; fourthly, where there is a constructive fraud by both parties,—that is, where both parties are in delicto, but not in pari delicto; see 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 694; 3 Jones, Eq. 494; 2 Mas. 378; 25 Ga. 89; 1 Pat. & H. 307; Bisph. Eq. § 31. The court will decree that a deed or other solemn instrument shall be delivered up and cancelled, not only when it is avoidable on account of fraud, but also when it is absolutely void, unless its invalidity appears upon the face of it, so that it may be defeated at any time by a defence at law; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 698; 6 Du. N. Y. 597.

The ignorance or mistake which will authorize relief in equity must be an ignorance or mistake of material facts; 1 Stor. 173; 4 Mas. 414; 11 Conn. 134; 6 Wend. 77; 6 Harr. & J. 500; 10 Leigh, 37; and the mistake must be mutual; 3 Green, Ch. 103; 2 Sumn. 387; 11 Pet. 63; 24 Me. 82; 10 Vt. 570; 6 Mo. 16; 35 Penn. 287. If the facts are known but the law is mistaken, the same rule applies in equity as at law, that a mere mistake or ignorance of law, where there is no fraud or trust, is immaterial: ignorantia legis neminem excusat; Adams, Eq. 188; see IGNORANCE; MISTAKE.

Instruments may also be rescinded and cancelled when they have been obtained from persons who were at the time under duress or incapacity; 2 Root, 216; 8 Ohio, 214; 3 Yerg. 537; 36 Miss. 685; or by persons who stood in a confidential relation and took advantage of that relation; 5 Sneed, 583; 31 Ala. N. S. 292; 3 Cow. 537; 2 Mas. 378; 2 A. K. Marsh. 175; 9 Md. 348; 3 Jones, Eq. 152, 186; 30 Miss. 369; 8 Beav. 437.

Gross inadequacy of consideration; 17 Vt. 9; 22 Ga. 637; 19 How. 303; fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment; 3 Pet. 210; 2 Ala. N. S. 251; 10 Yerg. 206; 1 A. K. Marsh. 235; 2 Paige, Ch. 390; 1 D. & B. Eq. 318; 2 Mo. 126; 34 Ala. N. S. 596; 6 Wisc. 295; 9 Ind. 172, 526; hardship and unfairness; 17 Vt. 542; 2 Root, 216; 2 Green, Ch. 357; 2 Harr. & J. 285; 3 Yerg. 537; 8 Ohio, 214; 31 Vt. 101; undue influence; 2 Mas. 378; are among the causes for a rescission of contracts in equity.

RESCISSORY ACTIONS. In Scotch Law. Actions which are brought to set aside deeds. Patterson, Comp. 1058, n.

Proper improbation is an action brought for declaring writing false or forged.

Reduction-improbation is an action whereby a person who may be hurt or affected by a writing insists upon producing or exhibiting it in court, in order to have it set aside, or its effects ascertained under the certification that the writing, if not produced, shall be declared false and forged.

In an action of simple reduction the certification is only temporary, declaring the writings called for null until they be produced; so that they recover their full force after their production. Erskine, b. 4, tit. 1, § 5, b. 4, tit. 1, § 8.

RESCOUS. An old term, synonymous with rescue, which see.

RESCRIPT. In Canon Law. A term including any form of apostolical letter emanating from the pope. The answer of the pope in writing. Dict. Droit Can.

In Civil Law. The answer of the prince, at the request of the parties, respecting some matter in dispute between them, or to magistrates, in relation to some doubtful matter submitted to him.

The rescript was differently denominated according to the character of those who sought it. They were called annotations or subnotations, when the answer was given at the request of private citizens; letters or epistles, when he answered the consultation of magistrates; pragmatic sanctions, when he answered a corporation, the citizens of a province, or a municipality. See CODE.

At Common Law. A counterpart.

In Massachusetts it is used to denote the statement of the decision of the supreme judicial court as an appellate tribunal, and the accompanying brief statement of the reasons for the decision sent to the court from which the case was brought.

RESCRIPTION. In French Law. A rescription is a letter by which the maker requests some one to pay a certain sum of money, or to account for him to a third person for it. Pothier, Contr. de Change, n. 225.

According to this definition, bills of exchange are a species of rescription. The difference appears to be this,—that a bill of exchange is given when there has been a contract of exchange between the drawer and the payee; whereas the rescription is sometimes given in payment of a debt, and at other times it is lent to the payee.

RESCUE. In Criminal Law. The forcibly and knowingly freeing another from arrest or imprisonment. 4 Bla. Com. 131.

A deliverance of a prisoner from lawful custody by a third person. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1065.

Taking and setting at liberty, against law, a distress taken for rent, services, or damage feasant. Bacon, Abr. Rescous.

If the rescued prisoner was arrested for felony, then the rescuer is a felon; if for treason, a traitor; 3 P. Wms. 468; Cro. Car. 583; and if for a trespass, he is liable to a fine as if he had committed the original offence; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 5, c. 21. See 2 Gall. 313; Russ. & R. 432. If the principal be acquitted, the rescuer may nevertheless be fined for the misdemeanor in the obstruction and contempt of public justice; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 598. See T. U. P. Charlt. 13; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 21.

In order to render the rescuer criminal, it is necessary he should have knowledge that the person whom he sets at liberty has been apprehended for a criminal offence, if he is in the custody of a private person; but if he be under the care of a public officer, then he is to take notice of it at his peril; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 606. See further, with regard to the law of rescue, 1 Stor. 88; 2 Gall. 313; 1 Carr. & M. 299; 1 Ld. Raym. 35, 589.

The rescue of cattle and goods distrained by pound-breach is a common-law offence and indictable; 7 C. & P. 233; 5 Pick. 714.

In Maritime Law. The retaking by a party captured of a prize made by the enemy. There is still another kind of rescue which partakes of the nature of a recapture: it occurs when the weaker party, before he is overpowered, obtains relief from the arrival of fresh succors, and is thus preserved from the force of the enemy. 1 C. Rob. 224, 271; Halleck, Int. Law, cxxxv.

Rescue differs from recapture. The rescuers do not by the rescue become owners of the property, as if it had been a new prize; but the property is restored to the original owners by the right of post-liminium.

RESEALING WRIT. The second sealing of a writ by a master so as to continue it, or cure it of an irregularity. Whart. Dict.

RESCUSSOR. The party making a rescue is sometimes so called; but more properly he is a rescuer.

RESERVATION. That part of a deed or instrument which reserves a thing not in esse at the time of the grant, but newly created. 2 Hilliard, Abr. 359.

The creation of a right or interest which had no prior existence as such in a thing or part of a thing granted, by means of a clause inserted by the grantor in the instrument of conveyance.

A reservation is distinguished from an exception in that it is of a new right or interest: thus, a right of way reserved at the time of conveying an estate, which may have been enjoyed by the grantor as owner of the estate, becomes a new right. 42 Me. 9.

A reservation may be of a life-estate; 28 Vt. 10; 33 N. H. 18; 23 Mo. 373; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 230; of a right of flowage; 41 Me. 298; right to use water; 41 Me. 177; 9 N. Y. 423; right of way; 25 Conn. 331; 6 Cush. 254; 10 id. 313; 10 B. Monr. 463; a ground rent, in Pennsylvania, and of many other rights and interests; 33 N. H. 507; 9 B. Monr. 163; 5 Penn. 317; 29 Ohio, 568; 107 Mass. 290. The public land laws of the United States provide for reservations or "reserves" of government land for certain public purposes; such as Indian reservations, and those for military posts.

RESERVE. The National Bank Act directs that all national banks in the sixteen largest cities shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least twenty-five per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and deposits. Fifteen per cent. is required of all other national banks. When the reserve falls below the proper limit, the bank must not increase its liability, otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend, till the limit is reached. On a failure to make good the reserve for thirty days after notice by the comptroller of the currency, the latter may, with the concurrence of the secretary of the treasury, appoint a receiver to wind up the bank. R. S. § 5191.

For point reserved, see that title.

RESET OF THEFT. In Scotch Law. The receiving and keeping stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, with a design of feloniously retaining them from the real owner. Alison, Cr. Law, 328.

RESETTER. In Scotch Law. A receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen.

RESIANCE. A man's residence or permanent abode. Such a man is called a resiant. Kitch. 38.

RESIDENCE (Lat. residea). Personal presence in a fixed and permanent abode. 20 Johns. 208; 1 Metc. Mass. 251.

A residence is different from a domicil, although it is a matter of great importance in determining the place of domicil. See 13 Mass. 501; 2 Gray, 490; 19 Wend. 11; 11 La. 175; 5 Me. 143; DOMICIL. It is an element of domicil. See 97 Penn. 74; 21 Wall. 350; Dicey, Dom. 1. Residence and habitancy are usually synonymous; 2 Gray, 490; 2 Kent, 574, n. Residence indicates permanency of occupation, as distinct from lodging, or boarding, or temporary occupation, but does not include so much as domicil, which requires an intention continued with residence; 19 Me. 293; 2 Kent, 576. In a statute it was held not to mean business residence, but the fixed home of the party; 13 Reptr. 480 (S. C. of Md.); see 15 M. & W. 433.

RESIDENT. One who has his residence in a place.

RESIDENT MINISTER. In International Law. The second or intermediate class between ambassadors and envoys, created by the conference of the five powers at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1818. They are accredited to the sovereign; 2 Phill. Int. Law, 220*. They are said to represent the affairs, and not the person, of the sovereign, and so to be of less dignity; Vattel, b. 4, c. 6, § 73. The fourth class is chargés-d'affaires, accredited to the minister of foreign affairs; 2 Phill. Int. Law, 220; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 3, c. 1, § 6.

RESIDUARY ACCOUNT. In English Practice. The account which every executor and administrator, after paying the debts and particular legacies of the deceased, and before paying over the residuum, must pass before the Board of Inland Revenue. 2 Steph. Com. 208 n.; Moz. & W.

RESIDUARY CLAUSE. The clause in a will by which that part of the property is disposed of which remains after satisfying previous bequests and devises. 4 Kent, 541*; 2 Will. Exec. 1014, n. 2.

RESIDUARY DEVISEE. The person to whom the residue of a testator's real estate is devised after satisfying previous devises.

RESIDUARY ESTATE. What remains of a testator's estate after deducting the debts and the bequests and devises.

RESIDUARY LEGATEE. He to whom the residuum of the estate is devised or bequeathed by will. Rop. Leg.; Powell, Mortg. See LEGACY.

RESIDUE. That which remains of something after taking away a part of it: as the residue of an estate, which is what has not been particularly devised by will.

A will bequeathing the general residue of personal property passes to the residuary legatee every thing not otherwise effectually disposed of; and it makes no difference whether a legacy falls into the estate by lapse or as void at law, the next of kin is equally excluded; 15 Ves. 416; 2 Mer. 392. Where a residuary legacy lapses, there is a pro tanto intestacy; 82 Penn. 428.

RESIGNATION (Lat. resignatio: re, back, signo, to sign). The act of an officer by which he declines his office and renounces the further right to use it. It differs from abdication.

At common law, as offices are held at the will of both parties, if the resignation of an officer be not accepted he remains in office; 4 Dev. 1; 103 U. S. 471; 31 N. J. L. 107; 14 Cent. L. J. 272 (S. C. Kansas); contra, 1 McLean, 509 (see comments on this case in 103 U. S. 471); 6 Cal. 26; 3 Nev. 566 (a U. S. officer); 49 Ala. 402. Ineligibility as presidential elector by reason of holding a disqualifying office, is not removed by a resignation of such office subsequently to the election as a presidential elector; 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 15 n.; S. C. 11 R. I. 638. The acceptance of a second office incompatible with one already held, acts as a resignation of the latter; McCrary, Elect. 179.

RESIGNATION BOND. In Ecclesiastical Law. A bond given by an incumbent to resign on a certain contingency. It may be conditioned to resign for good and sufficient reason, and therefore lawful: e. g. to resign if he take a second benefice, or on request, if patron present his son or kinsman when of age to take the living, etc. Cro. Jac. 249, 274. But equity will generally relieve the incumbent; 1 Rolle, Abr. 443.

RESIGNEE. One in favor of whom a resignation is made. 1 Bell, Com. 125 n.

RESISTANCE (Lat. re, back, sisto, to stand, to place). The opposition of force to force. See ARREST; ASSAULT; OFFICER; PROCESS.

RESOLUTION (Lat. re, back, again, solvo, to loose, to free). A solemn judgment or decision of a court. This word is frequently used in this sense in Coke and some of the more ancient reporters. An agreement to a law or other thing adopted by a legislature or popular assembly. See Dict. de Jurisp.

In Civil Law. The act by which a contract which existed and was good is rendered null.

Resolution differs essentially from rescission. The former presupposes the contract to have been valid, and it is owing to a cause posterior to the agreement that the resolution takes place; while rescission, on the contrary, supposes that some vice or defect annulled the contract from the beginning. Resolution may be by consent of the parties or by the decision of a competent tribunal; rescission must always be by the judgment of a court; 7 Troplong, de la Vente, n. 689; 7 Toullier, 551.

RESOLUTORY CONDITION. One which has for its objects, when accomplished, the revocation of the principal obligation; for example, I will sell you my crop of cotton if my ship America does not arrive in the United States within six months: my ship arrives in one month: my contract with you is revoked. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 764.

RESPIRATION (Lat. re, back, spiro, to breathe). Breathing, which consists of the drawing into, inhaling, or, more technically, inspiring, atmospheric air into the lungs, and then forcing out, expelling, or, technically, expiring, from the lungs the air therein. Chitty, Med. Jur. 92, 416, note n.

RESPITE. In Civil Law. An act by which a debtor who is unable to satisfy his debts at the moment transacts (i.e. compromises) with his creditors and obtains from them time or delay for the payment of the sums which he owes to them. La. Code, 3051.

A forced respite takes place when a part of the creditors refuse to accept the debtor's proposal, and when the latter is obliged to compel them, by judicial authority, to consent to what the others have determined in the cases directed by law.

A voluntary respite takes place when all the creditors consent to the proposal of the debtor to pay in a limited time the whole or a part of his debt.

A delay, forbearance, or continuation of time.

In Criminal Law. A reprieve. A temporary suspension of the execution of a sentence. See 62 Penn. 60. It differs from a pardon, which is an absolute suspension. See PARDON; REPRIEVE.

RESPITE OF HOMAGE. To dispense with the performance of homage by tenants who held their lands in consideration of performing homage to their lords. Cowel.

RESPONDE BOOK. In Scotch Law. A book of record of the chancellary, in which are entered all non-entry and relief duties payable by heirs who take precepts from chancery. Stair, Inst. p. 296, § 28; Erskine, Inst. 11. 5. 50.

RESPONDEAT OUSTER (that he answer over). In Practice. A form of judgment anciently used when an issue in law upon a dilatory plea was decided against the party pleading it. See ABATEMENT.

RESPONDEAT SUPERIOR. A phrase often used to indicate the responsibility of a principal for the acts of his servant or agent. See 5 So. L. Rev. 288; 3 Cent. L. J. 647; Roberts & Wall., Liab. of Empl.; MASTER; AGENT.

RESPONDENT. The party who makes an answer to a bill or other proceeding in chancery.

In Civil Law. One who answers or is security for another; a fidejussor. Dig. 2. 8. 6.

RESPONDENTIA. In Maritime Law. A loan of money, on maritime interest, on goods laden on board of a ship, upon the condition that if the goods be wholly lost in the course of the voyage, by any of the perils enumerated in the contract, the lender shall lose his money; if not, that the borrower shall pay him the sum borrowed, with the interest agreed upon. See Newb. 514.

The contract is called respondentia because the money is lent mainly, or most frequently, on the personal responsibility of the borrower. It differs principally from bottomry, which see, in the following circumstances: bottomry is a loan on the ship; respondentia is a loan upon the goods. 1 Pet. 386. The money is to be repaid to the lender, with maritime interest, upon the arrival of the ship in the one case, and of the goods in the other. In most other respects the contracts are nearly the same, and are governed by the same principles. In the former, the ship and tackle, being hypothecated, are liable, as well as the borrower; in the latter, the lender has, in general, it is said, only the personal security of the borrower; Marsh. Ins. 784.

If any part of the goods arrive safely at the end of the voyage, the lender is entitled to have the proceeds applied to the payment of his debt. If the loan is made to the master, and not to the owners of the goods, the necessity for the loan and for the hypothecation of the cargo must be clearly shown, or the owners of the goods, and, consequently, the goods themselves, will not be bound. The ship and freight are always first to be resorted to to raise money for the necessity of the ship or the prosecution of the voyage; and it seems that a bond upon the cargo is considered by implication of law a bond upon the ship and freight also, and that unless the ship be liable in law the cargo cannot be held liable; The Constancia, 4 Notes of Cas. 285, 512, 677; 10 Jur. 845; 2 W. Rob. 83; 14 Jur. 96. And see 3 Mas. 255.

If the contract clearly contemplates that the goods on which the loan is made are to be sold or exchanged, free from any lien, in the course of the voyage, the lender will have no lien on them, but must rely wholly on the personal responsibility of the borrower. It has been frequently said by elementary writers, and without qualification, that the lender has no lien; 2 Bla. Com. 458; 3 Kent, 354; but the form of bond generally in use in this country expressly hypothecates the goods, and thus, even when there is no express hypothecation, if the goods are still on board at the end of the voyage it is not doubtful that a court of admiralty will direct the arrest of the goods and enforce against them the maritime lien or privilege conferred by the respondentia contract. There is, perhaps, no common-law lien, but this maritime lien only; but the latter will be enforced by the proper admiralty process. See the authorities cited in note to Abb. Shipp. 154; 4 Wash. C. C. 662; form of respondentia bonds in Conkl. Adm. 263; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 437, and n. 5; Abb. Shipp. 978.

RESPONDERE NON DEBET (Lat. ought not to reply). In Pleading. The prayer of a plea where the defendant insists that he ought not to answer, as when he claims a privilege: for example, as being a member of congress or a foreign ambassador. 1 Chitty, Pl. *433.

RESPONSA PRUDENTUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. Opinions given by Roman lawyers.

Before the time of Augustus, every lawyer was authorized, de jure, to answer questions put to him; and all such answers, responsa prudentum, had equal authority, which had not the force of law, but the opinion of a lawyer. Augustus was the first prince who gave to certain distinguished jurisconsults the particular privilege of answering in his name; and from that period their answers acquired greater authority. Adrian determined in a more precise manner the degree of authority which these answers should have, by enacting that the opinions of such authorized jurisconsults, when unanimously given, should have the force of law (legis vicem) and should be followed by the judges, and that when they were divided the judge was allowed to adopt that which to him appeared the most equitable. The opinions of other lawyers held the same place they had before: they were considered merely as the opinions of learned men. Mackeldey, Man. Introd. § 43; Mackeldey, Hist. du Dr. Rom. §§ 40, 49; Hugo, Hist. du Dr. Rom. § 313; Inst. 1. 2. 8; Institutes Expliquées, n. 39.

RESPONSALIS. In Old English Law. One who appeared for another.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A proctor.

RESPONSIBILITY. The obligation to answer for an act done and to repair any injury it may have caused.

One person—as, for example, a principal, master, or parent—is frequently responsible, civilly, for the acts of another.

Penal responsibility is always personal; and no one can be punished for the commission of a crime but the person who has committed it, or his accomplice.

RESPONSIBLE. Able to pay the sum which may be required of him; able to discharge an obligation. Webst. Dict.; 26 N. H. 527. A promise "to be responsible" for the debt of another, is merely a guaranty, and not a suretyship; 9 Phila. 499.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT. A term used in England and her colonial possessions to indicate an obligation to resign, on the part of the executive council, upon the declaration of a want of confidence by vote of the legislative branch of the colonial government. Mills, Col. Const. 27.

RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRAM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A restoring parties to the condition they were in before entering into a contract or agreement on account of fraud, infancy, force, honest mistake, etc. Calvinus, Lex. The going into a cause anew from the beginning. Calvinus, Lex.

RESTITUTION. In Maritime Law. The placing back or restoring articles which have been lost by jettison: this is done, when the remainder of the cargo has been saved, at the general charge of the owners of the cargo; but when the remainder of the goods is afterwards lost, there is not any restitution. Stevens, Av. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 1, n. 8. As to restitution of captured vessels, see RECAPTURE; Desty, Sh. & Adm. § 446.

In Practice. The return of something to the owner of it or to the person entitled to it.

After property has been taken into execution, and the judgment has been reversed or set aside, the party against whom the execution was sued out shall have restitution; and this is enforced by a writ of restitution; Cro. Jac. 698; 13 S. & R. 294. When the thing levied upon under an execution has not been sold, the thing itself shall be restored; when it has been sold, the price for which it is sold is to be restored; Bacon, Abr. Execution (Q); 1 Maule & S. 425.

RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS. In Ecclesiastical Law. A compulsory renewal of cohabitation between a husband and wife who have been living separately. Unknown in the United States.

A suit may be brought in the divorce and matrimonial court for this purpose whenever either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without sufficient reason, by which the party injured may compel the other to return to cohabitation; 3 Bla. Com. 94; 3 Steph. Com. 11; 1 Add. Eccl. 305; 3 Hagg. 619. Formerly a deed of separation afforded no bar to this suit, even though it in terms forbade such proceedings. But this rule is now changed, and to one separated spouse chancery will now grant an injunction, to restrain the other from suing for restitution of conjugal rights; Schoul. Hus. & Wife, § 482.

RESTITUTION OF MINORS. In Scotch Law. A minor on attaining majority may obtain relief against a deed previously executed by him, which may be held void or voidable, according to circumstances. This is called restitution of minors. Bell.

RESTRAINT. Contracts operating for the restraint of trade are presumptively illegal and void on the ground of the policy of the law favoring freedom of trade; but the presumption of illegality may be rebutted by the occasion and circumstances. Thus in agreements for the sale of the good-will of a firm, or the formation or dissolution of a partnership, provisions operating in restraint of trade are frequently inserted. Their validity depends upon whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in whose favor it is imposed; Leake Contr. 734–735. Whatever restraint is larger than is necessary for the protection of this party is void: therefore, the restraint must be limited in regard to space; 5 M. & W. 562; L. R. 15 Eq. 59. An agreement reasonable in regard to space may be unlimited in regard to the duration of time provided for; but where the question is whether the limit of space is unlimited, the duration of the restraint in point of time may become an important matter; Leake, Contr. 736; 2 M. & G. 20.

There are cases where an unlimited restraint is justified: e. g. the sale of a secret process of manufacture of an article in general demand, which it is agreed shall be communicated for the exclusive benefit of the buyer; see L. R. 9 Eq. 45; so of the sale of a patent right, the restraint may be unlimited while the patent continues; 1 H. & N. 189.

Some cases have required the presence of a sufficient and reasonable consideration to support a contract in restraint of trade; 8 Mass. 223; 21 Wend. 158; see 3 Ohio St. 275; but in England a legally valid consideration only is required; 6 A. & E. 438. See, generally, 1 Sm. L. C. 724; 35 Am. Rep. 269.

Conditions in wills in general restraint of marriage are held void. The subject is encumbered with many refined distinctions; see 2 Jarm. Wills, *44; art. in 2 Law Mag. & Rev. 419, 4th series.

RESTRAINING. Narrowing down; making less extensive. For example, a restraining statute is one by which the common law is narrowed down or made less extensive in its operation. Restraining powers are the limitations or restrictions upon the use of a power imposed by the donor. Restraining order is an order granted on motion or petition, restraining the Bank of England or other public company from allowing any dealing with certain specified stock or shares. Hunt, Eq. pt. iii. c. 3, s. 2.

RESTRICTIVE INDORSEMENT. An indorsement which confines the negotiability of a promissory note or bill of exchange by using express words to that effect: as, by indorsing it payable to A B only. 1 Wash. C. C. 512; 2 Murph. 138.

RESTS. A term used in computing interest especially on mortgages and in trust accounts. It consists in striking a balance of the account, at the end of any fixed period, upon which interest is allowed, thus giving the benefit of compound interest; Sm. Eq. 205, 320; 2 Pars. Con. *151.

RESULTING TRUST. A trust raised by implication or construction of law, and presumed to exist from the supposed intention of the parties and the nature of the transaction.

All trusts created by implication or construction of law are often included under the general term implied trusts; but these are commonly distinguished into implied or resulting and constructive trusts: resulting or presumptive trusts being those which are implied or presumed from the supposed intention of the parties and the nature of the transaction; constructive trusts, such as are raised independently of any such intention, and which are forced on the conscience of the trustee by equitable construction and the operation of law. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1095; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 510; 2 id. 196; 3 Swanst. 585; 1 Ohio, 321; 6 Conn. 285; 2 Edw. Ch. 373; 6 Humphr. 93.

Where upon a purchase of property, the conveyance of the legal estate is taken in the name of one person, while the consideration is given or paid by another, the parties being strangers to each other, a resulting or presumptive trust immediately arises by virtue of the transaction, and the person named in the conveyance will be a trustee for the party from whom the consideration proceeds; 30 Me. 126; 8 N. H. 187; 15 Vt. 525; 5 Cush. 435; 10 Paige, Ch. 618; 2 Green, Ch. 480; 18 Penn. St. 283; 2 Harr. Del. 225.

The fact that a conveyance is voluntary, especially when accompanied by other circumstances indicative of such an intention, it is said, may raise a resulting trust. See 2 Vern. 473; 23 Penn. 243; 29 Me. 410; 1 Johns. Ch. 240; 1 Dev. Eq. 456; 14 B. Monr. 585.

Where a voluntary; 1 Atk. 188; disposition of property by deed; 1 Dev. Eq. 493; or will is made to a person as trustee, and the trust is not declared at all; 10 Ves. 527; 19 id. 359; 3 Sim. 538; 6 Hare, 148; or is ineffectually declared; 10 Ves. 527; 1 Myl. & C. 286; 13 Sim. 496; 2 Dev. Eq. 255; or does not extend to the whole interest given to the trustee; 8 Pet. 326; 14 B. Monr. 585; 3 H. L. C. 492; 2 Vern. 644; or it fails either wholly or in part by lapse or otherwise; 1 Rop. Leg. 627; 5 Harr. & J. 392; 5 Paige, Ch. 318; 6 Ired. Eq. 137; 7 B. Monr. 481; 15 Penn. 500; 10 Hare, 204; the interest so undisposed of will be held by the trustee, not for his own benefit, but as a resulting trust for the donor himself, or for his heir at law or next of kin, according to the nature of the estate.

The property may be personal or real; 8 Humphr. 447; 1 Ohio St. 10; 26 Miss. 615; 2 Beav. 454.

Consult Story, Bishp., on Equity Jur.; Spence, Adams, Hill, Lewin, Sanders, on Trusts.

RESULTING USE. A use raised by equity for the benefit of a feoffor who has made a voluntary conveyance to uses without any declaration of the use. 2 Washb. R. P. 100.

The doctrine, at first limited to the case of an apparently voluntary conveyance with no express declaration, became so extended that a conveyance of the legal estate ceased to imply an intention that the feoffee should enjoy the beneficial interest therein; and if no intent to the contrary was expressed, and no consideration proved or implied, the use always resulted to the feoffor; 2 Washb. R. P. 100. And if part only of the use was expressed, the balance resulted to the feoffor; 2 Atk. 150; 2 Rolle, Abr. 781; Co. Litt. 23 a. And, under the statute, where a use has been limited by deed and expires, or cannot vest, it results back to the one who declared it; 4 Wend. 494; 15 Me. 414; 5 W. & S. 323; And see Cro. Jac. 200; Tudor, Lead. Cas. Eq. 258; 2 Washb. R. P. 132.

RESUMPTION. The taking again by the crown of land or tenements, which, on false suggestion, had been granted by letters patent. Whart. Dict.

RETAIL. To sell by small parcels, and not in the gross. 5 Mart. La. N. s. 297.

RETAILER OF MERCHANDISE. One who deals in merchandise by selling it in smaller quantities than he buys,—generally with a view to profit. 1 Cra. C. C. 268.

RETAIN. In Practice. To engage the services of an attorney or counsellor to manage a cause. See RETAINER.

RETAINER. The act of withholding what one has in one's own hands, by virtue of some right. See ADMINISTRATOR; EXECUTOR; LIEN.

In Practice. The act of a client by which he engages an attorney or counsellor to manage a cause, either by prosecuting it, when he is plaintiff, or defending it, when he is defendant.

The retaining fee.

In English practice a much more formal retainer is usually required than in America. Thus it is said by Chitty, 3 Pr. 116, note m, that, although it is not indispensable that the retainer should be in writing, unless required by the other side, it is very expedient. It is therefore recommended, particularly when the client is a stranger, to require from him a written retainer, signed by himself; and, in order to avoid the insinuation that it was obtained by contrivance, it should be witnessed by one or more respectable persons. When there are several plaintiffs, it should be signed by all, and not by one for himself and the others, especially if they are trustees or assignees of a bankrupt or insolvent. The retainer should also state whether it be given for a general or a qualified authority. See 9 Wheat. 738, 830; 6 Johns. 34, 296; 11 id. 464; 1 N. H. 23; 28 id. 302; 7 Harr. & J. 275; 27 Miss. 567.

The effect of a retainer to prosecute or defend a suit is to confer on the attorney all the powers exercised by the forms and usages of the courts in which the suit is pending; 2 M'Cord, Ch. 409; 13 Metc. 269. He may receive payment; 13 Mass. 320; 4 Conn. 517; 39 Me. 386; 1 Wash. C. C. 10; 8 Pet. 18; may bring a second suit after being nonsuited in the first for want of formal proof; 12 Johns. 315; may sue a writ of error on the judgment; 16 Mass. 74; may discontinue the suit; 6 Cow. 385; may restore an action after a nol. pros.; 1 Binn. 469; may claim an appeal, and bind his client in his name for the prosecution of it; 1 Pick. 462; may submit the suit to arbitration; 1 Dall. 164; 16 Mass. 396; 8 Rich. 468; 6 McLean, 190; 7 Cra. 436; may sue out an alias execution; 2 N. H. 376; may receive livery of seisin of land taken by an extent; 13 Mass. 363; may waive objections to evidence, and enter into stipulation for the admission of facts or conduct of the trial; 2 N. H. 520; and for release of bail; 1 Murph. 146; may waive the right of appeal, review, notice, and the like, and confess judgment; 5 N. H. 393; 4 T. B. Monr. 377; 5 Pet. 99. But he has no authority to execute a discharge of a debtor but upon the actual payment of the full amount of the debt; 8 Dowl. 656; 8 Johns. 361; 10 Vt. 471; 32 Me. 110; 21 Conn. 245; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 392; 14 Penn. 87; 13 Ark. 644; 1 Pick. 347; and that in money only; 16 Ill. 272; 1 Iowa, 360; see 6 Barb. N. Y. 201; nor to release sureties; 3 J. J. Marsh. 532; 4 McLean, 87; nor to enter a retraxit; 3 Blackf. 137; nor to act for the legal representatives of his deceased client; 2 Penn. N. J. 689.

There is an implied contract on the part of an attorney who has been retained, that he will use due diligence in the course of legal proceedings; but it is not an undertaking to recover a judgment; Wright, Ohio, 446. See 3 Camp. 17; 7 C. & P. 289; 16 S. & R. 368; 2 Cush. 316. An attorney is bound to act with the most scrupulous honor; he ought to disclose to his client if he has any adverse retainer which may affect his judgment or his client's interest; but the concealment of the fact does not necessarily imply fraud; 3 Mas. 305. See Weeks, Att. at Law.

RETAINING FEE. A fee given to counsel on being consulted, in order to insure his future services. See RETAINER.

RETAINING A CAUSE. Under the English Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875, a cause brought in a wrong division of the High Court of Justice may be retained therein, at the discretion of the court or a judge.

RETAKING. The taking one's goods, wife, child, etc. from another, who without right has taken possession thereof. See RECAPTION; RESCUE.

RETALIATION. See LEX TALIONIS.

RETENTION. In Scotch Law. The right which the possessor of a movable has of holding the same until he shall be satisfied for his claim either against such movable or the owner of it; a lien.

General retention is the right to withhold or detain the property of another, in respect of any debt which happens to be due by the proprietor to the person who has the custody, or for a general balance of accounts arising on a particular train of employment. 2 Bell, Com. 90.

Special retention is the right of withholding or retaining property or goods which are in one's possession under a contract, till indemnified for the labor or money expended on them.

RETIRE. As applied to bills of exchange, this word is ambiguous. It is commonly used of an indorser who takes up a bill by handing the amount to a transferee, after which the indorser holds the instrument with all his remedies intact. But it is sometimes used of an acceptor, by whom when a bill is taken up or retired at maturity, it is in effect paid, and all the remedies on it extinguished; Byles, Bills, *222.

RETORNA BREVIUM. In Old English Law. The return of writs by sheriffs and bailiffs, which is only a certificate delivered to the court on the day of return, of that which he hath done touching the execution of their writ directed to him: this must be indorsed on back of writ by officer; 2 Lilly, Abr. 476. Each term has return days, fixed, as early as 51 Hen. III., at intervals of about a week, on which all original writs are returnable. The first return day is regularly the first day in the term; but there are three days' grace. 3 Bla. Com. 278.

RETORNO HABENDO. In Practice. A writ issued to compel a party to return property to the party to whom it has been adjudged to belong, in an action of replevin.

Thus, where the property taken was cattle, it recites that the defendant was summoned to appear to answer the plaintiff in a plea whereof he took of the cattle of the said plaintiff, specifying them, and that the said plaintiff afterwards made default, wherefore it was then considered that the said plaintiff and his pledges of prosecuting should be in mercy, and that the said defendant should go without day, and that he should have return of the cattle aforesaid. It then commands the sheriff that he should cause to be returned the cattle aforesaid to the said defendant without delay, etc. 2 Sell. Pr. 168.

RETORSION. The name of the act employed by a government to impose the same hard treatment on the citizens or subjects of a state that the latter has used towards the citizens or subjects of the former, for the purpose of obtaining the removal of obnoxious measures. Vattel, liv. 2, c. 18, § 341; De Martens, Précis, liv. 8, c. 2, § 254; Klüber, Droit des Gens, s. 2, c. 1, § 234.

The act by which an individual returns to his adversary evil for evil; as, if Peter call Paul thief, and Paul says, You are a greater thief.

RETOUR SANS PROTET. A request or direction by the drawer of a bill of exchange, that in case the bill should not be honored by the drawee, it may be returned without protest, by writing the words "retour sans protet" or "sans pais." Should such request be made, it is said that a protest as against the drawer, and perhaps as against the indorsers, is unnecessary; Byles, Bills, *260.

RETRACT (Lat. re, back, traho, to draw). To withdraw a proposition or offer before it has been accepted.

This the party making it has a right to do as long as it has not been accepted; for no principle of law or equity can, under these circumstances, require him to persevere in it. See OFFER.

After pleading guilty, a defendant will, in certain cases where he has entered that plea by mistake or in consequence of some error, be allowed to retract it. But where a prisoner pleaded guilty to a charge of larceny, and sentence has been passed upon him, he will not be allowed to retract his plea and plead not guilty; 9 C. & P. 346; Dig. 12. 4. 5.

RETRAXIT (Lat. he has withdrawn). In Practice. The act by which a plaintiff withdraws his suit. It is so called from the fact that this was the principal word used when the law entries were in Latin.

A retraxit differs from a nonsuit—the former being the act of the plaintiff himself, for it cannot even be entered by attorney; 8 Co. 58; 3 Penn. 157, 163; and it must be after declaration filed; 3 Leon. 47; 3 Penn. 163; while the latter occurs in consequence of the neglect merely of the plaintiff. A retraxit also differs from a nolle prosequi. The effect of a retraxit is a bar to all actions of a like or a similar nature; Bacon, Abr. Nonsuit (A); a nolle prosequi is not a bar even in a criminal prosecution; 2 Mass. 172. See 2 Sell. Pr. 338; Bacon, Abr. Nonsuit; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (X 2).

RETRIBUTION. That which is given to another to recompense him for what has been received from him: as, a rent for the hire of a house.

A salary paid to a person for his services.

The distribution of rewards and punishments.

RETROCESSION. In Civil Law. When the assignee of heritable rights conveys his rights back to the cedent, it is called a retrocession. Erskine, Inst. 3. 5. 1; Dict. de Jur.

RETROSPECTIVE (Lat. retro, back, spectare, to look). Looking backward. Having reference to a state of things existing before the act in question.

This word is usually applied to those acts of the legislature which are made to operate upon some subject, contract, or crime which existed before the passage of the acts; and they are therefore called retrospective laws. These laws are generally unjust, and are to a certain extent forbidden by that article in the constitution of the United States, which prohibits the passage of ex post facto laws, or laws impairing contracts. See EX POST FACTO LAW.

The right to pass retrospective laws, with the exceptions above mentioned, exists in the several states, according to their own constitutions, and they become obligatory if not prohibited by the latter; 4 S. & R. 364; 1 Bay, 179; 7 Johns. 477. See 3 S. & R. 169; 2 Cra. 272; 2 Pet. 414; 8 id. 110; 11 id. 420; Baldw. 74; 18 Ind. 237; 19 Iowa, 388; 52 Penn. 474.

An instance may be found in the laws of Connecticut. In 1795, the legislature passed a resolve setting aside a decree of a court of probate disapproving of a will, and granted a new hearing: it was held that the resolve, not being against any constitutional principle in that state, was valid; 3 Dall. 386. And in Pennsylvania a judgment was opened by the act of April 1, 1837, which was holden by the supreme court to be constitutional; 2 W. & S. 271.

Laws should never be considered as applying to cases which arose previously to their passage, unless the legislature have clearly declared such to be their intention; 12 La. 352. See Barrington, Stat. 466, n.: 7 Johns. 477; 1 Kent, 455; Code, 1. 14. 7; Bracton, 1. 4, f. 228; Story, Const. § 1393; 1 McLean, 40; 1 Meigs, 437; 3 Dall. 391; 1 Blackf. 193; 2 Gall. 139; 1 Yerg. 360; 12 S. & R. 330. See EX POST FACTO LAW; IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS; Wade, Retrosp. Leg.

RETURN. Persons who are beyond the sea are exempted from the operation of the statute of limitations of Pennsylvania, and of other states, till after a certain time has elapsed after their returning. As to what shall be considered a return, see 14 Mass. 203; 1 Gall. 342; 3 Johns. 263; 2 W. Blackst. 723; 3 Litt. 48; 1 Harr. & J. 89, 350.

When a member of parliament has been elected to represent a certain constituency, he is said to be returned, in reference to the return of the writ directing the proper officer to hold the election. In this country, election returns are the statements or reports of the balloting at an election, by the proper officers.

RETURN-DAY. A day appointed by law when all writs are to be returned which have issued since the preceding return-day. The sheriff is, in general, not required to return his writ until the return-day. After that period he may be ruled to make a return.

RETURN OF PREMIUM. In Insurance. A repayment of a part or the whole of the premium paid. Policies of insurance, especially those on marine risks, not unfrequently contain stipulations for a return of the whole or a part of the premium in certain contingencies; 2 Phill. Ins. xxii. sect. xi.; but in the absence of any such stipulation, in a case free of fraud on the part of the assured, if the risk does not commence to run he is entitled to a return of it, if paid, or an exoneration from his liability to pay it, subject to deduction settled by stipulation or usage; and so, pro rata, if only a part of the insured subject is put at risk; 2 Phill. Ins. ch. xxii. sect. i.; and so an abatement of the excess of marine interest over the legal rate is made in hypothecation of ship or cargo in like case; id. ibid. sect. vii.; Boulay-Paty, Droit Com. p. 63, ed. of 1822; Pothier, Cout. à la Grosse, n. 39.

RETURN OF WRITS. In Practice. A short account, in writing, made by the sheriff, or other ministerial officer, of the manner in which he has executed a writ. Steph. Pl. 24.

It is the duty of such officer to return all writs on the return-day: on his neglecting to do so, a rule may be obtained on him to return the writ, and if he do not obey the rule he may be attached for contempt. See 19 Viner, Abr. 171; Comyns, Dig. Return; 2 Lilly, Abr. 476; Wood, Inst. b. 1, c. 7; 1 Rawle, 520.

REUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A party to a suit, whether plaintiff or defendant. Reus est qui cum altero litum contestatum habet, sive id egit, sive cum eo actum est.

A party to a contract. Reus credendi is he to whom something is due, by whatever title it may be; reus debendi is he who owes, for whatever cause. Pothier, Pand. lib. 50.

REVELAND. In Domesday Book we find land put down as thane-lands, which were afterwards converted into revelands, i.e. such lands as, having reverted to the king upon death of his thane, who had it for life, were not since granted out to any by the king, but vested in charge upon account of the reve or bailiff of the manor. Spelm. Feuds, c. 24. Coke was mistaken in thinking it was land held in socage.

REVENDICATION. In Civil Law. An action by which a man demands a thing of which he claims to be owner. It applies to immovables as well as movables, to corporeal or incorporeal things. Merlin, Répert.

By the civil law, he who has sold goods for cash or on credit may demand them back from the purchaser if the purchase-money is not paid according to contract. The action of revendication is used for this purpose. See an attempt to introduce the principle of revendication into our law, in 2 Hall, Law Journ. 181.

Revendication, in another sense, corresponds very nearly to the stoppage in transitu of the common law. It is used in that sense in the Code de Commerce, art. 577. Revendication, says that article, can take place only when the goods sold are on the way to their place of destination, whether by land or water, and before they have been received into the warehouse of the insolvent (failli) or that of his factor or agent authorized to sell them on account of the insolvent. See Dig. 14. 4. 15; 18. 1. 19. 53; 19. 1. 11.

REVENUE. The income of the government arising from taxation, duties, and the like; and, according to some correct lawyers, under the idea of revenue is also included the proceeds of the sale of stocks, lands, and other property owned by the government. Story, Const. § 877. By revenue is also understood the income of private individuals and corporations.

A bill establishing rates of postage is not a bill for raising revenue, within the meaning of the constitution; but post-office laws may be revenue laws without being laws for raising revenue; 13 Blatchf. 207. See 15 Wall. 390; 4 Blatch. 311; 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 30.

REVENUE SIDE OF THE EXCHEQUER. That jurisdiction of the court of exchequer, or of the exchequer division of the high court of justice, by which it ascertains and enforces the proprietary rights of the crown against the subjects of the realm. The practice in revenue cases is not affected by the orders and rules under the judicature act of 1875. Moz. & W.

REVERSAL. In International Law. A declaration by which a sovereign promises that he will observe a certain order, or certain conditions, which have been once established, notwithstanding any changes that may happen to cause a deviation therefrom: as, for example, when the French court consented for the first time, in 1745, to grant to Elizabeth, the czarina of Russia, the title of empress, it exacted as a reversal a declaration purporting that the assumption of the title of an imperial government by Russia should not derogate from the rank which France had held towards her.

Letters by which a sovereign declares that by a particular act of his he does not mean to prejudice a third power. Of this we have an example in history: formerly the emperor of Germany, whose coronation, according to the golden ball, ought to have been solemnized at Aix-la-Chapelle, gave to that city, when he was crowned elsewhere, reversals, by which he declared that such coronation took place without prejudice to its rights, and without drawing any consequences therefrom for the future.

In Practice. The decision of a superior court by which the judgment, sentence, or decree of the inferior court is annulled.

After a judgment, sentence, or decree has been rendered by the court below, a writ of error may be issued from the superior to the inferior tribunal, when the record and all proceedings are sent to the supreme court on the return to the writ of error. When, on the examination of the record, the superior court gives a judgment different from the inferior court, they are said to reverse the proceeding. As to the effect of a reversal, see 9 C. & P. 513. See REVERSE.

REVERSE, REVERSED. A term frequently used in the judgments of an appellate court, in disposing of the case before it. It then means "to set aside, to annul, to vacate." 7 Kans. 254.

REVERSION. The residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him. The return of land to the grantor and his heirs after the grant is over. Co. Litt. 142 b; 2 Bla. Com. 175; 4 Kent, 354.

The reversion is a vested interest or estate and arises by operation of law only. In this latter respect it differs from a remainder, which can never arise except either by will or deed; Cruise, Dig. tit. 17; 4 Kent, 345; 19 Vin. Abr. 217. A reversion is said to be an incorporeal hereditament; 4 Kent, 354; 1 Washb. R. P. 37, 47. See REMAINDER; LIMITATION.

REVERSIONARY INTEREST. The interest which one has in the reversion of lands or other property. The residue which remains to one who has carved out of his estate a lesser estate. See REVERSION. An interest in the land when possession shall fail. Cowel.

REVERSOR. In Scotch Law. A debtor who makes a wadset, and to whom the right of reversion is granted. Erskine, Inst. 2. 8. 1. A reversioner. Jacob, Law. Dict.

REVERTER. Reversion. A possibility or reverter is that species of reversionary interest which exists when the grant is so limited that it may possibly terminate. See 1 Washb. R. P. 63.

REVIEW. In Practice. A second examination of a matter. For example, by the laws of Pennsylvania, the courts having jurisdiction of the subject may grant an order for a view of a proposed road; the reviewers make a report, which, when confirmed by the court, would authorize the laying out of the same. After this, by statutory provision, the parties may apply for a review or second examination, and the last viewers may make a different report. For the practice of reviews in chancery, see BILL OF REVIEW. A bill of review is the appropriate mode of correcting errors apparent on the face of the record; 103 U. S. 766.

REVIEW, COURT OF. In England. A court of appeal in bankruptcy cases, established in 1832 and abolished in 1847. Robson, Bkcy.

REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES. The Revised Statutes were enacted June 22, 1874, and, when printed in 1875, embraced the laws, general and permanent in their nature, in force December 1, 1873. A second edition was completed in the latter part of 1878, and includes only the specific amendments passed by the forty-third and forty-fourth congresses, with references to some other acts. The period from 1874 to 1880 is provided for by a supplement published in 1881, without which the Revised Statutes are not altogether a safe guide to existing laws. See Preface to Supplement to Rev. Stat.

Transactions subsequent to the enactment of the Revised Statutes must be determined by the law as there found, and not by the earlier statutes incorporated therein. In cases of ambiguity or uncertainty, the previous statutes may be referred to to elucidate the legislative intent, but where the language is clear, the Revised Statutes must govern. The second edition is neither a new revision nor a new enactment; it is only a new publication, a compilation containing the original law with certain specific alterations and amendments made by subsequent legislation incorporated therein according to the judgment of the editor, who had no discretion to correct errors or supply omissions; 15 Ct. Cl. 80.

REVISING BARRISTERS. In English Law. Barristers appointed to revise the list of voters for county and borough members of parliament, and who hold courts for that purpose throughout the county, being appointed in July or August. 6 Vict. c. 18.

REVIVAL. Of Contracts. An agreement to renew the legal obligation of a just debt after it has been barred by the act of limitation or lapse of time is called its revival.

In Practice. The act by which a judgment which has lain dormant or without any action upon it for a year and a day is, at common law, again restored to its original force.

When a judgment is more than a day and a year old, no execution can issue upon it at common law; but till it has been paid, or the presumption arises from lapse of time that it has been satisfied, it may be revived and have all its original force, which was merely suspended. This may be done by a scire facias or an action of debt on the judgment. See SCIRE FACIAS.

REVOCATION (Lat. re, back, vocare, to call). The recall of a power or authority conferred, or the vacating of an instrument previously made.

Revocation of grants. Grants may be revoked by virtue of a power expressly reserved in the deed, or where the grant is without consideration or in the nature of a testamentary disposition; 3 Co. 25.

Voluntary conveyances, being without pecuniary or other legal consideration, may be superseded or revoked, in effect, by a subsequent conveyance of the same subject-matter to another for valuable consideration. And it will make no difference that the first conveyance was meritorious, being a voluntary settlement for the support of one's self or family, and made when the grantor was not indebted, or had ample means besides for the payment of his debts. And the English cases hold that knowledge of the former deed will not affect the rights of the subsequent purchaser; 9 East, 59; 4 B. & P. 332; 8 Term, 528; 2 Taunt. 69; 18 Ves. 84. See, also, the exhaustive review of the American cases, in note to Sexton vs. Wheaton, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 36.

In America, it is generally held that a voluntary conveyance which is also fraudulent, is void as to subsequent bona fide purchasers for value with notice; but if not fraudulent in fact, it is only void as to those purchasing without notice; 18 Pick. 131; 2

B. Monr. 345; 10 Ala. N. S. 348, 352; 12 Johns. 536, 557; 4 McCord, 295. See FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

The fact that the voluntary grantor subsequently conveys to another, is regarded as primâ facie evidence that the former deed was fraudulent as to subsequent purchasers without notice, or it would not have been revoked; 5 Pet. 265; 4 M'Cord, 295; 3 Strobh. 59; 1 Rob. Va. 500, 544.

In some of the states, notice of the voluntary deed will defeat the subsequent purchaser; 1 Rawle, 231; 6 Md. 242; 4 M'Cord, 295; 2 M'Mull, 508; 1 Bail. 575; 15 Ala. 525; 5 Pet. 265. But in other states the English rule prevails; 1 Yerg. 13; 5 id. 250; 1 A. K. Marsh. 208; 1 Dana, 531; 3 Ired. Eq. 81.

There is a distinction between the creditors of the grantor by way of family settlement (he being not insolvent or in embarrassed circumstances), and a subsequent purchaser for value. The claim of the latter is regarded as superior to a mere creditor's, whether prior or subsequent to the voluntary conveyance, —especially if he buy without notice. Some of the foregoing cases do not advert to this distinction; 3 Ired. Eq. 81; 4 Vt. 389.

So, too, if one bail money or other valuables to another, to be delivered to a third person on the day of marriage, he may countermand it at any time before delivery over; 1 Dy. 49. But if such delivery be made in payment or security of a debt, or for other valuable consideration, it is not revocable; 1 Stra. 165. And although the gift be not made known to the donee, being for his benefit, his assent will be presumed until he expressly dissents; 3 Co. 26 b; 2 Salk. 618.

Powers of appointment to uses are revocable if so expressed in the deed of settlement. But it is not indispensable, it is said that this power of revocation should be repeated in each successive deed of appointment, provided it exist in the original deed creating the settlement; 4 Kent, 336; 1 Co. 110 b; 1 Ch. Cas. 201; 2 id. 46; 2 Bla. Comm. 339.

It has been said that the power of revocation does not include the appointment of new uses; 2 Freem. 61; Pr. in Ch. 474.

A voluntary deed of trust, without power of revocation, made with a nominal consideration, and without legal advice as to its effect, when there was evidence that its effect was misunderstood by the grantor, will be set aside in equity; 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 345, and note. S. C. 24 N. J. Eq. 243. In a similar case it was held that the mere omission of counsel to advise the insertion of a power of revocation is not a ground to set aside the deed; but that this omission and the absence of the power are circumstances tending to show that the act was not done with a deliberate intent. The deliberate intent of a party to tie up his hands should clearly appear. In the absence of such an intent the omission of a power to revoke is primâ facie evidence of mistake. The mistake being one of fact mixed with legal effects, equity will relieve; 75 Penn. 269; the earlier English cases seem to have insisted upon the presence of a power of revocation in voluntary settlements; L. R. 8 Eq. 558; 14 id. 365; but in a later case it was held that the absence of such a power was merely a circumstance of more or less weight, according to the other circumstances of each case; L. R. 8 Ch. Ap. 430.

THE REVOCATION OF POWERS CONFERRED UPON AGENTS. See AGENCY.

The American courts, following the case of Brown vs. M'Gran, 14 Pet. 479, hold that the consignee of goods for sale, who has incurred liability or made advances upon the faith of the consignment, acquires a power of sale which, to the extent of his interest, is not revocable or subject to the control of the consignor. But if orders are given by the consignor, contemporaneously with the consignment and advances, in regard to the time and mode of sale, and which are, either expressly or impliedly, assented to by the consignee, he is not at liberty to depart from them afterwards. But if no instructions are given at the time of the consignment and advances, the legal presumption is that the consignee has the ordinary right of factors to sell, according to the usages of trade and the general duty of factors, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and reimburse the advances out of the proceeds, and that this right is not subject to the interference or control of the consignor. See 52 Miss. 7; 45 Ind. 115.

The right of the factor to sell in such case is limited to the protection of his own interest, and if he sell more than is necessary for that purpose contrary to the order of his principal, he is liable for the loss incurred; 37 Conn. 378.

The case of Parker vs. Brancker, 22 Pick. 40, seems to go to the length of holding that where the consignment is to sell at a limited price the consignee may after notice sell below that price, if necessary, to reimburse advances. But to this extent the American rule has not gone; 1 Pars. Contr. 59, n. (h). See, also, 12 N. H. 239; 3 N. Y. 78.

The English courts do not hold such a power irrevocable in law; 3 C. B. 380; 5 id. 895. In the last case, Wilde, C. J., thus lays down the rule. It may furnish a ground for inferring that the advances were made upon the footing of an agreement that the factor shall have an irrevocable authority to sell in case the principal made default. But it would be an inference of fact, not a conclusion of law. The fact that the agent has incurred expense in faith of the authority being continued, and will suffer loss by its revocation, is a ground of recovery against the principal, but does not render the power irrevocable.

A pledge of personal property to secure liabilities of the pledgeor, with an express power of sale, confers such an interest in the subject-matter that it will not be revoked by his death; 10 Paige, Ch. 205. But a power to pledge or sell the property of the constituent and from the avails to reimburse advances made or liabilities incurred by the appointee is not so coupled with an interest as to be irrevocable; 8 Wheat. 174; 6 Conn. 559. The interest must exist in the subject-matter of the power, and not merely in the result of its exercise, to become irrevocable; 15 N. H. 468; 20 Ohio St. 185. Hence, if one give a letter of credit agreeing to accept bills to a certain amount within a limited time, the letter is revoked by death, and bills drawn after the death and before knowledge thereof reaches the drawer cannot be enforced against the estate of such deceased party; 28 Vt. 209.

All contracts which are to be executed in the name of the constituent by virtue of an agency, although forming an essential part of a security upon the faith of which advances have been made, are of necessity revoked by the death of the constituent. Even a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, although not revocable by the act of the party, is revoked by his death. The courts, however, allow judgment in such cases to be entered as of a term prior to the death of the constituent; 2 Kent, 646; 9 Wend. 452; 8 Wheat. 174. See, also, 2 Ld. Raym. 766, 849, where the form of procedure is discussed; 7 Mod. 93; Stra. 108. A warrant of attorney to confess judgment, executed by a feme sole, is revoked by her marriage; but if executed to a feme sole, the courts will allow judgment to be entered up in the name of the husband and wife; 1 Salk. 117; 1 P. A. Browne, 253; 3 Harr. Del. 411.

The Powers of Arbitrators. These are revocable by either party at any time before final award; 20 Vt. 198. It is not competent for the parties to deprive themselves of this power by any form of contract; 8 Co. 80; 16 Johns. 205. But where the submission releases the original cause of action, and the adversary revokes, the party so releasing may recover the amount so released by way of damages caused by the revocation; 13 Vt. 97.

Where the submission is made a rule of court, it becomes practically irrevocable, since such an act would be regarded as a contempt of court and punishable by attachment; 7 East, 608. This is the only mode of making a submission irrevocable "when the fear of an attachment may induce them to submit;" 6 Bingh. 443.

In the American courts a submission by rule of court is made irrevocable by the express provisions of the statutes in most of the states, and the referee is required, after due notice, to hear the case ex parte, where either party fails to appear; 12 Mass. 47; 1 Conn. 498; 3 Halst. 116; 4 Me. 459; 5 Penn. 497; 3 Ired. 333. In Ohio, a submission under the statute is irrevocable after the arbitrators are sworn; 19 Ohio St. 245; and it has been held that a naked submission is not revocable after the arbitrator has made his award and published it to one of the parties; 6 N. H. 36. But while a statute requisite, as being witnessed, is not complied with, it is incomplete and so the submission revocable; 5 Paige, Ch. 575.

When one party to the submission consists of several persons, one cannot revoke without the concurrence of the others; 1 Brownl. 62; Rolle, Abr. Authority (H); 12 Wend. 578. But the text-writers are not fully agreed in this proposition; see Russ. Arb. 141; 2 Chitty, Bail. 452, where it was held that the death of one of several parties on one side of the submission operates as a revocation as to such party at least, and that an award made in the name of the survivors and the executor of the deceased party is void. It is here intimated by way of query whether, where the cause of action survives, the award might not legally be made in the name of the surviving party. See Russ. Arb. 155.

An award made after the revocation of the submission is entirely void; 1 Sim. 184.

The power of the arbitrator is determined by the occurrence of any fact which incapacitates the party from proceeding with the hearing. The marriage of a feme sole is a revocation of the arbitrator's power; 2 Kebl. 865; 11 Vt. 525; without notice to the arbitrators; Russ. Arb. 152. So, also, if she be joined with another in the submission, her marriage is a revocation as to both; W. Jones, 228; Rolle, Abr. Authority.

Insanity in either party, or in the arbitrator, will determine his authority. The death of either party, or of the arbitrator, or one of them, or where the arbitrators decline to act, will operate as a revocation of the submission; Caldw. Arb. 90; 17 Ves. 241; 4 T. B. Monr. 3; 1 B. & C. 66.

It is competent to make provision in the submission for the completion of the award, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties, by proceedings in the name of the personal representative. This seems to be the general practice in England in late years; 3 B. & C. 144; 6 Bing. N. C. 158; 8 M. & W. 873. And in some of the American states it is held that a submission by rule of court is not determined by the death of the party, where the cause of action survives, but may be revived and prosecuted in the name of the personal representative; 15 Pick. 79; 3 Halst. 116; 3 Gill, 190. Bankruptcy of the party does not operate to revoke a submission to arbitration; Caldw. Arb. 89. But it seems to be considered in Marsh vs. Wood, 9 B. & C. 659, that the bankruptcy of one party will justify the other in revoking. But see 2 Chitt. Bail, 43; 1 C. B. 131.

The time when the revocation becomes operative. Where it is by the express act of the party, it will be when notice reaches the arbitrator; Caldw. Arb. 80; 5 B. & Ald. 507; 8 Co. 80. But in the case of death, or marriage, or insanity, the act itself terminates the power of the arbitrator at once, and all acts thereafter done by him are of no force; 11 Vt. 525; 5 East, 266.

The form of the revocation is not important, if it be in conformity with the submission, or if, when it is not, it be acquiesced in by the other party; 7 Vt. 237.

It is said in the books that the revocation must be of as high grade of contract as the submission. This seems to be assumed by the text-writers and judges as a settled proposition; Caldw. Arb. 79; 8 Co. 82; Brownl. 62; 8 Johns. 125. Where the submission is in writing, the revocation "ought to be in writing;" 18 Vt. 91. But see 7 Vt. 237, 240; 15 N. H. 468. It seems questionable whether at this day a submission by deed would require to be revoked by deed, since the revocation is not a contract, but a mere notice, and no special right is conferred upon such an act by the addition of wax or wafer; 8 Ired. 74. See 2 Keb. 64. But see 26 Me. 251, contra. But it is conceded the party may revoke by any act which renders it impracticable for the arbitrators to proceed; 7 Mod. 8; Story, Ag. 474.

So a revocation imperfectly expressed, as of the bond instead of the submission, will receive a favorable construction, in order to effectuate the intention of the party; 1 Cow. 325.

It has been held, too, that bringing a suit upon the same cause of action embraced in the submission, at any time before the award, was an implied revocation; 6 Dana, 107; Caldw. Arb. 80.

THE POWER OF A PARTNER to contract in the name of the firm may be revoked, by injunction out of chancery, where there is a wanton or fraudulent violation of the contract constituting the association; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 673. This will sometimes be done on account of the impracticability of carrying on the undertaking; 1 Cox, Ch. 213; 2 V. & B. 299. So, too, such an injunction might be granted on account of the insanity or permanent incapacity of one of the partners; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 673. But insanity is not alone sufficient to produce a dissolution of the partnership; 2 My. & K. 125. See PARTNERSHIP.

AN ORAL LICENSE to occupy land is, where the Statute of Frauds prevails, revocable at pleasure, unless permanent and expensive erections have been made by the licensee in faith of the permission. In such case a court of equity will decree a conveyance on equitable terms, in conformity with the contracts of the parties, or else require compensation to be made upon equitable principles; 1 Stockt. 471; Red. Railw. 106; 13 Vt. 150; 10 Conn. 375.

For the law in regard to the revocation of wills, see WILLS.

REVOCATUR (Lat. recalled). A term used to denote that a judgment is annulled for an error in fact. The judgment is then said to be recalled, revocatur; not reversed, which is the word used when a judgment is annulled for an error in law; Tidd, Pr. 1126.

REVOLT. The endeavor of the crew of a vessel, or any one or more of them, to overthrow the legitimate authority of her commander, with intent to remove him from his command, or against his will to take possession of the vessel by assuming the government and navigation of her, or by transferring their obedience from the lawful commander to some other person. 11 Wheat. 417.

According to Wolff, revolt and rebellion are nearly synonymous: he says it is the state of citizens who unjustly take up arms against the prince or government. Wolff, Droit de la Nat. § 1232. See REBELLION.

By R. S. § 5359, if any one of the crew of an American vessel, on the high seas or other waters, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the U. S., endeavors to make a revolt, etc., or conspires, etc., so to do, or incites, etc., any other of the crew to disobey lawful orders, or to neglect their duty, or assembles such others in a mutinous manner, or makes a riot, or unlawfully confines the master, etc., he is punishable by a fine of not over $1000, or imprisonment for not over five years, or both. By § 5360, if any one of the crew, etc., usurps the command of the vessel, or deprives him of authority, or resists his authority, or transfers the same to one not entitled thereto, he is punishable by a fine of not over $2000, and imprisonment for not over ten years. Foreign seamen on American vessels are punishable under this section; 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 88. If, before a voyage is begun, the seamen for good reason believe that the vessel is unseaworthy, they may resist an attempt to compel them to go to sea in her, without being guilty of a revolt; 1 Sprague, 75.

Revolts on shipboard are to be considered as defined by the last-mentioned act; 1 W. & M. 306.

A confederacy or combination must be shown; 2 Sumn. 582; 1 W. & M. 305; Crabbe, 558. The vessel must be properly registered; 3 Sumn. 342; must be pursuing her regular voyage; 2 Sumn. 470. The indictment must specifically set forth the acts which constitute the crime; Whart. Prec. § 1061, n. And see 1 Mas. 147; 5 id. 402; 1 Sumn. 448; 4 Wash. C. C. 402, 528; 2 Curt. C. C. 225; 1 Pet. C. C. 213.

REWARD. An offer of recompense given by authority of law for the performance of some act for the public good, which, when the act has been performed, is to be paid. The recompense actually so paid.

A reward may be offered by the government or by a private person. In criminal prosecutions, a person may be a competent witness although he expects on conviction of the prisoner to receive a reward; 9 B. & C. 556; 1 Hayw. 3; 1 Root, 249; 4 Bla. Com. 294. See 6 Humphr. 113.

The publication of an advertisement offering a reward for information respecting a loss or crime is a general offer to any person who is able to give the information asked; and the acceptance of it by giving such information creates a valid contract; 82 N. Y.

503; 4 B. & Ad. 621; the offer of a reward may be revoked at pleasure; 16 Ind. 140. See, as to what information will satisfy such a contract, 3 C. B. 254; L. R. 2 Q. B. 301. A promise to pay a reward to a police constable is binding because there might be some information which he was not bound, in the discharge of his ordinary duty, to give; 11 A. & E. 856.

The finder of lost property is not entitled to a reward, if there was no promise of one by the owner; 1 Oreg. 86. In an action for a reward it must appear that the plaintiff acted on the knowledge that a reward had been offered; 6 Humphr. 110. If a sheriff arrests a felon on consideration of public policy, he is not entitled to a reward offered; id.

RHODE ISLAND. One of the original thirteen states of the United States of America; its full style being, "The State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations."

Its territory lies between Massachusetts and Connecticut, in the southwest angle of that portion of the territory of the former state which was known as the colony of New Plymouth, and is situated at the head and along both shores of the Narragansett bay, comprising the islands in the same, the principal of which is Rhode Island, placed at the mouth of the bay. The settlement was commenced as early as June, 1636, on the present site of the city of Providence, by five men under Roger Williams. Williams founded his colony upon a compact which bound the settlers to obedience to the major part "only in civil things;" leaving to each perfect freedom in matters of religious concernment, so that he did not, by his religious practices, encroach upon the public order and peace. A portion of the Massachusetts colonists, who were of the Antinomian party, after their defeat in that colony settled on the island of Aquetnet, now Rhode Island, where they associated themselves as a colony on March 7, 1638. These settlements, together with one "at Shawomet, now Warwick, made by another sect of religious outcasts, under Gorton, in 1642–3, remained under separate voluntary governments until 1647, when they were united under one government, styled 'The Incorporation of Providence Plantations in the Narragansett Bay in New England,' by virtue of a charter granted in 1643."

This colony remained under this charter, which, upon some divisions, was confirmed by Cromwell in 1655, until after the restoration, when a new charter was procured from Charles II., in the fifteenth year of his reign, under which a new colonial government was formed on the 24th of November, 1663, which continued, with the short interruption of the colonial administration of Sir Edmund Andros, down to the period of the American revolution. Under both the parliamentary charter which was procured by Williams, the founder of the settlement at Providence, and the royal charter which was procured by John Clark, one of the founders of the settlement at Aquetnet, religious liberty was carefully protected. By the parliamentary charter, the colony was authorized to make only "such civil laws and constitution as they or the greatest part of them shall by free consent agree unto;" and the royal charter, reciting "that it is much on the hearts" of the colonists, "if they may be permitted, to hold forth a lively experiment, that a most flourishing civil state may stand and best be maintained, and that amongst our English subjects with full liberty in religious concernments," expressly ordained "that no person within said colony, at any time hereafter, shall be any wise molested, punished, disquieted, or called in question for any differences in opinion in matters of religion, and do not actually disturb the civil peace of our said colony; but that all and every person or persons may, from time to time and at all times hereafter, freely and fully have and enjoy his and their own judgments and consciences in matters of religious concernments, throughout the tract of land hereafter mentioned, they behaving themselves peaceably and quietly, and not using the liberty to licentiousness and profaneness, nor to the civil injury or outward disturbance of others; any law, statute or clause therein contained or to be contained, usage or custom of this realm, to the contrary hereof, in any wise notwithstanding."

In the general assembly of the colony, on the first Wednesday of May, 1776, in anticipation of the declaration of independence, an act was passed which absolved the colonists from their allegiance to the king of Great Britain, and which ordered that in future all writs and processes should issue in the charter name of "The Governor and Company of the English Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," instead of the name of the king. The old colonial charter, together with a bill of rights adopted by the general assembly, remained the sole constitution of state government until the first Tuesday in May, 1843, when a state constitution framed by a convention assembled in November, 1842, and adopted by the people of the state, went into operation.

The third article of this constitution distributes the powers of government into the legislative, executive, and judicial.

The fourth article regulates the legislative power. It provides that the constitution shall be the supreme law, and the general assembly shall pass laws to carry it into effect; that there shall be a senate and house of representatives, constituting together the general assembly, and that a concurrence of these two houses shall be necessary to the enactment of laws, that there shall be one session to be holden at Newport, commencing the last Tuesday in May, and an adjournment from the same held annually at Providence, Amend. 1854, art. iii.; that members shall not take fees or be of counsel in any case pending before either house, under penalty of expulsion; against arrest of the person and attachment of the property of the members during the session and two days before and after; for freedom of debate; that each house shall judge the qualifications of its members, see Amend. art. i., as to evidence required; what shall be a quorum, and for continuing the session without a quorum; that each house may prescribe rules of proceedings, and punish and expel members; for keeping a journal of its proceedings; for not adjourning, without consent of the other house, for more than two days at a time; that the assembly shall exercise all their usual powers, though not granted by this constitution; for regulating the pay of members and all other officers. It also provides for abolishing lotteries; for restricting the power to create a debt of more than fifty thousand dollars, except in time of war or invasion or insurrection, without the express consent of the people; that the assent of two-thirds of the members of each house shall be required to a bill appropriating public money for local or private purposes; that new valuations of property may be made by order of the assembly for purposes of taxation; that laws may be passed to continue officers in office till their successors are qualified; that no bill to create a corporation other than for religious, charitable or literary purposes, or for a military or fire company, shall be passed by the assembly to which it is first presented; for joining to elect senators in congress.

It is also provided that amendments to the constitution may be proposed to the people by vote of a majority of all the members elected to each house; that these amendments shall be read, at the annual election of members of the houses, by the clerks of the towns and cities: if the propositions are again approved by a majority of the members of both houses then elected, they are to be submitted to the electors, and if approved by three-fifths of those voting they are adopted.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Senate. The sixth article of the constitution provides that the senate shall consist of the lieutenant-governor and one senator from each town or city in the state; the governor, and in his absence the lieutenant-governor, shall preside, and may vote only in case of a tie; that the senate may elect a presiding officer in case of the death or disability of the governor and lieutenant-governor; that the secretary of state shall be secretary of the senate, unless otherwise provided by law, and shall preside over the senate in case of death of the presiding officer, till a new one is chosen.

The House of Representatives. The fifth article provides that it shall not exceed seventy-two members, elected on the basis of population, giving each town and city one at least, and one for more than half the ratio, allowing reapportionment after each United States or state census, and forbidding districting any town or city; that the house shall elect its presiding officer, and the senior members from the town of Newport shall preside in the organization.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The seventh article provides that the chief executive power of the state shall be vested in a governor, who, together with a lieutenant-governor, shall be annually elected by the people; that the governor shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; that he shall be captain-general and commander-in-chief of the military and naval forces of the state, except when they shall be called into the service of the United States; that he shall have power to grant reprieves after conviction, in all cases except those of impeachment, until the end of the next session of the general assembly; that he may fill vacancies in office not otherwise provided for by this constitution, or by law, until the same shall be filled by the general assembly or by the people; that he may adjourn the houses in case of disagreement as to time or place of adjournment, till the time of the next session, or for a shorter period; that he may convene the assembly at a time or place not provided for by law, in case of necessity; that he shall sign all commissions, and that the secretary of state shall attest them; that the lieutenant-governor shall supply the place in case of vacancy or inability of the governor to fill the office; that the president of the senate shall act as governor if the governor and lieutenant-governor's offices be vacant; that the compensation of the governor and lieutenant-governor shall be fixed by law, and not diminished during their term of office; that the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall hereafter exclusively exercise the pardoning power, except in cases of impeachment, to the same extent as such power is now exercised by the general assembly, Amend. art. ii.; that the duties and powers of the secretary, attorney-general, and general treasurer shall be the same under this constitution as are now established, or as from time to time may be prescribed by law.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Court consists of a chief justice and four associate justices, elected by the two houses of the assembly in grand committee. They are to hold office until their places are declared vacant by a resolution passed by a majority of both houses at the annual session for electing officers, unless removed by impeachment. In case of vacancy by death, resignation, removal from the state or from office, refusal or inability to serve, of any judge of the supreme court, the office may be filled by the grand committee, until the next annual election; and the judge then elected holds his office as before provided. In case of impeachment or temporary absence or inability, the governor may appoint a person to discharge the duties of the office during the vacancy caused thereby.

This court has original jurisdiction concurrent with courts of common pleas, of all civil actions, as well between the state and its citizens as between citizens, where the damages laid exceed one hundred dollars (except in the county of Providence, where damages laid in the writ must be $300 or upwards to give the supreme court original jurisdiction), and of all criminal proceedings, concurrently with the court of common pleas; and exclusive jurisdiction over crimes for which the punishment is for life; see chap. 669, Public Laws, January Sess., 1878; has a general superintendence of all courts of inferior jurisdiction; has exclusive authority to issue writs of error, certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, to entertain informations in the nature of quo warranto; has exclusive cognizance of all petitions for divorce, separate maintenance, alimony, custody of children, and all petitions for relief of insolvents; and exclusive jurisdiction in equity. It is also the supreme court of probate. Two sessions are held annually in each county in the state.

The Court of Common Pleas is held by some one or more of the justices of the supreme court, designated for that purpose by the justices of that Court. This court has original jurisdiction of all civil actions which involve title to real estate or where real estate is attached, if the amount exceed $100, except in case of certain writs. It has jurisdiction, concurrently with the supreme court, of all crimes, and also of actions to recover possession of lands from tenants at will, or sufferance, and the like. It has appellate jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases from justices of the peace and the magistrates' courts. Two sessions of this court are held annually in each county, except Providence, in which there are four sessions. Special terms of this court are also held, for which no jury is to be summoned unless required by notice from one of the parties to the suit. It has concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme court.

Justices of the Peace are elected for one year by the several towns, and also by the general assembly in their discretion as to the number in each town. A justice court is established in every town. Such court is held by a trial justice elected by the town council from the qualified justices of the peace of such town. But the trial justices of Providence, Newport, Woonsocket, and Pawtucket are elected from the qualified justices of the peace of said towns by the general assembly. The justice courts have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all civil actions for less than $100, excepting actions relating to real estate. The justice courts have also jurisdiction or cognizance of all crimes committed within the town in which they are severally established. And this jurisdiction is exclusive where fine does not exceed $20 or imprisonment three months.

Courts of Probate are held by the town councils of the various towns, except in Providence, where the municipal courts acts as a probate court. This court has jurisdiction of the settlement of estates of deceased persons, supervision of guardians, probate of wills, and other similar matters, with a right of appeal to the supreme court.

RHODIAN LAWS. A code of maritime laws adopted by the people of Rhodes, who had by their commerce and naval victories obtained the sovereignty of the sea, about nine hundred years before the Christian era. There is reason to suppose this code has not been transmitted to posterity, at least not in a perfect state. A collection of marine constitutions, under the denomination of Rhodian Laws, may be seen in Vinnius; but they bear evident marks of a spurious origin. See Marsh. Ins. 15; CODE.

RIBAUD. A rogue; a vagrant.

RIDER. A schedule or small piece of paper or parchment added to some part of the record; as, when on the reading of a bill in the legislature a new clause is added, this is tacked to the bill on a separate piece of paper, and is called a rider.

RIDING. In English Law. An ascertained district; part of a county. This term has the same meaning in Yorkshire that division has in Lincolnshire. 4 Term, 459.

RIDING ARMED. The offence of riding or going armed with dangerous or unusual weapons. It is a misdemeanor; 4 Steph. Com. 357.

RIDING CLERK. One of the Six Clerks in chancery, who, in his turn, for one year kept the controlment books of all grants that passed the Great Seal. Whart. Dic.

RIEN. A French word which signifies nothing. It has generally this meaning: as, rien en arrere; rien passe per le fait, nothing passes by the deed; rien per descent, nothing by descent: it sometimes signifies not, as, rien culpable, not guilty. Doctrina Plac. 435.

RIEN EN ARRERE (L. Fr. nothing in arrear). In Pleading. A plea which alleges that there is nothing remaining due and unpaid of the plaintiff's demand. It is a good plea, and raises the general issue in an action for rent. 2 Wm. Saund. 297, n. 1; 2 Chitty, Pl. 486; 2 Ld. Raym. 1503.

RIEN PASSE PER LE FAIT (L. Fr. nothing passed by the deed). In Pleading. A plea which avoids the effect of a deed where its execution cannot be denied, by asserting that nothing passed thereby: for example, an allegation that the acknowledgment was before a court which had not jurisdiction.

RIGHT. A well-founded claim.

If people believe that humanity itself establishes or proves certain claims, either upon fellow-beings, or upon society or government, they call these claims human rights; if they believe that these claims inhere in the very nature of man himself, they call them inherent, inalienable rights; if people believe that there inheres in monarchs a claim to rule over their subjects by divine appointment, they call the claim divine right, jus divinum; if the claim is founded or given by law, it is a legal right. The ideas of claim and that the claim must be well founded always constitute the idea of right. Rights can only inhere in and exist between moral beings: and no moral beings can coexist without rights, consequently without obligations. Right and obligation are correlative ideas. The idea of a well-founded claim becomes in law a claim founded in or established by the law: so that we may say a right in law is an acknowledged claim.

Men are by their inherent nature moral and social beings; they have, therefore, mutual claims upon one another. Every well-grounded claim on others is called a right, and, since the social character of man gives the element of mutuality to each claim, every right conveys along with it the idea of obligation. Right and obligation are correlative. The consciousness of all constitutes the first foundation of the right or makes the claim well grounded. Its incipiency arises instinctively out of the nature of man. Man feels that he has a right of ownership over that which he has produced out of appropriated matter, for instance, the bow he has made of appropriated wood; he feels that he has a right to exact obedience from his children, long before laws formally acknowledge or protect these rights; but he feels, too, that if he claims the bow which he made as his own, he ought to acknowledge (as correlative obligation) the same right in another man to the bow which he may have made; or if he, as father, has a right to the obedience of his children, they have a corresponding claim on him for protection as long as they are incapable to protect themselves. The idea of rights is coexistent with that of authority (or government); both are inherent in man; but if we understand by government a coherent system of laws by which a state is ruled, and if we understand by state a sovereign society, with distinct authorities to make and execute laws, then rights precede government, or the establishment of states, which is expressed in the ancient law maxim: Ne ex regula jus sumatur, sed ex jure quod est, regula fiat. See GOVERNMENT. We cannot refrain from referring the reader to the noble passage of Sophocles, Œdyp. Tyr. 876 et seq., and to the words of Cicero, in his oration for Milo: Est enim hæc, judices, non scripta sed nata lex; quam non didicimus, accepimus, legimus; verum ex natura ipsa arripuimus, hausimus, expressimus; ad quam non docti sed facti; non instituti sed imbuti sumus.

As rights precede government, so we find that now rights are acknowledged above governments and their states, in the case of international law. International law is founded on rights, that is, well-grounded claims which civilized states, as individuals, make upon one another. As governments come to be more and more clearly established, rights are more clearly acknowledged and protected by the laws, and right comes to mean a claim acknowledged and protected by the law. A legal right, a constitutional right, means a right protected by the law, by the constitution; but government does not create the idea of right or original rights; it acknowledges them; just as government does not create property or values and money, it acknowledges and regulates them. If it were otherwise, the question would present itself, whence does government come? whence does it derive its own right to create rights? By compact? But whence did the contracting parties derive their right to create a government that is to make rights? We would be consistently led to adopt the idea of a government by jus divinum,—that is, a government deriving its authority to introduce and establish rights (bestowed on it in particular) from a source wholly separate from human society and the ethical character of man, in the same manner in which we acknowledge revelation to come from a source not human.

Rights are claims of moral beings upon one another: when we speak of rights to certain things, they are, strictly speaking, claims of persons on persons,—in the case of property, for instance, the claim of excluding others from possessing it. The idea of right indicates an ethical relation, and all moral relations may be infringed; claims may be made and established by law which are wrong in themselves and destitute of a corollary obligation; they are like every other wrong done by society or government; they prove nothing concerning the origin or essential character of rights. On the other hand, claims are gradually more clearly acknowledged, and new ones, which were not perceived in early periods, are for the first time perceived, and surrounded with legislative protection, as civilization advances. Thus, original rights, or the rights of man, are not meant to be claims which man has always perceived or insisted upon or protected, but those claims which, according to the person who uses the term, logically flow from the necessity of the physical and moral existence of man; for man is born to be a man,—that is, to lead a human existence. They have been called inalienable rights; but they have been alienated, and many of them are not perceived for long periods. Lieber, in his Political Ethics, calls them primordial rights: he means rights directly flowing from the nature of man, developed by civilization, and always showing themselves clearer and clearer as society advances. He enumerates, as such especially, the following: the right of protection; the right of personal freedom,—that is, the claim of unrestricted action except so far as the same claim of others necessitates restriction: these two rights involve the right to have justice done by the public administration of justice, the right of production and exchange (the right of property), the right of free locomotion and emigration, the right of communion in speech, letter, print, the right of worship, the right of influencing or sharing in the legislation. All political civilization steadily tends to bring out these rights clearer and clearer, while in the course of this civilization, from its incipiency, with its relapses, they appear more or less developed in different periods and frequently wholly in abeyance: nevertheless, they have their origin in the personality of man as a social being.

Publicists and jurists have made the following further distinction of rights:—

Rights are perfect and imperfect. When the things which we have a right to possess, or the actions we have a right to do, are or may be fixed and determinate, the right is a perfect one; but when the thing or the actions are vague and indeterminate, the right is an imperfect one. If a man demand his property which is withheld from him, the right that supports his demand is a perfect one, because the thing demanded is or may be fixed and determinate; but if a poor man ask relief from those from whom he has reason to expect it, the right which supports his petition is an imperfect one, because the relief which he expects is a vague, indeterminate thing. Rutherforth, Inst. c. 2, § 4; Grotius, lib. 1, c. 1, § 4.

Rights are also absolute and qualified. A man has an absolute right to recover property which belongs to him; an agent has a qualified right to recover such property when it had been intrusted to his care and which has been unlawfully taken out of his possession.

Rights might with propriety be also divided into natural and civil rights; but as all the rights which man has received from nature have been modified and acquired anew from the civil law, it is more proper, when considering their object, to divide them into political and civil rights.

Political rights consist in the power to participate, directly or indirectly, in the establishment or management of government. These political rights are fixed by the constitution. Every citizen has the right of voting for public officers, and of being elected: these are the political rights which the humblest citizen possesses.

Civil rights are those which have no relation to the establishment, support, or management of the government. These consist in the power of acquiring and enjoying property, of exercising the paternal and marital powers, and the like. It will be observed that every one, unless deprived of them by a sentence of civil death, is in the enjoyment of his civil rights,—which is not the case with political rights; for an alien, for example, has no political, although in the full enjoyment of his civil, rights.

These latter rights are divided into absolute and relative. The absolute rights of mankind may be reduced to three principal or primary articles: the right of personal security, which consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation; the right of personal liberty, which consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation or removing one's person to whatsoever place one's inclination may direct, without any restraint unless by due course of law; the right of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution save only by the laws of the land. 1 Bla. Com. 124–139.

The relative rights are public or private: the first are those which subsist between the people and the government; as, the right of protection on the part of the people, and the right of allegiance which is due by the people to the government; the second are the reciprocal rights of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, and master and servant.

Rights are also divided into legal and equitable. The former are those where the party has the legal title to a thing; and in that case his remedy for an infringement of it is by an action in a court of law. Although the person holding the legal title may have no actual interest, but hold only as trustee, the suit must be in his name, and not, in general, in that of the cestui que trust; 8 Term, 332; 1 Saund. 158, n. 1; 2 Bing. 20. The latter, or equitable rights, are those which may be enforced in a court of equity by the cestui que trust.

RIGHT, PETITION OF. See PETITION OF RIGHT.

RIGHT, WRIT OF. See WRIT OF RIGHT.

RIGHT OF ACTION. The right to bring suit in a case. Also sometimes used in the same sense as right in action, which is identical with chose in action, q. v.

RIGHT OF DISCUSSION. In Scotch Law. The right which the cautioner (surety) has to insist that the creditor shall do his best to compel the performance of the contract by the principal debtor, before he shall be called upon. 1 Bell, Com. 347.

RIGHT OF DIVISION. In Scotch Law. The right which each of several cautioners (sureties) has to refuse to answer for more than his own share of the debt. To entitle the cautioner to this right, the other cautioners must be solvent, and there must be no words in the bond to exclude it. 1 Bell, Com. 347.

RIGHT OF HABITATION. In Louisiana. The right of dwelling gratuitously in a house the property of another. La. Civ. Code, art. 623; 3 Toullier, c. 2, p. 325; 14 id. n. 279, p. 330; Pothier, n. 22–25.

RIGHT OF POSSESSION. The right to possession which may reside in one man, while another has the actual possession, being the right to enter and turn out such actual occupant: e.g. the right of a disseisee. An apparent right of possession is one which may be defeated by a better; an actual right of possession, one which will stand the test against all opponents. 2 Bla. Com. 196*.

RIGHT OF PROPERTY. The abstract right (merum jus) which remains after the actual possession has been so long gone that the right of possession is also lost, and the law will only allow recovery of the land by a writ of right. It, together with possession and right of possession, makes a perfect title; e.g. a disseisor has naked possession, the disseisee has right of possession and right of property. But after twenty years without entry the right of possession is transferred from the disseisee to the disseisor; and if he now buys up the right of property which alone remains in the disseisee, the disseisor will unite all three rights in himself, and thereby acquire a perfect title. 2 Bla. Com. 197*.

RIGHT OF RELIEF. In Scotch Law. The right which the cautioner (surety) has against the principal debtor when he has been forced to pay his debt. 1 Bell, Com. 347.

RIGHT OF SEARCH. See SEARCH, RIGHT OF; 1 Kent, 153, n.; 1 Phill. Int. Law, 325.

RIGHT OF WAY. See EASEMENT; WAY.

RIGHT TO BEGIN. In Practice. The party who asserts the affirmative of an issue has the right to begin and reply, as on him is the burden of proof. The substantial affirmative, not the verbal, gives the right; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 74; 18 B. Monr. 136; 6 Ohio St. 307; 2 Gray, 260. See OPENING & CLOSING; 16 West. Jur. 18; 8 Daly, 61.

RIGHT PATENT. The name of an ancient writ, which Fitzherbert says, "ought to be brought of lands and tenements, and not of an advowson, or of common, and lieth only of an estate of fee-simple, and not for him who has a lesser estate, as tenant in tail, tenant in frank-marriage, or tenant for life." Fitzh. N. B. 1.

RING-DROPPING. In Criminal Law. A phrase applied in England to a trick frequently practised in committing larcenies. It is difficult to define it; it will be sufficiently exemplified by the following cases. The prisoner, with some accomplices, being in company with the prosecutor, pretended to find a valuable ring wrapped up in a paper, appearing to be a jeweller's receipt for "a rich brilliant diamond ring." They offered to leave the ring with the prosecutor if he would deposit some money and his watch as a security. The prosecutor, having accordingly laid down his watch and money on a table, was beckoned out of the room by one of the confederates, while the others took away his watch and money. This was held to amount to a larceny; 1 Leach, 273. In another case, under similar circumstances, the prisoner procured from the prosecutor twenty guineas, promising to return them the next morning, and leaving the false jewel with him. This was also held to be larceny; 1 Leach, 314; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 679. In these cases the prosecutor had no intention of parting with the property in the money or goods stolen. It was taken, in the first case, while the transaction was proceeding, without his knowledge; and in the last, under the promise that it should be returned. See 2 Leach, 640.

RINGING THE CHANGE. In Criminal Law. A trick practised by a criminal, by which, on receiving a good piece of money in payment of an article, he pretends it is not good, and, changing it, returns to the buyer a spurious coin. See 2 Leach, 786.

RINGS-GIVING. The giving of golden rings by a newly-created sergeant-at-law to every person of rank at court, from the princes of the blood, through the lords in parliament and the justices and barons of the courts, down to the meanest clerk of common pleas, to each one according to his dignity. The expense was not less than forty pounds English money. Fortesque, 190; 10 Co., Introd. 23.

RIOT. In Criminal Law. A tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling together of their own authority with an intent mutually to assist each other against any who shall oppose them, in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful. Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 65, § 1. See 3 Blackf. 209; 3 Rich. 337; 5 Penn. 83; 37 Leg. Int. Pa. 426.

In this case there must be proved—first, an unlawful assembling; 15 N. H. 169; for if a number of persons lawfully met together, as, for example, at a fire, or in a theatre or a church, should suddenly quarrel and fight, the offence is an affray, and not a riot, because there was no unlawful assembling; but if three or more being so assembled, on a dispute occurring, form into parties with promises of mutual assistance, which promises may be express, or implied from the circumstances, then the offence will no longer be an affray, but a riot; the unlawful combination will amount to an assembling within the meaning of the law. In this manner any lawful assembly may be converted into a riot; 18 Me. 346; 1 Camp. 328; 24 Hun, 562. Any one who joins the rioters after they have actually commenced is equally guilty as if he had joined them while assembling.

Secondly, proof must be made of actual violence and force on the part of the rioters, or of such circumstances as have an apparent tendency to force and violence, and calculated to strike terror into the public mind; 2 Camp. 369. The definition requires that the offenders should assemble of their own authority, in order to create a riot: if, therefore, the parties act under the authority of the law, they may use any necessary force to enforce their mandate, without committing this offence. See 1 Hill, So. C. 362; 72 N. C. 25.

Thirdly, evidence must be given that the defendants acted in the riot and were participants in the disturbance; 1 Morr. Tenn. 142. It is sufficient if they be present encouraging or giving countenance, support, or acquiescence to the act; 9 Miss. 270. See 1 Russ. Cr. *382; Co. 3d Inst. 176; 4 Bls. Com. 146; Comyns, Dig.; Ros. Cr. Ev. Women and infants above, but not those under, the age of discretion are punishable as rioters; 1 Russ. Cr. *387.

In a case growing out of the riots in Pittsburgh in 1877, under a statute making a county liable for the property "situated" therein, when destroyed by a mob, the liability was held to attach to property owned by a non-resident of the state, in transit in possession of a common carrier; 90 Penn. 397; s. c. 35 Am. Rep. 670.

RIOT ACT. The stat. 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5. It forbade the unlawful assembling of twelve persons or more to the disturbance of the peace. If they continue together for one hour after the sheriff, mayor, etc. has commanded them to disperse, such contempt shall be felony. Stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 11, requires, that, in order to constitute felony, the riotous act must consist in demolishing, or beginning to demolish, some building; Moz. & W.; Cox & S. Cr. Law, 104.

RIOTOUSLY. In Pleading. A technical word, properly used in an indictment for a riot, which of itself implies violence. 2 Sess. Cas. Sc. 13; 2 Stra. 834; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 489.

RIPA (Lat.). The banks of a river, or the place beyond which the waters do not in their natural course overflow.

An extraordinary overflow does not change the banks of the river. Pothier, Pand. lib. 50. See BANKS; RIVER.

RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS. Those who own the lands bounding upon a watercourse. 4 Mass. 397.

Each riparian proprietor owns that portion of the bed of the river (not navigable) which is adjoining his land usque ad filum aquæ; or, in other words, to the thread or central line of the stream; Hargr. Tracts, 5; Holt, 499; 3 Dane, Abr. 4; 7 Mass. 496; 5 Wend. 423; 2 Conn. 482; 11 Ohio St. 138; Ang. Wat.-Courses, 3; 28 Am. Law Reg. 147, 337. See RIVER; WATER-COURSE; TIDE-WATER; WHARF; ALLUVION; AVULSION; FISHERY; RELICTION; LAKE.

As to the rights of riparian owners over the bed of navigable waters between high and low water-mark, the decisions are somewhat conflicting, although the general rule is that the riparian owner holds the right of access to the water, subject to the right of the state to improve navigation; Wood, Nuisances, 592 et seq.; 81 Penn. 80; 7 W. N. C. Pa. 332. That the riparian owner has a right of action where his access to the water is cut off by a structure erected between high and low water mark, by a corporation acting under its charter, see L. R. 5 H. L. 418; 10 Wall. 497; 25 Wend. 462; 42 Wisc. 214; s. c. 24 Am. Rep. 394, n.; contra, 32 Iowa, 106; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 176; 8 Cow. 146; 34 N. J. 532; s. c. 3 Am. Rep. 269. Where, by the action of the sea, the sea front was cut off between certain points, and a beach formed outside the mainland, divided from it by a navigable bay, the title to the new formation was held to be in the owners of the part cut off; 61 How. Pr. 197. See 95 Ill. 84. In the leading cases of Gould v. Hudson River R. R. Co., 6 N. Y. 522, it was held, Edmonds, J., dissenting, that "whatever rights the owner of the land has in the river, or in its shore below high-water mark, are public rights, which are under the control of the legislative power, and any loss sustained through the act of the legislature affecting them, is damnum absque injuria." One riparian owner cannot build out into the stream, so as to injure the land of another riparian owner, even when armed with a license granted under act of parliament; L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662. The owner of lands situated on the sea cannot maintain ejectment for that portion of a wharf constructed on his land, which extends below low-water mark; 52 Cal. 385. The owner of both sides of a stream above tide-water has a right to the ice formed between his boundaries; 14 Chic. Leg. News, 83.

RIPUARIAN LAW. A code of laws of the Franks, who occupied the country upon the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Scheldt, who were collectively known by the name Ripuarians, and their laws as Ripuarian law.

RISKS AND PERILS. In Insurance. Those causes against loss from which the insurer is to be protected in virtue of the contract for insurance.

The risk or peril in a life policy is death; under a fire policy, damage by fire; and under a marine policy, by perils of the seas, usually including fire; and under a policy upon subjects at risk in lake, river, or canal navigation, by perils of the same. See INSURABLE INTEREST; INSURANCE; POLICY; WARRANTY.

Under a marine insurance the risks are from a certain place to a certain other, or from one date to another. The perils usually insured against as "perils of the seas" are —fire, lightning, winds, waves, rocks, shoals, and collisions, and also the perils of hostile capture, piracy, theft, arrest, barratry, and jettisons. 1 Phill. Ins. § 1099. But a distinction is made between the extraordinary action of perils of the seas, for which underwriters are liable, and wear and tear and deterioration by decay, for which they are not liable; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1105.

Perils of lakes, rivers, etc. are analogous to those of the seas; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1099, n. See, as to sea risks, Crabbe, 405; 32 Penn. 351; 2 Paine, 82; 16 B. Monr. 467; 4 Du. N. Y. 141; 6 id. 191, 282; 13 Miss. 57; 11 Ind. 171; 3 Dutch. 645; 13 Ala. 167; 6 Gray, 192; 35 N. H. 328.

Underwriters are not liable for loss occasioned by the gross misconduct of the assured or imputable to him; but if a vessel is seaworthy, with suitable officers and crew, underwriters are liable for loss though occasioned through the mistakes or want of assiduity and vigilance of the officers or men; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1049. Underwriters are not answerable for loss directly attributable to the qualifications of the insured subject, independently of the specified risks; 1 Phillips, Ins. c. xiii. sect. v.; or for loss distinctly occasioned by the fraudulent or gross negligence of the assured.

Insurance against illegal risks—such as trading with an enemy, the slave-trade, piratical cruisers, and illegal kinds of business —is void; 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 210, 691. Policies usually contain express exceptions of some risks besides those impliedly excepted. These may be—in maritime insurance, contraband and illicit, interloping trade, violation of blockade, mobs and civil commotions; in fire policies, loss on jewelry, paintings, sculpture, by hazardous trades, etc.; in life policies, loss by suicide, risk in certain climates or localities and in certain hazardous employments without express permission; 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 55, 63, 64. See LOSS; TOTAL LOSS; AVERAGE.

RIVAGE. In French law, the shore, as of the sea. In English law, a toll anciently paid to the Crown for the passage of boats or vessels on certain rivers. Cowel.

RIVER. A natural stream of water flowing betwixt banks or walls in a bed of considerable depth and width, being so called whether its current sets always one way or flows and reflows with the tide. Woolrych, Wat. 40; 16 N. H. 467.

Rivers are either public or private. Public rivers are divided into navigable and not navigable,—the distinction being that the former flow and reflow with the tide, while the latter do not. Both are navigable in the popular sense of the term; Ang. Tide-Wat. 74; 7 Pet. 324; 5 Pick. 199; 26 Wend. 404; 4 B. & C. 602.

At common law, the bed or soil of all rivers subject to the ebb and flow of the tide, to the extent of such ebb and flow, belongs to the crown; and the bed or soil of all rivers above the ebb and flow of the tide, or in which there is no tidal effect, belongs to the riparian proprietors, each owning to the centre or thread,—ad filum aquæ, which see,—where the opposite banks belong to different persons; Ang. Tide-Wat. 20; Daveis, 149; 5 B. & Ald. 268. In this country the common law has been recognized as the law of many of the states,—the state succeeding to the right of the crown; 4 Pick. 268; 26 Wend. 404; 31 Me. 9; 1 Halst. 1; 2 Conn. 481; 2 Swan, 9; 16 Ohio, 540; 4 Wisc. 486; but in Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, Iowa, Mississippi, and Alabama, it has been determined that the common law does not prevail, and that the ownership of the bed or soil of all rivers navigable for any useful purpose of trade or agriculture, whether tidal or fresh-water, is in the state; 2 Binn. 475; 14 S. & R. 71; 3 Ired. 277; 1 M'Cord, 580; 3 Iowa, 1; 4 id. 199; 29 Miss. 21; 11 Ala. 496. At common law, the ownership of the crown extends to high-water mark; Ang. Tide-Wat. 69; Woolr. Wat. 433–450; 3 B. & Ald. 967; 5 id. 268; and in several states of this country the common law has been followed; 12 Barb. 616; 3 Zabr. 624; 7 Cush. 53; 7 Pet. 324; 3 How. 221; 25 Conn. 346; but in others it has been modified by extending the ownership of the riparian proprietor, subject to the servitudes of navigation and fishery, to low-water mark; 28 Penn. 206; 1 Whart. 124; 4 Call. 441; 14 B. Monr. 367; 11 Ohio, 138; unless these decisions may be explained as applying to fresh-water rivers; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 224.

In England, many rivers originally private have become public, as regards the right of navigation, either by immemorial use or by acts of parliament; Woolr. Wat. 40. In this country, all rivers, whether tidal or fresh-water, are, of common right, navigable highways, if naturally capable of use for the floating of vessels, boats, rafts, or even logs, or "whenever they are found of sufficient capacity to float the products of the mines, the forests, or the tillage of the country through which they flow, to market;" 8 Barb. 239; 18 id. 277; 31 Me. 9; 42 id. 552; 20 Johns. 90; 3 N. H. 321; 10 Ill. 351; 2 Swan, 9; 2 Mich. 519; 5 Ind. 8. The state has the right to improve all such rivers, and to regulate them by lawful enactments for the public good; 4 Rich. 69; 31 Me. 361; 5 Ind. 13; 29 Miss. 21. Any obstruction of them without legislative authority is a nuisance, and any person having occasion to use the river may abate the same, or, if injured thereby, may receive his damages from its author; 28 Penn. 195; 4 Wisc. 454; 4 Cal. 180; 6 Cow. 518; 10 Mass. 70; 5 Pick. 492; Wood, Law Nuis. 597 et seq.; 1 McCrary, 281; 80 N. Y. 239; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 612; 53 Md. 422; 8 Mo. App. 266. And see BRIDGE. By the ordinance of 1787, art. 4, relating to the northwestern territory, it is provided that the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying-places between the same, shall be common highways and forever free; 3 Story, U. S. Laws, 2077; 29 Miss. 21; 2 Mich. 519.

Rivers, when naturally unfit for public use, as above described, are called private rivers. They are the private property of the riparian proprietors, and cannot be appropriated to public use, as highways, by deepening or improving their channels, without compensation to their owners; 16 Ohio, 540; 26 Wend. 404; 6 Barb. 265; 18 id. 277; 8 Penn. 379; 10 Me. 278; 1 McCord, 580. And see WATER-COURSE.

A river, then, may be considered—as private in the case of shallow and obstructed streams; as private property, but subject to public use, when it can be navigated; and as public, both with regard to its use and property. Some rivers possess all these qualities. The Hudson is mentioned as an instance: in one part it is entirely private property; in another, the public have the use of it; and it is public property from the mouth as high up as the tide flows; 6 Barb. 265. See, generally, La. Civ. Code, 444; Bacon, Abr. Prerogatives (B 3); Jacobsen, Sea Laws; 3 Kent, 411; Woolr. Waters; Schultes, Aquatic Rights; Washb. R. P.; Cruise, Dig. Greenl. ed.; BOUNDARIES; FISHERY; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS.

RIXA (Lat.). In Civil Law. A dispute; a quarrel. Dig. 48. 8. 17.

RIXATRIX (Lat.). A common scold.

ROAD. A passage through the country for the use of the people. 3 Yeates, 421. See WAY; STREET.

In Maritime Law. An open passage of the sea, which, from the situation of the adjacent land and its own depth and wideness, affords a secure place for the common riding and anchoring of vessels. Hale, de Port. Mar. p. 2, c. 2. This word, however, does not appear to have a very definite meaning; 2 Chitty, Com. Law, 4, 5. Often called "roadstead;" 2 Hugh. 17.

ROBBER. One who commits a robbery. One who feloniously and forcibly takes goods or money to any value from the person of another by violence or putting him in fear.

ROBBERY. In Criminal Law. The felonious and forcible taking from the person of another, goods or money to any value, by violence or putting him in fear. 4 Bla. Com. 243; Baldw. 102. See 12 Ga. 293.

Robbery, by the common law, is larceny from the person, accompanied by violence or by putting in fear; and an indictment therefor must allege that the taking was from the person, and that it was by violence or by putting in fear, in addition to the averments that are necessary in indictments for other larcenies; Jebb, 62; 1 Leach, 195; 7 Mass. 242; 17 id. 539; 8 Cush. 215.

By "taking from the person" is meant not only the immediate taking from his person, but also from his presence when it is done with violence and against his consent; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 533; 2 Russ. Cr. 61; 3 Wash. C. C. 209; 11 Humphr. 167. The taking must be by violence or putting the owner in fear; but both these circumstances need not concur; for if a man should be knocked down, and then robbed while he is insensible, the offence is still a robbery; 4 Binn. 379. And if the party be put in fear by threats and then robbed, it is not necessary there should be any greater violence; 17 Mass. 539. The violence or putting in fear must be at the time of the act or immediately preceding; 1 C. & P. 304.

ROD. A measure sixteen feet and a half long; a perch.

ROE, RICHARD. See EJECTMENT; PLEDGES.

ROGATORY, LETTERS. See LETTERS ROGATORY.

ROGUE. A French word, which in that language signifies proud, arrogant. In some of the ancient English statutes it means an idle, sturdy beggar, which is its meaning in law. Rogues are usually punished as vagrants. Although the word rogue is a word of reproach, yet to charge one as a rogue is not actionable; 5 Binn. 219. See 2 Dev. 162; Hard. 529.

ROLE D'EQUIPAGE. The list of a ship's crew; the muster roll.

ROLL. A schedule of parchment which may be turned up with the hand in the form of a pipe or tube. Jacob, Law Dict.

In early times, before paper came in common use, parchment was the substance employed for making records, and, as the art of bookbinding was but little used, economy suggested as the most convenient mode the adding of sheet to sheet, as was found requisite, and they were tacked together in such a manner that the whole length might be wound up together in the form of spiral rolls. Rolls of the exchequer are kept in that court relating to the revenue. The ancient manuscript registers of the proceedings in parliament were called Rolls of Parliament. A Roll of the Temple is kept in each of the two temples, called the calves head roll, wherein every bencher, barrister and student is taxed yearly.

The records of a court or offices.

ROLLING STOCK. The movable machinery of a railroad, such as locomotive engines, tenders, freight and passenger cars, shop-tools, etc. Concerning the character of rolling stock of railways in this country, there still exists great diversity of opinion, one class of cases holding it to be a fixture, at least so far as to pass under a mortgage of the realty; 23 Ill. 300; 23 How. 117; 54 Me. 263; 25 Barb. 485; 11 Am. Rep. 751, n.; 3 Dill. 412; and previous federal decisions; another class regarding it as personal property, and as such liable to be seized and sold for the collection of a tax, or upon the execution of a judgment creditor as against mortgagees; 52 N. Y. 521; see 54 N. Y. 314; 21 Wisc. 44; 29 N. J. Eq. 311; 53 Mo. 17.

There are many decisions which do not strictly fall under either of the above classes. Of these, one class views rolling stock as an accessory of the railroad, passing by a deed or mortgage as a necessary incident. The other takes the ground that rolling stock being indispensable to the exercise of the franchises, cannot be sold under execution, because the sale would prevent the use of the franchise. In considering the several decisions, reference must be had to the dates of their rendition, and to the changes in method of operating railroads in this country. In some states, the question has been settled by legislation, and such must be the ultimate solution of the matter. See Green's Brice's, Ultra Vires, 238, n. (a); 2 Redf. Railw. 504, n.

A mortgage of a railroad afterwards to be built, and of the rolling stock appurtenant to such road, attaches to the road and the rolling stock as soon as they are purchased and acquired; 23 How. 117; 6 Biss. 529; 11 Wall. 459; Jones, Railr. Sec. § 147. It is not essential that the rolling stock should be especially mentioned in the mortgage; general words are enough. For instance, a mortgage of the line of a railroad "with all the revenue or tolls thereof" covers rolling stock; 18 Md. 183. See also 53 Ala. 237; 4 Biss. 35. The words "road and its franchise" do not, however, cover rolling stock; 36 Vt. 452. The subject is fully treated in Jones, Railr. Securities; see 4 So. L. Rev. 198.

ROLLING STOCK (OF RAILWAYS) PROTECTION ACT. The act of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 50, passed to protect the rolling stock of railways from distress or sale in certain cases.

ROLLS OFFICE OF THE CHANCERY. An office in Chancery Lane, London, which contains rolls and records of the high court of chancery, of which the master of the rolls is keeper. It was formerly called domus conversorum, having been appointed by Henry III. for the use of converted Jews, but for irregularities they were expelled by Edward II., when it was put to its present use. Blount, Encyc. Lond.

ROLLS, MASTER OF THE. See MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES ACT. The stat. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 134, providing a method for enjoying estates given upon trust for Roman Catholics; but invalidated by reason of certain of the trusts being superstitious or otherwise illegal; 3 Steph. Com. 76. See SUPERSTITIOUS USES; CHARITIES.

ROMNEY MARSH. A tract of land in the county of Kent, England, containing twenty-four thousand acres, governed by certain ancient and equitable laws of sewers, composed by Henry de Bathe, a venerable judge in the reign of king Henry III.; from which laws all commissioners of sewers in England may receive light and direction. 3 Steph. Com. 442, note (a); 3 Bla. Com. 73, note (t); Co. 4th Inst. 276.

ROOD OF LAND. The fourth part of an acre.

ROOT. That part of a tree or plant under ground from which it draws most of its nourishment from the earth.

When the roots of a tree planted in one man's land extend into that of another, this circumstance does not give the latter any right to the tree, though such is the doctrine of the civil law; Dig. 41. 1. 7. 13; but such person has a right to cut off the roots up to his line; Rolle, 394. See TREE.

In a figurative sense, the term root is used to signify the person from whom one or more others are descended.

ROTA (Lat.). A court. A celebrated court of appeals at Rome, of which one judge must be a German, one a Frenchman, two Spaniards, and eight Italians. Encyc. Brit. Its decisions had great weight, but were not law, although judged by the law. Saccise Trac. de Com. et Comb. § 1, quæst. 7, pars 2, ampl. 8, num. 219, 253. There was also a celebrated rota or court at Genoa about the sixteenth century, or before, whose decisions in maritime matters form the first part of Straccha de Merc. See Ingersoll's Roccus.

ROTURIER. In Old French Law. One not noble. Dict. de l'Acad. Franç. A free commoner; one who did not hold his land by homage and fealty, yet owed certain services. Howard, Dict. de Normande.

ROUP. In Scotch Law. Sale by auction. Auction. Index to Burton, Law of Scotl.; Bell, Dict. Auction.

ROUT. In Criminal Law. A disturbance of the peace by persons assembled together with an intention to do a thing which if executed would have made them rioters, and actually making a motion towards the execution of their purpose. Haw. P. C. 516.

It generally agrees in all particulars with a riot, except only in this: that it may be a complete offence without the execution of the intended enterprise. Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 65, s. 14; 1 Russ. Cr. 253; 4 Bla. Com. 140; Viner, Abr. Riots, etc. (A 2); Comyns, Dig. Forcible Entry (D 9). Where a number of persons met, staked money, and agreed to engage in a prize fight, it was held a rout; 2 Speers, 599. Not less than three assembled persons are sufficient to constitute the offence; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1186.

ROUTOUSLY. In Pleading. A technical word, properly used in indictments for a rout as descriptive of the offence. 2 Salk. 593.

ROYAL BURGHS. Boroughs incorporated in Scotland by royal charter. Bell.

ROYAL FISH. Whales and sturgeons,—to which some add porpoises,—which when cast on shore or caught near shore belonged to the king of England by his prerogative. 1 Edw. I.; 17 Edw. V. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 5; 17 Edw. II. c. 11; Bracton, l. 3, c. 3; Britton, c. 17; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 45, 46.

ROYAL HONORS. In diplomatic language, by this term is understood the rights enjoyed by every empire or kingdom in Europe, by the pope, the grand duchies of Germany, and the Germanic and Swiss confederations, to precedence over all others who do not enjoy the same rank, with the exclusive right of sending to other states public ministers of the first rank, as ambassadors, together with other distinctive titles and ceremonies. Vattel, Law of Nat. b. 2, c. 3, § 38; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 3, § 2.

ROYAL MINES. Mines of silver and gold belonged to the king of England, as part of his prerogative of coinage, to furnish him with material. 1 Bla. Com. 294*. See MINES.

RUBRIC. The title or inscription of any law or statute; because the copyists formerly drew and painted the title of laws and statutes in red letters (rubro colore). Ayliffe, Pand. b. 1, t. 8; Dict. de Jur.

RUDENESS. In Criminal Law. An impolite action, contrary to the usual rules observed in society, committed by one person against another.

This is a relative term, which it is difficult to define: those acts which one friend might do to another could not be justified by persons altogether unacquainted; persons moving in polite society could not be permitted to do to each other what boatmen, hostlers, and such persons might perhaps justify; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 73. An act done by a gentleman towards a lady might be considered rudeness, which if done by one gentleman to another might not be looked upon in that light; Russ. & R. 130. A person who touches another with rudeness is guilty of a battery.

RULE ABSOLUTE. If, upon the hearing of a rule to show cause, the cause shown should be decided insufficient, the rule is made absolute, i. e., the court makes final order for the party to perform the requirements of the rule. See RULE NISI.

RULE OF COURT. An order made by a court having competent jurisdiction.

Rules of court are either general or special; the former are the laws by which the practice of the court is governed; the latter are special orders made in particular cases.

Disobedience to these is punished by giving judgment against the disobedient party, or by attachment for contempt.

RULE OF LAW. A general principle of law, recognized as such by authorities, and stated usually in the form of a maxim. It is called a rule because in doubtful and unforeseen cases it is a rule for their decision; it embraces particular cases within general principles. Toullier, tit. prél. n. 17; 1 Bla. Com. 44; Domat, liv. prél. t. 1, s. 1; Ram, Judgm. 30; 3 B. & Ad. 34; 2 Russ. 216, 580, 581; 4 id. 305; 10 Price, 218; 1 B. & C. 86; 1 Ld. Raym. 728; 4 Maule & S. 348. See MAXIM.

RULE NISI. In Practice. A rule obtained on motion ex parte to show cause against the particular relief sought. Notice is served on the party against whom the rule is obtained, and the case is then heard like other motions, except that the party showing cause is entitled to open and reply. The rule is made absolute unless (nisi) good cause is shown against it. Graham, Pr. 688; 3 Steph. Com. 680.

RULE TO PLEAD. A rule of court requiring defendant to plead within a given time, entered as of course by the plaintiff on filing his declaration. On defendant's failure to put in his plea accordingly, a judgment in the nature of a judgment by default may be entered against him. In England, under the common law Procedure Act of 1852, the rule to plead is abolished, a notice to plead indorsed on the declaration being sufficient. The Judicature Act of 1875 allows the defendant eight days for his defence after the delivery of the statement of claim, unless the time be extended by the court. In the United States circuit court, defendant may be ruled to plead in fourteen days; Rule xxviii.

RULE TO SHOW CAUSE. An order made by the court, in a particular case, upon motion of one of the parties calling upon the other to appear at a particular time before the court, to show cause, if any he have, why a certain thing should not be done.

This rule is granted generally upon the oath or affirmation of the applicant; but upon the hearing the evidence of competent witnesses must be given to support the rule, and the affidavit of the applicant is insufficient. See RULE ABSOLUTE; RULE NISI.

RULE OF THE WAR OF 1756. In Commercial Law, War. A rule relating to neutrals was the first time practically established in 1756, and universally promulgated, that "neutrals are not to carry on in times of war a trade which was interdicted to them in times of peace." Chitty, Law of Nat. 166; 2 C. Rob. 186; 4 id. App.; 1 Kent, 82.

RULES. Certain limits without the actual walls of the prisons, where the prisoner, on proper security previously given to the proper authority, may reside. These limits are considered, for all legal and practical purposes, as merely a further extension of the prison-walls. So used in America. See 3 Bibb, 202. The rules or permission to reside without the prison may be obtained by any person not committed criminally; 2 Stra. 845; nor for contempt; id. 817; by satisfying the marshal or warden or other authority of the security with which he may grant such permission.

Proceedings in an action out of court, and in vacation time. See 12 Gratt. 312.

RULES OF PRACTICE. Certain orders made by the courts for the purpose of regulating the practice of members of the bar and others

Every court of record has an inherent power to make rules for the transaction of its business; which rules they may from time to time change, alter, rescind, or repeal. While they are in force, they must be applied to all cases which fall within them; they can use no discretion, unless such discretion is authorized by the rules themselves. Rules of court cannot, of course, contravene the constitution or the law of the land; 3 Pick. 512; 2 Harr. & J. 79; 1 Pet. 604; 3 Binn. 227, 417; 3 S. & R. 253; 8 id. 336; 2 Mo. 98.

RUMOR. A general public report of certain things, without any certainty as to their truth.

In general, rumor cannot be received in evidence; but when the question is whether such rumor existed, and not its truth or falsehood, then evidence of it may be given.

RUNCINUS (Lat.). A nag. 1 Thomas, Co. Lit. 471.

RUNNING ACCOUNT. An open account. See 2 Pars. Contr. 351; ACCOUNT; MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS; LIMITATIONS.

RUNNING AT LARGE. A term applied to animals estray, wandering apparently without owner or keeper, and not confined to any certain place. The phrase has been judicially construed in a number of recent cases. In 50 Vt. 130; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 496, a hound, in close pursuit of a fox, and out of sight and hearing of its master, was held not to be within the meaning of a statute permitting any one to kill a dog "running at large off the premises of the owner or keeper, without a collar with the keeper's name on it." Animals escaping from the owner's premises cannot be said to be running at large; the phrase implies permission or assent or at least some fault on the owner's part; 21 Hun, 249; but contra, 53 Iowa, 632; see 52 Cal. 653; 23 Alb. L. J. 504. An animal running on the range where it was permitted to run by its owner, has been held not an estray, especially where the owner was known to the person taking it up; 4 Oreg. 206; 27 Wisc. 422; 29 Iowa, 437.

RUNNING DAYS. Days counted in succession, without any allowance for holidays. The term is used in settling lay-days or days of demurrage.

RUNNING LANDS. In Scotch Law. Lands where the ridges of a field belong alternately to different proprietors. Bell, Dict.

RUNNING OF THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. A metaphorical expression, by which is meant that the time mentioned in the statute of limitations is considered as passing. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 861.

RUNNING WITH THE LAND. A technical expression applied to covenants real which affect the land. See COVENANT.

RUSE DE GUERRE (Fr.). Literally, a trick in war. A stratagem. It is said to be lawful among belligerents, provided it does not involve treachery and falsehood. Grotius, Droit de la Guerre, liv. 3, c. 1, § 9.

RUTA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name given to those things which are extracted or taken from land: as, sand, chalk, coal, and such other things. Pothier, Pand. l. 50.

RYOT. In India. A peasant, subject, or tenant of house or land. Whart. Dict.

SAC, SAK (Lat. saca, or sacha). An ancient privilege, which a lord of a manor claimed to have in his court, of holding plea in causes of trespass arising among his tenants, and imposing fines touching the same.

SACABURTH, SACABERE (from sac, cause, and burh, pledge). He that is robbed and puts in surety to prosecute the felon with fresh suit. Briton, c. 15, 29; Bracton, l. 3, c. 32; Cowel.

SACQUIER. In Maritime Law. The name of an ancient officer, whose business was to load and unload vessels laden with salt, corn, or fish, to prevent the ship's crew defrauding the merchant by false tale, or cheating him of his merchandise otherwise. Laws of Oleron, art. 11, published in an English translation in 1 Pet. Adm. xxv. See ARRAMEUR; STEVEDORE.

SACRAMENTALES (L. Lat. sacramentum, oath). Compurgatores, which see. Jurors. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.

SACRAMENTUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A gage in money laid down in court by both parties that went to law, returned to him who had the verdict on his side, but forfeited by the party who was cast, to the exchequer, to be laid out in sacris rebus, and therefore so called. Varro, lib. 4. de Ling. Lat. c. 36.

In Old Common Law. An oath. Cowel; Jacob.

SACRAMENTUM DECISIONIS (Lat.). The voluntary or decisive oath of the civil law, where one of the parties to a suit, not being able to prove his case, offers to refer the decision of the cause to the oath of his adversary, who is bound to accept or make the same offer on his part, or the whole is considered as confessed by him. 3 Bla. Com. 342.

SACRILEGE. The act of stealing, from the temples or churches dedicated to the worship of God, articles consecrated to divine uses. Ayliffe, Parerg. 476. Also, the alienation to laymen of property given to pious uses. Par. Ant. 390.

SÆVITIA (Lat.). Cruelty. To constitute sævitia there must be such a degree of cruelty as to endanger the party's suffering bodily hurt. 1 Hagg. Cons. 35; 2 Mass. 150; 4 id. 587.

SAFE-CONDUCT. A passport or permission from a neutral state to persons who are thus authorized to go and return in safety, and, sometimes, to carry away certain things in safety.

According to common usage, the term passport is employed on ordinary occasions for the permission given to persons when there is no reason why they should not go where they please; and safe-conduct is the name given to the instrument which authorizes certain persons, as enemies, to go into places where they could not go without danger unless thus authorized by the government.

The name of an instrument given to the captain or master of a ship to proceed on a particular voyage: it usually contains his name and residence, the name, description, and destination of the ship, with such other matters as the practice of the place requires, This document is indispensably necessary for the safety of every neutral ship.

The act of congress of April 30, 1790, s. 27, punishes the violation of any safe-conduct or passport granted under the authority of the United States, on conviction, with imprisonment, not exceeding three years, and a fine at the discretion of the court. See CONDUCT; PASSPORT; 18 Viner, Abr. 272.

SAFE-PLEDGE. A surety given that a man shall appear upon a certain day. Bracton, l. 4, c. 1.

SAFEGUARD. A protection of the king to one who is a stranger, who fears violence from some of his subjects for seeking his right by course of law. Reg. Orig. 26.

SAID. Before mentioned.

In contracts and pleadings it is usual and proper, when it is desired to speak of a person or thing before mentioned, to designate them by the term said or aforesaid, or by some similar term; otherwise the latter description will be ill for want of certainty. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 18); Gould, Pl. § 63.

The reference of the word said is to be determined, in any given case, by the sense. The relative same refers to the next antecedent, in the interpretation of a written instrument, the word said does so only when the plain meaning requires it; 2 Kent, 555; 10 Ind. 373.

SAILING. It is sometimes important, in the construction of a charter party, to know when a vessel commenced her voyage, and to this end to determine what constitutes a sailing. It has been held that complete readiness for the sea, with the intention of proceeding at once on the voyage, is sufficient, though head winds should prevent any actual progress; 20 Pick. 275. It has also been held that some measurable progress, though by tow-boat, is also necessary; 4 W. N. C. Pa. 415.

SAILING INSTRUCTIONS. In Maritime Law. Written or printed directions, delivered by the commanding officer of a convoy to the several masters of the ships under his care, by which they are enabled to understand and answer his signals, to know the place of rendezvous appointed for the fleet in case of dispersion by storm, by an enemy, or by any other accident.

Without sailing instructions no vessel can have the full protection and benefit of convoy. Marsh. Ins. 368.

SAILORS. Seamen; mariners. See SEAMEN; SHIPPING ARTICLES.

ST. MARTIN LE GRAND, COURT OF. An ancient court in London, of local importance, formerly held in the church from which it took its name.

SAISIE-EXECUTION. In French Law. A writ of execution by which the creditor places under the custody of the law the movables of his debtor, which are liable to seizure, in order that out of them he may obtain payment of the debt due by him. Lat. Code of Pract. art. 641; Dalloz, Dict. It is a writ very similar to the fieri facias of the common law.

SAISIE-FORAINE. In French Law. A permission given by the proper judicial officer to authorize a creditor to seize the property of his debtor in the district which he inhabits. Dalloz, Dict. It has the effect of an attachment of property, which is applied to the payment of the debt due.

SAISIE-GAGERIE. In French Law. A conservatory act of execution, by which the owner or principal lessor of a house or farm causes the furniture of the house or farm leased, and on which he has a lien, to be seized, in order to obtain the rent due to him. It is similar to the distress of the common law. Dalloz, Dict.

SAISIE-IMMOBILIERE. In French Law. A writ by which the creditor puts in the custody of the law the immovables of his debtor, that out of the proceeds of their sale he may be paid his demand.

SALARY. A reward or recompense for services performed.

It is usually applied to the reward paid to a public officer for the performance of his official duties.

Salary is also applied to the reward paid for the performance of other services; but if it be not fixed for each year it is called honorarium. Pothier, Pand. According to M. Duvergier, the distinction between honorarium and salary is this. By the former is understood the reward given to the most elevated professions for services performed; and by the latter the price of hiring of domestic servants and workmen; 19 Toullier, n. 268, p. 292, note.

There is this difference between salary and price: the former is the reward paid for services or for the hire of things; the latter is the consideration paid for a thing sold; Leg. Elem. §§ 907, 908.

SALE. An agreement by which one of two contracting parties, called the seller, gives a thing and passes the title to it, in exchange for a certain price in current money, to the other party, who is called the buyer or purchaser, who, on his part, agrees to pay such price. 2 Kent, 363; Pothier, Vente, n. 1.

This contract differs from a barter or exchange in this: that in the latter the price or consideration, instead of being paid in money, is paid in goods or merchandise susceptible of a valuation. 12 N. H. 390; 43 Iowa, 194; 65 Ind. 409; 21 Vt. 520. See PRICE. It differs from accord and satisfaction, because in that contract the thing is given for the purpose of quieting a claim, and not for a price; and from bailment, because there the agreement is for the return of the subject matter, in its original or an altered form, while in sale it is for the return of an equivalent in money; L. R. 3 P. C. C. 101; and see 100 Mass. 198; 79 Penn. 488; 89 Conn. 70; 55 Ill. 45.

An onerous gift, when the burden it imposes is the payment of a sum of money, is, when accepted, in the nature of a sale. When partition is made between two or more joint owners of a chattel, it would seem the contract is in the nature of a barter. See 11 Pick. 311.

An absolute sale is one made and completed without any condition whatever.

A conditional sale is one which depends for its validity upon the fulfilment of some condition. See 4 Wash. C. C. 588; 8 Vt. 154; 28 Ohio St. 630; 58 Ga. 379; 126 Mass. 519; Benj. Sales, § 320.

A forced sale is one made without the consent of the owner of the property, by some officer appointed by law, as by a marshal or a sheriff, in obedience to the mandate of a competent tribunal. This sale has the effect to transfer all the rights the owner had in the property, but it does not, like a voluntary sale of personal property, guarantee a title to the thing sold; it merely transfers the rights of the person as whose property it has been seized. This kind of a sale is sometimes called a judicial sale.

A private sale is one made voluntarily, and not by auction.

A public sale is one made at auction to the highest bidder. Auction sales sometimes are voluntary, as when the owner chooses to sell his goods in this way, and then as between the seller and the buyer the usual rules relating to sales apply; or they are involuntary or forced, when the same rules do not apply.

A voluntary sale is one made freely without constraint by the owner of the thing sold: this is the common case of sales, and to this class the general rules of the law of sale apply.

Parties. As a general rule, all persons sui juris may be either buyers or sellers; Story, Sales, § 9. See PARTIES. But no one can sell goods and convey a valid title to them unless he be owner or lawfully represent the owner: nemo dat quod non habet; Benj. Sales, § 6; 2 Ad. & E. 495; 89 Ill. 540; 56 N. H. 158; 115 Mass. 129. And even an innocent purchaser from one not the owner, or his proper representative, acquires no valid title; 6 B. & C. 515; 13 M. & W. 603; Benj. Sales, § 6; 54 Ind. 141; 61 N. Y. 477.

There is a class of persons who are incapable of purchasing except sub modo, as infants and married women, insane persons, and drunkards; Benj. Sales, §§ 21–37; and another class, who, in consequence of their peculiar relation with regard to the owner of the thing sold, are totally incapable of becoming purchasers while that relation exists; these are trustees, guardians, assignees of insolvents, and, generally, all persons who, by their connection with the owner, or by being employed concerning his affairs, have acquired a knowledge of his property, as, attorneys, conveyancers, and the like.

Mutual assent. The consent of the contracting parties, which is of the essence of a sale, consists in the agreement of the will of the seller to sell a certain thing to the buyer for a certain price, and in the will of the buyer to purchase the same thing for the same price. It must, therefore, be mutual, intended to bind both parties, and must coexist at the same moment of time; Benj. Sales, § 39. Thus, if a condition be affixed by the party to whom an offer is made, or a modification requested, this constitutes a rejection of the offer, and a new proposal, which must be accepted by the first proposer, otherwise there would be no assent by the parties to the same thing, at the same time; 4 De G. J. & S. 646; 34 U. C. Q. B. 410; 1 Bradw. 153. It follows that the assent must correspond with the offer in every particular; 8 C. E. Green, 512; 14 Pet. 77; 43 Vt. 161; 118 Mass. 232.

When there has been a mistake made as to the article sold, there is no sale, because no mutual agreement upon the subject of the sale: as, for example, where a broker, who is the agent of both parties, sells an article and delivers to the seller a sold note describing the article sold as "St. Petersburg clean hemp," and a bought note to the buyer as "Riga Rhine hemp," there is no sale; 4 Q. B. 747; 112 Mass. 32; 49 N. Y. 583.

The consent is certain when the parties expressly declare it. This, in some cases, it is requisite should be in writing. See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF. This writing may be a letter. See LETTER; 4 Bingh. 653; 3 Metc. Mass. 207; 16 Me. 458.

An express consent to a sale may be given verbally, when it is not required by the statute of frauds to be in writing.

When a party, by his acts, approves of what has been done, as if he knowingly uses goods which have been left at his house by another who intended to sell them, he will by that act confirm the sale.

Care must be taken to distinguish between an agreement to enter into a future contract of sale, which would be called an executory contract of sale, and pass no title until executed, and a present actual agreement to make a sale, which passes the title immediately.

The distinction between executed and executory contracts of sale depends upon the intention of the parties. When the vendor appropriates goods to the vendee, or, in other words, signifies his intention that the right of property shall pass at once, and the vendee assents, the law will give effect to the intention and the title will pass immediately; 104 Mass. 262; 54 N. Y. 167; 4 Cush. 33; 14 B. Monr. 413. This principle remains the same,—whether the goods are sold for cash or on credit, whether they are to be delivered forthwith or at a future time; whether they have yet to be weighed, measured, or set apart, or whether they are still unfinished; and by the terms of the agreement, the vendor has either to complete them, or in some way add to their value. These circumstances may be reason for supposing that the parties do not mean to pass the title, but will not defeat the intention to do so if it exists; Lectures on Contracts, by Prof. Hare; 1 Q. B. 389; 2 B. & C. 540; 102 Mass. 443; 13 Pick. 175; 6 Rand. 473.

The thing sold. There must be a thing which is the object of the sale; for if the thing sold at the time of the sale had ceased to exist, it is clear there can be no sale; Benj. Sales, § 76; if, for example, you and I being in Philadelphia, I sell you my house in Cincinnati, and at the time of the sale it be burned down, it is manifest there was no sale, as there was not a thing to be sold; 5 Maule & S. 228; 5 H. L. C. 673; 11 Pet. 63; 20 Pick. 139. It is evident, too, that no sale can be made of things not in commerce: as, the air, the water of the sea, and the like.

In general, there must be an agreement as to the specific goods which form the basis of the contract of sale; in other words, to make a perfect sale the parties must have agreed, the one to part with the title to a specific article, and the other to acquire such title: an agreement to sell one hundred bushels of wheat, to be measured out of a heap, does not change the property until the wheat has been measured; 15 Johns. 349; 2 N. Y. 258; 7 Ohio, 127; 3 N. H. 282; 6 Pick. 280; 7 E. & B. 885. And see 6 B. & C. 388; 7 Gratt. 240; 34 Me. 289; 25 Penn. 208; 24 N. H. 337; 11 Humphr. 206; 11 Ired. 609. This rule is merely a guide to the interpretation of the contract, and will not override the intention of the parties expressly declared or implied from their language; L. R. 7 Q. B. 486; 24 Penn. 14; 68 Ill. 196; 20 Pick. 280.

The price. To constitute a sale, there must be a price agreed upon. The presumption is that where the price is not definitely ascertained the title remains in the vendor until a computation has been made; Blackb. Sales, 122; 24 N. H. 386; 11 Cush. 573. But this may be rebutted by proof that the parties intended to have the right of property vest in the purchaser at once; 39 Conn. 413; 55 Ga. 633; 19 N. Y. 330. Upon the maxim id certum est quod reddi certum potest, a sale may be valid although it is agreed that the price for the thing sold shall be determined by a third person; 4 Pick. 179. See 10 Bingh. 382, 487; 11 Ired. 166.

The price must be an actual or serious price, with an intention on the part of the seller to require its payment: if, therefore, one should sell a thing to another, and by the same agreement he should release the buyer from the payment, this would not be a sale, but a gift; because in that case the buyer never agreed to pay any price, the same agreement by which the title to the thing is passed to him discharging him from all obligations to pay for it. As to the quantum of the price, that is altogether immaterial unless there has been fraud in the transaction. The price must be certain or determined; but it is sufficiently certain if, as before observed, it be left to the determination of a third person; 4 Pick. 179. And an agreement to pay for goods what they are worth is sufficiently certain; Coxe, N. J. 261. See PRICE; SAMPLE.

Sale to arrive. A sale of goods to arrive per Argo, or on arrival per Argo, is construed to be a sale of goods subject to a double condition precedent: that the ship arrives and the goods are on board; 5 M. & W. 639; Ry. & M. 406. In such case, title to the goods does not pass till their arrival; 16 N. Y. 597.

Sale for illegal purpose. A sale of goods for the purpose of smuggling is invalid; 3 Term, 454; but not when a foreigner sold the goods abroad having no concern in the smuggling; 1 Cowp. 34; see 50 N. H. 253. The mere knowledge of the vendor that the goods sold would be used for an illegal purpose does not render the sale illegal; 50 N. H. 253; 32 Vt. 110; 3 Cliff. 494. See Benj. Sales, § 511, n.

Real estate. The above rules apply to sales of personal property. The sale of real estate is governed by other rules. When a contract has been entered into for the sale of lands, the legal estate in such lands still remains vested in the vendor, and it does not become vested in the vendee until he shall have received a lawful deed of conveyance from the vendor to him; and the only remedy of the purchaser at law is to bring an action on the contract and recover pecuniary damages for a breach of the contract. In equity, however, after a contract for the sale, the lands are considered as belonging to the purchaser, and the court will enforce his rights by a decree for a specific performance; and the seller will be entitled to the purchase-money; Wms. R. P. 127. See SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

In general, the seller of real estate does not guarantee the title; and if it be desired that he should, this must be done by inserting a warranty to that effect. See, generally, Brown, Campbell, Blackburn, Long, Story, on Sales; Dart, Sugden, on Vendors; Pothier, Vente; Duvergier, Vente; 2 Kent; Parsons, Story, on Contracts; CONTRACTS; DELIVERY; PARTIES; STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

SALE-NOTE. A memorandum given by a broker to a seller or buyer of goods, stating the fact that certain goods have been sold by him on account of a person called the seller to another person called the buyer. Sale-notes are also called bought and sold notes, which see.

SALE AND RETURN. When goods are sent from a manufacturer or wholesale dealer to a retail trader, in the hope that he may purchase them, with the understanding that what he may choose to take he shall have as on a contract of sale, and what he does not take he will retain as a consignee for the owner, the goods are said to have been sent on sale and return.

The goods taken by the receiver as on sale will be considered as sold, and the title to them is vested in the receiver of them: the goods he does not buy are considered as a deposit in the hands of the receiver of them, and the title is in the person who sent them. 1 Bell, Com. 268.

SALIC OR SALIQUE LAW. The name of a code of laws, so called from the Salians, a people of Germany who settled in Gaul under their king Pharamond.

The most remarkable law of this code is that which regards succession. De terrâ vero salicâ nulla portio hæreditatis transit in mulierem, sed hoc virilis sextus acquirit; hoc est, filii in ipsâ hæreditate succedunt: no part of the salique land passes to females, but the males alone are capable of taking; that is, the sons succeed to the inheritance. This has ever excluded females from the throne of France.

SALVAGE. In Maritime Law. A compensation given by the maritime law for service rendered in saving property or rescuing it from impending peril on the sea or wrecked on the coast of the sea, or, in the United States, on a public navigable river or lake, where inter-state or foreign commerce is carried on. 1 Sumn. 210, 416; 12 How. 466; 1 Blatchf. 420; 5 McLean, 359.

The property saved. 2 Phill. Ins. § 1488; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 595.

The peril. In order to found a title to salvage, the peril from which property was saved must be real, not speculative merely; 1 Cra. 1; 1 Ben. Adm. 166; but it need not be such that escape from it by any other means than by the aid of the salvors was impossible. It is sufficient that the peril was something extraordinary, something differing in kind and degree from the ordinary perils of navigation; 1 Curt. C. C. 353; 2 id. 350. All services rendered at sea to a vessel in distress are salvage services; 1 W. Rob. 174; 3 id. 71 But the peril must be present and pending, not future, contingent, and conjectural: 1 Sumn. 216; 3 Hagg. Adm. 344. It may arise from the sea, rocks, fire, pirates, or enemies; 1 Cra. 1; or from the sickness or death of the crew or master; 1 Curt. C. C. 376; 2 Wall. Jr. 59; 1 Swab; 84.

The saving. In order to give a title to salvage, the property must be effectually saved; it must be brought to some port of safety, and it must be there in a state capable of being restored to the owner, before the service can be deemed completed; 1 Sumn. 417; 1 W. Rob. 329, 406. The salvage services must be performed by persons not bound by their legal duty to render them; 1 Hagg. Adm. 227; 2 Spinks, Adm. 253. The property must be saved by the instrumentality of the asserted salvors, or their services must contribute in some certain degree to save it; 4 Wash. C. C. 651; Olc. 462; though, if the services were rendered on the request of the master or owner, the salvor is entitled to salvage though the services were slight and the property was saved mainly by a providential act; 5 McLean, 359; 1 Newb. 130; 2 W. Rob. 91; Bee, 90.

The place. In England, it has been held that the services must be rendered on the high seas, or, at least, extra corpus comitatus, in order to give the admiralty court jurisdiction to decree salvage; but in this country it is held that the district courts of the United States have jurisdiction to decree salvage for services rendered on tide waters and on the lakes or rivers where inter-state or foreign commerce is carried on, although infra corpus comitatus; 12 How. 466; 1 Blatchf. 420; 5 McLean, 359.

The amount. Some foreign states have fixed by law the amount or proportion to be paid for salvage services; but in England and the United States no such rule has been established. In these countries the amount rests in the sound discretion of the court awarding the salvage, upon a full consideration of all the facts of the case. It generally far exceeds a mere remuneration pro opere et labore, the excess being intended, upon principles of sound policy, not only as a reward to the particular salvor, but also as an inducement to others to render like services; 2 Cra. 240; 1 C. Rob. 312, n.; 3 id. 355; 3 Hagg. Adm. 95. But it is equally the policy of the law not to provoke the salvor's appetite of avarice, nor encourage his exorbitant demands, nor teach him to stand ready to devour what the ocean has spared; Gilp. 75. Adequate rewards encourage the tendering and acceptance of salvage services; exorbitant demands discourage their acceptance and tend to augment the risk and loss of vessels in distress. 7 Notes of Cas. 579. The amount is determined by a consideration of the peril to which the property was exposed, the value saved, the risk to life or property incurred by the salvors, their skill, the extent of labor or time employed, and the extent of the necessity that may exist in any particular locality to encourage salvage services; 3 Hagg. Adm. 121; 1 Gall. 133; 1 Sumn. 413; 2 Sprague, 102. An ancient rule of the admiralty allowed the salvors one-half of the property saved, when it was absolutely derelict or abandoned; but that rule has been latterly distinctly repudiated by the high court of admiralty and our supreme court, and the reward in cases of derelict is now governed by the same principles as in other salvage cases; 20 E. L. & E. 607; 4 Notes of Cas. 144; 18 How. 161. Risking life to save the lives of others is an ingredient in salvage service which will enhance the salvage upon the property saved; Daveis, 61; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 84. But no salvage is due for saving life merely, unaccompanied by any saving of property; 1 W. Rob. 330; unless it be the life of a slave; Bee, 226, 260. If one person saves property and another life, the latter is entitled to share in the salvage on the property saved; 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs.

The property saved. Salvage is properly a charge apportionable upon all the interests and property at risk in the voyage which derive any benefit from the salvage service; 1 Stor. 469. Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. It follows that salvage expenses incurred in saving ship, cargo, and freight in one common and continuous service are apportionable upon them all, according to their respective values; but expenses incurred for any one interest separately, or any two interests only, are chargeable wholly to it or to them; 2 W. Rob. 315; 7 E. & B. 523; 2 Pick. 1; 11 id. 90; 4 Whart. 301; 5 Du. N. Y. 310. Goods of the government pay the same rate as if owned by individuals; 3 Sumn. 308; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 246; Edw. Adm. 79; but not the mails; Marv. Salv. 132; nor can vessels of war belonging to a foreign neutral power be arrested in our ports for salvage; 7 Cra. 116; 2 Dods. 451. Salvage is not allowed on the clothing left by the master and crew on board the vessel which they abandon, but this should be returned free of charge; Ware, 378; or for saving from a wreck bills of exchange or other evidences of debt, or documents of title; Daveis, 20.

Bar to salvage claim. An express explicit agreement, in distinct terms, to pay at all events, whether the property shall be saved or not, a sum certain, or a reasonable sum, for work, labor, and the hire of a vessel in attempting to save the property, is inconsistent with a claim for salvage; and when such agreement is pleaded in bar and proved, any claim for salvage will be disallowed; 2 Curt. C. C. 350; 2 W. Rob. 177. An agreement fairly made and fully understood by the salvors, to perform a salvage service for a stipulated sum or proportion, to be paid in the event of a successful saving, does not alter the nature of the service as a salvage service, but fixes the amount of compensation. But such an agreement will not be binding upon the master or owner of the property unless the court can clearly see that no advantage has been taken of the party's situation, and that the rate of compensation agreed upon is just and reasonable; 1 Stor. 323; 1 Sumn. 207; 1 Blackf. 414; 19 How. 160. A custom in any particular trade that vessels shall assist each other without claiming salvage is legal, and a bar to a demand for salvage in all cases where it properly applies; 1 W. Rob. 440.

Forfeiture or denial of salvage. Embezzlement of any of the goods saved works a forfeiture of the salvage of the guilty party; Ware, 380; 1 Sumn. 328; and, in general, fraud, negligence, or carelessness in saving or preserving the property, or any gross misconduct on the part of the salvors in connection with the property saved, will work a total forfeiture of the salvage or a diminution of the amount; 2 Cra. 240; 1 W. Rob. 497; 3 id. 122; 2 E. L. & E. 554; 6 Wheat. 152; 6 Wall. 548.

Distribution. The distribution of salvage among the salvors, like the amount, rests in the sound discretion of the court. In general, all persons, not under a pre-existing obligation of duty to render assistance, who have contributed by their exertions to save the property, and who have not forfeited their rights by their misconduct, are entitled to share in the salvage, as well those who remain on board the salvor vessel in the discharge of their duty, but are ready and willing to engage in the salvage enterprise, as those who go on board and navigate the wreck; Ware, 483; 2 Dods. 132; 2 W. Rob. 115; 2 Cra. 240. The apportionment between the owners and crew of the salvor ship depends upon the peculiar circumstances of each case: such as, the character, size, value, and detention of the vessel, its exposure to peril, and like considerations, and the number, labor, exposure, and hazard of the crew. In ordinary cases, the more usual proportion allowed the owners of a salvor sail-vessel is one-third; 2 Cra. 240; 1 Sumn. 425; 3 id. 579. The owner of a steam-vessel, if of considerable value, is often allowed a larger proportion; Marv. Wreck & Salv. 247. The master's share is usually double that of the mate, and the mate's double that of a seaman, and the share of those who navigate the derelict into port, or do the labor, double that of those who remain on board the salvor vessel. But these proportions are often varied according to the circumstances, so as to reward superior zeal and energy and discourage indifference and selfishness; 3 Hagg. Adm. 121. See generally, Abbott, Mer. Shipp. 536.

In marine insurance, the salvage is to be accounted for by the assured to underwriters in an adjustment of a total or salvage loss, or assigned to the underwriters by abandonment or otherwise; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1726. And so, also, the remnant of the subject insured or of the subject pledged in bottomry, and (if there be such) in that of a fire insurance, and of the interest in the life of a debtor (if so stipulated in this case), is to be brought into the settlement for the loss in like manner; 2 Dutch. 541; 15 Ohio, 81; 2 N. Y. 285; 4 La. 289; 2 Sumn. 157. See next titles.

SALVAGE CHARGES. In Insurance. All those costs, expenses, and charges necessarily incurred in and about the saving and preservation of the property imperilled, and which, if the property be insured, are eventually borne by the underwriters. Stevens, Av. c. 2, § 1.

SALVAGE LOSS. That kind of loss which it is presumed would, but for certain services rendered and exertions made, have become a total loss. It also means, among underwriters and average-adjusters, a mode of settling a loss, under a policy, in cases where the goods have been necessarily sold at a port short of the port of destination, in consequence of the perils insured against. In such cases, though the property be not abandoned to the underwriter, the principle of abandonment is assumed in the adjustment of the loss. The underwriter pays a total loss. The net proceeds of the sale of the goods, after deducting all the expenses, are retained by the assured, and he credits the underwriter with the amount; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1480.

SALVOR. In Maritime Law. A person who saves property or rescues it from impending peril on the sea or when wrecked on the coast of the sea, or, in the United States, on a public navigable river or lake where inter-state commerce is carried on, and who is under no pre-existing contract or obligation of duty by his relation to the property to render such services. 1 Hagg. Adm. 236; 1 Curt. C. C. 378.

In general the crew cannot claim as salvors of their own ship or cargo, they being under a pre-existing obligation of duty to be vigilant to avoid the danger, and when in it to exert themselves to rescue or save the property, in consideration of their wages merely; 1 Hagg. Adm. 236; 2 Mas. C. C. 319. But if their connection with the ship be dissolved, as by a capture, or the ship or cargo be voluntarily abandoned by order of the master, sine spe revertendi aut recuperandi, such abandonment taking place bona fide and without coercion on their part, and for the purpose of saving life, their contract is put an end to, and they may subsequently become salvors; 16 Jur. 572; 3 Sumn. 270; 2 Cra. 240; Daveis, 121. A passenger; 2 Hagg. Adm. 3, n.; 3 B. & P. 612, n.; 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) iv.; a pilot; 10 Pet. 108; Gilp. 65; Lloyd's agent; 3 W. Rob. 181; official persons; 3 Wash. C. C. 567; 1 C. Rob. 46; officers and crews of naval vessels; 2 Wall. Jr. 67; 1 Hagg. Adm. 158; 15 Pet. 518; may all become salvors, and, as such, be entitled to salvage for performing services in saving property, when such services are not within or exceed the line of their proper official duties.

The finders of a derelict (that is, a ship or goods at sea abandoned by the master and crew without the hope or intention of returning and resuming the possession) who take actual possession with an intention and with the means of saving it, acquire a right of possession which they can maintain against all the world, even the true owner, and become bound to preserve the property with good faith and bring it to a place of safety for the owner's use. They are not bound to part with the possession until their salvage is paid, or the property is taken into the custody of the law preparatory to the amount of salvage being legally ascertained; Daveis, 20; Ole. 462; Ware, 339. If they cannot with their own force convey the property to a place of safety without imminent risk of a total or material loss, they cannot, consistently with their obligations to the owner, refuse the assistance of other persons proffering their aid, nor exclude them from rendering it under the pretext that they are the finders and have thus gained the right to the exclusive possession. But if third persons unjustifiably intrude themselves, their services will enure to the benefit of the original salvors; 1 Dods. 414; 3 Hagg. Adm. 156; Ole. 77.

If a first set of salvors fall into distress, and are assisted by a second or third set, the first or second do not lose their claim to salvage, unless they voluntarily and without fraud or coercion abandon the enterprise, but they all share together according to their respective merits; 1 Sumn. 400; 1 W. Rob. 406; 2 id. 70. In cases of ships stranded or in distress, not derelicts, salvors do not acquire an exclusive possession as against the owner, the master, or his agent. While the master continues on board, he is entitled to retain the command and control of the ship and cargo and to direct the labor. The salvors are assistants and laborers under him; and they have no right to prevent other persons from rendering assistance, if the master wishes such aid; 3 Hagg. Adm. 383; 2 W. Rob. 307; 2 E. L. & E. 551. When the ship has been relieved from its peril, salvors forfeit no right and impair no remedy by leaving the ship; 1 Hagg. Adm. 156; 1 Newb. 275. Their remedy to recover salvage is by libel or suit in the district court of the United States, sitting as a court of admiralty.

SAMPLE. A small quantity of any commodity or merchandise, exhibited as a specimen of a larger quantity, called the bulk.

When a sale is made by sample, the vendor warrants the quality of the bulk to be equal to that of the sample; Benj. Sales, § 648; and if it afterwards turn out that the bulk does not correspond with the sample, the purchaser is not, in general, bound to take the property on a compensation being made to him for the difference; 1 Camp. 113. See 4 Camp. 22; 5 Johns. 395; 13 Mass. 139; 3 Rawle, 37; 14 M. & W. 651.

To constitute a sale by "sample," the contract must be made solely with reference to the sample; 13 Mass. 139; 40 N. Y. 113. In Pennsylvania it has been held that in the absence of fraud or representation as to the quality, a sale by sample is not in itself a warranty of the quality of the goods, but simply a guaranty that the goods shall be similar in kind and merchantable; 83 Penn. 319. But although goods sold by sample are not in general deemed to be sold with an implied warranty that they were merchantable, the facts and circumstances may justify the inference that this implied warranty is superadded to the contract; L. R. 4 Ex. 49. If a manufacturer agrees to furnish goods according to sample, the sample is to be considered as if free from any secret defect of manufacture not discoverable on inspection, and unknown to both parties; L. R. 7 C. P. 438; but if the sale is made by a merchant, who is not a manufacturer, there is no implied warranty against secret defects; 7 Allen, 29. It is an implied condition in a sale by sample that the buyer shall have a fair opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sample, and an improper refusal by the vendor to allow this will justify the buyer in rejecting the contract; 1 B. & C. 1; see Benj. Sales, Bennett's edition, § 649.

SANCTION. That part of a law which inflicts a penalty for its violation or bestows a reward for its observance. Sanctions are of two kinds,—those which redress civil injuries, called civil sanctions, and those which punish crimes, called penal sanctions. 1 Hoffm. Leg. Outl. 279; Ruth. Inst. b. 2, c. 6, s. 6; Toull. tit. prél. 86; 1 Bla. Com. 56.

SANCTUARY. A place of refuge, where the process of the law cannot be executed.

Sanctuaries may be divided into religious and civil. The former were very common in Europe,—religious houses affording protection from arrest to all persons, whether accused of crime or pursued for debt. This kind was never known in the United States, and was abolished in England by statute 21 Jac. I. c. 28.

Civil sanctuary, or that protection which is afforded to a man by his own house, was always respected in this country. The house protects the owner from the service of all civil process in the first instance, but not if he is once lawfully arrested and takes refuge in his own house. See DOOR; HOUSE; ARREST.

No place affords protection from arrest in criminal cases: a man may, therefore, be arrested in his own house in such cases, and the doors may be broken for the purpose of making the arrest. See ARREST.

SANE MEMORY. That understanding which enables a man to make contracts and his will, and to perform such other acts as are authorized by law. See LUNACY; MEMORY; NON COMPOS MENTIS.

SANG, SANC. Blood. These words are nearly obsolete.

SANITY. The state of a person who has a sound understanding; the reverse of insanity.

The sanity of an individual is always presumed; 5 Johns. 144; 1 Pet. 163; 1 Hen. & M. 476; 4 Wash. C. C. 262. See INSANITY.

SANS CEO QUE. The same as Absque hoc, which see.

SANS NOMBRE (Fr. without number). In English Law. A term used in relation to the right of putting animals on a common. The term common sans nombre does not mean that the beasts are to be innumerable, but only indefinite, not certain; Willes, 227; but they are limited to the commoner's own commonable cattle, levant et couchant, upon his lands, or as many cattle as the land of the commoner can keep and maintain in winter; 5 Term, 48; 1 Wms. Saund. 28, n. 4.

SANS RECOURS (Fr. without recourse). Words which are sometimes added to an indorsement by the indorsee to avoid incurring any liability. 7 Taunt. 160; 3 Cra. 198; 7 id. 159; 12 Mass. 172; 14 S. & R. 325. See INDORSEMENT.

SATISDATIO (Lat. satis, and dare). In Civil Law. Security given by a party to an action to pay what might be adjudged against him. It is a satisfactory security in opposition to a naked security or promise. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 3 Bla. Com. 291.

SATISFACTION (Lat. satis, enough, facio, to do, to make). In Practice. An entry made on the record, by which a party in whose favor a judgment was rendered declares that he has been satisfied and paid.

In Alabama, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Vermont, provision is made by statute, requiring the mortgagee to discharge a mortgage upon the record, by entering satisfaction in the margin, or by separate instrument, to be recorded on the margin. The refusal or neglect to enter satisfaction after payment and demand renders the mortgagee liable to an action after the time given him by the respective statutes for doing the same has elapsed, and subjects him to the payment of damages, and, in some cases, treble costs. In Indiana and New York, the register or recorder of deeds may himself discharge the mortgage upon the record on the exhibition of a certificate of payment and satisfaction signed by the mortgagee or his representatives, and attached to the mortgage, which shall be recorded. 2 Ind. Stat. § 634. March 9, 1861; N. Y. Rev. Stat. p. 2252, L. 1879, ch. 171.

In Equity. The donation of a thing, with the intention, expressed or implied, that such donation is to be an extinguishment of some existing right or claim in the donee. See LEGACY; CUMULATIVE LEGACY.

SATISFACTION PIECE. In English Practice. An instrument of writing in which it is declared that satisfaction is acknowledged between the plaintiff and defendant. It is signed by the attorney, and on its production and the warrant of attorney, to the clerk of the judgments, satisfaction is entered on payment of certain fees. Lee, Dict. of Pract. Satisfaction.

SATISFACTORY EVIDENCE. That which is sufficient to induce a belief that the thing is true; in other words, it is credible evidence. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3049.

SATISFIED TERMS ACT. The stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112, passed to abolish satisfied outstanding terms of years in land. By this act, terms which shall henceforth become attendant upon the inheritance, either by express declaration or construction of law, are to cease and determine. This, in effect, abolishes outstanding terms; 1 Steph. Com. 380–382; Wms. R. P. pt. iv. c. 1; Moz. & W.

SAVINGS BANK. An institution in the nature of a bank, formed or established for the purpose of receiving deposits of money, for the benefit of the persons depositing, to accumulate the produce of so much thereof as shall not be required by the depositors, their executors or administrators, at compound interest, and to return the whole or any part of such deposit, and the produce thereof to the depositors, their executors or administrators, deducting out of such produce so much as shall be required for the necessary expenses attending the management of such institution, but deriving no benefit whatever from any such deposit or the produce thereof. Grant, Bank. 571.

In the United States, these institutions are regulated by the statutes of each state, limiting the surplus fund, the amount of interest to be paid, and the division of the profits.

SAXON LAGE. The laws of the West Saxons. Cowel.

SAY ABOUT. Words frequently used in contracts to indicate an uncertain quantity. They have been said to mark emphatically the vendor's purpose to guard himself against being supposed to have made an absolute promise as to "quantity; 21 W. R. 609. There a sale of all the spars manufactured, say about 600," was held to be complied with by a tender of 496 spars. See 2 B. & Ad. 106; 5 Gray, 589; 8 Pet. 181.

SCANDAL. A scandalous verbal report or rumor respecting some person.

SCANDALOUS MATTER. In Equity Pleading. Unnecessary matter criminatory of the defendant or any other person, alleged in the bill, answer, or other pleading, or in the interrogatories to or answers by witnesses. Adams, Eq. 306. Matter which is relevant can never be scandalous; Story, Eq. Pl. § 270; 15 Ves. 477; and the degree of relevancy is of no account in determining the question; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 19; 2 Ves. 24; 6 id. 514; 11 id. 256; 15 id. 477. Where scandal is alleged, whether in the bill; 2 Ves. 631; answer; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 313; or interrogatories to or answer of witnesses; 2 Y. & C. 445; it will be referred to a master at any time; 2 Ves. 631; and, by leave of court, even upon the application of a stranger to the suit; 6 Ves. 514; 5 Beav. 82; and matter found to be scandalous by him will be expunged; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 266, 862; 4 Hen. & M. 414; at the cost of counsel introducing it, in some cases; Story, Eq. Pl. § 266. The presence of scandalous matter in the bill is no excuse for its being in the answer; 19 Me. 214.

SCANDALUM MAGNATUM (L. Lat. slander of great men). Words spoken in derogation of a peer, a judge, or other great officer of the realm. 1 Ventr. 60. This was distinct from mere slander in the earlier law, and was considered a more heinous offence. Bull. N. P. 4. See 3 Bla. Com. 124.

SCHEDULE. In Practice. When an indictment is returned from an inferior court in obedience to a writ of certiorari, the statement of the previous proceedings sent with it is termed the schedule. 1 Saund. 309 a, n. 2.

Schedules are also frequently annexed to answers in a court of equity, and to depositions and other documents, in order to show more in detail the matter they contain than could otherwise be conveniently shown.

The term is frequently used instead of inventory.

SCHOOL. An institution of learning of a lower grade, below a college or a university. A place of primary instruction. Webster, Dict. As used in the American reports, the term generally refers to the common or public schools existing under the laws of each state and maintained at the expense of the public.

When the legislature has placed the management of public schools under the exclusive control of directors, trustees, and boards of education, the courts have no rightful authority to interfere by directing what instruction shall be given, or what books shall be used therein; 23 Ohio St. 211; s. c. 13 Am. Rep. 233. A statute establishing separate systems of schools for white and colored children is not in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States. And where appropriate schools for colored children are maintained, such children may be lawfully excluded from schools established for white children; 48 Cal. 36; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 405; 48 Ind. 327; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 738. But a mandamus will lie compelling trustees to admit colored children to public schools where separate schools are not provided for them; 7 Nev. 342; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 713.

SCHOOLMASTER. One employed in teaching a school.

A schoolmaster stands in loco parentis in relation to the pupils committed to his charge, while they are under his care, so far as to enforce obedience to his commands lawfully given in his capacity as schoolmaster, and he may, therefore, enforce them by moderate correction; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (3 M. 19); Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 60, sect. 23; 4 Gray, 36; 45 Iowa, 248; s. c. 24 Am. Rep. 769. See CORRECTION.

The schoolmaster is entitled to be paid for his services, by those who employ him. See 1 Bingh. 357; 8 J. B. Moore, 368. His duties are to teach his pupils what he has undertaken, and to have a special care over their morals. See 1 Stark. 421; ASSAULT. The salary of a public school teacher is not attachable by trustee powers while in the hands of city officials whose duty it is to pay it; 54 Ga. 21; s. c. 21 Am. Rep. 273.

SCIENDUM (L. Lat.). In English Law. The name given to a clause inserted in the record by which it is made "known that the justice here in court, in this same term, delivered a writ thereupon to the deputy sheriff of the county aforesaid, to be executed in due form of law." Lee, Dict. Record.

SCIENTER (L. Lat. knowingly). The allegation of knowledge on the part of a defendant or person accused, which is necessary to charge upon him the consequence of the crime or tort.

A man may do many acts which are justifiable or not, as he is ignorant or not ignorant of certain facts. He may pass a counterfeit coin, when he is ignorant of its being counterfeit, and is guilty of no offence; but if he knew the coin to be counterfeit, which is called the scienter, he is guilty of passing counterfeit money.

SCILICET (Lat. scire, to know, licet, it is permitted: you may know: translated by to wit, in its old sense of to know). That is to say; to wit; namely.

It is a clause to usher in the sentence of another, to particularize that which was too general before, distribute what was too gross, or to explain what was doubtful and obscure. It neither increases nor diminishes the premises or habendum, for it gives nothing of itself; it may make a restriction when the preceding words may be restrained; Hob. 171; 1 P. Wms. C. 18; Co. Litt. 180 b. note 1.

When the scilicet is repugnant to the precedent matter, it is void: for example, when a declaration in trover states that the plaintiff on the third day of May was possessed of certain goods which on the fourth day of May came to the defendant's hands, who afterward, to wit, on the first day of May, converted them, the scilicet was rejected as surplusage; Cro. Jac. 428. And see 6 Binn. 15; 3 Saund. 291, note 1.

Stating material and traversable matter under a scilicet will not avoid the consequences of a variance; 1 M'Cl. & Y. 277; 2 B. & P. 170, n. 2; 4 Johns. 450; 2 Pick. 223; nor will the mere omission of a scilicet render immaterial matter material; 2 Saund. 206 a; even in a criminal proceeding; 2 Camp. 307, n. See 3 Term, 68; 3 Maule & S. 173.

SCINTILLA OF EVIDENCE. The doctrine that where there is any evidence, however slight, tending to support a material issue, the case must go to the jury, since they are the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence. 43 Ga. 323; 106 Mass. 271; 40 Mo. 151. In the United States courts, it has been decided that the more reasonable rule is, "that before the evidence is left to the jury, there is, or may be, in every case, a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the burden of proof is imposed;" 94 U. S. 278; 11 How. 378; 9 Wall. 197; 10 id. 604. A similar doctrine prevails in England, where it is now settled that the question for the judge is, whether there is any evidence that might reasonably and properly satisfy the jury that the fact sought to be proved is established; 13 C. B. 916; 3 C. B. N. S. 150.

The old rule is likewise exploded in several of the states, whose courts are now in the constant habit of ordering nonsuits against the complaint of the plaintiff; 49 N. J. 671; 58 Me. 384; of giving peremptory instructions to the jury to find for one party or the other; 71 N. C. 451; 15 Kan. 244; or of sustaining demurrers to the evidence, in cases where there is confessedly some evidence supporting a material issue. This is done under the guise of various expressions, which seem to leave the ancient prerogative of the jury intact. In Maryland, and perhaps other states, the judge achieves this result by determining the legal sufficiency of the evidence; 7 Gill & J. 20; and in Missouri by determining its legal effect; 9 Mo. 113. See 1 Jones & Sp. 128; 45 How. Pr. 48. See Thompson on Charging the Jury, § 30.

SCINTILLA JURIS (Lat. a spark of law or right). A legal fiction resorted to for the purpose of enabling feoffees to uses to support contingent uses when they come into existence, thereby to enable the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. VIII., to execute them. For example, a shifting use: a grant to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, until C perform an act, and then to the use of C and his heirs. Here the statute executes the use in B, which, being coextensive with A's seisin, leaves no actual seisin in A. When, however, C performs the act, B's use ceases, and C's springs up, and he enjoys the fee-simple; upon which the question arises, out of what seisin C's use is served. It is said to be served out of A's original seisin; for upon the cessor of B's use it is contended that the original seisin reverted to A for the purpose of serving C's use, and is a possibility of seisin, or scintilla juris. See 4 Kent, 238, and the authorities there cited, for the learning upon this subject; Burton, R. P. 48; Wilson, Springing Uses, 59; Washb. R. P.

SCIRE FACIAS (Lat. that you make known). The name of a writ (and of the whole proceeding) founded on some public record.

Public records, to which the writ is applicable, are of two classes, judicial and non-judicial.

Judicial records are of two kinds, judgments in former suits, and recognizances which are of the nature of judgments. When founded on a judgment, the purpose of the writ is either to revive the judgment, which because of lapse of time—a year and a day at common law, but now varied by statutes—is presumed in law to be executed or released, and therefore execution on it is not allowed without giving notice, by scire facias, to the defendant to come in, and show if he can, by release or otherwise, why execution ought not to issue; or to make a person, who derives a benefit by or becomes chargeable to the execution, a party to the judgment, who was not a party to the original suit. In both of these classes of cases, the purpose of the writ is merely to continue a former suit to execution. When the writ is founded on a recognizance, its purpose is, as in cases of judgment, to have execution; and though it is not a continuation of a former suit, as in the case of judgments, yet, not being the commencement and foundation of an action, it is not an original, but a judicial, writ, and at most is only in the nature of an original action. When founded on a judicial record, the writ must issue out of the court where the judgment was given or recognizance entered of record, if the judgment or recognizance remains there, or if they are removed out of the court where they are; 3 Bla. Com. 416, 421; 3 Gill & J. 359; 2 Wms. Saund. 71, notes.

Non-judicial records are letters patent and corporate charters. The writ, when founded on a non-judicial record, is the commencement and foundation of an original action; and its purpose is always to repeal or forfeit the record. Quo warranto is the usual and more appropriate remedy to forfeit corporate charters and offices; and scire facias, though used for that purpose, is more especially applicable to the repeal of letters patent. When the crown is deceived by a false suggestion, or when it has granted any thing which by law it cannot grant, or where the holder of a patent office has committed a cause of forfeiture, and other like cases, the crown may by its prerogative repeal by scire facias its own grant. And where by several letters patent the selfsame thing has been granted to several persons, the first patentee is of right permitted, in the name and at the suit of the crown by scire facias, to repeal the subsequent letters patent; and so, in any case of the grant of a patent which is injurious to another, the injured party is permitted to use the name of the crown in a suit by scire facias for the repeal of the grant. This privilege of suing in the name of the crown for the repeal of the patent is granted to prevent multiplicity of suits; 2 Wms. Saund. 72, notes. A state may by scire facias repeal a patent of land fraudulently obtained; 1 H. & M'H. 162.

Scire facias is also used by government as a mode to ascertain and enforce the forfeiture of a corporate charter, where there is a legal existing body capable of acting, but who have abused their power; it cannot, like quo warranto (which is applicable to all cases of forfeiture), be applied where there is a body corporate de facto only, who take upon themselves to act, but cannot legally exercise their powers. In scire facias to forfeit a corporate charter, the government must be a party to the suit; for the judgment is that the parties be ousted and the franchises be seized into the hands of the government; 2 Kent, 313; 10 B. & C. 240 5 Mass. 230; 16 S. & R. 140; 4 Gill & J. 1; 9 id. 365; 4 Gill, 404. See QUO WARRANTO.

Scire facias is also used to suggest further breaches on a bond with a condition, where a judgment has been obtained for some but not all of the breaches and to recover further instalments where a judgment has been obtained for the penalty before all the instalments are due; 1 Wms. Saund. 58, n. 1; 4 Md. 375.

By statute, in Pennsylvania, scire facias is the method of proceeding upon a mortgage.

The pleadings in scire facias are peculiar. The writ recites the judgment or other record, and also the suggestions which the plaintiff must make to the court to entitle him to the proceeding by scire facias. The writ, therefore, presents the plaintiff's whole case, and constitutes the declaration, to which the defendant must plead; 1 Blackf. 297. And when the proceeding is used to forfeit a corporate charter, all the causes of forfeiture must be assigned in distinct breaches in the writ, as on a bond with a condition is done in the declaration or replication. And the defendant must either disclaim the charter or deny its existence, or deny the facts alleged as breaches, or demur to them. The suggestions in the writ, disclosing the foundation of the plaintiff's case, must also be traversed if they are to be avoided. The scire facias is founded partly upon them and partly upon the record; 2 Inst. 470, 679. They are substantive facts, and can be traversed by distinct pleas embracing them alone, just as any other fundamental allegation can be traversed alone. All the pleadings after the writ or declaration are in the ordinary forms. There are no pleadings in scire facias to forfeit a corporate charter to be found in the books, as the proceeding has been seldom used. There is a case in 1 P. Wms. 207, but no pleadings. There is a case also in 9 Gill, 379, with a synopsis of the pleadings. Perhaps the only other case is in Vermont; and it is without pleadings. A defendant cannot plead more than one plea to a scire facias to forfeit a corporate charter: the statutes of 4 & 5 Anne, ch. 16, and 9 Anne, ch. 20, allowing double pleas, do not extend to the crown; 1 Chitty, Pl. 479; 1 P. Wms. 220.

SCIRE FACIAS AD AUDIENDUM ERRORES (Lat.). The name of a writ which is sued out after the plaintiff in error has assigned his errors. Fitzh. N. B. 20; Bacon, Abr. Error (F).

SCIRE FACIAS AD DISPROBANDUM DEBITUM (Lat.). The name of a writ in use in Pennsylvania, which lies by a defendant in foreign attachment against the plaintiff, in order to enable him, within a year and a day next ensuing the time of payment to the plaintiff in the attachment, to disprove or avoid the debt recovered against him. Act relating to the commencement of actions, s. 61, passed June 13, 1836.

SCIRE FECI (Lat. I have made known). In Practice. The return of the sheriff, or other proper officer, to the writ of scire facias, when it has been served.

SCIRE FIERI INQUIRY. In English Law. The name of a writ formerly used to recover the amount of a judgment from an executor.

The history of the origin of the writ is as follows. When on an execution de bonis testatoris against an executor the sheriff returned nulla bona and also a devastavit, a fieri facias, de bonis propriis, might formerly have been issued against the executor, without a previous inquisition finding a devastavit and a scire facias. But the most usual practice upon the sheriff's return of nulla bona to a fieri facias de bonis testatoris was to sue out a special writ of fieri facias de bonis testatoris, with a clause in it, "et si tibi constare poterit," that the executor had wasted the goods, then to levy de bonis propriis. This was the practice in the king's bench till the time of Charles I.

In the common pleas a practice had prevailed in early times upon a suggestion in the special writ of fieri facias of a devastavit by the executor, to direct the sheriff to inquire by a jury whether the executor had wasted the goods, and if the jury found he had, then a scire facias was issued out against him, and, unless he made a good defence thereto, an execution de bonis propriis was awarded against him.

The practice of the two courts being different, several cases were brought into the king's bench on error, and at last it became the practice of both courts, for the sake of expedition, to incorporate the fieri facias inquiry, and scire facias, into one writ, thence called a scire fieri inquiry,—a name compounded of the first words of the two writs of scire facias and fieri facias, and that of inquiry, of which it consists.

This writ recites the fieri facias de bonis testatoris sued out on the judgment against the executor, the return of nulla bona by the sheriff, and then, suggesting that the executor had sold and converted the goods of the testator to the value of the debt and damages recovered, commands the sheriff to levy the said debt and damages of the goods of the testator in the hands of the executor, if they could be levied thereof, but if it should appear to him by the inquisition of a jury that the executor had wasted the goods of the testator, then the sheriff is to warn the executor to appear, etc. If the judgment had been either by or against the testator or intestate, or both, the writ of fieri facias recites that fact, and also that the court had adjudged, upon a scire facias to revive the judgment, that the executor or administrator should have execution for the debt, etc. Clift, Entr. 669; Lilly, Entr. 664.

Although this practice is sometimes adopted, yet the most usual proceeding is by action of debt, on the judgment, suggesting a devastavit, because in the proceeding by scire fieri inquiry the plaintiff is not entitled to costs unless the executor appears and pleads to the scire facias; 1 Saund. 219, n. 8. See 2 Archb. Pr. 934.

SCITE. The setting or standing of any place. The seat or situation of a capital messuage, or the ground on which it stood. Jacobs, Law Dict.

SCOLD. See COMMON SCOLD.

SCOT AND LOT. In English Law. The name of a customary contribution, laid upon all the subjects according to their ability.

SCOTALE. An extortion by officers of the forests who kept ale-houses and compelled people to drink there under fear of their displeasure. Manw. For. Laws, pt. 1, 216.

SCOTCH MARRIAGES. It was formerly quite common for persons to cross the border into Scotland in order to be married without the delay and formalities required in England. Gretna Green, in Dumfriesshire, was the most celebrated resort for this purpose, being most conveniently situated; hence the phrase "Gretna Green" marriages. They were practically abolished in 1856. See 1 Bish. Mar. & D. 192, n.; 2 Steph. Com. 295, n.

SCOUNDREL. An opprobrious title, applicable to a person of bad character. General damages will not lie for calling a man a scoundrel, but special damages may be recovered when there has been an actual loss; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2250; 1 Chitty, Pr. 44.

SCRAWL. A mark which is to supply the place of a seal. 2 Pars. Contr. 100. See SCROLL.

SCRIP. A certificate or schedule. Evidence of the right to obtain shares in a public company; sometimes called scrip certificate, to distinguish it from the real title to shares. Wharton, Law Dict.; 15 Ark. 12. The possession of such scrip is prima facie evidence of ownership of the shares therein designated; Addison, Contr. 203*. It is not goods, wares, or merchandise within the Statute of Frauds; 16 M. & W. 66. Scrip certificates have been held negotiable; L. R. 10 Ex. 337; Dos Passos, Stockbrokers, 488.

SCRIPT. The original or principal instrument, where there are part and counterpart.

SCRIVENER. A person whose business it is to write deeds and other instruments for others; a conveyancer.

Money scriveners are those who are engaged in procuring money to be lent on mortgages and other securities, and lending such money accordingly. They act also as agents for the purchase and sale of real estates.

An attorney, qua attorney, is not a scrivener; 18 E. L. & Eq. R. 402.

To be considered a money scrivener, a person must be concerned in carrying on the trade or profession as a means of making a livelihood. He must in the course of his occupation receive other men's money into his trust and custody, to lay out for them as occasion offers; 3 Camp. 538.

SCROLL. A mark intended to supply the place of a seal made with a pen or other instrument of writing.

A scroll is adopted as a sufficient seal in Jamaica; 1 B. & P. 360, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Wisconsin, and, perhaps, one or two other states. In those states, as a rule, the scroll will not have the effect of a seal, unless the maker declare, in the instrument itself, that he set his seal thereto; 7 Leigh, 301. In Mississippi and Florida it has been held, that "a scroll attached to a written instrument has the effect of a seal, whenever it appears, from the body of the instrument, the scroll itself, or the place where affixed, that such scroll was intended as a seal;" 42 Miss. 304; 9 Sm. & M. 34. In Tennessee the word "seal" affixed to the name has been held equivalent to a seal or scroll; 1 Swan, 333; otherwise in Virginia and Indiana. In Wisconsin and Pennsylvania a printed "L. S.," inclosed in brackets, in the usual place of a seal, is sufficient; 5 Wis. 549; or in the latter state a seal made with a flourish of the pen; 1 S. & R. 72. An expression in the body of the instrument denoting that it is sealed is sufficient, whatever the scroll may be; 5 Mo. 79; 1 Morris (Ia.), 48; 5 Harr. (Del.) 351; 13 La. An. 524. See Martindale, Conveyancing. In the New England states, New Jersey, and New York, the common-law seal is required; Thornton, Conv.

SCRUET ROLL (called, also, Scruet Finium, or simply Scruet). In Old English Law. A record of the bail accepted in cases of habeas corpus. The award was set down in the remembrance roll, together with the cause of commitment, the writ and return were put on file, the bail was recorded in the scruet. 3 Howell, St. Tr. 134, 135, arg. For remembrance roll, see Reg. Mich. 1654, § 15.

SCRUTATOR (Lat. from scrutari, to search). In Old English Law. A bailiff whom the king of England appointed in places that were his in franchise or interest, whose duty was to look after the king's water-rights: as, flotsam, jetsam, wreck, etc. 1 Hargr. Tracts, 23; Pat. 27 Hen. VI. parte 2, m. 20; Pat. 8 Ed. IV. parte 1, m. 22.

SCUTAGE (from Lat. scutum, a shield). Knight-service. Littleton, § 99. The tax which those who, holding by knight-service, did not accompany the king, had to pay on its being assessed by parliament. Escuage certain was a species of socage where the compensation for service was fixed. Littleton, § 97; Reg. Orig. 88.

SCYREGEMOTE. The name of a court among the Saxons. It was the court of the shire, in Latin called curia comitatis, and the principal court among the Saxons. It was holden twice a year for determining all causes both ecclesiastical and secular.

SE DEFENDENDO (Lat.). Defending himself. Homicide se defendendo may be justifiable.

SEA. The ocean; the great mass of water which surrounds the land, and which probably extends from pole to pole, covering nearly three-quarters of the globe. Waters within the ebb and flow of the tide are to be considered the sea. Gilp. 526.

A large body of salt water communicating with the ocean is also called a sea: as, the Mediterranean sea, etc.

Very large inland bodies of salt water are also called seas: as, the Caspian sea, etc.

The high seas include the whole of the seas below high water mark and outside the body of the county. Couls. & F. on Waters. See 2 Ex. Div. 62.

The open sea is public and common property, and any nation or person has ordinarily an equal right to navigate it or to fish therein; 1 Kent, 27; Ang. Tide-Waters, 44; and to land upon the sea-shore; 1 Bouvier, Inst. 173.

Every nation has jurisdiction over the person of its own subjects in its own public and private vessels when at sea; and so far territorial jurisdiction may be considered as preserved; for the vessels of a nation are in many respects considered as portions of its territory, and persons on board are protected and governed by the laws of the country to which the vessel belongs. The extent of jurisdiction over adjoining seas is often a question of difficulty, and one that is still open to controversy. As far as a nation can conveniently occupy, and that occupation is acquired by prior possession or treaty, the jurisdiction is exclusive; 1 Kent, 29–31. This has been heretofore limited to the distance of a cannon-shot, or marine league, over the waters adjacent to its shore; 2 Cra. 187, 234; 1 Cra. C. C. 62; Bynkershoek, Qu. Pub. Juris. 61; 1 Azuni, Marit. Law, 185, 204; Vattel, 207. See LEAGUE; SEAMAN; ADMIRALTY.

SEA-LETTER, SEA-BRIEF. In Maritime Law. A document which should be found on board of every neutral ship; it specifies the nature and quantity of the cargo, the place from whence it comes, and its destination. Chitty, Law of Nat. 197; 1 Johns. 192.

SEA-SHORE. That space of land on the border of the sea which is alternately covered and left dry by the rising and falling of the tide; or, in other words, that space of land between high and low water mark. Hargrave, St. Tr. 12; 6 Mass. 435; 1 Pick. 180; 5 Day, 22; 12 Me. 237; 2 Zabr. 441; 4 De G. M. & G. 206; 40 Conn. 382; s. c. 16 Am. Rep. 51, n. See TIDE; TIDE-WATER.

At common law, the sea-shore, in England, belongs to the crown; in this country, to the state; Ang. Tide-Wat. 20; 3 Kent, 347; 27 E. L. & E. 242; 6 Mass. 435; 16 Pet. 367; 3 How. 221; 3 Zabr. 624. In England, the sovereign is not the absolute proprietor, but holds the sea-shore subject to the public rights of navigation and fishery; and if he grants it to an individual, his grantee takes subject to the same rights; Phear, Rights of Water, 45–55; Ang. Tide-Wat. 21. So in this country it has been held that the rights of fishery and navigation remain unimpaired by the grant of lands covered by navigable water; 6 Gill, 121. But the power of the states, unlike that of the crown, is absolute, except in so far as it is controlled by the federal constitution; Ang. Tide-Wat. 59. The states, therefore, may regulate the use of their shores and the fisheries thereon, provided such regulations do not interfere with the laws of congress; 4 Wash. C. C. 371; 18 How. 71; 4 Zabr. 80; 2 Pet. 245. And see TIDE-WATER; RIVER.

The public right of fishing includes shrimping and gathering all shell-fish or other fish whose natural habitat is between high and low water mark; 5 Day, 22; 2 B. & P. 472; 22 Me. 353.

In Massachusetts and Maine, by the colony ordinance of 1691, and by usage arising therefrom, the proprietors of the adjoining land on bays and arms of the sea, and other places where the tide ebbs and flows, go to low water mark, subject to the public easement, and not exceeding one hundred yards below high water mark; 3 Kent, 429; Dane, Abr. c. 68, a. 3, 4. See WHARF.

By the Roman law, the shore included the land as far as the greatest wave extended in winter: est autem littus maris, quatenus hibernus fluctus maximus excurrit. Inst. l. 2, t. 1, s. 3. Littus publicum est eatenus qua maxime fluctus æstuat. Dig. 50. 16. 112.

The Civil Code of Louisiana seems to have followed the law of the Institutes and the Digest; for it enacts, art. 442, that the "sea-shore is that space of land over which the waters of the sea are spread in the highest water during the winter season." See 5 Rob. 182; Dougl. 425; 1 Halst. 1; 2 Rolle, Abr.

170; Dy. 326; 5 Co. 107; Bacon, Abr. Courts of Admiralty (A); 16 Pet. 234, 367; Ang. Tide-Waters, 5 M. & W. 327; 22 Me. 350; Coul. & F., Waters; Hale's De Jure Maris, given in full in Hale Sea Sh. and for the most part in 16 Am. Rep. 54.

SEA-WEED. A species of grass which grows in the sea.

When cast upon land, it belongs to the owner of the land adjoining the sea-shore, upon the grounds that it increases gradually, that it is useful as manure and a protection to the ground, and that it is some compensation for the encroachment of the sea upon the land; 3 B. & Ad. 967; 2 Johns. 313, 323. See 5 Vt. 223. But when cast upon the shore between high and low water mark it belongs to the public and may be lawfully appropriated by any person; 40 Conn. 382; s. c. 16 Am. Rep. 54.

SEAL. An impression upon wax, wafer, or some other tenacious substance capable of being impressed. 5 Johns. 239; 4 Kent, 452.

Lord Coke defines a seal to be wax, with an impression. 3 Inst. 169. "Sigillum," says he, "est cera impressa, quia cera sine impressione non est sigillum." The definition given above is the common-law definition of a seal; Perkins, 129, 134; Brooke, Abr. Faits, 17, 30; 2 Leon. 21; 5 Johns. 239; 21 Pick. 417; but any other material besides wax may be used; 1 Am. L. Rev. 639.

The mere printing of the fac simile of the seal of a corporation at the same time and by the same agency as the printing of the certificates, to be afterwards signed by the president and secretary, leaving writing to be done by the officers of the corporation, who alone were authorized to affix the corporate seal, does not constitute a valid seal; 10 Allen, 251; but the impression of a corporate seal stamped upon and into the substance of the paper upon which the instrument is written, is a good seal, although no wax, wafer, or other adhesive substance is used; 14 id. 381.

In some of the United States a scroll is equally effective. See SCROLL.

Merlin defines a seal to be a plate of metal with a flat surface, on which is engraved the arms of a prince or nation, or private individual, or other device, with which an impression may be made on wax or other substance on paper or parchment, in order to authenticate them: the impression thus made is also called a seal; Répert. mot Sceau; 3 M'Cord, 583; 5 Whart. 563.

When a seal is affixed to an instrument it makes it a specialty. See SPECIALTY.

When an instrument concludes with the words, "witness our hands and seals," and is signed by two persons, with only one seal, the jury may infer from the face of the paper that the person who signed last adopted the seal of the first; 6 Penn. 302. An executory contract under seal, ignorantly made in pursuance of a parol authority, will be sufficient to maintain an action, the seal being disregarded as mere excess; 60 Penn. 214. Where a corporation executed a promissory note, payable to the order of its president, attaching thereto before delivery, its corporate seal, it was held that the note was not a negotiable note under the law merchant, but was a specialty; 8 Fed. Rep. 534. See 1 Ohio, 386; 3 Johns. 470; 12 id. 76; as to the origin and use of seals, Addison, Contr. 6; SCROLL.

The public seal of a foreign state proves itself; and public acts, decrees, and judgments exemplified under this seal are received as true and genuine; 2 Cra. 187, 238; 7 Wheat. 273, 335; 2 Conn. 85; 6 Wend. 475. See 2 Munf. 53. But to entitle its seal to such authority the foreign state must have been acknowledged by the government within whose jurisdiction the forum is located; 3 Wheat. 610; 9 Ves. 347.

The seal of a notary public is taken judicial notice of the world over; 2 Esp. 700; 5 Cra. 535; 6 S. & R. 484; 3 Wend. 173; 1 Gray, 175; but it must not be a scroll; 4 Blackf. 158. Judicial notice is taken of the seals of superior courts; Comyns, Dig. Evidence (A 2); not so of foreign courts; 3 East, 221; 9 id. 192; except admiralty or marine courts; 2 Cra. 187; 4 id. 292, 435; 3 Conn. 171. See Story, Confl. Laws, § 643; 2 Phill. Ev. 454, notes.

SEAL DAYS. In English Practice. Motion days in the court of chancery, so called because every motion had to be stamped with the seal, which did not lie in court in the ordinary sittings out of term; Whart. Dict.

SEAL OFFICE. In English Practice. The office at which certain judicial writs are sealed with the prerogative seal, and without which they are of no authority. The officer whose duty it is to seal such writs is called "sealer of writs."

SEAL OF THE UNITED STATES. The seal used by the United States in congress assembled shall be the seal of the United States, viz.: ARMS, paleways of thirteen pieces argent and gules; a chief azure; the escutcheon on the breast of the American eagle displayed proper, holding in his dexter talon an olive-branch, and in his sinister a bundle of thirteen arrows, all proper, and in his beak a scroll, inscribed with this motto, "E pluribus unum." For the CREST: over the head of the eagle which appears above the escutcheon, a glory, or breaking through a cloud, proper, and surrounding thirteen stars, forming a constellation argent on an azure field. REVERSE, a pyramid unfinished. In the zenith, an eye in a triangle, surrounded with a glory proper: over the eye, these words, Annuit cœptis." On the base of the pyramid, the numerical letters MDCCLXXVI; and underneath, the following motto: "Novus ordo sectorum." Resolution of Congress, June 20, 1782; R. S. § 1793. See 1 Cra. 158.

SEALING A VERDICT. In Practice. The putting a verdict in writing, and placing it in an envelope, which is sealed. To relieve jurors after they have agreed, it is not unusual for the counsel to agree that the jury shall seal their verdict and then separate. When the court is again in session, the jury come in and give their verdict in all respects as if it had not been sealed; and a juror may dissent from it if since the sealing he has honestly changed his mind; 8 Ohio, 405; 1 Gilm. 333.

SEALS. In Louisiana. A method of taking the effects of a deceased person into public custody.

On the death of a person, according to the laws of Louisiana, if the heir wishes to obtain the benefit of inventory and the delays for deliberating, he is bound, as soon as he knows of the death of the deceased to whose succession he is called, and before committing any act of heirship, to cause the seals to be affixed on the effects of the succession by any judge or justice of the peace. La. Civ. Code, art. 1027.

In ten days after this affixing of the seals, the heir is bound to present a petition to the judge of the place in which the succession is opened, praying for the removal of the seals and that a true and faithful inventory of the effects of the succession be made. Id. art. 1028.

In case of vacant estates, and estates of which the heirs are absent and not represented, the seals, after the decease, must be affixed by a judge or justice of the peace within the limits of his jurisdiction, and may be fixed by him either ex officio or at the request of the parties. La. Civ. Code, art. 1070. The seals are affixed at the request of the parties when a widow, a testamentary executor, or any other person who pretends to have an interest in a succession or community of property, requires it. Id. art. 1071. They are affixed ex officio when the presumptive heirs of the deceased do not all reside in the place where he died, or if any of them happen to be absent. Id. art. 1072.

The object of placing the seals on the effects of a succession is for the purpose of preserving them, and for the interest of third persons. Id. art. 1068.

The seals must be placed on the bureaus, coffers, armories, and other things which contain the effects and papers of the deceased, and on the doors of the apartments which contain these things, so that they cannot be opened without tearing off, breaking, or altering the seals. Id. art. 1069.

The judge or justice of the peace who affixes the seals is bound to appoint a guardian, at the expense of the succession, to take care of the seals and of the effects, of which an account is taken at the end of the proces-verbal of the affixing of the seals. The guardian must be domiciliated in the place where the inventory is taken; id. art. 1079. And the judge, when he retires, must take with him the keys of all things and apartments upon which the seals have been affixed; id.

The raising of the seals is done by the judge of the place, or justice of the peace appointed by him to that effect, in the presence of the witnesses of the vicinage, in the same manner as for the affixing of the seals; id. art. 1084.

SEAMAN. A sailor; a mariner; one whose business is navigation. 2 Boulay-Paty, Dr. Com. 232; Laws of Oleron, art. 7; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 19.

The term seamen, in its most enlarged sense, includes the captain as well as other persons of the crew; in a more confined signification, it extends only to the common sailors; 3 Pardessus, n. 667. But the mate; 1 Pet. Adm. 246; the cook and steward; 2 id. 268; and engineers, clerks, carpenters, firemen, deck-hands, porters, and chamber-maids, on passenger-steamers, when necessary for the service of the ship; 1 Conkl. Adm. 107; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 582; are considered, as to their rights to sue in the admiralty, as common seamen; and persons employed on board of steamboats and lighters engaged in trade or commerce on tide-water are within the admiralty jurisdiction; while those employed in ferry-boats are not; Gilp. 203, 532. Persons who do not contribute their aid in navigating the vessel or to its preservation in the course of their occupation, as musicians, are not to be considered as seamen with a right to sue in the admiralty for their wages; Gilp. 516. See LIEN.

Seamen are employed either in merchant-vessels for private service, or in public vessels for the service of the United States.

Seamen in the merchant-vessels are required to enter into a contract in writing, commonly called shipping articles, which see. This contract being entered into, they are bound, under severe penalties, to render themselves on board the vessel according to the agreement; they are not at liberty to leave the ship without the consent of the captain or commanding officer; and for such absence, when less than forty-eight hours, they forfeit three days' wages for every day of absence; and when the absence is more than forty-eight hours at one time, they forfeit all the wages due to them, and all their goods and chattels which were on board the vessel, or in any store where they may have been lodged at the time of their desertion, to the use of the owners of the vessel; and they are liable for damages for hiring other hands. They may be imprisoned for desertion until the ship is ready to sail.

On board, a seaman is bound to do his duty to the utmost of his ability; and when his services are required for extraordinary exertions, either in consequence of the death of other seamen or on account of unforeseen perils, he is not entitled to an increase of wages, although it may have been promised to him; 2 Camp. 317. For disobedience of orders he may be imprisoned or punished with stripes; but the correction must be reasonable; 4 Mas. 508; 2 Day, 294; 1 Wash. C. C. 316; but see CORRECTION; and, for just cause, may be put ashore in a foreign country; 1 Pet. Adm. 186; 2 id. 268; 2 East, 145. By act of congress, Sept. 28, 1850, 9 Stat. at L. 515, it is provided that flogging in the navy and on board vessels of commerce be, and the same is hereby, abolished from and after the passage of this act. And this prohibits corporal punishment by stripes inflicted with a cat, and any punishment which in substance and effect amounts thereto; 1 Curt. C. C. 501.

Seamen are entitled to their wages, of which one-third is due at every port at which the vessel shall unlade and deliver her cargo before the voyage be ended; and at the end of the voyage an easy and speedy remedy is given them to recover all unpaid wages. When taken sick, a seaman is entitled to medical advice and aid at the expense of the ship, such expense being considered in the nature of additional wages and as constituting a just remuneration for his labor and services; Gilp. 435; 2 Mas. 541.

The right of seamen to wages is founded not in the shipping articles, but in the services performed; Bee, 395; and to recover such wages the seaman has a triple remedy,—against the vessel, the owner, and the master; Gilp. 592; Bee, 254.

When destitute in foreign ports, American consuls and commercial agents are required to provide for them, and for their passage to some port of the United States, in a reasonable manner, at the expense of the United States; and American vessels are bound to take such seamen on board at the request of the consul, but not exceeding two men for every hundred tons of the ship, and transport them to the United States, on such terms, not exceeding ten dollars for each person, as may be agreed on. See R. S. §§ 4554–4591; SEAMEN'S FUND.

Seamen in the public service are governed by particular laws. See NAVY; NAVAL CODE.

SEAMEN'S FUND. By the act of July 16, 1798, a provision is made for raising a fund for the relief of disabled and sick seamen: the master of every vessel arriving from a foreign port into the United States is required to pay to the collector of customs at the rate of twenty cents per month for every seaman employed on board of his vessel, which sum he may retain out of the wages of such seaman; vessels engaged in the coasting-trade, and boats, rafts, or flats navigating the Mississippi with intention to proceed to New Orleans, are also laid under similar obligations. The fund thus raised is to be employed by the president of the United States, as circumstances shall require, for the benefit and convenience of sick and disabled American seamen. Act of March 3, 1802, s. 1.

By the act of congress passed Feb. 28, 1803, c. 62, R. S. § 4584, it is provided that when a seaman is discharged in a foreign country with his own consent, or when the ship is sold there, he shall, in addition to his usual wages, be paid three months' wages into the hands of the American consul, two-thirds of which are to be paid to such seaman on his engagement on board any vessel to return home, and the remaining one-third is retained in aid of a fund for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign ports. See 11 Johns. 66; 12 id. 143; 1 Mas. 45; 4 id. 541; Edw. Adm. 239.

SEARCH. In Criminal Law. An examination of a man's house, premises, or person, for the purpose of discovering proof of his guilt in relation to some crime or misdemeanor of which he is accused. See SEARCH WARRANT.

By act of March 2, 1799, s. 68, it is enacted that every collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or other person specially appointed by either of them for that purpose, shall have full power and authority to enter any ship or vessel or any dwelling-house in the daytime, upon taking proper measures, to search for goods forfeited for non-payment of duties; R. S. § 3066.

In Practice. An examination made in the proper lien office for mortgages, liens, judgments, or other incumbrances against real estate. The certificate given by the officer as to the result of such examination is also called a search.

Conveyancers and others who cause searches to be made ought to be very careful that they should be correct with regard—to the time during which the person against whom the search has been made owned the premises; to the property searched against, which ought to be properly described; and to the form of the certificate of search.

SEARCH, RIGHT OF. In Maritime Law. The right existing in a belligerent to examine and inspect the papers of a neutral vessel at sea. On the continent of Europe this is called the right of visit. Dalloz, Dict. Prises maritimes, n. 104–111.

The right does not extend to examine the cargo, nor does it extend to a ship of war, it being strictly confined to the searching of merchant-vessels. The exercise of the right is to prevent the commerce of contraband goods. Although frequently resisted by powerful neutral nations, yet this right appears now to be fixed beyond contravention. The penalty for violently resisting this right is the confiscation of the property so withheld from visitation. Unless in extreme cases of gross abuse of his right by a belligerent, the neutral has no right to resist a search; 1 Kent, 154.

The right of search—or rather of visitation—in time of peace, especially in its connection with the efforts of the British government for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been the subject of much discussion; but it is not within the scope of this work to review such discussions. See Wheat. Right of Search; The Life of Genl. Cass, by Smith, c. 25; Webster, Works, vol. 6, 329, 335, 338; and the documents relating to this subject communicated to congress from time to time, and most of the works on international law, may be profitably examined by those who desire to trace the history and understand the merits of the questions involved in the proposed exercise of this right. See, also, Edinburgh Review, vol. 11, p. 9; Foreign Quarterly Review, vol. 35, p. 211; 3 Phillimore, International Law, Index, title Visit and Search; Morse, Citizenship, 75.

SEARCH-WARRANT. In Practice. A warrant requiring the officer to whom it is addressed to search a house, or other place, therein specified, for property therein alleged to have been stolen, and, if the same shall be found upon such search, to bring the goods so found, together with the body of the person occupying the same, who is named, before the justice or other officer granting the warrant, or some other justice of the peace, or other lawfully-authorized officer.

It should be given under the hand and seal of the justice, and dated.

The constitution of the United States, Amendments, art. 4, declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or thing to be seized." See 11 Johns. 500; 3 Cra. 447.

Lord Hale, 2 Pl. Cr. 149, recommends great caution in granting such warrants:—first, that they be not granted without oath made before a justice of a felony committed, and that the complainant has probable cause to suspect that the goods are in such a house or place, and his reasons for such suspicion, see 2 Wils. 283; 1 Dowl. & R. 97; 13 Mass. 236; 5 Ired. 45; 1 R. I. 464; second, that such warrants express that the search shall be made in daytime; third, that they ought to be directed to a constable or other proper officer, and not to a private person; fourth, that they ought to command the officer to bring the stolen goods, and the person in whose custody they are, before some justice of the peace. See 6 B. & C. 332; 5 Metc. Mass. 98. They should designate the place to be searched; 1 M. & W. 255; 2 Metc. Mass. 329; 2 J. J. Marsh. 44; 6 Blackf. 249; 1 Conn. 40. Trespass will not lie against a party who has procured a search-warrant to search for stolen goods, if the warrant be duly issued and regularly executed; 6 Wend. 382. And see 6 Me. 421; 2 Conn. 700; 11 Mass. 500; 2 Litt. 231; 6 Gill & J. 377. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 367; GENERAL WARRANT.

SEARCHER. In English Law. An officer of the customs, whose duty it is to examine and search all ships outward bound, to ascertain whether they have any prohibited or uncustomed goods on board.

SEAT IN STOCK EXCHANGE. See STOCK EXCHANGE.

SEATED LANDS. In the early land-legislation of some of the United States, seated is used, in connection with improved, to denote lands of which actual possession was taken. 5 Pet. 468.

SEAWORTHINESS. In Maritime Law. The sufficiency of the vessel in materials, construction, equipment, officers, men, and outfit, for the trade or service in which it is employed.

Under a marine policy on ship, freight, or cargo, the fitness for the service of the vessel, if there is no provision to the contrary at the outset, is an implied condition, non-compliance with which defeats the insurance; 2 Johns. 231; 1 Whart. 399; 1 Camp. 1; 5 Pick. 21; 2 Ohio, 211; 2 B. & Ald. 73; 6 Cow. 270; 3 Hill, N. Y. 250; 4 Mas. 439; 20 Wend. 287; 1 Pet. C. C. 410; 1 Wall. Jr. 273; 1 Curt. C. C. 278; 26 Penn. 192; 4 H. L. C. 253; Olc. 110; 12 Md. 348.

It is of no consequence whether the insured was aware of the condition of the ship, or not. His innocence or ignorance is no answer to the fact that the ship was not seaworthy. When the want of seaworthiness arises from justifiable ignorance of the cause of the defect, and is discovered and remedied before any injury occurs, it is not to be considered as a defect; 1 Johns. 241; 1 Pet. 183; 2 B. & Ald. 73.

The opinion of carpenters who have repaired the vessel, however they may strengthen the presumption that the ship is seaworthy, when it is favorable, is not conclusive of the fact of seaworthiness; 4 Dowl. 269. The presumption prima facie is for seaworthiness; 1 Dowl. 336. And it is presumed that a vessel continues seaworthy if she was so at the inception of the risk; 20 Pick. 389. See 1 Brev. 252. Any sort of disrepair left in the ship, by which she or the cargo may suffer, is a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness. A deficiency of force in the crew, or of skill in the master, mate, etc., is a want of seaworthiness; 1 Camp. 1; 4 Du. N. Y. 234. But if there was once a sufficient crew, their temporary absence will not be considered a breach of the warranty; 2 B. & Ald. 73; 1 Johns. Cas. 184; 1 Pet. 183. A vessel may be rendered not seaworthy by being overloaded; 2 B. & Ald. 320.

It can never be settled by positive rules of law how far this obligation of seaworthiness extends in any particular case, for the reason that improvements and changes in the means and modes of navigation frequently require new implements, or new forms of old ones; and these, though not necessary at first, become so when there is an established usage that all ships of a certain quality, or those to be sent on certain voyages or used for certain purposes, shall have them; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 134. Seaworthiness is, therefore, in general, a question of fact; 1 Pet. 170, 184; 9 Wall. 526.

SECESSION. The act of withdrawing; separation.

The attempted secession of eleven of the states, from the United States government led to the civil war of 1861–65, and gave rise to many important decisions affecting the mutual relations of the national and state governments, and the rights of citizens under contracts made before and during the war. And first, as to the Power or Right of Secession.

The union of the states was never a purely artificial relation. By the articles or confederation the union was declared to be perpetual, and the constitution was ordained to form a more perfect union. But this by no means implies the loss of individual existence on the part of the states; the constitution looks throughout to an indestructible union of indestructible states; and the more recent states are no less subject to this principle than the original ones. Considered as transactions under the constitution, the ordinance of secession adopted by any one of the seceding states, and all the acts of her legislature intended to give effect to that ordinance were absolutely null and without operation in law. The state did not cease to be a state, nor her citizens, citizens of the union. The war of secession was therefore treason. It is the practice of modern governments when attacked by formidable rebellion to concede belligerent rights: this establishes no rights except during the war. Legal rights could neither be created nor defeated by the action of the government of the Confederate States. Neither the pretended acts of secession nor the magnitude of the war could constitute a confederate state government de facto, so as to create civil rights which could outlast the war, except that acts necessary to peace and good order among citizens, such as those relating to private relations and private property, which would be valid if emanating from a lawful government, must be regarded in general as valid when proceeding from an actual, though unlawful, government; 7 Wall. 700; 1 Abb. U. S. 50; Chase's Dec. 136.

As to the validity of contracts. Where one engaged actively in the service of the rebel government purchased cotton which was afterwards seized by the military forces of the United States, sold, and the proceeds paid into the treasury, held, that his purchase of the cotton was illegal and void and gave him no title thereto; 93 U. S. 605; 21 Wall. 350. The confederate government had no corporate power to take, hold, or convey a valid title to property, real and personal, and a purchaser of cotton from said government during the rebellion acquired no title thereto; 8 Ct. of Cl. 499.

Confederate bonds. The bonds issued by the seceding states do not constitute a valid consideration for a promissory note; 15 Wall. 439; and so of the securities known as Confederate treasury notes; 1 Abb. U. S. Rep. 261; but a promise to pay in "Confederate notes" in consideration of the receipt of such notes and of drafts payable by them, is neither a nudum pactum nor an illegal contract; 16 Wall. 483.

Validity of statutes. When the military forces of the Confederate government were overthrown, it perished, and with it all its enactments. But the legislative acts of the several states forming the confederacy stand on different grounds, and so far as they did not impair or tend to impair the supremacy of the national authority or the just rights of citizens under the constitution, they are in general to be treated as valid and binding; 96 U. S. 177; 97 id. 594; 1 Chase's Dec. 167; 7 Wall. 733; 22 id. 99.

Payments made under the Confederate sequestration acts were void and gave no title; see 96 U. S. 193.

Decisions of the Confederate courts. Judgments of such courts merely settling the rights of private parties actually within their jurisdiction, not tending to defeat the just rights of citizens of the United States, nor in furtherance of laws passed in aid of the rebellion, are valid; 1 Woods, 437; 97 U. S. 509; and a judgment of a court of Georgia in November, 1861, for the purchase-money of slaves, was held a valid judgment when entered, and may be enforced now (1871); 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 641. But during the war, the courts of states in rebellion had no jurisdiction of parties residing in states which adhered to the national government; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 53. See further, 15 Wall. 610; 12 Op. Att. Gen. 141, 182; 13 id. 149; 45 Ga. 370; 20 Gratt. 31; 13 Wall. 646; Hurd's Theory of Nat. Govt.; RECONSTRUCTION; CONFEDERATE STATES.

SECK. A want of remedy by distress. Littleton, s. 218. See RENT. Want of present fruit or profit, as in the case of the reversion without rent or other service, except fealty. Co. Litt. 151 b, n. 5.

SECOND DELIVERANCE. The name of a writ given by statute of Westminster 2d, 13 Edw. I. c. 2, founded on the record of a former action of replevin. Co. 2d Inst. 341. It commands the sheriff, if the plaintiff make him secure of prosecuting his claim and returning the chattels which were adjudged to the defendant by reason of the plaintiff's default, to make deliverance. On being nonsuited, the plaintiff in replevin might, at common law, have brought another replevin, and so ad infinitum, to the intolerable vexation of the defendant. The statute of Westminster restrains the plaintiff when nonsuited from so doing, but allows him this writ, issuing out of the original record, in order to have the same distress delivered again to him, on his giving the like security as before; 3 Bla. Com. 150.

SECOND DISTRESS. See DISTRESS.

SECOND SURCHARGE, WRIT OF. The name of a writ issued in England against a commoner who has a second time surcharged the common. 3 Bla. Com. 239.

SECONDARY. An officer who is second or next to the chief officer; as, secondaries to the prothonotaries of the courts of king's bench or common pleas; secondary of the remembrancer in the exchequer, etc. Jacob, Law Dict.

SECONDARY CONVEYANCES, or derivative conveyances, are those which presuppose some other conveyance precedent, and only serve to enlarge, confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by such original conveyance. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 234*.

SECONDARY EVIDENCE. See EVIDENCE.

SECOND-HAND EVIDENCE. This term is sometimes applied to hearsay evidence, and should not be confounded with secondary evidence; see POW. EV.

SECONDS. In Criminal Law. Those persons who assist, direct, and support others engaged in fighting a duel.

Where the principal in deliberate duelling would be guilty of murder, the second is considered equally guilty. It has been contended that the second of him who is killed is equally guilty with the second of the successful principal; but this is denied by Judge Hale, who considers such a one guilty only of great misdemeanor; 1 Barb. Pl. Cr. 242; 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 311.

SECRETARY. An officer who, by order of his superior, writes letters and other instruments. He is so called because he is possessed of the secrets of his employer. This term was used in France in 1343, and in England the term secretary was first applied to the clerks of the king, who being always near his person were called clerks of the secret, and in the reign of Henry VIII. the term secretary of state came into use.

In the United States the term is used to denote the head of a department: as, secretary of state, etc. See DEPARTMENT.

SECRETARY OF EMBASSY. An officer appointed by the sovereign power to accompany a minister of the first or second rank, and sometimes, though not often, of an inferior rank.

He is, in fact, a species of public minister; for, independently of his protection as attached to an ambassador's suite, he enjoys in his own right the same protection of the law of nations, and the same immunities, as an ambassador. But private secretaries of a minister must not be confounded with secretaries of embassy or of legation. Such private secretaries are entitled to protection only as belonging to the suite of the ambassador.

SECRETARY OF LEGATION. An officer employed to attend a foreign mission and to perform certain duties as clerk.

He is considered a diplomatic officer; R. S. § 1674.

The salary of a secretary of embassy, or the secretary of a minister plenipotentiary, is the same as that of a secretary of legation.

SECTA (Lat. sequor, to follow). The persons, two or more in number, whom the plaintiff produced in court, in the ancient form of proceedings, immediately upon making his declaration, to confirm the allegations therein, before they were called in question by the defendant's plea. Bracton, 214 a. The word appears to have been used as denoting that these persons followed the plaintiff into court; that is, came in a matter in which the plaintiff was the leader or one principally concerned. The actual production of suit was discontinued very early; 3 Bla. Com. 295; but the formula "et inde producit sectam" (for which in more modern pleadings "and thereupon he brings suit" is substituted) continued till the abolition of the Latin form of pleadings. Steph. Pl. 429. The count in dower and writs of right did not so conclude, however; 1 Chitty, Pl. 399. A suit or action. Hob. 20; Bracton, 399 b. A suit of clothes. Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

Ad Furnum. Suit due a public bake-house.

Ad Molendrinum. A service arising from the usage, time out of mind, of carrying corn to a particular mill to be ground. 3 Bla. Com. 235. A writ adapted to the injury lay at the old law. Fitzh. N. B. 123.

Ad Torrale. Suit due a man's kiln or malt-house. 3 Bla. Com. 235.

Curiæ. Suit at court. The service due from tenants to the lord of attending his courts-baron, both to answer complaints alleged against themselves, and for the trial of their fellow-tenants. 2 Bla. Com. 54.

SECTATORES. A man's followers. Suitors of court among the Saxons. 1 Reeve's Hist. Eng. L. 22.

SECTION OF LAND. A parcel of government land containing six hundred and forty acres. The lands of the United States are surveyed into parcels of six hundred and forty acres; each such parcel is called a section.

These sections are divided into half-sections, each of which contains three hundred and twenty acres, and into quarter-sections of one hundred and sixty acres each. See 2 Washb. R. P.

SECTORES (Lat.). In Roman Law. Bidders at an auction. Babington, Auct. 2.

SECURITY. That which renders a matter sure; an instrument which renders certain the performance of a contract. A person who becomes the surety for another, or who engages himself for the performance of another's contract. See 3 Blackf. 431.

SECURITY FOR COSTS. In Practice. In some courts there is a rule that when the plaintiff resides abroad he shall give security for costs, and until that has been done, when demanded, he cannot proceed in his action.

This is a right which the defendant must claim in proper time; for if he once waives it he cannot afterwards claim it: the waiver is seldom or perhaps never expressly made, but is generally implied from the acts of the defendant. When the defendant had undertaken to accept short notice of trial; 2 H. Blackst. 573; or after issue joined, and when he knew of plaintiff's residence abroad, or, with such knowledge, when the defendant takes any step in the cause, these several acts will amount to a waiver; 5 B. & Ald. 702. It is never too late, however, if the motion do not delay the trial; 1 Yeates, 176. See 1 Johns. Ch. 202; 1 Ves. 396; 1 Tr. & H. Pr. 530.

The fact that the defendant is out of the jurisdiction of the court will not alone authorize the requisition of security for costs: he must have his domicil abroad; 1 Ves. 396. When the defendant resides abroad, he will be required to give such security although he is a foreign prince. See 11 S. & R. 121; 1 Miles, Penn. 321; 2 id. 402. A general affidavit of defence is sufficient on moving for security for costs; the particulars of the defence need not be specified; 1 W. N. Cas. (Pa.), 134.

SECUS (Lat.). Otherwise.

SEDERUNT, ACTS OF. Ancient ordinances, of the court of session in Scotland, by which authority is given to the court to make regulations equivalent to the Regulæ Generales, of the English courts. Various modern acts give the court such power; Whart. Dict.

SEDITION. In Criminal Law. The raising commotions or disturbances in the state; it is a revolt against legitimate authority. Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. 14.

The distinction between sedition and treason consists in this: that though the ultimate object of sedition is a violation of the public peace, or at least such a course of measures as evidently engenders it, yet it does not aim at direct and open violence against the laws or the subversion of the constitution. Alison, Crim. Law of Scotl. 580.

The obnoxious and obsolete act of July 14, 1798, 1 Story, Laws, 543, was called the sedition law, because its professed object was to prevent disturbances.

SEDUCING TO LEAVE SERVICE. In England a master may bring an action on the case for enticing away his servant or apprentice, knowing him to be such; 6 Mod. 182; Bac. Abr. tit. Master and Servant O. 3; 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 429, n.

The subject seems to have received little or no attention in this country. A person making a contract with the servant of another, to take effect at the expiration of his present term of service, is liable to no action therefor; 4 Pick. 425.

SEDUCTION (Lat. seductio, from se, away, duco, to lead).

The act of a man in inducing a woman to commit unlawful sexual intercourse with him.

At common law the woman herself has no action for damages, though practically the end is reached by a suit for breach of promise of marriage, in many cases, but in some states the rule has been altered by statute. The parent, as being entitled to the services of his daughter, may maintain an action in many cases grounded upon that right, but only in such cases; 6 M. & W. 55; 7 Ired. 408; 4 N. Y. 38; 14 Ala. N. S. 235; 11 Ga. 603; 13 Gratt. 726; 3 Sneed, 29; 6 Ind. 262; 10 Mo. 634. In England the parent's right of action terminates when the child leaves the parent's house without the intention of returning; 5 East, 45; but in America the right of action depends on the will of the parent, not the child; if he has not divested himself of a right to require his child's services, he may recover, even though at the time of the injury she was in another's service with his permission; 9 Johns. 387; s. c. Big. L. C. Torts. 286; otherwise if his power of the child was gone at the time of the seduction. If the control was divested by fraud, the parent has still a right of action; 2 Stark. 493. Specific acts of service are not necessary to a right of action: the right to the service is enough; Big. Torts. 146. The right of action continues after the majority of the child, if the relation of master and servant continues; 3 Vroom, 58. It is not necessary that pregnancy should ensue; Big. Torts. 147; contra, 1 Exch. 61; where the proper consequence of the defendant's act was a loss of the child's health, resulting in an incapacity for service, an action lies; 104 Mass. 222; especially where sexual disease is communicated to the child; Big. Torts. 147. The daughter's consent does not affect the parent's right to recover; 5 Lans. 454. If the mother, after the father's death, is the child's guardian, she has a right of action; Big. Torts. 149; apart from the mother's guardianship, she has a right of action so long as the daughter continues to give her services to her mother. See 51 N. Y. 424. Where the daughter in her illness returns to her mother and is taken care of by her, the mother may sue for the seduction; 5 Cow. 106; contra, 2 Watts, 474; 14 Ala. 235. See, generally, as to the mother's right of action; Big. L. C. Torts. 302. Any one standing in loco parentis, and entitled to, or receiving, in his own right, the services of a minor, is entitled to maintain the action; Big. Torts. 152; 2 C. & P. 308. If the parent consented to the seduction, or rendered it easy by his misconduct or neglect, he cannot recover; Peake, 240; Big. Torts. 151.

While the loss of services is the gist of the action, yet, when that has once been established, the jury may give damages commensurate with the real injury inflicted on the plaintiff. See Big. L. C. Torts. 294. By statute, seduction has been made a criminal offence in some states.

SEEDS. The substance which nature prepares for the reproduction of plants or animals.

Seeds which have been sown in the earth immediately become a part of the land in which they have been sown: quæ sata solo cedere intelliguntur. Inst. 2. 1. 32.

SEIGNIOR, SEIGNEUR. Among the feudists, this name signified lord of the fee. Fitzh. N. B. 23. The most extended signification of this word includes not only a lord or peer of parliament, but is applied to the owner or proprietor of a thing: hence the owner of a hawk, and the master of a fishing vessel, is called a seigneur. 37 Edw. III. c. 19; Barrington, Stat. 258.

SEIGNIORY. In English Law. The rights of a lord, as such, in lands. Swinb. Wills, 174.

SEISIN. The completion of the feudal investiture, by which the tenant was admitted into the feud and performed the rights of homage and fealty. Stearns, Real Act, 2.

Possession with an intent on the part of him who holds it to claim a freehold interest. 8 N. H. 58; 1 Washb. R. P. 85.

Immediately upon the investiture or livery of seisin the tenant became tenant of the freehold; and the term seisin originally contained the idea of possession derived from a superior lord of whom the tenant held. There could be but one seisin, and the person holding it was regarded for the time as the rightful owner; Littleton, § 701; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 136. In the early history of the country, livery of seisin seems to have been occasionally practised. See 1 Washb. R. P. 84, n; Colony Laws (Mass.), 85, 86; Smith, Landl. & T. 6, n.

In Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, seisin means merely ownership, and the distinction between seisin in deed and in law is not known in practice; 4 Day, 305; 14 Pick. 224. A patent by the commonwealth, in Kentucky, gives a right of entry, but not actual seisin; 3 Bibb, 57.

Seisin in fact is possession with intent on the part of him who holds it to claim a freehold interest.

Seisin in law is a right of immediate possession according to the nature of the estate. Cowel; Comyns, Dig. Seisin (A 1, 2).

If one enters upon an estate having title, the law presumes an intent in accordance, and requires no further proof of the intent; 12 Metc. 357; 4 Wheat. 213; 8 Cra. 229; but if one enters without title, an intent to gain seisin must be shown; 5 Pet. 402; 9 id. 52. Seisin once established is presumed to continue till the contrary is shown; 5 Metc. Mass. 173. Seisin will not be lost by entry of a stranger if the owner remains in possession; 1 Salk. 246; 9 Metc. 418. Entry by permission of the owner will never give seisin without open and unequivocal acts of disseisin known to the owner; 10 Gratt. 305; 9 Metc. 418. Simple entry by one having the freehold title is sufficient to regain seisin; 4 Mass. 416; 25 Vt. 316; 10 Pet. 412; 8 Cra. 247. The heir is invested with the seisin by law upon descent of the title; 24 Pick. 78. As a general proposition, by the law in this country, the making, delivery, and recording of a deed of lands passes the seisin without any formal entry being necessary. This is generally by force of the statutes of the several states,—in some such a deed being in terms declared to be equivalent to livery of seisin, and in others dispensing with any further act to pass a full and complete title; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 45, n., 47, n.; Smith, Landl. & T. 6, n.; 3 Dall. 489.

The seisin could never be in abeyance; 1 Prest. Est. 255; and this necessity gave rise to much of the difficult law in regard to estates enjoyable in the future. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 156.

SEIZING OF HERIOTS. Taking the best beast, etc., where an heriot is due, on the death of the tenant. 2 Bla. Com. 422; Whart. Dict.

SEIZURE. In Practice. The act of taking possession of the property of a person condemned by the judgment of a competent tribunal to pay a certain sum of money, by a sheriff, constable, or other officer lawfully authorized thereto, by virtue of an execution, for the purpose of having such property sold according to law to satisfy the judgment. The taking possession of goods for a violation of a public law: as, the taking possession of a ship for attempting an illicit trade. 2 Cra. 187; 4 Wheat. 100; 1 Gall. 75; 2 Wash. C. C. 127, 567; 6 Cow. 404.

The seizure is complete as soon as the goods are within the power of the officer; 16 Johns. 287; 2 N. & M'C. 392; 2 Rawle, 142; 3 id. 401; Wats. Sher. 172.

The taking of part of the goods in a house, however, by virtue of a fieri facias in the name of the whole, is a good seizure of all; 8 East, 474. As the seizure must be made by virtue of an execution, it is evident that it cannot be made after the return-day; 2 Caines, 243; 4 Johns. 450. See DOOR; HOUSE; SEARCH-WARRANT.

SELECTI JUDICES (Lat.). In Roman Law. Judges who were selected very much like our juries. They were returned by the prætor, drawn by lot, subject to be challenged and sworn. 3 Bla. Com. 366.

SELECTMEN. The name of certain town officers in several states of the United States, who are invested by the statutes of the states with extensive powers for the conduct of the town business.

SELF-DEFENCE. In Criminal Law. The protection of one's person and property from injury.

A man may defend himself, and even commit a homicide for the prevention of any forcible and atrocious crime which if completed would amount to a felony; 17 Ala. N. S. 587; 5 Ga. 85; 1 Jones, No. C. 190; 30 Miss. 619; 14 B. Monr. 103, 614; 3 Wash. C. C. 515; and, of course, under the like circumstances, mayhem, wounding, and battery would be excusable at common law; 4 Bla. Com. 180. A man may repel force by force even to the taking of life; 45 Vt. 308; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 212, n.; in defence of his person, property, or habitation, or of a member of his family, against any one who manifests, intends, attempts, or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a forcible felony, such as murder, rape, robbery, arson, burglary, and the like; 38 Penn. 265; 8 Bush, 481; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 484. In these cases he is not required to retreat; 12 Reporter, 268; 57 Ind. 80; 64 id. 340; but he may resist, and even pursue his adversary, until he has secured himself from all danger; 7 J. J. Marsh. 478; 4 Bingh. 628; but see 7 N. Y. 396. A man may defend his dwelling to any extremity; and this includes whatever is within the curtilage of his dwelling house; 8 Mich. 150. In deciding what force is necessary, a person need only act upon the circumstances as they appear to him at the time; see 24 Tex. 454; 23 Ill. 17. The doctrine of constructive self-defence comprehends the principle, civil and domestic relations; therefore master and servant, parent and child, husband and wife, killing an assailant in the necessary defence of each, respectively, are excused, the act of the relation being construed the same as the act of the party himself; 4 Bla. Com. 186; strangely enough, there seems to be no authority for placing a brother or sister in this category, though they doubtless occupy as good a position as a stranger; 25 Alb. L. J. 187; see 2 Bish. Cr. L. 877.

A man may defend himself when no felony has been threatened or attempted. First, when the assailant attempts to beat another and there is no mutual combat: as where one meets another and attempts to commit or does commit an assault and battery on him, the person attacked may defend himself; 4 Denio, 448; 24 Vt. 218; 3 Harr. Del. 22; 3 Brev. 515; 5 Gray, 475; 3 C. & P. 31; 9 id. 474; see 10 Ired. 214; and in case of an offer or attempt to strike another, when sufficiently near, so that there is danger, the person assailed may strike first, and is not required to wait until he has been struck; Bull. N. P. 18. Second, when there is a mutual combat upon a sudden quarrel. In these cases both parties are the aggressors; and if in the fight one is killed, it will be manslaughter at least, unless the survivor can prove two things, viz., that before the mortal stroke was given he had refused any further combat, and had retreated as far as he could with safety; 8 N. Y. 396; 4 D. & B. 491; 15 Ga. 117; 1 Ohio St. 66; 1 Hawks, 78, 210; Selfridge's case; and that he killed his adversary from necessity, to avoid his own destruction; 32 Me. 279; 2 Halst. 220; 11 Humphr. 200; 2 N. Y. 193; Coxe, N. J. 424; 25 Ala. N. S. 15.

A man may defend himself against animals, and he may during the attack kill them, but not afterwards; 1 C. & P. 106; 10 Johns. 365; 13 id. 12. See Horr. & T. Cas. on Self Defence, where all the cases are collected.

SELL. See SALE.

SELLER. One who disposes of a thing in consideration of money; a vendor.

This term is more usually applied in the sale of chattels, that of vendor in the sale of estates. See SALE.

SELLING PUBLIC OFFICES. Buying or selling any office in the gift of the crown, or making any negotiation relating thereto was deemed guilty of a misdemeanor under stats. 5 and 6 Edw. VI. c. 16, and 49 Geo. III. c. 126. Steph. Com. 7th ed. II. 621.

SEMBLE. (Fr. it seems.) A term frequently used before the statement of a point of law which has not been directly settled, but about which the court have expressed an opinion and intimated what a decision would be.

SEMESTRIA. The collected decisions of the emperors in their councils. Civ. Law; Whart. Dict.

SEMINARY. A place of education. Any school, academy, college, or university in which young persons are instructed in the several branches of learning which may qualify them for their future employments. Webster, Dict.

The word is said to have acquired no fixed and definite legal meaning. 12 N. Y. 229.

SEMINAUFRAGIUM (Lat.). A term used by Italian lawyers, which literally signifies half-shipwreck, and by which they understand the jetsam, or casting merchandise into the sea to prevent shipwreck. Locré, Esp. du Code de Com. art. 409. The state of a vessel which has been so much injured by tempest or accident that to repair the damages, after being brought into port, and prepare her for sea, would cost more than her worth. 4 Bost. L. Rep. 120.

SEMI-PROOF. In Civil Law. Presumption of fact. This degree of proof is thus defined: "Non est ignorandum, probationem semiplenam eam esse, per quam rei gestæ fides aliqua fit judici; non tamen tanta ut jure debeat in pronuncianda sententia eam sequi." Mascardus, de Prob. vol. 1, Quæst. 11, n. 1, 4.

SEMPER PARATUS (Lat. always ready). The name of a plea by which the defendant alleges that he has always been ready to perform what is demanded of him. 3 Bla. Com. 303. The same as Tout temps prist.

SEN. This is said to be an ancient word which signified justice. Co. Litt. 61 a.

SENATE. The name of the less numerous of the two bodies constituting the legislative branch of the government of the United States, and of the several states. See the articles upon the various states.

The Senate of the United States is composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years; and each senator has one vote. The equal suffrage of the states in the senate is secured to them beyond the ordinary power of amendment; no state can be deprived thereof without its consent. Art. 5. The senate has been, from the first formation of the government, divided into three classes. The rotation of the classes was originally determined by lot, and the seats of one class are vacated at the end of the second year, so that one-third of the senate is chosen every second year. U. S. Const. art. 1, s. 3. This provision was borrowed from a similar one in some of the state constitutions, of which Virginia gave the first example.

The qualifications which the constitution requires of a senator are that he should be thirty years of age, have been nine years a citizen of the United States, and, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen. U. S. Const. art. 1, s. 3. See Congress.

SENATOR. A member of a senate.

SENATUS CONSULTA. (Ordinances of the senate). Public acts among the Romans, affecting the whole community; Sand. Just. 5th ed. xxiv. 9.

SENATUS CONSULTUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. A decree or decision of the Roman senate, which had the force of law.

When the Roman people had so increased that there was no place where they could meet, it was found necessary to consult the senate, instead of the people, both on public affairs and those which related to individuals. The opinion which was rendered on such an occasion was called senatus consultum. Inst. 1. 2. 5; Clef. des Lois Rom.; Merlin Répert. These decrees frequently derived their titles from the names of the consuls or magistrates who proposed them: as senatusconsultum Claudianum, Libonianum, Velleianum, etc., from Claudius, Libonius, Velleius. Ayliffe, Pand. 30.

SENATUS DECRETA. (Decisions of the senate.) Private acts concerning particular persons merely; Civ. law.

SENESCHALLUS (Lat.). A steward. Co. Litt. 61 a.

SENILITY. The state of being old.

Sometimes it is exceedingly difficult to know whether the individual in this state is or is not so deprived of the powers of his mind as to be unable to manage his affairs. In general, senility is merely a loss of energy in some of the intellectual operations, while the affections remain natural and unperverted: such a state may, however, be followed by actual dementia or idiocy.

When on account of senility the party is unable to manage his affairs, a committee will be appointed as in case of lunacy; 1 Collier, Lun. 66; 2 Johns. Ch. 232; 5 id. 158; 4 Call, 423; 12 Ves. Jr. 446; 8 Mass. 129; 19 Ves. Jr. 285.

SENIOR. The elder. This addition is sometimes made to a man's name, when two persons bear the same, in order to distinguish them. In practice when nothing is mentioned, the senior is intended; 3 Miss. 59.

SENTENCE. A judgment, or judicial declaration made by a judge in a cause. The term judgment is more usually applied to civil, and sentence to criminal, proceedings.

Sentences are final, when they put an end to the case; or interlocutory, when they settle only some incidental matter which has arisen in the course of its progress. See Aso & Man. Inst. b. 3, t. 8, c. 1.

A sentence exceeding the term allowed by law will be reversed upon certiorari; 3 Brews. 30. Under some circumstances a sentence may be suspended after conviction; 43 N. J. 113; 115 Mass. 133. But a single sentence exhausts the power of the court to punish the offender, after the term is ended or the judgment has gone into operation; 18 Wall. 163; 122 Mass. 317; 57 Penn. 291. See ACCUMULATIVE JUDGMENT.

SENTENCE OF DEATH RECORDED. A custom in the English courts, now disused, of entering sentence of death on the record which is not intended to be pronounced. The effect was the same as if it had been pronounced and the offender reprieved.

SEPARALITER (Lat. separately). A word sometimes used in indictments to show that the defendants are charged separately with offences which without the addition of this word would seem, from the form of the indictment, to be charged jointly: as, for example, when two persons are indicted together for perjury, and the indictment states that A and B came before a commissioner, etc., this is alleging that they were both guilty of the same crime, when by law their crimes are distinct, and the indictment is vicious; but if the word separaliter is used, then the affirmation is that each was guilty of a separate offence. 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 174.

SEPARATE ACTION. An action is so called which each of several persons must bring when they are denied the privilege of joining in one suit.

SEPARATE ESTATE. That which belongs to one only of several persons: as, the separate estate of a partner, which does not belong to the partnership. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1519.

The separate estate of a married woman is that which belongs to her and over which her husband has no right in equity. It may consist of lands or chattels. 4 Barb. 407; 1 Const. 452.

In England a married woman's capacity to dispose of property of whatever kind settled to her separate use, by deed or will, is absolute, unless she be expresely restrained by the settlement; and generally speaking, it is bound by her contracts, written or verbal. But this was not always so held; 3 Johns. Ch. 77; 17 id. 548. Most of the states adopt in the main the English doctrine as to the power to charge the separate estate, but Pennsylvania, South Carolina, North Carolina, Mississippi, Rhode Island, and Tennessee hold what has been called the American doctrine, that a married woman, as to her separate estate, is a feme sole only in so far as the instrument has expressly conferred upon her the power to act as such; that she is confined to the particular mode of disposition prescribed in the instrument, if any, and the estate is not liable for her contracts, bonds or notes, unless the instrument expressly declares that it shall be charged; 1 Rawle, 231; 65 Penn. 480; 2 R. I. 355; 7 Ired. Eq. 311; Kelly, Con. of Marr. Women, p. 259. See Address on Separate Use in Pennsylvania, by E. C. Mitchell, Phila., 1875. The tendency of legislation throughout the country has been to enlarge the wife's powers over her separate estate, and in some states, as New York and Pennsylvania, it has been provided that the wife's property held before or obtained during marriage, shall be her sole and separate property, thus abolishing the common law marital rights of the husband, to the same extent that they were avoided by a trust, in equity, to her sole and separate use. In those states which have adopted the American rule, a married woman having a separate estate under the statute, cannot make any contract, except so far as the statute expresely or by necessary implication enables her to do it. In those states which follow the English doctrine, the rule is, that a married woman having a separate estate conferred on her by statute, may make contracts with respect thereto, which will bind the estate, but not her person. Kelly, Con. of Marr. Women, 261, 270; Schouler, Hus. & W. ch. III. See FEME SOLE TRADER.

SEPARATE MAINTENANCE. An allowance made by a husband to his wife for her separate support and maintenance. In general, if a wife is abandoned by her husband, without fault on her part, and left without adequate means of support, a bill in equity will lie to compel the husband to support her, without asking for or procuring a decree of divorce; Schouler, Hus. and W. § 485; 50 Miss. 694; 30 N. J. Eq. 359.

When this allowance is regularly paid, and notice of it has been given, no person who has received such notice will be entitled to recover against the husband for necessaries furnished to the wife, because the liability of the husband depends on a presumption of authority delegated by him to the wife, which is negatived by the facts of the case; 2 Stark. Ev. 699.

SEPARATE TRIAL. See JOINDER.

SEPARATION. A cessation of cohabitation of husband and wife by mutual agreement.

Contracts of this kind are generally made by the husband for himself and by the wife with trustees; 3 Paige, Ch. 483; 4 id. 516; 5 Bligh, N. S. 339; 1 Dow. & C. H. L. 519. This contract does not affect the marriage, and the parties may at any time agree to live together as husband and wife. The husband who has agreed to a total separation cannot bring an action for criminal conversation with the wife; 4 Viner, Abr. 173; 2 Stark. Ev. 698; Shelf. Marr. & D. 608. Articles of separation are no bar to proceedings for divorce for subsequent cause; 4 Paige, 516; 33 Md. 401. Under recent legislation, separation deeds are legalized in England; L. R. 11 Ch. D. 508; Schouler, Hus. & W. § 476, 479.

Reconciliation after separation supersedes special articles of separation, in courts of law and equity; 1 Dowl. P. C. 245; 2 Cox. 105; 3 Bro. C. C. 619, n.; 11 Ves. 532; 9 Cal. 479. Public policy forbids that parties should be permitted to make agreements for themselves to hold good whenever they choose to live separate; 5 Bligh N. S. 367. And see 1 C. & P. 36; 11 Ves. 526; 2 S. & S. 372; 1 Y. & C. 28; 3 Johns. Ch. 521; 1 Des. Eq. 45, 198; 8 N. H. 350.

SEPARATION A MENSA ET THORO. A partial dissolution of the marriage relation.

By the ecclesiastical or canon law of England, which had exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce, marriage was regarded as a sacrament and indissoluble. This doctrine originated with the church of Rome, and became established in England while that country was Catholic; and though after the reformation it ceased to be the doctrine of the church of England, yet the law remained unchanged until the recent statute of 20 & 21 Vict. (1857) c. 85, and amendments; Bish. Marr. & D. §§ 65 n., 225. Hence, as has been seen in the article on Divorce, a valid marriage could not be dissolved in England except by what has been termed the omnipotent power of parliament.

This gave rise, in the ecclesiastical courts, to the practice of granting divorces from bed and board, as they used to be called, or judicial separation, as they are called in the recent statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, § 7; Bish. Marr. & D. §§ 65 n., 225. From England this practice was introduced into this country; and though in some of the states it has entirely given way to the divorce a vinculo matrimonii, in others it is still in use, being generally granted for causes which are not sufficient to authorize the latter.

The only causes for which such a divorce is granted in England are adultery and cruelty. In this country it is generally granted also for wilful desertion, and in some states for other causes.

The legal consequences of a separation from bed and board are much less extensive than those of a divorce a vinculo matrimonii or a sentence of nullity. Such a separation works no change in the relation of the parties either to each other or to third persons, except in authorizing them to live apart until they mutually come together. In coming together, no new marriage is required, neither, it seems, under the general law, are any new proceedings in court necessary; but the reconciliation, of its own force, annuls the sentence of separation; 5 Pick. 461; 4 Johns. Ch. 187; 2 Dall. 128; Cro. Eliz. 908.

Nor does such a separation, at common law and without statutory aid, change the relation of the parties as to property. Thus, it neither takes away the right of the wife to dower, nor the right of the husband to the wife's real estate, either during her life or after her death, as tenant by the curtesy; neither does it affect the husband's right in a court of law to reduce into possession the choses in action of the wife; though in equity it may be otherwise; 2 Pick. 316; 5 id. 61; 6 W. & S. 85; Cro. Eliz. 908; 4 Barb. 295.

It should be observed, however, that in this country the consequences of a judicial separation are frequently modified by statute. See Bishop, Marr. & D. §§ 660–695.

Of those consequences which depend upon the order and decree of the court, the most important is that of alimony. See ALIMONY. In respect to the custody of children, the rules are the same as in case of divorces a vinculo matrimonii; Bish. Marr. & D. c. 25. See DIVORCE.

SEPTENNIAL ELECTIONS. The English parliament dies a natural death at the end of every seventh year if not previously dissolved by the royal prerogative. 1 Geo. I. st. 2; Whart. Dict.

SEPULCHRE. The place where a corpse is buried. The violation of sepulchres is a misdemeanor at common law.

SEQUESTER. In Civil and Ecclesiastical Law. To renounce. Example: when a widow comes into court and disclaims having anything to do or to intermeddle with her deceased husband's estate, she is said to sequester. Jacob, Law Dict.

SEQUESTRATION. In Chancery Practice. A writ of commission, sometimes directed to the sheriff, but usually to four or more commissioners of the complainant's own nomination, authorizing them to enter upon the real or personal estate of the defendant, and to take the rents, issues, and profits into their own hands, and keep possession of or pay the same, as the court shall order or direct, until the party who is in contempt shall do that which he is enjoined to do and which is especially mentioned in the writ. Newl. Ch. Pr. 18; Blake, Ch. Pr. 103.

Upon the return of non est inventus to a commission of rebellion, a sergeant-at-arms may be moved for; and if he certifies that the defendant cannot be taken, a motion may be made upon his certificate for an order for a sequestration; 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 203; Blake, Ch. Pr. 103. It is the process formerly used instead of an attachment to secure the appearance of persons having the privilege of peerage or parliament, before a court of equity; Adams, Eq. 326.

Under a sequestration upon mesne process, as in respect of a contempt for want of appearance or answer, the sequestrators may take possession of the party's personal property and keep him out of possession, but no sale can take place, unless perhaps to pay expenses; for this process is only to form the foundation of taking the bill pro confesso. After a decree it may be sold. See 3 Bro. C. C. 72, 372; 2 Cox Ch. 224; 1 Ves. 86.

See, generally, as to this species of sequestration, 19 Viner, Abr. 325; Bacon, Abr. Sequestration; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (D 7, Y 4); 1 Hov. Suppl. to Ves. 25; 7 Vern. Raithby ed. 58, n. 1, 421, n. 1.

In Contracts. A species of deposit which two or more persons, engaged in litigation about anything, make of the thing in contest with an indifferent person, who binds himself to restore it, when the issue is decided, to the party to whom it is adjudged to belong. La. Code, art. 2942; Story, Bailm. § 45. See 19 Viner, Abr. 325; 1 Vern. 58, 420; 2 Ves. 23.

In Louisiana. A mandate of the court, ordering the sheriff, in certain cases, to take in his possession, and to keep, a thing of which another person has the possession, until after the decision of a suit, in order that it be delivered to him who shall be adjudged entitled to have the property or possession of that thing. This is what is properly called a judicial sequestration. See 1 Mart. La. 79; 1 La. 439; La. Civ. Code, 2941, 2948.

In this acceptation, the word sequestration does not mean a judicial deposit, because sequestration may exist together with the right of administration, while mere deposit does not admit it.

All species of property, real or personal, as well as the revenue proceeding from the same obligations and titles, when their ownership is in dispute, may be sequestered.

Judicial sequestration is generally ordered only at the request of one of the parties to a suit: as, where there is reason to believe that the defendant may destroy or injure the property in dispute during the delay of adjudication. There are cases, nevertheless, where it is decree by the court without such request, —as, where the title appears equally balanced, to continue till the question is decided, —or is the consequence of the execution of judgments.

Security is required from the petitioner asking a sequestration to reimburse the defendant his damages in case of disputed title.

When the sheriff has sequestered property pursuant to an order of the court, he must, after serving the petition and the copy of the order of sequestration on the defendant, send his return in writing to the clerk of the court which gave the order, stating in the same in what manner the order was executed, and annex to such return a true and minute inventory of the property sequestered, drawn by him in the presence of two witnesses.

The sheriff, while he retains possession of a sequestered property, is bound to take proper care of the same, and to administer the same, if it be of such nature as to admit of it, as a prudent father of a family administers his own affairs. He may confide them to the care of guardians or overseers, for whose acts he remains responsible, and he will be entitled to receive a just compensation for his administration, to be determined by the court, to be paid to him out of the proceeds of the property sequestered, if judgment be given in favor of the plaintiff; La. Civ. Code, arts. 274–283.

SEQUESTRATOR. One to whom a sequestration is made.

A depositary of this kind cannot exonerate himself from the care of the thing sequestered in his hands, unless for some cause rendering it indispensable that he should resign his trust. La. Civ. Code, art. 2947. See STAKEHOLDER.

Officers appointed by a court of chancery and named in a writ of sequestration. As to their powers and duties, see 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 205; Blake, Ch. Pr. 103.

SERF. In Feudal Law. A term applied to a class of persons who were bound to perform very onerous duties towards others. Pothier, Des Personnes, pt. 1, t. 1, a. 6, s. 4.

There is this essential difference between a serf and a slave: the serf was bound simply to labor on the soil where he was born, without any right to go elsewhere without the consent of his lord; but he was free to act as he pleased in his daily action: the slave, on the contrary, is the property of his master, who may require him to act as he pleases in every respect, and who may sell him as a chattel. Lepage, Science du Droit, c. 3, art. 2, § 2.

SERGEANT. In Military Law. An inferior officer of a company of foot or troop of dragoons, appointed to see discipline observed, to teach the soldiers the exercise of their arms, and to order, straighten, and form ranks, files, etc.

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. An officer appointed by a legislative body, whose duties are to enforce the orders given by such bodies, generally under the warrant of its presiding officer.

SERIATIM (Lat.). In a series; severally: as, the judges delivered their opinions seriatim.

SERJEANTS-AT-LAW. A very ancient and the most honorable order of advocates at the common law.

They were called, formerly, countors, or serjeant-countors, or countors of the bench (in the old law-Latin phrase, banci narratores), and are mentioned by Matthew Paris in the life of John II., written in 1255. They are limited to fifteen in number, in addition to the judges of the courts of Westminster, who are always admitted before being advanced to the bench.

The most valuable privilege formerly enjoyed by the serjeants was the monopoly of the practice in the court of common pleas. A bill was introduced into parliament for the purpose of destroying this monopoly, in 1755, which did not pass. In 1834, a warrant under the sign manual was directed to the judges of the common pleas, commanding them to open that court to the bar at large. The order was received and complied with. In 1839, the matter was brought before the court and decided to be illegal; 10 Bingh. 571; 6 Bingh. N. C. 187, 232. The statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 54 has since extended the privilege to all barristers; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 27, note. Upon the Judicature Act coming into operation, Nov. 2d, 1875, the institution and office of serjeant-at-law virtually came to an end; Weeks, Att. at Law, § 33. See Experiences of Serjeant Ballantine, Lond. 1882.

SERJEANTS' INN. The Inn to which the serjeants-at-law belonged, near Chancery Lane; formerly called Faryndon Inn. See Inns of Court; 3 Steph. Com. 272, n. It no longer exists.

SERJEANTY. In English Law. A species of service which cannot be due or performed from a tenant to any lord but the king, and is either grand or petit serjeanty.

SERVAGE. Where a tenant, besides his rent, finds one or more workmen for his lord's service. King John brought the Crown of England in servage to the see of Rome; 2 Inst. 174; Whart. Dict.

SERVANTS. In Louisiana. A term including slaves and, in general, all free persons who let, hire, or engage their services to another in the state, to be employed therein at any work, commerce, or occupation whatever, for the benefit of him who has contracted with them, for a certain sum or retribution, or upon certain conditions. La. Civ. Code, arts. 155–157.

Personal Relations. Domestics; those who receive wages, and who are lodged and fed in the house of another and employed in his services. Such servants are not particularly recognized by law. They are called menial servants, or domestics, from living infra mœnia, within the walls of the house. 1 Bla. Com. 324; Wood, Inst. 53.

The right of the master to their services in every respect is grounded on the contract between them.

Laborers or persons hired by the day's work or any longer time are not considered servants; 3 S. & R. 351. See 12 Ves. 114; 16 id. 486; 2 Vern. 546; 3 Deac. & C. 332; 1 Mont. & B. 413; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 652. DOMESTIC; OPERATIVE; MASTER.

SERVICE. In Contracts. The being employed to serve another.

In cases of seduction, the gist of the action is not the injury which the seducer has inflicted on the parent by destroying his peace of mind and the reputation of his child, but for the consequent inability to perform those services for which she was accountable to her master or her parent, who assumes this character for the purpose. See SEDUCTION; 2 M. & W. 539; 7 C. & P. 528.

In Feudal Law. That duty which the tenant owed to his lord by reason of his fee or estate.

The services, in respect of their quality, were either free or base, and in respect of their quantity, and the time of exacting them, were either certain or uncertain. 2 Bla. Com. 62.

In Civil Law. A servitude.

In Practice. The execution of a writ or process. Thus, to serve a writ of capias signifies to arrest a defendant under the process; Kirb. 48; 2 Aik. 338; 11 Mass. 181; to serve a summons is to deliver a copy of it at the house of the party, or to deliver it to him personally, or to read it to him: notices and other papers are served by delivering the same at the house of the party, or to him in person.

But where personal service is impossible, through the non-residence or absence of a party, constructive service by publication is, in some cases, permitted, and is effected by publishing the paper to be served in a newspaper designated in the order of court and by mailing a copy of the paper to the last known address of the party.

Substituted service is a constructive service made upon some recognized representative, as where a statute requires a foreign insurance company doing business in the State of Massachusetts to appoint the insurance commissioner of the state their attorney, "upon whom all lawful processes in any proceeding against the company may be served with like effect as if the company existed in that commonwealth;" 16 Am. L. Rev. 421. Service by publication is in general held valid only in proceedings in rem, where the subject-matter is within the jurisdiction of the court, as in suits in partition, attachment, for the foreclosure of mortgages, and the enforcement of mechanics' liens. In many of the states statutes have been passed to meet this class of cases. In purely personal actions, service by publication is invalid, upon the well-settled principle that the person or thing proceeded against must be within the jurisdiction of the court entertaining the cause of action. 27 Am. L. Reg. 93; 95 U. S. 704; Story, Confl. L. § 539. Some states, however, have gone so far as to allow suits in chancery to be maintained against non-residents upon constructive service of process by publication; 15 Am. L. Reg. 2. But proceedings in divorce are generally recognized as forming an exception to the rule; Bish. Mar. & D. § 159 et seq. See DIVORCE; FOREIGN JUDGMENT; 11 Wall. 329.

When the service of a writ is prevented by the act of the party on whom it is to be served, it will, in general, be sufficient if the officer do everything in his power to serve it; 1 Mann. & G. 238.

SERVICE OF AN HEIR. An old form of Scotch law, fixing the right and character of an heir to the estate of his ancestor. Bell, Dict. Abolished in 1874.

SERVIENT. In Civil Law. A term applied to an estate or tenement by or in respect of which a servitude is due to another estate or tenement.

SERVITORS OF BILLS. Such servants or messengers of the marshal belonging to the king's bench as were heretofore sent abroad with bills or writs to summon men to that court, being now called "tipstaves." Blount; 2 Hen. IV. c. 23.

SERVITIUM LIBERUM. See FREEHOLD.

SERVITIUM REGALE. Royal service, or the prerogatives that within a royal manor, belonged to the lord of it, viz.: power of judicature in matters of property; of life and death in felonies and murders; right to waifs and estrays; remitting of money; assize of bread and beer, and weights and measures. Whart. Dict.

SERVITUDE. In Civil Law. The subjection of one person to another person, or of a person to a thing, or of a thing to a person, or of a thing to a thing.

A right which subjects a land or tenement to some service for the use of another land or tenement which belongs to another master. Domat, Civ. Law, Cushing's ed. § 1018.

A mixed servitude is the subjection of persons to things, or things to persons.

A natural servitude is one which arises in consequence of the natural condition or situation of the soil.

A personal servitude is the subjection of one person to another: if it consists in the right of property which a person exercises over another, it is slavery. When the subjection of one person to another is not slavery, it consists simply in the right of requiring of another what he is bound to do or not to do: this right arises from all kinds of contracts or quasi-contracts. Lois des Bât. p. 1, c. 1, art. 1.

A real or predial servitude is a charge laid on an estate for the use and utility of another estate belonging to another proprietor. La. Code, art. 643. When used without any adjunct, the word servitude means a real or predial servitude. Lois des Bât. p. 1, c. 1. Real servitudes are divided into rural and urban.

Rural servitudes are those which are due by an estate to another estate, such as the right of passage over the serving estate, or that which owes the servitude, or to draw water from it, or to water cattle there, or to take coal, lime, and wood from it, and the like.

Urban servitudes are those which are established over a building for the convenience of another, such as the right of resting the joists in the wall of the serving building, of opening windows which overlook the serving estate, and the like. Dalloz, Dict. Servitudes.

This term is used as a translation of the Latin term servitus in the French and Scotch Law, Dalloz, Dict.; Paterson, Comp., and by many common-law writers, 3 Kent. 434; Washb. Easem., and in the Civil Code of Louisiana. Service is used by Wood, Taylor, Harris, Cowper, and Cushing in his translation of Domat. Much of the common-law doctrine of easements is closely analogous to, and probably in part derived from, the civil-law doctrine of servitudes.

SERVITUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. Servitude; slavery; a state of bondage; a disposition of the law of nations by which, against common right, one man has been subjected to the dominion of another. Inst. 1. 2. 3; Bracton, 4 b; Co. Litt. 116.

A service or servitude; a burden imposed by law, or the agreement of parties, upon one estate for the advantage of another, or for the benefit of another person than the owner.

Servitus actus, a right of way on horseback or in a carriage. Inst. 2. 3. pr.

Servitus altius non tollendi, a servitude preventing the owner of a house from building higher than his neighbor. Inst. 2. 3. 4; Paterson, Comp.

Servitus aquæ ducendæ, a right of leading water to one's own land over that of another. Inst. 2. 3. pr.

Servitus aquæ educendæ, a right of conducting water from one's own land unto a neighbor's. Dig. 8. 3. 29.

Servitus aquæ hauriendæ, a right of drawing water from another's spring or well. Inst. 2. 3. 2.

Servitus itineris, a right of way on horseback or in a carriage. This includes a servitus actus. Inst. 2. 3.

Servitus luminum, a right to have an open place for receiving light into a chamber or other room. Domat, 1. 1. 4; Dig. 8. 2. 4.

Servitus oneris ferendi, a servitude of supporting a neighbor's building.

Servitus pascendi, a right of pasturing one's cattle on another's lands. Inst. 2. 3. 2.

Servitus pecoris ad aquam adpulsam, a right of driving one's cattle on a neighbor's land to water.

Servitus prædii rustici, a rural servitude.

Servitus prædii urbani, an urban servitude.

Servitus prædiorum, a servitude on one estate for the benefit of another. See PRÆDIÆ.

Servitus projiciendi, a right of building a projection into the open space belonging to a neighbor. Dig. 8. 2. 2.

Servitus prospectus, a right of prospect. Dig. 8. 2. 15. This may be either to give one a free prospect over his neighbor's land, or to prevent a neighbor from having a prospect over one's own land. Domat, 1. 1. 6.

Servitus stillicidii, a right of having the water drip from the eaves of one's house upon a neighbor's house or ground.

Servitus tigni immittendi, a right of inserting beams in a neighbor's wall. Inst. 2. 3. 1. 4; Dig. 8. 2. 2.

See, generally, Inst. 2. 3; Dig. 8. 2; Dict. de Jur.; Domat. Civ. Law; Bell, Dict.; Washb. Easem.; Gale, Easm.

SERVUS (Lat.). A slave.

The institution of slavery is traced to the remotest antiquity. It is referred to in the poems of Homer; and all the Greek philosophers mention it without the slightest censure. Aristotle justified it on the ground of a diversity of race. The Roman jurists rest the institution of slavery on the law of nations: in a fragment of Florentinus copied in the Institutes of Justinian, servitude is defined, Servitus autem est constitutio juris gentium, qua quis domino alieno contra naturam subjicitur. D. 1. 5. 4. 1; Inst. 1. 3. 2. The Romans considered that they had the right of killing their prisoners of war, manu capti; and that by preserving their lives, servati, they did not abandon but only postponed the exercise of that right. Such was, according to their ideas, the origin of the right of the master over his slave. Hence the etymology of the words servi, from servati, and mancipia, from manu capti, by which slaves were designated. It is, however, more simple and correct to derive the word servus from servire. Inst. 1. 3. 3. Children born of a woman who was a slave followed the condition of their mother; servi nascuntur aut fiunt.

A free person might be reduced to slavery in various ways: by captivity, ex captivitate. The Roman who was taken prisoner by the enemy lost all his rights as a citizen and a freedman: thus, when Regulus was brought to Rome by the Carthaginian ambassadors he refused to take his seat among the senators, saying that he was nothing but a slave. But if he had made his escape and returned to Rome, all his rights would have been restored to him by the jus postliminii; and the whole period of his captivity would have been effaced, and he would have been considered as if he had never lost his freedom. According to the law of the Twelve Tables, the insolvent debtor became the slave of his creditor, by a judgment rendered in a proceeding called manus injectio,—one of the four leges actiones. The thief taken in the act of stealing, or while he was carrying the thing stolen to the place where he intended to conceal it, was deprived of his freedom, and became a slave. So was a person, who, for the purpose of defrauding the state, omitted to have his name inscribed on the table of the census. The illicit intercourse of a free woman with a slave without the permission of his master, the sentence to a capital punishment and the sentence to work perpetually in the mines,— in metallum dati,— made the culprit the slave as his punishment (servi pœnæ). The ingratitude of the emancipated slave towards his patron or former master and the fraud of a freeman who had suffered himself to be sold by an accomplice (after having attained the age of twenty years) in order to divide the price of the sale, were so punished.

Liberty being inalienable, no one could sell himself; but in order to perpetrate a fraud on the purchaser, a freeman was offered for sale as a slave and bought by an innocent purchaser: after the price had been paid and divided between the confederates, the pretended slave claimed and, of course, obtained his freedom. To remedy this evil and punish this fraud, a senatus consultum issued under Claudius provided that the person who had thus suffered himself to be sold should lose his liberty and remain a slave. In the social and political organization slaves were not taken into consideration; they had no status. Quod attinet ad jus civile, servi pro nullis habentur. Servitutem mortalitati fere comparamus. With regard to the master there was no distinction in the condition of slaves: they were all equally subject to the domina potestas. But the master sometimes established a distinction between the servi vicarii and the servi ordinarii: the former exercised a certain authority over the latter. But there was a marked difference between those slaves of whom we have been speaking and the coloni censili, adscripti, and tributarii, who resembled the serfs of the middle ages. 1 Ortolan, 27 et seq.; 1 Etienne, 68 et seq.; Lagrange, 93 et seq. See SLAVE; SLAVERY.

SESSION. The time during which a legislative body, a court, or other assembly, sits for the transaction of business: as, a session of congress, which commences on the day appointed by the constitution, and ends when congress finally adjourns before the commencement of the next session; the session of a court, which commences at the day appointed by law, and ends when the court finally rises. A term.

SESSION COURT. See COURT OF SESSION.

SESSION LAWS. A term used to designate the printed statutes as passed at the successive legislative sessions of the various states. In Pennsylvania they are usually called pamphlet laws.

SESSIONS OF THE PEACE. In English Law. Sittings of justices of the peace for the execution of the powers which are confided to them as such.

Petty sessions (or petit sessions) are sittings held by one or more justices for the trial of minor offences, admitting to bail prisoners accused of felony, and the like purposes.

When sitting for purposes of preliminary inquiry, the public cannot claim admittance; but it is otherwise when sitting for purposes of adjudication.

Special sessions are sittings of two or more justices on a particular occasion for the exercise of some given branch of their authority, upon reasonable notice given to the other magistrates of the hundred or other division of the county, city, etc., for which they are convened. See stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 33.

The counties are distributed into divisions, and authority given by various statutes to the justices acting for the several divisions to transact different descriptions of business, such as licensing alehouses, or appointing overseers of the poor, surveyors of the highways, etc., at special sessions. 3 Steph. Com. 43, 44.

General sessions of the peace are courts of record, holden before the justices, whereof one is of the quorum, for execution of the general authority given to the justices by the commission of the peace and certain acts of parliament.

The only description of general sessions now usually held is the court of general quarter sessions of the peace; but in the county of Middlesex, besides the four quarter sessions, four general sessions are held in the intervals, and original intermediate sessions occasionally take place. They may be called by any two justices in the jurisdiction, one being of the quorum, or by the custos rotulorum and one justice, but not by one justice or the custos rotulorum alone.

General quarter sessions of the peace. See COURT OF GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

SESSIONAL ORDERS. Certain orders agreed to by both houses of parliament at the commencement of each session, and in force only during that session. May, P. L.

SET ASIDE. To annul; to make void: as, to set aside an award.

When proceedings are irregular, they may be set aside on motion of the party whom they injuriously affect.

SET OF EXCHANGE. The different parts of a bill of exchange, taken together. Each part is a perfect instrument by itself; but the parts are numbered successively, and upon payment of any one the others become useless. See Chitty, Bills, 175; Pars. Notes & B.

SET-OFF. In Practice. A demand which a defendant makes against the plaintiff in the suit for the purpose of liquidating the whole or a part of his claim. See 7 Fla. 329.

A set-off was unknown to the common law, according to which mutual debts were distinct, and inextinguishable except by actual payment or release; 1 Rawle, 293; Babingt. Set-Off, 1.

The statute 2 Geo. II. c. 22, which has been generally adopted in the United States, with some modifications, in cases of mutual debts, however, allowed the defendant to set his debt against the other, either by pleading it in bar, or giving it in evidence, when proper notice had been given of such intention, under the general issue. The statute, being made for the benefit of the defendant, is not compulsory; 8 Watts, 39; the defendant may waive his right, and bring a cross-action against the plaintiff; 2 Camp. 594; 9 Watts, 179.

It seems, however, that in some cases of intestate estates and of insolvent estates, perhaps owing to the peculiar wording of the law, the statute has been held to operate on the rights of the parties before action brought or an act done by either of them; 2 Rawle, 293; 3 Binn. 135; Bacon, Abr. Bankrupt (K). See 7 Gray, 191, 425.

Set-off takes place only in actions on contracts for the payment of money: as, assumpsit, debt, and covenant; and where the claim set off grows out of a transaction independent of the contract sued on; 31 Conn. 398. A set-off is not allowed in actions arising ex delicto; as, upon the case, trespass, replevin, or detinue; Bull. N. P. 181; 4 E. D. Sm. 162.

In Pennsylvania, if it appear that the plaintiff is overpaid, then defendant has a certificate of the amount due to him, which is recorded with the verdict as a debt of record; Purd. Dig. 487; 10 Penn. 436. But the plaintiff may suffer a nonsuit, notwithstanding a plea of set-off; 7 Watts, 496.

The matters which may be set off may be mutual liquidated debts or damages; but unliquidated damages cannot be set off; 3 Bosw. 560; 34 Penn. 239; 34 Ala. N. S. 659; 20 Tex. 31; 2 Head, 467; 3 Iowa, 163; 1 Blackf. 394; 6 Halst. 397; 5 Wash. C. C. 232. The statutes refer only to mutual unconnected debts; for at common law, when the nature of the employment, transaction, or dealings necessarily constitutes an account consisting of receipts and payments, debts and credits, the balance only is considered to be the debt, and therefore in an action it is not necessary in such cases either to plead or give notice of set-off; 4 Burr. 2221.

In general, when the government is plaintiff, no set-off will be allowed; 9 Pet. 319; 4 Dall. 303. See 9 Cra. 313; 1 Paine, 156. Otherwise when an act of congress authorizes such set-off; 9 Cra. 213.

Judgments in the same rights may be set off against each other, at the discretion of the court; 3 Bibb, 233; 3 Watts, 78; 3 Halst. 172; 18 Tex. 541; 30 Ala. N. S. 470; 4 Ohio, 90; 7 Mass. 140, 144; 8 Cow. 126. See Montague, Babington, Set-Off. DEFALCATION; LIEN.

SETTLE. To adjust or ascertain; to pay.

Two contracting parties are said to settle an account when they ascertain what is justly due by one to the other; when one pays the balance or debt due by him, he is said to settle such debt or balance. 11 Ala. N. S. 419.

SETTLEMENT. A residence under such circumstances as to entitle a person to support or assistance in case of becoming a pauper.

It is obtained in various ways, to wit: by birth; by the legal settlement of the father, in the case of minor children; by marriage; by continued residence; by the payment of requisite taxes; by the lawful exercise of a public office; by hiring and service for a specified time; by serving an apprenticeship; and perhaps some others, which depend upon the local statutes of the different states. See 1 Bla. Com. 363; 1 Dougl. 9; 6 S. & R. 103, 565; 10 id. 179.

In Contracts. An agreement by which two or more persons who have dealings together so far arrange their accounts as to ascertain the balance due from one to the other; payment in full.

The conveyance of an estate for the benefit of some person or persons.

Settlements of the latter class are usually made on the prospect of marriage, for the benefit of the married pair, or one of them, or for the benefit of some other persons; as their children. They may be of either personal or real estate. Such settlements vest the property in trustees upon specified terms, usually for the benefit of the husband and wife during their joint lives, and then for the benefit of the survivor for life, and afterwards for the benefit of children.

Ante-nuptial agreements of this kind will be enforced in equity by a specific performance of them, provided they are fair and valid and the intention of the parties is consistent with the principles and policy of law; 8 Blackf. 284; 4 R. I. 276; 28 Penn. 73; 7 Pet. 348; 9 How. 196. Settlements after marriage, if made in pursuance of an agreement in writing entered into prior to the marriage, are valid both against creditors and purchasers; 22 Ga. 402.

When made without consideration, after marriage, and the property of the husband is settled upon his wife and children, the settlement will be valid against subsequent creditors if at the time of the settlement being made he was not indebted; 8 Wheat. 229; 4 Mas. 443; 21 N. H. 34; 28 Miss. 717; 25 Conn. 154; but if he was then indebted it will be void as to the creditors existing at the time of the settlement; 3 Johns. Ch. 481; 16 Barb. 136; 5 Md. 68; 13 B. Monr. 496; 8 Wheat. 229; unless in cases where the husband received a fair consideration in value for the thing settled, so as to repel the presumption of fraud; 2 Ves. 16; 10 id. 139; 6 Ind. 121; 28 Ala. N. S. 432; 7 Pick. 533; 4 Mas. 443; see Wms. on Settlement of R. E.

SETTLEMENT, DEED OF. A deed made for the purpose of settling property, i.e. arranging the mode and extent of the enjoyment thereof. The party who settles property is called the settler; Brown. See SETTLEMENT.

SETTLING DAY. The day on which transactions for the "account" are made up on the Stock Exchange. Whart. Dict. The settling days for English and foreign stocks and shares occur twice a month, the middle and the end. Those for consols are once in every month, generally near the commencement of the month; Moz. & W. A conspiracy to obtain a settling day by fraudulent means in order to defraud buyers of shares, or a conspiracy by fraudulent means to raise or lower the price of shares with intent to defraud buyers or sellers is an indictable offence; 1 Q. B. D. 730; 3 M. & S. 67; 2 Lind. Part. *711, 816.

SETTLING ISSUES. In English Practice. Deciding the forms of the issues to be determined in a trial, according to the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1875, Sched. I. Ord. 26. 3 Steph. Com. 510.

SEVER. In Practice. To separate; to insist upon a plea distinct from that of other co-defendants.

SEVERAL. Separate; distinct. A several agreement or covenant is one entered into by two or more persons separately, each binding himself for the whole; a several action is one in which two or more persons are separately charged; a several inheritance is one conveyed so as to descend or come to two persons separately by moieties. Several is usually opposed to joint. See CONTRACT; COVENANT; PARTIES.

SEVERAL FISHERY. See FISHERY.

SEVERAL ISSUES. This occurs where there is more than one issue involved in a case. 3 Steph. Com. 560.

SEVERALTY, ESTATE IN. An estate which is held by the tenant in his own right only, without any other being joined or connected with him in point of interest during the continuance of his estate. 2 Bla. Com. 179.

SEVERANCE. The separation of a part of a thing from another: for example, the separation of machinery from a mill is a severance, and in that case the machinery, which while annexed to the mill was real estate, becomes by the severance personalty, unless such severance be merely temporary. 8 Wend. 587.

In Pleading. When an action is brought in the name of several plaintiffs, in which the plaintiffs must of necessity join, and one or more of the persons so named do not appear, or make default after appearance, the other may have judgment of severance, or, as it is technically called, judgment ad sequendum solum.

But in personal actions, with the exception of those by executors, and of detinue for charters there can be no summons and severance; Co. Litt. 139.

After severance, the party severed can never be mentioned in the suit nor derive any advantage from it.

When there are several defendants, each of them may use such plea as he may think proper for his own defence; and they may join in the same plea, or sever, at their discretion; Co. Litt. 303 a; except, perhaps, in the case of dilatory pleas; Hob. 245, 250. But when the defendants have once united in the plea they cannot afterwards sever at the rejoinder, or other later stage of the pleading. See, generally, Brooke, Abr. Summ. and Sev.; 2 Rolle, 488; Archb. Civ. Pl. 59.

Of Estates. The destruction of any one of the unities of a joint tenancy. It is so called because the estate is no longer a joint tenancy, but is severed.

A severance may be effected in various ways, namely: by partition, which is either voluntary or compulsory; by alienation of one of the joint tenants, which turns the estate into a tenancy in common; by the purchase or descent of all the shares of the joint tenants, so that the whole estate becomes vested in one only. Comyns, Dig., Estates by Grant (K 5); 1 Binn. 175.

SEWER (L. Lat. sewera, severa). A fresh-water trench or little river, encompassed with banks on both sides, to carry the water into the sea and thereby preserve the lands against inundation, etc. See Callis, Sew. 80, 99; Cowel. Properly, a trench artificially made for the purpose of carrying water into the sea, river, or some other place of reception. Crabb, R. P. s. 113; 110 Mass. 433. A ditch or trench through marshy places to carry off water. Spelman, Gloss. See Washb. Easem.

SEX. The physical difference between male and female in animals.

In the human species the male is called man, and the female woman. Some human beings whose sexual organs are somewhat imperfect have acquired the name of hermaphrodite.

In the civil state the sex creates a difference among individuals. Women cannot generally be elected or appointed to offices, or service in public capacities. In this our law agrees with that of other nations. The civil law excluded women from all offices civil or public: fœminæ ab omnibus officiis civilibus vel publicis remotæ sunt; Dig. 50. 17. 2. The principal reason of this exclusion is to encourage that modesty which is natural to the female sex, and which renders them unqualified to mix and contend with men; the pretended weakness of the sex is not probably the true reason. Pothier, Des Personnes, tit. 5; Wood. Inst. 12; La. Civ. Code, art. 24; 1 Beck, Med. Juris. 94.

SEXTERY LANDS. Lands given to a church for maintenance of a sexton or sacristan. Cowel.

SHAM PLEA. One entered for the mere purpose of delay; it must be of a matter which the pleader knows to be false: as, judgment recovered, that is, that judgment has already been recovered by the plaintiff for the same cause of action.

These sham pleas are generally discouraged, and in some cases are treated as a nullity; 1 B. & Ald. 197; 5 id. 750; 1 B. & C. 286; Archb. Civ. Pl. 249; 1 Chitty, Pl. 401.

Under the Judicature Act of 1875, Sched. I. Ord. 27, r. 1, the court may order to be struck out or amended any matter in the pleadings which may tend to prejudice, embarrass, or delay the fair trial of the action; Moz. & W.

SHARE. A portion of any thing. Sometimes shares are equal, at other times they are unequal.

In companies and corporations the whole of the capital stock is usually divided into equal portions, called shares. Shares in public companies have sometimes been held to be real estate, but most usually they are considered as personal property. See CORPORATION; PERSONAL PROPERTY; STOCK; STOCKHOLDER. The proportion which descends to one of several children from his ancestor is called a share. The term share and share alike signifies in equal proportions. See PURPART.

SHAREHOLDER. See STOCKHOLDER.

SHEEP. A wether more than a year old. 4 C. & P. 216.

SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN. "When the ancestor, by any gift or conveyance, taketh an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs in fee or in tail, the heirs are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase." 1 Co. 104.

This rule has been the subject of much comment. It is given by Mr. Preston, Estates, pp. 263, 419, as follows: When a person takes an estate of freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed, will, or other writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without the interposition of another estate, of the same legal or equitable quality, to his heirs, or heirs of his body, as a class of persons to take in succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate. See 15 B. Monr. 282; Hargr. Law Tracts, 489, 551; 2 Kent, 214.

If the limitation be to heirs of the body, he takes an estate tail; if to heirs generally, a fee-simple; 1 Day, 299; 2 Yeates, 410.

It does not apply where the ancestor's estate is equitable and that of the heirs legal; 1 Curt. C. C. 419.

The rule in Shelley's Case was adopted as a part of the common law of this country, and in very many of the states still prevails. It has been abolished in the following states, and in the following order: Massachusetts, New Jersey (as to devises of real property), Mississippi (as to real property), New York, Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio (as to wills), Maine, Michigan, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Connecticut, Missouri, Alabama, and New Hampshire (as to wills). This subject has been exhaustively treated in Pennsylvania, and the numerous decisions will be found analyzed and arranged in tabular form in an essay by J. P. Gross, Esq. (Harrisburg, 1877.) The rule has been held applicable to instruments in which the words, "heir" or "heirs;" 8 W. & S. 38; "issue;" 3 W. & S. 160; 30 Penn. 158; 45 Penn. 179; "child" or "children;" 7 W. & S. 288; 50 Penn. 483; "son," or "daughter," 3 S. & R. 433; 70 Penn. 335; "next of kin;" "offspring;" 36 Penn. 117; "descendants," and similar expressions are used in the technical sense of the word heirs. Chief Justice Gibson states the operation of the rule as follows: "It operates only on the intention (of the devisor) when it has been ascertained, not on the meaning of the words used to express it. The ascertainment is left to the ordinary rules of construction peculiar to wills. . . . It gives the ancestor an estate for life, in the first instance, and, by force of the devise to his heirs, general or special, the inheritance also, by conferring the remainder on him, as the stock from which alone they can inherit;" 13 Penn. 344, 354. Although a fee is given in the first part of a will, it may be restrained by subsequent words, so as to convert it into a life estate; 86 Penn. 386. See 75 Penn. 339; 83 id. 242, 377; 87 id. 144; id. 248; 91 id. 30; Hayes on Est. Tail, *53.

SHERIFF (Sax. scyre, shire, rere, keeper). A county officer representing the executive or administrative power of the state within his county.

The office is said by Camden to have been created by Alfred when he divided England into counties; but Lord Coke is of opinion that it is of still greater antiquity, and that it existed in the time of the Romans, being the deputy of the earl (comes), to whom the custody of the shire was originally committed, and hence known as vice-comes; Camden, 156; Co. Litt. 168 a; Dalt. Sheriff, 5.

The selection of sheriffs in England was formerly by an election of the inhabitants of the respective counties, except that in some counties the office was heriditary, and in Middlesex the shrievalty was and still is vested by charter in the city of London. But now the lord chancellor, in conjunction with the judges of the courts at Westminster, nominates suitable persons for the office, and the king appoints. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21 § 42. In this country the usual practice is for the people of the several counties to elect sheriffs at regular intervals, generally of three years, and they hold subject to the right of the governor to remove them at any time for good cause, in the manner pointed out by law. Before entering upon the discharge of their duties, they are required to give bonds to the people of the state, conditioned for the faithful performance of their duties, without fraud, deceit, or oppression.

It is the sheriff's duty to preserve the peace within his bailiwick or county. To this end he is the first man within the county, and may apprehend and commit to prison all persons who break or attempt to break the peace, or may bind them over in a recognizance to keep the peace. He is bound, ex officio, to pursue and take all traitors, murderers, felons and rioters; has the safe-keeping of the county jail, and must defend it against all rioters; and for this, as well as for any other purpose, in the execution of his duties he may command the inhabitants of the county to assist him, which is called the posse comitatus. And this summons every person over fifteen years of age is bound to obey, under pain of fine and imprisonment; Dalt. Sheriff, 355; 2d Inst. 454.

In his ministerial capacity he is bound to execute, within his county, all process that issues from the courts of justice, except where he is a party to the proceeding, in which case the coroner acts in his stead. On mesne process he is to execute the writ, to arrest and take bail; when the cause comes to trial he summons and returns the jury, and when it is determined he carries into effect the judgment of the court. In criminal cases he also arrests and imprisons, returns the jury, has the custody of the prisoner, and executes the sentence of the court upon him, whatever it may be.

As bailiff to the chief executive, it is his business to seize, on behalf of the state, all lands that devolve to it by attainder or escheat, levy all fines and forfeitures, and seize and keep all waifs, wrecks, estrays, and the like; Dalt. Sheriff, c. 9.

He also possesses a judicial capacity, and may hold a court and summon a jury for certain purposes; this jurisdiction, in this respect, is at common law quite extensive. This branch of his powers, however, is circumscribed in this country by the statutes of the several states, and is generally confined to the execution of writs of inquiry of damages, and the like, sent to him from the superior courts of law; 1 Bla. Com. 389.

He has no power or authority out of his own county, except when he is commanded by a writ of habeas corpus to carry a prisoner out of his county; and then if he conveys him through several counties the prisoner is in custody of the sheriffs of each of the counties through which he passes; Plowd. 37 a; 2 Rolle, 163. If, however, a prisoner escapes and flies into another county, the sheriff or his officers may, upon fresh pursuit, take him again in such county. But he may do mere ministerial acts out of his county, if within the state, such as making out a panel or return, or assigning a bail-bond, or the like; 2 Ld. Raym. 1455; 2 Stra. 727; Dalt. Sheriff, 22.

To assist him in the discharge of his various duties, he may appoint an under-sheriff, and as many general or special deputies as the public service may require, who may discharge all the ordinary ministerial duties of the office, such as the service and return of process and the like, but not the execution of a writ of inquiry, for this is in the nature of a judicial duty, which may not be delegated. All acts of the under-sheriff or of the deputies are done in the name of the sheriff, who is responsible for them although such acts should amount to a tresspass or an extortion of the officer; for which reason he usually takes bonds from all his subordinates for the faithful performance of their duties; Cro. Eliz. 294; Dougl. 40.

The sheriff also appoints a jailer, who is usually one of his deputies, and has two kinds of jails, one for debtors, which he may appoint in any house within his bailiwick, and the other for felons, which is the common jail of the county. The jailer is responsible for the escape of any prisoner committed to his charge, and is bound to have sufficient force at his disposal to prevent a breach of the prison by a mob or otherwise; and nothing will excuse him but an act of God or the public enemy. He must not be guilty of cruelty, or of putting debtors in irons, or the like, without sufficient cause; but he may defend himself at all hazards if attacked. In a case where a prisoner, notwithstanding his remonstrances, was confined by the jailer in a room in which was a person ill with the small-pox, which disease he took and died, it was held to be murder in the jailer; Viner, Abr. Gaol (A); 4 Term, 789; 4 Co. 84; Co. 3d Inst. 34; 2 Stra. 856.

A deputy cannot depute another person to do the duty intrusted to him; although it is not necessary that his should be the hand that executes the writ: it is sufficient if he is present and assists. In the execution of criminal process, he may, after demanding admittance, break open the outer door of a house; but in civil actions he may not forcibly enter a dwelling-house, for every man's house is said to be his castle and fortress, as well for defence as for repose. But a warehouse, store, or barn, or the inner door of a dwelling-house after the officer has peaceably entered, is not privileged. Process or writs of any description may not be served on Sunday, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace; nor may the sheriff on that day retake a prisoner who has escaped from custody; 6 Wend. 454; 8 id. 47; 16 Johns. 287; 4 Taunt. 619; 8 id. 250; Cro. Eliz. 908; Cro. Car. 537; W. Jones, 429; 3 B. & P. 223; Dalt. Sheriff; Wats. Sheriff.

SHERIFF-DEPUTE. The judge of a Scotch county. Bell.

SHERIFF-TOOTH. 1. A tenure by the service of providing entertainment for the sheriff at his county courts. 2. An ancient tax on land in Derbyshire. 3. A common tax levied for the sheriff's diet. Cowel, Moz. & W.

SHERIFF'S COURT. In Scotch Law. A court having an extensive civil and criminal jurisdiction.

Its judgments and sentences are subject to review by the court of session and court of justiciary. Alison, Pract. 25; Paterson, Comp. 941, n.

SHERIFF'S COURT IN LONDON. A tribunal having cognizance of personal actions under the London (city) Small Debts Act of 1852, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 157, s. 3. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 121; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 127; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, s. 99; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 157.

The sheriff's court in London is one of the chief of the courts of limited and local jurisdiction in London. 3 Steph. Com. 449, note (l); 3 Bla. Com. 80, note (j).

By the County Courts Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142; this court is now classed among the county courts, so far as regards the administration of justice; 3 Steph. Com. 298, n. The privileges of the corporation in the appointment of the judge and other officers of the court are not affected by that act; Mozl. & W. Dict.

SHERIFF'S JURY. In Practice. A jury composed of no determinate number, but which may be more or less than twelve, summoned by the sheriff for the purposes of an inquisition or inquest of office. 3 Bla. Com. 258.

SHERIFF'S TOURN. A court of record in England, held twice every year, within a month after Easter and Michaelmas, before the sheriff, in different parts of the county.

It is, indeed, only the turn or circuit of the sheriff to keep a court-leet in each respective hundred. It is the great court-leet of the county, as the county court is the court-baron; for out of this, for the ease of the sheriff, was taken the court-leet or view of frank-pledge, q. v. 4 Bla. Com. 273. This court has fallen into desuetude.

SHERIFFALTY, OR SHRIEVALTY. The office of sheriff.

SHIFTING USE. Such a use as takes effect in derogation of some other estate, and is limited expressly by the deed or is allowed to be created by some person named in the deed. Gilb. Uses, 152, n.; 2 Washb. R. P. 284.

For example, a feoffment in fee is made to the use of W and his heirs till A pays £40 to W, and then to the use of A and his heirs. A very common application is in the case of marriage settlements. Wms. R. P. 243. The doctrine of shifting uses furnished a means of evading the principle of law that a fee could not be limited after a fee. See 2 Washb. R. P. 284; Wms. R. P. 242; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 452; 1 Vern. 402; 1 Edw. Ch. 34.

SHILLING. In English Law. The name of an English coin, of the value of one-twentieth part of a pound. In the United States while they were colonies there were coins of this denomination; but they varied greatly in their value.

SHIP. A vessel employed in navigation: for example, the terms the ship's papers, the ship's husband, shipwreck, and the like, are employed whether the vessel referred to be a brig, a schooner, a sloop, or a three-masted vessel.

A vessel with three masts, employed in navigation. 4 Wash. C. C. 530. The boats and rigging; 2 Marsh. Ins. 727; together with the anchors, masts, cables, and such-like objects, are considered as part of the ship; Pardessus, n. 599.

As to what passes by a bill of sale under the general term ship, or ship and her appurtenances, or ship, apparel, and furniture, see 1 Pars. Marit. Law, 71 n. 3; APPAREL. The capacity of a ship is ascertained by its tonnage, or the space which may be occupied by its cargo.

Ships are of different kinds: as, ships of war and merchant-ships, steamships and sailing-vessels. Merchant-ships may be devoted to the carriage of passengers and property, or either alone. When propelled in whole or in part by steam, and employed in the transportation of passengers, they are subject to inspection and certain stringent regulations imposed by act of congress passed 28th Feb. 1871; R. S. §§ 4463–4500; and steam-vessels not carrying passengers are likewise subject to inspection and certain regulations; R. S. §§ 4399–4462.

Stringent regulations in regard to the number of passengers to be taken on board of sailing-vessels, and the provisions to be made for their safety and comfort, are also prescribed by R. S. § 4465.

Numerous acts of congress have been passed from time to time in reference to the registering, enrolling, licensing, employment, and privileges of the vessels of commerce owned in the United States. See R. S. §§ 4399, 4500. NAVIGATION, RULES OF.

SHIP-BROKER. One who transacts business relating to vessels and their employment between the owners of vessels and merchants who send cargoes.

SHIP-DAMAGE. In the charter-parties with the English East India Company these words occur: their meaning is, damage from negligence, insufficiency, or bad stowage in the ship. Dougl. 272; Abb. Shipp. 204.

SHIP-MONEY. An imposition formerly levied on port towns and other places for fitting out ships; revived by Charles I. and abolished in the same reign; 17 Car. I. c. 14; Whart. Dict.

SHIP'S BILL. The copy of the bill of lading retained by the master. In case of a variance between this and the bill delivered to the shipper, the latter must control; 14 Wall. 98.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONER. An officer appointed by the several circuit courts of the United States for each port of entry, which is also a port of ocean navigation within their respective jurisdictions, which, in the judgment of such court, may require the same. His duties are: to facilitate and superintend the engagement and discharge of seamen; to secure the presence on board of the men engaged at the proper times; to facilitate the making of apprenticeship to the sea service; and such other like duties as may be required by law; R. S. §§ 4501–4508.

SHIP'S HUSBAND. An agent appointed by the owner of a ship, and invested with authority to make the requisite repairs and attend to the management, equipment, and other concerns of the ship. He is the general agent of the owners in relation to the ship, and may be appointed in writing or orally. He is usually, but not necessarily, a part-owner; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 97. He must see to the proper outfit of the vessel in the repairs adequate to the voyage and in the tackle and furniture necessary for a seaworthy ship; must have a proper master, mate, and crew for the ship, so that in this respect it shall be seaworthy; must see to the due furnishing of provisions and stores according to the necessities of the voyage; must see to the regularity of the clearances from the custom-house and the regularity of the registry; must settle the contracts and provide for the payment of the furnishings which are requisite to the performance of those duties; must enter into proper charter-parties, or engage the vessel for general freight under the usual conditions, and settle for freight and adjust averages with the merchant; and must preserve the proper certificates, surveys and documents, in case of future disputes with insurers and freighters, and to keep regular books of the ship; 4 B. & Ad. 375; 1 Y. & C. 326; 8 Wend. 144; 16 Conn. 12. These are his general powers; but, of course, they may be limited or enlarged by the owners; and it may be observed that without special authority he cannot borrow money generally for the use of the ship; though, as above observed, he may settle the accounts for furnishings, or grant bills for them, which form debts against the concern whether or not he has funds in his hands with which he might have paid them; 1 Bell, Com. § 499. Although he may, in general, levy the freight which is by the bill of lading payable on the delivery of the goods, it would seem that he would not have power to take bills for the freight and give up the possession of the lien over the cargo, unless it has been so settled by the charter-party.

He cannot insure or bind the owners for premiums; 17 Me. 147; 2 Maule & S. 485; 7 B. Monr. 595; 11 Pick. 85; 5 Burr. 2627.

As the power of the master to enter into contracts of affreightments is superseded in the port of the owners, so it is by the presence of the ship's husband or the knowledge of the contracting parties that a ship's husband has been appointed; 2 Bell, Com. 199. The ship's husband, as such, has no lien on the vessel or proceeds; 2 Curt. C. C. 427.

SHIP'S PAPERS. The papers or documents required for the manifestation of the ownership and national character of a vessel and her cargo, and to show her compliance with the revenue and navigation laws of the country to which she belongs.

The want of these papers or any of them renders the character of a vessel suspicious;

2 Boulay-Paty, Droit Com. 14; and the use of false or simulated papers frequently subjects the vessel to confiscation; 15 East, 46, 70, 364; or avoids an insurance, unless the insurer has stipulated that she may carry such papers; id.

A ship's papers are of two sorts: first, those required by the law of the particular country to which the ship belongs: as, the certificate of registry or of enrolment, the license, the crew-list, the shipping articles, clearance, etc.; and, second, such as are required by the law of nations to be on board of neutral ships as evidence of their title to that character: as, the sea brief or letter, or passport; the proofs of property in the ship, as bills of sale, etc.; the charter-party; the bills of lading; the invoices; the crew-list or muster-roll; the log-book, and the bill of health. M'Culloch, Com. Dict. Ship's Papers.

SHIPPER. One who ships or puts goods on board of a vessel, to be carried to another place during her voyage. In general, the shipper is bound to pay for the hire of the vessel or the freight of the goods; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1030.

SHIPPING. Ships in general; ships or vessels of any kind intended for navigation. Relating to ships; as, shipping interest, shipping affairs, shipping business, shipping concerns. Putting on board a ship or vessel, or receiving on board a ship or vessel. Webster, Dict.; Worcester, Dict. See SHIP; SHIP'S PAPERS.

SHIPPING ARTICLES. An agreement, in writing or print, between the master and seamen or mariners on board his vessel (except such as shall be apprenticed or servant to himself or owners), declaring the voyage or voyages, term or terms of time, for which such seamen or mariners shall be shipped. It is also required that at the foot of every such contract there shall be a memorandum, in writing, of the day and the hour on which each seaman or mariner who shall so ship and subscribe shall render himself on board to begin the voyage agreed upon. Provision is made in the R. S. of U. S. for shipping articles, and a penalty is imposed for shipping seamen without them; R. S., § 4509 et seq.

The shipping articles ought not to contain any clause which derogates from the general rights and privileges of seamen; and, if they do, such clause will be declared void; 2 Sumn. 443; 2 Mas. 541.

A seaman who signs shipping articles is bound to perform the voyage; and he has no right to elect to pay damages for non-performance of the contract; 2 Va. Cas. 276.

See, generally, Gilp. 147, 219, 452; 1 Pet. Adm. 212; Bee, 48; 1 Mas. 443; 5 id. 272; 14 Johns. 260.

SHIRE. In English Law. A district or division of country. Co. Litt. 50 a.

SHIRE-GEMOT (spelled, also, Scire-gemote, Scir-gemot, Scyre-gemote, Shire-mote; from the Saxon scir or scyre, county, shire, and gemote, a court, an assembly).

The Saxon county court. It was held twice a year before the bishop and alderman of the shire, and was the principal court. Spelman, Gloss, Gemotum; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 28.

SHIRE-MAN, or SCYRE-MAN. Before the conquest the judge of the county, by whom trials for land, etc., were determined. Toml.; Moz. & W.

SHOP-BOOKS. The books of a retail dealer, mechanic, or other person, in which entries or charges are made of work done, or goods sold and delivered to customers, commonly called "account-books," or "books of account." The party's own shop-books are in certain cases admissible in evidence to prove the delivery of goods therein charged, where a foundation is laid for their introduction. The following are the general rules governing the production of this kind of evidence. First, that the party offering the books kept no clerk; second, that the books offered by the party are his books of account, and that the entries therein are in his handwriting; third, it must appear, by some of those who have dealt with the party and settled by the books offered, that they found them correct; fourth, it must be shown that some of the articles charged have been delivered. Where entries are made by a clerk who is dead, such entries are admissible in evidence on proof of the handwriting; 4 Ill. 120; 19 id. 393; 8 Johns. 212; 11 Wend. 568; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 117; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 282. See ORIGINAL ENTRY.

SHORE. Land on the side of the sea, a lake, or a river. Strictly speaking, when the water does not ebb and flow in a river, there is no shore. See 6 Mass. 435; 23 Tex. 349; 23 N. J. L. 624, 683; 38 id. 548. RIVER; SEA.

SHORT CAUSE. A suit in the chancery division of the high court of justice, where there is only a simple point for discussion, which will probably occupy not more than ten minutes in the hearing. A suit may often be greatly accelerated by being placed on the list of short causes, which are heard one day in each week (generally Saturday) during the sittings of the court; Dan. Ch. Pr. 5th ed. 836; Hunt. Eq. Pt. I. ch. 4, s. 4. A similar provision is familiar to the practice of the courts of several of the states, but its operation is not restricted to chancery cases, and the time allowed for the hearing varies in the different courts.

SHORT ENTRY. A term used among bankers to denote the act which takes place when a note has been sent to a bank for collection, and an entry of it is made in the customer's bank-book, stating the amount in an inner column, and carrying it out into the accounts between the parties when it has been paid.

A bill of this kind remains the property of the depositor; 1 Rose, 153; 2 id. 163; 2 B. & C. 422; 11 R. I. 119.

SHORT-FORD. An ancient custom of the city of Exeter, similar to that of gavelet in London, which was in effect a foreclosure of the right of the tenant by the lord of the fee, in cases of non-payment of rent; Cowel.

SHORT NOTICE. In English Practice. Four days' notice of trial. Wharton, Law Dict. Notice of Trial; 1 Cr. & M. 499. Where short notice has been given, two days is sufficient notice of continuance; Wharton, Lex.

SI TE FECERIT SECURUM (Lat. if he make you secure). Words which occur in the form of writs, which originally required, or still require, that the plaintiff should give security to the sheriff that he will prosecute his claim, before the sheriff can be required to execute such writ.

SICKNESS. By sickness is understood any affection of the body which deprives it temporarily of the power to fulfil its usual functions. It has been held to include insanity; L. R. 8 Q. B. 295.

Sickness is either such as affects the body generally, or only some parts of it. Of the former class a fever is an example; of the latter, blindness. When a process has been issued against an individual for his arrest, the sheriff or other officer is authorized, after he has arrested him, if he be so dangerously sick that to remove him would endanger his life or health, to let him remain where he found him, and to return the facts at large, or simply languidus.

SIDE-BAR RULES. In English Practice. Rules which were formerly moved for by attorneys on the side-bar of the court, but now may be had of the clerk of the rules, upon a præcipe. These rules are, that the sheriff return his writ, that he bring in the body, for special imparlance, to be present at the taxing of costs, and the like. As to side-bar applications, see Mitchell, Rules, 20.

SIDESMEN (testes, synodales). In Ecclesiastical Law. A kind of impanelled jury, consisting of two, three, or more persons, in every parish, who were upon oath to present all heretics and irregular persons. In process of time they became standing officers in many places, especially cities. They were called synodsmen,—by corruption sidesmen; also questmen. But their office has become absorbed in that of church-warden. 1 Burn, Eccl. Law, 399.

SIDEWALK. See STREET.

SIGHT. Presentment. Bills of exchange are frequently drawn payable at sight or a certain number of days or months after sight.

Bills payable at sight are said to be entitled to days of grace by the law merchant; Dan. Neg. Instr. § 617; 13 Gray, 597; 42 Ala. 186; 28 Mo. 596; contra, 1 E. D. Sm. 505. Statutes have settled the question in some states.

The holder of a bill payable at sight is required to use due diligence to put it into circulation, and, if payable after sight, have it presented in reasonable time; 20 Johns. 146; 12 Pick. 299; 28 E. L. & E. 131; 13 Mass. 137; 4 Mas. 336; 5 id. 118; 1 M'Cord, 322; 1 Hawks, 195.

After sight in a bill means after acceptance, in a note, after exhibition to the maker; Dan. Neg. Instr. § 619. It is usual to leave a bill for acceptance one whole day; but the acceptance is dated as on the day it was left; Sewell, Bank.

A bill drawn payable a certain number of days after sight, acceptance waived, must be presented to fix the time at which the bill is to become due, and the term of the bill begins to run from the date of presentment.

Sight drafts and sight bills are bills payable at sight.

SIGILLUM (Lat.). A seal.

SIGN MANUAL. In English Law. The signature of the king to grants or letters patent, inscribed at the top. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 347*.

Any one's name written by himself. Webster, Dict.; Wharton, Law Dict. The sign manual is not good unless countersigned, etc.; 9 Mod. 54.

SIGNA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those species of indicia which come more immediately under the cognizance of the senses: such as, stains of blood on the person of one accused of murder, indications of terror at being charged with the offence, and the like.

Signa, although not to be rejected as instruments of evidence, cannot always be relied upon as conclusive evidence; for they are frequently explained away. In the instance mentioned, the blood may have been that of a beast; and expressions of terror have been frequently manifested by innocent persons who did not possess much firmness. See Best, Pres. Ev. 18, n. f; Denisart.

SIGNATURE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a sort of rescript, without seal, containing the supplication, the signature of the pope or his delegate, and the grant of a pardon. Dict. Dr. Can.

In Practice. By signature is understood the act of putting down a man's name at the end of an instrument, to attest its validity. The name thus written is also called a signature.

It is not necessary that a party should write his name himself, to constitute a signature: his mark is now held sufficient, though he was able to write; 8 Ad. & E. 94; 3 Nev. & P. 228; 3 Curt. C. C. 752; 5 Johns. 144. A signature made by a party, another person guiding his hand with his consent, is sufficient; 4 Wash. C. C. 262, 269.

The signature is usually made at the bottom of the instrument; but in wills it has been held that when a testator commenced his will with these words, "I, A B, make this my will," it was a sufficient signing; 3 Lev. 1. And see Sudg. Vend. 71; 2 Stark. Ev. 605, 613. But this decision is said to be absurd; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 278, n. 16. See Merlin, Répert. Signature, for a history of the origin of signatures; and, also, 4 Cruise, Dig. 32, c. 2. s. 73 et seq. See, generally, 8 Toullier, nn. 94–96; 1 Dall. 64; 5 Whart. 386; 2 B. & P. 238; 2 Maule & S. 286.

SIGNET. A seal commonly used for the sign manual of the sovereign. Whart. Lex. The signet is also used for the purpose of civil justice in Scotland; Bell. See WRITERS TO THE SIGNET.

SIGNIFICATION (Lat. signum, a sign, facere, to make). In French Law. The notice given of a decree, sentence, or other judicial act.

SIGNIFICAVIT (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. When this word is used alone, it means the bishop's certificate to the court of chancery in order to obtain the writ of excommunication; but where the words writ of significavit are used, the meaning is the same as writ de excommunicato capiendo. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 248; Shelf. Marr. & D. 502. Obsolete.

SIGNING JUDGMENT. In English Practice, the plaintiff or defendant, when the cause has reached such a stage that he is entitled to a judgment, obtains the signature or allowance of the proper officer; and this is called signing judgment, and is instead of the delivery of judgment in open court; Steph. Pl. 111. It is the leave of the master of the office to enter up judgment, and may be had in vacation; 3 B. & C. 317; Tidd, Pr. 616.

In American Practice, it is an actual signing of the judgment on the record, by the judge or other officer duly authorized; Graham, Pr. 341.

SILENCE. The state of a person who does not speak, or of one who refrains from speaking.

Pure and simple silence cannot be considered as a consent to a contract, except in cases where the silent person is bound in good faith to explain himself; in which case silence gives consent; 14 S. & R. 393; L. R. 6 Q. B. 597; 102 Mass. 135; 6 Penn. 336. But no assent will be inferred from a man's silence unless he knows his rights and knows what he is doing, nor unless his silence is voluntary.

When any person is accused of a crime or charged with any fact, and he does not deny it, in general, the presumption is very strong that the charge is correct; 5 C. & P. 332; 7 id. 832; Joy, Conf. p. 77.

The rule does not extend to the silence of the prisoner when, on his examination before a magistrate, he is charged by another prisoner with having joined with him in the commission of an offence; 3 Stark. 33.

When an oath is administered to a witness, instead of expressly promising to keep it, he gives his assent by his silence and kissing the book.

The person to be affected by the silence must be one not disqualified to act, as non compos, an infant, or the like; for even the express promise of such a person would not bind him to the performance of any contract.

The rule of the civil law is that silence is not an acknowledgment or denial in every case: qui tacet, non utique fatetur; sed tamen verum est, eum non negare; Dig. 50. 17. 142.

SILK GOWN. Used especially of the gowns worn by queen's counsel; hence, "to take silk" means to attain the rank of queen's counsel; Moz. & W.

SILVA CÆDUA (Lat.). By these words, in England, is understood every sort of wood, except gross wood of the age of twenty years. Bacon, Abr. Tythes (C).

SIMILITER (Lat. likewise). In Pleading. The plaintiff's reply that, as the defendant has put himself upon the country, he, the plaintiff, does the like. It occurs only when the plea has the conclusion to the country, and its effect is to join the plaintiff in the issue thus tendered by the defendant; Co. Litt. 126 a. The word similiter was the effective word when the proceedings were in Latin; 1 Chitty, Pl. 519; Archb. Civ. Pl. 250. See Steph. Pl. 255; 2 Saund. 319 b; Cowp. 407; 1 Stra. 551; 11 S. & R. 32.

SIMONY. In Ecclesiastical Law. The selling and buying of holy orders or an ecclesiastical benefice. Bacon, Abr. Simony. By simony is also understood an unlawful agreement to receive a temporal reward for something holy or spiritual. Code, 1. 3. 31; Ayliffe, Parerg. 496.

SIMPLE CONTRACT. A contract the evidence of which is merely oral or in writing, not under seal nor of record. 1 Chitty, Contr. 1. See 11 Mass. 30; 4 B. & Ald. 588; 2 Bla. Com. 472.

Under the act of 32 and 33 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, in the administration of the estate of a decedent, after Jan. 1, 1870, his simple contract debts are placed on an equal footing with those secured by specialty. But this does not prejudice any lien or other security, which any creditor may hold.

SIMPLE LARCENY. The felonious taking and carrying away the personal goods of another, unattended by acts of violence: it is distinguished from compound larceny, which is stealing from the person or with violence. LARCENY.

SIMPLE OBLIGATION. An unconditional obligation; one which is to be performed without depending upon any event provided by the parties to it.

SIMPLE TRUST. A simple trust corresponds with the ancient use, and is where property is simply vested in one person for the use of another, and the nature of the trust, not being qualified by the settler, is left to the construction of law. It differs from a special trust. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1896.

SIMPLE WARRANDICE. See WARRANDICE.

SIMPLEX (Lat.). Simple or single; as, charta simplex is a deed-poll or single deed. Jacob, Law Dict.

SIMPLICITER (Lat.). Simply; without ceremony; in a summary manner.

SIMUL CUM (Lat. together with). In Pleading. Words used in indictments and declarations of trespass against several persons, when some of them are known and others are unknown.

In cases of riots, it is usual to charge that A B, together with others unknown, did the act complained of; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 488; 2 Salk. 593.

When a party sued with another pleads separately, the plea is generally entitled in the name of the person pleading, adding, "sued with ——," naming the other party. When this occurred, it was, in the old phraseology, called pleading with a simul cum.

SIMULATION (Lat. simul, together). In French Law. The concert or agreement of two or more persons to give to one thing the appearance of another, for the purpose of fraud. Merlin, Répert.

With us, such act might be punished by indictment for a conspiracy, by avoiding the pretended contract, or by action to recover back the money or property which may have been thus fraudulently obtained.

SINE DIE (Lat.). Without day. A judgment for a defendant in many cases is quod eat sine die, that he may go without day. While the cause is pending and undetermined, it may be continued from term to term by dies datus. See CONTINUANCE; Co. Litt. 362 b. When the court or other body rise at the end of a session or term, they adjourn sine die.

SINE HOC. A phrase formerly used in pleading as equivalent to absque hoc, q. v.

SINE PROLE. Without issue. Used in genealogical tables, and often abbreviated into "s. p."

SINECURE. In Ecclesiastical Law. A term used to signify that an ecclesiastical officer is without a charge or cure.

In common parlance, it means the receipt of a salary for an office when there are no duties to be performed.

SINGLE BILL. One without any condition, which does not depend upon any future event to give it validity.

SINGLE COMBAT. See BATTEL; WAGER OF BATTLE.

SINGLE ENTRY. A term used among merchants, signifying that the entry is made to charge or to credit an individual or thing, without at the same time presenting any other part of the operation: it is used in contradistinction to double entry. For example, a single entry is made, A B debtor, or A B creditor, without designating what are the connections between the entry and the objects which composed the fortune of the merchant.

SINGULAR. In grammar, the singular is used to express only one; not plural. Johnson.

In law, the singular frequently includes the plural. A bequest to "my nearest relation," for example, will be considered as a bequest to all the relations in the same degree who are nearest to the testator; 1 Ves. Sen. 357; 1 Bro. C. C. 293. A bequest made to "my heir," by a person who had three heirs, will be construed in the plural; 4 Russ. Cr. Cas. 384.

The same rule obtains in the civil law: in usu juris frequenter uti nos singulari appellatione, cum plura significari vellemus. Dig. 50. 16. 158.

Under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, words in acts of parliament importing the singular shall include the plural, and vice versa, unless the contrary is expressly provided; Whart. Lex.

SINGULAR SUCCESSOR. A phrase in Scotch law, applied to the purchase of a specific chattel or specific land, as e. g., an executor or administrator, in contradistinction to the heir. Bell.

SINKING FUND. A fund arising from particular taxes, imposts, or duties, which is appropriated towards the payment of the interest due on a public loan and for the gradual payment of the principal. See FUNDING SYSTEM.

SIST ON A SUSPENSION. A Scotch phrase equivalent to "Stay of proceedings." Bell.

SISTER. A woman who has the same father and mother with another, or has one of them only. In the first case, she is called sister, simply; in the second, half-sister.

SITTINGS IN BANK OR BANC. The sittings which the respective superior courts of common law hold during every term for the purpose of hearing and determining the various matters of law argued before them.

They are so called in contradistinction to the sittings at nisi prius, which are held for the purpose of trying issues of fact.

In America, the practice is essentially the same, all the judges, or a majority of them, usually, sitting in banc, and but one holding the court for jury trials; and the term has the same application here as in England. See LONDON AND MIDDLESEX SITTINGS.

SITTINGS IN CAMERA. See CHAMBERS.

SITUS (Lat.). Situation; location. 5 Pet. 524.

Real estate has always a fixed situs, while personal estate has no such fixed situs: the law rei sitæ regulates real but not personal estate; Story, Confl. Laws, § 379.

SIX ARTICLES, LAWS OF. A celebrated act entitled "an act for abolishing diversity of opinion;" 31 Hen. VIII. c. 14; enforcing conformity to six of the strongest points in the Roman Catholic religion, under the severest penalties; repealed by 1 Eliz. c. 1; 4 Reeve, Eng. L. 378.

SIX CLERKS IN CHANCERY. Officers who received and filed all proceedings, signed office copies, attended court to read the pleadings, etc. Abolished by 5 Vict. c. 5. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 443*; Spence, Eq. Jur.

SKELETON BILL. In Commercial Law. A blank paper, properly stamped, in those countries where stamps are required, with the name of the person signed at the botton.

In such case the person signing the paper will be held as the drawer or acceptor, as it may be, of any bill which shall afterwards be written above his name, to the sum of which the stamp is applicable; 1 Bell, Com. 390.

SKILL. The art of doing a thing as it ought to be done.

Every person who purports to have skill in a business, and undertakes for hire to perform it, is bound to do it with ordinary skill, and is responsible civilly in damages for the want of it; 11 M. & W. 483; and sometimes he is responsible criminally. See MALA PRAXIS; 2 Russ. Cr. 288.

The degree of skill and diligence required rises in proportion to the value of the article and the delicacy of the operation: more skill is required, for example, to repair a very delicate mathematical instrument, than upon a common instrument; Jones, Bailm. 91; 2 Kent, 458, 463; Ayliffe, Pand. 466; 1 Rolle, Abr. 10; Story, Bailm. § 431; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 144.

SLANDER. In Torts. Words falsely spoken, which are injurious to the reputation of another.

False, defamatory words spoken of another. See Odger, Libel & S. *7.

Verbal Slander. Actionable words are of two descriptions: first, those actionable in themselves, without proof of special damages; and, secondly, those actionable only in respect of some actual consequential damages.

Words of the first description must impute—

First, the guilt of some offence for which the party, if guilty, might be indicted and punished by the criminal courts; as, to call a person a "traitor," "thief," "highwayman," or to say that he is guilty of "perjury," "forgery," "murder," and the like. And although the imputation of guilt be general, without stating the particulars of the pretended crime, it is actionable; Cro. Jac. 114, 142; 6 Term, 694; 5 B. & P. 335; it is enough if the offence charged be a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; Bigel. Torts, 44. If the charge is that the plaintiff has already suffered the punishment, the words, if false, are actionable; ibid.; see 5 Penn. 272.

Second, that the party has a disease or distemper which renders him unfit for society; Bacon, Abr. Slander (B. 2). An action can, therefore, be sustained for calling a man a leper; Cro. Jac. 144. Imputations of having at the present time a venereal disease are actionable in themselves; 8 C. B. N. S. 9; 7 Gray, 181; 22 Barb. 396; 2 Ind. 82; 2 Ga. 57. But charging another with having had a contagious disease is not actionable, as he will not on that account be excluded from society; 2 Term, 473, 474; 2 Stra. 1189.

Third, unfitness in an officer, who holds an office to which profit or emolument is attached, either in respect of morals or inability to discharge the duties of the office; in such a case an action lies; 1 Salk. 695, 698; 4 Co. 16 a.; 5 id. 125; 1 Stra. 617; 2 Ld. Raym. 1369; Bull. N. P. 4.

Fourth, the want of integrity or capacity, whether mental or pecuniary, in the conduct of a profession, trade, or business, in which the party is engaged, is actionable; as, to accuse an attorney or artist of inability, inattention, or want of integrity; 3 Wils. 187; 2 W. Blackst. 750; or a clergyman of being a drunkard; 1 Binn. 178; is actionable. It is one of the general rules governing the action for words spoken, that words are actionable, when spoken of one in an office of profit, which have a natural tendency to occasion the loss of his office, or when spoken of persons touching their respective professions, trades, and business, and which have a natural tendency to their damage. The ground of action in these cases is that the party is disgraced or injured in his profession or trade, or exposed to the hazard of losing his office, in consequence of the slanderous words; not that his general reputation and standing in the community are affected by them. It will be recollected that the words spoken, in this class of cases, are not actionable of themselves, but that they become so in consequence of the special character of the party of whom they were spoken. The fact of his maintaining that special character, therefore, lies at the very foundation of the action; Heard, Libel & S. §§ 41, 45.

Fifth. Bigelow (Torts, 48) gives as a fifth class words tending to defeat an expected title: as to call an heir apparent to estates, a bastard. See Cro. Car. 469.

Of the second class are words which are actionable only in respect of special damages sustained by the party slandered. Though the law will not permit in these cases the inference of damage, yet when the damage has actually been sustained the party aggrieved may support an action for the publication of an untruth; 1 Lev. 53; 2 Leon. 111; unless the assertion be made for the assertion of a supposed claim; Comyns, Dig. Action upon the Case for Defamation (D 30); Bacon, Abr. Slander (B); but it lies if maliciously spoken. In this case special damage is the gist of the action, and must be particularly specified in the declaration. For it is an established rule that no evidence shall be received of any loss or injury which the plaintiff had sustained by the speaking of the words unless it be specially stated in the declaration. And this rule applies equally where the special damage is the gist of the action and where the words are in themselves actionable; Heard, Libel & S. § 51.

The charge must be false; 5 Co. 125, 126; Hob. 253. The falsity of the accusation is to be implied till the contrary is shown; 2 East, 436; 1 Saund. 242. The instance of a master making an unfavorable representation of his servant, upon an application for his character, seems to be an exception, in that case there being a presumption, from the occasion of speaking, that the words were true; 3 B. & P. 587.

The slander must, of course, be published, —that is, must be communicated to a third person,—and in a language which he understands; otherwise the plaintiff's reputation is not impaired; 1 Rolle, Abr. 74; Cro. Eliz. 857; 1 Saund. 242, n. 3; Bacon, Abr. Slander (D 3). The slander must be published respecting the plaintiff. A mother cannot maintain an action for calling her daughter a bastard; 11 S. & R. 343. In an action for slander it will afford no justification that the defamatory matter has been previously published by a third person, that the defendant at the time of his publication disclosed the name of that third person and believed all the statements to be true; Heard, Libel & S. § 148. And a repetition of oral slander already in circulation, without expressing any disbelief of it or any purpose of inquiring as to its truth, though without any design to extend its circulation or credit, or to cause the person to whom it is addressed to believe or suspect it to be true, is actionable; 5 Gray, 3.

To render words actionable, they must be uttered without legal occasion. On some occasions it is justifiable to utter slander of another; in others it is excusable, provided it be uttered without express malice; Bacon, Abr. Slander (D 4); Rolle, Abr. 87; 1 Viner. Abr. 540. It is justifiable for an attorney to use scandalous expressions in support of his client's cause and pertinent thereto; 1 Maule & S. 280; 1 Holt, 531; 1 B. & Ald. 232. See 2 S. & R. 469; 11 Vt. 536. Members of congress and other legislative assemblies cannot be called to account for anything said in debate. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

Malice is essential to the support of an action for slanderous words. But malice is, in general, to be presumed until the contrary be proved; 4 B. & C. 247; 1 Saund. 242, n. 2; 1 East, 563; 2 id. 436; 5 B. & P. 385; Bull. N. P. 8; except in those cases where the occasion primâ facie excuses the publication; 4 B. & C. 247. See 14 S. & R. 359.

See, as to slander of a physician, 28 Am. L. Reg. 465. As to the admissibility of evidence of the defendant's pecuniary means, see 23 Alb. L. J. 44.

See, generally, Comyns, Dig.; Bacon, Abr.; 1 Viner, Abr. 187; Starkie, Slander; Heard, Libel & Slander; Odger, Slander; Bigelow, L. C. Torts.

SLANDER OF TITLE. In Torts. A statement tending to cut down the extent of one's title. An action for slander of title is not properly an action for words spoken, but an action on the case for special damage sustained by reason of the speaking or publication of the slander of the plaintiff's title. The property may be either real or personal, and the plaintiff's interest therein may be anything that has a market value. It makes no difference whether the defendant's words be spoken, written, or printed; save as affecting the damages, which should be larger when the publication is more permanent or extensive, as by advertisement. The action is ranged under that division of actions in the digests and other writers on the text law, and is so held by the courts of the present day. The slander may be of such a nature as to fall within the scope of ordinary slander. It is essential, to give a cause of action, that the statement should be false. It is essential, also, that it should be malicious,—not malicious in the worst sense, but with intent to injure the plaintiff. If the statement be true, if there really be the infirmity in the title that is suggested, no action will lie however malicious the defendant's intention might be; Heard, Libel & S. §§ 10, 59 et seq.

Where a person claims a right in himself which he intends to enforce against a purchaser, he is entitled, and in common fairness bound, to give the intended purchaser warning of his intention; and no action will lie for giving such preliminary warning, unless it can be shown either that the threat was made malâ fide, only with intent to injure the vendor, and without any purpose to follow it up by an action against the purchaser, or that the circumstances were such as to make the bringing an action altogether wrongful; L. R. 4 Q. B. 730; 14 Cent. L. J. 187; Odger, Libel & S. 138.

SLANDERER. A calumniator who maliciously and without reason imputes a crime or fault to another of which he is innocent. See SLANDER.

SLAVE. One over whose life, liberty, and property another has unlimited control.

Every limitation placed by law upon this absolute control modifies and to that extent changes the condition of the slave. In every slaveholding state of the United States the life and limbs of a slave were protected from violence inflicted by the master or third persons.

Among the Romans the slave was classed among things (res). He was homo sed non persona. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. l. 1, § 75. He was considered pro nullo et mortuo, quia nec status familiæ nec civitatis nec libertatis gaudet Id. § 77. See, also, 4 Dev. 340; 9 Ga. 582. In the United States, as a person, he was capable of committing crimes, of receiving his freedom, of being the subject of homicide, and of modifying by his volition very materially the rules applicable to other species of property. His existence as a person being recognized by the law, that existence was protected by the law; 1 Hawks, 217; 1 Ala. 8; 1 Miss. 83; 5 Rand. 678; 1 Yerg. 156.

In the slaveholding states the relations of husband and wife and parent and child were recognized by statutes in relation to public sales, and by the courts in all cases where such relations were material to elucidate the motives of their acts.

A slave had no political rights. His civil rights, though necessarily more restricted than the freemen's, were based upon the law of the land. He had none but such as were by that law and the law of nature given to him. The civil-law rule, "partus sequitur ventrem," was adopted in all the slaveholding states, the status of the mother at the time of birth deciding the status of the issue; 2 Rand. 246; 1 Hayw. 234; 1 Cooke, 331; 2 Dana, 432; 2 Mo. 71; 14 S. & R. 446; 3 H. & M'H. 139; 20 Johns. 1; 12 Wheat. 568; 2 How. 265, 496.

The slave could not acquire property: his acquisitions belonged to his master; 5 Cow. 397; 1 Bail. 633; 2 Hill, Ch. 397; 6 Humphr. 299; 2 Ala. 320; 5 B. Monr. 186. The peculium of the Roman slave was ex gratia, and not of right; Inst. 2. 9. 3. In like manner, negro slaves in the United States were, as a matter of fact, sometimes permitted by their masters ex gratia, to obtain and retain property. The slave could not be a witness, except for and against slaves or free negroes. This was, perhaps, the rule of the common law. None but a freeman was otherworth. In the United States the rule of exclusion which we have mentioned was enforced in all cases where the evidence was offered for or against white persons; 6 Leigh, 74. In most of the states this exclusion was by express statutes, while in others it existed by custom and the decision of the courts; 10 Ga. 519. In the slaveholding states, and in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, by statute, the rule was extended to include free persons of color or emancipated slaves; 14 Ohio, 199; 3 Harr. & J. 97. The slave could be a suitor in court only for his freedom. For all other wrongs he appeared through his master, for whose benefit the recovery was had; 9 Gill & J. 19; 1 Mo. 608; 4 Yerg. 303; 3 Brev. 11; 4 Gill, 249; 9 La. 156; 4 T. B. Monr. 169. The suit for freedom was favored; 1 Hen. & M. 143; 8 Pet. 44; 2 A. K. Marsh. 467. Lapse of time worked no forfeiture by reason of his dependent condition; 8 B. Monr. 631; 1 Hen. & M. 141. The master was bound to maintain, support, and defend his slave, however helpless or impotent. If he failed to do so, public officers were provided to supply his deficiency at his expense.

Cruel treatment was a penal offence of a high grade. Emancipation of the slave was the consequence of conviction in Louisiana; and the sale of the slave to another master was a part of the penalty in Alabama and Texas.

The enfranchisement of a slave was called manumission. Manumission being merely the withdrawal of the dominion of the master, the right to manumit existed everywhere, unless forbidden by law. No one but the owner could manumit; 4 J. J. Marsh. 103; 10 Pet. 583; and the effect was simply to make a freeman, not a citizen. See MANUMISSION; SERVUS; FREEDOM. Slavery was abolished in the United States by the thirteenth amendment to the constitution.

SLAVE-TRADE. The traffic in slaves, or the buying and selling of slaves for profit. It is either foreign or domestic.

The history of the slave-trade is as old as the authentic records of the race. Joseph was sold to Ishmaelitish slave-traders, and Egypt has been a mart for the traffic from that day to this. The negro early became a subject of it. In every slave-market he has been found, and never as a master except in Africa. The Roman mart, however, exhibited a variety of all the conquered races of the world. At Bristol, in England, for many years about the eleventh century, a brisk trade was carried on in purchasing Englishmen and exporting them to Ireland for sale. And William of Malmsbury states that it seems to be a natural custom with the people of Northumberland to sell their nearest relations.

The African slave-trade on the eastern coast has been carried on with India and Arabia from a period difficult to be established, and was continued with British India while British ships-of-war hovered on the western coast to capture the pirates engaged in the same trade. On the western coast the trade dates from 1442. The Spaniards for a time monopolized it. The Portuguese soon rivalled them in its prosecution. Sir John Hawkins, in 1562, was the first Englishman who engaged in it; and queen Elizabeth was the first Englishwoman known to share in the profits.

Immense numbers of African negroes were transported to the New World, although thousands were landed in England and France and owned and used as servants. The large profits of the trade stimulated the avarice of bad men to forget all the claims of humanity; and the horrors of the middle passage, though much exaggerated, were undoubtedly very great.

The American colonies raised the first voice in Christendom for the suppression of the slave-trade, but the interests of British merchants were too powerful with the king, who stifled their complaints. The constitution of the United States, in 1789, was the first governmental act towards its abolition. By it, congress was forbidden to prohibit the trade until the year 1808. This limitation was made at the suggestion of South Carolina and Georgia, aided by some of the New England states. Yet both of those states, by state action, prohibited the trade many years before the time limited,—Georgia as early as 1793. In 1807, an act of congress was passed which prohibited the trade after 1808; and by subsequent acts it was declared piracy. The federal legislation on the subject will be found in acts of congress passed respectively March 22, 1794, May 10, 1800, March 2, 1807, April 20, 1818, March 3, 1819, and May 15, 1820. In the year 1807, the British Parliament also passed an act for the abolition of the slave-trade,—the consummation of a parliamentary struggle continued for nineteen years, and fourteen years after a similar act had been adopted by Georgia. Great efforts have been made by Great Britain, by treaties and otherwise, to suppress this trade. See Buxton's Slave-Trade, etc.; Carey's Slave-Trade; Cobb's Historical Sketch of Slavery.

SLEEPING-CAR. The servants and employés in charge of sleeping or drawing-room cars are considered in the same light as if they were employed by the railroad company, notwithstanding the existence of a separate agreement between the railroad and the sleeping-car company, whereby the latter furnishes its own servants and conductors, and has exclusive control of the cars used on the former company's road; 19 Alb. L. J. 471; 28 Am. Rep. 200; s. c. 125 Mass. 54.

Sleeping-car companies are not liable as inn-keepers; 3 Cent. L. J. 591; 73 Ill. 360, 365; 16 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 352; 24 Am. L.

Reg. N. S. 95; nor as common carriers; 73 Ill. 360; nor as a carrier providing state-rooms for his passengers; 43 How. Pr. 466; but they must exercise ordinary care for the security of passengers' valuables; 3 Cent. L. J. 591; especially at night; 10 Cent. L. J. 66. In cases of loss for which the companies are responsible, the measure of liability is the same as that of common carriers of passengers under like circumstances, including only such property as the passenger may reasonably be supposed to carry about his person; 10 Alb. L. J. 149. See Thomp. Car. 530.

SLEEPING RENT. A fixed rent, as opposed to one varying with the profits. 2 Harr. & W. 43.

SMART-MONEY. Vindictive or exemplary damages given beyond the actual damage, by way of punishment and example, in cases of gross misconduct of defendant. 15 Conn. 225; 14 Johns. 352; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 566. That it cannot be given by jury, see 2 Greenl. Ev. § 253, n. See EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

SMOKE-SILVER. A modus of sixpence in lieu of tithe-wood. Twisdale, Hist. Vindicat. 77.

SMUGGLING. The fraudulent taking into a country, or out of it, merchandise which is lawfully prohibited. Bacon, Abr. Smuggling.

SO HELP YOU GOD. The formula at the end of a common oath, as administered to a witness who testifies in chief.

SOCAGE. (This word, according to the earlier common-law writers, originally signified a service rendered by a tenant to his lord, by the soke or ploughshare; but Mr. Somner's etymology, referred to by Blackstone, seems more apposite, who derives it from the Saxon word soc, which signifies liberty or privilege, denoting thereby a free or privileged tenure.) A species of English tenure, whereby the tenant held his lands of the lord by any certain service in lieu of all other services, so that the service was not a knight's service. Its principal feature was its certainty: as, to hold by fealty and a certain rent, or by fealty-homage and a certain rent, or by homage and fealty without rent, or by fealty and certain corporal service, as ploughing the lord's land for a specified number of days. 2 Bla. Com. 80.

The term socage was afterwards extended to all services which were not of a military character, provided they were fixed: as, by the annual payment of a rose, a pair of gilt spurs, a certain number of capons, or of so many bushels of corn. Of some tenements the service was to be hangman, or executioner of persons condemned in the lord's court; for in olden times such officers were not volunteers, nor to be hired for lucre, and could only be bound thereto by tenure. There were three different species of these socage tenures, —one in frank tenure, another in ancient tenure, and the third in base tenure: the second and third kinds are now called, respectively, tenure in ancient demesne, and copyhold tenure. The first is called free and common socage, to distinguish it from the other two; but, as the term socage has long ceased to be applied to the two latter, socage and free and common socage now mean the same thing. Bracton; Co. Litt. 17, 86. See TENURE.

By the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24, the ancient tenures by knight's service were abolished, and all lands, with the exception of copyholds and of ecclesiastical lands, which continued to be held in free alms (frankalmoigne), were turned into free and common socage and the great bulk of real property in England is now held under this ancient tenure. Many grants of land in the United States, made, previous to the revolution, by the British Crown, created the same tenure among us, until they were formally abolished by the legislatures of the different states. In 1787, the state of New York converted all feudal tenures within its boundaries into a tenure by free and common socage; but in 1830 it abolished this latter tenure, with all its incidents, and declared that from thenceforth all lands in the state should be held upon a uniform allodial tenure, and vested an absolute property in the owners according to their respective estates. Similar provisions have been adopted by other states; and the ownership of land throughout the United States is now essentially free and unrestricted. See TENURE.

SOCER (Lat.). The father of one's wife; a father-in-law.

SOCIDA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a contract by which one man delivers to another, either for a small recompense or for a part of the profits, certain animals, on condition that if any of them perish they shall be replaced by the bailer or he shall pay their value.

A contract of hiring, with the condition that the bailee takes upon him the risk of the loss of the thing hired. Wolff, § 638.

SOCIETAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A contract in good faith made to share in common the profit and loss of a certain business or thing, or of all the possessions of the parties. Calvinus, Lex.; Inst. 3. 26; Dig. 17. 21. See PARTNERSHIP.

SOCIETAS LEONINA (Lat.). In Roman Law. That kind of society or partnership by which the entire profits should belong to some of the partners in exclusion of the rest.

It was so called in allusion to the fable of the lion and other animals, who having entered into partnership for the purpose of hunting, the lion appropriated all the prey to himself; Dig. 17. 2. 29. 2; Poth. Traité de Société, n. 12. See 2 M'Cord, 421; 6 Pick. 372.

SOCIETE EN COMMANDITE. In Louisiana. A partnership formed by a contract by which one person or partnership agrees to furnish another person or partnership a certain amount, either in property or money, to be employed by the person or partnership to whom it is furnished, in his or their own name or firm, on condition of receiving a share in the profits, in the proportion determined by the contract, and of being liable to losses and expenses to the amount furnished and no more. La. Civ. Code, art. 2810; Code de Comm. 26, 33; 4 Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 1027; Dalloz. Dict. Societé Commerciale, n. 166. See Goirand, Code; COMMENDAM; PARTNERSHIP.

SOCIETY. A society is a number of persons united together by mutual consent, in order to deliberate, determine, and act jointly for some common purpose.

Societies are either incorporated and known to the law, or unincorporated, of which the law does not generally take notice.

By civil society is usually understood a state, a nation, or a body politic. Rutherforth, Inst. c. 1, 2.

SODOMITE. One who has been guilty of sodomy. Formerly such offender was punished with great severity, and was deprived of the power of making a will.

SODOMY. A carnal copulation by human beings with each other against nature, or with a beast. See 2 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 1191–1196.

It may be committed between two persons both of whom consent, even between husband and wife; 8 C. & P. 604; and both may be indicted; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 464; 2 C. & K. 869. Penetration of the mouth is not sodomy; Russ. & R. 331. As to emission, see 12 Co. 36; 1 Va. Cas. 307. See 1 Russ. Cr. 698; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 34; 8 C. & P. 417; 3 Harr. & J. 154.

SOIL. The superficies of the earth on which buildings are erected or may be erected.

The soil is the principal, and the building, when erected, is the accessory.

SOIT DROIT FAIT AL PARTIE. In English Law. Let right be done to the party. A phrase written on a petition of right, and subscribed by the king. See PETITION OF RIGHT.

SOKEMANS. In English Law. Those who held their land in socage. 2 Bla. Com. 100.

SOLAR DAY. That period of time which begins at sunrise and ends at sunset; the same as "artificial day." Co. Litt. 135 a.

SOLAR MONTH. A calendar month. Co. Litt. 135 b; 1 W. Blackst. 450; 1 Maule & S. 111; 1 Bingh. 307.

SOLARES. In Spanish Law. Lots of ground. This term is frequently found in grants from the Spanish government of lands in America. 2 White, Recop. 474.

SOLD NOTE. The name of an instrument in writing, given by a broker to a buyer of merchandise, in which it is stated that the goods therein mentioned have been sold to him. 1 Bell, Com. 435; Story, Ag. § 28. Some confusion may be found in the books as to the name of these notes: they are sometimes called bought notes.

SOLDIER. A military man; a private in the army.

The constitution of the United States, Amendm. art. 3, directs that no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

SOLE. Alone, single: used in contradistinction to joint or married. A sole tenant, therefore, is one who holds lands in his own right, without being joined with any other. A feme sole is a single woman; a sole corporation is one composed of only one natural person.

SOLEMNITY. The formality established by law to render a contract, agreement, or other act valid.

A marriage, for example, would not be valid if made in jest and without solemnity. See MARRIAGE; Dig. 4. 1. 7; 45. 1. 30.

SOLICITATION OF CHASTITY. The asking a person to commit adultery or fornication.

This of itself is not an indictable offence; Salk. 382; 2 Chitty, Pr. 478; 54 Penn. 209. The contrary doctrine, however, has been held in Connecticut; 7 Conn. 267. In England, the bare solicitation of chastity is punished in the ecclesiastical courts; 2 Chitty, Pr. 478. See 2 Stra. 1100; 2 Ld. Raym. 809; Bish. Cr. Law, § 767 et seq.

The civil law punished arbitrarily the person who solicited the chastity of another; Dig 47. 11. 1.

The term solicitation is also used in connection with other offences, as, solicitation to larceny, sodomy, bribery, threatening notice. 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 767. Under the stat. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, § 4, whoever shall solicit any one to murder any other person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Under this act the editor of a German paper in London was indicted and found guilty, for having published an article commending the assassination of the emperor of Russia; 7 Q. B. Div. 244; 1 Bish. Cr. L. 768 a.

SOLICITOR. A person whose business is to be employed in the care and management of suits depending in courts of chancery.

A solicitor, like an attorney, will be required to act with perfect good faith towards his clients. He must conform to the authority given him. It is said that to institute a suit he must have a special authority, although a general authority will be sufficient to defend one. The want of a written authority may subject him to the expenses incurred in a suit; 3 Mer. 12. See 1 Phill. Ev. 192; 2 Chitty, Pr. 2. See ATTORNEY AT LAW; COUNSELLOR AT LAW; PROCTOR.

Under a Nevada statute, the term has been held to apply to all individuals who are engaged or employed specially for the purpose of soliciting, importuning, or entreating, for the purchase of goods, etc.; 10 Rep. 175. In this sense the term is used in the statutes of some states, authorizing the levying of license taxes. See 11 Cent. L. J. 159.

Solicitors have hitherto been regarded as officers of the court of chancery; and it has been the usual course that, as soon as any one has been the admitted an attorney, he should apply to be admitted a solicitor, which is done by the Master of the Rolls as a matter of course. Hunt. Eq. Pl. III., c. 6. But now by the Judicature Act of 1873, s. 87, all solicitors, attorneys and proctors are to be henceforth called solicitor of the supreme court; Moz. & W.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL. In English Law. A law officer of the crown, appointed by patent during the royal pleasure, and who assists the attorney-general in managing the law business of the crown. Selden, 1. 6. 7. He is first in right of preandience; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 28, n. (a), n. 9; Encyc. Brit.

SOLICITOR OF THE SUPREME COURT. The solicitors before the supreme courts, in Scotland, are a body of solicitors entitled to practice in the court of session, etc. Their charter of incorporation bears date, August 10th, 1797.

SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY. The title of one of the officers of the United States, created by the act of May 29, 1830; he is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and is under the supervision of the Department of Justice; R. S. § 349.

SOLIDO, IN. See IN SOLIDO.

SOLUTIO (Lat. release). In Civil Law. Payment. By this term is understood every species of discharge or liberation, which is called satisfaction, and with which the creditor is satisfied. Dig. 46. 3. 54; Code 8. 43. 17; Inst. 3. 30. This term has rather a reference to the substance of the obligation than to the numeration or counting of the money; Dig. 50. 16. 176.

SOLUTIO INDEBITI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The case where one has paid a debt, or done an act or remitted a claim because he thought that he was bound in law to do so, when he was not. In such cases of mistake there is an implied obligation (quasi ex contractu) to pay back the money, etc. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 468.

SOLVENCY. The state of a person who is able to pay all his debts: the opposite of insolvency, q. v.

SOLVENT. One who has sufficient to pay his debts and all obligations. Dig. 50. 16. 114.

A person is solvent who owns property enough and so situated that all his debts can be collected from it by legal proceedings; 13 Wend. 377; 53 Barb. 547. But other cases hold that to be solvent one must be able to pay all his debts in the ordinary course of trade; see 2 N. B. R. 149. See Insolvency.

SOLVERE (Lat. to unbind; to untie). To release; to pay; solvere dicimus eum qui fecit quod facere promisit. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 807.

SOLVIT AD DIEM (Lat. he paid at the day). The name of a plea to an action on a bond, or other obligation to pay money, by which the defendant pleads that he paid the money on the day it was due. See 1 Stra. 652; Rep. temp. Hardw. 133; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 W. 29).

This plea ought to conclude with an averment, and not to the country; 1 Sid. 215; 12 Johns. 253. See 2 Phill. Ev. 92; Coxe, N. J. 467.

SOLVIT POST DIEM (Lat. he paid after the day). The name of a special plea in bar to an action of debt on a bond, by which the defendant asserts that he paid the money after the day it became due. 1 Chitty, Pl. 480, 555; 2 Phill. Ev. 93.

SOMNAMBULISM (Lat. somnium, sleep; ambulo, to walk). Sleep-walking.

The mental condition in this affection is not very unlike that of dreaming. Many of their phenomena are the same; and the former differs from the latter chiefly in the larger number of the functions involved in the abnormal process. In addition to the mental activity common to both, the somnambulist enjoys the use of his senses in some degree, and the power of locomotion. He is thereby enabled to perform manual operations as well, frequently, as in his waking state. The farmer goes to his barn and threshes his grain; the house-servant lights a fire and prepares the breakfast for the family; and the scholar goes to his desk and writes or reads. Usually, however, the action of the senses is more or less imperfect, many of the impressions being incorrectly or not at all perceived. The person walks against a wall, or stumbles over an object in his path; he mistakes some projections for a horse, strides across it, and imagines himself to be riding; he hears the faintest sound connected with what he is doing, while the voices of persons near him, and even the blast of a trumpet, are entirely unnoticed. Occasionally the power of the senses is increased to a degree unknown in the waking state. Jane Rider, whose remarkable history was published some thirty years ago, could read the almost obliterated dates of coins in a dark room, and was able to read and write while her eyes were covered with several folds of handkerchief. For the most part, however, the operations of the somnambulist consist in getting up while asleep, groping about in the dark, endeavoring to make his way out of the house through doors or windows, making some inarticulate sounds, perhaps, and all the while unconscious of persons or things around him. The power of the perceptive faculties, as well as that of the senses, is sometimes increased in a wonderful degree. It is related of the girl just mentioned that in the fit she would sing correctly, and play at backgammon with considerable skill, though she had never done either when awake.

The somnambulist always awakes suddenly, and has but a faint conception, if any, of what he has been thinking and doing. If conscious of anything, it is of an unpleasant dream imperfectly remembered. This fact, not being generally known, will often enable us to detect simulated somnambulism. If the person on waking continues the same train of thought and pursues the same plans and purposes which he did while asleep, there can be no doubt that he is feigning the affection. When a real somnambulist, for some criminal purpose, undertakes to simulate a paroxysm, he is not at all likely to imitate one of his own previous paroxysms, for the simple reason that he knows less than others how he appeared while in them. If, therefore, somnambulism is alleged in any given case, with no other proof than the occurrence of former paroxysms unquestionably genuine, it must be viewed with suspicion if the character of the alleged paroxysm differs materially from that of the genuine ones. In one way or another, a case of simulation would generally be detected by means of a close and intelligent scrutiny, so difficult is it to imitate that mixture of consciousness and unconsciousness, of dull and sharp perceptions, which somnambulism presents. The history of the individual may throw some light on the matter. If he has had an opportunity of witnessing the movements of a somnambulist in the course of his life, this fact alone would rouse suspicion, which would be greatly increased if the alleged paroxysm presented many traits like those of the paroxysms previously witnessed.

The legal consequences of somnambulism should be precisely those of insanity, which it so nearly resembles. The party should be exempt from punishment for his criminal acts, and be held amenable in damages for torts and trespasses. The only possible exceptions to this principle is to be found in those cases where the somnambulist, by meditating long on a criminal act while awake, is thereby led to commit it in his next paroxysm. Hoffbauer contends that, such being generally the fact, too much indulgence ought not to be shown to the criminal acts of the somnambulist. Die Psychologie, etc. c. 4. art. 2. But surely this is rather refined and hazardous speculation, and seems like punishing men solely for bad intentions,—because the acts, though ostensibly the ground of punishment, are actually those of a person deprived of his reason. The truth is, however, that criminal acts have been committed in a state of somnambulism by persons of irreproachable character. See Gray, Med. Jur. 265; Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 492; Rush on the Mind, 302; 18 Am. Journ. of Ins. 236. Tirrell's case, Mass.

SON. An immediate male descendant. In its technical meaning in devises, this is a word of purchase; but the testator may make it a word of descent. Sometimes it is extended to more remote descendants. 2 Des. 125, n.

SON ASSAULT DEMESNE (L. Fr. his own first assault). In Pleading. A form of a plea to justify an assault and battery, by which the defendant asserts that the plaintiff committed an assault upon him and the defendant merely defended himself.

When the plea is supported by evidence, it is a sufficient justification, unless the retaliation by the defendant were excessive and bore no proportion to the necessity or to the provocation received; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 406; 4 Denio, 448.

SON-IN-LAW. The husband of one's daughter.

SORS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A lot; chance; fortune. Calvinus, Lex.; Ainsworth, Dict. Sort.; kind. The little scroll on which the thing to be drawn by lot was written. Carpentier, Gloss. A principal or capital sum: e.g. the capital of a partnership. Calvinus, Lex.

In Old English Law. A principal lent on interest, as distinguished from the interest itself. Pryn. Collect. p. 161; Cowel.

SOUL SCOT. A mortuary, or customary gift due ministers, in many parishes of England, on the death of parishioners. It was originally voluntary and intended as amends for ecclesiastical dues neglected to be paid in the lifetime. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 425*.

SOUND MIND. That state of a man's mind which is adequate to reason and comes to a judgment upon ordinary subjects like other rational men.

The law presumes that every person who has acquired his full age is of sound mind, and, consequently, competent to make contracts and perform all his civil duties; and he who asserts to the contrary must prove the affirmation of his position by explicit evidence, and not by conjectural proof; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 434; 3 Add. Eccl. 86; 8 Watts, 66; Ray, Med. Jur. § 92; 3 Curt. Eccl. 671.

SOUNDING IN DAMAGES. When an action is brought, not for the recovery of lands, goods, or sums of money (as is the case in real or mixed actions or the personal action of debt or detinue), but for damages only, as in covenant, trespass, etc., the action is said to be sounding in damages. Steph. 126.

SOUNDNESS. General health; freedom from any permanent disease. 1 Carr. & M. 291. To create unsoundness, it is requisite that the animal should not be useful for the purpose for which he is bought, and that inability to be so useful should arise from disease or accident; 2 Mood. & R. 113, 137; 9 M. & W. 670.

In the sale of animals they are sometimes warranted by the seller to be sound; and it becomes important to ascertain what is soundness. Horses affected by roaring; a temporary lameness, which rendered the horse less fit for service; 4 Camp. 271; but see 2 Esp. Cas. 573; a cough, unless proved to be of a temporary nature; 2 Chitty, Bail, 245, 416; and a nerved horse; Ry. & M. 290; have been held to be unsound. But crib-biting is not a breach of a general warranty of soundness; Holt, Cas. 630; but see 8 Gray, 430; 43 Vt. 608. The true test is whether the defect complained of renders the horse less than reasonably fit for present use; 9 M. & W. 668. See Oliph., Hanover, on Horses; Benj. Sales, § 619.

An action on the case is the proper remedy for a verbal warrant of soundness; 1 H.

SOURCES OF THE LAW. The authority from which the laws derive their force. A term used to include all the reliable testimonials of what constitutes the law.

The power of making all laws is in the people or their representatives, and none can have any force whatever which is derived from any other source. But it is not required that the legislator shall expressly pass upon all laws, and give the sanction of his seal, before they can have life or existence. The laws are, therefore, such as have received an express sanction, and such as derive their force and effect from implication. The first, or express, are the constitution of the United States, and the treaties and acts of the legislature which have been made by virtue of the authority vested by the constitution. To these must be added the constitution of the state, and the laws made by the state legislature, or by other subordinate legislative bodies, by virtue of the authority conveyed by such constitution. The latter, or tacit, received their effect by the general use of them by the people—when they assume the name of customs—or by the adoption of rules by the courts from systems of foreign laws.

The express laws are—first, the constitution of the United States; secondly, the treaties made with foreign powers; thirdly, the acts of congress; fourthly, the constitutions of the respective states; fifthly, the laws made by the several state legislatures; sixthly, the laws made by inferior legislative bodies, such as the councils of municipal corporations, and the general rules made by the courts.

The constitution is an act of the people themselves, made by their representatives elected for that purpose. It is the supreme law of the land, and is binding on all future legislative bodies until it shall be altered, by the authority of the people, in the manner provided for in the instrument itself; and if an act be passed contrary to the provisions of the constitution it is, ipso facto, void; 2 Pet. 522; 12 Wheat. 270; 2 Dall. 309; 3 id. 388; 4 id. 18; 6 Cra. 128.

Treaties made under the authority of the constitution are declared to be the supreme law of the land, and, therefore, obligatory on courts; 1 Cra. 103. See TREATY.

The acts and resolutions of congress enacted constitutionally are, of course, binding as laws, and require no other explanation.

The constitutions of the respective states, if not opposed to the provisions of the constitution of the United States, are of binding force in the states respectively; and no act of the state legislature has any force which is made in contravention of the state constitution.

The laws of the several states constitutionally made by the state legislatures have full and complete authority in the respective states.

Laws are frequently made by inferior legislative bodies which are authorized by the legislature: such are the municipal councils of cities or boroughs. Their laws are generally known by the name of ordinances, and when lawfully ordained they are binding on the people. The courts, perhaps by a necessary usurpation, have been in the practice of making general rules and orders, which sometimes affect suitors and parties as much as the most regular laws enacted by congress. These apply to all future cases. There are also rules made in particular cases as they arise: but these are rather decrees or judgments than laws.

The tacit laws, which derive their authority from the consent of the people without any legislative enactment, may be subdivided into,—

The common law, which is derived from two sources,—the common law of England, and the practice and decisions of our own courts. In some states it has been enacted that the common law of England shall be the law, except where the same is inconsistent with our constitutions and laws. See LAW.

Customs which have been generally adopted by the people have the force of law.

The principles of the Roman law, being generally founded in superior wisdom, have insinuated themselves into every part of the law. Many of the refined rules which now adorn the common law appear there without any acknowledgment of their paternity; and it is at this source that some judges dipped to get the wisdom which adorns their judgments. The proceedings of the courts of equity, and many of the admirable distinctions which manifest their wisdom, are derived from this source. To this fountain of wisdom the courts of admiralty owe most of the law which governs in admiralty cases.

The Canon law, which was adopted by the ecclesiastical courts, figures in our laws respecting marriage, divorces, wills and testaments, executors and administrators, and many other subjects.

The jurisprudence, or decisions of the various courts, have contributed their full share of what makes the law. These decisions are made by following precedents, by borrowing from the sources already mentioned, and sometimes by the less excusable disposition of the judges to legislate on the bench.

The monument where the common law is to be found are the records, reports of cases adjudicated by the courts, and the treatises of learned men. The books of reports are the best proof of what is the common law; but, owing to the difficulty of finding out any systematic arrangement, recourse is had to treatises upon the various branches of the law. The records, owing to their being kept in one particular place and therefore not generally accessible, are seldom used.

SOUS SEING PRIVE. In Louisiana. An act or contract evidenced by writing under the private signature of the parties to it. The term is used in opposition to the authentic act, which is an agreement entered into in the presence of a notary or other public officer.

The form of the instrument does not give it its character so much as the fact that it appears or does not appear to have been executed before the officer; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 196; 7 id. 548.

The effect of a sous seing privé is not the same as that of the authentic act. The former cannot be given in evidence until proved, and, unless accompanied by possession, it does not, in general, affect third persons; 6 Mart. La. N. S. 429, 432; the latter, or authentic acts, are full evidence against the parties and those who claim under them; 8 Mart. La. N. S. 132.

SOUTH CAROLINA. One of the original thirteen United States.

This state was originally part of the British province of Carolina, then comprehending both North Carolina and South Carolina. That province was granted by Charles II., by charter issued to eight lord proprietors, in 1663, and amended in 1665 so as to extend it from north latitude twenty-nine degrees to thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, and include it within parallel lines drawn from these points on the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. The first permanent settlement in South Carolina was effected in 1670 by emigrants from England who landed at Beaufort, then Port Royal, in the same year and removed to the point on the river Ashley nearly opposite the present site of Charleston; but, abandoning this position, they again removed, in 1680, to Oyster Point, at the confluence of the Ashley and Cooper, where they began Charleston.

In 1719, the colonial legislature disowned the proprietary government and threw the colony into the hands of the king, who, accordingly, assumed the control of it. It was not, however, until 1729 that the charter was surrendered. In that year the shares of seven out of the eight lords proprietors were ceded. The eighth share, which belonged to the family of Lord Granville, formerly Cartaret, was retained, and laid off in North Carolina,—which was about the same time finally divided from South Carolina.

In 1732, that part of South Carolina lying west of the river Savannah was granted by the crown to the Georgia Company, under Oglethorpe. Thus South Carolina was reduced in extent, and, in consequence of subsequent arrangements of boundaries, made with Georgia in 1787 in the treaty of Beaufort, and with North Carolina in the early part of the present century, is now separated from those two states, by a line beginning at a cedar stake, marked with nine notches, planted near the mouth of Little river on the Atlantic (north latitude thirty-five degrees eight minutes), and running by various traverses a west-northwest course to the forks of the Catawba, thence irregularly a west course to a point of intersection in the Appalachian mountains, from which it proceeds due south to the Chattooga, and thence along the Chattooga, Tugaloo, Keowee, and the Savannah (as regulated by the treaty of Beaufort) to the most northern mouth of the latter river on the Atlantic.

On the twenty-sixth of March, 1776, she adopted her first constitution,—the earliest it is believed, of the American constitutions. This constitution was replaced in 1778 by another, and that in 1790 by yet another. Some amendments were made in 1808, 1810, 1816, 1828 and 1834. In 1865 a new constitution was adopted. This in its time was succeeded by that of 1868, which, with the amendments of 1873 and 1876, forms the present constitution of the state.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative power consists of two chambers, a senate and a house of representatives. This legislature, by joint ballot of the two houses, elects the judges of the supreme and circuit courts, and formerly elected all the state and district officers.

The Senate is composed of one member from each county as now established for the election of the house of representatives, except the county of Charleston, to which shall be allowed two senators; Cons. 1868, Art. II. § 8. The members are elected for four years, one half going out of office each second year. The election takes place on the first Tuesday following the first Monday in November. Amend. approved 29th of January, 1873.

The House of Representatives consists of one hundred and twenty-four members, apportioned among the counties according to their population, elected for two years, Art. II. §§ 3 and 4, at the same time that the election of senators is held.

No person is eligible to a seat in the senate unless he is of the age of twenty-five years and is a citizen of the United States, and has been a resident in the state one year next previous his election and for three months next preceding his election a resident of the county. The requisitions of members of the house are the same except as to age, which with these is fixed at twenty-one years. No one convicted of an infamous crime or who has fought a duel or sent or accepted a challenge for that purpose or has been an aider or abettor in a duel is ineligible to these or in fact any other office of honor or trust. Those holding offices of profit or trust under this state, the United States or any of them or under any other power, except officers of the militia and receiving no pay, are also ineligible.

Every male citizen of the United States who has resided in the state one year previous to the day of election, and in the county in which he offers to vote sixty days next preceding any election, has a right to vote for a member or members to serve in either branch of the legislature.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor. No person is eligible to the office of governor who denies the existence of the Supreme Being or who has not attained the age of thirty years and has not been a citizen of the United States, and a citizen and resident of this state two years.

He is elected, by the electors qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives, for two years and until his successor is chosen and qualified. The governor is commander-in-chief of the militia, except when they shall be called into the actual service of the United States. He may grant reprieves and pardons after conviction, except in cases of impeachment, and remit fines and forfeitures unless otherwise directed by law, shall cause the laws to be faithfully executed in mercy, may require information from the executive departments, shall recommend such measures as he may deem necessary, and give the assembly information as to the condition of the state, may on extraordinary occasions convene the assembly, and in case of disagreement between the two houses with respect to the time of adjournment, or should either house remain without a quorum for five days he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, not beyond the time of the annual session then next ensuing.

A Lieutenant-Governor is to be chosen at the same time, in the same manner, continue in office for the same period, and be possessed of the same qualifications, as the governor, and shall be ex-officio president of the senate. In case of the impeachment of the governor or his removal from office, death, resignation, or removal from the state, or his inability to discharge the powers and duties of the office, the lieutenant-governor succeeds to his office. And for the case of the impeachment of the lieutenant-governor or his removal from office, death, resignation, or inability, the legislature held first after the ratification of the present constitution was directed to provide. The provision is that, the president of the senate, or in case of his disability the speaker of the house succeeds to his office till the disability is removed or till the next general election.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, two circuit courts (common pleas and general sessions), probate courts, justices of the peace, and such municipal and inferior courts as the legislature shall from time to time direct and establish. The judges of the supreme court hold their offices for six years and the judges of circuit and probate courts hold them for two years. Justices of the peace have never been elected. Judges of the supreme and circuit courts are, at stated times, to receive a compensation for their services, which cannot be diminished during their continuance in office; but they are to receive no fees or perquisites of office nor hold any other office of profit or trust under the state, the United States, or any other power. Art. 3, s. 1.

The Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and otherwise is a court for the correction of errors at law. It has power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary. It must hold one term in the year at the capital of the state and one at such other place as the legislature may direct. At present both terms (April and November) are held at Columbia.

The Circuit Courts are held twice a year in all the counties except in Charleston, Orangeburg, Rushland, Greenville, in which three terms are held. The courts of probate are always open.

The Circuit Courts have exclusive jurisdiction of all cases of divorce, and in all civil matters both ex contractu and ex delicto, when the amount involved is over $100, and concurrent jurisdiction with the trial justices court in all other cases, and in criminal matters all felonies and crimes punishable by more than a fine or imprisonment of more than thirty days. These courts have also power to issue writs of mandamus, prohibition, scire facias, and all other writs necessary to carry their powers fully into effect. It has appellate jurisdiction for the court of trial justice of probate. The process runs throughout the state; but trials in criminal cases and in civil cases relating to real estate are confined to the county where the cause of prosecution or of suit arose.

The Probate Courts have jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration; in business appertaining to minors and the allotment of dower, in cases of idiotcy and lunacy, and of persons non compotes.

Justices of the Peace are to be elected by the qualified electors of members of the house for two years. Their jurisdiction extends to all cases of bastardy and in all actions ex contractu and ex delicto when the amount involved does not exceed $100; and prosecutions for assault and battery, other penal offences less than felony, punishable by fines only.

The legislature has never carried into effect this provision of the constitution and organized these courts. In their stead there have been organized one of the inferior courts, the trial-justice court.

The judges may be impeached before the senate for high crimes and misdemeanors, misbehavior in office, corruption in procuring office, or any act degrading their official character, and for any wilful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause which is not sufficient ground for impeachment, they may be removed by the governor on the address of two thirds of each house.

There was formerly an appellate bench for each jurisdiction, law and equity (apart from one another), consisting of the law judges for the one and the chancellors for the other. This plan continued until 1824, when a separate court of appeals, consisting of three judges, was established for both jurisdictions. This court was broken up in 1835, by electing its members to the equity and law branches respectively, and an appeal bench was constituted, in its stead, of all the chancellors and judges. This arrangement, after one year's trial, was given up in 1836, and the appeal benches as originally existing were restored, with an obligation, however, to carry the cause or the question, when a constitutional point arose, before all the chancellors and judges, and a right, also, to carry it before them on the request of any two chancellors or judges. This last resort was denominated the court of errors. In December, 1859, a separate court of appeals was again established in three judges, with a resort to all the chancellors and judges on constitutional questions or on the request of two appeal judges. In 1868 the present supreme court consisting of a chief justice and two associate justices was established.

The State Reporter is appointed by the supreme courts. There are no county courts.

JURISPRUDENCE. By a colonial statute passed 1712, the common law of England, not unsuitable to the condition of the colony, was adopted, together with leading English statutes selected and enumerated. Among the latter were the statutes relating to the writ habeas corpus and to the confirmation of Magna Charta, 9 Edw. I., A.D. 1297. The constitution of 1790 secures rights in the following particulars, among others:—an independent judiciary, the freedom of religion, not amounting to licentiousness nor inconsistent with public peace and safety, subordination of military to civil power, perpetuation of jury trial, liberty of the press, no hereditary offices or titles, inhibition of excessive bail, excessive fines, and cruel punishments, that no freeman of this state shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseised of his freehold, liberties, or privileges, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land (it is not, however, further declared that private property shall be taken for public use only by direct act of the legislature, by giving contemporaneously full bona fide compensation for the property taken and the injury therefrom accruing, or by authority conferred by the legislature by statute prescribing the rule by which similar compensation shall be made); that no bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligations of contracts shall ever be passed by the legislature of this state.

The people have also by this constitution endeavored to secure themselves against their own caprice, by anticipating that no alteration of this instrument shall be made except by bill read three times in each house, agreed to by two-thirds of both houses, and (after an intervening election securing three months' previous publication of the bill) passed, by a similar process, at the immediately consecutive session. And, by an amendment adopted in 1810, it is also provided that no convention of the people shall be called but by the concurrent vote of both branches of the legislature. These provisions remain substantially now. Three months' previous publication is not required by the present constitution. But the people must now by separate ballots vote for or against every proposed constitutional amendment at the election next succeeding the legislature passing the proposed amendment. Even after this vote of the people the next succeeding legislature must adopt the amendment by a two-thirds vote after three readings. By the present constitution a convention to amend the constitution cannot be called by the legislature. It can only recommend one. The people vote directly on that recommendation.

These constitutional and fundamental provisions and the common law, and leading English statutes, adopted in 1712, together with the statutes subsequently enacted, and the decisions of the courts, constitute the law of the state.

By an act of 1872 aliens are allowed to hold real estate in the same manner as natural-born citizens.

SOVEREIGN. A chief ruler with supreme power; a king or other ruler with limited power. An action is not maintainable against a foreign sovereign; 44 L. T. Rep. N. s. 199.

In English Law. A gold coin of Great Britain, of the value of a pound sterling.

SOVEREIGN STATE. One which governs itself independently of any foreign power.

SOVEREIGNTY. The union and exercise of all human power possessed in a state: it is a combination of all power; it is the power to do everything in a state without accountability,—to make laws, to execute and to apply them, to impose and collect taxes and levy contributions, to make war or peace, to form treaties of alliance or of commerce with foreign nations, and the like. Story, Const. § 207.

Abstractly, sovereignty resides in the body of the nation and belongs to the people. But these powers are generally exercised by delegation.

When analyzed, sovereignty is naturally divided into three great powers: namely, the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary: the first is the power to make new laws and to correct and repeal the old; the second is the power to execute the laws, both at home and abroad; and the last is the power to apply the laws to particular facts, to judge the disputes which arise among the citizens, and to punish crimes.

Strictly speaking, in our republican forms of government the absolute sovereignty of the nation is in the people of the nation; and the residuary sovereignty of each state, not granted to any of its public functionaries, is in the people of the state; 2 Dall. 471. And see, generally, 2 Dall. 433, 455; 3 id. 93; 1 Story, Const. § 208; 1 Toullier, n. 20; Merlin, Répert. Lieber's Hermeneutics, p. 250.

SOWNE. A corruption of the French souvenu, remembered. Estreats that sowne are such as the sheriff may gather; Cowel. See ESTREAT.

SPADONES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those who, on account of their temperament or some accident they have suffered, are unable to procreate. Inst. 1. 11. 9; Dig. 1. 7. 2. 1. And see IMPOTENCE.

SPARSIM (Lat.). Here and there; in a scattered manner; sparsely; dispersedly. It is sometimes used in law: for example, the plaintiff may recover the place wasted, not only where the injury has been total, but where trees growing sparsim in a close are cut; Bacon, Abr. Waste (M); Brownl. 240.

SPEAK. A term used in the English law to signify the permission given by a court to the prosecutor and defendant, in some cases of misdemeanor, to agree together, after which the prosecutor comes into court and declares himself to be satisfied; when the court pass a nominal sentence. 1 Chitty, Pr. 17.

SPEAKER. The title of the presiding officer of the house of representatives of the United States. The position is one of great importance, as the speaker appoints the standing committees of the house. The presiding officer of either branch of the state legislature generally is called the speaker.

Both houses of parliament are presided over by a speaker. That of the house of lords is commonly the lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal, though the latter office is practically merged in that of lord chancellor. In the commons the speaker never votes, except when the votes are equal; in the lords he has a vote with the rest of the house; see May, P. L. ch. 7.

SPEAKING DEMURRER. In Pleading. One which alleges new matter in addition to that contained in the bill as a cause for demurrer. 4 Bro. C. C. 254; 2 Ves. 83; 4 Paige, Ch. 374.

SPEAKING WITH PROSECUTOR. A kind of imparlance, allowed in English practice, where the court permits a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor to speak with the prosecutor before judgment is pronounced; if the prosecutor declares himself satisfied, the court may inflict a trivial punishment. 4 Steph. Com. 234.

SPECIAL. That which relates to a particular species or kind; opposed to general: as, special verdict and general verdict; special imparlance and general imparlance; special jury, or one selected for a particular case, and general jury; special issue and general issue, etc.

The meaning of special, as used in a constitutional provision authorizing the legislature to confer jurisdiction in special cases, has been the subject of much discussion in the court of appeals of the state of New York. See 12 N. Y. 593; 18 id. 57.

SPECIAL ACCEPTANCE. The qualified acceptance of a bill of exchange, as payable at a particular place, and there only. Byles, Bills, *194; see Q. B. Hill. Term, 1839; see ACCEPTANCE.

SPECIAL AGENT. An agent whose authority is confined to a particular or an individual instance. It is a general rule that he who is invested with a special authority must act within the bounds of his authority, and he cannot bind his principal beyond what he is authorized to do; 15 Johns. 44; 1 Wash. C. C. 174. See AGENT.

SPECIAL ASSUMPSIT. An action of assumpsit brought on a special contract, which the plaintiff declares upon setting out its particular language or its legal effect.

It is distinguished from a general assumpsit, where the plaintiff, instead of setting out the particular language or effect of the original contract, declares as for a debt arising out of the execution of the contract, where that constitutes the debt. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3426.

SPECIAL BAIL. A person who becomes specially bound to answer for the appearance of another.

The recognizance or act by which such person thus becomes bound.

SPECIAL BAILIFF. Same as bound bailiff, q. v.

SPECIAL BASTARD. One whose parents afterwards intermarry. 3 Bla. Com. 335.

SPECIAL CASE. See CASE STATED.

SPECIAL CONSTABLE. One who has been appointed a constable for a particular occasion, as in the case of an actual tumult or a riot, or for the purpose of serving a particular process.

SPECIAL COUNT. As opposed to the common counts, in pleading, a special count is a statement of the actual facts of the particular case.

SPECIAL DAMAGES. The damages recoverable for the actual injury incurred through the peculiar circumstance of the individual case, above and beyond those presumed by law from the general nature of the wrong.

These damages must be specially averred in the declaration, or they cannot be recovered; while damages implied by law are recoverable without any such special averment. Thus, in the case of an action for libel the law presumes an injury as necessarily involved in the loss of reputation, and will award damages therefor without any distinct averment. But if there was any peculiar loss suffered in the individual case, as the plaintiff's marriage prevented or the plaintiff's business diminished, etc., this must be especially averred. See DAMAGES.

SPECIAL DEMURRER. One which excepts to the sufficiency of the pleadings on the opposite side, and shows specifically the nature of the objection and the particular ground of the exception. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3022. See DEMURRER.

SPECIAL DEPOSIT. A deposit made of a particular thing with the depositary: it is distinguished from an irregular deposit.

When a thing has been specially deposited with a depositary, the title to it remains with the depositor, and if it should be lost the loss will fall upon him. When, on the contrary, the deposit is irregular, as where money is deposited in a bank, the title to which is transferred to the bank, if it be lost, the loss will be borne by the bank. This will result from the same principle: the loss will fall in both instances, on the owner of the thing, according to the rule res perüt domino. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1054.

SPECIAL ERRORS. Special pleas in error are those which assign for error matters in confession and avoidance, as a release of errors, the act of limitations, and the like, to which the plaintiff in error may reply or demur.

SPECIAL FINDING. Where a jury find specially a particular fact, presumably material to the general question before them, but which does not involve the whole of that question. Moz. & W.

SPECIAL IMPARLANCE. In Pleading. An imparlance which contains the clause, "saving to himself all advantages and exceptions, as well to the writ as to the declaration aforesaid." 2 Chitty, Pl. 407. See IMPARLANCE.

SPECIAL INDORSEMENT. An indorsement in full, which, besides the signature of the indorser, expresses in whose favor the indorsement is made; thus, "Pay Mr. C. D., or order, A. B." See Byles, Bills, *149.

In English practice, under the judicature act of 1875, a special indorsement on a writ of summons is one which may be made in all cases where a definite sum of money is claimed. When the writ is thus indorsed and the defendant does not appear within the time appointed, the plaintiff may then sign final judgment for any sum not exceeding that indorsed on the writ. See 3 Steph. Com. 425; Lush's Prac. 366; Moz. & W.

SPECIAL INJUNCTION. An injunction obtained only on motion and petition, usually with notice to the other party. It is applied for sometimes on affidavit before answer, and frequently upon merits disclosed in the defendant's answer. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3756. See INJUNCTION.

SPECIAL ISSUE. In Pleading. A plea to the action which denies some particular material allegation, which is in effect a denial of the entire right of action. It differs from the general issue, which traverses or denies the whole declaration or indictment. Gould, Pl. c. 2, § 38. See GENERAL ISSUE; ISSUE.

SPECIAL JURY. One selected in a particular way by the parties. See JURY.

SPECIAL LAWS. See GENERAL LAWS.

SPECIAL MATTER. Under a plea of the general issue, a defendant may, instead of pleading specially, give the plaintiff notice, that on the trial he will give some special matter, of such and such a nature, in evidence.

SPECIAL NON EST FACTUM. The name of a plea by which the defendant says that the deed which he has executed is not his own or binding upon him, because of some circumstance which shows that it was not intended to be his deed, or because it was not binding upon him for some lawful reason: as, when the defendant delivered the deed to a third person as an escrow to be delivered upon a condition, and it has been delivered without the performance of the condition, he may plead non est factum, state the fact of the conditional delivery, the non-performance of the condition, and add, "and so it is not his deed," or if the defendant be a feme covert, she may plead non est factum, that she was a feme covert at the time the deed was made, "and so it is not her deed." Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (H 3, I 2); Gould, Pl. c. 6, pt. 1, § 64. See ISSINT.

SPECIAL OCCUPANT. When an estate is granted to a man and his heirs during the life of cestui que vie, and the grantee die without alienation, and while the life for which he held continues, the heir will succeed, and is called a special occupant. 2 Bla. Com. 259. In the United States the statute provisions of the different states vary considerably upon this subject. In New York and New Jersey, special occupancy is abolished. Virginia, and probably Maryland, follow the English statutes. In Massachusetts and other states, where the real and personal estates of intestates are distributed in the same way and manner, the question does not seem to be material; 4 Kent, 27.

SPECIAL PARTNERSHIP. See PARTNERSHIP.

SPECIAL PLEA IN BAR. One which advances new matter. It differs from the general in this, that the latter denies some material allegation, but never advances new matter. Gould, Pl. c. 2, § 38.

SPECIAL PLEADER. In English Practice. A lawyer whose professional occupation is to give verbal or written opinions upon statements submitted to him, either in writing or verbally, and to draw pleadings, civil or criminal, and such practical proceedings as may be out of the general course. 2 Chitty, Pr. 42.

Special pleaders are not necessarily at the bar; but those that are not are required to take out annual certificates under stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, ss. 60, 63; Moz. & W.

SPECIAL PLEADING. A branch of the science of pleading.

The allegation of special or new matter to avoid the effect of the previous allegations of the opposite party, as distinguished from a direct denial of matter previously alleged on the opposite side. Gould, Pl. c. 1, § 18; 3 Wheat. 246; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (E 15); Steph. Pl. 162 n. (a), *lxi.

SPECIAL PROPERTY. That property in a thing which gives a qualified or limited right. See PROPERTY.

SPECIAL REQUEST. A request actually made, at a particular time and place; this term is used in contradistinction to a general request, which need not state the time when nor place where made. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2843.

SPECIAL RULE. See RULE OF COURT.

SPECIAL SESSIONS. See SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

SPECIAL TAIL. See ESTATE TAIL.

SPECIAL TERM OR TERMS. See TERM.

SPECIAL TRAVERSE. See TRAVERSE.

SPECIAL TRUST. A special trust is one where a trustee is interposed for the execution of some purpose particularly pointed out, and is not, as in the case of a simple trust, a mere passive depositary of the estate, but is required to exert himself actively in the execution of the settler's intention: as, where a conveyance is made to trustees upon trust to reconvey, or to sell for the payment of debts. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1896. See TRUST.

SPECIAL VERDICT. In Practice. A special verdict is one by which the facts of the case are put on the record, and the law is submitted to the judges. See VERDICT; Bacon, Abr. Verdict (D).

SPECIALTY. A writing sealed and delivered, containing some agreement. 2 S. & R. 503; Willes, 189; 1 P. Wms. 130. A writing sealed and delivered, which is given as a security for the payment of a debt, in which such debt is particularly specified. Bacon, Abr. Obligation (A).

Although in the body of the writing it is not said that the parties have set their hands and seals, yet if the instrument be really sealed it is a specialty, and if it be not sealed it is not a specialty, although the parties in the body of the writing make mention of a seal; 2 S. & R. 504; 2 Co. 5 a; Perkins, § 129. See BOND; DEBT; OBLIGATION.

SPECIE. Metalic money issued by public authority. See also IN SPECIE.

This term is used in contradistinction to paper money, which in some countries is emitted by the government, and is a mere engagement which represents specie.

In cases of salvage, specie on board is treated like any other cargo; 1 Pet. Adm. 416; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 254. See 15 Am. L. Rev. 416.

SPECIFIC LEGACY. A bequest of a particular thing.

It follows that a specific legacy may be of animals or inanimate things, provided they are specified and separated from all other things: a specific legacy may, therefore, be of money in a bag, or of money marked and so described: as, I give two eagles to A B, on which are engraved the initials of my name. A specific legacy may also be given out of a general fund; Ambl. 310; 4 Ves. 565; 3 V. & B. 5. If the specific article given be not found among the assets of the testator, the legatee loses his legacy; but, on the other hand, if there be a deficiency of assets, the specific legacy will not be liable to abate with the general legacies; 1 Vern. 31; 1 P. Wms. 422; 3 id. 365; 3 Bro. C. C. 160. See 1 Rop. Leg. 150; 1 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 209, 231; 2 id. 112; LEGACY; LEGATEE.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. The actual performance of a contract by the party bound to fulfil it. As the exact fulfilment of an agreement is not always practical, the phrase may mean, in a given case, not literal, but substantial performance; Waterm. Spec. Perf. § 1.

Many contracts are entered into by parties to fulfil certain things, and then the contracting parties neglect or refuse to fulfil their engagements. In such cases the party grieved has generally a remedy at law, and he may recover damages for the breach of the contract; but in many cases the recovery of damages is an inadequate remedy, and the party seeks to recover a specific performance of the agreement.

It is a general rule that courts of equity will entertain jurisdiction for a specific performance of agreements, whenever courts of law can give but an inadequate remedy; and it is immaterial whether the subject relate to real or personal estate; 2 Story, Eq. § 717; 1 S. & S. 607; 1 P. Wms. 570; 1 Sch. & L. 553; 1 Vern. 159. But the rule is confined to cases where courts of law cannot give an adequate remedy; 1 Grant Cas. 83; 18 Ga. 473; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 718; and a decree is to be granted or refused in the discretion of the court; 38 N. H. 400; 2 Iowa, 126; 5 id. 525; 9 Ohio St. 511; 8 Wisc. 392; 5 Harr. Del. 74; Hempst. 245; 2 Jones, Eq. 267; 6 Ind. 259.

As the doctrine of a specific performance in equity arises from the occasional inadequacy of the remedy at law upon a violated contract, it follows that the contract must be such a one as is binding at law; 33 Ala. N. s. 449; and it must be executory, certain in its terms, and fair in all its parts. It must also be founded upon a valuable consideration, and its performance in specie must be practicable and necessary; and, if it be one of the contracts which is embraced in the Statute of Frauds, it must be evidenced in writing; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 751; Adams, Eq. 77; Busb. Eq. 80. The first requisite is that the contract must be founded upon a valuable consideration; 19 Ark. 51; either in the way of benefit bestowed or of disadvantage sustained by the party in whose favor it is sought to be enforced; 1 Beasl. Ch. 498; and this consideration must be proved even though the contract be under seal; 12 Ind. 539; 14 La. An. 606; 17 Tex. 397. The consideration must be strictly a valuable one, and not one merely arising from a moral duty or affection, as towards a wife and children; although it need not necessarily be an adequate one; Adams, Eq. 78. See 6 Iowa, 279; 6 Mich. 364.

The second requisite is that the mutual enforcement of the contract must be practicable; for if this cannot be judicially secured on both sides, it ought not to be compelled against either party. Among the cases which the court deems impracticable is that of a covenant by a husband to convey his wife's land, because this cannot be effectuated without danger of infringing upon that freedom of will which the policy of the law allows the wife in the alienation of her real estate; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 731–735; 63 Penn. 335; 3 Bush, 694.

The third requisite is that the enforcement in specie must be necessary; that is, it must be really important to the plaintiff, and not oppressive to the defendant; 1 Beasl. Ch. 497. We have seen, for instance, that mere inadequacy of consideration is not necessarily a bar to a specific performance of a contract; but if it be so great as to induce the suspicion of fraud or imposition, the court of equity will refuse its aid to the party seeking to enforce, and leave him to his remedy at law; 2 Jones, Eq. 267. This is upon the ground that the specific enforcement of the contract would be oppressive to the defendant. The court will equally withhold its aid where such enforcement is not really important to the plaintiff, as it will not be in any case where the damages which he may recover at law will answer his purpose as well as the possession of the thing which was contracted to be conveyed to him; Adams, Eq. 83 et seq. As a general rule, a contract to convey real estate will be specifically enforced; unless the title thereto is not marketable; 15 Cent. L. J. 8; while one for the transfer of personal chattels will be ordinarily denied any relief in equity; Waterm. Spec. Perf. § 16; 40 Miss. 119. But even in the case of personal property, if the plaintiff has not an adequate remedy at law, equity will take jurisdiction; and more willingly in America than in England; Story, Eq. Jur. § 724. Equity has decreed the performance of contract to assign certain patent rights; 34 Conn. 325; and when goods were sold and there were no other similar goods in the market, a disposal of them by the seller has been enjoined; 33 L. J. Q. B. 335. Equity will decree the specific delivery of goods of a peculiar value; as heirlooms; 10 Ves. 139; an ancient silver altar; 3 P. Wms. 390; the celebrated Pusey horn; 1 Vern. 273; the decorations of a lodge of Freemasons; 6 Ves. 773; a faithful family slave; 3 Murphey, 74. Contracts for the sale of stock will not, usually, be enforced, but the rule has been departed from; 23 Cal. 390; L. R. 3 Ch. 388; 1 S. & S. 174.

When the Statute of Frauds requires that a contract shall be evidenced in writing, that will be a fourth requisite to the specific execution of it. In such case the contract must be in writing and certain in its terms; but it will not matter in what form the instrument may be, for it will be enforced even if it appear only in the consideration of a bond secured by a penalty; 6 Gray, 25; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 751.

In applying the equity of specific performance to real estate, there are some modifications of legal rules, which at first sight appear inconsistent with them and repugnant to the maxim that equity follows the law. The modifications here referred to are those of enforcing parol contracts relating to land, on the ground that they have been already performed in part; of allowing time to make out a title beyond the day which the contract specifies; and of allowing a conveyance with compensation for defects; Adams, Eq. 85.

The principle upon which it is held that part-performance of a contract will in equity take a case out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds, is that it would be a fraud upon the opposite party if the agreement were not carried into complete execution; 11 Cal. 28; 30 Barb. 633; 24 Ga. 402; 28 Mo. 134; 40 Me. 94. The act which is alleged to be part-performance must be done in pursuance of the contract and with the assent of the defendant. What will be a sufficient part-performance must depend on circumstances. The taking possession of the land and making improvements thereon will answer; 10 Cal. 156; 8 Mich. 463; 6 Iowa, 279; 30 Vt. 516; 5 R. I. 149; 33 N. H. 32; 4 Wisc. 79; though the payment of a part or even the whole of the purchase-money will not; 14 Tex. 373; 22 Ill. 643; 4 Kent, 451; 103 Mass. 404; 68 N. Y. 499. See, however, 1 Harr. Del. 532; 26 Md. 37. If the purchaser have entered and made improvements upon the land, and the vendor protect himself from a specific performance by taking advantage of the statute, the plaintiff shall be entitled to a decree for the value of his improvements; 14 Tex. 331; 1 D. & B. 9. The doctrine of part-performance is not recognized in some of the states; 37 Mo. 388; 40 Me. 187; 8 Cush. 223; 13 Sm. & M. 93.

The doctrine of allowing time to make out a title beyond the day which the contract specifies, and which is embodied in the maxim that time is not of the essence of a contract in equity, has no doubt been generally adopted in the United States; 1 D. & B. Eq. 237; 3 Jones, Eq. 84, 240; 2 McLean, 495; 57 Ill. 480. But to entitle the purchaser to a specific performance he must show good faith and a reasonable diligence; 4 Ired. Eq. 386; 3 Jones, Eq. 321. If during the vendor's delay there has been a material change of circumstances affecting the rights and interests of the parties, equity will not relieve; 15 Penn. 429.

The third equity, to wit, that of allowing a conveyance with compensation for defects, applies where a contract has been made for the sale of an estate, which cannot be literally performed in toto, either by reason of an unexpected failure in the title to part of the estate; 34 Ala. N. s. 633; 1 Head. 251; 6 Wisc. 127; of inaccuracy in the terms of the description, or of diminution in value by a liability to a charge upon it. In any such case, the court of equity will enforce a specific performance, allowing a just compensation for defects, whenever it can do so consistently with the principle of doing exact justice between the parties; Adams, Eq. 89 et seq. This doctrine has also been adopted in the United States. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 794–800; 1 Ired. Eq. 299; 1 Head, 251.

When a vendor files a bill he must show a tender of the title and an offer to perform; 46 Ill. 113; 89 Mich. 175; that is a tender of a deed; 63 Ind. 213; but it has been held that an offer of a deed in the bill is enough; 63 N. Y. 301; 20 Iowa, 295. And a vendee must show a tender of the purchase-money; 67 Penn. 24; 21 Gratt. 29. And such tender must not be delayed till circumstances have changed; 4 Brewst. 49.

A decree for specific performance will not be made against a vendor whose wife refuses to join in the conveyance; 75 Penn. 141.

A feme covert cannot maintain a bill for specific performance; 4 Brewst. 49. See, generally, Fry, Waterman, on Specific Performance.

SPECIFICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The process by which, from material either of one kind or different kinds, either belonging to the person using them or to another, a new form or thing is created; as, if from gold or gold and silver a cup be made, or from grapes wine. Calvinus, Lex. Whether the property in the new article was in the owner of the materials or in him who effected the change was a matter of contest between the two great sects of Roman lawyers. Stair, Inst. p. 204, § 41; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 241.

SPECIFICATION. A particular and detailed account of a thing.

For example, in order to obtain a patent for an invention, it is necessary to file a specification or an instrument of writing, which must lay open and disclose to the public every part of the process by which the invention can be made useful. If the specification does not contain the whole truth relative to the discovery, or contains more than is requisite to produce the desired effect, and the concealment or addition was made for the purpose of deception, the patent would be void; for if the specification were insufficient on account of its want of clearness, exactitude, or good faith, it would be a fraud on society that the patentee should obtain a monopoly without giving up his invention; 2 Kent, 300; 1 Bell, Com. 112; Perpigna, Pat. 67; Renouard, Des Brevets d'Inv. 252. See PATENT.

In Military Law. The clear and particular description of the charges preferred against a person accused of a military offence. Tytler, Courts-Mar. 109.

SPECIMEN. A sample; a part of something by which the other may be known.

The act of congress of July 8, 1870, section 28, requires the inventor or discoverer of an invention or discovery to accompany his petition and specification for a patent with specimens of ingredients, and of the composition of matter, sufficient in quantity for the purpose of experiment, where the invention or discovery is of a composition of matter.

SPECULATION. The hope or desire of making a profit by the purchase and re-sale of a thing. Pardessus, Droit Com. n. 12. The profit so made: as, he made a good speculation.

SPEECH. A formal discourse in public.

The liberty of speech is guaranteed to members of the legislature, in debate, and to counsel in court.

The reduction of a speech to writing and its publication is a libel if the matter contained in it is libellous; and the repetition of it upon occasions not warranted by law, when the matter is slanderous, will be slander; and the character of the speaker will be no protection to him from an action; 1 Maule & S. 273; 1 Esp. 226. See DEBATE; LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

SPELLING. The art of putting the proper letters in words in their proper order.

It is a rule that bad spelling will not void a contract when it appears with certainty what is meant: for example, where a man agreed to pay threty pounds he was held bound to pay thirty pounds; and seutene was holden to be seventeen; Cro. Jac. 607; 10 Co. 133 a; 2 Rolle, Abr. 147. Even in an indictment undertood has been holden as understood; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law.

A misspelling of a name in a declaration will not be sufficient to defeat the plaintiff, on the ground of variance between the writing produced and the declaration, if such name be idem sonans: as, Kay for Key; 16 East, 110; 2 Stark. 29; Segrave for Seagrave; 2 Str. 889. See IDEM SONANS; ELECTION.

SPENDTHRIFT. A person who by excessive drinking, gaming, idleness, or debauchery of any kind, shall so spend, waste, or lessen his estate as to expose himself or his family to want or suffering, or expose the town to charge or expense for the support of himself or family. Vt. Rev. Stat. c. 65, § 9. Spendthrift son trusts are sometimes created to protect a son against his own improvidence; 7 Phila. 58; 47 Penn. 113.

SPERATE (Lat. spero, to hope). That of which there is hope.

In the accounts of an executor and the inventory of the personal assets, he should distinguish between those which are sperate and those which are desperate: he will be primâ facie responsible for the former and discharged for the latter; 1 Chitty, Pr. 520; 2 Will. Exec. 644; Toller, Exec. 248. See DESPERATE.

SPES RECUPERANDI (Lat. the hope of recovery). A term applied to cases of capture of an enemy's property as a booty or prize, while it remains in a situation in which it is liable to be recaptured. As between the belligerent parties, the title to the property taken as a prize passes the moment there is no longer any hope of recovery; 2 Burr. 683. See INFRA PRÆSIDIA; JUS POSTLIMINII; BOOTY; PRIZE.

SPINSTER. An addition given, in legal writings, to a woman who never was married. Lovelace, Wills, 269. So called because she was supposed to be occupied in spinning.

SPIRITUAL CORPORATIONS. See ECCLESIASTICAL CORPORATIONS.

SPIRITUAL LORDS. The archbishops and bishops of the House of Peers. 2 Steph. Com. 328.

SPLITTING A CAUSE OF ACTION. The bringing an action for only a part of the cause of action. This is not permitted either at law or in equity. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4167.

SPOLIATION. In English Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a suit sued out in the spiritual court to recover for the fruits of the church or for the church itself. Fitzh. N. B. 85.

A waste of church property by an ecclesiastical person. 3 Bla. Com. 90.

In Torts. Destruction of a thing by the act of a stranger: as, the erasure or alteration of a writing by the act of a stranger is called spoliation. This has not the effect to destroy its character or legal effect. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 566.

In Admiralty Law. By spoliation is also understood the total destruction of a thing; as, the spoliation of papers by the captured party is generally regarded as a proof of guilt; but in America it is open to explanation, except in certain cases where there is a vehement presumption of bad faith; 2 Wheat. 227, 241; 1 Dods. Admr. 480, 486. See ALTERATION.

SPONSALIA, STIPULATIO SPONSALITIA (Lat.). A promise lawfully made between persons capable of marrying each other, that at some future time they will marry. See ESPOUSALS; Erksine, Inst. 1, 6, 3.

SPONSIO JUDICIALIS (Lat.) A judicial wager. This corresponded in the Roman law to our feigned issue.

SPONSIONS. In International Law. Agreements or engagements made by certain public officers, as generals or admirals, in time of war, either without authority or by exceeding the limits of authority under which they purport to be made.

Before these conventions can have any binding authority on the state, they must be confirmed by express or tacit ratification. The former is given in positive terms and in the usual forms; the latter is justly implied from the fact of acting under the agreement as if bound by it, and from any other circumstance from which an assent may be fairly presumed; Wheaton, Int. Law, pt. 3, c. 2, § 3; Grotius, de Jur. Bel. ac Pac. l. 2, c. 15, § 16; id. l. 3, c. 22, §§ 1–3; Vattel, Law of Nat. b. 2, c. 14, §§ 209–212; Wolff, Inst. § 1156.

SPONSOR. In Civil Law. He who intervenes for another voluntarily and without being requested. The engagement which he enters into is only accessory to the principal. See Dig. 17. 1. 18; Nov. 4. 1; Code de Comm. art. 158, 159; Code Nap. 1236; Wolff, Inst. § 1556.

SPOUSE BREACH. Adultery. Cowel.

SPRING. A fountain.

A natural source of water, of a definite and well-marked extent; 6 Ch. Div. 264 (C. A.). A natural chasm in which water has collected, and from which it either is lost by percolation, or rises in a defined channel; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457.

The owner of the soil has the exclusive right to use a spring arising on his grounds. When another has an easement or right to draw water from such a spring, acquired by grant or prescription, if the spring fails the easement ceases, but if it returns the right revives.

The owner of land on which there is a natural spring has a right to use it for domestic and culinary purposes and for watering his cattle, and he may make an aqueduct to another part of his land and use all the water required to keep the aqueduct in order or to keep the water pure; 15 Conn. 366. He may also use it for irrigation, provided the volume be not materially decreased; Ang. Waterc. 34. See 1 Root, 535: 9 Conn. 291; 2 Watts, 327; 2 Hill, So. C. 634; Coxe, N. J. 460; 2 D. & B. 50; 8 Mass. 106; 13 id. 420; 3 Pick. 269; 8 id. 136; 8 Me. 253.

The owner of the spring cannot lawfully turn the current or give it a new direction. He is bound to let it enter the inferior estate on the same level it has been accustomed to, and at the same place, for every man is entitled to a stream of water flowing through his land without diminution or alteration; 6 East, 206; 2 Conn. 584. See 3 Rawle, 84; 12 Wend. 330; 10 Conn. 213; 14 Vt. 239.

Where one conveyed a spring or well to be enjoyed without interruption, and afterwards conveyed contiguous property to a railway company whose works drained the water from the land before it reached the spring, on an action for breach of agreement: held, that the grantor had only conveyed the flow of the water after it had reached the spring, and therefore there was no breach; 41 L. T. N. S. 458 (C. A.). See 15 L. J. N. S. Ex. 315. Where the value of land was enhanced by a spring, it was held ratable for taxation at such improved value; 1 M. & S. 503. See Coul. & F. Waters.

The owner of the superior inheritance, or of the land on which there is a spring, has no right to deprive the owner of the estate below him; 5 Pick. 175; 3 Harr. & J. 231; 12 Vt. 178; 13 Conn. 303; 4 Ill. 492; nor can he detain the water unreasonably; 17 Johns. 306; 2 B. & C. 910. See 1 Dall. 211; 3 Rawle, 256; 13 N. H. 360; POOL; STAGNUM; BACK-WATER; IRRIGATION; MILL; RAIN WATER; SUBTERRANEAN WATER; WATER-COURSE.

SPRING-BRANCH. A branch of a stream flowing from a spring. 12 Gratt. 196.

SPRINGING USE. A use limited to arise on a future event where no preceding use is limited, and which does not take effect in derogation of any other interest than that which results to the grantor or remains in him in the mean time. Gilbert, Uses, Sugden ed. 153, n.; 2 Crabb, R. P. 498.

A future use, either vested or contingent, limited to arise without any preceding limitation. Cornish, Uses, 91.

A use to take effect at a time specified (an event certain) without any act upon the part of the beneficiary, and not in derogation of any preceding use.

It differs from a remainder in not requiring any other particular estate to sustain it than the use resulting to the one who creates it, intermediate between its creation and the subsequent taking effect of the springing use; Dy. 274; Pollexf. 65; 1 Ed. Ch. 34; 4 Drur. & W. 27; 1 Me. 271. It differs from an executory devise in that a devise is created by will, a use by deed; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 385, Butler's note; Wilson, Uses. It differs from a shifting use, though often confounded therewith. See, generally, 2 Washb. R. P. 281.

SPULZIE (spoliatio). In Scotch Law. The taking away movables without the consent of the owner or order of law. Stair, Inst. 96, § 16; Bell, Dict.

SPY. One on the watch to gain intelligence of transactions meant to be kept secret.

The term is mostly applied to an enemy who comes into the camp for the purpose of ascertaining its situation in order to make an attack upon it. The punishment for this crime is death. See articles of War; Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, § 179; Halleck, Int. Law.

SQUATTER. One who settles on the lands of others without any legal authority; this term is applied particularly to persons who settle on the public land. 3 Mart. La. N. S. 293. See PRE-EMPTION RIGHT.

STAB. To make a wound with a pointed instrument. A stab differs from a cut or a wound. Russ. & R. 356; Russ. Cr. 597; Bacon, Abr. Maihem (B).

STAGNUM (Lat.). A pool. It is said to consist of land and water; and therefore by the name of stagnum the water and the land may be passed. Co. Litt. 5.

STAKEHOLDER. A third person chosen by two or more persons to keep in deposit property the right or possession of which is contested between them, and to be delivered to the one who shall establish his right to it. Thus, each of them is considered as depositing the whole thing. This distinguishes this contract from that which takes place when two or more tenants in common deposit a thing with a bailee. Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 1, t. 7, s. 4; 1 Vern. 44, n. 1.

A person having in his hands money or other property claimed by several others is considered in equity as a stakeholder. 1 Vern. 144.

The duties of a stakeholder are to deliver the thing holden by him to the person entitled to it on demand. It is frequently questionable who is entitled to it. In case of an unlawful wager, although he may be justified in delivering the thing to the winner, by the express or implied consent of the loser; 8 Johns. 147; yet if before the event has happened he has been required by either party to give up the thing deposited with him by such party, he is bound so to deliver it; 3 Taunt. 377; 4 id. 492; or if, after the event has happened, the losing party give notice to the stakeholder not to pay the winner, a payment made to him afterwards will be made in his own wrong, and the party who deposited the money or thing may recover it from the stakeholder; 16 S. & R. 147; 7 Term, 536; 8 id. 575; 2 Marsh. 542. See 3 Penn. R. 468; 5 Wend. 250; 1 Bail. 486, 503; WAGERS.

A deposit of stakes by one of the parties in a match may be recovered back on demand from the stakeholder, as upon a void contract; 1 Q. B. D. 189; 5 App. Ca. 342; overruling 5 C. B. 818.

STALE DEMAND. A claim which has been for a long time undemanded: as, for example, where there has been a delay of twelve years unexplained. 3 Mas. C. C. 161.

STALLAGE (Sax. stal). The liberty or right of pitching or erecting stalls in fairs or markets, or the money paid for the same. Blount; Whart. Dict.; 6 Q. B. 31.

STALLARIUS (Lat.). In Saxon Law. The præfectus stabuli, now master of the horse (Sax. stalstabulum). Blount. Sometimes one who has a stall in a fair or market. Fl. lib. 4, c. 28, p. 13.

STAMP. An impression made by order of the government, on paper, which must be used in reducing certain contracts to writing, for the purpose of raising a revenue. See Stark. Ev.; 1 Phill. Ev. 444.

A paper bearing an impression or device authorized by law and adopted for attachment to some subject of duty or excise.

The term in American law is used often in distinction from stamped paper, which latter meaning, as well as that of the device or impression itself, is included in the broader signification of the word.

Stamps or stamped paper are prepared under the direction of officers of the government, and sold at a price equal to the duty or excise to be collected. The stamps are affixed and cancelled; and where stamped paper is used, one use obviously prevents a second use. The Internal Revenue acts of the United States of 1862 and subsequent years required stamps to be affixed to a great variety of subjects, under severe penalties in the way of fines, and also under penalty of invalidating written instruments and rendering them incapable of being produced in evidence. The only papers upon which stamps are now required are bank-checks, drafts, orders, or vouchers, for the payment of money, drawn on any bank, etc. Internal revenue stamps are required upon tobacco and various other articles.

Maryland has enacted a stamp law.

Instruments not duly stamped are not void or inadmissible in evidence, in the absence of a fraudulent intent; 39 Vt. 412; 53 Penn. 176; 26 Wis. 163; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 51; 47 N. Y. 467; 7 Am. Rep. 468; see 82 Penn. 280; in the absence of affirmative proof, a fraudulent intent will not be presumed; cases supra.

STAND. To abide by a thing; to submit to a decision; to comply with an agreement; to have validity: as, the judgment must stand.

STANDARD. In War. An ensign or flag used in war.

In Measures. A weight or measure of certain dimensions, to which all other weights and measures must correspond: as, a standard bushel. Also, the quality of certain metals, to which all others of the same kind ought to be made to conform: as standard gold, standard silver. See DOLLAR; EAGLE.

STANDING ASIDE JURORS. In order to mitigate the effect of the statute 33 Edw. I. which forbade the challenging of jurors by the crown excepting for cause shown, a rule of practice gradually arose of permitting the prosecution to direct jurors to stand aside until the whole panel was exhausted, without showing cause. The validity of this practice has been repeatedly upheld in England; 26 How. St. Tr. 1231.

In the United States this statute became a part of the fundamental law after the revolution; Baldw. C. C. 78, 82; 8 Phila. 440; 22 Penn. 94; 7 Watts, 585; and notwithstanding statutes of various states granting to the prosecution a number of peremptory challenges, the custom of standing aside has been preserved. This practice has been opposed where the statutes allowing peremptory challenges are in force, but where the number allowed is very small, it has heretofore been allowed to continue. See Thomp. & Mer. Juries, 147; 14 Cent. L. J. 402.

The practice applies in misdemeanors as well as felonies, although there is a peremptory right of challenge; 39 Leg. Int. 384.

STANDING MUTE. See MUTE; PEINE; FORTE ET DURE.

STANNARY COURTS (stannary,—from Lat. stannum, Cornish stean, tin,—a tin mine).

In English Law. Courts of record, in Devonshire and Cornwall, England, for the administration of justice among the tinners therein. They are of the same limited and exclusive nature as those of the counties palatine.

They are held before a judge called the vice-warden, in virtue of a privilege granted to the workers in the tin-mines, or stannaries, there, during the time of their working bona fide in the stannaries, to sue and be sued only in these their own courts, in all matters arising within the stannaries, except pleas of land, life, and member, that they may not be drawn from their business, which is highly profitable to the public, by atttending their law-suits in other courts.

By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, the plaintiff may choose between the stannary court and the county court of the district in which the cause of action arises; 3 Bla. Com. 80, 81.

STAPLE. In International Law. The right of staple, as exercised by a people upon foreign merchants, is defined to be that they may not allow them to set their mer-chandises and wares, to sale but in a certain place.

This practice is not in use in the United States. 1 Chitty, Com. Law, 103; Co. 4th Inst. 238; Bacon, Abr. Execution (B 1). See STATUTE STAPLE.

STAR-CHAMBER. See COURT OF STAR-CHAMBER.

STARE DECISIS (Lat.). To abide by, or adhere to, decided cases. Stare decisis et non quieta movere. It is a general maxim that when a point has been settled by decision, it forms a precedent which is not afterwards to be departed from. The doctrine of stare decisis is not always to be relied upon; for the courts find it necessary to overrule cases which have been decided contrary to principle. Many hundreds of such overruled cases may be found in the American and English reports. It should require very controlling considerations to induce any court to break down a former decision, and lay again the foundations of the law; 7 How. (Miss.) 569. And a court when asked to do so should consider how far its action would affect transactions entered into and acted upon, under the law as it exists; 11 Tex. 455. Where there have been a series of decisions by the supreme judicial tribunal of a state, the rule of stare decisis may usually be regarded as impregnable, except by legislative act; 29 Ind. 470. Especially is this the case where the law has become settled as a rule of property, and titles have become vested on the strength of it; 44 Mo. 206; and even an isolated decision will not be reversed when it has remained undisputed for a long time, and rights to land have been acquired under it; 31 Cal. 402; 22 Cal. 110. It has been said that the doctrine of stare decisis has greater or less force according to the nature of the question decided, those questions where the decisions do not constitute a business rule, e.g., as where personal liberty is involved, will be met only by the general considerations which favor certainty and stability in the law; but where a decision relates to the validity of certain modes of transacting business, and a change of decision must necessarily invalidate everything done in the mode prescribed by the former case, as in the manner of executing deeds or wills, the maxim becomes imperative, and no court is at liberty to change it; 15 Wisc. 691. The U. S. courts will follow the decisions of those of the several states; in interpreting state laws; but when the decisions of the state courts are unsettled and conflicting the rule does not apply; 1 Wall. 205; 5 Wall. 772. When titles to real estate depend on any compact between states, the rule of decision will not be drawn from either of the states; 11 Pet. 1; but where any principle of law is laid done by a state court regarding a sale of real property; 6 Wall. 723; the violation of a charter by a state corporation; 7 How. 198; the payment of taxes; 7 Wall. 71; the United States courts will follow it in analogous cases; 7 How. 738. In matters relating to the construction of treaties, constitutional provisions, or laws of the United States, the authority of the federal courts is paramount, while e converso in the construction of state constitutions and state laws, the decisions of the state courts are final within their jurisdiction; 23 Miss. 498; Wells, Res. Adj. & Stare Decisis, 583. See Cooley, Const. 57; Greenl. Overruled Cases; 1 Kent, 477; Livingston, Syst. of Pen. Law, 104. See Jenkins, Century, vi., for a list of curious aphorisms on this subject; AUTHORITIES; PRECEDENTS.

STARE IN JUDICIO (Lat.). To appear before a tribunal, either as plaintiff or defendant.

STATE (Lat. stare, to place, establish). A body politic, or society of men, united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage, by the joint efforts of their combined strength. Cooley, Const. Lim. 1. A self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defence of their rights and to do right and justice to foreigners. In this sense, the state means the whole people united into one body politic; and the state, and the people of the state, are equivalent expressions. 2 Dall. 425; 3 id. 93; 2 Wilson, Lect. 120; 1 Story, Const. § 361. So, frequently, are state and nation; 7 Wall. 720. See Morse, Citizenship. The positive or actual organization of the legislative or judicial powers: thus, the actual government of the state is designated by the name of the state: hence the expression, the state has passed such a law or prohibited such an act. The section of territory occupied by a state: as, the state of Pennsylvania.

One of the commonwealths which form the United States of America.

The constitution of the United States makes the following provisions in relation to the states. Art. 1, s. 9, § 5. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one state be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another. Art. 1, s. 10, § 1. No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex-post-facto law or law impairing the obligation of contracts; or grant any title of nobility. No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States, and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of congress. No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty on tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay. Amendt. xiv. § 1. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; § 4. Neither the United States nor any state shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void. Amendt. xv. § 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The District of Columbia and the territorial districts of the United States are not states within the meaning of the constitution and of the judiciary act, so as to enable a citizen thereof to sue a citizen of one of the states in the federal courts; 2 Cra. 445; 1 Wheat. 91; 15 C. L. J. 308 (U. S. D. C. Oreg).

The several states composing the United States are sovereign and independent in all things not surrendered to the national government by the constitution, and are considered, on general principles, by each other as foreign states: yet their mutual relations are rather those of domestic independence than of foreign alienation; 7 Cra. 481; 3 Wheat. 324.

In Society. That quality which belongs to a person in society, and which secures to and imposes upon him different rights and duties in consequence of the difference of that quality.

Although all men come from the hands of nature upon an equality, yet there are among them marked differences. The distinctions of the sexes, fathers and children, age and youth, etc., come from nature.

The civil or municipal laws of each people have added to these natural qualities distinctions which are purely civil and arbitrary, founded on the manners of the people or in the will of the legislature. Such are the differences which these laws have established between citizens and aliens, between magistrates and subjects, and between freemen and slaves, and those which exist in some countries between nobles and plebeians, which differences are either unknown or contrary to natural law.

Although these latter distinctions are more particularly subject to the civil or municipal law, because to it they owe their origin, it nevertheless extends its authority over the natural qualities, not to destroy or to weaken them, but to confirm them and to render them more inviolable by positive rules and by certain maxims. This union of the civil or municipal and natural law forms among men a third species of differences, which may be called mixed, because they participate of both, and derive their principles from nature and the perfection of the law: for example, infancy, or the privileges which belong to it, have their foundation in natural law; but the age and the term of these prerogatives are determined by the civil or municipal law.

Three sorts of different qualities which form the state or condition of men may, then, be distinguished: those which are purely natural, those purely civil, and those which are composed of the natural and civil or municipal law.

See 3 Bla. Com. 396; 1 Toullier, n. 170.

In Practice. To make known specifically; to explain particularly: as, to state an account or to show the different items in an account; to state the cause of action in a declaration.

STATING-PART OF A BILL. See BILL.

STATION. In Civil Law. A place where ships may ride in safety. Dig. 49. 12. 1. 13; 50. 15. 59.

STATU LIBERI (Lat.). In Louisiana. Slaves for a time, who had acquired the right of being free at a time to come, or on a condition which was not fulfilled, or in a certain event which had not happened, but who in the mean time remained in a state of slavery. La. Civ. Code, art. 37. See 3 La. 176; 6 id. 571; 4 Mart. La. 102; 7 id. 351; 8 id. 219. This is substantially the definition of the civil law. STATUS (Lat.). The condition of persons. The movement of progressive societies has been from status to contract; Maine, Anc. Law, 170. It also means estate, because it signifies the condition or circumstances in which the owner stands with regard to his property.

STATUTE. A law established by the act of the legislative power. An act of the legislature. The written will of the legislature, solemnly expressed according to the forms necessary to constitute it the law of the state.

This word is used to designate the written law in contradistinction to the unwritten law. See COMMON LAW.

Among the civilians, the term statute is generally applied to laws and regulations of every sort; every provision of law which ordains, permits, or prohibits anything is designated a statute, without considering from what source it arises. Sometimes the word is used in contradistinction from the imperial Roman law, which, by way of eminence, civilians call the common law.

A negative statute is one expressed in negative terms, and so controls the common law that it has no force in opposition to the statute. Bacon, Abr. Statute (G).

An affirmative statute is one which is enacted in affirmative terms.

Such a statute does not necessarily take away the common law; Co. 2d Inst. 200. If, for example, a statute without negative words declares that when certain requisites shall have been complied with, deeds shall have a certain effect as evidence, this does not prevent their being used in evidence, though the requisites have not been complied with, in the same manner they might have been before the statute was passed; 2 Caines, 169. Or a custom; 6 Cl. & F. 41. Nor does such an affirmative statute repeal a precedent statute if the two can both be given effect: Dwarris, Stat. 474. The distinction between negative and affirmative statutes has been considered inaccurate; 13 Q. B. 33.

A declaratory statute is one which is passed in order to put an end to a doubt as to what is the common law or the meaning of another statute, and which declares what it is and ever has been.

Penal statutes are those which command or prohibit a thing under a certain penalty. Bacon, Abr. A statute affixing a penalty to an act, though it does not in words prohibit it, thereby makes it illegal; 14 Johns. 273; 1 Binn. 110; 37 E. L. & E. 475; 14 N. H. 294; 4 Iowa, 490; 7 Ind. 77. See, as to the construction of penal statutes, 2 Cr. L. Mag. Jan. 81.

A perpetual statute is one for the continuance of which there is no limited time, although it be not expressly declared to be so.

If a statute which did not itself contain any limitation is to be governed by another which is temporary only, the former will also be temporary and dependent upon the existence of the latter. Bacon, Abr. Statute (D).

Private statutes or acts are those of which the judges will not take notice without pleading; such as concern only a particular species or person.

Private statutes may be rendered public by being so declared by the legislature; 1 Bla. Com. 85; 4 Co. 76. And see 1 Kent, 459. Private statutes will not bind strangers; though they should contain any saving of their rights. A general saving clause used to be inserted in all private bills; but it is settled that, even if such saving clause be omitted, the act will bind none but the parties.

Public statutes are those of which the courts will take judicial notice without pleading or proof.

They are either general or local,—that is, have operation throughout the state at large, or within a particular locality. It is not easy to say what degree of limitation will render an act local. Thus, it has been held that a public act relating to one county only is not local within the meaning of a constitutional provision which forbids enactments of local bills embracing more than one subject; 5 N. Y. 285; 2 Sandf. 355.

A remedial statute is one made to supply such defects and abridge such superfluities in the common law as may have been discovered. 1 Bla. Com. 86.

These remedial statutes are themselves divided into enlarging statutes, by which the common law is made more comprehensive and extended than it was before, and into restraining statutes, by which it is narrowed down to that which is just and proper. The term remedial statute is also applied to those acts which give the party injured a remedy; and in some cases such statutes are penal; Esp. Pen. Act. 1.

A temporary statute is one which is limited in its duration at the time of its enactment.

It continues in force until the time of its limitation has expired, unless sooner repealed. A statute which by reason of its nature has only a single and temporary operation—e. g. an appropriation bill—is also called a temporary statute.

The most ancient English statute extant is Magna Charta. Formerly the statutes enacted after the beginning of the reign of Edw. III. were called Nova Statuta, or new statutes, to distinguish them from the ancient statutes.

There is also a distinction in England between general and special statutes. The former affect the whole community, or large and important sections, the interest of which may be identical with those of the whole body. Special statutes relate to private interests, and deal with the affairs of persons, places, classes, etc., which are not of a public character. Wilb. Stat. 218.

As to mandatory and directory statutes, see 2 Ky. L. Rep. 166.

It is a general rule that when the provision of a statute is general, everything which is necessary to make such provision effectual is supplied by the common law; Co. Litt. 235; Co. 2d Inst. 222; and when a power is given by statute, everything necessary for making it effectual is given by implication: quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest; 12 Co. 130.

The provisions of a statute cannot be evaded by any shift or contrivance; 2 B. & C. 655. Whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance; 7 Cl. & F. 540.

As to the doctrine of the interpretation of statutes, see CONSTRUCTION; 2 Cr. L. Mag. 1.

The mode of enacting laws in the United States is regulated by the constitution of the Union and of the several states respectively. The advantage of having a law officer, or board of officers, to revise bills and amendments of bills during their progress through the legislature, has been somewhat discussed. It is urged that legislators often have no general knowledge of law, are ignorant or careless of the extent to which a proposed law may affect previous statutes on the same or collateral subjects; amendments, too, are affixed without carefully harmonizing them with the bill amended; and special provisions are resorted to when a more general and simple remedy should be applied. Reports of Eng. Stat. Law Com. 1856, 1857; Street, Council of Revision; 5 Rep. Am. Bar Asso.

Much interesting discussion has arisen on the question whether a statute which appears to be contrary to the laws of God and nature, and to right reason, is void. Earlier dicta in the affirmative (see 8 Co. *118 a; 12 Mod. 687) are not now considered to be law; L. R. 6 C. P. 582. See Dwarris, Stat. 482.

In the United States, a statute which contravenes a provision of the constitution of the state by whose legislature it was enacted, or of the constitution of the United States, is in so far void. See CONSTITUTIONAL. The presumption, however, is that every state statute the object and provision of which are among the acknowledged powers of legislation is valid and constitutional; and such presumption is not to be overcome unless the contrary is clearly demonstrated; 6 Cra. 87; 1 Cow. 564; 7 N. Y. 109. Where a part only of a statute is unconstitutional, the rest is not void if it can stand by itself; 1 Gray, 1.

By the common law, statutes took effect by relation back to the first day of the session at which they were enacted; 4 Term, 660. The injustice which this rule often worked led to the statute of 33 Geo. III. c. 13, which declared that, except when otherwise provided, statutes should take effect from the day of obtaining the royal assent, unless otherwise ordered therein. This rule, however, does not obviate the hardship of sometimes holding men responsible under a law before its promulgation. By the Code Napoléon, a law takes effect in each department of the empire as many days after its promulgation in that department as there are distances of twenty leagues between the seat of government and the place of promulgation. The general rule in America is, that an act takes effect from the time when the formalities of enactment are actually complete, unless it is ordered otherwise or there is some constitutional or statutory rule on the subject; Cooley, Const. Lim. 190; 7 Wheat. 164. As to retroactive statutes, see EX POST FACTO.

A statute is not to be deemed repealed merely by the enactment of another statute on the same subject. There must be a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law and the old, to work a repeal by implication; and even then the old law is repealed only to the extent of such repugnancy; 16 Pet. 342. This rule is supported by a vast variety of cases. There is, however, a qualification to be observed in the case of a revised law. When the new statute is in effect a revision of the old, it may be treated as superseding the former, though not expressly so declared; 7 Mass. 140; 12 id. 537, 545; 1 Pick. 43, 154; 9 id. 97; 31 Me. 34; 42 id. 53; 16 Barb. 15; 5 E. L. & E. 588; 37 N. H. 295; 30 Vt. 344; 8 Tex. 62; 14 Ill. 334; 6 B. Monr. 146. But compare 9 Ind. 337; 10 id. 566. A mere change of phraseology in the revision does not, however, necessarily imply a change in the law; 21 Wend. 316; 7 Barb. 191; 33 N. H. 246; 6 Tex. 34.

Where a new statute expressly repeals the former statute, and the new and the repeal of the old are to take effect at the same time, a provision in the old statute which is embodied in the new is deemed to have continued in force without suspension; 3 Wisc. 667; 15 Ill. 595. But it has been held that where the new law does not go into effect until a time subsequent to that at which the repeal takes effect, such a provision is to be deemed repealed meantime; 12 La. An. 593. But see 1 Pick. 33.

When one statute is repealed by another, the unqualified repeal of the repealing statute revives the original; 21 Pick. 492; 1 Gray, 163; 7 W. & S. 263; 1 Ga. 32. This is the common-law rule; but the contrary is provided by statute in some of the United States. Where a repealing act is unconstitutional, the repeal clause is nevertheless operative; 11 Ind. 489; contra, 26 Ala. 165; 3 Gray, 476; 14 Mich. 276.

It is not to be presumed in the courts of any state that statutes which have been enacted in that state have also been enacted in other states. The courts assume that the common law still prevails, unless it is shown to have been modified. 22 Barb. 118; contra, where the law of the forum has been changed; 70 Penn. 252. See FOREIGN LAWS.

Some laws, such as charters, or other statutes granting franchises, if accepted or acted upon by the persons concerned, acquire some of the qualities of a contract between them and the state; 4 Wheat. 518; 6 Cra. 87; 10 How. 190, 218, 224, 511.

As to the titles of statutes, see TITLES.

STATUTE MERCHANT. A security entered before the mayor of London, or some chief warden of a city, in pursuance of 13 Ed. I. stat. 3, c. 1, whereby the lands of the debtor are conveyed to the creditor till out of the rents and profits of them his debt may be satisfied. Cruise, Dig. t. 14, s. 7; 2 Bla. Com. 160.

STATUTE STAPLE. The statute of the staple, 27 Ed. III. stat. 2, confined the sale of all commodities to be exported to certain towns in England, called estaple or staple, where foreigners might resort. It authorized a security for money, commonly called statute staple, to be taken by traders for the benefit of commerce; the mayor of the place is entitled to take a recognizance of a debt in proper form, which has the effect to convey the lands of the debtor to the creditor till out of the rents and profits of them he may be satisfied. 2 Bla. Com. 160; Cruise, Dig. tit. 14, s. 10; 2 Rolle, Abr. 446; Bacon, Abr. Execution (B 1); Co. 4th Inst. 238.

STATUTI (Lat). In Roman Law. Those advocates whose names were inscribed in the registers of matriculation, and formed a part of the college of advocates. The number of advocates of this class was limited. They were distinguished from the supernumeraries from the time of Constantine to Justinian. See Calvinus, Lex.

STAY OF EXECUTION. In Practice. A term during which no execution can issue on a judgment.

It is either conventional, when the parties agree that no execution shall issue for a certain period, or it is granted by law, usually on condition of entering bail or security for the money.

An execution issued before the expiration of the stay is irregular and will be set aside; and the plaintiff in such case may be liable to an action for damages. What is said above refers to civil cases.

In criminal cases, when a woman is capitally convicted and she is proved to be enceinte there shall be a stay of execution till after her delivery. See PREGNANCY.

A statute which authorizes stay of execution for an unreasonable or indefinite period, on judgments rendered on pre-existing contracts, is void; 41 Penn. 441; 31 Mo. 205; a law permitting a year's stay upon judgments where security is given has been held invalid; 6 Heisk. 93; s. c. 19 Am. Rep. 593. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 357.

STAYING PROCEEDINGS. The suspension of an action.

Proceedings are stayed absolutely or conditionally.

They are peremptorily stayed when the plaintiff is wholly incapacitated from suing: as, for example, when the plaintiff is not the holder, nor beneficially interested in a bill on which he has brought his action; 2 Cr. & M. 416; 3 Chitty, Pr. 628; or when the plaintiff admits in writing that he has no cause of action; 3 Chitty, Pr. 370, 630; or when an action is brought contrary to good faith; Tidd, Pr. 515, 529, 1134; 3 Chitty, Pr. 633.

Proceedings are sometimes stayed until some order of the court shall have been complied with; as, when the plaintiff resides in a foreign country or in another state, or is insolvent, and he has been ruled to give security for costs, the proceedings are stayed until such security shall be given; 3 Chitty, Pr. 633, 635; or until the payment of costs in a former action; 1 Chitty, Bail, 195.

STEALING. This term imports, ex vi termini, nearly the same as larceny; but in common parlance it does not always import a felony; as, for example, you stole an acre of my land.

In slander cases, it seems that the term stealing takes its complexion from the subject-matter to which it is applied, and will be considered as intended of a felonious stealing, if a felony could have been committed of such subject-matter; 12 Johns. 239; 3 Binn. 546.

STEELBOW GOODS. Instruments of husbandry, cattle, corn, etc., delivered by a landlord to his tenant on condition that the like number of goods of like quality should be returned on expiration of the lease. Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 285, § 81.

STELLIONATE. In Civil Law. A name given generally to all species of frauds committed in making contracts.

This word is said to be derived from the Latin stellio, a kind of lizard remarkable for its cunning and the change of its color, because those guilty of frauds used every art and cunning to conceal them. But more particularly it was the crime of a person who fraudulently assigned, sold, or engaged the thing which he had before assigned, sold, or engaged to another, unknown to the person with whom he was dealing. Dig. 47. 20. 3; Code 9. 34. 1; Merlin, Répert.; La. Civ. Code, art. 2069; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 426.

STENOGRAPHER. One whose business it is to write in short-hand, by using abbreviations or characters for whole words.

The depositions of witnesses taken in short-hand, and afterwards reduced to long-hand, will be suppressed, if not read to and signed by the witness after they are written out, though the witness's subsequent attendance for the purpose could not be procured; 9 Fed. Rep. 754; but see contra, 79 Ill. 576, where it is held that the transcript of evidence taken in short-hand is admissible, where the stenographer testifies that he wrote up the testimony, and that the transcript is correct; that the witnesses were sworn and testified as therein stated. See also 43 Mich. 257. Where it is sought to impeach a witness's testimony by proving his testimony at a former trial, the stenographer is not the only witness who may be called, but any one who heard the testimony may be; 65 Me. 466.

In Pennsylvania, where a stenographer is appointed under the provisions of an act of legislature authorizing the appointment of stenographers in the several courts of the commonwealth, his note of a bill of exceptions to the admission or rejection of evidence is sufficient; and it is not essential that the bill should be actually sealed by the judge; 88 Penn. 217.

The charges of a stenographer are not taxable for costs in a suit in equity; 7 Fed. Rep. 42; but the agreement of the parties may make them taxable costs, though not so by statute; 1 Bingh. 345. See 10 Wash. L. Rep. 7; 61 Ill. 271; 44 Mich. 438.

STEP-DAUGHTER. The daughter of one's wife by a former husband, or of one's husband by a former wife.

STEP-FATHER. The husband of one's mother by virtue of a marriage subsequent to that of which the person spoken of is the offspring.

STEP-MOTHER. The wife of one's father by virtue of a marriage subsequent to that of which the person spoken of is the offspring.

STEP-SON. The son of one's wife by a former husband, or of one's husband by a former wife.

STERE. A French measure of solidity, used in measuring wood. It is a cubic metre. See MEASURE.

STERILITY. Barrenness; incapacity to produce a child. It is curable and incurable: when of the latter kind at the time of the marriage, and arising from impotency, it is a good cause for dissolving a marriage. 1 Fodéré, Méd. Lég. § 254. See IMPOTENCY.

STERLING. Current money of Great Britain, but anciently a small coin worth about one penny, and so called, as some suppose, because it was stamped with the figure of a small star, or, as others suppose, because it was first stamped in England in the reign of king John by merchants from Germany called Esterlings. Pounds sterling originally signified so many pounds in weight of these coins. Thus, we find in Matthew Paris, A. D. 1242, the expression Accepit a rege pro stipendio tredecim libras esterlingorum. The secondary or derived sense is a certain value in current money, whether in coins or other currency. Lowndes, 14; Watts, Gloss. Sterling.

STET PROCESSUS (Lat.). In Practice. An order made, upon proper cause shown, that the process remain stationary. As, where a defendant having become insolvent would, by moving judgment in the case of nonsuit, compel a plaintiff to proceed, the court will, on an affidavit of the fact of insolvency, award a stet processus. See 7 Taunt. 180; 1 Chitty, Bail, 738; 10 Wentw. Pl. 43.

STEVEDORE. A person employed in loading and unloading vessels. He has no maritime lien on the ship for wages; Dunlap, Adm. Pract. 98.

STEWARD OF ALL ENGLAND. In Old English Law. An officer who was invested with various powers; among others, to preside on the trial of peers.

STEWS. Places formerly permitted in England to women of professed lewdness, who for hire would prostitute their bodies to all comers.

These places were so called because the dissolute persons who visited them prepared themselves by bathing,—the word stews being derived from the old French estuves, stove, or hot bath. Co. 3d Inst. 205.

STILLICIDIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The rain-water that falls from the roof or eaves of a house by scattered drops. When it is gathered into a spout, it is called flumen.

Without the constitution of one or other of these servitudes, no proprietor can build so as to throw the rain that falls from his house directly on his neighbor's grounds; for it is a restriction upon all property, nemo potest immittere in alienum; and he who in building breaks through that restraint truly builds on another man's property; because to whomsoever the area belongs, to him also belongs whatever is above it; cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum. 3 Burge, Confl. of Laws, 405. See SERVITUS; Inst. 3. 2. 1; Dig. 8. 2. 2.

STINT. The proportionable part of a man's cattle which he may keep upon the common. The general rule is that the commoner shall not turn more cattle upon the common than are sufficient to manure and stock the land to which his right of common is annexed. There may be such a thing as common without stint or number; but this is seldom granted, and a grantee cannot grant it over. 3 Bla. Com. 239; 1 Ld. Raym. 407.

STIPES. Stock; source of descent or title. Ainsworth, Dict.; 2 Bla. Com. 209.

STIPULATIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. A contract made in the following manner: viz., the person to whom the promise was to be made proposed a question to him from whom it was to proceed, fully expressing the nature and extent of the engagement; and, the question so proposed being answered in the affirmative, the obligation was complete.

It was essentially necessary that both parties should speak (so that a dumb man could not enter into a stipulation), that the person making the promise should answer conformably to the specific question proposed without any material interval of time, and with the intention of contracting an obligation. No consideration was required.

STIPULATION. A material article in an agreement.

The term appears to have derived its meaning from the use of stipulatio above given; though it is applied more correctly and more conformably to its original meaning to denote the insisting upon and requiring any particular engagement. 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 19.

In Admiralty Practice. A recognizance of certain persons (called in the old law fide jussors) in the nature of bail for the appearance of a defendant. 3 Bla. Com. 108.

These stipulations are of three sorts: namely, judicatum solvi, by which the party is absolutely bound to pay such sum as may be adjudged by the court; de judicio sisti, by which he is bound to appear from time to time during the pendency of the suit, and to abide the sentence; de rato, or de rato, by which he engages to ratify the acts of his proctor: this stipulation is not usual in the admiralty courts of the United States.

The securities are taken in the following manner: namely, cautio fide jussoria, by sureties; pignoratitia, by deposit; juratoria, by oath: this security is given when the party is too poor to find sureties, at the discretion of the court; nuda promissoria, by bare promise: this security is unknown in the admiralty courts of the United States. Hall, Adm. Pr. 12; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 150. See 17 Am. Jur. 51.

STIRPES (Lat.). Descents. The root-stem, or stock of a tree. Figuratively, it signifies in law that person from whom a family is descended, and also the kindred or family. 2 Bla. Com.

STOCK. In Mercantile Law. The capital of a merchant, tradesman, or other person, including his merchandise, money, and credits. The goods and wares he has for sale and traffic.

In Corporation Law. A right to partake, according to the amount of the party's subscription, of the surplus profits obtained from the use and disposal of the capital stock of the company. Ang. & A. Corp. § 557.

The capital stock of a corporation is that money or property which is put into a fund by those who, by subscription therefore become members of the corporate body. Per Folger, J. in 75 N. Y. 211. The phrase capital stock has been objected to, as the two words have separate meanings, capital being the sum subscribed and paid into the company, and stock being the thing which the subscriber receives for what he pays in; Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 579; see 23 N. Y. 192. The interest which each person has in the corporation is termed a share, which is the right to participate in the profits of the corporation, and, upon its dissolution, in the division of its assets. See 75 N. Y. 211. "Capital stock" has been held to mean the amount contributed by the shareholders, and not the property of the company; 23 N. J. L. 195.

The number of shares depends upon the statutory regulations, or in their absence the agreement of the parties forming the corporation; 45 Me. 524. Shares may be arranged in classes, one class being preferred to another in the distribution of profits; 78 N. Y. 159. See infra. Voting may be restricted to a certain class.

The ownership of shares is usually attested by a certificate issued under the corporate seal; and when a new transfer is effected, such certificate is surrendered and cancelled, and a new one is issued to the transferee. But a person may be the owner of shares in a corporation without holding such certificate; 102 Mass. 261; and, strictly speaking, a company need not issue any certificates or muniments of title, if not required to do so by law or its charter; 24 Me. 256. The presence of a party's name on the stock books of the company is evidence of his ownership of shares; 73 Penn. 59. The possession of a corporate certificate of stock, duly issued, is a continuing affirmation of ownership of the stock by the person named therein; 11 Wall. 369; which generally creates an estoppel against the company in favor of the holder; 57 N. Y. 616; though in England it is said to be merely a solemn affirmation that the specified amount of stock stands on the stock books in the name of the person specified in the certificate; L. R. 7 H. L. 496.

The stock of a national bank is said to be a species of chose in action, or an equitable interest which the shareholder possesses, and which he can enforce against the corporation. See 53 N. Y. 161, 237. "If a share in a bank is not a chose in action, it is in the nature of a chose in action, and is personal property;" per Shaw, C. J., in 12 Metc. 421. Shares are not, strictly speaking, chattels; they bear a greater resemblance to choses in action; or, in other words, they are merely evidence of property; Ang. & A. Corp. § 560. They are now universally considered to be personal property; Ang. & A. Corp. § 557. They are not a debt; Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 590. In Louisiana, stock is property and not a credit; 10 Fed. Rep. 330.

Shares of stock are non-negotiable instruments, but through the doctrine of estoppel, stock certificates, with a power to transfer them, can be dealt in with the same immunity as bills and notes; Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 596; and the same writer is of opinion that the time has come for the court to receive evidence of the general usage of the business world, so as to raise stock certificates to the dignity of negotiable instruments; id. 597; but see 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 322, where evidence of such a usage was rejected; see, also, 38 Penn. 98. Professor Ames says (2 Bills & Notes, 784): "Whether the custom of merchants will ever lead the courts to give those instruments (certificates of stock) the quality of negotiability may be an open question; but that they have not done so is clear." See 28 N. Y. 600; 86 Penn. 83; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 163, n. It has been said, however, that a certificate of stock accompanied by an assignment and a power of attorney in blank has a species of negotiability well recognized in commercial transactions and judicial decisions; id. (C. C. U. S., per Shipley, Circ. J.) And in 11 Wall. 369, the court said that certificates, "although neither in form or character negotiable paper, approximate it as nearly as practicable."

It is now settled in England that shares in a joint-stock company are not goods, wares and merchandise within the Statute of Frauds; 11 A. & E. 205; it has been otherwise decided in Massachusetts; 9 Pick. 9. See, also, 128 Mass. 388.

Transfer. A certificate of stock is transferable by a blank indorsement which may be filled up by the transferee, and by writing an assignment and power of attorney, usually under seal, over the signature indorsed; Ang. & A. Corp. § 564; 34 N. Y. 30; 50 Penn. 67? A transfer in this mode is deemed sufficient in some jurisdictions to pass the legal title to the stock subject to the claims of the company upon the registered stockholders; 2 Ames, B. & N. 784; 76 N. Y. 365; 10 Ala. 82; in other cases such a transfer has been held to give the holder merely an equitable interest; 3 How. 483; 5 Biss. 181. Prof. Ames is of opinion that the true view is that such a transfer does not pass the legal title, but that it passes the equitable interest, coupled with an irrevocable power of attorney to acquire the legal title; 2 Ames, B. & N. 784. This irrevocable power may, in some cases, by the doctrine of estoppel be acquired by the delivery of the certificate from one who has no such power himself; 48 Cal. 99; 14 Nev. 362; 86 Penn. 80; 46 N. Y. 325; 10 Reporter, 125. In England the courts refuse to sanction the transfer of shares by deed executed in blank; 4 De G. & J. 559.

In case of the sale of the stock this power of attorney becomes irrevocable; 14 Md. 299; but if such a power of attorney is forged or is made by a person not competent to make it, the corporation is liable for allowing the transfer; 14 Md. 299; see 86 Penn. 80; 123 Mass. 110. A company may refuse to allow a transfer until satisfied of the party's right to make it; L. R. 9 Eq. 181; 52 Penn. 232; 5 S. C. 379.

A transferee of stock in a company does not acquire a right thereto by estoppel, as between himself and the company, by the mere fact that the company allows the registration of the transfer and the issue of the certificate. The company is under no duty as to him, to make any inquiry of the transferrer before issuing the certificate; 20 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 159 (Engl. Ct. of App.). He takes his title from the vendor, not from the company. But when a company has issued a new certificate upon a forged transfer, which a bona fide purchaser subsequently buys, the company is liable to the purchaser. So is the company liable where the purchaser of stock buys directly from the corporation stock which is fraudulently issued by its authorized officers.

See 20 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 168.

Dividends. Where certificates of stock were bequeathed, the income to be paid to a life-tenant, with remainder to his children, etc., a dividend in certificates of indebtedness in addition to a cash dividend was considered income; 14 C. L. J. 214 (S. C. of Ga.). Where a company increased its capital by offering its shareholders the option to subscribe new stock at par, and the executors of an estate holding some of the stock in trust for one for life with remainder over, sold this option, and it appeared that a slight depreciation followed the issue of the new stock, it was held that the sum realized, though more than enough to make up this depreciation, was capital and not income; 14 C. L. J. 253 (S. C. of Pa.). Where a gas company sold a part of its property and divided the proceeds by way of a dividend among the stockholders, this was held capital and not income as between a life-tenant and remainder-man of stock held in trust; 14 C. L. J. 273 (S. C. of Pa.). For the earlier cases, see DIVIDENDS.

Preferred stock entitles the holder to a priority in the dividends or earnings. A late writer (Dos Passos, Stock Brokers) considers the following points as settled in reference to this kind of shares. (1) Generally a corporation has no power to issue preferred shares unless the power is given it by the charter or general law, and even when preferred shares are authorized to be issued in the first instance, yet, if the company is organized upon the basis of common stock, preferred stock cannot be issued afterwards without the consent of the common stockholders. See 78 N. Y. 159; 2 Dr. & Sm. 514. (2) The latter may be estopped from questioning the issuance and validity. See id.; 31 Mich. 76. (3) The holders of preferred stock may upon the making of net earnings compel the corporation to account for and pay over such earnings. See 84 N. Y. 157. (4) The form of preferred stock in some cases entitles the holder to have the arrears of one year made up from the net earnings of another. See 84 N. Y. 157; 31 Mich. 76; 8 R. I. 359. (5) Arrears of net earnings due the holders of such stock, unlike declared dividends, pass to the transferee on the ordinary transfer of shares. See 24 Hun, 360. (6) Notwithstanding the existence of preferred stock, a corporation has the right subsequently to create bonds and mortgages, although the effect of the creation of such encumbrances will be to diminish the profits accruing to the preferred stock. See 22 Wall. 137; 45 N. Y. 468; 19 Md. 177. There seems to be a doubt as to the extent of discretion of the directors in regard to dividends and as to the meaning of "net earnings" and "net profits," as generally used in preference to certificates. See 99 U. S. 402.

Legislative power to issue preferred stock may be granted subsequently to the organization of the corporation; 10 Bush, 69; 35 Vt. 536. Its issue is valid if agreed to by all the stockholders; 1 Hun, 655. It has been held that where the charter number of shares of common stock were not issued, the residue could be made up of preferred shares; 43 Ga. 13; but see 2 Dr. & Sm. 514.

Preferred stockholders are entitled to preference only out of actual net profits; 31 Mich. 76; 8 R. I. 310. As to capital they stand in the same position as common stockholders; L. R. 5 Eq. 510; 6 Ch. Div. 511; unless a preference in the division of capital has been created; L. R. 20 Eq. 59. See 33 N. J. Eq. 181, where this was done by statute. Any agreement to pay dividends out of capital would be void; 63 Penn. 126.

The subject is fully treated by Mr. Lawson in 20 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 633.

As to deferred stock, see 39 Leg. Int. 98; (S. C. of Pa.).

See, generally, Lewis, Stocks; Biddle, Stock Brokers; Thomps. Liab. of Stockh.

English Law. In reference to the investment of money, the term "stock" implies those sums of money contributed towards raising a fund whereby certain objects, as of trade and commerce, may be effected. It is also employed to denote the moneys advanced to government, which constitute a part of the national debt, whereupon a certain amount of interest is payable. Since the introduction of the system of borrowing upon interminable annuities, the meaning of the word "stock" has become gradually changed; and, instead of signifying the security upon which loans are advanced, it has for a long time signified the principal of the loans themselves. In this latter sense we speak of the sale, purchase, and transfer of stock; Moz. & W. See Cavanagh, Money Securities.

Descents. A metaphorical expression which designates in the genealogy of a family the person from whom others are descended: those persons who have so descended are called branches. See 1 Roper, Leg. 103; 2 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 307; BRANCH; DESCENT; LINE; STIRPES.

STOCK-BROKER. See BROKER; Lewis, Stocks; Biddle, Stock Brokers; Dos Passos, Stock Brokers; 2 So. L. R. N. S. 321.

STOCK-EXCHANGE. A building or room in which stock-brokers meet to transact their business of purchasing or selling stocks.

A voluntary association (usually unincorporated) of persons who, for convenience in the transaction of business with each other, have associated themselves to provide a common place for the transaction of their business. See Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, etc., 14; 2 Brewst. 571; 2 Daly, 329. It is usually not a corporation, and in such case it is not a partnership. In the absence of a statute its real estate is held by all the members in the same way as partnership real estate. At common law, all the members had to be joined in a suit; Dicey, Parties, 170; 44 Conn. 259; though actions have been sustained against the exchange as a body; 2 Brewst. 571; 9 W. N. C. (Pa.) 441.

The members may make such reasonable regulations for the government of the body as they may think best; see 24 Barb. 570; such rules bind the members assenting to them; 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 162; but their personal assent must appear; 16 N. Y. 112; it may be inferred from circumstances, as from their admissions and acting as members; L. R. 5 Eq. 63; 25 Mo. 593; and a member is bound by a by-law passed during his membership, whether he votes for it or not; 8 W. N. C. (Pa.) 464. It is said that the courts will prevent the interference with a member's rights in an unincorporated association where the latter is acting under a by-law which is unreasonable or contrary to public policy: Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 36; 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 162; 47 Wisc. 670; but see 80 Ill. 134.

Stock Exchange, seat in. Members of a stock exchange are entitled to what is known as a seat. Seats are held subject to the rules of the exchange. They are a species of incorporeal property—a personal, individual right to exercise a certain calling in a certain place, but without the attributes of descendibility or assignability, which are characteristic of other species of property; Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, etc., 87. There has been much controversy as to whether a seat can be reached by an execution. A late writer considers the following as settled: "1. In the disposition of a seat or the proceeds thereof, the members of the exchange will be preferred to outside creditors. 2. The seat is not the subject of seizure and sale on attachment and execution. 3. The proceeds of the seat, in the hands of the exchange, are capable of being reached, after members' claims have been satisfied, to the same extent and in the same manner as any other money or property of a debtor. 4. A person owning a seat in the exchange can be compelled, by proceedings subsequent to execution, or under the direction of a receiver, to sell his seat to a person acceptable to the exchange, and devote the proceeds to the satisfaction of his judgment debts;" Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, etc., 96. See 5 W. N. C. (Pa.) 36; 94 U. S. 525; 20 Alb. L. J. 414; 9 Reporter, 805.

A regular register of all the transactions is kept by an officer of the association, and questions arising between the members are generally decided by an arbitration committee. The official record of sales is the best evidence of the price of any stock on any particular day. The stocks dealt in at the sessions of the board are those which are placed on the list by a regular vote of the association; and when it is proposed to add a stock to the list, a committee is appointed to examine into the matter, and the board is generally guided by the report of such committee.

STOCKHOLDERS. At common law the members of a corporation are not liable for the debts of a corporation; 10 Wall. 575; 24 Cal. 540; Thomp. Liab. of Stockh. § 4. But statutes have been passed in many states by which they are made liable under certain circumstances. These statutes are too various to be treated here. They may be made liable in equity when they have assets of the corporation which they ought not to retain. So they may be liable when they have subscribed money to the capital stock of the corporation which they have not paid in. The capital stock in such cases is usually said to be a trust fund for the benefit of creditors; 91 U. S. 56. The cases in which this doctrine has most frequently been applied have arisen out of suits brought to compel stockholders to pay over the amounts unpaid upon their stock subscriptions.

The original holder of stock in a corporation is liable for unpaid instalments of stock without an express promise to pay, and a contract between him and the corporation or its agent limiting his liability is void as to creditors or the assignee in bankruptcy of the corporation. Representations made to the stockholder by an agent of the corporation as to the non-assessability of stock beyond a certain percentage of its par value, constitute no defence to an action against the stockholder to enforce payment of the amount subscribed. The legal effect of the word "non-assessable" in the certificate is at most a stipulation against further assessments after the face value of the stock is paid; 91 U. S. 45. The transferee of stock, when the transfer was duly registered, is liable in the same way upon his implied promise; 91 U. S. 65. So where the holder of shares had procured a transfer to his name, he was held liable for unpaid instalments, though he held the stock only as collateral security for debts due him by the transferror of the stock; 96 U. S. 328. Where certificates of stock had on their face a condition that the residue of eighty per cent. unpaid on the stock was to be paid on the call of the directors, when ordered by a vote of a majority of the stockholders, it was held that the absence of a call was no defence to an action for the residue by an assignee of the corporation in bankruptcy; 3 Biss. 417. Agreements of members among themselves that stock shall be considered as "fully paid" are invalid; L. R. 15 Eq. 407. A corporation may, however, take in payment of its shares any property which it may lawfully purchase; Thomps. Liab. of Stockh. § 134; and stock issued therefor as full paid, will be so considered; 7 C. L. J. 430 (C. C. U. S. per Clifford, Circ. J.).

In order to constitute one a shareholder, it is not necessary that a certificate should have been issued to him; 32 Ind. 393; 46 Mo. 248.

The subject of the liability of stockholders is treated with great fulness by Judge Thompson in his work above cited. See 31 Am. Rep. 88; 15 Am. L. Reg, N. s. 648; 14 C. L. J. 288; STOCK.

STOCKS. In Criminal Law. A machine, commonly made of wood, with holes in it, in which to confine persons accused of or guilty of crime.

It was used either to confine unruly offenders by way of security, or convicted criminals for punishment. This barbarous punishment has been generally abandoned in the United States.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU. A resumption by the seller of the possession of goods not paid for, while on their way to the vendee and before he has acquired actual possession of them. 15 Me. 314.

Chancellor Kent has defined the right of stoppage in transitu to be that which the vendor has, when he sells goods on credit to another, of resuming the possession of the goods while they are in the possession of a carrier or middleman, in the transit to the consignee or vendee, and before they arrive into his actual possession, or the designation he has appointed for them on his becoming bankrupt and insolvent; 2 Kent, 702.

For most purposes, the possession of the carrier is considered to be that of the buyer; but by virtue of this right, which is an extension of the right of lien, the vendor may reclaim the possession before they reach the vendee, in case of the insolvency of the latter; 12 Pick. 313; 4 Gray, 336; 2 Caines, 98; 8 M. & W. 341, which gives a history of the law.

The vendor, or a consignor to whom the vendee is liable for the price; 3 East, 93; 6 id. 17; 13 Me. 103; 1 Binn. 106; see 4 Camp. 31; 2 Bingh. N. C. 83; or a general or special agent acting for him; 9 M. & W. 518; 2 J. & W. 349; 5 Whart. 189; 13 Me. 93; see 1 Moore & P. 515; 4 Bingh. 479; 5 Term, 404; 4 Gray, 367; 1 Hill, N. Y. 302; 5 Mass. 157; may exercise the right.

The vendor can bring suit for the price of the goods after he has caused them to be stopped in transitu, and while they are yet in his possession, provided he be ready to deliver them upon payment of the price; 1 Camp. 109; but the right of the vendor after stoppage exceeds a mere lien; for he may resell the goods; 6 Mod. 152.

There need not be a manual seizure: it is sufficient if a claim adverse to the buyer be made during their passage; 2 B. & P. 457; 9 M. & W. 518; 13 Me. 93; 5 Denio, 333.

The goods sold must be unpaid for, either wholly or partially; 7 Term, 440; 15 Me. 314; 2 Exch. 702. See 5 C. & P. 179. As to the rule where a note has been given, see 2 M. & W. 375; 7 Mass. 453; 4 Cush. 33; 7 Penn. 301; 14 id. 48; where there has been a pre-existing debt; 4 Camp. 31; 16 Pick. 475; 3 Paige, Ch. 373; 1 Binn. 106; 1 B. & P. 563; where there are mutual creditors; 7 Dowl. & R. 126; 4 Camp. 31; 16 Pick. 467. The vendee must be insolvent; 4 Ad. & E. 332; 5 B. & Ad. 313; 20 Conn. 54; 8 Pick. 198; 14 Penn. 51.

The goods must be in transit; 3 Term, 466; 15 B. Monr. 270; 16 Pick. 474; 20 N. H. 154. In order to defend the right the goods must have come actually into the hands of the vendee or some person acting for him; 2 M. & W. 632; 10 id. 436; 2 Cr. & J. Exch. 218; 1 Pet. 386; 3 Mas. 107; 2 Strobh. 309; 23 Wend. 611; or constructively, as, by reaching the place of destination; 9 B. & C. 422; 4 C. B. 837; 3 B. & P. 320, 469; 7 Mass. 457; 20 N. H. 154; 2 Curt. C. C. 259; 3 Vt. 49; or by coming into an agent's possession; 5 East, 175; 4 Camp. 181; 7 Mass. 453; 4 Dana, 7; 30 Penn. 254; see 22 Conn. 473; 17 N. Y. 249; 7 Cal. 213; or by being deposited for the vendee in a public store or warehouse; 5 Denio, 631; 7 Penn. 301; 7 Mann. & G. 360; 4 Camp. 251; or by delivery of part for the whole; 14 M. & W. 28; 4 B. & P. 69; 1 C. & P. 207; 14 B. Monr. 324. As to the effect of transfer of bill of lading, see Story, Sales, §§ 343–347; 16 N. Y. 325; 16 Pick. 467; 34 Me. 554; 3 Conn. 9; 24 Vt. 55; 4 Mas. 5; 6 Cra. 338; 1 Pet. 445; 7 Ad. & E. 29.

Where there is no contract to the contrary, express or implied, the employment of a carrier by a vendor of goods on credit constitutes all middlemen, into whose custody they pass for transportation and delivery, agents of the vendor; and until the complete delivery of the goods, are deemed in transitu; 21 Ohio St. 281. The right cannot be superseded by an attachment at the suit of a general creditor, levied while the goods are in transitu; 50 Miss. 500; id. 590. If the vendor attach the goods while in transit, his right of stoppage will be destroyed; 15 Conn.

335. Where goods are to be delivered a part at a time, and various deliveries are so made, the right to stop the remaining portion is not lost; nor will the fact that the entire lot of goods was transferred on the books of the warehouse affect the right; 106 Mass. 76; 17 Wend. 504; 7 Am. L. Reg. 290. The right of stoppage in transitu is looked upon with favor by the courts; 2 Eden, 77; 21 Ohio St. 281.

The effect of the exercise of this right is to repossess the parties of the same rights which they had before the vendor resigned his possession of the goods sold: 1 Q. B. 389; 5 B. & Ad. 339; 10 B. & C. 99; 14 Me. 314; 5 Ohio, 98; 20 Conn. 53; 10 Tex. 2; 19 Am. Rep. 87; 14 C. L. J. 242.

See, generally, Benjamin, Story, Long, on Sales; Parson, on Contracts; Cross, on Lien; Whittaker, on Stoppage in Transitu; 5 Wait, Action & Def. 612; 14 C. L. J. 242.

STOUTHRIEFF. In Scotch Law. Formerly this word included in its signification every species of theft accompanied with violence to the person; but of late years it has become the vox signata for forcible and masterful depredation within or near the dwelling-house; while robbery has been more particularly applied to violent depredation on the highway, or accompanied by house-breaking. Alison, Prin. Scotch Law, 227.

STOWAGE. In Maritime Law. The proper arrangment in a ship of the different articles of which a cargo consists, so that they may not injure each other by friction, or be damaged by the leakage of the ship.

The master of the ship is bound to attend to the stowage, unless by custom or agreement this business is to be performed by persons employed by the merchant; Abb. Shipp. 228; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 721. See STEVEDORE.

Merchandise and other property must be stored under deck, unless a special agreement or established custom and usage authorizes their carriage on deck.

STRANDING. In Maritime Law. The running of a ship or other vessel on shore; it is either accidental or voluntary.

Accidental stranding takes place where the ship is driven on shore by the winds and waves.

Voluntary stranding takes place where the ship is run on shore either to preserve her from a worse fate or for some fraudulent purpose. Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 12, s. 1.

It is of great consequence to define accurately what shall be deemed a stranding; but this is no easy matter. In one case, a ship having run on some wooden piles, four feet under water, erected in Wisbeach river, about nine yards from shore, which were placed there to keep up the banks of the river, and having remained on these piles until they were cut away, was considered by Lord Kenyon to have been stranded; Marsh. Ins. b. 7, s. 3. In another case, a ship arrived in the river Thames, and upon coming up to the Pool, which was full of vessels, one brig ran foul of her bow and another of her stern, in consequence of which she was driven aground, and continued in that situation an hour, during which period several other vessels ran foul of her: this Lord Kenyon told the jury that, unskilled as he was in nautical affairs, he thought he could safely pronounce to be no stranding; 1 Camp. 131; 3 id. 431; 4 Maule & S. 503; 5 B. & Ald. 225; 4 B. & C. 736; 7 id. 224. See PERILS OF THE SEA.

It may be said, in general terms, that in order to constitute a stranding the ship must be in the course of prosecuting her voyage when the loss occurs; there must be a settling down on the obstructing object; and the vessel must take the ground by reason of extraordinary casualty, and not from one of the ordinary incidents of a voyage. Arn. Ins. §§ 297, 318. And see Phill. Ins.

STRANGER. A person born out of the United States; but in this sense the term alien is more properly applied until he becomes naturalized.

A person who is not privy to an act or contract: example, he who is a stranger to the issue shall not take advantage of the verdict; Brooke, Abr. Record, pl. 3; Viner, Abr. 1. And see Comyns, Dig. Abatement (H. 54).

When a man undertakes to do a thing, and a stranger interrupts him, this is no excuse; Comyns, Dig. Condition (L 14). When a party undertakes that a stranger shall do a certain thing, he becomes liable as soon as the stranger refuses to perform it; Bacon, Abr. Conditions (Q 4).

STRATAGEM. A deception either by words or actions, in times of war, in order to obtain an advantage over an enemy.

Stratagems, though contrary to morality, have been justified unless they have been accompanied by perfidy, injurious to the rights of humanity, as in the example given by Vattel of an English frigate, which during a war between France and England appeared off Calais and made signals of distress in order to allure some vessel to come to its relief, and seized a shallop and its crew who had generously gone out to render it assistance. Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3 c. 9, § 178.

Sometimes stratagems are employed in making contracts. This is unlawful and fraudulent, and avoids the contract. See FRAUD.

STRATOCRACY. A military government; government by military chiefs of an army.

STREAM. A current of water. The right to a water-course is not a right in the fluid itself, so much as a right in the current of the stream. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1612. The owner of the land on both sides of a navigable stream, above the ebb and flow of the tide, is the owner of the bed of the stream, and entitled to all the ice that forms within the extent of his lands; 14 Chi. L. News, 83. See RIVER; WATER-COURSE; ICE.

STREET. A public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village. It differs from a country highway; 21 Alb. L. J. 45; 4 S. & R. 106; 11 Barb. 399. See HIGHWAY.

A street, besides its use as a highway for travel, may be used for the accommodation of drains, sewers, aqueducts, water- and gas-pipes, lines of telegraph, and for other purposes conducive to the general police, sanitary and business interests of a city; 10 Barb. 26, 360; 15 id. 210; 17 id. 435; 2 R. I. 15. A street may be used by individuals for the lading and unlading of carriages, for the temporary deposit of movables or of materials and scaffoldings for building or repairing, provided such use shall not unreasonably abridge or incommode its primary use for travel; 6 East, 427; 3 Camp. 230; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76, s. 49; 4 Ad. & E. 405; 4 Iowa, 199; 1 Denio, 524; 1 S. & R. 219; 24 Alb. L. J. 464. So a sidewalk which is part of a street may be excavated for a cellar, pierced by an aperture for the admission of light, or overhung by an awning. But if the highway becomes more unsafe and a passenger is injured by reason thereof, the individual so using the street will be responsible for the damages; 18 N. Y. 79–84; 3 C. & P. 262; 23 Wend. 446; 3 Cush. 174; 6 id. 524; 13 Metc. 299. But an individual has no right to have an auction in a street; 13 S. & R. 403; or to keep a crowd of carriages standing therein; 3 Camp. 230; or to attract a disorderly crowd to witness a caricature in a shop-window; 6 C. & P. 636. Such an act constitutes a nuisance; Ang. High. c. 6.

The owners of lands adjoining a street are not entitled to compensation for damages occasioned by a change of grade or other lawful alteration of the street; 2 B. & A. 403; 1 Pick. 417; 4 N. Y. 195; 14 Mo. 20; 2 R. I. 154; 6 Wheat. 593; 20 How. 135; unless such damages result from a want of due skill and care or an abuse of authority; 5 B. & Ald. 837; 1 Sandf. 22; 16 N. Y. 158, and note.

Under the statutes of several of the states, assessments are levied upon the owners of lots specially benefited by opening, widening, or improving streets, to defray the expense thereof; and such assessments have been adjudged to be a constitutional exercise of the taxing power; 4 N. Y. 419; 8 Wend. 85; 18 Penn. 26; 21 id. 147; 3 Watts, 293; 23 Conn. 189; 5 Gill, 383; 27 Mo. 209; 4 R. I. 230; Ang. High. c. 4. See Dill. Mun. Corp.

Street Railway. Railways on streets are operated either by horse or steam power. When operated by horse power they do not constitute an additional burden to the easement, and the adjoining land-owners are not entitled to compensation; 125 Mass. 516; 28 Am. Rep. 264; 14 Ohio St. 523; 32 Conn. 579; 51 Cal. 583; 28 Am. L. Reg. 16; 21 Alb. L. J. 44; 25 id. 390; 9 Am. Rep. 465; 10 Am. L. Reg. 194. But steam railways, on the contrary, are usually considered an additional burden, and compensation is allowed; 25 N. Y. 526; 46 Iowa, 366; 17 Minn. 215; 28 Am. L. Reg. 16. But see 6 Whart. 25; 12 Iowa, 246; 21 Ill. 522. As to steam motors, see 37 Am. Rep. 216 n.

The operation of street railways is an exercise of the public right of way over them; and the street railway has only a qualified right in its track. That is, the proprietary right which a street railway has in its track is subject to the right of eminent domain. The legislature may grant to one company the right to operate a street railway and then afterwards grant part of the same railway to another company. One legislature cannot by giving a franchise in a public street, deprive succeeding legislatures of the power of performing the duty of regulating the use of the street in such manner as to each legislature shall seem to be for the best interests of the public; 28 Am. L. Reg. 765.

Where a company was chartered to operate horse railways they were held not to have gone beyond their charter in operating a railway worked by means of a cable with steam for a motive power; 15 Chicago L. N. 7.

As streets belong to the public the paramount control and regulation of them is in the hands of the legislature. But part of this authority is generally delegated by charter or statute to the municipal corporations; Dill. Mun. Corp. 651–727.

There is no substantial difference between streets as to which the legal title is in private individuals and those in which it is in the public, as to the rights of the people therein; 94 U. S. 324. See RAILROAD.

STRICT SETTLEMENT. A settlement of lands to the parent for life, and after his death to his first and other sons in tail, with an interposition of trustees to preserve the contingent remainders.

STRICTISSIMI JURIS (Lat. the most strict right or law). In general, when a person receives an advantage, as the grant of a license, he is bound to conform strictly to the exercise of the rights given him by it, and in case of a dispute it will be strictly construed. See 3 Stor. C. C. 159.

STRICTUM JUS (Lat.). Mere law, in contradistinction to equity.

STRIKE. A combined effort by workmen to obtain higher wages or other concessions from their employers, by stopping work at a preconcerted time. Where this is peaceably effected without positive breach of contract, it is not unlawful, but it sometimes amounts to conspiracy. Most of the decisions bear upon questions arising more or less indirectly from the strike.

A conspiracy to obtain from a master mechanic money which he is under no legal obligation to pay, by inducing his workmen to leave him and by deterring others from entering his employment, or by threatening to do this, so that he is induced to pay the money demanded, is an illegal conspiracy; 106 Mass. 1; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 6. See 9 Neb. 390. One has no right to dictate whom the owners of property shall employ to work it, nor to say that the work shall not be done by such as the owners may employ. If a society or union, acting in its associate capacity, bring about a "strike" and uphold a striker's extraordinary demand, all who are in the association and participate in its action are guilty; 3 Pitts. Rep. 143.

It is no answer to a suit against a common carrier for failure to deliver goods with reasonable promptness, that a strike among their employés prevented; 20 N. Y. 48; 18 Ill. 488. But otherwise if the employés are discharged and afterwards interfere unlawfully with the business of the road; 15 Alb. L. J. 39; Cooley, Torts, 640, n. See CONSPIRACY.

STRIKING A DOCKET. In English Practice. Entering the creditor's affidavit and bond in bankruptcy. 1 Deac. Bank. 106.

STRIKING A JURY. In English Practice. Where, for nicety of the matter in dispute, or other cause, a special jury is necessary, upon motion and rule granted thereon, the sheriff is to attend the prothonotary or proper officer with the book of freeholders, and to take indifferently forty-eight of the principal freeholders, when the attorneys on each side, being present, are to strike off twelve respectively, and the remaining twenty-four are returned. 3 Bla. Com. 357. Essentially the same practice prevails in New York, Pennsylvania, and other states; Tr. & H. Pr. § 636. See JURY; Graham, Pr. 277. In some of the states a special or struck jury is granted as of course upon the application of either party; but more generally it must appear to the court that a fair trial cannot be otherwise had, or that the intricacy and importance of the case require it. One of the parties being a citizen of color, the judge cannot properly direct a special jury to be impanelled, one half of whom are of African descent; 3 Baxt. 373; 100 U. S. 313. The statutory method of striking is held to be mandatory; 26 Wis. 423; 78 Penn. 303. See Abb. N. Y. Dig. tit. Trial, §§ 196–208; Thomp. & Merr. Jur. § 14.

STRUCK. In Pleading. A word essential in an indictment for murder, when the death arises from any wounding, beating, or bruising. 1 Bulstr. 184; 5 Co. 122; 3 Mod. 202; Cro. Jac. 655; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 184, 186, 187; 6 Binn. 179.

STRUCK JURY. See STRIKING A JURY.

STRUCK OFF. A term applied to a case which the court, having no jurisdiction over, and not being able to give judgment, order to be taken off the record. This is done by an entry to that effect.

STRUMPET. A harlot, or courtesan. The word was formerly used as an addition. Jacob, Law Dict.

STUDENTS. Students living in a place merely for the purpose of attending college, have not such residence as will entitle them to vote there; Fry's Case, 71 Penn. 302; contra, 10 Mass. 488. See McCr. Elect. § 34 et seq.

STUFF GOWN. The professional robe worn by barristers of the outer bar; viz., those who are not queen's counsel. Brown.

STULTIFY (Lat. stultus, stupid). To make one out mentally incapacitated for the performance of an act.

It has been laid down by old authorities; Littleton, § 405; 4 Co. 123; Cro. Eliz. 398; that no man should be allowed to stultify himself, i.e. plead disability through mental unsoundness. This maxim was soon doubted as law; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 414; 2 Bla. Com. 292; and has been completely overturned; 4 Kent, 451.

STUPRUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The criminal sexual intercourse which took place between a man and a single woman, maid, or widow, who before lived honestly. Inst. 4. 18. 4; Dig. 48. 5. 6; 50. 16. 101.

STURGEON. See ROYAL FISH.

SUB-AGENT. A person appointed by an agent to perform some duty, or the whole of the business relating to his agency.

A sub-agent is generally invested with the same rights, and incurs the same liabilities in regard to his immediate employers, as if the latter were the real principal. To this general rule there are some exceptions: for example, where, by the general usage of trade or the agreement of the parties, sub-agents are ordinarily or necessarily employed to accomplish the ends of the agency, there, if the agency is avowed and the credit is exclusively given to the principal, the intermediate agent may be entirely exempted from all liability to the sub-agent. The agent, however, will be liable to the sub-agent unless such exclusive credit has been given, although the real principal or superior may also be liable; Story, Ag. § 386; Paley, Ag. Lloyd ed. 49. When the agent employs a sub-agent to do the whole or any part of the business of the agency, without the knowledge or consent of his principal, either express or implied, the latter will only be entitled to recover from his immediate employer, and his sole responsibility is also to him. In this case the superior or real principal is not responsible to the sub-agent, because there is no privity between them; Story, Ag. §§ 13, 14, 15, 217, 387.

Where, by an express or implied agreement of the parties, or by the usages of trade, a sub-agent is to be employed, a privity exists between the principal and the sub-agent, and the latter may justly maintain his claim for compensation both against the principal and his immediate employer, unless exclusive credit is given to one of them; and in that case his remedy is limited to that party; 1 Livermore, Ag. 64; 6 Taunt. 147

SUB-CONTRACT. A contract by one who has contracted for the performance of labor or service with a third party for the whole or part performance of that labor or service. 9 M. & W. 710; 3 Gray, 362; 17 Wend. 550.

SUB MODO (Lat.). Under a qualification. A legacy may be given sub modo, that is, subject to a condition or qualification.

SUB PEDE SIGILLI (Lat.). Under the foot of the seal; under seal. This expression is used when it is required that a record should be certified under the seal of the court.

SUB POTESTATE (Lat.). Under, or subject to, the power of another: as, a wife is under the power of her husband; a child is subject to that of his father; a slave to that of his master.

SUB SILENTIO (Lat.). Under silence; without any notice being taken. Sometimes passing a thing sub silentio is evidence of consent. See SILENCE.

SUB-TENANT. An under-tenant.

SUBALTERN. An officer who exercises his authority under the superintendence and control of a superior.

SUBDIVIDE. To divide a part of a thing which has already been divided. For example, when a person dies leaving children, and grandchildren, the children of one of his own who is dead, his property is divided into as many shares as he had children, including the deceased, and the share of the deceased is subdivided into as many shares as he had children.

SUBINFEUDATION. The act of an inferior lord by which he carved out a part of an estate which he held of a superior, and granted it to an inferior tenant to be held of himself.

It was an indirect mode of transferring the fief, and resorted to as an artifice to elude the feudal restraint upon alienation. This was forbidden by the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Ed. I.; 2 Bla. Com. 91; 3 Kent, 406. See Cadw. Gr. Rents, § 7.

SUBJECT. In Scotch Law. The thing which is the object of an agreement.

In Governmental Law. An individual member of a nation, who is subject to the laws. This term is used in contradistinction to citizen, which is applied to the same individual when considering his political rights.

In monarchical governments, by subject is meant one who owes permanent allegiance to the monarch. See Greenl. Ev. § 286; 1 Phill. Ev. 732, n. 1; Morse, Citizenship; ALLEGIANCE; CITIZEN; NATURALIZATION.

SUBJECT-MATTER. The cause; the object; the thing in dispute.

It is a fatal objection to the jurisdiction of the court when it has not cognizance of the subject-matter of the action: as, if a cause exclusively of admiralty jurisdiction were brought in a court of common law, or a criminal proceeding in a court having jurisdiction of civil cases only; 10 Co. 68, 76; 1 Ventr. 133; 8 Mass. 87; 12 id. 367. In such case, neither a plea to the jurisdiction nor any other plea would be required to oust the court of jurisdiction. The cause might be dismissed upon motion by the court.

SUBJECTION (Lat. sub, under, jacio, to put, throw). The obligation of one or more persons to act at the discretion or according to the judgment and will of others. Private subjection is subjection to the authority of private persons. Public subjection is subjection to the authority of public persons.

SUB-LEASE. A lease by a tenant to another person of a part of the premises held by him; an under-lease.

SUBMISSION (Lat. submissio,—sub, under, mittere, to put,—a putting under. Used of persons or things. A putting one's person or property under the control of another). A yielding to authority. A citizen is bound to submit to the laws, a child to his parents, a guardian to his ward. A victor may enforce the submission of his enemy.

In Maritime Law. Submission on the part of the vanquished, and complete possession on the part of the victor, transfer property as between belligerents; 1 Gall. 532.

In Practice. An agreement, parol (oral or written) or sealed, by which parties agree to submit their differences to the decision of a referee or arbitrators. It is sometimes termed a reference; Kyd, Arb. 11; Caldw. Arb. 16; 17 Ves. 419; 3 M. & W. 816; 6 Watts, 359; 16 Vt. 663; 4 N. Y. 157.

It is the authority given by the parties to the arbitrators, empowering them to inquire into and determine the matters in dispute.

It may be in pais, or by rule of court, or under the various statutes; 1 Dev. 82.

It may be oral, but this is inconvenient, because open to disputes; by written agreement not under seal (in Louisiana and California the submission must be in writing, 5 La. 133; 2 Cal. 92); by indenture, with mutual covenants to abide by the decision of the arbitrator; by deed-poll, or by bond, each party executing an obligation to the other conditioned to be void respectively upon the performance of the award; Caldw. Arb. 16; 6 Watts, 357. If general in terms, both law and fact are referred; 7 Ind. 49; if limited, the arbitrator cannot exceed his authority; 11 Cush. 37.

When to be made. A submission may be made at any time of causes not in court, and at common law, where a cause was depending, submission might be made by rule of court before the trial, or by order of nisi prius after it had commenced, which was afterwards made a rule of court; 1 Mann. & G. 976; 2 B. & Ald. 395; 3 S. & R. 262; 4 Halst. 198.

Who may make. Any one capable of making a disposition of his property or release of his right, or capable of suing or being sued, may make a binding submission to arbitration; but one under civil or natural incapacity cannot be bound by his submission; Wats. Arb. 65; Russ. Arb. 20; 2 P. Wms. 45; 9 Ves. 350; 8 Me. 315; 11 id. 326; 2 N. H. 484; 8 Vt. 472; 16 Mass. 396; 5 Conn. 367; 1 Barb. 584; 2 Rob. Va. 761; 6 Munf. 458; Paine, 646; 1 Wheat. 304; 5 How. 83.

In general, in cases of incapacity of the real owner of property, as well as in many cases of agency, the person who has the legal control of the property may make submission, including a husband for his wife; Stra. 351; 5 Ves. 846; a parent or guardian for an infant; Freem. 62, 139; 11 Me. 326; 12 Conn. 376; 3 Caines, 253; but not a guardian ad litem; 9 Humphr. 129; a trustee for his cestui que trust; 3 Esp. 101; an attorney for his client; 1 Wils. 28, 58; 1 Ld. Raym. 246; 12 Ala. 252; 9 Penn. 101; 23 id. 393; 2 Hill, N. Y. 271; 4 T. B. Monr. 375; 7 Cra. 436; but see 6 Weekl. Rep. 10; an agent duly authorized for his principal; 8 B. & C. 16; 5 id. 141; 8 Vt. 472; 11 Mass. 449; 5 Green, N. J. 38; 29 N. H. 405; 8 N. Y. 160; an executor or administrator at his own peril, but not thereby necessarily admitting assets; 2 Stra. 1144; 20 Pick. 584; 6 Leigh, 62; 5 T. B. Monr. 240; 5 Conn. 621; see 5 Bingh. 200; 1 Barb. 419; 3 Harr. N. J. 442; assignees under bankruptcy and insolvency laws, under the statutory restrictions, stat. 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, and state statutes; the right being limited in all cases to that which the person acting can control and legally dispose of; 6 Mass. 78; 6 Munf. 453; 4 T. B. Monr. 240; 21 Miss. 133; but not including a partner for a partnership; 3 Bingh. 101; Holt, 143; 1 Cr. M. & R. 681; 1 Pet. 221; 19 Johns. 137; 2 N. H. 284; 5 Gill & J. 412; 12 S. & R. 243; Collyer, Partn. §§ 439–470; 3 Kent, 49.

What may be included in a submission. Generally, any matter which the parties might adjust by agreement, or which may be the subject of an action or suit at law, except perhaps actions (qui tam) on penal statutes by common informers; for crimes cannot be made the subject of adjustment and composition by arbitration, this being against the most obvious policy of the law; Caldw. Arb. 12; 5 Wend. 111; 13 S. & R. 319; 2 Rawle, 341; 7 Conn. 345; 6 N. H. 177; 16 Miss. 298; 16 Vt. 450; 10 Gill & J. 192; 5 Munf. 10; including a debt certain on a specialty, any question of law, the construction of a will or other instrument, any personal injury on which a suit will lie for damages, although it may be also indictable; 2 Madd. 6; 9 Ves. 367; 8 Me. 119, 288; 6 Pick. 148.

An agreement to refer future disputes will not be enforced by a decree of specific performance, nor will an action lie for refusing to appoint an arbitrator in accordance with such an agreement; 6 Ves. 815; 2 S. & S. 418; 2 B. & P. 135; 2 Stor. 800; 15 Ga. 473. It is considered against public policy to exclude from the tribunals of the state disputes the nature of which cannot be foreseen; 4 Bro. C. C. 312, 315; 2 Ves. 131; 19 id. 431; 1 Swanst. 40. See 31 Penn. 306.

Effect of. A submission of a case in court works a discontinuance and a waiver of defects in the process; 2 Penn. 868; 18 Johns. 22; 10 Yerg. 439; 2 Humphr. 516; 5 Gray, 492; 4 Hen. & M. 363; 5 Wisc. 421; 4 N. J. 647; 41 Me. 355; 30 Vt. 610; 2 Curt. C. C. 28; see 20 Barb. 262; 9 Tex. 44; and the bail or sureties on a replevin bond are discharged; 1 Pick. 192; 4 Green, N. J. 277; 7 id. 348; 1 Ired. 9; 3 Ark. 214; 2 B. & Ad. 774. But see 6 Taunt. 379; 10 Bingh. 118. But this rule has been modified in England by statute; Stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, § 11; 8 Exch. 327.

The submission which defines and limits as well as confers and imposes the duty of the arbitrator must be followed by him in his conduct and award; but a fair and liberal construction is allowed in its interpretation; 1 Wms. Saund. 65; 11 Ark. 477; 3 Penn. 144; 13 Johns. 187; 2 N. H. 126; 2 Pick. 534; 3 Halst. N. J. 195; 1 Pet. 222. If general, it submits both law and fact; 7 Ind. 49; if limited, the arbitrator cannot exceed his authority; 11 Cush. 37.

The statutes of many of the states of the United States provide for submissions by the parties before a justice of the peace, in which case the award will be enforced as if it had been made under rule of court; and statutes also regulate submissions made under rule of court.

Revocation of a submission may take place at any time previous to the award, though it be expressed in the agreement to be irrevocable. The remedy of the injured party is by an action for breach of the agreement; 8 Co. 81; 4 B. & C. 103; 10 id. 483; 1 Cow. 235; 12 Wend. 578; 1 Hill, N. Y. 44; 12 Mass. 49; 20 Vt. 198; 28 id. 532; 26 Me. 251, 459; 3 Day, 118; 23 Penn. 393; 4 Sneed, 462; 6 Dana, 307. A submission by deed must be revoked by deed; 8 Co. 72, and cases above.

A submission under rule of court is generally irrevocable, by force of statutory provisions, both in England and the United States; Stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42; 5 Burr. 497; 12 Mass. 47; 4 Me. 459; 1 Binn. 42; 6 N. H. 36; 4 Conn. 498; 5 Paige, 575; 3 Halst. 116; 3 Ired. 333; 19 Ohio, 245.

A submission at common law is generally revoked by the death of either party (unless it be stipulated otherwise), or of the arbitrator, or his refusal to act; 2 B. & Ald. 394; 3 B. & C. 144; 8 M. & W. 873; but see 15 Pick. 79; 3 Halst. 116; 3 Gill, 192; 2 Gill & J. 479; 3 Swan, 90; 15 Ga. 473; by marriage of a feme sole, and the husband and wife may then be sued on her arbitration bond; 5 East, 266. It is not revoked by the bankruptcy of the party or by the death of the arbitrator after publication of the award; 4

B. & Ald. 250; 9 B. & C. 629; 29 E. L. & E. 362; 21 Ga. 1.

SUBNOTATIONS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The answers of the prince to questions which had been put to him respecting some obscure or doubtful point of law. See RESCRIPT.

SUBORNATION OF PERJURY. In Criminal Law. The procuring another to commit legal perjury, who in consequence of the persuasion takes the oath to which he has been incited. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 10.

To complete the offence, the false oath must be actually taken, and no abortive attempt to solicit will complete the crime; 2 Show. 1; 5 Metc. Mass. 241.

But the criminal solicitation to commit perjury, though unsuccessful, is a misdemeanor at common law; 2 East, 17; 6 id. 464. For a form of an indictment for an attempt to suborn a person to commit perjury, see 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 480.

The act of congress of March 3, 1825, c. 65, § 13, as amended by subsequent acts, provides that if any person shall knowingly or wilfully procure any such perjury, mentioned in the act, to be committed, every such person so offending shall be guilty of subornation of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding five years, according to the aggravation of the offence; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of giving testimony in any court of the United States until such time as the judgment against him is reversed. R. S. §§ 5392, 5393. See 8 How. 41.

SUBPŒNA (Lat. sub, under, pœna, penalty). In Practice. A process to cause a witness to appear and give testimony, commanding him to lay aside all pretences and excuses, and appear before a court or magistrate therein named, at a time therein mentioned, to testify for the party named, under a penalty therein mentioned. This is called distinctively a subpœna ad testificandum.

On proof of service of a subpœna upon the witness, and that he is material, an attachment may be issued against him for a contempt, if he neglect to attend as commanded.

In Chancery Practice. A mandatory writ or process directed to and requiring one or more persons to appear at a time to come and answer the matters charged against him or them. The writ of subpœna was originally a process in the courts of common law, to enforce the attendance of a witness to give evidence; but this writ was used in the court of chancery for the same purpose as a citation in the courts of civil and canon law, to compel the appearance of a defendant, and to oblige him to answer upon oath the allegations of the plaintiff.

It was invented by John Waltham, bishop of Salisbury, and chancellor to Rich. II., under the authority of the statutes of Westminster 2, and 13 Edw. I. c. 34, which enabled him to devise new writs; Cruise, Dig. t. 11, c. 1, §§ 12–17. See Vin. Abr. Subpœna; 1 Swanst. 209; Spence, Eq. Jur.

SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM. In Practice. A writ or process of the same kind as the subpœna ad testificandum, including a clause requiring the witness to bring with him and produce to the court books, papers, etc., in his hands, tending to elucidate the matter in issue. 2 Bla. Com. 382. See DISCOVERY.

SUBREPTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Obtaining gifts of escheat, etc., from the king by concealing the truth. Bell, Dict.; Calv. Lex. Subripere.

SUBREPTION. In French Law. The fraud committed to obtain a pardon, title, or grant, by alleging facts contrary to truth.

SUBROGATION. The substitution of another person in the place of the creditor, to whose rights he succeeds in relation to the debt. That change which puts another person in the place of the creditor, and which makes the right, the mortgage, or the security which the creditor has pass to the person who is subrogated to him,—that is to say, who enters into his right. Domat. Civ. Law, pt. i. l. iii. t. i. § vi.

It is a legal fiction by force of which an obligation extinguished by payment made by a third party is considered as continuing to subsist for the benefit of this third person, who makes but one and the same person with the creditor in the view of the law. Subrogation is the act of putting one thing in place of another, or one person in place of another. Guyot, Répertoire Universelle, Subrogation, sect. II.

The substitution of one creditor to the rights and securities of another. Subrogatio est transfusio unius creditoris in alium eadem vel meliori conditione. Merlin, Inst. de Droit, Subrogatio.

Subrogation gives to the substitute all the rights of the party for whom he is substituted; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 253. Among the earlier civil-law writers, the term seems to have been used synonomously with substitution; or, rather, substitution included subrogation as well as its present more limited signification. See Domat, Civ. Law, passim; Pothier, Obl. passim. The term substitution is now almost altogether confined to the law of devises and chancery practice. See SUBSTITUTION.

The word subrogation is originally found only in the civil law, and has been adopted, with the doctrine itself, thence into equity; but in the law as distinguished from equity it hardly appears as a term, except perhaps in those states where, as in Pennsylvania, equity is administered through the forms of law. There the term subrogation, adopted from the Roman law, has of late years come into quite general use. 6 Penn. 504. The equitable doctrine of marshalling assets is plainly derived from the Roman law of subrogation or substitution; and although the word is, or, rather, has been used sparingly in the common law, many of the doctrines of subrogation are familiar to the courts of common law.

Subrogation differs from cession in this that while cession only substitutes the one to whom the debt is ceded in place of the ceder, in subrogation the debt would have become extinguished but for the effect of the subrogation; and, also, because although subrogation supposes a change in the person of the creditor, it does not imply novation; but, through the fiction of the law, the party who is subrogated is considered as making only one and the same person with the creditor whom he succeeds; Massé, Droit Commerciel, Payment in Subrogation.

It is one thing to decide that a surety is entitled, on payment, to have an assignment of the debt, and quite another to decide that he is entitled to be subrogated or substituted as to the equities and securities to the place of the creditor, as against the debtor and his co-sureties; Story, Eq. Jur. § 493, n.; 2 McLean, 451; 1 Dev. Ch. 137.

Subrogation of persons is of three sorts:—

First, the canonists understand by subrogation the succession of a priest to the rights of action of the occupant of a benefice who has died during a suit. Guyot, Répert. Univ. Subrogation of Persons, sect. 1.

Second, the second sort arose from a local custom of the Bourbonnais, and had for its object the protection of the debtor from the effects of collusion on the part of the attaching creditor.

Third, subrogation in fact to liens and pledges, which is only the change of one creditor for another. See Guyot, ut sup., and, also, Massé, Droit Commerciel.

Nearly all the instances in which the common law has adopted the doctrines of subrogation have arisen under this latter class.

Convention subrogation results, as its name indicates, from the agreement of the parties, and can take effect only by agreement. This agreement is, of course, with the party to be subrogated, and may be either by the debtor or creditor. La. Civ. Code, 1249.

Thus, it may happen when the creditor receiving payment from the third person subrogates the payer to his right against the debtor. This must happen by express agreement; but no formal words are required. This sort of subrogation only takes place where there is a payment of the debt by a third party,—not where there is an assignment, in which case subrogation results from the assignment.

This principle is recognized by the common law in cases where upon payment the securities are transferred to a party having an interest in the payment. Or, in case the debtor borrows money from a third party to pay a debt, he may subrogate the lender to the rights of the creditor; for by this change the rights of the other creditors are not injuriously affected. To make this mode of subrogation valid, the borrowing and discharge must take place before a notary; in the borrowing it must be declared that the money has been borrowed to make payment, and in the discharge, that it has been made with money furnished by the creditor. Massé, Droit Commerciel, lib. 5, tit. 1, ch. 5, §§ 1, 2.

"The doctrine of subrogation is derived from the civil law (43 Penn. 518). In this country, under the initial guidance of Chancellor Kent, its principles have been more widely developed than in England (44 Mo. 338). It is treated as the creature of equity, and is so administered as to secure real and essential justice without regard to form (id.), and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties to be effected by it (6 Neb. 219). It is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter (33 Gratt. 527; 43 Conn. 244)." Sheld. Subr. § 1.

Legal subrogation takes place to its full extent—

First, for the benefit of one who being himself a creditor pays the claim of another who has a preference over him by reason of his liens and securities. For in this case, it is said, it is to be presumed that he pays for the purpose of securing his own debt; and this distinguishes his case from that of a mere stranger. Domat, Civ. Law, part 1, lib. 3, tit. 1, § 6, art. 6; Dig. qui pot. in pig. l. 16; l. 11, § 4; l. 12, § 9; l. 17, § 9. And so, at common law, if a junior mortgagor pays off the prior mortgage, he is entitled to demand an assignment thereof; 56 Penn. 76; 36 Me. 577.

Second, for the benefit of the purchasers of an immovable, who uses the price which he paid in paying the creditors to whom the inheritance was mortgaged.

Third, for the benefit of him who, being held with others or for others for the payment of the debt, has an interest in discharging it.

Subrogation takes place for the benefit of co-promisors or co-guarantors, as between themselves, and for the benefit of sureties against their principals.

But between co-guarantors and co-promisors subrogation benefits him who pays the debt only to the extent of enabling him to recover from each separately his portion of the debt.

As against his co-sureties, the surety increasing the value of their joint security is entitled to subrogation only to the amount actually paid; 6 Ind. 857; 12 Gratt. 642. Any arrangement by one co-surety with the principal enures to the benefit of all the co-sureties; 26 Ala. N. S. 280, 728.

Subrogation for the whole sum takes place only when the person who pays ought to have recourse to the principal debtor for the whole. But when the person paying ought only to have recourse for part, and is debtor without recourse and on his own account also, the subrogation will only be for the portions for which he might have recourse; Massé, ub. sup.

Most of the cases of subrogation so called in the common law arise from transactions of principals and sureties.

Courts of equity have held sureties entitled, upon payment of the debt due by their principal to the creditor, to have the full benefit of all the collateral securities, both of a legal and equitable nature, which the creditor has taken as an additional pledge for his debt; Story, Eq. Jur. § 499.

It is a settled rule that in all cases where a party only secondarily liable on an obligation is compelled to discharge it, he has a right in a court of equity to stand in the place of the creditor, and be subrogated to all his rights against the party previously liable; 4 Johns. Ch. 123; 29 Vt. 676; 4 Pick. 505; 3 Stor. 392; 1 Gill & J. 346; 10 Yerg. 310; 27 Miss. 679. This is clearly the case where the surety takes an assignment of the security; 2 Me. 341.

If a surety on a debt secured by mortgage pays the debt, he is entitled to the mortgage as security; 1 Turn. & R. 224; 3 Mylne & K. 183; 2 Sim. 155. In all cases the payment must have been made by a party liable, and not by a mere volunteer; 3 Paige, Ch. 117; 1 Spears, Eq. 37; 2 Brock. 252; 4 Bush, 471. The creditor must have had his claim fully satisfied; 1 Gill & J. 347; and the surety claiming subrogation must have paid it; 6 Watts, 221; 3 Hayw. 14; 3 Barb. Ch. 625; 11 Ired. 118; 13 Ill. 68; and is subrogated, where he has paid to redeem a security, only to the amount he has paid, whatever be the value of the security; 19 Miss. 632; 2 Sneed, 93; 11 Gratt. 522. But giving a note is payment within this rule; 8 Tex. 66.

Judgment obtained against the principal and surety does not destroy the relation as between themselves; 2 Ga. 239; 11 Barb. 159. If a judgment is recovered against a debtor and surety separately for the same amount, the surety can enforce the judgment against his principal when assigned to him after he paid the amount of the judgment; 10 Johns. 524; 3 Rich. Eq. 139.

A surety in a judgment to obtain a stay of execution, is not entitled to be substituted on paying the judgment, as against subsequent creditors; 5 W. & S. 352. Nor can the surety be subrogated, although he has paid a judgment, if he has sued his principal and failed to recover; 8 Watts, 384.

If a judgment is recovered and the sureties pay, they are entitled to be subrogated; 1 W. & S. 155; 3 Leigh, 272; 14 Ga. 674; 5 B. Monr. 393; 22 Ala. N. S. 782; 3 Sandf. Ch. 431; even where a mortgage had been given them, but which turned out to be invalid; 4 Hen. & M. 436. This seems to be contradicted in 3 Gratt. 343.

Entry of satisfaction on a judgment does not destroy subrogation, if the entry was not made at the instance of the surety; 20 Penn. 41.

Where the surety has become liable on the contract of his principal, when the principal fails to perform the contract the surety may pay and be subrogated; 3 Gill & J. 243; 15 N. H. 119: thus, where the surety was held on a bond which he was obliged to pay; 2 Call, 125; 1 Ired. Ch. 340; 22 Vt. 274; and this even where the bond was given to the United States to pay duties on goods belonging to a third person; 4 Rand. 438. And where the bond was given for the payment of the price of land, he was allowed to sell the land; 2 D. & B. 390; 3 Ala. N. S. 430; 2 B. Monr. 50.

But it is said the mere payment does not ipso facto subrogate him; 6 W. & S. 190.

If the surety be also a debtor, there will be no substitution, unless expressly made; 2 Penn. 296; and the person who claims a right of subrogation must have superior equities to those opposing him; 3 Penn. 200.

Sureties of a surety, and his assignee, are entitled to all the rights of the surety, and to be substituted to his place as to all remedies against the principal or his estate; 5 Barb. 398; 22 Vt. 274.

A surety cannot compel the creditor to exhaust his security before coming on the surety; 37 N. J. L. 370.

Fourth, subrogation is allowed in the civil law for the benefit of the beneficiary heir who has paid with his own money the debts of the inheritance; Massé, ub. sup.

Fifth, and for the benefit of the payer of a debt through the medium of a bill of exchange or promissory negotiable note; Code Commerciel, 159.

Sixth, and for the benefit of the successive indorsers of a note, to the rights of those who follow them against those who precede them, when they are called upon to pay the note.

The debt of the acceptor of a bill is not extinguished by the payment of the bill by the indorser or drawer; for the same rights will remain against him, in their favor, which the holder had himself, unless he is a mere accommodation acceptor; Story, Bills, § 422. See a limitation in 19 Barb. 562.

But if payment is made by an indorser who had not received due notice, it is at his own risk, and he can ordinarily have no recourse over to third persons; Chitty, Bills, c. 9.

An accommodation acceptor is not entitled on payment to a security given to an accommodation indorser; 1 Dev. Eq. 205.

An accommodation indorser who is obliged to pay the note is subrogated to the collateral securities; 12 La. An. 733. This subrogation in the civil law operates for the benefit of a holder by intervention (i. e. who pays for the honor of the drawer).

This species of subrogation (by indorsement) is to be distinguished from that which a surety on a note has when he is compelled to pay. Such surety is entitled to the benefit of all the securities which the holder has; 2 Rich. Eq. 179; 4 Ired. Eq. 22; 22 Penn. 68; 7 N. H. 286.

In the civil law, an agent who buys goods for his principal with his own money is so far subrogated to the principal's rights that if he fails the agent may sell his goods as if they were his own; Cour. de Cass. Nov. 14, 1810.

An insurer of real property is subrogated to the rights of the insured against third parties who are responsible for the loss at common law; 2 B. & C. 254; 13 Metc. 99; 73 N. Y.

399; 39 Me. 253; 25 Conn. 265. And it is well settled in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and Illinois, that the mortgagee cannot, after payment of his debt by the underwriter, enforce his claim against the mortgagor, but that the underwriter is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee; 17 Penn. 253; 70 N. Y. 19; 52 Ill. 442; 2 Dutch. 541; 45 Me. 354. So in Canada; 1 Low. Can. 222. The contrary view, however, has been consistently maintained in Massachusetts; 7 Cush. 1; 10 Allen, 283. See 27 Am. L. Reg. 737.

But an insurance company is not subrogated to the rights of a mortgagee who has paid the premiums himself so as to demand an assignment of the mortgage before paying his claim when the buildings were burned; 2 Gray, 216; 8 Hare, 216.

The doctrine of subrogation does not apply to life insurance; 25 Conn. 265; 79 N. Y. 72. But see 3 Dill. 1; 43 Vt. 536.

In the civil law, whoever paid privileged debts, such, for example, as the funeral expenses, had by subrogation the prior claim: Eorum ratio prior est creditorum quorum pecunia ad creditores privilegios pervenit. Dig. de reb. anc. jud. pos. l. 24, § 3.

So, if during the community of goods arising from the relation of husband and wife an annuity which was due from one of them only was redeemed by the money belonging to both, the other was subrogated pleno jure as to that part of the claim; Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 1, art. 6, § 2.

In the civil law, the consignee of goods who pays freight is said to be subrogated to the rights of the carrier and forwarder; Cour de Cass. 7 Dec. 1826. The common law does not recognize this right as a subrogation. But see LIEN.

In marshalling assets, where a mortgagee has a lien on two funds, if he satisfy himself out of one which is mortgaged to a junior mortgagee so as to extinguish the fund, the junior mortgagee is subrogated to the other fund; 4 Sandf. Ch. 510.

This right of subrogation is a personal right, but may be assigned; 3 Penn. 300; and the creditors of the surety may claim the benefit of the right; 8 Penn. 347; 10 id. 519; 22 Miss. 87. As to which of two parties liable for the debt shall be subrogated, see 23 Vt. 169.

Where one is subrogated to a mortgage, it is not necessary that it be assigned to him; 45 Vt. 525; though such assignment would only strengthen his position; 10 Minn. 376. The right of subrogation to a prior encumbrance is sometimes enforced by a court of equity by compelling the holder of it to assign it to the party entitled to subrogation; 51 N. Y. 333; 61 Penn. 16.

Sureties of a surety are entitled to the rights by subrogation of their principal; 5 Barb. 398; 22 Vt. 274. The creditor need not be made a party to a bill to obtain subrogation; 10 Yerg. 310. Consult Domat, Civil Law; Guyot, Répert. Univ.; Massé, Droit Comm.; Dixon, Subrogation; Sheldon, Subrogation.

SUBSCRIBING WITNESS. One who subscribes his name to a writing in order to be able at a future time to prove its due execution. An attesting witness.

In order to make a good subscribing witness, it is requisite he should sign his name to the instrument himself, at the time of its execution, and at the request or with the assent of the party; 6 Hill, 303; 11 M. & W. 168; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 569 a; 5 Watts, 399.

SUBSCRIPTION (Lat. sub, under, scribo, to write). The placing a signature at the bottom of a written or printed engagement; or it is the attestation of a witness by so writing his name; but it has been holden that the attestation of an illiterate witness by making his mark is a sufficient subscription; 7 Bing. 457; 2 Ves. Sen. 454; 1 Atk. 177; 1 Ves. 11; 3 P. Wms. 253; 1 V. & B. 392.

The act by which a person contracts, in writing, to furnish a sum of money for a particular purpose: as, a subscription to a charitable institution, a subscription for a book, for a newspaper, and the like.

One who subscribes, agreeably to the statute and by-laws of a chartered company, acquires a right to his shares, which is a sufficient consideration to make the subscription obligatory on him; but otherwise, where the organization was not yet effected; 87 Penn. 332; 90 id. 169. The question, how far voluntary subscriptions for charitable objects are binding, is not thoroughly settled. But the rule seems well established that where advances have been made, or liabilities not rashly incurred by others, on the strength of such subscriptions, before notice of withdrawal, they must be held obligatory; 14 Mass. 172; 46 Ill. 377; 1 Pars. Con. *453; and not otherwise; 93 Ill. 475; see 84 Penn. 388. See SUNDAY.

SUBSCRIPTION LIST. A list of subscribers to some agreement with each other or a third person.

The subscription list of a newspaper is an incident to the newspaper, and passes with the sale of the printing materials; 2 Watts, 111.

SUBSIDY. In English Law. An aid, tax, or tribute granted by parliament to the king for the urgent occasions of the kingdom, to be levied on every subject of ability, according to the value of his lands or goods. Jacob, Law Dict.

In International Law. The assistance given in money by one nation to another to enable it the better to carry on a war, when such nation does not join directly in the war. Vattel, liv. 3, § 82. See NEUTRALITY.

SUBSTANCE (Lat. sub, under, stare, to stand). That which is essential: it is used in opposition to form.

It is a general rule that on any issue it is sufficient to prove the substance of the issue. For example, in a case where the defendant pleaded payment of the principal sum and all interest due, and it appeared in evidence that a gross sum was paid, not amounting to the full interest, but accepted by the plaintiff as full payment, the proof was held to be sufficient; 2 Stra. 699; 1 Phill. Ev. 161.

SUBSTANTIAL DAMAGES. Damages, assessed by the verdict of a jury, which are worth having, as opposed to nominal damages, q. v.

SUBSTITUTE (Lat. substitutus). One placed under another to transact business for him. In letters of attorney, power is generally given to the attorney to nominate and appoint a substitute.

Without such power, the authority given in one person cannot, in general, be delegated to another, because it is a personal trust and confidence, and is not, therefore, transmissible. The authority is given to him to exercise his judgment and discretion, and it cannot be said that the trust and confidence reposed in him shall be exercised at the discretion of another; 2 Atk. 88; 2 Ves. 645. But an authority may be delegated to another when the attorney has express power to do so; Bunb. 166; T. Jones, 110. See Story, Ag. §§ 13, 14. When a man is drawn into the militia, he may in some cases hire a substitute.

SUBSTITUTED SERVICE. In English Practice. Service of process upon another than the person upon whom it should be made, where the latter is impossible. Hunt. Eq. pt. i. ch. 2, § 1; Lush. Pr. 867–870. But an order must be obtained from the court to allow of substituted service, the application for which must be supported by affidavit; Moz. & W.

SUBSTITUTES. In Scotch Law. Where an estate is settled on a long series of heirs, substituted one after another, in tailzie, the person first called in the tailzies is the institute; the rest, the heirs of tailzie, or the substitutes. Erkskine, Inst. 3. 8. 8. See TAILZIE.

SUBSTITUTION (Lat. substitutio). In Civil Law. The putting of one person in the place of another, so that he may, in default of ability in the former, or after him, have the benefit of a devise or legacy.

Direct substitution is merely the institution of a second legatee in case the first should be either incapable or unwilling to accept the legacy: for example, if a testator should give to Peter his estate, but in case he cannot legally receive it, or he wilfully refuses it, then I give it to Paul. Fidei commissary substitution is that which takes place when the person substituted is not to receive the legacy after the first legatee, and, consequently, must receive the thing bequeathed from the hands of the latter: for example, I institute Peter my heir, and I request that at his death he shall deliver my succession to Paul. Merlin, Répert.; 5 Toullier, 14. See SUBROGATION.

SUBSTRACTION. In French Law. The act of taking something fraudulently; it is generally applied to the taking of the goods of the estate of a deceased person fraudulently. See EXPILATION.

SUBTERRANEAN WATERS. Subterranean streams, as distinguished from subterranean percolations, are governed by the same rules, and give rise to the same rights and obligations, as flowing surface streams; 25 Penn. 528; 2 H. & N. 186. But see 12 M. & W. 374. The owner of the land under which a stream flows, can, therefore, maintain an action for the diversion of it, if such diversion took place under the same circumstances as would have enabled him to recover, if the stream had been wholly above ground; 25 Penn. 528; 45 id. 518; 5 H. & N. 982; 1 Sawy. 270. But in order to bring subterranean streams within the rules governing surface streams, their existence and their course must be, to some extent, known or notorious; 20 Conn. 533; 25 id. 594; 45 Penn. 518. Where there is nothing to show that the waters of a spring are supplied by any defined flowing stream, the presumption will be that they have their source in the ordinary percolations of water through the soil; 42 Cal. 303. As these percolations spread themselves in every direction through the earth, it is impossible to avoid disturbing them without relinquishing the necessary enjoyment of the land, the law does not therefore forbid their disturbance; 79 Penn. 81. See Ang. Waterc. § 109; Bainbr. Mines, 85; 2 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.), 65; 3 id. 223. As to a prescriptive claim to direct such waters, see 20 Conn. 533; 32 Vt. 724.

SUBTRACTION (Lat. sub, away, traho, to draw). The act of withholding or detaining any thing unlawfully.

The principle descriptions of this offence are: (1) Subtraction of suit, and service, consisting of a withdrawal of fealty, suit of court, rent or customary services, from the lord or landlord; 2 B. & C. 827. (2) Of tithes. (3) Of conjugal rights. (4) Of legacies, which is the withholding of legacies by an executor. (5) Of church rates, a familiar class of cases in England, consisting in the refusal to pay the amount of rate at which any individual parishioner has been assessed for the necessary repairs of the parish church. Brown, Dict.

SUBTRACTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS. The act of a husband or wife living separately from the other without a lawful cause. 3 Bla. Com. 94. See RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS.

SUCCESSION. In Louisiana. The right and transmission of the rights and obligations of the deceased to his heirs. The estate, rights, and charges which a person leaves after his death, whether the property exceed the charges or the charges exceed the property, or whether he has left only charges without property. The succession not only includes the rights and obligations of the deceased as they exist at the time of his death, but all that has accrued thereto since the opening of the succession, as also of the new charges to which it becomes subject. That right by which the heir can take possession of the estate of the deceased, such as it may be.

Irregular succession is that which is established by law in favor of certain persons or of the state in default of heirs either legal or instituted by testament.

Legal succession is that which is established in favor of the nearest relations of the deceased.

Testamentary succession is that which results from the constitution of the heir, contained in a testament executed in the form prescribed by law. See HEIR; DESCENT; Pothier, des Successions; Toullier, l. 3, tit. 1.

In Common Law. The mode by which one set of persons, members of a corporation aggregate, acquire the rights of another set which preceded them. This term in strictness is to be applied only to such corporations; 2 Bla. Com. 430.

SUCCESSION DUTY. A duty payable under the Succession Duties Act of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, amended by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, upon succession to property. It is of the nature of the collateral inheritance tax of Pennsylvania, and like the English legacy duty, is levied at the rate of from one to ten per cent., according as the successor is more or less nearly related to the decedent. See Brown, Dict.

SUCCESSOR. One who follows or comes into the place of another.

This term is applied more particularly to a sole corporation, or to any corporation. The word heir is more correctly applicable to a common person who takes an estate by descent. 12 Pick. 322; Co. Litt. 8 b.

A person who has been appointed or elected to some office after another person.

SUCKEN, SUCHEN. In Scotch Law. The whole lands restricted to a mill,—that is, whose tenants are bound to grind there. The possessors of these lands are called suckeners. Bell, Dict.

SUE. To commence or continue legal proceedings for the recovery of a right. See ACTION; SUIT.

SUFFRAGAN. (L. Lat. suffraganeus). A titular bishop ordained to assist the bishop of the diocese in his spiritual functions, or to take his place. The number was limited to two to each bishop by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 14. So called because by his suffrage ecclesiastical causes were to be judged. T. L.

SUFFRAGE. Vote; the act of voting.

Participation in the suffrage is not of right, but it is granted by the state on a consideration of what is most for the interest of the state; Cooley, Const. 237; 1 MacArthur, 169; 11 Blatch. 200. The grant of suffrage makes it a legal right until it is recalled, and it is protected by the law as property is. The states establish rules of suffrage except as shown below. Suffrage is never a necessary accompaniment of state citizenship, and the great majority of citizens are always excluded from it. On the other hand, suffrage is sometimes given to those who are not citizens; as has been done by no less than twelve of the states, in admitting persons to vote, who, being aliens, have merely declared their intentions to become citizens.

By the constitution of the United States the qualifications for electors of members of the house of representatives are to be the same as those for the most numerous branch of the state legislature. The fifteenth amendment provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The fourteenth amendment was intended mainly to effect the same object by a voluntary action on the part of the state, but was practically superseded by the fifteenth amendment.

It has been said that the constitution of the United States confers the right to vote upon no one. That right comes to the citizens of the United States when they possess it at all, under state laws. But the fifteenth amendment confers upon them a new exemption: from discrimination in elections on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; 92 U. S. 214, 542; see Cooley, Const. 266. In Connecticut suffrage is denied to all who cannot read; in Massachusetts and Missouri to all who cannot both read and write, and many of the states admit no one to the right of suffrage unless he is a tax-payer. See ELECTION.

SUGGESTIO FALSI (Lat.). A statement of a falsehood. This amounts to a fraud whenever the party making it was bound to disclose the truth.

The following is an example of a case where chancery will interfere and set aside a contract as fraudulent, on account of the suggestio falsi: a purchaser applied to the seller to purchase a lot of wild land, and represented to him it was worth nothing, except for a sheep pasture, when he knew there was a valuable mine on the lot, of which the seller was ignorant. The sale was set aside; 2 Paige, Ch. 390. See CONCEALMENT; MISREPRESENTATION; REPRESENTATION; SUPPRESSIO VERI.

SUGGESTION. In Practice. Information. It is applied to those cases where during the pendency of a suit some matter of fact occurs which puts a stop to the suit in its existing form, such as death or insolvency of a party; the counsel of the other party announces the fact in court or enters it upon the record: the fact is usually admitted, if true, and the court issues the proper order thereupon. See 2 Sell. Pr. 191.

In wills, when suggestions are made to a testator for the purpose of procuring a device of his property in a particular way, and when such suggestions are false, they generally amount to a fraud. Bacon, Abr. Wills (G 3); 5 Toullier, n. 706.

SUGGESTIVE INTERROGATION. A phrase which has been used by some writers to signify the same thing as leading question. 2 Bentham, Ev. b. 3, c. 3. It is used in the French law.

SUI JURIS (Lat. of his own right). Possessing all the rights to which a freeman is entitled; not being under the power of another, as a slave, a minor, and the like.

To make a valid contract, a person must, in general, be sui juris. Every one of full age is presumed to be sui juris; Story, Ag. 10.

SUICIDE (Lat. suus, himself, cædere, to kill). In Medical Jurisprudence. Self-destruction.

This was once regarded by the common law as exclusively a felonious act: of late, however, it has been often treated as the result of insanity, to be followed by all the legal consequences of that disease, so far as it is practicable. That suicide may be committed by a person in the full enjoyment of his reason, there can be no doubt; nor can there be any doubt that it is often the result of unquestionable insanity. Between the two kinds of suicide here indicated, the medical jurist is obliged to discriminate, and in performing this duty the facts on the subject should be carefully considered.

The instinct of self-preservation is not so strong as to prevent men entirely from being tired of life and seeking their own destruction. They may have exhausted all their sources of enjoyment, their plans of business or of honor may have been frustrated, poverty or dishonor may be staring them in the face, the difficulties before them may seem utterly insurmountable, and, for some reason like these, they calmly and deliberately resolve to avoid the evil by ending their life. The act may be unwise and presumptuous, but there is in it no element of disease. On the other hand, it is well known that suicidal desires are a very common trait of insanity,—that a large proportion of the insane attempt or meditate self-destruction. It may be prompted by a particular delusion, or by a sense of irresistible necessity. It may be manifested in the shape of a well-considered, persistent intention to seize upon the first opportunity to terminate life, or of a blind, automatic impulse acting without much regard to means or circumstances. As the disease gives way and reason is restored, this propensity disappears, and the love of life returns.

Besides these two forms of the suicidal propensity, there are other phases which cannot be referred with any degree of certainty to either of them. Persons, for instance, in the enjoyment of everything calculated to make life happy, and exhibiting no sign of mental disease, deliberately end their days. Another class, on approaching a precipice or a body of water, are seized with a desire, which may be irresistible, to take the fatal plunge. Many are the cases of children who, after some mild reproof, or slight contradiction, or trivial disappointment, have gone at once to some retired place and taken their lives. Now, we are as little prepared to refer all such cases to mental disease as we are to free voluntary choice. Every case, therefore, must be judged by the circumstances accompanying it, always allowing the benefit of the doubt to be given to the side of humanity and justice.

By the common law, suicide was treated as a crime, and the person forfeited all chattels real or personal, and various other property. 4 Bla. Com. 190. This result can be avoided by establishing the insanity of the party; and in England, of late years, courts have favored this course whenever the legal effect of suicide would operate as a punishment. On the other hand, where the rights and interests of other parties are involved, the question of insanity is more closely scrutinized; and ample proof is required of the party on whom the burden of proof lies.

In regard to wills made just before committing suicide, the prevalent doctrine on this point, both in the United States and in England, is that the act of self-destruction may not necessarily imply insanity, and that if the will is a rational act, rationally done, the sanity of the testator is established; 7 Pick. 94; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 109; 2 Harr. Del. 583; 2 Eccl. 415.

In regard to life-insurance, it is the law of England, at present, that in every case of intentional suicide, whatever may have been the mental condition, the policy becomes void; 3 Mann. & G. 437; 5 id. 639; 38 L. J. N. S. Ch. 53. In Stormont vs. Ins. Co., 1 F. & F. Nisi Prius, 22, the court told the jury the question was, did the assured know he was throwing himself out of the window? If he did, no recovery could be had under the policy. Otherwise, if he did not. Such appears to be the rule in Ohio, Maryland, and Massachusetts; 4 Ins. L. J. 159; 4 Allen, 96; 42 Md. 414; 102 Mass. 227; and it is said, in Germany, Holland, and France; 6 Ins. L. J. 719; May Ins. § 312. But, although it has been a much vexed question, the American cases generally construe the phrases "die by his own hand," "commit suicide," or, "die by suicide," as including only criminal acts of self-destruction, and not extending to acts not under the control of the will; 54 Me. 224; 4 Seld. (N. Y.) 299; 15 Wall. 580; 7 Heisk. 567; s. c. 19 Am. Rep. 623; Monograph on the Law of Suicide in Life Ins., by William Shrady, N. Y. 1869. But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a condition in the policy that it shall be void if the insured should die by suicide, "sane or insane," avoids the policy, notwithstanding he was of unsound mind and wholly unconscious of the act; Bigelow vs. Berkshire L. Ins. Co., 93 U. S. 284. It has been said that the question is not precisely whether a party is insane or not, but whether he understood the physical nature and consequences of his act, and had sufficient will to make the act voluntary; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 101, 679. See Wharton, Mental Unsoundness; Phill. Ins.

In cases of persons found dead, the cause may not be always perfectly obvious, and it becomes necessary to determine whether death was an act of suicide, or murder. This is often one of the most difficult questions in the whole range of medical jurisprudence, requiring for its solution the most profound knowledge of surgery and physiology, and great practical sagacity. In case of death caused by wounds, the kind and situation of the weapon, the extent, direction, and situation of the wounds, their connection with marks of blows, the temper and disposition of the person, all these and many other circumstances must be carefully and intelligently investigated. The frequency with which cases of suicide strongly resemble, in their external characters, those of murder, renders necessary the highest degree of skill and careful discrimination. If one counsels another to commit suicide, and is present at the consummation of the act, it is murder in the principal; 13 Mass. 359; Russ. & R. 523. See FELO DE SE.

SUIT (L. Lat. secta; from Lat. sequi, to follow. French, suite). In Practice. An action.

The word suit in the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 applies to any proceeding in a court of justice in which the plaintiff pursues in such court the remedy which the law affords him. An application for a prohibition is, therefore, a suit; 2 Pet. 449. According to the Code of Practice of Louisiana, art. 96, a suit is a real, personal or mixed demand made before a competent judge, by which the parties pray to obtain their rights and a decision of their disputes. In that acceptation, the words suit, process, and cause are in that state almost synonymous. See SECTA; Steph. Pl. 427; 3 Bla. Com. 295; 1 Chitty, Pl. 399; Wood, Civ. Law, b. 4, p. 315; 4 Mass. 263; 18 Johns. 14; 4 Watts, 154; 3 Story, Const. § 1719. In its most extended sense, the word suit includes not only a civil action, but also a criminal prosecution, as, indictment, information, and a conviction by a magistrate; Hamm. N. P. 270. Suit is applied to proceedings in chancery as well as in law; 1 Sm. Ch. Dec. 26, 27; and is, therefore, more general than action, which is almost exclusively applied to matters of law; 10 Paige, Ch. 516. But Actions is a title in the United States Equity Digest.

The witnesses or followers of the plaintiff. 3 Bla. Com. 295. See SECTA.

Suit of court, an attendance which a tenant owes to his lord's court. Cowel, Gloss.; Jacob, Law Dict. 4.

Suit covenant, where one has covenanted to do suit and service in his lord's court.

Suit custom, where service is owed time out of mind.

Suithold, a tenure in consideration of certain services to the superior lord.

The following one in chase: as, fresh suit.

A petition to a king, or a great person, or a court.

SUIT SILVER. A small sum of money paid in lieu of attendance at the court barons. Cowel.

SUITE (French). Those persons who by his authority follow or attend an ambassador or other public minister.

In general, the suite of a minister are protected from arrest, and the inviolability of his person is communicated to those who form his suite; Vattel, lib. 4, c. 9, § 120. See 1 Dall. 177; Baldw. 240; AMBASSADOR.

SUITOR. One who is a party to a suit or action in court. One who is a party to an action. In its ancient sense, suitor meant one who was bound to attend the county court; also one who formed part of the secta.

SUITORS' FUND IN CHANCERY. In England. A fund consisting of moneys which, having been paid into the court of chancery, are placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors, including interest from the same. By stat. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 91, sec. 4, the principal of this fund, amounting to over £3,000,000, was transferred to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. Moz. & W.

SUMMARY ACTIONS. In Scotch Law. Those which are brought into court not by summons, but by petition, corresponding to summary proceedings in English courts. Bell; Brown.

SUMMARY PROCEEDING. A form of trial in which the ancient established course of legal proceedings is disregarded, especially in the matter of trial by jury, and, in the case of the heavier crimes, presentment by a grand jury. See 8 Gray, 329.

In no case can the party be tried summarily unless when such proceedings are authorized by legislative authority, except perhaps in cases of contempts; for the common law is a stranger to such a mode of trial; 4 Blackstone, Comm. 280. See 2 Kent, 73; 2 Conn. 819; 4 id. 535; 37 Me. 172; 4 Hill, N. Y. 145; 8 Gray, 329; 4 Dev. 15; 10 Yerg. 59.

The term summary proceedings is applied to proceedings under statutes for enabling landlords to promptly dispossess tenants who hold over after default in payment of rent, or after expiration of the term.

SUMMING UP. In Practice. The act of making a speech before a court and jury, after all the evidence has been heard, in favor of one of the parties in the cause, is called summing up. When the judge delivers his charge to the jury, he usually sums up the evidence in the case. 6 Hargr. St. Tr. 832; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 632. See CHARGE; OPENING AND CLOSING.

SUMMON. In Practice. To notify the defendant that an action has been instituted against him, and that he is required to answer to it at a time and place named. This is done by a proper officer's either giving the defendant a copy of the summons, or leaving it at his house, or by reading the summons to him.

SUMMONERS. Petty officers who cite men to appear in any court.

SUMMONS. In Practice. The name of a writ commanding the sheriff, or other authorized officer, to notify a party to appear in court to answer a complaint made against him and in the said writ specified, on a day therein mentioned. Viner, Abr. Summons; 2 Sell. Pr. 356; 3 Bla. Com. 279.

SUMMONS AND ORDER. In English Practice. In this phrase the summons is the application to a common law judge at chambers in reference to a pending action, and upon it the judge or master makes the order. Moz. & W.

SUMMONS AND SEVERANCE. See SEVERANCE.

SUMMUM JUS (Lat.). Extreme right, strict right. See MAXIMS, Summum jus, etc.

SUMPTUARY LAWS. Laws relating to the expenses of the people, and made to restrain excess in apparel, food, furniture, etc.

They originated in the view that luxury is, in some of its degrees, opposed to public policy, and that the state is bound to interfere against it. Montesquieu, Esprit des Lois, b. 7, c. 2, 4, and Tacitus, Ann. b. 2, ch. 33, b. 3, ch. 52.

In England, in 1336, it was enacted, 10 Edw. III. c. 3, that inasmuch as many mischiefs had happened to the people of the realm by excessive and costly meats, by which, among other things, many who aspired in this respect beyond their means were impoverished and unable to aid themselves or their liege lord in time of need, all men were forbidden to have served more than two courses at a meal, each of but two sorts of victual, except on the principal feasts of the year, and then only three courses were allowed. Blackstone states that this is still unrepealed. 4 Com. 170. Subsequent statutes—that of 1363, and those of 1463 and 1482—regulated the dress, and to some extent the diet, of the people, with careful regard to their rank. The substance of these statutes will be found in Knight's History of England, vol. 2, pp. 272-274. They were repealed by 1 Jac. I. c. 25.

In modern times legislation is not resorted to in respect to this object; but the subject is frequently discussed in connection with the laws for the prevention or punishment of intemperance, which is so direct and fruitful a source of crime.

SUNDAY. The first day of the week. In some of the New England states it begins at sunset on Saturday, and ends at the same time the next day. But in other parts of the United States it generally commences at twelve o'clock on the night between Saturday and Sunday, and ends in twenty-four hours thereafter; 6 Gill & J. 268. See, on this point, 4 Strobh. 493 (a very learned case); 37 Mo. 466; 39 Me. 193; 3 Cush. 137. The Sabbath, the Lord's day, and Sunday, all mean the same thing; 6 Gill & J. 268. See 6 Watts, 231.

The stat. 5 and 6 Edw. V. c. 3 (1552), enacted that Sunday should be strictly observed as a holy day, provided that in case of necessity it should be lawful to labor, ride, fish, or work at any kind of work. The Book of Sports (1618) declared that, after divine service, the people should not be disturbed from any lawful recreation. The stat. 29 Car. II. c. 7, provided that no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever, should exercise any worldly business, etc., upon the Lord's day, works of necessity and charity alone excepted. It also forbade the execution of legal process on that day. This has been followed substantially in America, with a tendency to greater strictness. This includes all business, public or private, done in the ordinary calling of the person; 5 B. & C. 406; ordinary calling means that which the ordinary duties of the calling bring into continued action; 7 B. & C. 596; 55 Ga. 245. Many statutes except those who observe the seventh day; others do not; and such legislation is constitutional; 52 Penn. 126; 69 N. Y. 557; 122 Mass. 40. Cases of necessity are determined by the moral fitness of the work; 34 Penn. 409. Charity includes everything which proceeds from a sense of moral duty, or a feeling of kindness and humanity, and is intended wholly for the comfort and relief of another, and not for one's own pleasure and benefit; 118 Mass. 197. Necessity may arise out of particular occupations; 23 How. 219; 14 Wall. 494; but not when it is a work of mere convenience or profit; 97 Mass. 404; 30 Ind. 476. Running street railways on Sunday is illegal; 54 Penn. 401; contra, 26 Alb. L. J. 56 (N. Y. Ct. of App.); 72 N. Y. 196; 14 Reptr. 364 (Ky. Ct. of App.); and see 55 Ga. 126. When statutes forbid travelling on Sunday, there can be no recovery for injuries from defective streets; 117 Mass. 64; 51 Me. 423; 47 Vt. 32; but see 39 Wisc. 21; unless the party was travelling from motives of necessity or charity; 121 Mass. 301; or walking for exercise; 65 Me. 34. But in actions for torts against individuals or common carriers, it is no defence that the injury occurred upon Sunday; 26 Penn. 342; 48 Iowa, 652; contra, 124 Mass. 387.

Except as to judicial acts, which are void when done on Sunday; 1 W. Black. 526; see DIES NON; the common law makes no distinction between Sunday and any other day. The English cases decided after the act of Charles II., supra, merely avoided contracts made in pursuance of one's ordinary calling; see 1 Taunt. 131; 1 Cr. & J. 180; 31 Barb. 41; 44 id. 618; 4 M. & W. 270; but in most of the states contracts made on Sunday are invalid; see 35 Me. 143; 19 Vt. 358; 6 Watts, 231; 3 Wisc. 343. In New York any business but judicial may be done on Sunday; 44 Barb. 618. Generally speaking executory contracts made on Sunday will not be enforced, while executed contracts will not be disturbed; 78 Penn. 473; 105 Mass. 399; 57 Ga. 179; but see 2 Ohio St. 388; 13 Kans. 529, as to executory contracts; delivery on Sunday passes title against the vendor; 26 Cal. 514; 13 Ind. 203; but see 12 Mich. 378; a church subscription on Sunday is valid in Pennsylvania, 12 Reptr. 665; and Michigan, 21 Alb. L. J. 293; see 62 Ind. 365. A contract dated on Sunday may be shown to be erroneously dated; 97 Mass. 166; and it may be shown that a contract bearing a secular date was actually dated on Sunday; 48 Me. 198; but not against a bona fide holder without notice; 48 Iowa, 228. When a contract takes effect on delivery, the date is not material; 6 Bush, 185; 43 Iowa, 297; and a note executed on Sunday but delivered on another day is valid; 24 Vt. 189; 35 Me. 143; a contract made on Sunday may be ratified; 7 Gray, 164; 24 Vt. 317; but see 11 Ala. 885; a will executed on Sunday is valid; 9 Allen, 118; 1 Am. L. Rev. 750 (N. H.). A contract for an advertisement in a Sunday paper is invalid; 24 N. Y. 353; contra, 52 Mo. 474. Laws requiring all persons to refrain from their ordinary callings on Sunday have been held not to encroach on the religious liberty of the people; Cooley, Const. Lim. 734; they may be sustained as police regulations; 8 Penn. 312; 33 Mich. 279; 40 Ala. 725.

No one is bound to do work in performance of his contract on Sunday, unless the work by its very nature or by express agreement is to be done on that day and can be then done without a breach of law; 18 Conn. 181; 6 Johns. 326; 10 Ohio, 426; 7 Blackf. 479.

Sundays are computed in the time allowed for the performance of an act; 10 M. & W. 331; but if the last day happen to be a Sunday, it is to be excluded, and the act must, in general, be performed on Monday; 3 Penn. R. 201; 3 Chitty, Pr. 110. Notes and bills, when they fall due on Sunday, are payable on Saturday. See, as to the origin of keeping Sunday as a holiday, Neale, F. & F.; Story, Pr. Notes, § 220; Story, Bills, § 233; Pars. Notes & Bills. See, generally, 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 285; 3 Rep. Am. Bar Association (1880); 2 Am. L. Rev. 226; 44 Barb. 618; 21 Alb. L. J. 424 (Sabbath breaking); 28 Am. L. Reg. 137, 209, 273; 32 Am. Rep. 557; 30 id. 417; 17 id. 122 (legality of labor on Sunday); 3 id. 371, n.; 4 Strobh. 493; 54 Penn. 401; 19 Vt. 358; 8 Cr. L. Mag. 632 (Sabbath-breaking; works of necessity). The Massachusetts law on this subject depends more on its peculiar legislation and customs than any general principles of justice or law; 23 How. 209.

As to execution of legal process on Sunday, see DIES NON.

SUPER ALTUM MARE (Lat.). Upon the high sea. See HIGH SEAS.

SUPER VISUM CORPORIS (Lat.). Upon view of the body. When an inquest is held over a body found dead, it must be super visum corporis. See CORONER; INQUEST.

SUPERCARGO. In Maritime Law. A person specially employed by the owner of a cargo to take charge of and sell to the best advantage merchandise which has been shipped, and to purchase returning cargoes and to receive freight, as he may be authorized.

Supercargoes have complete control over the cargo and every thing which immediately concerns it, unless their authority is either expressly or impliedly restrained; 12 East, 381. Under certain circumstances they are responsible for the cargo; 4 Mass. 115; see 1 Gill & J. 1; but the supercargo has no power to interfere with the government of the ship; 3 Pardessus, n. 646.

SUPERFICIARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. He who has built upon the soil of another, which he has hired for a number of years or forever, yielding a yearly rent. This is not very different from the owner of a lot on ground-rent in Pennsylvania. Dig. 43. 18. 1.

SUPERFICIES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Whatever has been erected on the soil.

SUPERFŒTATION. The conception of a second embryo during the gestation of the first, or the conception of a child by a woman already pregnant with another, during the time of such pregnancy.

This doctrine, though doubted, seems to be established by numerous cases; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 193; Cassan, Superfœtation; New York Medical Repository; 1 Briand, Méd. Lég. prem. partie, c. 3, art. 4; 1 Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 299; Buffon, Hist. Nat. de l'Homme, Puberté.

SUPERINSTITUTION. The institution of one upon another, as where two persons are admitted and are instituted to the same benefice, under adverse titles. Cowel.

SUPERIOR. One who has a right to command; one who holds a superior rank: as, a soldier is bound to obey his superior.

In estates, some are superior to others: an estate entitled to a servitude or easement over another estate is called the superior or dominant, and the other the inferior or servient estate. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1612.

SUPERIOR COURT. A term applied collectively to the three courts of common law at Westminster: namely, the king's bench, the common pleas, the exchequer; and so in Ireland.

It denotes a court of intermediate jurisdiction between the courts of inferior or limited jurisdiction and the courts of last resort.

In American Law. A court of intermediate jurisdiction between the inferior courts and those of last resort. Such courts exist in Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, and North Carolina, exercising a jurisdiction throughout the entire state.

In Delaware it is the court of last resort; and in some of the states there is a superior court for cities.

SUPER-JURARE. A term anciently used, when a criminal, who tried to excuse himself by his own oath or that of one or two witnesses, was convicted by the oaths of many more witnesses. Moz. & W.

SUPERNUMERARII (Lat.). In Roman Law. Those advocates who were not statuti, which title see.

The statuti were inscribed in the matriculation books, and formed a part of the college of advocates in each jurisdiction. The supernumeraries were not attached to any bar in particular, and could reside where they pleased: they took the place of advocates by title as vacancies occurred in that body.

SUPERONERATIO (L. Lat. superonerare). Surcharging a common: i. e. putting in beasts of a number or kind other than the right of common allows. It can only be of a common appendant or appurtenant. Bracton, 229, and Fleta, lib. 4, c. 23, § 4, give two remedies, novel disseisin and writ of admeasurement, by which latter remedy no damages are recovered till the second offence. Now, distraining, trespass, and case are used as remedies. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 238*.

SUPERSEDEAS (Lat. that you set aside). In Practice. The name of a writ containing a command to stay the proceedings at law.

It is granted on good cause shown that the party ought not to proceed; Fitzh. N. B. 236. There are some writs which, though they do not bear this name, have the effect to supersede the proceedings: namely, a writ of error when bail is entered operates as a supersedeas; and a writ of certiorari to remove the proceedings of an inferior into a superior court has, in general, the same effect; 8 Mod. 373; 6 Binn. 461. But, under special circumstances, the certiorari has not the effect to stay the proceedings, particularly where summary proceedings, as to obtain possession under the landlord and tenant law, are given by statute; 6 Binn. 460. See Bacon, Abr.; Comyns, Dig.; Yelv. 6, n.

SUPERSTITIOUS USE. In English Law. When lands, tenements, rents, goods, or chattels are given, secured, or appointed for and toward the maintenance of a priest or chaplain to say mass; for the maintenance of a priest or other man to pray for the soul of any dead man in such a church or elsewhere; to have and maintain perpetual obits, lamps, torches, etc. to be used at certain times to help to save the souls of men out of purgatory; in such cases the king, by force of several statutes, is authorized to direct and appoint all such uses to such purposes as are truly charitable; Bacon, Abr. Charitable Uses and Mortmain (D); Duke, Char. Uses, 105; 6 Ves. 567; 4 Co 104.

In the United States, where all religious opinions are free and the right to exercise them is secured to the people, a bequest to support a Catholic priest, and perhaps certain other uses in England, would not be considered as superstitious uses; 1 Penn. 49; 8 Penn. 327; 17 S. & R. 378; 1 Wash. C. C. 224. Yet many of the superstitious uses of the English law would fail to be considered as charities, and would undoubtedly come under the prohibition against perpetuities. See CHARITIES; CHARITABLE USES; 1 Jar. Wills, ch. ix. In England, there are three classes of persons who have been held obnoxious to the law against superstitious uses: 1. Roman Catholics. 2. Protestant dissenters. 3. Jews. Their various disabilities have been almost wholly removed, and Catholics and Jews have been put on the same footing as Protestant dissenters in reference to their schools and places of religious worship; a bequest, however, for masses for deceased persons is held to be superstitious in England, but not in Ireland; Moz. & W.

SUPERVISOR. An overseer; a surveyor.

An officer whose duty it is to take care of the highways.

The chief officer of a town or organized township in the states of Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa. He has various duties assigned him by the statutes as a town officer, and likewise represents his town in the general assembly, or county board of supervisors. See BOARD OF SUPERVISORS.

SUPERVISORS OF ELECTION. Persons appointed and commissioned by the judge of the circuit court of the United States in cities or towns of over 20,000 inhabitants upon the written application of two citizens, or in any county or parish of any congressional district upon that of ten citizens, to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters for representatives and delegates in congress, and supervise the registry and mark the list of voters in such manner as will in their judgment detect and expose the improper removal or addition of any name. Supervisors of elections are further required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of representatives and delegates in congress and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications are in doubt; to remain at the polling places during the progress of the voting, to scrutinize the manner in which it is done, and the way in which the poll-books, registry lists and tables are kept, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or of any state, territorial, or municipal law. They are required also personally to scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot cast, and to forward such returns to the chief supervisor of the judicial district as he may require. It is the duty of the United States marshal and his deputies to support and protect supervisors in the discharge of their duties by making arrests as the circumstances may require, either with or without process, and in the absence of the deputies the supervisors may make arrests on their own authority.

Two supervisors are appointed for each election district or voting precinct. They must be of different political parties, and be able to read and write the English language.

In the event of the absence or inability of the circuit judge, he may designate a district judge to appoint supervisors of election; R. S. §§ 2011–2031.

In case a question arises in respect to what political organization should be recognized by the court in appointing supervisors, the rule is that the body which was recognized by the last state convention of the party is entitled to be considered as its representative organization; subject, however, to modification by change of circumstances; 9 Fed. Rep. 14.

The legislation of congress in vesting the appointment of supervisors in the courts is constitutional, and in the exercise of its supervisory power over elections for senators and representatives, new duties may be imposed by congress on the officers of election and new penalties for breach of duty; 100 U. S. 371, 399. See ELECTION.

SUPPLEMENTAL. That which is added to a thing to complete it; as, a supplemental affidavit, which is an additional affidavit to make out a case; a supplemental answer, a supplemental bill.

SUPPLEMENTAL BILL. In Equity Practice. A bill brought as an addition to an original bill to supply some defect in its original frame or structure which cannot be supplied by amendment. See 1 Paige, Ch. 200; 15 Miss. 456; 22 Barb. 161; 14 Ala. N. s. 147; 18 id. 771. It may be brought by a plaintiff or defendant; 2 Atk. 533; 2 Ball & B. 140; 1 Stor. 218; and as well after as before a decree; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 306; 1 Macn. & G. 405; Story, Eq. Pl. § 338; but must be within a reasonable time; 2 Halst. Ch. 465.

It may be filed when a necessary party has been omitted; 6 Madd. 369; 4 Johns. Ch. 605; to introduce a party who has acquired rights subsequent to the filing of the original bill; 3 Iowa, 472; when, after the parties are at issue and witnesses have been examined, some point not already made seems to be necessary, or some additional discovery is found requisite; 3 Atk. 110; 1 Paige, Ch. 200; Coop. Eq. Pl. 73; when new events referring to and supporting the rights and interests already mentioned have occurred subsequently to the filing of the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. 336; 5 Beav. 253; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 289; for the statement only of facts and circumstances material and beneficial to the merits, and not merely matters of evidence; 3 Stor. 299; when, after a decision has been made on the original bill, it becomes necessary to bring other matter before the court to get the full effect of it; Story, Eq. Pl. § 336; 3 Atk. 370; when a material fact, which existed before the filing of the bill, has been omitted, and it can no longer be introduced by way of amendment; 3 Stor. 54; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 303; Mitf. Ch. Pl. 55, 61, 325; but only by special leave of court when it seeks to change the original structure of the bill and introduce a new and different case; 4 Sim. 76, 628; 3 Atk. 110; 8 Price, 518; 4 Paige, Ch. 259; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 42. See 2 Sumn. 316.

The bill must be in respect to the same title in the same person as the original bill; Story, Eq. Pl. 339.

It must state the original bill, and the proceedings thereon; and when it is occasioned by an event which has occurred subsequently to the original bill, it must state that event and the consequent alteration with regard to the parties. In general, the supplemental bill must pray that all defendants appear and answer the charges it contains; Mitf. Ch. Pl. 75; Story, Eq. Pl. § 343. In the English Supreme Court of Judicature, amendments of the pleadings may now be allowed at any stage of the proceedings in an action.

SUPPLETORY OATH. In Ecclesiastical Law. An oath given by the judge to the plaintiff or defendant upon half proof, as by one witness, already made. The oath added to the half proof enables the judge to decide. It is discretionary with the judge. Stra. 80; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 370*.

SUPPLICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A petition for pardon of a first offence; also, a petition for reversal of judgment; also, equivalent to duplicatio, which is our rejoinder. Calvinus, Lex.

SUPPLICAVIT (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ issuing out of the king's bench or chancery for taking sureties of the peace: it is commonly directed to the justices of the peace, when they are averse to acting in the affair in their judicial capacity. 4 Bla. Com. 253. See Viner, Abr.; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (4 R), Forcible Entry (D 16, 17).

SUPPLICIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A corporal punishment ordained by law; the punishment of death: so called because it was customary to accompany the guilty man to the place of execution and there offer supplications for him.

SUPPLIES. In English Law. Extraordinary grants to the king by parliament to supply the exigencies of the state. Jacob.

SUPPORT. The right of support is an easement which one man, either by contract or prescription, enjoys, to rest the joists or timbers of his house upon the wall of an adjoining building owned by another person. 3 Kent, 435. See Washb. Easem.; Lois des Bat. pt. 1, c. 3, s. 2, a. 1, § 7.

A right to the support of one's land so as to prevent its falling into an excavation made by the owner of adjacent lands.

This support is of two kinds, lateral and subjacent. Lateral support is the right of land to be supported by the land which lies next to it. Subjacent support is the right of land to be supported by the land which lies under it. In lateral support, if the soil has no buildings on it and is thrown down by digging in the adjoining land, an action for damages will lie. This right is not in the nature of an easement, but is a right incident to the ownership of the property. But if there are buildings on the land and the digging in the adjoining land causes them to fall, no action will lie for the damage done to the buildings, but only for the injury done to the soil, except when the digging can be shown to be negligent. There is no natural right to the support of buildings as there is to the support of the soil. A right to the support of buildings is to be acquired only by grant express or implied, or, as has sometimes been held, by prescription. Equity will restrain by injunction any negligent excavating which is likely to overthrow neighboring buildings. In subjacent support the rules are the same, both as regards the natural soil and the soil when burdened with buildings. See 1 Am. L. Rev. 1; 27 Am. L. Reg. 529; Gale, Easements, 358; Washb., Goddard, Easements.

SUPPRESSIO VERI (Lat.). Concealment of truth.

In general, a suppression of the truth when a party is bound to disclose it vitiates a contract. In the contract of insurance, a knowledge of the facts is required to enable the underwriter to calculate the chances and form a due estimate of the risk; and, in this contract perhaps more than any other, the parties are required to represent every thing with fairness; 1 W. Blackst. 594; 3 Burr. 1809.

Suppressio veri, as well as suggestio falsi, is a ground to rescind an agreement, or at least not to carry it into execution; 3 Atk. 383; 1 Fonbl. Eq. c. 2, s. 8; 1 Ball & B. 241; 3 Munf. 232; 1 Pet. 383; 2 Paige, Ch. 390; Bisph. Eq. sec. 213; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 264. See CONCEALMENT; MISREPRESENTATION; REPRESENTATION; SUGGESTIO FALSI.

SUPRA PROTEST. Under protest. See ACCEPTANCE; ACCEPTOR; BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

SUPREMACY. Sovereign dominion, authority, and pre-eminence; the highest state. In the United States the supremacy resides in the people, and is exercised by their constitutional representatives, the president and congress. See SOVEREIGNTY.

SUPREME. That which is superior to all other things; as, the supreme power of the state, which is an authority over all others; the supreme court, which is superior to all other courts.

SUPREME COURT. In American Law. A court of superior jurisdiction in many of the states of the United States.

The name is properly applied to the court of last resort, and is so used in most of the states. In nearly all the states there is a supreme court, but in one or two there is a court of appellate jurisdiction from the supreme court.

See the articles on the respective states; COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES; 4 Bla. Com. 259.

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS. In American Law. An appellate tribunal, and the court of last resort, in the state of Connecticut. See CONNECTICUT.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT. In American Law. An appellate tribunal, and the court of last resort, in the states of Maine, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. See MAINE; MASSACHUSETTS; NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SURCHARGE. To put more cattle upon a common than the herbage will sustain or than the party hath a right to do. 3 Bla. Com. 237.

In case of common without stint it could only happen when insufficient herbage was left for the lord's own cattle; 1 Rolle, Abr. 399.

The remedy was by distraining the beasts beyond the proper number; an action of trespass which must have been brought by the lord of the manor; an action on the case, or a writ of admeasurement of pasture. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 238, n.

In Equity Practice. To prove the omission of an item from an account which is before the court as complete, which should be inserted to the credit of the party surcharging; Story, Eq. Jur. § 526; 2 Ves. 565; 11 Wheat. 237. It is opposed to falsify, which see. Leave to surcharge and falsify is granted in preference to opening an account, in case of an account stated by the parties or reported by an auditor, where the party obtaining the liberty would be concluded by the account were it not granted. See ACCOUNT; AUDITOR.

SURETY. A person who binds himself for the payment of a sum of money, or for the performance of something else, for another. See SURETYSHIP.

SURETYSHIP. An undertaking to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, by which the surety becomes bound as the principal or original debtor is bound. It differs from guaranty in this, that suretyship is a primary obligation to see that the debt is paid, while guaranty is a collateral undertaking, essentially in the alternative, to pay the debt if the debtor does not pay it; 24 Pick. 252. And accordingly a surety may be sued as a promisor to pay the debt, while a guarantor must be sued specially on his contract; 8 Pick. 423.

While guaranty applies only to contracts not under seal, and principally to mercantile obligations, suretyship may apply to all obligations under seal or by parol. The subjects are, however, nearly related, and many of the principles are common to both. There must be a principal debtor liable, otherwise the promise becomes an original contract; and, the promise being collateral, the surety must be bound to no greater extent than the principal. Suretyship is one of the contracts included in the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3.

The contract must be supported by a consideration, like every other promise. Without that it is void, apart from the Statute of Frauds, and whether in writing or not; 4 Taunt. 117; 17 Penn. 469.

Kent, C. J., divides secondary undertakings into three classes: First, cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal or direct debtor. Here there is not, and need not be, any other consideration than that moving between the creditor and original debtor. Second, cases in which the collateral undertaking is subsequent to the creation of the debt, and was not the inducement to it, though the subsisting liability is the ground of the promise without any distinct and unconnected inducement. Here there must be some further consideration shown, having an immediate respect to such liability; for the consideration for the original debt will not attach to this subsequent promise. Third, when the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the newly contracting parties. The two first classes of cases are within the Statute of Frauds; the last is not; 8 Johns. 29. This classification has been reviewed and affirmed in numerous cases; 21 N. Y. 415; 21 Me. 459; 15 Pick. 159.

The rule that the statute does not apply to class third has, however, been doubted; and it appears to be admitted that the principle is there inaccurately stated. The true test is the nature of the promise, not of the consideration; 50 Penn. 39; 94 E. C. L. R. 885. But see infra.

A simpler division is into two classes. First, where the principal obligation exists before the collateral undertaking is made. Second, where there is no principal obligation prior in time to the collateral undertaking. In the last class the principal obligation may be contemporaneous with or after the collateral undertaking. The first class includes Kent's second and third, the second includes Kent's first, to which must be added cases where the guaranty referring to a present or future principal obligation does not share the consideration thereof, but proceeds on a distinct consideration. Moreover, there are other original undertakings out of the Statute of Frauds and valid though by parol, besides his third class. These are where the credit is given exclusively to the promisor though the goods or consideration pass to another. Under this division, undertakings of the first class are original: first, when the principal obligation is thereby abrogated; second, when without such abrogation the promisor for his own advantage apparent on the bargain undertakes for some new consideration moving to him from the promisee; third, where the promise is in consideration of some loss or disadvantage to the promisee; fourth, where the promise is made to the principal debtor on a consideration moving from the debtor to the promisor; Theob. Surety, 37 et seq., 49 et seq. The cases under these heads will be considered separately.

First, where the principal obligation is pre-existent, there must be a new consideration to support the promise; and where this consideration is the discharge of the principal debtor, the promise is original and not collateral, as the first requisite of a collateral promise is the existence of a principal obligation. This has been held in numerous cases. The discharge may be by agreement, by novation or substitution, by discharge or final process, or by forbearance under certain circumstances; 5 B. & Ald. 297; 4 B. & P. 124; 11 M. & W. 857; 21 N. Y. 412; 8 Gray, 233; 13 Md. 141; 28 Vt. 135; 10 Ired. 13; 61 Ala. 155; 60 Ga. 456.

But the converse of this proposition, that where the principal obligation remains, the promise is collateral, cannot be sustained, though there have been repeated dicta to that effect; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 193; 12 Johns. 291; 20 Wend. 201; denied in 21 N. Y. 415; 7 Ala. N. S. 54; 33 Vt. 132.

The main question arising in cases under this head is whether the debtor is discharged; and this is to a great extent a question for the jury. But if in fact the principal debt is discharged by agreement and the new promise is made upon this consideration, then the promise is original, and not collateral; 1 Allen, 405.

It has been held that the entry on the creditor's books of the debtor's discharge is sufficient to prove it; 3 Hill, So. C. 41; but not conclusive; 41 N. H. 388; 17 Conn. 115.

A discharge of the debtor from custody, or surrender of property taken on an execution, is a good discharge of the debt; 11 M. & W. 857; 9 Vt. 137; 4 Dev. 261; 21 N. Y. 415; 34 Barb. 97.

Where the transaction amounts to a sale of the principal debt in consideration of the new promise, the debtor is discharged, and the promise is original; 3 B. & C. 855; 1 C. M. & R. 743.

So where a purchaser of goods transfers them to another, who promises the vendor to pay for them, this is a substitution and an original promise; 5 Taunt. 450; 9 Cow. 266; 11 Ired. 298; 21 Me. 545; 10 Mo. 538; 7 Cush. 133.

A mere forbearance to press the principal debt is not such a discharge of the debtor as will make the promise original; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 387; 21 N. Y. 412; 13 B. Monr. 356; but where the forbearance is so protracted as to discharge the debtor, it may be questioned whether the promise does not become original; 33 Vt. 132.

Second, the promise will be original if made in consideration of some new benefit moving from the promisee to the promisor; 3 Dutch. 371; 4 Cow. 432; Bull. N. P. 281.

Third, the promise is original where the consideration is some loss to the promisee or principal creditor; but it is held in many such cases that the loss must also work some benefit to the promisor; 6 Ad. & E. 564; 3 Strobh. Eq. 177; 24 Wend. 260; 20 N. Y. 268. As to merely refraining from giving an execution to the sheriff, see 14 Me. 140.

So the loss of a lien; 7 Johns. 463; Burge, Sur. 26. There have been decisions that the mere relinquishment of a lien by the plaintiff takes the case out of the statute; 10 Wend. 461; 7 Johns. 464; 1 McCord, 575. It would seem that a surrender of a lien merely is not a sufficient consideration; 3 Metc. Mass. 396; but it must appear that the surrender is in some way beneficial to the promisor, as when he has an interest in the goods released; 77 N. Y. 91; 45 Ind. 180.

The rule is well settled that when the leading object of a promisor is to induce a promisee to forego some lien, interest, or advantage, and thereby to confer on the promisor a privilege or benefit which he would not otherwise possess or enjoy, an agreement made under such circumstances and upon such a consideration is a new, original, and binding contract, although the effect of it may be to assume the debt and discharge the liability of another; 2 Allen, 417; 3 Burr. 1886; 6 Maule & S. 204; 2 B. & Ald. 613; 1 Gray, 391. The advantage relinquished by the promisee must directly enure to the benefit of the promisor, so as in effect to make it a purchase by the promisor; 5 Cush. 488; 2 Wils. 94; 12 Johns. 291. It is stated in many cases (under classes third and fourth, above) that the promise is original where the consideration moves to the promisor. The true test, however, must be found not in the consideration, but in the nature of the promise. Wherever the new promisor undertakes for his own default; where his promise is virtually to pay his own debt in a peculiar way, or if, by paying the debt, he is really discharging a liability of his own, his promise is original. The only case in which consideration can affect the terms of the promise is where the consideration of the promise is the extinguishment of the original liability; 17 Mass. 229; 50 Penn. 52; 18 Tex. 446; 22 How. 28.

Fourth, the promise is original if made on a consideration moving from the debtor to the promisor; 10 Johns. 412; 12 id. 291; 5 Wend. 235; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 170; 4 Cow. 432; 9 Cal. 92; 30 Ala. N. S. 599; 16 Barb. N. Y. 645; 5 Me. 31; 1 Gray, 391.

For the rule in a class of cases quite analogous, see 9 Ill. 40; 3 Conn. 272; 21 Me. 410; 1 South. 219; 1 Spears, 4; 2 Bosw. N. Y. 392; 13 Ired. 86; 5 Cra. 666.

Where the guaranty relates to a contemporaneous or future obligation, the promise is original, and not suretyship, (a) if credit is given exclusively to the promisor, (b) if the promise is merely to indemnify.

In the first of these cases the question to whom credit was given must be ultimately for the jury in each case. If there is any primary liability, and the creditor resorts to the principal debtor first, the promise is collateral. Thus, if the promisor says, "Deliver goods to A, and I will pay you," there is no primary obligation on the part of A, and the promise is original; 3 Metc. Mass. 396. But if he says, "I will see you paid," or, "I promise you that he will pay," or, "If he do not pay, I will," the promise would be collateral; 2 Term, 80; 1 H. Blackst. 120; 7 Fed. Rep. 477; 3 Col. 176; 13 Gray, 613.

A promise to indemnify merely against contingent loss from another's default is original; 15 Johns. 425; 4 Wend. 657. A doubt is expressed by Mr. Browne, Stat. of Frauds, § 158, whether the fact that mere indemnity is intended makes the promise original, because in many cases—those where the indemnity is against the default of a third person—there is an implied liability of that person, and the promise is collateral thereto. Now, there are three classes of cases. First, it is clear that where the indemnity is against the promisor's default of debt he is already liable without his promise; and to use this as a defence and make the promise collateral thereto would be using the law as a cover to a fraud; 1 Conn. 519; 46 Me. 41; 6 Bingh. 506; 10 Johns. 42; 17 id. 113; 17 Pick. 538. Second, so where the only debt against which indemnity is promised is the promisee's, this, being not the debt of another, but of the promisee, is clearly not within the statute, but the promise is original. And even if the execution of such a promise would discharge incidentally some other liability, this fact does not make the promise collateral; 13 M. & W. 561; 1 Gray, 391; 9 id. 76; 25 Wend. 243; 10 Gill & J. 404; 22 Conn. 317; 23 Miss. 430; 34 N. H. 414; 31 Vt. 142. Third, but where there is a liability implied in another person, and the promise refers to his liability or default, and if executed will discharge such liability or default, the promise would seem on reason to be collateral and binding like a suretyship for future advances—that is, when accepted; 9 Ired. 10; 1 Spears, 4; 1 Ala. 1; 1 Gill & J. 424; 10 Ad. & E. 453; 6 La. N. S. 605; 4 Barb. 131. But in many cases the rule is broadly stated that a promise to indemnify merely is original; 8 B. & C. 728 [overruled, 10 Ad. & E. 453]; 1 Gray, 391; 10 Johns. 242; 4 Wend. 657 [overruled, 4 Barb. 131]; 1 Ga. 294; 5 B. Monr. 382; 20 Vt. 205; 10 N. H. 175; 1 Conn. 519; 5 Me. 504. In other cases the distinction is made to rest on the fact that the engagement is made to the debtor; 9 Gray, 76; 11 Ad. & E. 438; and in other cases, on the futurity of the risk or liability; 12 Mass. 297.

The last ground is untenable; future guarantees binding when accepted or acted upon, and those against torts are expressly to the contrary. The first ground is too broad, as shown above; and the second seems to ignore the clear primary liability of the principal debtor.

When the principal obligation is void, voidable, not enforceable, or unascertained, the promise is original, there being in this case no principal obligation to sustain the promise as collateral; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 156. It may be questionable, however, whether the promise will in such cases be original unless the promisor knows the principal liability to be void or voidable; Burge, Surety, 6; but this question may be settled by the principle that where credit is given to the principal, notwithstanding his obligation is void or voidable, the promise of the surety is collateral; 4 Bingh. 470; 7 N. H. 368; but if no such credit is given or implied, the promise is collateral. See 34 Barb. 208; 15 N. Y. 576; 33 Ala. N. S. 106; 6 Gray, 90. Such would be the guaranty of an infant's promise; 7 N. H. 368; and this is accordingly so held; 20 Pick. 467; 4 Me. 521; though a distinction has been made in the case of a married woman; 4 Bingh. 470; 84 Penn. 135; 43 Ind. 103; but the promise is collateral where the married woman has separate property which she can charge with the payment of her debts, and the credit is given exclusively to her; 6 Ga. 14.

So where the liability is unascertained at the time of the promise, the promise is original; as the liabilities must concur at the time of the undertaking to make a guaranty; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 196; 1 Salk. 27; contra, Ambl. 330. Under this head would come a promise to pay damages for a tort, there being no principal liability until judgment; 1 Wils. 305; or where the liability rests upon a future award; 2 Allen, 417; and liability upon indefinite executory contracts in general.

The promise is clearly original where the promisor undertakes for his own debt. The rule is, unless the promisor himself or his property is ultimately to be made liable in default of the principal debtor, the statute does not apply; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 177. Thus, an engagement by one who owes the principal debtor to retain the principal debt, so that it may be attached by trustee or garnishee process, is not a collateral promise; 9 Pick. 306; 20 Conn. 486; 1 Bingh. N. R. 103; 63 Barb. 321; 50 Iowa, 310.

So an agreement by a purchaser to pay part of the purchase-money to a creditor of the vendor is an agreement to pay his own debt; 55 Miss. 365; 2 Lea, 543; 49 Iowa, 574; or to pay a debt due a promisee by a third person out of moneys owing by a promisor to such third person; 32 Ohio, 415; 9 Cow. 266; 58 Ill. 233; or for the application of a fund due a promisor by a third party; 86 Penn. 147; 18 How. 31. Such an agreement is a trust, or an original promise.

UNDER THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

At common law, a contract of guaranty or suretyship could be made by parol; but by the Statute of Frands, 29 Car. II. c. 3, "no action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, . . . unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some person thereunto lawfully authorized:" so that under the statute all contracts of guaranty and suretyship must be in writing and signed. The words debt and default in the statute refer to contracts; 2 East, 325; and debt includes only pre-existing liability; 12 Mass. 297; miscarriage refers to torts; 2 B. & Ald. 613. Torts are accordingly within the statute, and may be guaranteed against; 2 B. & Ald. 613; 2 Day, 457; though this is doubted in regard to future torts; 1 Wils. 305. Perhaps a guaranty against future torts might be open to objections on the ground of public policy.

The doctrine that a future contingent liability on the part of the principal is not within the statute; 1 Salk. 27; 12 Mass. 297; is not tenable; and it is clear, both by analogy and on authority, that such a liability may support a guaranty, although such cases must be confined within very narrow limits, and the mere fact of the contingency is a very strong presumption that the promise is original; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 196, 6 Vt. 666; 88 Ill. 561.

Where the promise is made to the debtor, it is not within the statute; 7 Halst. 188; 2 Denio, 162. "We are of opinion that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is answerable;" 11 Ad. & E. 446; 1 Gray, 391. The word another in the statute must be understood as referring to a third person, and not to a debt due from either of the contracting parties; 6 Cush. 552; 7 id. 136. False and deceitful representations of the credit or solvency of third persons are not within the statute; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 181; 4 Camp. 1.

The English rule required the consideration to be expressed; 5 East, 10. It could not be proved by parol; 4 B. & A. 595. But by statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 197, s. 3, no such promise shall be deemed invalid by reason only that the consideration does not appear in writing or by necessary inference from a written instrument; 7 C. B. N. S. 361. The rule varies in different states. In New York (amending Rev. Stat. 221), Massachusetts, Virginia, Indiana, Kentucky, there are statutes similar to the English statute. In Alabama, Wisconsin, Oregon, Nevada, Minnesota, and California, the consideration is required by statute to be expressed. Of other states where statutes are silent, some have accepted and some rejected the English construction of Statutes of Frauds in Wain v. Walters, 5 East, 10.

"Memorandum" includes consideration, which must appear; 5 East, 10.

The courts lay hold of any language which implies a consideration; 21 N. Y. 315. So where the guaranty and the matter guaranteed are one simultaneous transaction, both will be construed in connection, and the consideration expressed in the latter applied to the support of the former, if there are words of reference in the guaranty; 3 N. Y. 203; 36 N. H. 73.

FORMATION OF THE OBLIGATION.

In construing the language of the contract to decide whether it constitutes an original promise or a guaranty, it is difficult to lay down a general rule: the circumstances of particular cases vary widely. The word guaranty or surety may or may not indicate correctly the contract, and the circumstances of the case may make an indorser liable as a guarantor or surety, without any words to indicate the obligation; 24 Wend. 456.

In general, if a promissory note is signed or indorsed when made by a stranger to the note, he becomes a joint promisor and liable on the note; 44 Me. 433; 9 Cush. 104; 14 Tex. 275; 20 Mo. 571; and this will be true if indorsed after delivery to the payee in pursuance of an agreement made before the delivery; 7 Gray, 284; 9 Mass. 384; but parol evidence may be introduced to show that he is a surety or guarantor; 28 Ga. 368; 89 Ill. 550. If the third party indorses after delivery to the payee without any previous agreement, he is merely a second indorser; 11 Penn. 466; 82 N. C. 313; and he is liable as a maker to an innocent holder; 20 Mo. 591. But it was held otherwise where the signature was on the face of the note; 19 N. H. 572; and the same is held where he signs an inception of the note, in pursuance of a custom, leaving a blank for the payee's signature above his name; 12 La. An. 517. In Connecticut, such an indorser is held to guaranty that the note shall be collectible when due; 46 Conn. 410; 25 id. 576. The time of signing may be shown by parol evidence; 9 Ohio, 139.

It has been held that a third person indorsing in blank at the making of the note may show his intention by parol; 11 Mass. 436; 13 Ohio, 228; but not if he describes himself as guarantor, or if the law fixes a precise liability to indorsements in blank; 2 Hill, N. Y. 80; 4 id. 420. But this has been doubted; 33 E. L. & E. 282. In New York the cases seem to take the broad ground that an indorser in blank, under all circumstances, is an indorser merely, and cannot be made a guarantor or surety; 7 Hill, 416; 1 N. Y. 324; see 95 U. S. 90.

The consideration to support a parol promise to pay the debt of another must be such as would be good relating to the payment of that particular debt or of any other of equal amount; 33 Md. 373. It need not be necessarily a consideration distinct from that of the principal contract.

The giving of new credit where a debt already exists has been held a sufficient consideration to support a guaranty of the old and new debt; 15 Pick. 159; 15 Ga. 321; but the weight of authority would seem to require that there should be some further consideration; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 191; 5 East, 10; 1 Pet. 476; 3 Johns. 211; 20 Me. 28; 7 Harr. & J. 457.

Forbearance to sue the debtor is a good consideration, if definite in time; 1 Kebl. 114; or even if of considerable, Cro. Jac. 683, or reasonable time; 3 Bulstr. 206. But there must be an actual forbearance, and the creditor must have had a power of enforcement; 4 East, 465; Willes, 482. But the fact that it is doubtful whether such a power exists does not injure the consideration; 5 B. & Ad. 123. Forbearance has been held sufficient consideration even where there was no well-grounded claim; 18 L. J. C. P. 222; 34 Penn. 60; contra, 3 Pick. 83. A short forbearance, or the deferment of a remedy, as postponement of a trial, or postponement of arrest, may be a good consideration; and perhaps an agreement to defer indefinitely may support a guaranty; 1 Cow. 99; 4 Johns. 257; 6 Conn. 81. A mere agreement not to push an execution is too vague to be a consideration; 4 McCord, 409; and a postponement of a remedy must be made by agreement as well as in fact; 3 Cush. 85; 6 Conn. 81; 11 C. B. 172.

The contract of suretyship may be entered into absolutely and without conditions, or its formation may be made to depend on certain conditions precedent. But there are some conditions implied in every contract of this kind, however absolute on its face. In the case of bonds, as in other contracts of suretyship, it is essential that there should be a principal, and a bond executed by the surety is not valid until executed by the principal also. One case, 10 Co. 100 b, sometimes cited to the contrary, is not clear to the point. The argument that the surety is bound by his recital under seal fails, especially in all statute bonds, where one important requisite of the statute, that the bond should be executed by the principal, fails; 2 Pick. 24; 4 Beav. 383; 11 id. 265; 14 Cal. 421.

Where the surety's undertaking is conditional on others joining, he is not liable until they do so; 4 B. & Ad. 440; 53 Ind. 321; 4 Cra. 219: contra, if the obligee is ignorant of the condition; 2 Metc. Ky. 608; 16 Wall. 1; 61 Me. 505. So the surety is not bound if the signatures of his co-sureties are forged, although he has not made his signature expressly conditional on theirs; 2 Am. L. Reg. 349; but see 8 id. N. S. 665.

The acceptance of the contract by the promisee by words or by acts under it is often made a condition precedent to the attaching of the liability of the surety. The general rule is that where a future guaranty is given, absolute and definite in amount, no notice of acceptance is necessary; but if it is contingent and indefinite in amount, notice must be given; 4 Me. 521; 1 Mas. 324, 371; 8 Conn. 438; 16 Johns. 67; but the promisee has a reasonable time to give such notice; 8 Gray, 211. And see, on this last point, 21 Ala. N. S. 721.

A distinction is to be made between a guaranty and an offer to guaranty. No notice of acceptance is requisite when a guaranty is absolute; 3 N. Y. 212; 2 Mich. 511; but an offer to guaranty must have notice of acceptance; and till accepted it is revocable; 12 C. B. N. S. 784; 6 Dow. H. L. C. 239; 32 Penn. 10; and where acceptance is required, it may be as well implied by acts as by words; as, by receiving the written guaranty from the promisor; 8 Gray, 211; or by actual knowledge of the amount of sales under a guaranty of the purchase-money; 28 Vt. 160.

EXTENT OF OBLIGATION.

The liability of a surety cannot exceed, in any event, that of the principal, though it may be less. The same rule does not apply to the remedies, which may be greater against the surety. But, whatever may be the liability imposed upon the surety, it is clear that it cannot be extended by implication beyond the terms of the contract. His obligation is strictissimi juris, and cannot be extended beyond the precise terms of the contract; 10 Johns. 180; 2 Penn. R. 27; 15 Pet. 187. The rule is thus laid down by the United States supreme court: sureties are never held responsible beyond the clear and absolute terms and meaning of their undertakings, and presumptions and equities are never allowed to enlarge, or in any degree to change, their legal obligations; 21 How. 66. And this rule has been repeatedly reaffirmed; 11 N. Y. 598; 29 Penn. 460; 6 How. 296; 2 Wall. 235.

The remedies against the surety may be more extensive than those against the principal, and there may be defences open to the principal, but not to the surety,—as, infancy or coverture of the principal,—which must be regarded as a part of the risks of the surety; 30 Vt. 122.

The liability of the surety extends to and includes all securities given to him by the principal debtor, the converse of the rule stated below in the case of collateral security given to the creditor; 26 Vt. 308. Thus, in Missouri, a creditor is entitled in equity to the benefit of all securities given by the principal debtor for the indemnity of his surety; 18 Mo. 136; 19 Ala. N. S. 798; 22 Miss. 87. If the surety receives money from the principal to discharge the debt, he holds it as trustee of the creditor; 6 Ohio, 80.

In general, the obligations of a surety are the same as the obligations of the principal, within the scope of the contract; but the principal may be under obligations not imposed by the contract, but yet coming so close as to render the distinction a matter of some difficulty. The obligation must, therefore, be limited as to its subject-matter in time, and in amount may be limited in its operation to a single act, or be continuous, and may include only certain liabilities.

In the common case of bonds given for the faithful discharge of the duties of an office, it is of course the rule that the bond covers only the particular term of office for which it is given, and it is not necessary that this should be expressly stated; nor will the time be extended by a condition to be bound "during all the time A (the principal) continues," if after the expiration of the time A holds over merely as an acting officer, without a valid appointment; 3 Sandf. 403. The circumstances of particular cases may extend the strict rule stated above, as in the case of officers annually appointed. Here, although the bond recites the appointment, if it is conditioned upon his faithful accounting for money received before his appointment, the surety may be held; 9 B. & C. 35; 9 Mass. 267. But the intention to extend the time, either by including past or future liabilities, must clearly appear, and the condition of the bond in this particular is sometimes restrained by the recital; 4 B. & P. 175. Generally the recital cannot be enlarged and extended by the condition; Theob. Surety, 66, n. [b]. And where the recital sets forth an employment for twelve months, this time is not controlled by a condition, "from time to time annually, and at all times thereafter during the continuance of this employment," although the employment is actually continued beyond the year; 2 Camp. 39; 3 id. 52; 2 B. & Ald. 431; 7 Gray, 1.

So the obligation may cease by a change in the character of the office or employment, as where the principal who has given a bond for faithful discharge of the duties of clerk, is taken into partnership by the obligee; 3 Wils. 530; but an alteration in the character of the obligees, by taking in new partners, does not necessarily terminate the obligation; 10 B. & C. 122. But where an essential change takes place, as the death of the obligee, the obligation is terminated, although the business is carried on by the executors; 1 Term, 18. Where one becomes surety for two or either of them, the obligation is terminated by the death of one of the principals; 1 Bingh. 452; but this is where the obligation is essentially personal; and where a bond for costs was given by two as "defendants," the surety was not discharged by the death of one; 5 B. & Ald. 261.

So a surety for a lessee is not liable for rent after the term, although the lessee holds over; 1 Pick. 332.

If the law provides that a public officer shall hold over until a successor is appointed, the sureties on the official bond are liable during such holding over; 37 Miss. 518; 2 Metc. Mass. 522: contra, in the case of officers of corporations; 7 Gray, 1. And this provision is not controlled by an alteration of the law extending the term but leaving the provision intact; 15 Gratt. 1. But when the term of an office created by statute or charter is not limited, but merely directory for an annual election, it seems the surety will be liable, though after the year, until his successor is qualified; 9 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 365 (Del. Chanc.). See 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 146.

In bonds, the penalty is the extreme amount of liability of the surety; but various circumstances may reduce the liability below this; 2 South. 498; 3 Cow. 151; 6 Term, 303. If the engagement of the surety is general, the surety is understood to be obliged to the same extent as his principal, and his liability extends to all the accessories of the principal obligation; 14 La. An. 183.

A continuing guaranty up to a certain amount covers a constant liability of that amount; but if the guaranty is not continuing, the liability ceases after the execution of the contract to the amount limited; 3 B. & Ald. 593.

A guaranty may be continuing or may be exhausted by one act; but in drawing distinctions on this point, each case must rest upon its own circumstances. The general principle may be thus stated: when by the terms of the undertaking, by the recitals in the instrument, or by a reference to the custom and course of dealing between the parties, it appears that the guaranty looked to a future course of dealing for an indefinite time, or a succession of credits to be given, it is to be deemed a continuing guaranty, and the amount expressed is to limit the amount for which the guarantor is to be responsible, and not the amount to which the dealing or whole credit given is to extend; 7 Pet. 113; 3 B. & Ald. 593. Thus, a guaranty for any goods to one hundred pounds is continuous; 12 East, 227; or for "any debts not exceeding," etc.; 2 Camp. 413; or, "I will undertake to be answerable for any tallow not exceeding," etc., but "without the word any it might perhaps have been confined to one dealing;" 3 Camp. 220. The words, "I do hereby agree to guaranty the payment of goods according to the custom of their trading with you, in the sum of £200," are held to constitute a continuing guaranty; 6 Bingh. 244; so of the words, "I agree to be responsible for the price of goods purchased at any time, to the amount of," etc.; 1 Metc. Mass. 24. The words "answerable for the amount of five sacks of flour" are clearly not continuous; 6 Bingh. 276. See 6 Maule & S. 239.

Where the surety is bound for the acts of the principal in a certain capacity or office, the obligation ceases, as we have seen above, on the termination of the office. But, besides being limited in point of time to the duration of the particular employment, it is essential, to bind the surety, that the liabilities of the principal should be of such a character as may fairly be covered by the contract. In official bonds, the liability of the surety is limited to the acts of the principal in his official capacity: e. g. a surety on a cashier's bond is not liable for money collected by the cashier as an attorney-at-law, and not accounted for to the bank; 4 Pick. 314. So also where one was surety, and the bond was conditioned on the accounting by the principal for money received by him in virtue of his office as parish overseer, the surety was held not liable for money borrowed by the principal for parochial purposes; 7 B. & C. 491. On the other hand, a surety on a collector's bond is liable for his principal's neglect to collect, as well as failure to pay over; 6 C. & P. 106.

As the surety is only liable to the obligations fairly intended at the execution of the bond, he cannot be held for a breach of new duties attached to his principal's office; Theob. Surety, 72; 4 Pick. 314; or if any material change is made in the duties; 2 Pick. 223.

If one guarantees payment for services, and the promisee partly performs the services, but fails of completing them from no fault of his own, the guarantor is liable to the amount of the part-performance; 12 Gray, 445.

A bond for faithful performance of duties renders the sureties responsible for ordinary skill and diligence, as well as for integrity; 12 Pick. 303.

The contracts of guaranty and suretyship are not negotiable or assignable, and in general can be taken advantage of only by those who were included as obligees at the formation of the contract; 3 McLean, 279; 4 Cra. 224. Accordingly, the contract is terminated by the death of one of several obligees; 4 Taunt. 673; or by material change, as incorporation; 3 B. & P. 34. But where a bond is given to trustees in that capacity, their successors can take advantage of it; 12 East, 399. The fact that a stranger has acted on a guaranty does not entitle him to the benefits of the contract; 20 Vt. 499; and this has been held in the case of one of two guarantees who acted on the guaranty; 3 Tex. 199.

It is held that a guaranty addressed to no one in particular may be acted on by any one; 22 Vt. 160; but the true rule would seem to be that in such cases a party who had acted on the contract might show, as in other contracts, that he was a party to it within the intention at the making; the mere fact that no obligee is mentioned does not open it to everybody.

ENFORCEMENT OF OBLIGATION.

As the surety cannot be bound to any greater extent than the principal, it follows that the creditor cannot pursue the surety until he has acquired a full right of action against the principal debtor. A surety for the performance of any future or executory contract cannot be called upon until there is an actual breach by the principal. A surety on a promissory note cannot be sued until the note has matured, as there is no debt until that time. All conditions precedent to a right of action against the principal must be complied with. Where money is payable on demand, there must have been a demand and refusal. But it is not necessary that the creditor should have exhausted all the means of obtaining his debt. In some cases which will be treated of in detail, it may be requisite to notify the surety of the default of the debtor, or to sue the debtor; but this depends upon the particular conditions and circumstances of each case, and cannot be considered a condition precedent in all cases. Even where the creditor has a fund or other security to resort to, he is not obliged to exhaust this before resorting to the surety; he may elect either remedy, and pursue the surety first. But if the surety pay the debt, he is entitled to claim that the creditor should proceed against such fund or other security for his benefit; 4 Jones, Eq. 212; 33 Ala. N. S. 261.

And if the creditor, having received such collateral security, avail himself of it, he is bound to preserve the original debt; for in equity the surety will be entitled to subrogation; 38 Penn. 98. A judgment against the principal may be assigned to the surety upon payment of the debt; 1 Metc. 489; 4 Jones, Eq. 262. But an assignment of the debt must be for the whole: the surety cannot pay a part and claim an assignment pro tanto; 39 N. H. 150.

In general, it is not requisite that notice of the default of the principal should be given to the surety, especially when the engagement is absolute and for a definite amount; 14 East, 514. The guarantor on a note is not entitled to notice as an indorser; 33 Iowa, 293; 74 Penn. 351, 445; 56 Mo. 272. Laches in giving notice to the surety upon a draft of the default of the principal can only be set up as a defence in an action against the surety, in cases where he has suffered damage thereby, and then only to the extent of that damage; 3 N. Y. 203; it is no defence to an action against a surety on a bond that the plaintiff knew of the default of the principal, and delayed for a long time to notify the surety or to prosecute the bond; 1 Zabr. 100.

If after a joint judgment against a principal and his surety on their joint and several bond, the surety die, the obligee has no remedy in equity against his executor; 9 How. 88.

DISCHARGE OF OBLIGATION.

The obligation may be discharged by acts of the principal, or by acts of the creditor. Payment, or tender of payment, by the one, and any act which would deprive the creditor of remedies which in case of default would enure to the benefit of the surety, are instances of discharge. In the first place, a payment by the debtor would of course operate to discharge the liability. The only questions which can arise upon this point are, whether the payment is applicable to the payment in question, and as to the amount. Upon the first of these, this contract is governed by the general rule that the debtor can apply his payment to any debt he chooses. The surety has no power to modify or direct the application, but is bound by the election of the principal; 2 Bingh. N. C. 7. If no such election is made by the debtor, the creditor may apply the payment to whichever debt he sees fit; 7 Wheat. 20; 9 Cow. 409, 747; 1 Pick. 336. This power, however, only applies to voluntary payments, and not to payments made by process of law; 10 Pick. 129. A surety on a promissory note is discharged by the payment, and the note cannot be again put in circulation; 12 Cush. 163. Whatever will discharge the surety in equity will be a defence at law; 7 Johns. 337; 2 Ves. 542; 2 Pick. 223; 16 S. & R. 252; 5 Wend. 85.

A release of the principal debtor operates as a discharge of the surety; though the converse is not true; 17 Tex. 128; unless the obligation is such that the liability is joint only, and cannot be severed. See, on this point, Fell, Guar. c. ii.; 8 Penn. 265.

Fraud or alteration avoids a contract of suretyship. Fraud may be by the creditor's misrepresentation or concealment of facts. Unless, however, the contract between the debtor and creditor is unusual, the surety must ask for information; 12 Cl. & F. 109; 26 Ga. 241; 15 W. Va. 21. The creditor has been held bound to inform surety of debtor's previous default; 33 Penn. 358; L. R. 7 Q. B. 666; contra, 21 W. R. 439; 91 Ill. 518; though not of his mere indebtedness; 17 C. B. N. S. 482. But to receive a surety known to act on belief that there are no unusual circumstances increasing his risk, knowing that there are such, and neglecting to communicate them, is fraud; 36 Me. 179; 31 N. Y. 518.

Any material alteration in the contract without the assent of the surety, or change in the circumstances, will discharge the surety. Such are the cases where the sureties on a bond for faithful performance are released by a change in the employment or office of the principal; 6 C. B. N. S. 550; and it makes no difference whether the change is prejudicial to the surety or not; 30 Vt. 122; 32 N. H. 550; 3 B. & C. 605; 9 Wheat. 680; Paine, 305; 3 Binn. 520; 3 Wash. C. C. 70. But it seems that an alteration by the legislature in an official's duties will not discharge surety as long as they are appropriate to his office; 36 N. Y. 459. If the principal and obligee change the terms of the obligation without the consent of the surety, the latter is discharged; 4 Wash. C. C. 26.

If the creditor, without the assent of the surety, gives time to the principal, the surety is discharged; 3 Mer. 272; 2 Bro. C. C. 579; 3 Y. & C. 187; 2 B. & P. 61; 7 Price, 223; 8 Bingh. 156. So where he agrees with the principal to give time to the surety; L. R. 7 Ch. App. 142. But not where a creditor reserves his rights against the surety; 16 M. & W. 128; 4 H. L. C. 997. The rule applies where a state is a creditor; 75 N. C. 515.

The contract must be effectual, binding the creditor as well as the debtor; and it is not enough that the creditor merely forbears to press the debtor; 2 Ad. & E. 528; 5 Gray, 457; 15 Ind. 45. See, also, 17 Johns. 176; 1 Gall. 35; 2 Caines, Cas. 30; 2 White & T. L. C. Eq. *974; 9 Tex. 615; 9 Cl. & F. 45.

The receipt of interest on a promissory note, after the note is overdue, is not sufficient to discharge the surety; 8 Pick. 458; 6 Gray, 319; nor is taking another bond as collateral security to the original, having a longer time to run; 41 N. Y. 474.

And as a requisite to the binding nature of the agreement, it is necessary that there should be some consideration; 2 Dutch. 191; 30 Miss. 424; but a part payment by the principal is held not to be such a consideration; 31 Miss. 664. Pre-payment of interest is a good consideration; 30 Miss. 432; but not an agreement to pay usurious interest, where the whole sum paid can be recovered back; 10 Md. 227; though it would seem to be otherwise if the contract is executed, and the statutes only provide for a recovery of the excess; 2 Patt. & H. 504.

It has been questioned how far the receipt of interest in advance shows an agreement to extend the time: it may undoubtedly be a good consideration for such an agreement, but does not of itself constitute it. At the most it may be said to be primâ facie evidence of the agreement; 30 Vt. 711; 15 N. H. 119; 1 Y. & C. 620.

The surety is not discharged if he has given his assent to the extension of the time; 6 Bosw. 600; 2 McLean, 99; 16 Penn. 112. Such assent by one surety does not bind his co-surety; 10 N. H. 318; and subsequent assent given by the surety without new consideration, after he has been discharged by a valid agreement for delay, will not bind him; 12 N. H. 320. He need not show notice to the creditor of his dissent; 12 Ga. 271.

Where an execution against a principal is not levied, or a levy is postponed without the consent of the surety, he is discharged from his liability as surety, unless he has property of the principal in his hands at the time; if he has property in his hands liable for the principal's debts, the creditors of the principal may insist on an application of the property to the payment of their debts; 9 B. Monr. 235. Marriage of the principal and creditor discharges the surety, destroying the right of action; 30 Ark. 667.

If the creditor releases any security which he holds against the debtor, the surety will be discharged; 7 Mo. 497; 8 S. & R. 452; but if the security only covers a part of the debt, it would seem that the surety will be released only pro tanto; 9 W. & S. 36; 127 Mass. 386; so of an execution levied; 88 Penn. 157. Nor will it matter if the security is received after the contract is made. A creditor who has the personal contract of his debtor, with a surety, and has also or takes afterwards property from the principal as a pledge or security for his debt, is to hold the property fairly and impartially for the benefit of the surety as well as himself, and if he parts with it without the knowledge or against the will of the surety he shall lose his claim against the surety to the amount of the property so surrendered, in equity; 43 Me. 381; 8 Pick. 121; 4 Johns. Ch. 129; 4 Ves. 829; 5 N. H. 353; or at law; 8 S. & R. 457; 13 id. 157. The fact that other security, as good as, or better than, that surrendered, was substituted for it, will not preclude the surety from availing himself of the discharge; 15 N. H. 119; 2 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 403; 80 Ill. 122.

But a surety is not discharged by the fact that the creditor has released or compounded with his co-surety; much less if his co-surety has been released by process of law. The only effect of such a release or composition is that the surety is then not liable for the proportion which would properly fall on his co-surety; 6 Ves. 605. This at least is the doctrine in equity; although it may be questioned whether it would apply at law where the obligation is joint; 4 Ad. & E. 675.

But if the obligation is joint and several, a surety is not released from his proportion by such discharge of his co-surety; 31 Penn. 460.

RIGHTS OF SURETY AGAINST PRINCIPAL.

Until default, the surety has, in general, no rights against the principal, except the passive right to be discharged from the obligation on the conditions stated before. But after default on the part of the principal, and before the surety is called upon to pay, the latter has a remedy against the further continuance of the obligation, and he cannot in all cases, as we shall see below, compel the creditor to proceed against the debtor; but the English courts in equity allow him to bring a bill against the debtor, requiring the latter to exonerate him; 2 Bro. C. C. 579.

So, in this country, a surety for a debt which the creditor neglects or refuses to enforce by proper proceedings for that purpose may, by bill in equity, bring both debtor and creditor before the court, and have a decree to compel the debtor to make payment and discharge the surety; 5 Sneed, 86; 3 E. D. Smith, 432; and in courts having full equity powers there can be no doubt of the right of a surety, after a debt has become due, to file a bill to compel the principal debtor to pay, whether the surety has himself been sued or not; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 442; 4 Johns. Ch. 128.

The surety, after payment of the debt, may recover the amount so paid of the principal, the process varying according to the practice of different courts; 2 Term, 104; 4 Me. 200: 1 Pick. 121; 13 Ill. 68. The liability assumed by the surety is held to be a good consideration to sustain another contract; 21 Pick. 241.

And such payment refers back to the original undertaking, and overrides all intermediate equities, as of the assignee of a claim against the surety assigned by the principal before payment; 28 Vt. 391.

The payment must not be voluntary, or made in such a manner as to constitute a purchase; for the surety, by purchasing the claim, would take the title of the creditor, and must claim under that, and not on his own implied contract of the principal. By an involuntary payment is intended only a payment of a claim against which the surety cannot defend. It is not necessary that a suit should be brought. But a surety who pays money on a claim which is absolutely barred has no remedy against the principal; 3 Rand. 490; 3 N. H. 270.

A surety, having in his hands funds or securities of the principal, may apply them to the discharge of the debt; 10 Rich. Eq. 557; but where the fund is held by one surety he must share the benefit of it with his co-surety; 3 Jones, Eq. 170; 28 Vt. 65. But a surety who has security for his liability may sue the principal on his implied promise all the same, unless it was agreed that he should look to the security only; 4 Pick. 444. A surety need not account to his co-surety for the simple indebtedness by himself to the principal; 77 N. Y. 280.

Payment of a note by a surety by giving a new note is sufficient payment, even if the new note has not been paid when the suit is commenced; 4 Pick. 444: 14 id. 286; 3 N. H. 366: contra, where judgment had been rendered against the surety; 3 Md. 47; or by conveyance of land; 9 Cush. 213.

If the surety pays too much by mistake, he can recover only the correct amount of the principal; 1 Dane, Abr. Mass. 197. If a surety pays usurious interest to obtain time to pay the debt of the principal, he cannot recover it of the principal; 1 Mich. 193.

Extraordinary expenses of the surety, which might have been avoided by payment of the money, or remote and unexpected consequences, are never considered as coming within the contract; 17 Mass. 169; 5 Rawle, 106. Costs incurred and paid by the surety in litigating in good faith the claim of the creditor can be recovered of the principal; 30 Vt. 467; 5 Barb. 398; but not so if the litigation is in bad faith; 24 Barb. 546; or where the surety, being indemnified for his liability, incurred expenses in defending a suit contrary to the expressed wishes of the principal and after being notified by him that there was no defence to such action; 22 Conn. 299.

Joint sureties who pay the debt of the principal may sue jointly for reimbursement; 3 Metc. Mass. 169; and if each surety has paid a moiety of the debt, they have several rights of action against the principal; 20 N. H. 418.

RIGHTS OF SURETY AGAINST CREDITOR.

It is not quite clear whether a surety can enforce any remedies on the part of the creditor before actual payment by the surety; and, of course, as connected with this, what is the effect of a request by the surety to the creditor to proceed against the debtor, and neglect or refusal to comply by the creditor. The objection to discharging the surety on account of such neglect is the fact that the surety may pay the debt and at once become subrogated to all the rights of the creditor; 6 Md. 210. But where there are courts in the exercise of full equity powers, the surety may insure a prompt prosecution either by discharging the obligation and becoming by substitution entitled to all the remedies possessed by the creditor, or he may coerce the creditor to proceed by an application to a court of equity; 2 Johns. Ch. 554; though in the latter case he would probably be required to indemnify the creditor against the consequences of risk, delay, and expense; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 442. The same indemnity would in general be required where a request is made; but it has been held that a simple request to sue the principal debtor, without a tender of expenses, or a stipulation to pay them, or an offer to take the obligation and bring suit, is sufficient to discharge the surety, unless the creditor at the time of the notice expressly puts his refusal to sue on the ground of the trouble and expense, and offers to proceed if that objection be removed; 18 Penn. 460. A creditor is not bound to make use of active diligence against a principal debtor on the mere request of a surety; 13 Ill. 376. There must be an express declaration by the surety that he would otherwise hold himself discharged; 29 Ohio St. 663; 90 Penn. 363.

The surety who pays the debt of the principal in full is entitled to have every advantage which the creditor has in pursuing the debtor, and for this purpose may have assignment of the debt, or be subrogated either in law or equity; 39 N. H. 150. Whether the remedy will be by subrogation, or whether the suit must be in the name of the creditor, will depend upon the rules of practice in the different states; 38 Penn. 98. The right of subrogation does not depend upon any contract or request by the principal debtor, but rests upon principles of justice and equity; 1 N. Y. 595; 4 Ga. 343; and, though originating in courts of equity, is now fully recognized as a legal right; 11 Barb. 159.

RIGHTS OF SURETY AGAINST CO-SURETY.

The co-sureties are bound to contribute equally to the debt they become liable to pay when their undertaking is joint, or joint and several, not separate and successive; 3 Pet. 470; but the creditor may recover the whole amount of one surety, and leave him to his remedy by contribution from the others and reimbursement from the principal; 1 Dana, 355. To support the right of contribution, it is not necessary that the sureties should be bound by the same instrument; 2 Swanst. 185; 14 Ves. 160. But where two sureties are bound by separate and distinct agreements for distinct amounts, although for equal portions of the same debt, there is no right of contribution between them; 1 Turn. & R. 426; 3 Pet. 470. The right of contribution, however, does not arise out of any contract or agreement between co-sureties to indemnify each other, but rests on the principle of equity, which courts of law will enforce, that where two persons are subject to a common burden it shall be borne equally between them; 66 N. Y. 225; in such cases the law raises an implied promise from the mutual relation of the parties; 3 Allen, 566.

It is not necessary that the co-sureties should know of the agreements of each other, as the principle of contribution rests only on the equality of the burden, and not on any privity; 2 B. & P. 270; 23 Penn. 294; 61 Ala. 440; but a volunteer is not entitled to contribution; there must be a contract of suretyship; 56 Penn. 80; and see 22 Am. L. Reg. 529 (a full article).

A surety may compel contribution for the costs and expenses of defending a suit, if the defence were made under such circumstances as to be regarded as prudent; 23 Vt. 581. And where the suit is defended at the instance or request of the co-surety, costs would be a subject of contribution, both on equitable grounds and on the implied promise; 1 Mood. & M. 406.

A claim for contribution extends to all securities given to one surety; 30 Barb. 403; 3 Johns. Eq. 170. If one of several sureties takes collaterals from the principal, they will enure to the benefit of all; 28 Vt. 65; 3 Dutch. 503. Where one of several sureties is secured by mortgage, he is not bound to enforce his mortgage before he pays the debt or has reason to apprehend that he must pay it, unless the mortgagor is wasting the estate; and if the mortgagor be squandering the mortgaged property, and the surety secured by the mortgage fails to enforce his rights, he is chargeable between himself and his co-sureties with the fair vendible value of the mortgaged property at a coercive sale; 11 B. Monr. 399. The surety in a suit for contribution can recover only the amount which he has actually paid. Any reduction which he has obtained must be regarded as for the benefit of all the co-sureties; 12 Gratt. 642. And see 11 B. Monr. 297. But he is not obliged to account for a debt due by him to principal; 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 225.

The right of contribution may be controlled by particular circumstances: thus, where one becomes surety at the request of another, he cannot be called on to contribute by the person at whose request he entered into the security; 2 Esp. N. P. 478; 37 N. H. 567. The agreement between the first surety and the second in such a case is not within the Statute of Frauds; 4 Zabr. 812. The right to contribution may be lost by laches; 89 Penn. 336.

A surety who is fully indemnified by his principal cannot recover contribution from his co-surety for money paid by him, but must indemnify himself out of the means placed in his hands; 21 Ala. N. s. 779, n.

The remedy for contribution may be either in equity or at law. The law raises an implied promise, as we have seen, and clearly gives the right of action, and the remedy at law is ancient, writs of contribution being found in the Register, fo. 176, and in Fitzh. N. B. 162. But the majority of the cases are in equity, where the rules of practice are much better suited to the proceeding, especially where the accounts are complicated or the sureties numerous. The result reached either in law or in equity is the same, with one important exception; in the case of the insolvency of one of the sureties. In such cases the law takes no notice of the insolvency, but awards the paying surety his due proportion as if all were solvent. But equity takes no notice of the surety who is insolvent, but awards contribution as if he had never existed; 1 Ch. Cas. 246; 6 B. & C. 689; 4 Gratt. 267. One surety cannot by injunction arrest the proceedings at law of his co-surety against him for contribution unless he tenders the principal and interest due such co-surety, who has paid the principal, or alleges that he is ready and willing to bring the same into court to be paid to him as a condition of the court's interference; 4 Gill, 225. Where a surety has been compelled to pay the debt of his principal, and one of his co-sureties is out of the jurisdiction of the court, and others are within it, the surety who has paid is at liberty to proceed in a suit in equity for contribution against those co-sureties only who are within the jurisdiction, by stating the fact in his bill, and the defendants will be required to make contribution without regard to the share of the absent co-surety; 6 Ired. Eq. 115. See, generally, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. *100.

CONFLICT OF LAWS.

The contract of suretyship, like other contracts, is governed by the lex loci contractus; but the locus is not necessarily the same as that of the principal contract. Thus, the contract made by the indorser of a note is, not to pay the note where it is payable, but that if not paid there he will pay it at the place where the indorsement is made; 12 Johns. 142; 13 Mass. 20; 16 Mart. La. 606; 4 B. & Ald. 654; 8 Pick. 194. The lex loci applies as well to the interest as to the principal amount. A question has been made in the case of bonds for faithful performance given by public officers; and in these it has been held that the place of performance is to be regarded as the place of making the contract, and sureties are bound as if they made the contract at the seat of the government to which the bonds are given. And under this rule the obligation of all on the bond is governed by the same law, although the principal and sureties may sign in different states; Story, Confl. L. 291; 6 Pet. 172. A letter of guaranty written in the United States and addressed to a person in England must be construed according to the laws of England; 1 How. 161.

Consult BOND; GUARANTY; PROMISSORY NOTES; Burge, Ross, Theobald, De Colyar, Baylies, on Suretyship; Fell, on Guaranty; Pitman, on Principal and Surety; Browne, Statute of Frauds.

SURGEON. One who applies the principles of the healing art to external diseases or injuries, or to internal injuries or malformations, requiring manual or instrumental intervention. One who practises surgery.

This definition is imperfect, it being impossible to define the term surgeon or surgery. The term surgery, or chirurgery, comes from two Greek words signifying the hand and work, meaning a manual procedure by means of instruments, or otherwise, in the healing of injuries and the cure of disease. The practice of medicine, in contradistinction to the practice of surgery, denotes the treatment of disease by the administration of drugs or other sanative substances. There cannot be a complete separation between the practice of medicine and surgery as they are developed by modern science, and understood by the most learned in the profession of medicine: the principles of both are the same throughout, and no one is qualified to practise either who does not completely understand the fundamental principles of both.

The general principles of law defining the civil responsibilities of physicians and surgeons are the same as those that apply to and govern the conduct of lawyers, engineers, machinists, ship-builders, brokers, and other classes of men whose employment requires them to transact business demanding special skill and knowledge; Elwell, Malp. 19; 27 N. H. 468. The surgeon does not warrant or insure as to the result, ordinarily; 7 C. & P. 81; Elwell, Malp. 20. The surgeon or physician may bind himself by an express contract to cure; Elwell, Malp. 21; Chitty, Contr. 629; 27 N. H. 468; 2 Ld. Raym. 909; 1 Bell, Com. 459; 3 Bla. Com. 122.

Tindall, C. J., says: Every person who enters into a learned profession undertakes to bring to the exercise of it a reasonable, fair, and competent degree of skill; 8 C. & P. 475. This degree of skill is what is usually termed ordinary and reasonable; Story, Bailm. 433; Elwell, Malp. 22, 23. In addition to the application of ordinary skill in the treatment of disease and injuries, the physician and surgeon undertake to give to their cases ordinary care and diligence, and the exercise of their best judgment; Elwell, Malp. 20; 5 B. & Ald. 820; 15 East, 62; 15 Groenl. 97. See PHYSICIAN.

SURNAME. A name which is added to the Christian name. In modern times these have become family names.

They are called surnames, because originally they were written over the name in judicial writings and contracts. They were and are still used for the purpose of distinguishing persons of the same name. They were taken from something attached to the persons assuming them: as, John Carpenter, Joseph Black, Samuel Little, etc. Any name by which a man is known is his true name; 44 Vt. 662; 119 Kan. 522. If he enters into a particular transaction by a particular name, that is his real name for the purposes of that transaction, the law looks only to his identity; 42 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 570; 5 M. & W. 449; 57 Raym. 2; 11 Ad. & E. 594; 4 Law Times, N. S. 167. See NAME.

SURPLUS. That which is left from a fund which has been appropriated for a particular purpose; the remainder of a thing; the overplus; the residue. See 18 Ves. 466.

SURPLUSAGE. In Accounts. A greater disbursement than the charges amount to. A balance over. 1 Lew. 219.

In Pleading. Allegations of matter wholly foreign and impertinent to the cause. All matter beyond the circumstances necessary to constitute the action is surplusage; Cowp. 683; 5 East, 275; 10 id. 205; 2 Johns. Cas. 52; 1 Mas. 57; 16 Tex. 656. Generally, matter of surplusage will be rejected and will not be allowed to vitiate the pleading; Co. Litt. 303 b; 2 Saund. 306, n. 14; 7 Johns. 462; 13 id. 80; 3 Dougl. 472; 1 Root, 456; 1 Pet. 18; 2 Mass. 283; 8 S. & R. 124; 1 Ala. 326; Hempst. 221; 21 N. H. 535; as new and needless matter stated in an innuendo; 9 East, 95; 7 Johns. 272; even if repugnant to what precedes; 10 East, 142; see 16 Tex. 656; but if it shows that the plaintiff has no cause of action, demurrer will lie; 1 Salk. 363; 3 Taunt. 139; 2 East, 451; 4 id. 400; 2 W. Blackst. 842; 3 Cra. 193. Where the whole of an allegation is immaterial to the plaintiff's right of action, it may be struck out as surplusage; 1 Mas. 57. Matter laid under a videlicet, inconsistent with what precedes, may be rejected as surplusage; 4 Johns. 450; 2 Blackf. 143; and when the unnecessary matter is so connected with what is material that it cannot be separated, the whole matter may be included in the traverse; Dy. 365; 2 Saund. 206 a, n. 21; and the whole must be proved as laid; 1 Ohio, 483; 1 Brev. 11; Steph. Plead. 422.

SURPRISE. In Equity Practice. The act by which a party who is entering into a contract is taken unawares, by which sudden confusion or perplexity is created, which renders it proper that a court of equity should relieve the party so surprised. 2 Bro. C. C. 150; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 120, n.

The situation in which a party is placed, without any default of his own, which will be injurious to his interests. 8 Mart. La. N. S. 407.

Mr. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 366, 382, note, seems to think that the word surprise is a technical expression, and nearly synonymous with fraud. It is sometimes used in this sense when it is deemed presumptive of, or approaching to, fraud. 1 Fonbl. Eq. 123; 3 Ch. Cas. 56, 74, 103, 114. See 6 Ves. 327, 338; 16 id. 31, 86; 2 Bro. C. C. 326; 1 Cox, Ch. 340.

In Law. The general rule is that when a party or his counsel is taken by surprise, in a material point or circumstance which could not have been anticipated, and when want of skill, care, or attention cannot be justly imputed, and injustice has been done, a new trial should be granted; Hill. New Trials, 521. Surprise may be good ground for a new trial in criminal as in civil cases; 10 E. L. & E. 105; but in neither case is surprise arising after verdict sufficient to warrant an application to the discretion of the court; 2 Parker, 673.

SURREBUTTER. In Pleading. The plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rebutter. It is governed by the same rules as the replication. See 6 Comyns, Dig. 185; 7 id. 389.

SURREJOINDER. In Pleading. The plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rejoinder. It is governed in every respect by the same rules as the replication. Steph. Pl. 77; Archb. Civ. Pl. 284; 7 Comyns, Dig. 389.

SURRENDER. A yielding up of an estate for life or years to him who has an immediate estate in reversion or remainder, by which the lesser estate is merged in the greater by mutual agreement. Co. Litt. 337 b.

The deed by which the surrender is made.

A surrender is of a nature directly opposite to a release; for, as the latter operates by the greater estate descending upon the less, the former is the falling of a less estate into a greater, by deed. A surrender immediately divests the estate of the surrenderor, and vests it in the surrenderee, even without the assent of the latter; Shepp. Touchst. 300, 301.

The technical and proper words of this conveyance are, surrender and yield up; but any form of words by which the intention of the parties is sufficiently manifested will operate as a surrender; Perkins, § 607; 1 Term, 441; Comyns, Dig. Surrender (A).

The surrender may be express or implied. The latter is when an estate incompatible with the existing estate is accepted, or the lessee takes a new lease of the same lands; 16 Johns. 28; 1 B. & Ald. 50; 2 id. 119; 5 Taunt. 518. And see 6 East, 86; 9 B. & C. 288; 7 Watts, 123; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 7; Comyns, Dig.; 4 Kent, 102.

SURRENDER OF A PREFERENCE. The surrender by a preferred creditor, to the assignee in bankruptcy, of all that he has received under such preference, as a necessary step, under the bankrupt law, to obtaining a dividend of the estate. 1 Dill. 544.

SURRENDER TO USES OF WILL. Formerly a copyhold interest would not pass by will unless it had been surrendered to the use of the will. By stat. 55 Geo. III. c. 192, this is no longer necessary; 1 Steph. Com. 639; Moz. & W.

SURRENDER OF CRIMINALS. The act by which the public authorities deliver a person accused of a crime, and who is found in their jurisdiction, to the authorities within whose jurisdiction it is alleged the crime has been committed. See EXTRADITION; FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

SURRENDEREE. One to whom a surrender has been made.

SURRENDEROR. One who makes a surrender; as, when the tenant gives up the estate and cancels his lease before the expiration of the term. One who yields up a freehold estate for the purpose of conveying it.

SURROGATE (Lat. surrogatus, from subrogare, or surrogare, to substitute). In English Law. A deputy or substitute of the chancellor, bishop, ecclesiastical or admiralty judge, appointed by him. He must take an oath of office. He can grant licenses, hold courts, and adjudicate cases, to the same extent and with the same authority as his principal, provided his grant of powers has been coextensive with those possessed by his principal. The office has arisen by usage, but is sanctioned by canon 128, and recognized by stat. 26 Geo. II. c. 33, 56 Geo. III. c. 82, and 10 Geo. IV. c. 53, by which latter act it was provided that the surrogates of the arches and consistory of London are to continue after the death of the judges of those courts till new appointments are made. 1 Phill. Eccl. 205; 3 Burn, Eccl. Law, 667.

In American Law. A term used in some states to denote the judge to whom jurisdiction of the probate of wills, the grant of administration and of guardianship is confided. In some states he is called surrogate, in others, judge of probate, register, judge of the orphans' court, etc. He is ordinarily a county officer, with a local jurisdiction limited to his county.

SURROGATE'S COURT. In the United States, a state tribunal, with similar jurisdiction to the court of ordinary, court of probate, etc., relating to matters of probate, etc. See above titles; 2 Kent, 409, note b; NEW YORK.

SURVEY. The act by which the quantity of a piece of land is ascertained; the paper containing a statement of the courses, distances, and quantity of land is also called a survey.

A survey made by authority of law, and duly returned into the land office, is a matter of record, and of equal dignity with the patent; 3 A. K. Marsh. 226; 2 J. J. Marsh. 160. See 3 Me. 126; 5 id. 24; 14 Mass. 149; 1 Harr. & J. 201; 1 Ov. 199; 1 Dev. & B. 76.

By survey is also understood an examination; and in this sense it is constantly employed in insurance and in admiralty law.

SURVIVOR. The longest liver of two or more persons.

In cases of partnership, the surviving partner is entitled to have all the effects of the partnership, and is bound to pay all the debts owing by the firm; Gow, Partn. 157; Wats. Partn. 364. He is, however, bound to account for the surplus to the representatives of his deceased partners, agreeably to their respective rights. See PARTNERSHIP.

A surviving trustee is generally vested with all the powers of all the trustees, and the surviving administrator is authorized to act for the estate as if he had been sole administrator. As to the presumption of survivorship, when two or more persons have perished by the same event, see DEATH; LIFE; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 4; 2 Pothier, Obl. 346; 17 Ves. 482; 6 Taunt. 213; Cowp. 257.

The right of survivorship among joint-tenants has been abolished, except as to estates held in trust, in Pennsylvania, New York, Kentucky, Virginia, Indiana, Missouri, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, North and South Carolina. See ESTATES IN JOINT-TENANCY. In Connecticut it never existed; 1 Swift, Dig. 102; Washb. R. P. As to survivorship among legatees, see 1 Turn. & R. 413; 1 Bro. C. C. 574; 3 Russ. 217.

SUS' PER COLL'. In English Law. In the English practice, a calendar is made out of attainted criminals, and the judge signs the calendar with their separate judgments in the margin. In the case of a capital felony it is written opposite the prisoner's name, "let him be hanged by the neck," which when the proceedings were in Latin, was "suspendatur per collum," or, in the abbreviated form "sus' per coll'." 4 Bla. Com. 403.

SUSPENDER. In Scotch Law. He in whose favor a suspension is made.

In general, a suspender is required to give caution to pay the debt in the event it shall be found due. Where the suspender cannot, from his low or suspected circumstances, procure unquestionable security, the lords admit juratory caution; but the reasons of suspension are in that case to be considered with particular accuracy at passing the bill. Act. S. 8 Nov. 1682; Erskine, Inst. 4. 3. 6.

SUSPENSE. When a rent, profit à prendre, and the like, are, in consequence of the unity of possession of the rent, etc. of the land out of which they issue, not in esse for a time, they are said to be in suspense, tunc dormiunt; but they may be revived or awakened. Co. Litt. 313 a.

SUSPENSION. A temporary stop of a right, of a law, and the like.

In times of war the habeas corpus act may be suspended by lawful authority.

There may be a suspension of an officer's duties or powers when he is charged with crimes; Wood, Inst. 510. An attorney, solicitor, or ecclesiastical person may be suspended from practising for a time; see DISBAR. The Stock Exchange and many corporations provide for the suspension as well as expulsion of members under certain circumstances; 47 Wisc. 670; 86 Ill. 441; 2 Brews. 571; see Dos Passos, Stock Brokers; EXPULSION.

Suspension of a right in an estate is a partial extinguishment, or an extinguishment for a time. It differs from an extinguishment in this: a suspended right may be revived; one extinguished is absolutely dead; Bacon, Abr. Extinguishment (A).

The suspension of a statute for a limited time operates so as to prevent its operation for the time; but it has not the effect of a repeal; 3 Dall. 365. For plea in suspension, see PLEA; ABATEMENT. Pleas in suspension are not specifically abolished in England by the Judicature Acts, though Ord. xix. rule 13, directs that no plea or defence shall be pleaded in abatement; Moz. & W.

In Scotch Law. That form of law by which the effect of a sentence-condemnatory, that has not yet received execution, is stayed or postponed till the cause be again considered. Erskine, Inst. 4. 3. 5. Suspension is competent also, even where there is no decree, for putting a stop to any illegal act whatsoever; Erskine, Inst. 4. 3. 7.

Letters of suspension bear the form of a summons, which contains a warrant to cite the charger.

In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical censure, by which a spiritual person is either interdicted the exercise of his ecclesiastical function or hindered from receiving the profits of his benefice. It may be partial or total; for a limited time, or forever, when it is called deprivation or amotion. Ayliffe, Parerg. 501.

SUSPENSION OF ARMS. An agreement between belligerents, made for a short time or for a particular place, to cease hostilities between them. See ARMISTICE; TRUCE.

SUSPENSION OF A RIGHT. The act by which a party is deprived of the exercise of his right for a time.

When a right is suspended by operation of law, the right is revived the moment the bar is removed; but when the right is suspended by the act of the party, it is gone forever. See 1 Rolle, Abr. Extinguishment (L, M).

SUSPENSIVE CONDITION. One which prevents a contract from going into operation until it has been fulfilled; as, if I promise to pay you one thousand dollars on condition that the ship Thomas Jefferson shall arrive from Havre, the contract is suspended until the arrival of the ship. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 731.

SUTLER. A man whose employment is to sell provisions and liquor to a camp.

By the articles of war no sutler is permitted to sell any kind of liquor or victuals, or to keep his house or shop open for the entertainment of soldiers, after nine at night, or before the beating of the reveillée, or upon Sundays during divine service or sermon, on penalty of being dismissed all future sutling; all sutlers are subject to orders according to the rules and discipline of war.

SUUS HÆRES (Lat.). In Civil Law. The proper heir, as it were, not called in from outside.

To use such profane language as is forbidden by law. This is generally punished by statutory provisions in the several states. See 7 Lea, 410; 85 N. C. 528; 25 Alb. L. J. 423.

SWINDLER. A cheat; one guilty of defrauding divers persons. 1 Term, 748; 2 H. Blackst. 531; Stark. Sland. 135.

Swindling is usually applied to a transaction where the guilty party procures the delivery to him, under a pretended contract, of the personal property of another, with the felonious design of appropriating it to his own use; 2 Russ. Cr. 130; Alison, Cr. Law, 250; 2 Mass. 406.

The terms cheat and swindler are not actionable unless spoken of the plaintiff in relation to his business; 6 Cush. 185; 10 How. Pr. 128. The words "you are living by imposture," spoken of a person with the intention of imputing that he is a swindler, are not actionable per se; 8 C. B. 142.

SWORN CLERKS IN CHANCERY. Officers who had charge of records, and performed other duties in connection with the court of chancery. Abolished in 1842.

SYB AND SOM. A Saxon form of greeting, meaning peace and safety. T. L.

SYMBOLIC DELIVERY. The delivery of some thing as a representation or sign of the delivery of some other.

Where an actual delivery of goods cannot be made, a symbolical delivery of some particular thing, as standing for the whole, will vest the property equally with an actual delivery; 1 Pet. 445; 8 How. 399; 6 Md. 19; 19 N. H. 419; 39 Me. 496; 11 Cush. 282; 3 Cal. 140. See 1 Sm. L. C. 93.

One who is chosen to conduct the affairs and attend to the concerns of a body corporate or community. In this sense the word corresponds to director or manager. Rodman, Notes to Code de Com. p. 351; La. Civ. Code, art. 429; Dalloz, Dict. Syndic.

SYNDICATE. A university committee. A combination of persons or firms united for the purpose of enterprises too large for individuals to undertake; or a group of financiers who buy up the shares of a company in order to sell them at a profit by creating a scarcity. Moz. & W.

SYNDICOS (Gr. σύν with, δικη cause). One chosen by a college, municipality, etc. to defend its cause. Calv. Lex. See SYNDIC.

SYNGRAPH (Gr. σύν with, γράφω, to write). A deed, bond, or other instrument of writing, under the hand and seal of all the parties. It was so called because the parties wrote together.

Formerly such writings were attested by the subscription and crosses of the witnesses; afterwards, to prevent frauds and concealments, they made deeds of mutual covenant in a script and rescript, or in a part and counterpart, and in the middle between the two copies they wrote the word syngraphus in large letters, which, being cut through the parchment and one being delivered to each party, on being afterwards put together proved their authenticity.

Deeds thus made were denominated syngraphs by the canonists, and by the common-lawyers chirographs. 2 Bla. Com. 296.

SYNOD. An ecclesiastical assembly, which may be general, national, provincial, or diocesan.

SYNODALES TESTES. See SIDESMEN.

TABELLA (Lat.). In Civil Law. A small table on which votes were often written. Cicero, in Rull. 2. 2. Three tablets were given to the judges, one with the letter A for Absolutio, one with C for Condemnatio, and one with N. L. for Non Liquet, not proven. Calvinus, Lex.

TABELLIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. An officer among the Romans, who reduced to writing, and into proper form, agreements, contracts, wills, and other instruments, and witnessed their execution.

The term tabellio is derived from the Latin tabula, seu tabella, which, in this sense, signified those tables or plates covered with wax which were then used instead of paper. 8 Toullier, n. 53; Delaurière, sur Ragneau, Notaire.

Tabelliones differed from notaries in many respects: they had judicial jurisdiction in some cases, and from their judgments there were no appeals. Notaries were then the clerks or aiders of the tabelliones; they received the agreements of the parties which they reduced to short notes; and these contracts were not binding until they were written in extenso, which was done by the tabelliones. Encyclopédie de M. D'Alembert, Tabellione; Jacob, Law Dict. Tabellion; Merlin, Répert. Notaire, § 1; 3 Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, p. 86.

TABLE-RENTS. Rents paid to bishops and other ecclesiastics, appropriated to their table or housekeeping. Jacob.

TABULA IN NAUFRAGIO (Lat. a plank in a wreck). In English Law. A figurative term used to denote the power of a third mortgagee, who, having obtained his mortgage without any knowledge of a second mortgage, may acquire the first incumbrance, and squeeze out and have satisfaction before the second. 2 Ves. Ch. 573; 1 Ch. Cas. 162; 1 Story, Eq. §§ 414, 415; TACKING.

TACIT (from Lat. taceo, to be silent). That which, although not expressed, is understood from the nature of the thing or from the provision of the law; implied.

TACIT LAW. A law which derives its authority from the common consent of the people without any legislative enactment. 1 Bouvier, Inst. 120.

TACIT RELOCATION. In Scotch Law. The tacit or implied renewal of a lease when the landlord instead of warning a tenant has allowed him to continue without making a new agreement. Bell, Dict. Relocation.

TACIT TACK. See TACIT RELOCATION.

TACITURNITY. In Scotland this signifies laches in not prosecuting a legal claim, or in acquiescing in an adverse one. Mox. & W.

TACK. In Scotch Law. A contract of location by which the use of land or any other immovable subject is set to the lessee or tacksman for a certain yearly rent, either in money, the fruits of the ground, or services. Erskine, Inst. 2. 6. 8. This word is nearly synonymous with lease.

TACKING. In English Law. The union of securities given at different times, so as to prevent any intermediate purchaser's claiming title to redeem or otherwise discharge one lien which is prior, without redeeming or discharging other liens also which are subsequent, to his own title. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 188–191; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 412.

It is an established doctrine in the English chancery that a bona fide purchaser and without any notice of a defect in his title at the time of the purchase may lawfully buy any statute, mortgage, or incumbrance, and if he can defend by those at law his adversary shall have no help in equity to set those incumbrances aside, for equity will not disarm such a purchaser. And as mortgagees are considered in equity as purchasers pro tanto, the same doctrine has extended to them, and a mortgagee who has advanced his money without notice of any prior incumbrance may, by getting an assignment of a statute, judgment, or recognizance, protect himself from any incumbrance subsequent to such statute, judgment, or recognizance, though prior to his mortgage; that is, he will be allowed to tack or unite his mortgage to such old security, and will by that means be entitled to recover all moneys for which such security was given, together with the money due on his mortgage, before the prior mortgagees are entitled to recover any thing; 2 Cruise, Dig. t. 15, c. 5, s. 27; 1 Vern. 188; 1 White & T. L. C. Eq. 615, notes. Tacking was abolished by sec. 7 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, stat. 37 and 38 Vict. c. 78, but that section is repealed by sec. 129 of the Land Titles and Transfer Act of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87. Mox. & W.

This doctrine is inconsistent with the laws of the several states, which require the recording of mortgages; and does not exist to any extent in the United States; 1 Caines, Cas. 112; 2 Pick. 517; 12 Conn. 195; 14 Ohio, 318; 11 S. & R. 208; 1 White & T. L. C. Eq. 615; 1 Johns. Ch. 399; Bisph. Eq. § 159. A rule apparently analogous may, however, be found in those cases where a mortgage is given to secure future advances, and where the mortgagee is allowed to recover sums subsequently advanced, as against a mesne mortgage; Bisph. Eq. § 159.

TAIL. See ESTATE TAIL.

TAILAGE. See TALLAGE.

TAINT. A conviction of felony, or, the person so convicted. Cowel. See ATTAINT.

TAKE. A technical expression which signifies to be entitled to: as, a devisee will take under the will.

To seize: as, to take and carry away, either lawfully or unlawfully.

To choose: e. g. ad capiendas assisas, to choose a jury.

To obtain: e. g. to take a verdict in court, to get a verdict.

TAKING. In Criminal Law, Torts. The act of laying hold upon an article, with or without removing the same. A felonious taking is not sufficient, without a carrying away, to constitute the crime of larceny. See Dearsl. 621. And when the taking has been legal, no subsequent act will make it a crime; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 160.

The taking is either actual or constructive. The former is when the thief takes, without any pretence of a contract, the property in question.

A constructive felonious taking occurs when under pretence of a contract the thief obtains the felonious possession of goods: as, when under the pretence of hiring he had a felonious intention, at the time of the pretended contract, to convert the property to his own use.

When property is left through inadvertence with a person, and he conceals it animo furandi, he is guilty of a felonious taking and may be convicted of larceny; 17 Wend. 460.

But when the owner parts with the property willingly, under an agreement that he is never to receive the same identical property, the taking is not felonious: as, when a person delivered to the defendant a sovereign to get it changed, and the defendant never returned either with the sovereign or the change, this was not larceny; 9 C. & P. 741. See 2 B. & P. 508; Co. 3d Inst. 408; LARCENY; ROBBERY.

The wrongful taking of the personal property of another, when in his actual possession, or such taking of the goods of another who has the right of immediate possession, subjects the tort-feasor to an action. For example, such wrongful taking will be evidence of a conversion, and an action of trover may be maintained; 2 Saund. 47; 3 Willes, 55. Trespass is a concurrent remedy in such a case; 3 Wils. 336. Replevin may be supported by the unlawful taking of a personal chattel. See CONVERSION; TRESPASS; TROVER; REPLEVIN.

TAKE UP. An indorser or acceptor is said to take up, or retire, a bill when he discharges the liability upon it. In such a case, the indorser would hold the instrument with all his remedies intact; while the acceptor would extinguish all the remedies on it. One who accepts a lease is also said to take it up.

TALE. In English Law. The ancient name of the declaration or count. 3 Bla. Com. 293

TALES (Lat. talis, such, like). A number of jurors added to a deficient panel sufficient to supply the deficiency.

A list of such jurymen as were of the tales, kept in the king's bench office in England.

TALES DE CIRCUMSTANTIBUS (Lat. a like number of the bystanders). A sufficient number of jurors selected from the bystanders to supply a deficiency in the panel.

The order of the judge for taking such bystanders as jurors.

Whenever from any cause the panel of jurors is insufficient, the judge may issue the above order, and the officer immediately executes it; see 2 Hill, So. C. 381; Coxe, N. J. 283; 1 Blackf. 65; 2 H. & J. 426; 1 Pick. 43, n. The number to be drawn on successive panels is in the discretion of the court; 17 Ga. 497.

TALITER PROCESSUM EST. "So it has proceeded;" words formerly used in pleading, by which a defendant, in justifying his conduct by the process of an inferior court, alleged the proceedings in such inferior court. Steph. Pl. 5th ed. p. 369; Mos. & W.

TALLAGE OR TALLIAGE (Fr. tailler to cut). In English Law. A term used to denote subsidies, taxes, customs, and, indeed, any imposition whatever by the government for the purpose of raising a revenue. Bacon, Abr. Smuggling, etc. (B); Fort. De Laud. 26; Madd. Exch. c. 17; Co. 2d Inst. 531.

TALLAGIUM (perhaps from Fr. taille, cut off). A term including all taxes. Co. 2d Inst. 532; Stat. de tal. non concedendo, temp. Edw. I.; Stow, Annals, 445; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 311*. Chaucer has talaigiers for "tax-gatherers"

TALLY (Fr. tailler; It. tagliare, i.e. scindere, to cut off). A stick cut into two parts, on each whereof is marked, with notches or otherwise, what is due between debtor and creditor. Hence the tallier of the exchequer is now called the teller. Lex. Constit. 205; Cowel. One party must have one part, and the other the other, and they must match. Tallies in the exchequer were abolished by 23 Geo. III. c. 82, and were ordered to be destroyed in 1834. They were thereupon used in such quantities to heat the stoves in the house of lords that it is supposed they were the cause of the fire which destroyed both houses of parliament. There was the same usage in France. Dict. de l'Acad. Franç.; Pothier, Obl. pt. 4, c. 1, art. 2, § 8; 2 Reeves, c. 11, p. 253.

TARDE VENIT (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a return made by the sheriff to a writ, when it came into his hands too late to be executed before the return day.

The sheriff is required to show that he has yielded obedience to the writ, or give a good excuse for his omission; and he may say, quod breve adeo tarde venit quod exequi non potuit. It is usual to return the writ with an indorsement of tarde venit. Comyns, Dig. Return (D 1).

TARE. An allowance in the purchase and sale of merchandise for the weight of the box, bag, or cask, or other thing, in which the goods are packed. It is also an allowance made for any defect, waste, or diminution in the weight, quality, or quantity of goods. It differs from TRET, which see.

TARIFF. Customs, duties, toll, or tribute payable upon merchandise to the general government is called tariff; the rate of customs, etc. also bears this name, and the list of articles liable to duties is also called the tariff.

TAVERN. A place of entertainment; a house kept up for the accommodation of strangers. Webster, Dict. Originally, a house for the retailing of liquors to be drunk on the spot. Webster, Dict.

In almost all the states the word has come to mean the same as inn, with no particular reference to the sale of liquors. See 2 Kent, 597*, note a. Tavern has been held to include "hotel;" 46 Mo. 593; contra, 7 Ga. 296.

These are regulated by various local laws. For the liability of tavern-keepers, see Story, Bailm. § 7; 2 Kent, 458; 12 Mod. 487; Jones, Bailm. 94; 1 Bla. Com. 430; 1 Rolle, Abr. (3 F); Bacon, Abr. Inn, etc.; INN; INNKEEPER.

TAX. A pecuniary burden imposed for the support of the government. 17 Wall. 322. The enforced proportional contribution of persons and property, levied by the authority of the state for the support of government, and for all public needs. 58 Me. 591; Cooley, Tax. 1. Burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power of a state upon persons or property, to raise money for public purposes. Blackw. Tax Titles, 1; 20 Cal. 318. See 64 Penn. 154; 20 Wall. 655; 27 Iowa, 28; 34 Cal. 432; 27 Ind. 62. Taxes are not "debts;" 20 Cal. 318.

Taxes differ from subsidies, in being certain and orderly, and from forced contributions, etc., in that they are levied by authority of law, and by some rule of proportion which is intended to insure uniformity of contribution, and a just apportionment of the burdens of government; Cooley, Tax. 2. See 51 Penn. 9. No matter how equitable a tax may be, it is void unless legally assessed; 3 Cush. 567; and, on the other hand, the injustice of a particular tax cannot defeat it when it is demanded under general rules prescribed by the legislature for the general good; Cooley, Tax. 3; 17 Mass. 52. A sovereign power has the unlimited power to tax all persons or property within its jurisdiction; 21 Vt. 152; 4 Wheat. 316; 20 Wall. 46; 66 N. C. 361; but the power of taxation of a state is limited to persons, property, and business within her jurisdiction; thus bonds issued by a railroad company and held by non-residents of the state in which the company was incorporated, are property beyond the jurisdiction of that state; 15 Wall. 300.

Taxes are classified as direct, which includes "those which are assessed upon the property, person, business, income, etc., of those who pay them; and indirect, or those which are levied on commodities before they reach the consumer, and are paid by those upon whom they ultimately fall, not as taxes, but as part of the market price of the commodity." Cooley, Tax. 5. The latter include duties upon imports and stamp duties levied upon manufactures; ibid. The term "direct taxes" in the federal constitution is used in a peculiar sense, and such taxes are perhaps limited to capitation and land taxes; 3 Dall. 171; 7 Wall. 433; 8 id. 533.

Direct taxes within the meaning of the constitution are only capitation taxes and taxes on real estate; 102 U. S. 586.

Judge Cooley gives, as the most common taxes:—

Capitation taxes, which can only in a few cases be said to be either just or politic.

Land taxes. These are usually laid by value.

House taxes. These, except when the houses are treated as appurtenant to the lands, have been measured by rents, and sometimes by hearths and windows. Both of these latter have been laid in England, but are now abolished.

Income taxes. These may be on all incomes, or the smaller incomes may be exempted; and sometimes there has been an increasing percentage on larger incomes. This tax is objectionable as being inquisitorial, and as leading to evasion.

Taxes on employments. This usually takes the form of an excise tax on the license to pursue the employment. See as to such a tax on lawyers, 23 Gratt. 464.

Taxes on the carriage of property. These may be laid by licenses, by taxing the vehicles employed, by tonnage duties, etc.

Taxes on wages. These have been unusual in modern times.

Taxes on servants, horses, carriages, etc.

Taxes on the interest of money. These are objectionable for the same reasons that apply to income taxes.

Taxes on dividends are more easily collected, and are a common method of raising revenue.

Taxes on legacies and inheritances. These may be on direct or collateral succession. See, as to their validity, 14 Gratt. 422; 28 Md. 577.

Taxes on sales, bills of exchange, etc. These, when laid by way of stamp duties, are, perhaps, the least objectionable of all taxes.

Taxes of legal process may be imposed as stamp fees on process, fees for permission to begin suit, etc.

Taxes on consumable luxuries, as whiskey, etc.

Taxes on exports. These are usually impolitic, either as tending to diminish exports, or as leading to retaliatory legislation. The states cannot levy export duties without the consent of congress, and congress cannot lay any export duty on articles exported from any state. Art. 1, §§ ix., x. of the constitution.

Taxes on imports have been the chief reliance of the federal government.

Taxes on corporate franchises have been a source of large revenue in some states, while, in other states, corporations have been taxed, like individuals, on their property. See 18 Wall. 231.

Taxes on the value of property have been the main reliance in the United States. As to taxes on personalty it is objected, among other things, that their assessment is necessarily inquisitorial, that they hold out constant temptations to taxpayers to defraud the state, and that such taxation requires a large addition to the revenue officers, and renders necessary more frequent assessments than would be required were taxation confined to subjects more permanent in characteristics and ownership.

Stockholders in a moneyed corporation are liable to taxation on their shares, although the capital stock has also paid a tax; 6 Baxt. 553; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 532, and note; but see cases cited in this note.

Taxes on amusements. These are in the nature of a tax on luxuries, and therefore unobjectionable.

The state may undoubtedly require the payment of taxes in kind, that is, in products, or in gold or silver bullion, etc.; Cooley, Tax. 12; see 20 Cal. 318; 7 Wall. 71.

The power to tax is vested entirely in the legislative department. No matter how oppressive taxation may be, the judiciary cannot interfere on that account; 8 Wall. 533; 18 id. 206; 47 Miss. 367. It can only check excess of authority. The right to lay taxes cannot be delegated by the legislature to any other department of the government; 52 Mo. 133; 47 Cal. 456; 4 Bush, 464: except that municipal corporations may be authorized to levy and collect local taxes; Cooley, Tax. 51; 49 Mo. 559, 574; 73 Penn. 448.

The constitutional guaranty which declares that no person shall be deprived of property, etc., except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land does not necessarily apply to the collection of taxes; 23 Ga. 566; Cooley, Tax. 37; taxes have been said to be recoverable, not only without a jury, but without a judge; 6 T. B. Monr. 641. Though differing from procedure in courts of justice, the general system of procedure for the levy and collection of taxes established in this country, is due process of law; 104 U. S. 78; 96 U. S. 97.

Persons and property not within the limits of a state cannot be taxed by the state; Cooley, Tax. 42; but when a person is resident within a state, his personal property may be taxed wherever it is, on the ground that in contemplation of law its situs is the place of his residence; 16 Pick. 572; 46 N. H. 389; 3 Oreg. 13; and the stock of a foreign corporation may be taxed to the resident owner; 82 N. C. 420; s. c. 33 Am. Rep. 692; but the mere right of a foreign creditor to receive from his debtor within the state the payment of his demand cannot be subjected to taxation within the state; 15 Wall. 300; see supra. So shares in a corporation are the shares of the stockholder wherever he may have his domicil, and can only be taxed by the jurisdiction to which his person is subject; 16 Pick. 572; 30 N. J. 13; 49 Penn. 526; subject to the qualification that a foreign corporation must always accept the privilege of doing business in a state on such terms as the state may see fit to exact; Cooley, Tax. 16. Under a statute providing for taxation of all personal property within the state owned by non-residents, a tax cannot be imposed on choses in action, owned by a non-resident and left with an attorney in the state for collection, nor on municipal bonds so owned and temporarily on deposit in a bank in the state for safe keeping; 59 Ind. 472; s. c. 26 Am. Rep. 87.

Tangible personal property situate within a state may be taxed there without regard to the residence of the owner; 48 N. Y. 390; 21 Vt. 152; 52 Penn. 140; and the real estate of a non-resident may be taxed where it is situated; 4 Wall. 210; 16 Mass. 208; see, generally, 15 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65 et seq.

A state may bind itself by a contract, based upon a consideration, to refrain from exercising the right of taxation in a particular case; 15 Wall. 460; 16 id. 244; 6 Conn. 223; s. c. 16 Am. Dec. 46 n.

The agencies selected by the federal government for the exercise of its functions cannot be taxed by the states: for instance, a bank chartered by congress as the fiscal agent of the government; 4 Wheat. 316; the loans of the United States; 2 Wall. 220; 7 id. 16, 26; the United States revenue stamps; 101 Mass. 329; the salary of a federal officer; 16 Pet. 435; see 9 Metc. 73. On the other hand, the federal government cannot tax the corresponding agencies of the states; 12 Wall. 418; 105 Mass. 49; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 499; including the salary of a state officer; 11 Wall. 113; and a state municipal corporation; 17 Wall. 322; but railroad corporations are not included in this exemption; 9 Wall. 579. The states have no power to tax the operations of the Union Pacific R. R. Company, which was chartered by congress, but may tax their property; 18 Wall. 5.

A state tax on telegraphic messages sent out of the state is unconstitutional as a regulation of interstate commerce, and so taxes on government messages are void, as burdens upon the agencies of the federal government; 4 Morr. Transcr. 447; a state tax on freights transported from state to state is a regulation of commerce, and therefore void; 15 Wall. 232.

But a state tax upon the gross receipts of a railroad company is not repugnant to the federal constitution, although they are made up in part from articles transported from state to state. There is a distinction between a tax upon freights carried between states and a tax upon the fruits of such transportation after they have become mingled with the other property of the carrier; 15 Wall. 284; nor is such a tax a tax upon exports or imports or upon interstate transportation; id.

The federal constitution provides that no state shall, without consent of congress, (1) lay any imposts or duties on exports or imports, except what may be necessary for executing its inspection laws. See 24 How. 169; 8 Wall. 123; (2) lay any duties of tonnage. Under this clause a tax on vessels at a certain sum per ton is forbidden; 20 Wall. 577. Congress having the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, etc., the states cannot tax the commerce which is regulated by congress; 4 Wheat. 316; but a tax may be laid upon merchandise in the original packages that has been the subject of commerce and has been sold by the importer; 5 Wall. 475; 8 id. 110; locomotives may be taxed as property, but not their use as vehicles of commerce between the states; 2 Abb. U. S. 323. See 15 Wall. 232, 284. See TONNAGE TAX; COMMERCE.

No tax is valid which is not laid for a public purpose; 20 Wall. 655; 58 Me. 590; 2 Dill. 353; such are (according to Cooley, Tax. 81): to preserve the public order; to make compensation to public officers, etc.; to erect, etc., public buildings; to pay the expenses of legislation, and of administering the laws, etc.; also, to provide secular instruction; Cooley, Tax. 84; 104 U. S. 81; see 10 Metc. 508; 30 Mich. 69; but not in a school founded by a charitable bequest, though a majority of the trustees were to be chosen (but from certain religious societies) by the inhabitants of the town; 103 Mass. 94. See, also, 24 Wisc. 350. A town may tax itself for the erection of a state educational institution within its limits; 12 Allen, 500; see 47 N. Y. 608. The support of public charities is a public purpose, and money raised by taxation may be applied to private charitable institutions. Taxation for the purpose of giving or loaning money to private business enterprises is illegal; 111 Mass. 454; 60 Me. 124; s. c. 11 Am. Rep. 185, and 12 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 493 and n. In some cases, governments have applied public funds to pay equitable claims (upon which no legal right exists), such as for the destruction of private property in war, or for loss incurred in a contract for the construction of a public work: Cooley, Tax. 91; see 108 Mass. 408; 19 N. Y. 116. Taxes may be levied for the construction and repair of canals, railroads, highways, roads, etc.; Cooley, Tax. 94; and the construction of a free bridge in a city; 58 Penn. 320; and for the payment of the public debt, if lawfully incurred; and for protection against fire; 104 U. S. 81. A preponderance of authority favors the proposition that the legislatures of states may confer upon municipalities the right to take stock in railroad corporations, and to lend their credit to such, and to levy taxes to enable them to pay the debt incurred; the decision has turned upon the question whether this is a public purpose; 20 Wall. 655. Taxation to provide municipal gas and water works is lawful; 43 Ga. 67; 27 Vt. 70; and for the preservation of the public health; 31 Penn. 175, 185; Cooley, Tax. 101. Municipalities may pay money by way of bounties to those who volunteer as soldiers in times of actual or threatened hostility; 50 Penn. 150; 56 id. 466; 52 Me. 590; but not to provide amusements for the people, or to celebrate the declaration of independence, etc.; 1 Allen, 108; 2 Denio, 110; though the purchase and support of public parks is lawful; Cooley, Tax. 93.

It is said to be an essential rule of taxation that the purpose for which a tax is levied "should be one which in an especial manner pertains to the district within which it is proposed that the contribution shall be collected. . . . A state purpose must be accomplished by a state taxation, a county purpose by a county taxation, etc." Cooley, Tax. 104, 105. Thus an act imposing an assessment upon lands fronting on a county road for the purpose of paving the road in a costly manner, not for the local but for the general public benefit, was held void; 69 Penn. 352; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 255.

Apportionment is a necessary element of taxation; it consists in a selection of the subjects to be taxed, and in laying down the rule by which to measure the contribution which each of those subjects shall make to the tax. Apportionment is therefore a matter of legislation; Cooley, Tax. 175. See 4 N. Y. 419. The same writer arranges all taxes under three classes: specific taxes, ad valorem taxes, and taxes apportioned by special benefit, and lays down the following general rules: (1) Though the districts are established at the discretion of the legislature, the basis of apportionment which is fixed upon must be applied throughout the district. See 25 Ill. 557; 25 Ark. 289. (2) Though the apportionment must be general, a diversity in the methods of collection violates no rule of right, and is as much admissible as a diversity in police regulations. Indeed, this may, under some circumstances, be an absolute necessity. (3) It is no objection to a tax that the rule of apportionment which has been provided for it fails in some instances, or even in many instances, of enforcement. (4) It is not to be extended to embrace persons or property outside the district. If there are any exceptions to the rule, they must stand on very special and peculiar reasons. (5) Although exemptions may be made, special and invidious discriminations against individuals are illegal.

It has been said that perfect equality in the assessment of taxes is unattainable, and that approximation to it is all that can be had. It is only when statutes are passed which impose taxes on false and unjust principles, or operate to produce gross inequality, so that they cannot be deemed in any just sense proportional in their effect on those who are to bear the public charges, that courts can interpose and declare such enactments void; 5 Allen, 426; see 57 Penn. 433; 19 id. 258; 73 id. 370; 3 Bland, Ch. 186.

The constitution of Illinois provides that taxation shall be uniform, and uniform as to the class upon which it operates; under these provisions a statute is not unconstitutional which prescribes a different rule of taxation for railroad companies from that for individuals; 92 U. S. 575. This case further held that the capital stock, franchises, and all the real and personal property of corporations are justly liable to taxation in the place where they do business and by the state which creates them; and a rule which ascertains the value of all this by ascertaining the cost value of the funded debt and of the shares of the capital stock as the basis of assessment is probably as fair as any other, all modes being more or less imperfect.

A constitutional provision to the effect that taxation shall be uniform is met by taxation which is uniform among all persons engaged in the same business; 14 La. An. 318. Such provisions are usually held not to apply to municipal assessments; see Dill. Mun. Corp. § 746 et seq.

Taxes may be levied upon occupations, even to the extent of duplicating the burden to the one who pays it, as by taxing both a merchant's stock and his gross sales; Cooley, Tax. 385. Taxes on the privilege of following an occupation are usually imposed by way of a license, which is a prerequisite to the right to carry on the business. There is a distinction between a license granted as a condition precedent before a thing can be done and a tax assessed on the business which that license may authorize one to engage in; 50 Ga. 530; 42 Ga. 596.

Such taxes have been laid on bankers, auctioneers, lawyers, 12 Mo. 268; 23 Gratt. 464; 4 Tex. App. 312; 17 Fla. 169; s. c. 35 Am. Rep. 93; clergymen, 29 Penn. 226; Peddlers, etc. See 5 Wall. 462 as to federal license taxes.

Municipal assessments made for local improvements, though resting for their foundation upon the taxing power, are distinguishable in many ways from taxes levied for general state or municipal purposes. A local assessment upon the property benefited by a local improvement may be authorized by the legislature, but such an assessment must be based upon benefits received by the property owner over and above those received by the community at large. The legislature may make provision for ascertaining what property will be specially benefited and how the benefits shall be apportioned. The assessments may be made upon all the property specially benefited according to the exceptional benefit which each parcel of property actually and separately receives. Where the property is urban and plotted into blocks with lots of equal depth, the frontage rule of assessment is generally, but not always, a competent one for the legislature to provide. This rule is, in the long run, a just one, especially as to sidewalks, sewers, grading and paving. (See 30 Mich. 24; but see, contra; 82 Penn. 360; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 760; 9 Heisk. 349.) The legislature may, under some circumstances, authorize the assessment of the lots benefited, in proportion to their area (but see 35 Mich. 155). Whether it is competent for the legislature to declare that the whole of an improvement of a public nature shall be assessed upon the abutting property, and other property in the vicinity, is in doubt. The earlier cases so held; but since many state constitutions have made provision for equality of taxation, several courts have held that the cost of a local improvement can be assessed upon particular property only to the extent that it is especially and particularly benefited, and that as to the excess, it must be borne by the public. See 82 Penn. 360; 69 id. 352; 18 N. J. Eq. 519. This whole subject is fully treated by Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, where he summarizes the subject as above.

As to exemptions from taxation: In cases where there is no constitutional provision such as exists in many of the states, Judge Cooley (Taxation, 145) deduces these rules: (1) The general right to make exemptions is involved in the right to apportion taxes, and must be understood to exist wherever it is not forbidden. See 73 Penn. 448; 27 Mo. 464; 24 Ind. 391. (2) Exemptions thus granted on considerations of public policy may be recalled whenever the legislative view of public policy shall have changed. See 24 How. 300; 13 Wall. 373; 47 Cal. 222; 15 id. 454. (3) The intention to exempt must in any case be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. See 53 Penn. 219; 47 N. Y. 501; 49 Mo. 490; 104 Mass. 470. (4) All exemptions are to be strictly construed; 18 Wall. 225.

The courts do not favor exemptions of property; 76 N. Y. 64. Where the constitution provided that the legislature might exempt from taxation "institutions of purely public charity," it was held that the phrase did not necessarily refer to institutions solely controlled by the state, but extended to private institutions of purely public charity and not administered for private gain; and that the essential features of a public use are that it is not confined to privileged individuals, but is open to the indefinite public; 86 Penn. 306. The residence of a clergyman is not exempt as a "building for religious worship" because it contains one room set apart as a religious chapel; 12 R. I. 19; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 597. See, generally, Burroughs, Taxation; Blackwell, Tax Titles.

TAX DEED. An instrument whereby the officer of the law undertakes to convey the title of the rightful proprietor to the purchaser at the tax sale, or sale of the land for non-payment of taxes.

This deed, according to the principles of the common law, is simply a link in the chain of the grantee's title. It does not ipso facto transfer the title of the owner, as in grants from the government or deeds between man and man. The operative character of it depends upon the regularity of the anterior proceedings. The deed is not the title itself, nor even evidence of it. Its recitals bind no one. It creates no estoppel upon the former owner. No presumption arises upon the mere production of the deed that the facts upon which it is based had any existence. When it is shown, however, that the ministerial officers of the law have performed every duty which the law imposed upon them, every condition essential in its character, then the deed becomes conclusive evidence of the title in the grantee, according to its extent and purport. See Blackw. Tax Titles, 430; 2 Washb. R. P. 542.

TAX SALE. A sale of lands for the non-payment of taxes assessed thereon.

The power of sale does not attach until every prerequisite of the law has been complied with; 9 Miss. 627. The regularity of the anterior proceedings is the basis upon which it rests. Those proceedings must be completed and perfected before the authority of the officer to sell the land of the delinquent can be regarded as consummated. The land must have been duly listed, valued, and taxed, the assessment roll placed in the hands of the proper officer with authority to collect the tax, the tax demanded, all collateral remedies for the collection of the tax exhausted, the delinquent list returned, a judgment rendered when judicial proceedings intervene, the necessary precept, warrant, or other authority delivered to the officers intrusted with the power of sale, and the sale advertised in due form of law, before a sale can be made; Blackw. Tax Titles, 294; 4 Wheat. 78; 6 id. 119; 7 Cow. 88; 6 Mo. 64; 12 Miss. 627; 5 S. & R. 332.

There are important details connected with the auction itself and the duties of the officer intrusted with the conducting thereof.

The sale must be a public, and not a private, one. The sale must take place at the precise time fixed by the law or notice, otherwise it will be void.

It is equally important that the sale should be made at the place designated in the advertisement.

The sale to be valid must be made to the "highest bidder," which ordinarily means the person who offers to pay for the land put up the largest sum of money. This is the rule in Pennsylvania; but in most of the states the highest bidder is he who will pay the taxes, interest, and costs due upon the tract offered for sale for the least quantity of it.

The sale must be for cash.

Where a part of the land sold is liable to sale and the residue is not, the sale is void in toto.

The sale must be according to the parcels and descriptions contained in the list and the other proceedings, or it cannot be sustained.

When a tract of land is assessed against tenants in common, and one of them pays the tax on his share, the interest of the other may be sold to satisfy the residue of the assessment.

Where several parcels of land belonging to the same person are separately assessed, each parcel is liable for its own specific tax and no more.

The quantity of land that may be sold by the officer depends upon the phraseology of each particular statute.

Where, after an assessment is made, the county in which the proceedings were had is divided, the collector of the old county has power to sell land lying in the territory in the newly created county; 4 Yerg. 307; 11 How. 414; 24 Me. 283; 13 Ill. 253; 9 Ohio, 43; 13 Pick. 492; 21 N. H. 400; 9 W. & S. 80.

TAXATION. The process of taxing or imposing a tax. Webster, Dict.

In Practice. Adjustment. Fixing the amount: e. g. taxation of costs. 3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 602.

TAXATION OF COSTS. In Practice. Fixing the amount of costs to which a party is entitled.

It is a rule that the jury must assess the damages and costs separately, so that it may appear to the court that the costs were not considered in the damages; and when the jury give costs in an amount insufficient to answer the costs of the suit, the plaintiff may pray that the officer may tax the costs, and such taxation is inserted in the judgment. This is said to be done ex assensu of the plaintiff, because at his prayer. Bacon, Abr. Costs (K). The costs are taxed in the first instance by the prothonotary or clerk of the court. See 2 Wend. 244; Harp. 326; 1 Pick. 211. A bill of costs, having been once submitted to such an officer for taxation, cannot be withdrawn from him and referred to another; 2 Wend. 252.

TEAMSTER. One who drives horses in a wagon for the purpose of carrying goods for hire. He is liable as a common carrier. Story, Bailm. § 496. See CARRIER.

TECHNICAL. That which properly belongs to an art.

In the construction of contracts it is a general rule that technical words are to be taken according to their approved and known use in the trade in which the contract is entered into or to which it relates, unless they have manifestly been understood in another sense by the parties; 2 B. & P. 164; 6 Term, 320; see CONSTRUCTION.

Words which do not of themselves denote that they are used in a technical sense are to have their plain, popular, obvious, and natural meaning; 6 W. & S. 114.

The law, like other professions, has a technical language. "When a mechanic speaks to me of the instruments and operations of his trade," says Mr. Wynne, Eunom. Dial. 2, s. 5, "I shall be as unlikely to comprehend him as he would me in the language of my profession, though we both of us spoke English all the while. Is it wonderful, then, if in systems of law, and especially among the hasty recruits of commentators, you meet (to use Lord Coke's expression) with a whole army of words that cannot defend themselves in a grammatical war? Technical language, in all cases, is formed from the most intimate knowledge of any art. One word stands for a great many, as it is always to be resolved into many ideas by definitions. It is, therefore, unintelligible because it is concise, and it is useful for the same reason." See LANGUAGE; WORDS.

TEIND COURT. In Scotch Law. A court which has jurisdiction of matters relating to teinds, q. v.

TEINDS. In Scotch Law. Tithes.

TELEGRAPH. An apparatus, or a process for communicating rapidly between distant points, especially by means of preconcerted visible signals representing words or ideas, or by means of words and signs transmitted by electro-magnetism. Webster, Dict. The term, as generally used, applies distinctively to the electro-magnetic telegraph. And it is in the operation of this instrument by incorporated companies that the principal legal questions upon the subject of telegraphs have arisen.

In the United States all telegraph lines are operated by companies, either under the authority of general laws, or by express charter; Scott & J. Telegr. § 3. Telegraph companies are private corporations deriving their franchise from the grant of the legislature; when the grant has been accepted, a contract exists between the state on the one part and the company on the other; 4 Wheat. 518; 22 Cal. 398. Exclusive franchises may be granted, but will not be implied; 11 Pet. 420; 11 Leigh, 42. By statute, telegraph companies are authorized to construct their lines upon any public road or highway, and across navigable streams, but so as not to interfere with their public use or navigation; 46 Me. 483. The telegraph is a public use authorizing the exercise of the right of eminent domain; 43 N. J. L. 381. Under the general police power, municipal corporations may regulate the manner in which the lines are to be constructed in cities, so as not to interfere with the comfort and safety of the inhabitants; Scott & J. Telegr. § 54. But the power of the municipality is to regulate, not to prohibit, and in the absence of evidence that a proposed method of laying the wires by a company will impede or endanger the use of the streets by the public, a court of equity will enjoin the town from interfering with the wires; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 325. Unless under the sanction of legislative enactment the erection of telegraph posts or the laying of tubes in any highway is a nuisance at common law; 9 Cox, C. C. 174; 30 Beav. 287; 21 Alb. L. J. 44. It has been generally held that the obligations of telegraph companies are not the same as those of common carriers of goods; 41 N. Y. 544; 45 Barb. 274; 18 Md. 341; 15 Mich. 525; see Laws. Carr. 3; but this language has been thought to be too broad, and it has been said that these companies are common carriers of messages, subject to all the rules which are in their nature applicable to all classes of common carriers; Shearm. & R. Negligence, § 554. The better opinion would seem to be that since these companies perform a quasi-public employment, under obligations analogous to those of common carriers, the rules governing the latter should be applied to them, but modified to meet the changed conditions of the case; 1 Daly, 547; 35 Penn. 298; 18 Allen, 226; 58 Ga. 433. They were held to be common carriers in 17 C. B. 3; 13 Cal. 422.

Due and reasonable care is required of telegraph companies in the performance of their duties; 13 Allen, 226; 78 Penn. 238; 48 N. Y. 132; 15 Mich. 525; and the necessity for such care is made the greater by the delicacy of the instrument and the skill required to manage it; 15 Mich. 525; 48 N. Y. 132; 60 Ill. 421.

Telegraph companies may limit their liability by notice to the sender of the message; 35 Ind. 429; 74 Ill. 168; 30 How. Pr. 413; 113 Mass. 299; 17 C. B. 3; 13 Cent. L. J. 475; 14 id. 386. A company may make reasonable rules relative to its business and thereby limit its liability. A rule that the company will not be responsible for the correct transmission of despatches, beyond the amount received therefrom, unless repeated at an additional expense, is reasonable; 11 Neb. 87; but see 25 Alb. L. J. 478 (S. C. of Ga.). But they cannot by any device avoid liability for the consequences of gross negligence or fraud of their agents; 33 Wisc. 558; 34 id. 471; 37 Mo. 472.

The current of authority favors the rule that the usual conditions in the blanks of telegraph companies exempt them only from the consequences of errors arising from causes beyond their control, whether the message be repeated or unrepeated; 6 So. L. Rev. 335; 78 Penn. 238; 27 Iowa, 433; 1 Col. 230; 5 S. C. 358; 17 Wall. 357; 95 U. S. 655; 2 Am. L. Rev. 615. Notice of regulations must be brought home to the sender of the despatch, if they are to be regarded as incorporated in his contract; 1 Daly, 547. His signature to the printed conditions is sufficient evidence of knowledge, and he will not be heard to say that he did not read them; 113 Mass. 299; 15 Mich. 525.

Telegraph companies are not allowed to show any preference in the transmission of despatches, except as regulated by statute; 23 Ind. 377; 56 Barb. 46. They may refuse to send obscene messages, but they cannot judge of the good or bad faith of the senders in the use of language not in itself immoral; 57 Ind. 495.

In England, it is held that the receiver of a message, not being party to the contract for despatching it, can claim no rights under it; L. R. 4 Q. B. 706; 3 C. P. Div. 1; but in the United States the right of action in such cases has been conceded; 1 Am. L. Reg. 685; and this right has been based upon the "misfeasance" of the company upon which the receiver acted to his injury; 35 Penn. 298; 52 Ind. 1; 6 So. L. Rev. 344.

Telegraph companies are bound to receive and transmit messages from other companies, but are not held responsible for their defaults; 45 N. Y. 744; 41 id. 544.

A railroad company cannot grant a telegraph company the exclusive right to establish telegraph lines along its way, such contracts being void as in restraint of trade; 11 Fed. Rep. 1.

Employés of telegraph companies cannot refuse to answer questions as to messages transmitted by them; and they must, if called upon, produce such messages; 20 Law Times, N. S. 421; an operator may be required to testify to the contents of a telegram addressed and delivered to a defendant on trial under indictment; 58 Me. 267; 7 West Va. 544; 3 Dillon, 567. And even when a statute forbids the divulging of the contents of a telegram, it has been held not to apply when the testimony of an operator is required in a court of justice; 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. 274. See Allen, Tel. Cas. 496, n. The power of the court to compel the local manager of a company to search for and produce private telegrams has been enforced in Missouri by subpœna duces tecum, notwithstanding a statute similar to that referred to above; 8 Cent. L. J. 378. These decisions have been severely criticized, but have not been overruled; Cooley, Const. Lim. 387; 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65. See 5 So. L. Rev. 473.

In estimating the measure of damages for the failure to transmit a message properly, the general rules upon the subject of damages ex contractu are applied; 98 Mass. 232; 18 U. C. Q. B. 60; 15 Gratt. 122. Unless the despatch shows on its face the importance of the matter to which it relates, or information on this point is communicated to the company's agents, only nominal damages can be recovered for the default of the company; 9 Bradw. 283; 29 Md. 232; 21 Minn. 155; 45 N. Y. 744; 16 Nev. 222. Orders to agents to buy and sell stocks, though briefly expressed, have been held to impart information sufficiently as to their importance; 55 Penn. 262; 60 Ill. 421; 44 N. Y. 263; contra, 29 Md. 232. And the company is liable for the losses sustained, the fluctuations in the market being the measure of damages; supra. See also 41 Iowa, 458; 27 La. An. 49. If the default of the company arises from the dishonesty of some third person, the company will not be held liable for such remote damages; 30 Ohio St. 555; 60 N. Y. 198.

A company is bound to use reasonable efforts to ascertain where the persons are to whom a message is sent and to deliver the same; 9 Bradw. 283.

A contract may be made and proved in court by telegraphic despatches; 20 Mo. 254; 41 N. Y. 544; 103 Mass. 327; L. R. 6 Ex. 7; and the same rules apply in determining whether a contract has been made by telegrams as in cases of a contract made by letter; 36 N. Y. 307; 31 U. C. Q. B. 18; 4 Dill. 431. Messages are instruments of evidence, and are governed by the same rules as other writings; Scott & J. Telegr. § 340; the original message is said to be the best evidence: if this cannot be produced, then a copy should be produced; id. § 341; see 40 Wisc. 440. As to which is the original, it is said to "depend upon which party is responsible for its transmission across the line, or, in other words, whose agent the telegraph company is. The first communication in a transaction, if it is all negotiated across the wires, will only be effective in the form in which it reaches its destination;" 29 Vt. 140. See 36 N. Y. 307; 40 Wisc. 440. See, on this subject, an article in 14 C. L. J. 262.

The signature of a clerk of a telegraph company to a despatch was held to be sufficient, under the Statute of Frauds, where the original instructions had been signed by the party; L. R. 5 C. P. 295; see 6 U. C. C. P. 221.

By act of congress of July 24, 1866, any telegraph company organized under the laws of any state of the Union is granted the right under certain restrictions to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States, and over, under, or across navigable streams or waters, provided that they do not obstruct their navigation, or interfere with ordinary travel; R. S. § 5263. This act, so far as it declares that the erection of telegraph lines shall, as against state interference, be free to all who accept its terms and conditions, and that a telegraph company of one state shall not, after accepting them, be excluded by another state from prosecuting its business within her jurisdiction, is a legitimate regulation of commercial intercourse among the states, and is appropriate legislation to execute the powers of congress over the postal service; 96 U. S. 1. Since this act a railroad company cannot grant to a telegraph company the sole right to construct a line over its right of way so as to exclude other companies which have accepted the provisions of the said act, and the lines of which would not disturb or obstruct the business of the company to which the use has first been granted; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 173.

As to submarine cables, in international law, see 15 Am. L. Rev. 211.

See generally Allen, Telegraph Cases; Scott & Jarnagin, Telegraphs, Shearman & Redfield, Negligence; COMMERCE.

TELEPHONE. An instrument for transmitting spoken words.

In law the owners and operators of telephones are in much the same position as telegraph companies. They have been called "common carriers of articulate speech," that is to say, even though their liabilities do not in all respects resemble the liabilities of ordinary common carriers, yet, like common carriers, they are engaged in a semi-public occupation, and have duties and privileges accordingly; 24 Alb. L. J. 283; 22 id. 363. See TELEGRAPH.

It has been held that a telephone company must transmit despatches impartially for all who choose to send them; and may make no discriminations in favor of or against particular individuals. So a contract between a telephone company and the owner of patented telephone instruments, that in the use of such instruments by the telephone company discriminations should be made against certain telegraph companies, was declared void; 36 Ohio St. 296; 22 Alb. L. J. 363. But see 25 id. 224.

In England, a message sent by Edison's telephone has been held to come within the statute (32 & 33 Vict. c. 73, s. 4) placing the transmission of telegraphic messages and telegrams under the control of the postmaster-general, though the telephone was not invented or contemplated in 1869; 6 Q. B. Div. 244; s. c. 29 Moak, Engl. Rep. 602. As to making affidavit by means of the telephone, see 26 Alb. L. J. 326.

TELLER (tallier, one who keeps a tally). An officer in a bank or other institution. A person appointed to receive votes. A name given to certain officers in the English exchequer.

The duties of tellers in banks in this country consist of the receiving of all sums of money paid into the bank, and the paying of all sums drawn out. In large institutions there are generally three,—the first or paying teller, the second or receiving teller, and the third or note teller. It is the duty of the first teller to pay all checks drawn on the bank, and, where the practice of certification is in use, to certify those that are presented for that purpose. The position ranks next in importance to that of cashier. The authority of a teller to certify that a cheque is "good," so as to bind the bank, has been denied; 9 Metc. (Mass.) 306; but is supported by the weight of decisions; 39 Penn. 92; 52 N. Y. 96; Morse, Bk. 201. The second teller receives the deposits made in the bank, and also payment for bills that may be drawn on other places. The third teller receives payment of bills and notes held by the bank. The receiving teller often does the duty of the note teller. Sewell, Bank.

TEMPLE. See INNS OF COURT.

TEMPORALITIES (L. Lat. temporalia). Revenues, lands, tenements, and lay fees which bishops have from livery of the king, and in virtue of which they sit in parliament. 1 Rolle, Abr. 881.

TEMPORALTY. The laity.

TEMPORARY. That which is to last for a limited time. See STATUTE.

TEMPORIS EXCEPTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A plea of lapse of time in bar of an action, like our statute of limitations. Dig. de diversis temporalibus actionibus.

TEMPUS (Lat.). In Civil and Old English Law. Time in general. A time limited; a season: e. g. tempus pessonis, mast time in the forest.

TEMPUS CONTINUUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A period of time which runs continually having once begun, feast-days being counted as well as ordinary days, and it making no difference whether the person against whom it runs is present or absent. Calvinus.

TEMPUS UTILE (Lat.). In Civil Law. A period of time which runs beneficially: i. e. feast-days are not included, nor does it run against one absent in a foreign country, or on business of the republic, or detained by stress of weather. But one detained by sickness is not protected from its running; for it runs where there is power to act by an agent as well as where there is power to act personally; and the sick man might have deputed his agent. Calvinus.

TENANCY. The state or condition of a tenant; the estate held by a tenant.

TENANT (Lat. teneo, tenere, to hold). One who holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will. In a popular sense, he is one who has the temporary use and occupation of lands or tenements which belong to another, the duration and other terms of whose occupation are usually defined by an agreement called a lease, while the parties thereto are placed in the relation of landlord and tenant. See LANDLORD AND TENANT; 5 M. & G. 54.

TENANTS IN COMMON are such as hold lands and tenements by several and distinct titles, and not by a joint title, but occupy in common, the only unity recognized between them being that of possession. They are accountable to each other for the profits of the estate; and if one of them turns another out of possession, an action of ejectment will lie against him. They may also have reciprocal actions of waste against each other; 2 Bla. Com. 191. See ESTATE IN COMMON; 7 Cruise, Dig.; Bac. Abr. Joint Tenants, and Tenants in Common; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (E 10, F 6), Chancery (3 V 4), Devise (N 8), Estates (K 8, R 2); 1 Vern. Ch. 353; Will. R. Pr. *137; 47 Conn. 474.

TENANT BY THE CURTESY at common law is a species of life tenant who, on the death of his wife seized of an estate of inheritance, after having issue by her which is capable of inheriting her estate, holds her lands for the period of his own life: after the birth of such a child, the tenant is called tenant by the curtesy initiate; Co. Litt. 29 a; 2 Bla. Com. 126; but to consummate the tenancy the marriage must be lawful, the wife must have possession, and not a mere right of possession, the issue must be born alive, during the lifetime of the mother, and the husband must survive the wife. Tenancy by curtesy has been adopted as a common law estate in most of the United States, although modified in many of them by statute; 1 Washb. R. P. 163. Thus, in Pennsylvania, the right to curtesy is by the act of 8th of April, 1833, given to the husband "although there be no issue of the marriage;" Will. R. P. *229 n. 2. In some states, e. g. Louisiana, Indiana, and Michigan, no curtesy is allowed. See CURTESY.

TENANT OF THE DEMESNE. One who is tenant of a mesne lord: as, where A is tenant of B, and C of A; B is the lord, A the mesne lord, and C tenant of the demesne. Hamm. N. P. 392, 393.

TENANT IN DOWER is another species of life tenant, occurring where the husband of a woman is seized of an estate of inheritance and dies, and the wife thereby becomes entitled to hold the third part of all the lands and tenements of which he was seized at any time during the coverture to her own use, for the term of her natural life. See DOWER; 2 Bla. Com. 129; Comyns, Dig. Dower (A).

The right of dower has been adopted, in a somewhat modified form, throughout the United States, and in nearly every state excepting Louisiana and Indiana it will be found to exist, substantially like the dower of the common law; 1 Washb. R. P. p. 187. Dower has substantially defeated in England under modern statutes; Schoul. Husb. & W. 453.

TENANT IN FEE, under the feudal law, held his lands either immediately or derivatively from the sovereign, in consideration of the military or other services he was bound to perform. If he held directly from the king he was called a tenant in fee, in capite. With us, the highest estate which a man can have in land has direct reference to his duty to the state: from it he ultimately holds his title, to it he owes fealty and service, and if he fails in his allegiance to it, or dies without heirs upon whom this duty may devolve, his lands revert to the state under which he held. Subject to this qualification, however, a tenant in fee has an absolute unconditional ownership in land, which upon his death vests in his heirs; and hence he enjoys what is called an estate of inheritance; see ESTATE; 2 Bla. Com. 81; Litt. § 1; Plowd. 555; Will. R. P. *60.

JOINT-TENANTS are two or more persons to whom lands or tenements have been granted to hold in fee-simple, for life, for years, or at will. In order to constitute an estate in joint-tenancy, the tenants thereof must have one and the same interest, arising by the same conveyance, commencing at the same time, and held by one and the same undivided possession; 2 Bla. Com. 180. The principal incident to this estate is the right of survivorship, by which upon the death of one joint-tenant the entire tenancy remains to the surviving co-tenant, and not to the heirs or other representatives of the deceased, the last survivor taking the whole estate. It is an estate which can only be created by the acts of the parties, and never by operation of law; Co. Litt. 184 b; 2 Cruise, Dig. 43; 4 Kent, 358; 2 Bla. Com. 179.

The policy of American law is against survivorship, and in many states it is abolished by statute, except in case of joint trustees; while in others, estates to two or more persons are held to create tenancies in common, unless expressly declared to be joint tenancies; 16 Gray, 308; 7 Mass. 131; Washb. R. P. 644.

TENANT FOR LIFE has a freehold interest in lands, the duration of which is confined to the life or lives of some particular person or persons, or to the happening or not happening of some uncertain event; 1 Cruise, 76. When he holds the estate by the life of another, he is usually called tenant pur autre vie; 2 Bla. Com. 120; Comyns, Dig. Estates (F 1). See ESTATE FOR LIFE; EMBLEMENTS.

TENANT BY THE MANNER. One who has a less estate than a fee in land which remains in the reversioner. He is so called because in avowries and other pleadings it is specially shown in what manner he is tenant of the land, in contradistinction to the veray tenant, who is called simply tenant. See VERAY.

TENANT PARAVAIL. The tenant of a tenant. He is so called because he has avails or profits of the land.

TENANT IN SEVERALTY is he who holds lands and tenements in his own right only, without any other person being joined or connected with him in point of interest during his estate therein; 2 Bla. Com. 179.

TENANT AT SUFFERANCE is he who comes into possession by a lawful demise, but after his term is ended continues the possession wrongfully by holding over. He has only a naked possession, stands in no privity to the landlord, and may, consequently, be removed without notice to quit: Co. Litt. 57 b; 2 Leon. 46; 3 id. 153; 1 Johns. Cas. 123; 4 Johns. 150, 312; 54 Penn. 86; 17 Pick. 268; Jacks. & G. Landl. & T. § 471.

TENANT IN TAIL is one who holds an estate in fee, which by the instrument creating it is limited to some particular heirs, exclusive of others; as, to the heirs of his body or to the heirs, male or female, of his body. The whole system of entailment, rendering estates inalienable, is so directly opposed to the spirit of our republican institutions as to have become very nearly extinct in the United States. Most of the states at an early period of our independence passed laws declaring such estates to be estates in fee-simple, or provided that the tenant and the remainderman might join in conveying the land in fee-simple. In New Hampshire, Chancellor Kent says, entails may still be created; while in some of the states they have not been expressly abolished by statute, but in practice they are now almost unknown. See ENTAILS; 2 Bla. Com. 113; 2 Kent; 2 Washb. R. P.

TENANT AT WILL is where a person holds rent-free by permission of the owner, or where he enters under an agreement to purchase, or for a lease, but has not paid rent. Formerly all leases for uncertain periods were considered to be tenancies at will merely; but in modern times they are construed into tenancies from year to year; and, in fact, the general language of the books now is that the former species of tenancy cannot exist without an express agreement to that effect; 8 Cow. 75; 4 Ired. 291; 3 Dana, 66; 12

Mass. 325; 23 Wend. 616; 12 N. Y. 346; but see Wood. Landl. & T. 30, n. 1. The great criterion by which to distinguish between tenancies from year to year, and at will, is the payment or reservation of rent; 5 Bing. 361; 2 Esp. 718.

A tenancy at will must always be at the will of either party, and such a tenant may be ejected at any time, and without notice, unless notice is rendered necessary by statute, as in Massachusetts and other states; Wood. Landl. & T. 51; 10 Gray, 290; but as soon as he once pays rent he becomes tenant from year to year; 1 W. & S. 90; Tayl. Land. & T. § 56; Co. Litt. 55; 2 Bla. Com. 145.

TENANT FOR YEARS is he to whom another has let lands, tenements, or hereditaments, for a certain number of years, agreed upon between them, and the tenant enters thereon. Before entry he has only an inchoate right, which is called an interesse termini; and it is of the essence of this estate that its commencement as well as its termination be fixed and determined, so that the lapse of time limited for its duration will, ipso facto, determine the tenancy; if otherwise, the occupant will be tenant from year to year, or at will, according to circumstances. See LEASE; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 54; 2 Bla. Com. 140; 28 Mo. 65; 26 N. J. L. 565.

TENANT FROM YEAR TO YEAR is where lands or tenements have been let without any particular limitation for the duration of the tenancy: hence any general occupation with permission, whether a tenant is holding over after the expiration of a lease for years, or otherwise, becomes a tenancy from year to year; 3 Burr. 1609; 3 B. & C. 478; 9 Johns. 330; 3 Zab. 311. The principal feature of this tenancy is that it is not determinable even at the end of the current year, unless a reasonable notice to quit is served by the party intending to dissolve the tenancy upon the other; 4 Cow. 349; 11 Wend. 616; 5 Bingh. 185. See LANDLORD AND TENANT; NOTICE TO QUIT; and as to this latter title, 15 C. L. J. 322.

TENANT RIGHT. In leases from the crown, corporations, or the church, it is usual to grant a further term to the old tenants in preference to strangers; and, as this expectation is seldom disappointed, such tenants are considered as having an ulterior interest beyond their subsisting term; and this interest is called the tenant right. Bacon, Abr. Leases and Terms for Years (U).

TENDER (Lat. tendere, to extend, to offer). An offer to deliver something, made in pursuance of some contract or obligation, under such circumstances as to require no further act from the party making it to complete the transfer.

Legal tender, money of a character which by law a debtor may require his creditor to receive in payment, in the absence of any agreement in the contract or obligation itself. See LEGAL TENDER.

In Contracts. It may be either of money or of specific articles.

Tender of money must be made by some person authorized by the debtor; Co. Litt. 206; 2 Maule & S. 86; to the creditor, or to some person properly authorized, and who must have capacity to receive it; 1 Camp. 477; Dougl. 632; 5 Taunt. 307; 4 B. & C. 29; 14 S. & R. 307; 11 Me. 475; 1 Gray, 600; 13 La. An. 529; but necessity will sometimes create exceptions to this rule; thus any one may make a tender for an idiot; 1 Inst. 206 b; an uncle, although not appointed guardian, has been permitted to make a tender on behalf of an infant whose father was dead; 1 Rawle, 408; in lawful coin of the country; 5 Co. 114; 13 Mass. 235; 4 N. H. 296; or paper money which has been legalized for this purpose; 2 Mas. 1; as, U. S. treasury notes, or "greenbacks;" 12 Wall. 457; 27 Ind. 426; or foreign coin made current by law; 2 Nev. & M. 519; but a tender in bank-notes will be good if not objected to on that account; 2 B. & P. 526; 9 Pick. 539; 1 Johns. 476; 1 Bay. 115; 1 Rawle, 408; 6 Harr. & J. 53; 7 Mo. 556; 6 Ala. N. S. 226; or by a check; Dowl. Pr. Cas. 442; 7 Ohio, 257. As to what has been held objection, see 2 Caines, 116; 13 Mass. 235; 5 N. H. 296; 10 Wheat. 333. The exact amount due must be tendered; 3 Camp. 70; 6 Taunt. 336; 5 Mass. 365; 2 Conn. 659; 41 Vt. 66; 29 Iowa, 480; though more may be tendered, if the excess is not to be handed back; 5 Co. 114; 3 Term, 683; 4 B. & Ad. 546; and asking change does not vitiate unless objection is made on that account; 1 Camp. 70; 5 Dowl. & R. 289; and the offer must be unqualified; 1 Camp. 131; 3 id. 70; 4 id. 156; 1 M. & W. 310; 9 Metc. 162; 20 Wend. 47; 18 Vt. 224; 1 Wisc. 141.

When a larger sum than is due is tendered, it is not necessary that the debtor pay or keep good the whole amount; for, although the tender of money is supposed to be an admission by the debtor that the entire sum tendered is due and payable, yet it is not conclusive evidence to that effect; 24 Ind. 250. But where tender was made after suit brought, and the amount supposed by defendant to be due was paid into court, it was decided that the full amount must be paid over to the plaintiff, notwithstanding a much less sum was found by arbitrators to be due; 82 Penn. 64.

It is said that the amount must be stated in making the offer; 30 Vt. 577. It must be made at the time agreed upon; 5 Taunt. 240; 7 id. 487; 1 Saund. 33 a, n.; 5 Pick. 187, 240; 8 Wend. 562; 4 Ark. 450; but may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages, if made subsequently, before suit brought; 1 Saund. 33 a. n.; statutes have been passed in many of the states, permitting the debtor to make a tender at any time before trial, of the amount he admits to be due, together with all costs accrued up to date of tender, and compelling plaintiff, in case he do not recover more than the sum tendered, to pay all costs subsequently incurred; 27 Am. L. Reg. 747. In Pennsylvania, by statute of 1705, in case of a tender made before suit, in the event of a suit, the amount tendered must be paid into court under a rule; 10 S. & R. 14; otherwise, the plea of tender is a nullity. If so paid tender is a good plea in bar, and if followed up, protects the defendant; 66 Penn. 158. Tender may be made after suit brought by paying the amount tendered into court with the costs up to the time of payment; 1 T. & H. Pr. 744. At common law the tender of a mortgage debt on the day it falls due and at the appointed place discharges the mortgage; but if made after the maturity of the debt, it must be kept good, in order to have that effect; 86 Ill. 431; s. c. 29 Am. Rep. 41, n.; 5 Pick. 240; 27 Me. 237; 50 Cal. 650; 34 N. J. L. 496; but in New York and Michigan mere tender is sufficient to discharge the mortgage; 26 Wend. 541; 21 N. Y. 343; 70 id. 553; 12 Mich. 270; 13 id. 303. See 27 Am. L. Reg. 182, n.; 2 Jon. The law of tender on the Continent of Europe is quite different from that of England, the debtor being allowed to make payment to his creditor, by depositing the amount which he admits to be due, in a special department of the public treasury, termed Caisse des Consignations. This is considered as an actual payment, and the money thus deposited bears interest at a rate fixed by the state; Code Civ. arts. 1257 et seq. This system is derived from the Roman law. Benj. Sales, § 754.

TENDER OF AMENDS. See AMENDS.

TENEMENT (from Lat. teneo, to hold). Every thing of a permanent nature which may be holden.

House, or homestead. Jacob. Rooms let in houses.

In its most extensive signification, tenement comprehends every thing which may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature; and not only lands and inheritances which are holden, but also rents and profits à prendre of which a man has any frank-tenement, and of which he may be seized ut delibero tenemento, are included under this term; Co. Litt. 6 a; 2 Bla. Com. 17; 1 Washb. R. P. 10. But the word tenements simply, without other circumstances, has never been construed to pass a fee; 10 Wheat. 204. See 4 Bingh. 293; 1 Term, 358; 3 id. 772; 1 B. & Ad. 161; Comyns, Dig. Grant (E 2), Trespass (A 2); 1 Washb. R. P. 10.

Its original meaning, according to some, was house or homestead. Jacob. In modern use it also signifies rooms let in houses. Webster, Dict.; 10 Wheat. 204; 104 Mass. 95; 107 id. 212.

Bracton says that tenements acquired by a villein were as to the lord in the same condition as chattels, because bought with the chattels which rightfully belong to the lord. Bracton, 26.

TENEMENTAL LAND. Land distributed by a lord among his tenants, as opposed to the demesnes which were occupied by himself and his servants. 2 Bla. Com. 90.

TENENDAS (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The name of a clause in charters of heritable rights, which derives its name from its first words, tenendas prædictas terras, and expresses the particular tenure by which the lands are to be holden. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, t. 3, n. 10.

TENENDUM (Lat.). That part of a deed which was formerly used in expressing the tenure by which the estate granted was holden; but since all freehold tenures were converted into socage, the tenendum is of no further use even in England, and is therefore joined to the habendum in this manner,—to have and to hold. The words "to hold" have now no meaning in our deeds. 2 Bla. Com. 298. See HABENDUM.

TENERI (Lat.). In Contracts. That part of a bond where the obligor declares himself to be held and firmly bound to the obligee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, is called the teneri. 3 Call, 350.

TENET (Lat. he holds). In Pleading. A term used in stating the tenure in an action for waste done during the tenancy.

When the averment is in the tenet, the plaintiff on obtaining a verdict will recover the place wasted, namely, that part of the premises in which the waste was exclusively done, if it were done in a part only, together with treble damages. But when the averment is in the tenuit, the tenancy being at an end, he will have judgment for his damages only. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 652.

TENNESSEE. The name of one of the United States of America. It is divided into three grand divisions: East Tennessee, that part of the state lying east of the Cumberland Mountains; Middle Tennessee, between the Cumberland Mountains on the east and the Tennessee River on the west; and West Tennessee, lying west of the Tennessee River. The state contains ninety-six counties.

It was originally a part of North Carolina. In April, 1784, the legislature of North Carolina passed an act ceding to the United States, upon certain conditions, all her territory west of the Appalachian or Alleghany Mountains. Before the cession was accepted by congress, it was repealed by another act passed in October, 1784. In the mean time, movements had been set on foot by the people to constitute themselves an independent state. They acted upon the assumed but erroneous ground that North Carolina had by the cession abdicated her sovereignty, and, as the congress had not accepted it and might not upon the conditions proposed, they were left without any regular government, and therefore had an inherent right to provide one for themselves. They consummated their design after the cession act was repealed, and gave to their new state the name of The State of Franklin.

This revolutionary state maintained its existence for about three years, when it was suppressed and the rightful dominion of North Carolina reinstated. In December, 1789, the legislature again ceded the territory to the United States; and the cession was accepted by congress by an act approved April 2, 1790. North Carolina made it a fundamental condition of the cession that the territory so ceded should be laid out and formed into a state or states, containing a suitable extent of territory, the inhabitants of which should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of the late congress for the government of the western territory of the United States: provided, always, that no regulations made or to be made by congress should tend to emancipate slaves. One of the privileges thus secured to the territory was that when the number of its inhabitants should amount to sixty thousand, it should be entitled to admission into the Union upon an equality with the original states. Under the authority of the territorial legislature, the census was taken in 1795, and, the necessary number of inhabitants being found in the territory, a convention was called, and a constitution established on February 6, 1796. The legal name of the territory while in a colonial condition was The Territory of the United States South of the River Ohio. But in the constitution the people adopted the name of The State of Tennessee.

As congress had not previously decided whether the territory should constitute one state or more than one, and had not itself authorized the enumeration of the inhabitants or the formation of a constitution, there was a strong minority against the admission of Tennessee into the Union. 1 Benton, Debates, 154. But she was admitted by an act approved June 1, 1796. Prior to this time a legislature had been elected, the state government organized, and many important laws enacted.

It was a part of the avowed object of the cession made by North Carolina to the United States to furnish "further means of hastening the extinguishment of the national debt." This object wholly failed. The land was to be first subject to the satisfaction of the claims which had originated against it under the laws of North Carolina. These claims ultimately absorbed nearly all the land that was fit for cultivation. Congress from time to time ceded the refuse land to Tennessee, and finally, by the act passed August 7, 1846, surrendered to her the last remnant to which the right of the United States had been previously reserved.

The constitution of 1796 was not submitted to the people for ratification. The authority of the convention established it as the constitution of the state. The constitution of 1834 was the work of a convention assembled in that year to revise and amend the first. It was submitted to the people, and ratified by popular vote, in 1835. The government was reorganized in 1835–36, in accordance with its provisions. Amendments were ratified in 1853 and 1866. The present constitution was framed, submitted to the people, and ratified in 1870, and went into effect May 5, 1870.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER. The Legislature is styled "the General Assembly." It consists of a senate and house of representatives. The number of senators is not to exceed one-third the number of representatives. The number of representatives is not to exceed seventy-five, until the population of the state is a million and a half, and never to exceed ninety-nine. A representative must be twenty-one years old, and a senator thirty. In all other respects their qualifications are the same. They are: citizenship of the United States, three years' residence in the state, and one year's residence in the county or district represented. They are elected by ballot, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of each even year, to serve for two years. The sessions of the assembly are also biennial, commencing on the first Monday in January next ensuing the election. The governor may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the general assembly by proclamation, in which he shall state specifically the purposes for which they are convened, and they cannot enter upon any business except that for which they were called; Const. Art. III. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years, being a citizen of the United States, a resident of the state for twelve months, and of the county wherein he offers to vote for six months next preceding the day of election, may be an elector. No qualification is attached except that each voter must give satisfactory evidence to the judge of elections that he has paid the poll tax prescribed by law; Const. Art. IV. § 1. This provision has not been carried into effect by legislative enactment.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER. The Governor is to be thirty years of age, a citizen of the United States, and a citizen of the state seven years next before his election. The supreme executive power is vested in him. He is elected at the times and places of electing members of the general assembly, and by the same electors. A plurality of votes elects a governor or member of assembly. He holds his office for two years and until his successor is elected and qualified. He is not eligible more than six years in any term of eight. He has a negative on the acts and resolutions of the general assembly. In other respects he has the ordinary powers of the chief executive magistrate of the American states. His compensation can neither be increased nor diminished during the term for which he is elected.

A Treasurer and a Comptroller of the treasury are appointed for the state by vote of both houses of the general assembly, and hold their offices for a term of two years; Const. Art. VII. § 3.

THE JUDICIAL POWER. The judicial power is vested in one supreme court, in such inferior courts as the legislature may establish, and in the judges thereof, and in justices of the peace, and corporation courts.

The Supreme Court is composed of five judges, of whom not more than two shall reside in any one of the grand divisions of the state. Its jurisdiction is appellate only, with a few inconsiderable exceptions; Const. Art. VI.; 3 Hayw. 59; 3 Cold. 255; T. & S. Rev. S. 4094, et seq. Its sessions are held annually, at Knoxville, Nashville, and Jackson. The judges are elected for eight years, by the qualified voters of the state at large. They must be thirty-five years of age, and residents of the state five years before their election.

The court of general original jurisdiction is the Circuit Court; it also has general appellate jurisdiction. The state is divided into sixteen judicial circuits; and three terms of the court are held annually in every county in the state. The people of each circuit elect the judge thereof, for the term of eight years. The only qualifications required by the constitution are that he shall be thirty years of age, a resident of the state for five years before his election, and of the circuit or district one year. An appeal lies from every decision of the circuit court to the supreme court; Code, §§ 3155, 3172, 3176.

The Chancery Court has general original jurisdiction of all cases of an equitable nature where the demand exceeds fifty dollars; Code, § 4280. There are some cases of an equitable nature in which the circuit and county courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the chancery courts. Act of March 26, 1879, c. 97. The state is divided into twelve chancery districts, in each of which a chancellor is elected, by the people, for eight years. In nearly every county in the state two terms of the chancery court are held annually. An appeal lies to the supreme court from all its decisions.

The County Court is divided into a Quarterly Court and a Quorum Court. The quarterly court is held each quarter in each county in the state by one-half of the justices of the county, and has a police jurisdiction. The quorum court is held on the first Monday in each month in each county by three justices appointed by the quarterly court, except in some of the more populous counties where there is a county judge. The county court has jurisdiction of the probate of wills, the granting of administrations, the appointment of guardians, and the general administration of decedents' estates. There are some cases in which its jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the circuit and chancery courts; Code, §§ 4201–4205. An appeal lies from its decisions to the circuit court in all cases, and in some to the supreme court; Code, §§ 3147–3154.

Justices of the Peace have jurisdiction in cases to an extent varying from fifty to five hundred dollars, according to the nature of the demand. An appeal lies from their decisions to the circuit court. Act 1875, ch. 11.

An Attorney-General and a Reporter for the state are appointed by the judges of the supreme court for a term of eight years. An attorney for the state for any circuit or district for which a judge having criminal jurisdiction shall be provided by law, shall be elected by the qualified voters of such circuit or district, and shall hold his office for a term of eight years, and shall have been a resident of the state five years, and of the circuit or district one year.

By the constitution of 1796, these judicial officers were elected by the general assembly, and held their offices during good behavior. By the constitution of 1834, they were elected by the general assembly for a term of years. Since the amendment of the constitution in 1853, they have been elected by the people, as above set forth.

TENOR. A term used in pleading to denote that an exact copy is set out. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 235; 1 Mass. 203; 1 East, 180.

The tenor of an instrument signifies the true meaning of the matter therein contained. Cowel. In Scotland an action for proving the purport of a lost deed is called the action of proving the tenor.

In Chancery Pleading. A certified copy of records of other courts removed into chancery by certiorari. Gresl. Ev. 309.

TENSE. A term used in grammar to denote the distinction of time.

The acts of a court of justice ought to be in the present tense: as, præceptum est, not præceptum fuit; but the acts of the party may be in the perfect tense: as, venit et protulit hic in curiâ quandam querelam suam, and the continuances are in the perfect tense: as, venerunt, not veniunt; 1 Mod. 81.

The contract of marriage should be made in language of the present tense; 6 Binn. 405. See 1 Saund. 393, n. 1.

TENUIT (Lat. he held). A term used in stating the tenure in an action for waste done after the termination of the tenancy. See TENET.

TENURE (from Lat. tenere, to hold). The mode by which a man holds an estate in lands.

Such a holding as is coupled with some service, which the holder is bound to perform so long as he continues to hold.

The thing held is called a tenement; the occupant, a tenant; and the manner of his holding constitutes the tenure. Upon common-law principles, all lands within the state are held directly or indirectly from the king, as lord paramount or supreme proprietor. To him every occupant of land owes fidelity and service of some kind, as the necessary condition of his occupation. If he fails in either respect, or dies without heirs upon whom this duty may devolve, his land reverts to the sovereign as ultimate proprietor. In this country, the people in their corporate capacity represent the state sovereignty; and every man must bear true allegiance to the state, and pay his share of the taxes required for her support, as the condition upon which alone he may hold land within her boundaries; Co. Litt. 65 a; 2 Bla. Com. 105; 3 Kent, 487.

In the earlier ages of the world the condition of land was probably allodial, that is, without subjection to any superior,—every man occupying as much land found unappropriated as his necessities required. Over this he exercised an unqualified dominion; and when he parted with his ownership the possession of his successor was equally free and absolute. An estate of this character necessarily excludes the idea of any tenure, since the occupant owes no service or allegiance to any superior as the condition of his occupation. But when the existence of an organized society became desirable to secure certain blessings only by its means to be acquired, there followed the establishment of governments, and a new relation arose between each government and its citizens,—that of protection on the one hand and dependence on the other,—necessarily involving the idea of service to the state as a condition to the use and enjoyment of lands within its boundaries. This relation was of course modified according to the circumstances of particular states; but throughout Europe it early took the form of the feudal system. See ALLODIUM.

Some writers suggest that the image of a feudal policy may be discovered in almost every age and quarter of the globe; but, if so, its traces are very indistinct, and, in fact, we have nothing reliable on the subject until we come to the history of the Gothic conquerors of the Roman empire. The military occupation of the country was their established policy, and enabled them more effectually to secure their conquests. The commander-in-chief, as head of the conquering nation, parcelled out the conquered lands among his principal followers, and they in turn granted portions of it to their vassals; but all grants were upon the same condition of fealty and service. The essential element of a feudal grant was that it did not create an estate of absolute ownership, but the grantee was merely a tenant or holder of the land, on condition of certain services to be rendered by him, the neglect of which caused a forfeiture to the grantor. Hargrave's note to Co. Litt. 64 a; Wright, Ten. 7; Spelm. Feuds, c. 2; 1 Hallam, Mid. Ages, 83; 6 Cra. 87; 12 Johns. 365.

The introduction of feudal tenures into England is usually attributed to the Normans, but it evidently existed there before their arrival. It appears from the laws of the Saxons that a considerable portion of land was held under their lords by persons of a greater or less degree of bondage, who owed services of either a civil, military, or agricultural character. A large quantity of the lands which were entered in the Conqueror's celebrated Domesday book were then held by the same tenure and subjected to the same services as they had been in the time of Edward the Confessor. The Normans probably introduced some new provisions, and attempted to re-establish more, which had become obsolete, and we know there were many severe contests between the Normans and the English with respect to their restoration; but the general system of their laws remained much the same under the new dynasty of the Normans as it was under that of the Saxons. Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 120; Stevens, Const. Eng. 22.

The principal species of tenure which grew out of the feudal system was the tenure by knight's service. This was essentially military in its character, and required the possession of a certain quantity of land, called a knight's fee,—the measure of which, in the time of Edward I., was estimated at twelve ploughlands, of the value of twenty pounds per annum. He who held this portion of land was bound to attend his lord to the wars forty days in every year, if called upon. It seems, however, that if he held but half a knight's fee he was only bound to attend twenty days. Many arbitrary and tyrannical incidents or lordly privileges were attached to this tenure, which at length became so odious and oppressive that the whole system was destroyed at a blow by the statute of 12 Charles II. c. 24, which declared that all such lands should thenceforth be held in free and common socage,—a statute, says Blackstone, which was a greater acquisition to the civil property of this kingdom than even Magna Charta itself; since that only pruned the luxuriances which had grown out of military tenures, and thereby preserved them in vigor, but the statute of king Charles extirpated the whole, and demolished both root and branches. See FEUDAL LAW; Co. Litt. 69; Stat. Westm. 1, c. 36.

Tenure in socage seems to have been a relic of Saxon liberty which, up to the time of the abolition of military tenures, had been evidently struggling with the innovations of the Normans. Its great redeeming quality was its certainty; and in this sense it is by the old law-writers put in opposition to the tenure by knight's service, where the tenure was altogether precarious and uncertain. Littleton defines it to be where a tenant holds his tenement by any certain service, in lieu of all other services, so that they be not services of chivalry or knight's service: as, to hold by fealty and twenty shillings rent, or by homage, fealty, and twenty shillings rent, or by homage and fealty without any rents, or by fealty and a certain specified service, as, to plough the lord's land for three days. Littleton, 117; 2 Bla. Com. 79. See SOCAGE.

Other tenures have grown out of the two last mentioned species of tenure, and are still extant in England, although some of them are fast becoming obsolete. Of these is the tenure by grand serjeanty, which consists in some service immediately respecting the person or dignity of the sovereign: as, to carry the king's standard, or to be his constable or marshal, his butler or chamberlain, or to perform some similar service. While the tenure by petit serjeanty requires some inferior service, not strictly military or personal, to the king; as, the annual render of a bow or sword. The late duke of Wellington annually presented his sovereign with a banner, in acknowledgment of his tenure. There are also tenures by copyhold and in frankalmoigne, in burgage and of gavelkind; but their nature, origin, and history are explained in the several articles appropriated to those terms. See 2 Bla. Com. 66; Co. 2d Inst. 233.

Tenures were distinguished by the old common-law writers, according to the quality of the service, into free or base; the former were such as were not unbecoming a soldier or a freeman to perform, as, to serve the lord in the wars; while the latter were only considered fit for a peasant, as to plough the land, and the like. They were further distinguished with reference to the person from whom the land was held: as, a tenure in capite, where the holding was of the person of the king, and tenure in gross, where the holding was of a subject. Before the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. I., any person might by a grant of land have created an estate as a tenure of his person or of his house or manor; and although by Magna Charta a man could not alienate so much of his land as not to leave enough to answer the services due to the superior lord, yet, as that statute did not remedy the evil then complained of, it was provided by the statute above referred to, that if any tenant should alien any part of his land in fee, the alienee should hold immediately of the lord of the fee, and should be charged with a proportional part of the service due in respect to the quantity of land held by him. The consequence of which was that upon every such alienation the services upon which the estate was originally granted became due to the superior lord, and not to the immediate grantee; 4 Term, 443; 4 East, 271; Crabb, R. P. § 735.

The remote position of the United States, as well as the genius of its institutions, has preserved its independence of these embarrassing tenures. With scarce an exception, its present condition includes no tenure but that which, as we have intimated, is necessarily incident to all governments. Every estate in fee-simple is held as absolutely and unconditionally as is compatible with the state's right of eminent domain. Many grants of land made by the British government prior to the revolution created socage tenures, which were subsequently abolished or modified by the legislatures of the different states. Thus, by the charter of Pennsylvania, the proprietary held his estate of the crown in free and common socage, his grantees being thereby also authorized to hold of him direct, notwithstanding the statute of Quia Emptores. The act of Pennsylvania of November 27, 1779, substituted the commonwealth in place of the proprietaries as the ultimate proprietor of whom lands were held. In 44 Penn. 492, it was held that Pennsylvania titles are allodial not feudal. In New York there was supposed to have been some species of military tenure introduced by the Dutch previously to their surrender to the English, in 1664; but the legislature of that state in 1787 turned them all into a tenure in free and common socage, and finally, in 1830, abolished this latter tenure entirely, and declared that all lands in that state should thenceforth be held upon a uniform allodial tenure. On this subject, consult Bracton; Glanville; Coke, Litt.; Wright, Tenures; Maddox, Hist. Exch.; Sullivan, Lect.; Craig, de Feud.; Du Cange; Reeve, Hist. of Eng. Law; Kent, Commentaries; Sharswood's Lecture before the Law Academy of Philadelphia, 1855; Washburn, Real Property.

TENURE OF OFFICE. By R. S. § 1765, it is provided that every person holding any civil office under the United States to which he has been, or may thereafter be, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the senate, or by the appointment, by and with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except that (by § 1768) during any recess of the senate, the president is authorized to suspend any such officer so appointed, except judges, until the next session of the senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time. See 12 Ct. Cl. 455; 18 Wall. 112

TERCE. In Scotch Law. A life-rent competent by law to widows who have not accepted of special provisions in the third part of the heritable subjects in which the husband died infeft. It thus corresponds to dower; Craig, Inst. § 8; Erskine, Inst. 2, 9, 26; Burge, Confl. of Laws, 429–435. See KENNING TO THE TERCE.

TERM. Word; expression; speech.

Terms are words or characters by which we announce our sentiments, and make known to others things with which we are acquainted. These must be properly construed or interpreted in order to understand the persons using them. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; WORD.

In Estates. The limitation of an estate: as, a term for years, for life, and the like. The word term does not merely signify the time specified in the lease, but the estate, also, and interest that passes by that lease: and therefore the term may expire during the continuance of the time: as, by surrender, forfeiture, and the like. 2 Bla. Com. 145; 8 Pick. 339.

Terms legal and conventional in Scotland are periods for the payment of rent, corresponding to quarter days in England. The legal terms are Whitsunday, which for this purpose is the 15th of May; and Martinmas, the 11th of November. Bell. Conventional terms are such as are created by contract between different parties, the principal ones being Candlemas (Feb. 2), and Lammas-day (Aug. 1). Moz. & W.

In Practice. The space of time during which a court holds a session. Sometimes the term is a monthly, at others it is a quarterly period, according to the constitution of the court.

The whole term is considered as but one day: so that the judges may at any time during the term revise their judgments. In the computation of the term, all adjournments are to be included; 9 Watts, 200. Courts are presumed to know judicially when their terms are required to be held by public law; 4 Dev. 427. In England, by the Judicature Acts, q. v., the division of the legal year into the four terms of Hilary, Easter, Trinity, and Michaelmas has been abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice; see EASTER TERM.

TERM FEE. In English Practice. A certain sum which a solicitor is entitled to charge to his client, and the client to recover, if successful, from the unsuccessful party; payable for every term in which any proceedings subsequent to the summons shall take place. Whart. Lex.

TERM FOR YEARS. An estate for years and the time during which such estate is to be held are each called a term: hence the term may expire before the time, as, by a surrender. Co. Litt. 45. See ESTATE FOR YEARS; LEASE.

TERM IN GROSS. An estate for years which is not held in trust for the party entitled to the land on the expiration of the term.

TERM PROBATORY. In an ecclesiastical suit, the time during which evidence may be taken. Cootes, Eccl. Pr. 240.

TERMINUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A day set to the defendant. Spelman. In this sense Bracton, Glanville, and some others sometimes use it. Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, p. 71; Beames, Glanville, 27, n.

TERMINUS (Lat.). A boundary or limit, either of space or time. A bound, goal, or borders parting one man's land from another's. Est inter eos non determinis, sed tota possessione contentio. Cic. Acad. 4, 43. It is used also for an estate for a term of years: e. g. "interesse termini." 2 Bla. Com. 143. See TERM.

Terminus a quo (Lat.). The starting-point of a private way is so called. Hamm. N. P. 196.

Terminus ad quem (Lat.). The point of termination of a private way is so called. In common parlance, the point of starting and that of termination of a line of railway, are each called the terminus.

TERMOR. One who holds lands and tenements for a term of years, or life. Littleton, § 100; 4 Tyrwh. 561.

TERMS, TO BE UNDER. A party is said to be under terms, when an indulgence is granted to him by the court in its discretion, on certain conditions. Thus, when an injunction is granted ex parte, the party obtaining it is put under terms to abide by such order as to damages as the court may make at the hearing. Moz. & W.

TERRE-TENANT (improperly spelled ter-tenant). One who has the actual possession of land; but, in a more technical sense, he who is seised of the land; and in the latter sense the owner of the land, or the person seised, is the terre-tenant, and not the lessee. 4 W. & S. 256; Bacon, Abr. Uses and Trusts. It has been holden that mere occupiers of the land are not terre-tenants. See 16 S. & R. 432; 3 Saund. 7, n. 4; 2 Bla. Com. 91, 328.

Contribution among Terre-tenants. The question whether purchasers, at different times, of land bound by an incumbrance created by the grantor, stand in equal equity as regards this incumbrance, and if so, must each contribute proportionably to its discharge, has been settled in England in the affirmative, following the rule laid down in the Year Books and repeated in Coke's Reports; 2 Wms. Saund. p. 10, n.; 3 Rep. 14 b. In this country, the opposite view has been taken; 1 Johns. Ch. 447; 5 id. 235; 10 S. & R. 450; 20 Penn. 222. See Lecture before Phila. Law Acad. 1863, by G. W. Biddle, LL.D.

TERRIER. In English Law. A roll, catalogue, or survey of lands, belonging either to a single person or a town, in which are stated the quantity of acres, the names of the tenants, and the like.

By the ecclesiastical law, an inquiry is directed to be made from time to time of the temporal rights of the clergymen of every parish, and to be returned into the registry of the bishop: this return is denominated a terrier. 1 Phill. Ev. 602.

TERRITORIAL COURTS. The courts established in the territories of the United States. See COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

TERRITORY. A part of a country separated from the rest and subject to a particular jurisdiction.

The word is derived from terreo, and is said to be so called because the magistrate within his jurisdiction has the power of inspiring a salutary fear. Dictum est ab eo quod magistratus intra fines ejus terendi jus habet. Henrion de Pansy, Auth. Judiciaire, 98. In speaking of the ecclesiastical jurisdictions, Francis Duaren observes that the ecclesiastics are said not to have territory, nor the power of arrest or removal, and are not unlike the Roman magistrates of whom Gellius says vocationem habebant non prehensionem. De Sacris Eccles. Minist. lib. 1, cap. 4.

In American Law. A portion of the country subject to and belonging to the United States which is not within the boundary of any state or the District of Columbia.

The constitution of the United States, art. 4, s. 3, provides that the congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property of the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be construed so as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any state.

Congress possesses the power to erect territorial governments within the territory of the United States: the power of congress over such territory is exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, unless in the case of ceded territory, as far as it may be affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled. Story, Const. § 1322; Rawle, Const. 237; 1 Kent, 243, 359; 1 Pet. 511. See the articles on the various territories; STATE. As to whether a territory is a state under the judiciary act, see STATE.

TERROR. That state of the mind which arises from the event or phenomenon that may serve as a prognostic of some catastrophe; affright from apparent danger.

One of the constituents of the offence of riot is that the acts of the persons engaged in it should be to the terror of the people, as a show of arms, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures; but it is not requisite in order to constitute this crime that personal violence should be committed; 3 Camp. 369; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 65, s. 5; 4 C. & P. 373, 538. See Rolle, 109; Dalton, Just. c. 186; Viner, Abr. Riots (A 8).

To constitute a forcible entry; 1 Russ. Cr. 287; the act must be accompanied with circumstances of violence or terror; and in order to make the crime of robbery there must be violence or putting in fear; but both these circumstances need not concur; 4 Binn. 379. See RIOT; ROBBERY; PUTTING IN FEAR.

TERTIUS INTERVENIENS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who, claiming an interest in the subject or thing in dispute in action between other parties, asserts his right to act with the plaintiff, to be joined with him, and to recover the matter in dispute, because he has an interest in it; or to join the defendant, and with him oppose the interest of the plaintiff, which it is his interest to defeat. He differs from the intervenor, or he who interpleads in equity. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3819, note.

TEST. Something by which to ascertain the truth respecting another thing. 7 Penn. 428; 6 Whart. 284.

TEST ACT. The act of 25 Car. II. c. 2, by which it was enacted that all persons holding any office, civil or military (excepting some very inferior ones), or receiving pay from the crown, or holding a place of trust under it, should take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and receive the sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, under a penalty of £500 and disability to the office. 4 Bla. Com. 59. Abolished, 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, so far as taking the sacrament is concerned, and new form of declaration substituted. Mozl. & W.

TESTAMENT. In Civil Law. The appointment of an executor or testamentary heir, according to the formalities prescribed by law. Domat, liv. 1, tit. 1, s. 1.

At first there were only two sorts of testaments among the Romans,—that called calatis comitiis, and another called in procinctu. (See below.) In the course of time, these two sorts of testament having become obsolete, a third form was introduced, called per æs et libram, which was a fictitious sale of the inheritance to the heir apparent. The inconveniences which were experienced from these fictitious sales again changed the form of testament; and the prætor introduced another, which required the seal of seven witnesses. The emperors having increased the solemnity of these testaments, they were called written or solemn testaments, to distinguish them from nuncupative testaments, which could be made without writing. Afterwards military testaments were introduced, in favor of soldiers actually engaged in military service.

A testament calatis comitiis, or made in the comitia,—that is, the assembly of the Roman people,—was an ancient manner of making wills used in times of peace among the Romans. The comitia met twice a year for this purpose. Those who wished to make such testaments caused to be convoked the assembly of the people by these words, calatis comitiis. None could make such wills that were not entitled to be at the assemblies of the people. This form of testament was repealed by the law of the Twelve Tables.

A civil testament is one made according to all the forms prescribed by law, in contradistinction to a military testament, in making which some of the forms may be dispensed with. Civil testaments are more ancient than military ones; the former were in use during the time of Romulus, the latter were introduced during the time of Coriolanus. See Hist. de la Jurisp. Rom. de M. Terrason, p. 119.

A common testament is one which is made jointly by several persons. Such testaments are forbidden in Louisiana, Civ. Code of La. art. 1565, and by the laws of France, Code Civ. 968, in the same words, namely: "A testament cannot be made by the same act, by two or more persons, either for the benefit of a third person, or under the title of a reciprocal or mutual disposition."

A testament ab irato is one made in a gust of passion or hatred against the presumptive heir, rather than from a desire to benefit the devisee. When the facts of unreasonable anger are proved, the will is annulled as unjust and as not having been freely made. See AB IRATO.

A mystic testament (called a solemn testament, because it requires more formality than a nuncupative testament) is a form of making a will which consists principally in enclosing it in an envelope and sealing it in the presence of witnesses.

This kind of testament is used in Louisiana. The following are the provisions of the Civil Code of that state on the subject, namely: the mystic or secret testament, otherwise called the close testament, is made in the following manner: the testator must sign his dispositions, whether he has written them himself, or has caused them to be written by another person. The paper containing these dispositions, or the paper serving as their envelope, must be closed and sealed. The testator shall present it thus closed and sealed to the notary and to seven witnesses, or he shall cause it to be closed and sealed in their presence; then he shall declare to the notary in the presence of the witnesses that that paper contains his testament written by himself, or by another by his direction, and signed by him, the testator. The notary shall then draw up the act of superscription, which shall be written on that paper, or on the sheet that serves as its envelope, and that act shall be signed by the testator and by the notary and the witnesses. (5 Mart. La. 182.) All that is above prescribed shall be done without interruption or turning aside to other acts; and in case the testator, by reason of any hindrance that has happened since the signing of the testament, cannot sign the act of superscription, mention shall be made of the declaration made by him thereof, without its being necessary in that case to increase the number of witnesses. Those who know not how or are not able to write, and those who know not how or are not able to sign their names, cannot make dispositions in the form of the mystic will. If any one of the witnesses to the act of superscription knows not how to sign, express mention shall be made thereof. In all cases the act must be signed by at least two witnesses. La. Civ. Code, art. 1584–1588.

A nuncupative testament was one made verbally, in the presence of seven witnesses: it was not necessary that it should have been in writing; the proof of it was by parol evidence. See NUNCUPATIVE.

In Louisiana, testaments, whether nuncupative or mystic, must be drawn up in writing, either by the testator himself, or by some other person under his dictation. The custom of making verbal statements, that is to say, resulting from the mere deposition of witnesses who were present when the testator made known to them his will, without his having committed it or caused it to be committed to writing, is abrogated. Nuncupative testaments may be made by public act, or by act under private signature. La. Civ. Code, art. 1568–1570.

An olographic testament is one which is written wholly by the testator himself. In order to be valid, it must be entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator. It is subject to no other form. See La. Civ. Code, art. 1581.

TESTAMENTARY. Belonging to a testament; as, a testamentary gift; a testamentary guardian, or one appointed by will or testament; letters testamentary, or a writing under seal, given by an officer lawfully authorized, granting power to one named as executor to execute a last will.

TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY. Mental capacity sufficient for making a valid will. As to what constitutes, see WILLS; 12 Am. L. Reg. 385.

TESTAMENTARY CAUSES. In English Law. Causes relating to probate of testaments and administration and accounts upon the same. They are enumerated among ecclesiastical causes by Lord Coke. 5 Co. 1, and Table of Cases at the end of the part. Over these causes the probate court has now exclusive jurisdiction, by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95. See JUDICATURE ACTS for the present jurisdiction.

TESTAMENTARY GUARDIAN. A guardian appointed by last will of a father to have custody of his child and his real and personal estate till he attains the age of twenty-one. In England, the power to appoint such guardian was given by 12 Car. II. c. 34. The principles of this statute have been generally adopted in the United States; 12 N. H. 437; but not in Connecticut; 1 Swift, Dig. 48.

TESTAMENTARY POWER. The power to make a will is neither a natural nor a constitutional right, but depends wholly upon statute; 100 Mass. 234. Such power has been expressly conferred by statute in most of the states, in some cases unrestricted, in others with various restrictions by reason of dower and homestead rights, and for other reasons; 3 Jarm. Wills, 721, n.; 731, n.

TESTATE. The condition of one who leaves a valid will at his death.

TESTATOR (Lat.). One who has made a testament or will.

In general, all persons may be testators. But to this rule there are various exceptions. First, persons who are deprived of understanding cannot make wills; idiots, lunatics, and infants are among this class. Second, persons who have understanding, but being under the power of others cannot freely exercise their will; and this the law presumes to be the case with a married woman, and therefore she cannot make a will without the express consent of her husband to the particular will. When a woman makes a will under some general agreement on the part of the husband that she shall make a will, the instrument is not properly a will, but a writing in the nature of a will or testament. Third, persons who are deprived of their free will cannot make a testament: as, a person in duress. 2 Bla. Com. 497; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2102 et seq. See DEVISOR; DURESS; FEME COVERT; IDIOT; WIFE; WILL.

TESTATRIX (Lat.). A woman who has made a will or testament.

TESTATUM (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ which is issued by the court of one county to the sheriff of another county in the same state, when the defendant cannot be found in the county where the court is located: for example, after a judgment has been obtained, and a ca. sa. has been issued, which has been returned non est inventus, a testatum ca. sa. may be issued to the sheriff of the county where the defendant is. See Viner, Abr. Testatum, 259.

In Conveyancing. That part of a deed which commences with the words "this indenture witnesseth."

TESTE OF A WRIT (Lat.). In Practice. The concluding clause, commencing with the word witness, etc. A signature in attestation of the fact that a writ is issued by authority. A writ which bears the teste is sometimes said to be tested.

The act of congress of May 8, 1792, 1 Story, Laws, 227, directs that all writs and process issuing from the supreme or a circuit court shall bear teste of the chief justice of the supreme court, or, if that office be vacant, of the associate justice next in precedence; and that all writs of process issuing from a district court shall bear teste of the judge of such court, or, if the said office be vacant, of the clerk thereof. See R. S. §§ 911, 912; Sergeant, Const. Law; 20 Viner, Abr. 262; Steph. Pl. 25.

TESTES. Witnesses.

TESTIFY. To give evidence according to law. A witness testifying in regard to conversations had with a party, must state either the language used, or the substance of it. The impression left upon his mind by the conversations is not evidence; 33 Md. 135.

TESTIMONIAL PROOF. In Civil Law. A term used in the same sense as parol evidence is used at common law and in contradistinction to literal proof, which is written evidence.

TESTIMONIES. In Spanish Law. An attested copy of an instrument by a notary. Neuman & Baretti, Dict.; Tex. Dig.

TESTIMONY. The statement made by a witness under oath or affirmation.

Testimony and evidence are synonymous, but evidence includes testimony, as well as all other kinds of proof. It seems settled, both in England and this country, that a prisoner may be convicted on the testimony of an accomplice alone, though the court may, at its discretion, advise an acquittal unless such testimony is corroborated on material points; Whart. Cr. Law, § 783.

Where testimony was introduced under objection for the purpose of corroboration, did not tend to connect the defendant with the crime, and the jury were instructed that if they were satisfied of the defendant's guilt upon the whole testimony, they should convict; held, error; 127 Mass. 424; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 391, n.

TESTMOIGNE. This is an old and barbarous French word, signifying, in the old books, evidence. Comyns, Dig. Testmoigne.

TEXAS. The name of one of the states of the American Union.

Under the names of Coahuila and Texas, it was a province of Mexico until 1836, when the inhabitants established a separate republic. On the first day of March, 1845, the congress of the United States, by a joint resolution, submitted to the new republic a proposition providing for the erection of the territory of Texas into a new state, and for its annexation to that country under the name of the state of Texas. This proposition was accepted by the existing government of Texas on the 23d of June, 1845, and was ratified by the people in convention on the 6th of July. On the 29th of December following, by a joint resolution of congress, the new state was formally admitted into the Union. The present constitution of the state was adopted by a convention of the people, at Austin, on the 24th day of November, 1875, and was voted upon and accepted by the people on the 17th day of February, 1876.

The powers of the government are divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative power of the state is vested in a senate and house of representatives. The senate consists of thirty-one members, and cannot be increased above this number. The house of representatives, at present, consists of ninety-three members, but may be increased after any apportionment upon the ratio of not more than one representative for every fifteen thousand inhabitants; provided, the number never exceeds one hundred and fifty.

Senators are chosen by the qualified electors for four years, but a new senate shall be chosen after every apportionment. They are divided into two classes, so that one-half of the senate is chosen biennially. No person can be a senator unless he is a citizen of the United States and a qualified elector of the state, and has been a resident of the state five years next preceding his election, and for the last year thereof a resident of the district for which he is chosen, and has attained the age of twenty-six years.

The House of Representatives is composed of members chosen by the qualified electors for the term of two years from the day of the general election, at such times and places as are now, or may hereafter be, designated by law. Const. art. 3. No person can be a representative unless he is a citizen of the United States, or was at the time of the adoption of the constitution a citizen of the republic of Texas, and has been an inhabitant of this state two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof a citizen of the county, city, or town for which he shall be chosen; and he must have attained the age of twenty-one years.

Two-thirds of each house constitute a quorum to do business. The pay of the members for their services cannot exceed five dollars per day for the first sixty days of each session; and after that not exceeding two dollars per day for the remainder of the session. They are also entitled to mileage at the rate of five dollars for every twenty-five miles.

The regular sessions of the legislature take place biennially. Extra sessions may be called by the governor at any time.

The third article of the constitution contains the customary provisions for securing the organization of the two houses, choice of officers, qualification of members, power of expulsion and punishment of members, privilege from arrest, preservation and publication of proceedings, and open sessions.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The executive department of the state consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, comptroller, treasurer, commissioner of general land office, and attorney-general. All of these officers are elected by the people except the secretary of state, who is appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate.

The Governor is elected by the qualified electors of the state, at the time and places of elections for members of the legislature. He holds his office for two years from the regular time of installation, and until his successor has been duly qualified. He must be at least thirty years of age, a citizen of the United States or of Texas at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and have resided in the same for five years next immediately preceding his election. He is commander-in-chief of the military forces of the state, may require information from officers of the executive department, may convene the legislature, may recommend measures to the legislature, must cause the laws to be executed. In all criminal cases except treason and impeachment, he has power after conviction, to grant reprieves, commutations of punishment, and pardons, and under such rules as the legislature may prescribe he has power to remit fines and forfeitures. With the advice and consent of the senate he has the pardoning power in cases of treason. In the exercise of the powers of pardon, reprieve, and remission of fines, he is required to file in the office of the secretary of state his reasons therefor. He has the power to fill vacancies in all state offices, which, when made during the session of the legislature, must be confirmed by the senate. The same veto power is given him as is given by the constitution of the United States to the president, with these additions, that the power is given him to veto every bill passed by the legislature within the last ten days of the session, by filing his objections in the office of the secretary of state within twenty days after adjournment, and giving notice thereof by public proclamation. If any bill contains several items of appropriation, he can object to one or more of such items and approve the other portion of the bill. Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of both houses of the legislature is necessary, except on questions of adjournment, shall be printed and approved by the governor before it shall take effect, and if disapproved, shall be repassed as in cases of a bill.

A Lieutenant-Governor is chosen at every election for governor, by the same persons and in the same manner, continues in office for the same time, and must possess the same qualifications. In voting for governor and lieutenant-governor, the electors are to distinguish for whom they vote as governor and for whom as lieutenant-governor. The lieutenant-governor, by virtue of his office, is president of the senate, and has, when in committee of the whole, a right to debate and vote on all questions, and, when the senate is equally divided, to give the casting vote. In case of the death, resignation, removal from office, inability or refusal of the governor to serve, or of his impeachment or absence from the state, the lieutenant-governor exercises the power and authority appertaining to the office of governor until another is chosen at the periodical election and is duly qualified, or until the governor impeached, absent, or disabled is acquitted, returns, or his disability is removed.

The lieutenant-governor, while he acts as president of the senate, receives for his services the same compensation and mileage as allowed to the members of the senate.

The Seal of the State is a star of five points, encircled by olive and live oak branches and the words "The State of Texas."

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power is vested in one supreme court, in one court of appeals, in district courts, in county courts, in commissioners' courts, in courts of justices of the peace, and in such other courts as may be established by law. Power is given the legislature to establish criminal courts in districts where there is a city containing thirty thousand inhabitants. All judicial officers are elected by the qualified voters of the state at a general election.

The Supreme Court consists of a chief justice and two associate justices, any two of whom form a quorum, and the concurrence of two judges is necessary to the decision of a case. No person is eligible as a member of the supreme court unless he be at the time of his election a citizen of the United States or the state of Texas, and unless he shall have attained the age of thirty years, and shall have been a practising lawyer or a judge of a court in the state, or such lawyer and judge together, at least seven years. They hold their offices for six years, and receive an annual salary fixed by law of not more than three thousand five hundred and fifty dollars.

The supreme court has appellate jurisdiction only, coextensive with the limits of the state; it only extends to civil cases of which the district courts have original or appellate jurisdiction, and to appeals from interlocutory judgments, with such exceptions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislature. It and the judges thereof have the power to issue the writ of mandamus, and all other writs necessary to enforce the jurisdiction of the court. It also has power, upon affidavit or otherwise, as by the court may be thought proper, to ascertain such matters of fact as may be necessary to the proper exercise of its jurisdiction. The supreme court holds its sessions between the months of October and June inclusive, at Austin, Galveston, and Tyler. The clerk is appointed by the court, and holds his office for four years.

The Court of Appeals consists of three judges, any two of whom form a quorum. The judges must possess the same qualifications as required of a judge of the supreme court. They receive the same salary and hold their office for the same length of time as prescribed for judges of the supreme court. The court of appeals has appellate jurisdiction co-extensive with the limits of the state in all criminal cases of whatever grade, and in all civil cases of which the county courts have original or appellate jurisdiction. The court of appeals and the judges thereof have power to issue the writ of habeas corpus and such writs as it may deem necessary to enforce its jurisdiction. It sits at the same time and in the same places as the supreme court.

District Courts.—The state is divided into a convenient number of judicial districts. For each district there is elected by the qualified voters a judge, who must be at least twenty-five years of age, must be a citizen of the United States, must have been a practising attorney or a judge of a court in the state for the period of four years, and must have resided in the district in which he is elected for two years next before his election, and receives an annual salary of twenty-five hundred dollars. Two terms are held each year, but the legislature can provide for more than two terms a year.

The District Court has original jurisdiction in criminal cases of the grade of felony; of all suits in behalf of the state to recover penalties, forfeitures, and escheats; of all cases of divorces; in cases of misdemeanor involving official misconduct; of all suits to recover damages for slander or defamation of character; of all suits for the trial of title to land, and for the enforcement of liens thereon; of all suits for trial to right of property levied on by virtue of any writ of execution, sequestration, or attachment, when the property levied on shall be equal to or exceed in value five hundred dollars; and of all suits, complaints, or pleas whatsoever, without regard to any distinction between law and equity, when the matter in controversy shall be valued at or amount to five hundred dollars exclusive of interest; the courts and the judges thereof have power to issue writs of habeas corpus in felony cases and misdemeanors, injunctions, certiorari, and all writs necessary to enforce their jurisdiction. They have appellate jurisdiction and general control in probate matters over the county courts, and original jurisdiction and general control over executors, administrators, guardians, and minors, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislature. The clerk is elected by the people, and holds office for two years. In case of vacancy the judge appoints until the vacancy is filled by an election. In the trial of all cases in the district court, either party is entitled to a trial by jury, but no jury is empanelled unless demanded in open court by a party to the case, and then only when the party demanding a jury shall pay the jury fee. The grand and petit jurors in the district court are composed of twelve men; but nine members of a grand jury constitute a quorum to transact business and find bills. In trials of civil cases and in trials of criminal cases below the grade of felony, nine members of the jury may render a verdict, but when so rendered it shall be signed by every member of the jury concurring in it; but power is given the legislature to modify or change the rule authorizing less than the whole number of the jury to render a verdict.

All judges of the supreme court, court of appeals, and district courts are conservators of the peace. All prosecutions are carried on in the name and by the authority of "The State of Texas," and conclude "against the peace and dignity of the state."

The pleading and practice of the district court are peculiar, and deserve some attention. Prior to the revolution which severed Texas form the Mexican confederacy, the Spanish civil law, modified to some extent by local statutes, was in force. The common law was introduced at an early period after the declaration of independence; but the old system left behind it distinct traces, and some of its features are apparent in the existing laws. Amid the changes which followed the revolution, when the body of the civil law was abrogated, and the common law was adopted in its application to juries and to evidence, and as a rule of decision, where not inconsistent with the constitution and laws, the system of pleading previously in use was carefully preserved. That system is still in force, except where it has been expressly changed by subsequent legislation altering or establishing the course of proceedings in the courts, or where it has been necessarily modified by the introduction of the trial by jury,—a mode of trial wholly unknown to the civil law,—and with it, to a great extent, the practice peculiar to the common-law courts, the analogies of which are constantly consulted by the Texas practitioner.

The system of pleading formerly in force, and which has impressed its character on that now practised, consisted in written allegations by the parties on either side.

As defined by the Spanish law-writers, an action was the legal method of demanding in a court of justice that which is our own and is withheld from us. Actions were divided into real and personal,—the former having reference to the right which we have in a thing, the latter, to the obligation which one has assumed to perform a certain duty. The defence to an action was called an exception. It embraced every allegation and defence used to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff. Exceptions were either dilatory, when they delayed or suspended the action, or peremptory, when they destroyed it and prevented further litigation.

The first step in the progress of the action was the demand, which was a written petition adapted to the nature of the action, and must have contained the following requisites:—first, the name of the judge to whom it was addressed; second, the name of the plaintiff; third, the name of the defendant; fourth, the statement of the cause of action; fifth, the ground of the demand, or the right by which the relief was sought.

The demand concluded with the word "juro," which signified that the party had taken an oath that his action was begun in good faith, and the words "el oficio de vmd. implora," by which the interposition of the judge was invoked.

The citation followed the demand. This was the process by which the defendant was brought into court to answer the demand.

Then followed the contestation, which was the answer made by the defendant, either confessing or denying the plaintiff's right.

To this the plaintiff might present a replica, or replication; and the defendant might add a duplica, or rejoinder. Here the pleadings originally ended, and new facts could only be presented upon affidavit that they had just come to the knowledge of the party pleading them.

The history of a lawsuit in the present district courts of the state will give the reader an insight into their system of pleading and practice, and show how far the ancient form of the pleadings has been preserved, and wherein it has been modified.

It will be recollected that the district courts have jurisdiction in all cases without regard to any distinction between law and equity. There is no difference in the mode of proceeding in the application of legal and equitable remedies, nor are there any forms of action adapted to different injuries. The pleadings in all cases consist of the petition and answer. Demands entitling a party to legal and equitable relief can be united in the same action: an equitable defence can be opposed to a legal demand. The court may so frame its judgment as to afford all the relief required by the nature of the case and which could be granted by a court of law or equity, and may also grant all such orders, writs, and process as may be necessary to make the relief granted effectual.

There being no forms of action, the rules of pleading known to the common-law and equity systems are only applicable so far as they are the rules of sound logic and conduce to a clear and methodical statement of the cause of action or ground of defence. No rule of pleading which is purely technical and has reference to the form of proceeding has any place in the system. The pleadings are the same in cases of legal and equitable cognizance, and the application of legal or equitable principles to the decision of the case presented depends upon the facts, and not upon the manner of stating them.

Every suit is commenced by the filing of the petition, which is a written statement of the cause of action, and of the relief sought by the plaintiff. The petition should contain certain formal but essential parts, the omission of any of which would render it defective. They are—

The marginal venue: "The State of Texas, County of ——;" the term of the court: "District Court, —— Term, A.D. 18—;" the address: "To the District Court of said County;" the commencement, consisting of the names and residences of the parties: the statement of the cause of action, which should be a clear, logical, and succinct statement of the facts, which, upon the general denial, the plaintiff would be bound to prove, and which if admitted will entitle him to a judgment; the statement of the nature of the relief sought; the signature of the party or his attorney. The petition must be filed with the clerk of the proper county, whose duties are the same as at common law, to indorse upon it the day on which it was filed, together with its proper file number. The clerk must also make an entry of the case in his docket.

Next follows the citation, or writ, which is issued by the clerk, and dated, tested, and signed by him. Its style is, "The State of Texas." It is addressed to the sheriff or any constable of the county in which the defendant is alleged to be found, and commands him to summon the defendant to appear at the next term of the court to answer the plaintiff's petition, a certified copy of which accompanies the writ. The citation is executed by the sheriff like an original writ.

There are certain auxiliary writs, which may be sued out at the commencement or during the progress of the suit, whereby the effects of the defendant or the property in controversy may be seized by the sheriff and held until replevied or until the final termination of the suit, so that it may be subject to the judgment rendered therein, or the defendant is restrained from the commission of some act until the question of right between the parties shall be determined. These are the writs of attachment, garnishment, sequestration, and injunction. But there is no peculiarity in these writs under the Texas practice which renders it necessary to explain them here.

When the citation has been served, the defendant is in court, and must file his answer within the time prescribed by law for pleading. In those counties in which the term of the court is limited to one week, the answer must be filed on or before the fourth day of the term; if the term is not so limited, the answer must be filed on or before the fifth day; and this is, accordingly, called the appearance-day.

Upon the morning of the appearance-day the cases upon the appearance docket are called over by the judge in the order in which they have been filed. If the defendant in any suit has failed to appear by his answer, a final judgment by default may be rendered against him, and a short entry to that effect is made upon the judge's docket. If the cause of action is liquidated, and established by an instrument in writing, the amount due may be computed by the clerk, or may be found by a jury, upon a writ of inquiry, if asked for by either party. Where the cause of action is unliquidated, the damages must be assessed by a jury upon the writ of inquiry when the case is reached on the regular call of the docket. When the damages have been assessed by the clerk, or jury, as the case may be, judgment is accordingly entered upon the minutes.

The defendant, if he does not intend to resist the suit, may appear and confess judgment; or, if he has pleaded, he may withdraw his answer, and suffer judgment by nil dicit,—in either of which cases the appearance is a waiver of all errors. If the defendant intends to resist the plaintiff's recovery, he must, within the time prescribed for pleading, file his answer.

The answer includes all defensive pleading, and may consist of as many several matters, whether of law or of fact, as the defendant may deem necessary for his defence and which may be pertinent to the cause. They must all be filed at the same time, and in the due order of pleading.

The answer may be by demurrer, usually termed an exception, or by plea, or by both. The demurrer is either general or special; and its office is the same as under the common-law system of pleading. It is not, however, an admission of the allegations of fact, but simply calls upon the court to say whether, granting all the facts to be as the plaintiff states them, any cause of action is shown requiring an answer.

A plea is an answer either denying the truth of the matter alleged in the petition, or admitting its truth, and showing some new matter to avoid its effect.

The exception or plea may, as at common law, be either dilatory or peremptory.

The due order of pleading above referred to is the ancient and what is said to be the natural order of pleading. See PLEADING.

The answer may embrace one or all of the grounds of defence, provided only that they be presented in the due order of pleading.

The defendant may also, by a plea in reconvention, which is analogous to the cross-bill of the equity system, show that he has a claim against the plaintiff similar in its nature to that set out in the petition, and pray for judgment over against the plaintiff; and upon the trial, judgment will be given for that party who may establish the largest claim, for the excess of his claim over that of his opponent.

The pleading may proceed one step further; the plaintiff may, by a replication, set up new matter in avoidance of that relied upon by the defendant in his answer; or he may, as at common law, demur to the answer.

No formal joinder in demurrer or in issue is necessary. The demurrer is to be decided by the court before the questions of fact are submitted to the jury. The party against whom judgment is rendered sustaining the demurrer may abide by his pleadings,—in which case judgment final will be given against him; or he may, under leave of the court, remove the objection by amendment.

The questions of law having been thus disposed of, the issues of fact arising upon the pleadings are submitted to the jury in the same manner as at common law, who may respond thereto by a general or special verdict, upon which the judgment of the court is then rendered.

There is established in each county of the state a County Court, which is a court of record, presided over by a county judge, elected by the qualified voters of the county, who is required to be well informed in the law of the state, and who holds office for two years and until his successor is elected and qualified. He receives such fees and perquisites as may be prescribed.

The county courts have original jurisdiction of all misdemeanors of which exclusive original jurisdiction is not given to the justices' courts by law, and where the fine to be imposed shall exceed two hundred dollars; and they have exclusive original jurisdiction in all civil cases where the matter in controversy shall exceed in value two hundred dollars, and not exceed five hundred dollars, exclusive of interest; and concurrent jurisdiction with the district court when the matter in controversy shall exceed five hundred dollars and not exceed one thousand dollars exclusive of interest. They have appellate jurisdiction in cases originating in justices' courts, but appeals in civil cases are limited to civil cases where the judgment appealed from exceeds twenty dollars exclusive of costs. They also have the general jurisdiction of a probate court. The county court holds a term for civil business at least once every two months, and a term for criminal business once every month.

Justices of the Peace have jurisdiction in criminal matters of all cases where the penalty or fine to be imposed by law may not be more than two hundred dollars, and in civil matters of all cases where the amount in controversy is two hundred dollars or less exclusive of interest, of which exclusive original jurisdiction is not given to the district or county courts.

THAINLAND. In Old English Law. The land which was granted by the Saxon kings to their thains or thanes was so called. Crabb, Comm. Law, 10.

THANE (Sax. thenian, to serve). In Saxon Law. A word which sometimes signifies a nobleman, at others a freeman, a magistrate, an officer, or minister. A tenant of the part of the king's lands called the king's "thanеage." Termes de la Ley.

THEFT. A popular term for larceny.

In Scotch Law. The secret and felonious abstraction of the property of another for sake of lucre, without his consent. Alison, Cr. Law, 250.

THEFT-BOTE. The act of receiving a man's goods from the thief, after they had been stolen by him, with the intent that he shall escape punishment.

This is an offence punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment. Hale, Pl. Cr. 130. See COMPOUNDING A FELONY.

THELUSSON ACT. The stat. 39 & 40 Geo. III., passed in consequence of objections to a Mr. Thelusson's will, for the purpose of preventing the creation of perpetuities; see PERPETUITY; 4 Ves. 221.

THEOCRACY. A species of government which claims to be immediately directed by God.

La religion, qui, dans l'antiquité, s'associa souvent au despotisme, pour régner par son bras ou à son ombrage, a quelquefois tenté de régner seule. C'est ce qu'elle appelait le règne de Dieu, la théocratie. Matter, De l'Influence des Mœurs sur les Lois, et de l'Influence des Lois sur les Mœurs, 189. (Religion, which in former times frequently associated itself with despotism, to reign by its power or under its shadow, has sometimes attempted to reign alone; and this she has called the reign of God—theocracy.)

THIEF. One who has been guilty of larceny or theft. The term covers both compound and simple larceny; 1 Hill (N. Y.), 25.

THINGS. By this word is understood every object, except man, which may become an active subject of right. Code du Canton de Berne, art. 332. In this sense it is opposed, in the language of the law, to the word persons. See CHOSE; PROPERTY; RES.

THIRD-BOROW. In Old English Law. A constable. Lombard, Duty of Const. 6; 28 Hen. VIII. c. 10.

THIRD PARTIES. A term used to include all persons who are not parties to the contract, agreement, or instrument of writing by which their interest in the thing conveyed is sought to be affected. 1 Mart. La. N. s. 384. See, also, 2 La. 425; 6 Mart. La. 528.

But it is difficult to give a very definite idea of third persons; for sometimes those who are not parties to the contract, but who represent the rights of the original parties, as executors, are not to be considered third persons. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1335 et seq.

THIRD PENNY. In Old English Law. Of the fines and other profits of the county courts (originally, when those courts had superior jurisdiction, before other courts were created) two parts were reserved to the king, and a third part or penny to the earl of the county. See DENARIUS TERTIUS COMITATUS; Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 418; Cowel.

THIRLAGE. In Scotch Law. A servitude by which lands are astricted or thirled to a particular mill, and the possessors bound to grind their grain there, for the payment of certain multures and sequels as the agreed price of grinding. Erskine, Inst. 2. 9. 18.

THOROUGHFARE. A street or way opening at both ends into another street or public highway, so that one can go through and get out of it without returning. It differs from a cul de sac, which is open only at one end.

Whether a street which is not a thoroughfare is a highway seems not fully settled; 1 Ventr. 189; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76; § 1. In a case tried in 1790, where the locus in quo had been used as a common street for fifty years, but was no thoroughfare, Lord Kenyon held that it would make no difference; for otherwise the street would be a trap to make people trespassers; 11 East, 375. This decision in several subsequent cases was much criticized, though not directly overruled; 5 Taunt. 126; 5 B. & Ald. 456; 3 Bingh. 447; 1 Camp. 260; 4 Ad. & E. 698. But in a recent English case the decision of Lord Kenyon was affirmed by the unanimous opinion of the court of queen's bench. The doctrine established in the latter case is that it is a question for the jury, on the evidence, whether a place which is not a thoroughfare is a highway or not; 14 E. L. & E. 69. And see 28 id. 30. The United States authorities seem to follow the English; 8 Allen, 242; 24 N. Y. 559 (overruling 23 Barb. 103); 87 Ill. 189; s. c. 29 Am. Rep. 49 and note; contra, 2 R. I. 172. See HIGHWAY; STREET.

THOUGHT. The operation of the mind. No one can be punished for his mere thoughts, however wicked they may be. Human laws cannot reach them,—first, because they are unknown; and secondly, unless made manifest by some action, they are not injurious to any one; but when they manifest themselves, then the act which is the consequence may be punished. Dig. 50. 16. 225.

THREAD. A figurative expression used to signify the central line of a stream or watercourse. Hargr. Law Tracts, 5; 4 Mas. 397; Holt, 490. See FILUM AQUÆ; ISLAND; WATERCOURSE; RIVER.

THREAT. In Criminal Law. A menace of destruction or injury to the lives, character, or property of those against whom it is made. To extort money under threat of charging the prosecutor with an unnatural crime has been held to be robbery; 1 Park. C. R. 199; 12 Ga. 293; but to extort money or other valuable thing by threat of prosecution for passing counterfeit money, or any prosecution except that for an unnatural crime, is not robbery; 7 Humph. 45; though it is a criminal offence; 11 Mod. 137; 2 Dall. 399, n. See THREATENING LETTER.

In Evidence. Menace.

When a confession is obtained from a person accused of crime, in consequence of a threat, evidence of such confession cannot be received, because, being obtained by the torture of fear, it comes in so questionable a shape that no credit ought to be given to it; 1 Leach, 263. This is the general principle: but what amounts to a threat is not so easily defined. It is proper to observe, however, that the threat must be made by a person having authority over the prisoner, or by another in the presence of such authorized person and not dissented from by the latter; 8 C. & P. 733. See CONFESSION.

THREATENING LETTER. Sending threatening letters to persons for the purpose of extorting money is said to be a misdemeanor at common law; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 52, s. 1; 2 Russ. Cr. 575; 4 Bla. Com. 126. To be indictable, the threat must be of a nature calculated to overcome a firm and prudent man; but this rule has reference to the general nature of the evil threatened, and not to the probable effect of the threat on the mind of the particular party addressed; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 512. The party who makes a threat may be held to bail for his good behavior. See Comyns, Dig. Battery (D).

In England, by statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, § 46, written accusations of crime, punishable by death or penal servitude for not less than seven years, or accusations of assaults with intent to commit any rape or buggery with a view or intent to extort or gain by means of such letter or writing, any property, chattel, money, or valuable security, or other valuable thing, constitute an indictable offence. Similar statutes exist in many of the United States, though they vary somewhat in their provisions, some of them requiring the threatening to have been done "maliciously," others "knowingly." The indictment for this offence need not specify the crime threatened to be charged, for the specific nature of the crime which the prisoner intended to charge might intentionally be left in doubt; 1 Mood. 134; 36 Ohio St. 318; 3 Heisk. 262; 26 Iowa, 122; 8 Barb. 547. The threat need not be to accuse before a judicial tribunal; 2 M. & R. 14; 30 Mich. 460; 1 Cox, C. C. 22. A person whose property has been stolen, has himself no power to punish the thief without process of law, and cannot claim the right to obtain compensation for the loss of his property by maliciously threatening to accuse him of the offence, or to do an injury to his person or property, with intent to extort property from him; 24 Me. 71; 128 Mass. 55. A mere threat that the prosecutor would be indicted or complained of, has been held to be within the statute, even though no distinct crime was spoken of in the letter, because of the likelihood of threatening letters being written with as much disguise and artifice as possible, but still being sufficient to accomplish the purpose intended; 68 Me. 473; 68 Mo. 66. See 3 Cr. L. Mag. 720; 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1664; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1200.

THREE-DOLLAR PIECE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of three dollars.

The three-dollar piece was authorized by the seventh section of the act of Feb. 21, 1853. 10 Stat. at L. It is of the same fineness as the other gold coins of the United States. The weight of the coin is 77.4 grains. The devices upon this coin, and upon the gold dollar also, are not authoritatively fixed by act of congress, as is the case with all the other gold coins of the United States; and hence greater latitude was allowed to the treasury department and the officers of the mint in fixing these devices. The obverse of the piece presents an ideal head, emblematic of America, enclosed within the national legend; on the reverse is a wreath composed of wheat, cotton, corn, and tobacco, the staple productions of the United States; within the wreath the value and date of the coin are given.

The three-dollar piece is a legal tender in payment of any amount; R. S. § 3511.

THROAT. In Medical Jurisprudence. The anterior part of the neck. Dunglison, Med. Dict.; Cooper, Dict.; 2 Good, Study of Med. 302; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 97, n.

The word throat, in an indictment which charged the defendant with murder by cutting the throat of the deceased, does not mean, and is not to be confined to, that part of the neck which is scientifically called the throat, but signifies that which is commonly called the throat; 6 C. & P. 401. As to meaning of throat disease, in life insurance, see 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 152.

TICK. Credit: as, if a servant usually buy for the master upon tick, and the servant buy something without the master's order, yet if the master were trusted by the trader he is liable; 3 Kebl. 625; 10 Mod. 111; 3 Esp. 214; 4 id. 174.

TICKET. A certificate or token showing the existence of some right in the holder thereof. For example, a ticket may give the right of admission to a place of assembly or to the conveyance of a common carrier, or it may give the right to be repossessed of some property that has been placed in the hands of a bailee or pledgee, as a cloak-room ticket, a pawnbroker's ticket, etc.

A railroad ticket is not a contract, nor does it contain a contract. It is a mere receipt or voucher, showing that the passenger has paid his fare from one place to another; 17 N. Y. 306; 52 N. H. 596; 13 Reporter, 295. In this sense, however, it may be used as evidence of a contract. Thus a ticket from A. to B. is evidence that the holder has entered into a contract with the carrier to be conveyed from A. to B.; 14 C. L. J. 31. So a railway ticket for one part of a route does not entitle the holder to travel over another part of the route for which the same fare is charged; 10 C. L. J. 84.

It is not yet thoroughly settled what conditions may be printed on a ticket, and how far they are binding on the passenger. But it may perhaps be stated, as a general rule, that such conditions are not binding unless they are reasonable, and the passenger's assent thereto is clearly established; 2 C. L. J. 460; 1 Q. B. Div. 515; 1 C. P. Div. 418; Lawson, Carriers, 116-123.

When there is a condition on a ticket that it shall not be good unless used on or before a certain date, it is a sufficient compliance with the condition if the use is begun on the last day named, even though the journey which the ticket describes be not completed until after that day has expired 14 C. L. J. 461.

A carrier may require passengers to purchase tickets before entering his conveyance, and, when this is not done, may charge an extra rate of fare; 18 Ill. 460; 53 Me. 279; 5 S. L. Rev. 766. But the carrier must furnish the passenger with all conveniences necessary for obtaining tickets; 19 Ill. 352; 43 Ill. 464; 15 Minn. 49; 38 Ind. 116; 56 Ala. 246. The carrier, however, need not keep its ticket office open after the published time for the departure of a train which has been delayed; 43 Ill. 176. The carrier can at all times demand the exhibition of a passenger's ticket; 3 Park. Cr. Cas. 326; 27 Ind. 277; 15 N. Y. 455; or the surrender of the ticket in exchange for a conductor's check; 22 Barb. 130. But a passenger ought not to be obliged to give up his ticket without receiving such check when at a considerable distance from his destination; 20 N. H. 251; 39 Ind. 509. Persons holding commutation or season tickets may be required to exhibit them whenever requested, and on refusal may be compelled to pay the regular fare; 7 Phila. 11; 36 Conn. 287.

Limitations as to the time within which tickets may be used are usually valid. "Good for this day only" is the commonest form of limitation; 63 N. Y. 101; 1 Allen, 267; 40 Vt. 88; 5 So. L. Rev. 770. A commutation ticket, good for a certain number of miles of travel, but limited to certain time, is worthless after the term has expired, even though the whole number of miles has not been travelled; 25 Ohio St. 70; 40 Iowa, 45; 64 Mo. 464.

As a rule, a carrier's contract for conveyance is an entirety. The passenger cannot leave the train, and then afterwards resume his journey on another. The production of a ticket will not help him to enter the second train, unless the ticket expressly authorize him to stop over; 47 Iowa, 82; 71 Penn. 432; id. 66; 24 N. J. L. 435; 46 N. H. 213; 31 Barb. 556. Nor will he be aided by the fact that it has been customary to allow passengers to stop over at intermediate stations. The company may at any time make a regulation to the contrary without notice to passengers; 46 N. H. 213; 71 Penn. 432.

Fare is the sum charged by a carrier for the conveyance of a person by land or water. Though one who holds himself out as a carrier of passengers is bound to transport all who apply to him for conveyance, yet it is presupposed that he shall receive reasonable compensation for the performance of this duty. A carrier may therefore lawfully expel from his conveyance all persons who refuse to pay their fare. After a person has been so expelled, he cannot gain readmittance by tendering the fare, because in this way a railway train might be stopped at any time by the whim or humor of any of its passengers, thereby interfering with the reasonable arrangements of the company, and jeopardizing human life; 15 Gray, 20; 19 Mich. 305; Thomps. Carriers, 29, 340.

The legislature of a state may, in the exercise of its police power, regulate and limit the fares charged by common carriers, as being property "affected with a public interest;" 94 U. S. 113; Pierce, Railroads, 466; Cooley, Const. Lim. 742.

In life insurance. In accident insurance it is the practice to issue tickets to the insured. These are made out by the company and sold by agents indifferently to all who apply for them. The sale and delivery by an agent, and the payment of the price, give the owner a valid claim against the company, subject to the conditions set forth in the ticket; 45 Mo. 221; May, Ins. § 70.

TIDE. The ebb and flow of the sea.

The law takes notice of three kinds of tides, viz.: the high spring tides, which are the fluxes of the sea at those tides which happen at the two equinoctials; the spring tides, which happen twice every month, at the full and change of the moon; the neap or ordinary tides, which happen between the full and change of the moon, twice in twenty-four hours; Ang. Tide-Wat. 68. The changeable condition of the tides produces, of course, corresponding changes in the line of high-water mark. Now, inasmuch as the soil of all tidal waters up to the limit of high-water mark, at common law, is in the crown, or, in this country, in the state, it is important to ascertain what is high-water mark, in legal contemplation, considered as the boundary of the royal or public ownership. This ownership has been held to be limited by the average of the medium high tides between the spring and the neap in each quarter of a lunar revolution during the year, excluding only extraordinary catastrophes or overflows; 4 De G. M. & G. 206. See, also, 3 B. & Ald. 967; 2 Dougl. 629; 7 Pet. 324; 1 Pick. 180; 2 Johns. 357; RIVER.

TIDE-WATER. Water which flows and reflows with the tide. All arms of the sea, bays, creeks, coves or rivers, in which the tide ebbs and flows, are properly denominated tide-waters.

The term tide-water is not limited to water which is salt, but embraces, also, so much of the water of fresh rivers as is propelled backwards by the ingress and pressure of the tide; 5 Co. 107; 2 Dougl. 441; 6 Cl. & F. 628; 7 Pet. 324; 108 Mass. 436. The supreme court of the United States has decided that, although the current of the river Mississippi at New Orleans may be so strong as not to be turned backwards by the tide, yet if the effect of the tide upon the current is so great as to occasion a regular rise and fall of the water, it might properly be said to be within the ebb and flow of the tide; 7 Pet. 324. The flowing, however, of the waters of a lake into a river, and their reflowing, being caused by the occasional swell and subsidence of the lake, and not by the ebb and flow of regular tides, do not constitute such a river a tidal or, technically, navigable river; 20 Johns. 98. And see 17 Johns. 195; 2 Conn. 481; Woolr. Waters, c. ii.; Ang. Tide-Wat. c. iii.

The bed or soil of all tide-waters belongs, in England, to the crown, and in this country to the state in which they lie; and the waters themselves are public; so that all persons may use the same for the purposes of navigation and fishery, unless restrained by law; 5 B. & A. 304; 1 Macq. Hou. L. 49; 4 Ad. & E. 384; 8 id. 329; Ang. Watere. c. iii., xiii. In England, the power of parliament to restrain or improve these rights is held to be absolute; 4 B. & C. 598. In this country, such a power is subject to the limitations of the federal constitution; and while both the general and state governments may adopt measures for the improvement of navigation; 7 Pick. 209; 6 Rand. 245; 4 Rawle, 9; 9 Conn. 436; and the states may grant private rights in tide-waters, provided they do not conflict with the public right of navigation; 21 Pick. 344; 23 id. 360; yet neither the general nor the state governments have the power to destroy or materially impair the right of navigation. The state governments have no such power, because its exercise would be in collision with the laws of congress regulating commerce; 9 Wheat. 1; the general government has no such power, because the states have never relinquished to it such a power over the waters within their jurisdictional limits; 2 Pet. 245. See BRIDGE. As to the power of the state to regulate the public fisheries, see FISHERY. And see, generally, RIVER; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; WHARF.

TIE. When two persons receive an equal number of votes at an election, there is said to be a tie.

In that case neither is elected. When the votes are given on any question to be decided by a deliberative assembly, and there is a tie, the question is lost. See MAJORITY.

TIEL. An old manner of spelling tel: such as, nul tiel record, no such record.

TIEMPO INHABIL (Span.). In Louisiana. A time when a man is not able to pay his debts.

A man cannot dispose of his property, at such a time, to the prejudice of his creditors; 4 Mart. La. N. S. 292; 3 Mart. La. 270; 10 id. 70.

TIERCE. A liquid measure, containing the third part of a pipe, or forty-two gallons.

TIGNI IMMITTENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. A servitude which confers the right of inserting a beam or timber from the wall of one house into that of a neighboring house, in order that it may rest on the latter and that the wall of the latter may bear this weight. Dig. 8. 2. 36; 8. 5. 14.

TIMBER-TREES. Oak, ash, elm, in all places, and, by local custom, such other trees as are used in building; 2 Bla. Com. 281; also beech, chestnut, walnut, cedar, fir, aspen, lime, sycamore, and birch trees; 6 George III. ch. 48; and also such as are used in the mechanical arts; Lewis, Cr. L. 506. Timber-trees, both standing, fallen, and severed and lying upon the soil, constitute a portion of the realty, and are embraced in a mortgage of the land; 1 Washb. R. P. 13; 1 Wall. 53, 59, 60; 2 Greenl. 173; id. 387;

19 Me. 53; 5 Pa. L. J. 412; and pass, by a judicial sale under such mortgage, to the purchaser; 4 Rep. 62, a.; 11 Rep. 81, b; 1 Washb. R. P. 12, 13; 1 Wall. 53; 19 Me. 53; 54 Me. 313; 1 Denio, 554; 18 Penn. 185; 45 id. 128; 61 id. 294. A contract for the sale of timber-trees is a contract for the sale of an interest in lands; 10 N. Y. 117; 53 Penn. 206; 69 id. 474; and, as such, is within the Statute of Frauds; 33 Penn. 266. The better action for damages for cutting and carrying away timber trees, seems to be that of trespass quare clausum fregit, et de bonis asportatis (unless otherwise designated by statute); 2 Greenl. 173; id. 387; 11 Penn. 195; 4 Watts, 220; 15 Penn. 371; 4 id. 254. See WASTE.

TIME. The measure of duration. Lapse of time often furnishes a presumption, stronger or weaker according to the length of time which has passed, of the truth of certain facts, such as the legal title to rights, payment of or release from debts. See PRESCRIPTION; MEMORY; LIMITATIONS.

The general rule of law is that the performance of a contract must be completed at or within the time fixed by the contract; Leake, Contr. 834. Wherever, in cases not governed by particular customs of trade, the parties bind themselves to the performance of duties within a certain number of days, they have to the last minute of the last day to perform their obligations; 6 M. & G. 593.

Generally, in computing time, one day is included and one excluded; 2 P. A. Browne, 18; 4 T. B. Monr. 464; 26 Ala. N. S. 547; see 2 Harr. Del. 461; 5 Blackf. 319; 16 Ohio, 408; 10 Rich. So. C. 395; excluding the day on which an act is done, when the computation is to be made from such an act; 15 Ves. Ch. 248; 1 Ball & B. 196; 16 Cow. 659; 1 Pick. 485; 3 Denio, 12; 27 Ala. N. S. 311; 19 Mo. 60; see 18 Conn. 18; including it, according to Dougl. 463; 3 East, 417; 2 P. A. Browne, 18; 15 Mass. 193; 4 Blackf. 320; 18 How. 151; except where the exclusion will prevent forfeiture; 2 Camp. 294; 4 Me. 298. See 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 140, n. 3; Comyns, Dig. Temps; 1 Rop. Leg. 518; 2 Pothier, Obl. Evans ed. 50. Time from and after a given day excludes that day; 1 Pick. 485; 7 J. J. Marsh. 202; 1 Blackf. 392; 9 Cra. 104; 4 N. H. 267; 3 Penn. R. 200; 1 N. & M'C. 565. But see 94 U. S. 560. A policy of insurance includes the last day of the term for which it is issued; L. R. 5 Exch. 296; 34 L. J. C. B. 11. Particular words, e. g. at, on, or upon a certain time, will be construed according to a reasonable interpretation of the contract; 10 A. & E. 370. Deeds, bills of exchange, letters, and other written instruments are generally construed to have been made and issued at the time of their date, but the execution of a deed may be averred and proved according to the fact; 10 Exch. 40.

The construction of contracts with regard to the time of performance is the same in equity as at law; but in case of mere delay in performance, a court of equity will in general relieve against the legal consequences and decree specific performance upon equitable terms notwithstanding the delay, if the matter of the contract admits of that form of remedy. In such cases it is said that in equity time is not considered to be of the essence of the contracts; 3 D. M. & G. 284; L. R. 3 Ch. 67; Leake, Contr. 845. Ordinarily time is not of the essence of the contract, but it may be made so by express stipulation of the parties; or it may arise by implication, because of the nature of the property involved; or because of the avowed object of the seller or purchaser; or from the nature of the contract itself; or by one party giving the other notice that performance must be made within a certain reasonable time fixed in the notice; 2 Ohio St. 326; 5 C. E. Green, 367; 15 West. Jur. 97; time is always of the essence of unilateral contracts; 51 N. Y. 629; 35 Md. 352; 50 Ill. 298.

In determining whether stipulations as to the time of performance of a contract of sale are conditions precedent, the court will seek to discover the real intention of the parties in deciding whether time is of the essence of the contract; Benj. Sales, § 593. If a thing sold is of greater or less value according to the lapse of time, stipulations with regard to it must be literally complied with both at law and in equity; 42 Barb. 320; 10 Allen, 239. See 15 West. Jur. 97.

In Pleading. A point in or space of duration at or during which some fact is alleged to have been committed.

In criminal actions, both the day and the year of the commission of the offence must appear; but there need not be an express averment, if they can be collected from the whole statement; Comyns, Dig. Indictment (G 2); 5 S. & R. 315. The prosecutor may give evidence of an offence committed on any day which is previous to the finding of the indictment; Archb. Cr. Pl. 95; 5 S. & R. 316; but a day subsequent to the trial must not be laid; Add. Penn. 36.

In mixed and real actions, no particular day need be alleged in the declaration; 3 Chitty, Pl. 620; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 99; Metc. Yelv. 182 a, n.; Cro. Jac. 311.

In personal actions, all traversable affirmative facts should be laid as occurring on some day; Gould, Pl. § 63; Steph. Pl. 292; Yelv. 94; but no day need be alleged for the occurrence of negative matter; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 19); Plowd. 24 a; and a failure in this respect is, in general, aided after verdict; 18 East, 407. Where the cause of action is a trespass of a permanent nature or constantly repeated, it should be laid with a continuando, which title see. The day need not, in general, be the actual day of commission of the fact; 2 Saund. 5 a; Co. Litt. 283 a; 12 Johns. 287; 3 N. H. 299; if the actual day is not stated, it should be laid under a videlicet; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 63.

The exact time may become material, and must then be correctly laid; 10 B. & C. 215; 1 Cr. & J. 394; 4 S. & R. 576; 7 id. 405; 1 Stor. 528; as, the time of execution of an executory written document; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 67. The defence must follow the time laid in the declaration, if time is not material; 1 Chitty, Pl. 509; 1 Saund. 14, 82; need not when it becomes material; 2 Saund. 5 a, b (n. 3); or in pleading matter of discharge; 2 Burr. 944; Plowd. 46; 2 Stra. 944; or a record; Gould, Pl. § 83.

TIME-TABLES. See PUNCTUALITY.

TIPPLING-HOUSE. A place where spirituous liquors are sold and drunk in violation of law. Sometimes the mere selling is considered as evidence of keeping a tippling-house.

TIPSTAFF. An officer appointed by the marshal of the court of king's bench, to attend upon the judges with a kind of rod or staff tipped with silver.

In the United States, the courts sometimes appoint an officer who is known by this name, whose duty it is to wait on the court and serve its process.

TITHES. In English Law. A right to the tenth part of the produce of lands, the stocks upon lands, and the personal industry of the inhabitants. These tithes are raised for the support of the clergy. Almost all the tithes of England and Wales are now commuted into rent charges, under the Tithe Commutation Act (stat. 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 71), and the various statutes since passed for its amendment; 3 Steph. Com. 731; Moz. & W.

In the United States, there are no tithes. See Cruise, Dig. tit. 22; Ayliffe, Parerg. 504.

TITHING. In English Law. Formerly, a district containing ten men, with their families. In each tithing there was a tithingman, whose duty it was to keep the peace, as a constable now is bound to do. St. Armand, in his Historical Essay on the Legislative Power of England, p. 70, expresses an opinion that the tithing was composed not of ten common families, but of ten families of lords of a manor.

TITHINGMAN. In Saxon Law. The head or chief of a decennary of ten families: he was to decide all lesser causes between neighbors. Now tithingmen and constables are the same thing. Jacob, Law Dict.

In New England, a parish officer to keep good order in church. Webster, Dict.

TITLE. Estates. The means whereby the owner of lands hath the just possession of his property. Co. Litt. 345; 2 Bla. Com. 195. See 1 Ohio, 349. This is the definition of title to lands only.

A bad title is one which conveys no property to the purchaser of an estate.

A doubtful title is one which the court does not consider to be so clear that it will enforce its acceptance by a purchaser, nor so defective as to declare it a bad title, but only subject to so much doubt that a purchaser ought not to be compelled to accept it; 1 J. & W. 568; 9 Cow. 344.

A good title is that which entitles a man by right to a property or estate, and to the lawful possession of the same.

A marketable title is one which a court of equity considers to be so clear that it will enforce its acceptance by a purchaser.

The ordinary acceptation of the term marketable title would convey but a very imperfect notion of its legal and technical import. To common apprehension, unfettered by the technical and conventional distinction of lawyers, all titles being either good or bad, the former would be considered marketable, the latter non-marketable. But this is not the way they are regarded in courts of equity, the distinction taken there being, not between a title which is absolutely good or absolutely bad, but between a title which the court considers to be so clear that it will enforce its acceptance by a purchaser, and one which the court will not go so far as to declare a bad title, but only that it is subject to so much doubt that a purchaser ought not to be compelled to accept it; 1 J. & W. 568. In short, whatever may be the private opinion of the court as to the goodness of the title, yet if there be a reasonable doubt either as to a matter of law or fact involved in it, a purchaser will not be compelled to complete his purchase; and such a title, though it may be perfectly secure and unimpeachable as a holding title, is said, in the current language of the day, to be unmarketable; Atkins, Tit. 2.

The doctrine of marketable titles is purely equitable and of modern origin; id. 26. At law every title not bad is marketable; 5 Taunt. 625; 6 id. 263; 1 Marsh. 258. See 2 Penn. L. J. 17.

There are several stages or degrees requisite to form a complete title to lands and tenements. The lowest and most imperfect degree of title is the mere possession, or actual occupation of the estate, without any apparent right to hold or continue such possession: this happens when one man disseises another. The next step to a good and perfect title is the right of possession, which may reside in one man while the actual possession is not in himself, but in another. This right of possession is of two sorts: an apparent right of possession, which may be defeated by proving a better, and an actual right of possession, which will stand the test against all opponents. The mere right of property, the jus proprietatis, without either possession or the right of possession. 2 Bla. Com. 195.

Title to real estate is acquired by two methods, namely, by descent and by purchase. See these words.

Title to personal property may accrue in three different ways: by original acquisition; by transfer by act of law; by transfer by act of the parties.

Title by original acquisition is acquired by occupancy, see OCCUPANCY; by accession, see ACCESSION; by intellectual labor. See PATENT; COPYRIGHT.

The title to personal property is acquired and lost by transfer by act of law, in various ways: by forfeiture; succession; marriage; judgment; insolvency; intestacy. See those titles.

Title is acquired and lost by transfer by the act of the party, by gift, by contract or sale.

In general, possession constitutes the criterion of title of personal property, because no other means exist by which a knowledge of the fact to whom it belongs can be attained. A seller of a chattel is not, therefore, required to show the origin of his title, nor, in general, is a purchaser, without notice of the claim of the owner, compellable to make restitution; but it seems that a purchaser from a tenant for life of personal chattels will not be secure against the claims of those entitled in remainder; Cowp. 432; 1 Bro. C. C. 274; 2 Term, 376; 3 Atk. 44; 3 V. & B. 16.

As an exception to the rule that possession is the criterion of title of property may be mentioned the case of ships, the title of which can be ascertained by the register; 15 Ves. Ch. 60; 17 id. 251; 8 Price, 256, 277.

To convey a title, the seller must himself have a title to the property which is the subject of the transfer. But to this general rule there are exceptions. The lawful coin of the United States will pass the property along with the possession. A negotiable instrument indorsed in blank is transferable by any person holding it, so as by its delivery to give a good title "to any person honestly acquiring it;" 3 B. & C. 47; 3 Burr. 1516; 5 Term, 683.

In Legislation. That part of an act of the legislature by which it is known and distinguished from other acts; the name of the act.

Formerly the title was held to be no part of a bill, though it could be looked to when the statute was ambiguous; 3 Wheat. 610; 31 Wisc. 431; but it could not enlarge or restrain the provisions of the act itself; 5 Wall. 107. In later years constitutional provisions have required that the title of every legislative act shall correctly indicate the subject of the act; Cooley, Const. Lim. 172. The object of this was mainly to prevent surprise in legislation. An act must have but one general object, which is fairly indicated by the title; a title may be general if it does not cover incongruous legislation; id. 176; 7 Ind. 681; 50 N. Y. 553; the use of the words "other purposes" have no effect; 22 Barb. 642. It is said that the courts will construe these provisions liberally rather than embarrass legislation by a construction, the strictness of which is unnecessary to the attainment of the beneficial purposes for which they were adopted; Cooley, Const. Lim. 178. In construing an act, the court will strike from it all that relates to the object not indicated by the title, and sustain the rest if it is complete in itself; id. 181. These provisions are usually considered mandatory, though they were held to be directory in 4 Cal. 388; 6 Ohio, N. S. 187.

It is the settled rule in Pennsylvania that where an act of assembly is entitled a supplement to a former act, and the subject thereof is germane to that of the original act, its subject is sufficiently expressed; 77 Penn. 429; 88 id. 42; 13 Fed. Rep. 431.

See a paper in 5 Rep. Am. Bar Association (1882) by U. M. Rose.

In Literature. The particular division of a subject, as a law, a book, and the like: for example, Digest, book 1, title 2.

Personal Relations. A distinctive appellation denoting the rank to which the individual belongs in society.

The constitution of the United States forbids the grant by the United States or any state of any title of nobility. Titles are bestowed by courtesy on certain officers: the president of the United States sometimes receives the title of excellency; judges and members of congress, that of honorable; and members of the bar and justices of the peace are called esquires. See RANK; NOBILITY; Brackenridge, Law Misc.

Titles are assumed by foreign princes, and among their subjects they may exact these marks of honor; but in their intercourse with foreign nations they are not entitled to them as a matter of right; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 3, § 6.

In Pleading. The right of action which the plaintiff has. The declaration must show the plaintiff's title, and if such title be not shown in that instrument the defect cannot be cured by any of the future pleadings. Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (B 1).

In Rights. The name of a newspaper, a book, and the like.

The owner of a newspaper having a particular title has a right to such title; and an injunction will lie to prevent its use unlawfully by another; 8 Paige, Ch. 75. See Pardessus, n. 170. See TRADE-MARK.

TITLE-DEEDS. Those deeds which are evidences of the title of the owner of an estate. The person who is entitled to the inheritance has a right to the possession of the title-deeds; 1 Carr. & M. 653. As to a lien created by deposit of title-deeds, see LIEN.

TITLE OF A CAUSE. The peculiar designation of a suit, consisting usually of the name of the court, the venue, and the parties. The method of arranging the names of the parties is not everywhere uniform. The English way, and that formerly in vogue in this country, and still retained in many of the states, is for the actor in each step of the cause to place his name first, as if he were plaintiff in that particular proceeding, and his adversary's afterwards. Thus the case of Upton vs. White would, if taken from a county court to the supreme court on a writ of error by defendant, be entitled White vs. Upton. In New York and many other states which have enacted codes of procedure, the rule now is that the original order of names of parties is retained throughout. See AD SECTAM.

TITLE OF A DECLARATION. At the top of every declaration the name of the court is usually stated, with the term of which the declaration is filed, and in the margin the venue—namely, the city or county where the cause is intended to be tried is set down. The first two of these compose what is called the title of the declaration; 1 Tidd, Pr. 366.

TITLE OF CLERGYMEN (to orders). Some certain place where they may exercise their functions; also, an assurance of being preferred to some ecclesiastical benefice. 2 Steph. Com. 661; Whart. Dict.

TITLE OF ENTRY. The right to enter upon lands. Cowel. See ENTRY.

TO WIT. That is to say; namely; scilicet; videlicet.

TOFT. A place or piece of ground on which a house formerly stood, which has been destroyed by accident or decay; 2 Broom & H. Com. 17.

TOGATI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Under the empire, when the toga had ceased to be the usual costume of the Romans, advocates were nevertheless obliged to wear it whenever they pleaded a cause. Hence they were called togati. This denomination received an official or legal sense in the imperial constitutions of the fifth and sixth centuries; and the words togati, consortium (corpus, ordo, collegium) togatorum, frequently occur in those acts.

TOKEN. A document or sign of the existence of a fact.

Tokens are either public or general, or privy tokens. They are either true or false. When a token is false and indicates a general intent to defraud, and is used for that purpose, it will render the offender guilty of the crime of cheating; 12 Johns. 292; but if it is a mere privy token, as, counterfeiting a letter in another man's name, in order to cheat but one individual, it would not be indictable; 9 Wend. 182; 1 Dall. 47; 2 Const. 139; 4 Hawks, 348; 6 Mass. 72; 2 Dev. 199; 1 Rich. 244.

In Common Law. In England, this name is given to pieces of metal, made in the shape of money, passing among private persons by consent at a certain value. 2 Chitty, Com. Law, 182. They are no longer permitted to pass as money.

TOLERATION. In some countries, where religion is established by law, certain sects who do not agree with the established religion are nevertheless permitted to exist; and this permission is called toleration. They are permitted and allowed to remain rather as a matter of favor than a matter of right. By the Toleration Act of 1 W. & M. c. 18, and subsequent statutes down to the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 26, enabling any person to take any degree (other than a divinity degree) in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, or Durham, the disabilities of the Roman Catholics, Jews, and Dissenters have been almost wholly removed; 2 Steph. Com. 707. See CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION ACT.

In the United States there is no such thing as toleration; all men have an equal right to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences. See CHRISTIANITY; RELIGION; RELIGIOUS TEST.

TOLL. In Contracts. A sum of money for the use of something, generally applied to the consideration which is paid for the use of a road, bridge, or the like, of a public nature.

The compensation paid to a miller for grinding another person's grain.

The rate of taking toll for grinding is regulated by statute in most of the states. See 2 Washb. R. P.; 6 Q. B. 31.

In Real Law. To bar, defeat, or take away: as, to toll an entry into lands is to deny or take away the right of entry.

TOLLS. In a general sense, tolls signify any manner of customs, subsidy, prestation, imposition, or sum of money demanded for exporting or importing of any wares or merchandise, to be taken of the buyer. Co. 2d Inst. 58.

TON. Twenty hundredweight, each hundredweight being one hundred and twelve pounds avoirdupois. See act of congress of Aug. 30, 1842, c. 270, s. 20; 3 Wall. Jr. 46; 29 Penn. 27; 9 Paige, 188; MEASURE.

TONNAGE. The capacity of a ship or vessel.

This term is most usually applied to the capacity of a vessel in tons as determined by the legal mode of measurement; in England reckoned according to the number of tons burden a ship will carry, but here to her internal cubic capacity; and, as a general rule, in the United States the official tonnage of a vessel is considerably below the actual capacity of the vessel to carry freight. 40 N. Y. 259; see infra.

For the rule for determining the tonnage of British vessels under the law of England, see McCulloch, Com. Dict. Tonnage; English Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, §§ 20–29. Foard's Mer. Shipping, p. 17.

The duties paid on the tonnage of a ship or vessel.

These duties were altogether abolished in relation to American vessels by the act of May 31, 1830, s. 1. And, by the second section of the same act, all tonnage-duties on foreign vessels are abolished, provided the president of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished.

But tonnage duties have been revived, and are now imposed as follows: Upon vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any foreign port or place there shall be paid duties as follows: On vessels built within the United States, but belonging wholly or in part to subjects of foreign powers, at the rate of thirty cents per ton; on other vessels not of the United States, at the rate of fifty cents per ton. Upon every vessel not of the United States, which shall be entered in one district from another district, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise, taken in one district to be delivered in another district, duties shall be paid at the rate of fifty cents per ton. Nothing in this section shall be deemed in any wise to impair any rights or privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty of tonnage on vessels. On all foreign vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any foreign port or place, to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, there shall be paid a duty at the rate of two dollars per ton; and none of the duties on tonnage, above mentioned, shall be levied on the vessels of any foreign nation if the president of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nations, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished. In addition to the tonnage-duty above imposed, there shall be paid a tax, at the rate of thirty cents per ton, on vessels which shall be entered at any custom-house within the United States from any foreign port or place; and any rights or privileges acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty of tonnage on vessels shall not be impaired; and any vessel, any officer of which shall not be a citizen of the United States, shall pay a tax of fifty cents per ton. R. S. § 4219.

No vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States, trading from one port within the United States to another port within the United States, or employed in the bank, whale, or other fisheries, shall be subject to tonnage tax or duty, if such vessel be licensed, registered or enrolled. R. S. § 4220.

The tonnage duty imposed on all vessels engaged in foreign commerce shall be levied but once within one year, and when paid by such vessel, no further tonnage tax shall be collected within one year from the date of such payment. But this provision shall not extend to foreign vessels entered in the United States from any foreign port, to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade. § 4223.

A duty of fifty cents per ton, to be denominated "light money," shall be levied and collected on all vessels not of the United States, which may enter the ports of the United States; to be levied and collected in the same manner as the tonnage duties. § 4225. See other sections under R. S. ch. 3, title xlviii.

The constitution of the United States provides, art. 1, s. 10, n. 2, that no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty on tonnage. (12 Wall. 204; 94 U. S. 238.) But a municipal corporation situated on a navigable river can, consistently with the constitution of the United States, charge and collect from the owner of licensed steamboats, which moor at a wharf constructed by it, wharfage proportioned to their tonnage; 95 U. S. 80; 45 Iowa, 196. See COMMERCE.

By act of congress, approved May 6, 1864, it is provided that the registered tonnage of a vessel shall be her entire internal cubic capacity, in tons of one hundred cubic feet each, to be ascertained as follows: Measure the length of the vessel in a straight line along the upper side of the tonnage deck, from the inside of the inner plank (average thickness) at the side of the stem to the inside of the plank on the stern timbers (average thickness), deducting from this length what is due to the rake of the bow in the thickness of the deck, and what is due to the rake of the stern timber in the thickness of the deck, and also what is due to the rake of the stern timber in one-third of the round of the beam; divide the length so taken into the number of equal parts required by the following table, according to the class in such table to which the vessel belongs. See R. S. §§ 4150 et seq.

TABLE OF CLASSES.

Class I.—Vessels of which the tonnage-length, according to the above measurement, is fifty feet or under, into six equal parts.

Class II.—Vessels of which the tonnage-length, according to the above measurement, is above fifty feet and not exceeding one hundred feet long, into eight equal parts.

Class III.—Vessels of which the tonnage-length, according to the above measurement, is above one hundred feet long and not exceeding one hundred and fifty feet long, into ten equal parts.

Class IV.—Vessels of which the tonnage-length, according to the above measurement, is above one hundred and fifty feet and not exceeding two hundred feet long, into twelve equal parts.

Class V.—Vessels of which the tonnage-length, according to the above measurement, is above two hundred feet and not exceeding two hundred and fifty feet long, into fourteen equal parts.

Class VI.—Vessels of which the tonnage-length, according to the above measurement, is above two hundred and fifty feet long, into sixteen equal parts.

Then, the hold being sufficiently cleared to admit of the required depths and breadths being properly taken, find the transverse area of such vessel at each point of division of the length, as follows. Measure the depth at each point of division from a point at a distance of one-third of the round of the beam below such deck, or, in case of a break, below a line stretched in continuation thereof, to the upper side of the floor-timber, at the inside of the limber-strake, after deducting the average thickness of the ceiling which is between the bilge-planks and limber-strake; then, if the depth at the midship division of the length do not exceed sixteen feet, divide each depth into four equal parts; then measure the inside horizontal breadth at each of the three points of division, and also at the upper and lower points of the depth, extending each measurement to the average thickness of that part of the ceiling which is between the points of measurement; number these breadths from above (numbering the upper breadth one, and so on down to the lowest breadth); multiply the second and fourth by four, and the third by two; add these products together, and to the sum add the first breadth and the last or fifth; multiply the quantity thus obtained by one-third the interval between the breadths, and the product shall be deemed the transverse area; but if the midship depth exceed sixteen feet, divide each depth into six equal parts, instead of four, and measure as before directed the horizontal breadths at the five points of division and also at the upper and lower points of the depth; number them from above, as before, multiply the second, fourth, and sixth by four, and the third and fifth by two; add these products together, and to the sum add the first breadth and the last or seventh; multiply the quantity thus obtained by one-third of the common interval between the breadths, and the product shall be deemed the transverse area.

Having thus ascertained the transverse area at each point of division of the length of the vessel, as required above, proceed to ascertain the register-tonnage of the vessel, in the following manner:—

Number the areas successively one, two, three, etc., number one being at the extreme limit of the length at the bow, and the last number at the extreme limit of the length at the stern; then, whether the length be divided according to table into six or sixteen parts, as in classes one and six, or into any intermediate number, as in classes two, three, four, and five, multiply the second and every even-numbered area by four, and the third and every odd-numbered area (except the first and last) by two; add the products together, and to the sum add the first and last, if they yield anything; multiply the quantities thus obtained by one-third of the common interval between the areas, and the product will be the cubical contents of the space under the tonnage-deck; divide this product by one hundred, and the quotient, being the tonnage under the tonnage-deck, shall be deemed the register-tonnage of the vessel, subject to the additions hereinafter mentioned.

If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper decks or the spar-deck available for cargo or stores or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows:—

Measure the internal mean length of such space in feet, and divide into an even number of equal parts of which the distance asunder shall be most nearly equal to those into which the length of the tonnage-deck has been divided; measure at the middle of its height the inside breadths,—namely, one at each end and at each of the points of division,—numbering them successively one, two, three, etc.; then to the sum of the end breadths add four times the sum of the even-numbered breadths and twice the sum of the odd-numbered breadths, except the first and last, and multiply the whole sum by one-third of the common interval between the breadths; the product will give the mean horizontal area of such space; then measure the mean height between the planks of the decks, and multiply it by the mean horizontal area; divide the product by one hundred, and the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such space, and shall be added to the tonnage under the tonnage-deck ascertained as aforesaid.

If the vessel has a third deck, or spar-deck, the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage-deck shall be ascertained as follows:—

Measure in feet the inside length of the space, at the middle of its height, from the plank at the side of the stem to the plank on the timbers at the stern, and divide the length into the same number of equal parts into which the length of the tonnage-deck is divided; measure (also at the middle of its height) the inside breadth of the space at each of the points of division, also the breadth of the stem and the breadth at the stern; number them successively one, two, three, and so forth, commencing at the stem; multiply the second and all other even-numbered breadths by four, and the third and all other odd-numbered breadths (except the first and last) by two; to the sum of these products add the first and last breadths; multiply the whole sum by one-third of the common interval between the breadths, and the result will give, in superficial feet, the mean horizontal area of such space; measure the mean height between the plank of the two decks, and multiply it by the mean horizontal area, and the product will be the cubical contents of the space; divide this product by one hundred, and the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such space, and shall be added to the other tonnage of the vessel ascertained as aforesaid. And if the vessel has more than three decks, the tonnage of each space between decks above the tonnage-deck shall be severally ascertained in the manner above described, and shall be added to the tonnage of the vessel ascertained as aforesaid.

In ascertaining the tonnage of open vessels, the upper edge of the upper strake is to form the boundary-line of measurement, and the depth shall be taken from an athwartship line extending from the upper edge of said strake at each division of the length.

TONNAGE TAX. See TONNAGE.

TONTINE. In French Law. The name of a partnership composed of creditors or recipients of perpetual or life rents or annuities, formed on the condition that the rents of those who may die shall accrue to the survivors, either in whole or in part.

This kind of partnership took its name from Tonti, an Italian of the 17th century, who first conceived the idea and put it in practice. Merlin, Répert.; Dalloz, Dict.; 5 Watts, 351.

TOOK AND CARRIED AWAY. In Criminal Pleading. Technical words necessary in an indictment for simple larceny. Bacon, Abr. Indictment (G 1); Comyns, Dig. Indictment (G 6); Cro. Car. 37; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 244. See CEPIT ET ASPORTAVIT.

TOOLS. Those implements which are commonly used by the hand of one man in some manual labor necessary for his subsistence.

The apparatus of a printing-office, such as types, presses, etc., are not, therefore, included under the term tools; 10 Pick. 423; 3 Vt. 133. And see 2 Pick. 80; 5 Mass. 313.

By the forty-sixth section of the act of March 2, 1789, 1 Story, Laws, 612, the tools or implements of a mechanical trade of persons who arrive in the United States are free and exempted from duty.

TORT (Fr. tort, from Lat. torquere, to twist, tortus, twisted, wrested aside). A private or civil wrong or injury. A wrong independent of contract. 1 Hill. Torts, 1. The breach of a legal duty. Bigelow, Torts, 3.

The law recognizes certain rights as belonging to every individual, such as the right to personal security, to liberty, to property, to reputation, to the services of a daughter or servant, to the companionship of a wife, etc. Any violation of one of these rights is a tort. In like manner the law recognizes certain duties as attached to every individual, as the duty of not deceiving by false representations, of not prosecuting another maliciously, of not using your own property so as to injure another, etc. The breach of any of these duties coupled with consequent damages to any one is also a tort. Underhill, Torts, 4.

The word torts is used to describe that branch of the law which treats of the redress of injuries which are neither crimes nor arise from the breach of contracts. All acts or omissions of which the law takes cognizance may in general be classed under the three heads of contracts, torts, and crimes. Contracts include agreements and the injuries resulting from their breach. Torts include injuries to individuals, and crimes injuries to the public or state. 1 Hill. Torts, 1.

This division of the redress of injuries by civil suit into actions of tort and actions of contract is not thoroughly accurate. For often the party injured has his election whether he will proceed by tort or by contract, as in the case of a fraudulent sale, or the fraudulent recommendation of a third person; 1 Hill. Torts, 28; 10 C. B. 83; 24 Conn. 392. But for general usage this division has been found sufficient, and is universally adopted; Cooley, Torts, 2.

As distinguished from contracts, torts are characterized by the following qualities: (1) parties jointly committing torts are in many cases severally liable without right to contribution from each other; (2) the death of either party to a tort destroys the right of action; (3) persons under personal disabilities to contract are liable for their torts; 1 Hill. Torts, 2; Cooley, Torts, 147.

As the same act may sometimes constitute the breach of a contract as well as a tort, so the same act may often constitute a tort and also a crime. For a tort may amount to, or may be likely to lead to, a breach of the peace, and thus become a matter of public concern. The torts which are usually at the same time crimes are assault, libel, and nuisance. In such cases it is the general rule of law that a public prosecution and a private action for damages can both be maintained either at the same or at different times; 1 B. & P. 191; 3 Bla. Com. 122; 1 Hill. Torts, 57. In French law the two suits are combined, so that the criminal is punished and damages awarded by one proceeding; 8 Alb. L. J. 509.

In England there is a doctrine that when a tort amounts to a felony, the private right of action is suspended until the public prosecution is completed. This, however, is not generally recognized in the United States; 1 Gray, 83; 6 N. H. 454; 1 Miles, 312; 4 Ohio, 376; 22 Wend. 285, note; 1 Hill. Torts, 61 et seq.

The infringement of a right or the violation of a duty are necessary ingredients of a tort. If neither of these is present the act is not a tort, although damage may have resulted. Hence the maxim: Ex damno sine injuria non oritur actio. Thus if a building be erected whereby a shop is hidden from view of the public, this, though causing great loss to the shopkeeper, is yet no tort; for no man has the right to an uninterrupted view of a particular spot if the land of another intervene. Therefore, though in this case there was damage, yet there was no infringement of a right or violation of a duty: in other words, no wrongful act; L. R. 2 Ch. App. 158; Underhill, Torts, 6.

A wrongful or malicious intent is an essential element in some torts. As, for example, deceit, slander and libel, malicious prosecution, and conspiracy. In general, however, it may be stated as a prominent distinction between torts and crimes, that in the former the party's intent is immaterial, while in prosecutions for the latter a criminal purpose must always be alleged and proved; 1 Hill. Torts, 90; Cooley, Torts, 688. Thus one may be made liable in damages for what is usually called a mere accident. So insane persons and minors, under the age of discernment, are in general liable for torts. But the French law holds that every tort implies a fault, and consequently that the insane and minors under the age of discernment, being incapable of an intent, are not liable; 2 Hill. Torts, 521; Cooley, Torts, 99, 103; 8 Alb. L. J. 508; 32 L. J. C. P. 189; 1 Esp. 172.

The various acts which constitute torts may be classed as injuries to person, property, or reputation. But more particularly under the following heads: deceit, slander and libel, malicious prosecution, conspiracy, assault and battery, false imprisonment, enticement and seduction, trespass, conversion, infringement of patents, copyrights, and trade-marks, damage by animals, violation of water rights and rights of support, nuisance, negligence, etc. etc. In general, it may be said that whenever the law creates a right the violation of such right will be a tort, and wherever the law creates a duty, the breach of such duty coupled with consequent damage will be a tort also. This applies not only to the common law, but also to such rights and duties as may be created by statute; Underhill, Torts, 20; Cooley, Torts, 650; Addison, Torts, secs. 53–77. Thus a statute enacting that every ship shall carry medicines suitable to accidents and diseases at sea creates a duty; and any breach of this duty whereby damage results to any individual is a tort. That the statute in such case provides a penalty for non-performance, to be recovered by a common informer, does not interfere with the private action. The penalty concerns the public wrong, and has nothing to do with the private injury or the private right of action; 3 E. & B. 402.

Torts may also arise in the performance of the duties of a ministerial officer, when such duties are due to individuals and not to the state; Cooley, Torts, 376. See OFFICER; JUDGE; SHERIFF; ATTACHMENT; EXECUTION; BAIL; ARREST.

As to torts committed against property or in the relations of master and servant, husband and wife, parent and child, bailor and bailee, landlord and tenant, mortgagor and mortgagee, see these several titles.

As to remedies, the law has given particular forms of action for certain injuries, as trover for conversion, trespass for injuries to property, etc. But by far the larger class of torts is included under actions on the case, which is the form of proceeding allowed when the injury is consequential or indirect, or not capable of being brought under any of the ancient forms of action. The remedies not included under actions on the case are usually classed as trespass vi et armis. See CASE.

In order to maintain an action of tort the relation of cause and effect between the act and the injury must be clearly shown. The damage must not be remote or indirect. In jure non remota causa, sed proxima spectatur. Cooley, Torts, 68; Broom, Max. 216; 3 Wils. 403. Thus, where it was attempted to make a common carrier liable in tort for goods destroyed by a flood, because if they had not been delayed by the lameness of his horse they would have been beyond the locality of the flood, the court held that the lameness of the horse was the remote and not the proximate cause of the injury; 20 Penn. 171.

A party injured cannot generally maintain an action for the injury if caused in any degree by his own contributory negligence. See NEGLIGENCE; 14 Am. L. Rev. 1.

TORTFEASOR. A wrong-doer; one who commits or is guilty of a tort.

TORTURE. The rack, or question, or other mode of examination by violence to the person, to extort a confession from supposed criminals, and a revelation of their associates.

It is to be distinguished from punishment, which usually succeeds a conviction for offences, as it was inflicted in limine, and as part of the introductory process leading to trial and judgment.

It was wholly unknown to the common and statute law of England, and was forbidden by Magna Charta, ch. 29; Co. 2d Inst. 48; 4 Bla. Com. 326.

It prevailed in Scotland, where the civil law which allowed it obtained; Dig. 48. 18. It was, however, declared contrary to the claim of right, and was expressly prohibited, 7 Anne, c. 21, § 5, A. D. 1708. Several instances of its infliction may be found in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials of Scotland.

Sir John Kelynge, in the time of Hale, says, persons standing mute were also compelled to answer, by tying their thumbs together with a whip-cord, and that this was said to be the "constant practice at Newgate." Kely. 27.

Although torture was confessedly contrary to the common law of England, it was, nevertheless, often employed as an instrument of state to wring confessions from prominent criminals,—especially in charges of treason. It was usually inflicted by warrant from the privy council. Jardine, Torture, 7, 15, 42; 1 Rush. Coll. 638.

In 1596 a warrant was issued to the attorney-general (Sir Edward Coke), the solicitor-general (Sir Thomas Fleming), Mr. Francis Bacon, and the recorder of London, to examine four prisoners "upon such articles as they should think meet, and for the better boulting forth of the truth of their intended plots and purposes, that they should be removed to Bridewell and put to the manacles and torture." Mr. Jardine proves from the records of the privy council that the practice was not unfrequent during the time of Elizabeth, and continued to the close of the reign of the first two Stuarts. There is positive evidence that Guy Fawkes was directed to be tortured in regard to the Gunpowder Plot, in the warrant in the king's handwriting authorizing the commissioners, of whom Coke was one, to examine him upon the rack, "using the gentler tortures first, et sic per gradus ad ima tenditur." 1 Jardine, Crim. Trials, Int. 17; 2 id. 106.

This absurd and cruel practice has never obtained in the United States; for no man is bound to accuse himself. An attempt to torture a person to extort a confession of crime is a criminal offence; 2 Tyl. Vt. 380. See QUESTION; PEINE FORTE ET DURE; MUTE.

TORY. Originally a nickname for the wild Irish in Ulster. The words whig and tory were first applied to English political factions in 1679.

TOTAL LOSS. In Insurance. A total loss in marine insurance is either the absolute destruction of the insured subject by the direct action of the perils insured against, or a constructive—sometimes called technical—total loss, in which the assured is deprived of the possession of the subject, still subsisting in specie, or where there may be remnants of it or claims subsisting on account of it, and the assured, by the express terms or legal construction of the policy, has the right to recover its value from the underwriters, so far as, and at the rate at which, it is insured, on abandonment and assignment of the still subsisting subject or remnants or claims arising out of it. 2 Phill. Ins. ch. xvii.; 2 Johns. 286.

A constructive total loss may be by capture; seizure by unlawful violence; as, piracy; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1106; 2 E. L. & E. 85; or damage to ship or goods over half of the value at the time and place of loss; 1 Curt. C. C. 148; 9 Cush. 415; 5 Denio, 342; 19 Ala. N. S. 108; 6 Johns. 219; or loss of the voyage; 4 Me. 431; 24 Miss. 461; 19 N. Y. 272; 1 Mart. La. 221; though the ship or goods may survive in specie, but so as not to be fit for use in the same character for the same service or purpose; 2 Caines, Cas. 324; Valin, tom. 2, tit. Ass. a. 46; or by jettison; 1 Caines, 196; or by necessity to sell on account of the action and effect of the peril insured against; 5 Gray, 154; 1 Cra. 202; or by loss of insured freight consequent on the loss of cargo or ship; 18 Johns. 208.

There may be a claim for a total loss in addition to a partial loss; 17 How. 595. A total loss of the ship is not necessarily such of cargo; 3 Binn. 287; nor is submersion necessarily a total loss; 7 East, 38; nor is temporary delay of the voyage; 5 B. & Ald. 597.

A constructive total loss, and an abandonment thereupon of the ship, is a constructive total loss of freight; and a constructive total loss and abandonment of cargo has a like effect as to commissions or profits thereon; and the validity of the abandonment will depend upon the actual facts at the time of the abandonment, as the same may subsequently prove to have been; 2 Phillips, Ins. § 1630; 3 Johns. Cas. 93. See 2 Pars. Mar. Ins. §§ 68–106; Lowndes, Mar. Ins. §§ 210–241; ABANDONMENT.

TOTIDEM VERBIS (Lat.). In so many words.

TOTIES QUOTIES (Lat.). As often as the thing shall happen.

TOTTED. A good debt to the crown, i. e. a debt paid to the sheriff, to be by him paid over to the king. Cowel; Moz. & W. See FOREIGN APPOSER.

TOUCH AND STAY. Words frequently introduced in policies of insurance, giving the party insured the right to stop and stay at certain designated points in the course of the voyage. A vessel which has the power to touch and stay at a place in the course of the voyage must confine herself strictly to the terms of the liberty so given; for any attempt to trade at such a port during such a stay, as, by shipping or landing goods, will amount to a species of deviation which will discharge the underwriters, unless the ship have also liberty to trade as well as to touch and stay at such a place; 1 Marsh. Ins. 275; 1 Esp. 610; 5 id. 96.

And even where the printed form of policy contains the clause: And it shall be lawful for the said ship, etc., in this voyage to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever without prejudice to this insurance, the right of deviation is held to be limited by the words in this voyage, to places in the usual course of the voyage between the termini named in the policy; 1 Dougl. 284; Park. Ins. 626; 1 Exch. 257; and, as to purpose, to objects within the main scope of the voyage insured; 4 B. & Ald. 72; 5 B. & Cr. 210; Lowndes, Mar. Ins. § 85 et seq.

TOUJOURS ET UNCORE PRIST (L. Fr.). Always and still ready. This is the name of a plea of tender: as, where a man is indebted to another, and he tenders the amount due, and afterwards the creditor brings a suit, the defendant may plead the tender, and add that he has always been and is still ready to pay what he owes, which may be done by the formula toujours et uncore prist. He must then pay the money into court; and if the issue be found for him the defendant will be exonerated from costs, and the plaintiff made liable for them; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2923. See TOUT TEMPS PRIST; TENDER.

TOUR D'ECHELLE. In French Law. A right which the owner of an estate has of placing ladders on his neighbor's property to facilitate the reparation of a party-wall or of buildings which are supported by that wall. It is a species of servitude. Lois des Bât. part 1, c. 3, sect. 2, art. 9, § 1.

The space of ground left unoccupied around a building for the purpose of enabling the owner to repair it with convenience: this is not a servitude, but an actual corporeal property.

TOURN. See SHERIFF'S TOURN.

TOUT TEMPS PRIST (L. Fr. always ready). A plea by which the defendant signifies that he has always been ready to perform what is required of him. The object of the plea is to save costs: as, for example, where there has been a tender and refusal; 3 Bla. Com. 303; Comyns, Dig. Pleader, 2 Y, 5. So, in a writ of dower, where the plea is detinue of charters, the demandant might reply, always ready; Rast. Entr. 229 b; Stearns, Real Act. 310. See UNCORE PRIST.

TOWAGE. The act of towing or drawing ships and vessels, usually by means of a small steamer called a tug.

Where towage is rendered in the rescue or relief of a vessel from imminent peril, it becomes salvage service, entitled to be compensated as such; 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 223. A tug, sometimes called towing- or tow-boat, while not held to the responsibility of a common carrier, is bound to exercise reasonable care and skill in everything pertaining to its employment; 9 Fed. Rep. 614. See TOW-BOATS; TUGS.

That which is given for towing ships in rivers. Guidon de la Mer, c. 16; Pothier, Des Avaries, n. 147; 2 Chitty, Com. Law, 16.

TOW-BOATS. According to the weight of authority, the owners of steamboats engaged in the business of towing are not common carriers; Lawson, Carriers, 3. So held in 2 N. Y. 204; 18 Penn. 40; 9 C. L. J. 153; s. c. 14 Bush, 698, and 29 Am. Rep. 455; see TOWAGE; contra, 5 Jones, N. C. 174; 11 La. 46. See 6 Cal. 462; 28 N. J. L. 180.

TOWN. A term of somewhat varying signification, but denoting a division of a country next smaller in extent than a county.

In Pennsylvania and some other of the Middle states, it denotes a village or city. In the New England states, it is to be considered for many purposes as the unit of civil organization,—the counties being composed of a number of towns. Towns are regarded as corporations or quasi-corporations; 13 Mass. 193. In New York and Wisconsin, towns are subdivisions of counties; and the same is true of the townships of most of the Western states. In Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Iowa, they are called towhships. In England, the term town or vill comprehends under it the several species of cities, boroughs, and common towns. 1 Bla. Com. 114.

TOWN CAUSE. In English Practice. A cause tried at the sittings for London and Middlesex. 3 Steph. Com. 517.

TOWN-PLAT. The acknowledgment and recording of a town-plat vests the legal title to the ground embraced in the streets and alleys in the corporation of the town: therefore it is held that the proprietor who has thus dedicated the streets and alleys to the public cannot maintain trespass for an injury to the soil or freehold. The corporation alone can seek redress for such injury; 11 Ill. 554; 13 id. 54, 308. This is not so, however, with a highway: the original owner of the fee must bring his action for an injury to the soil; 13 Ill. 54. See HIGHWAY. If the streets or alleys of a town are dedicated by a different mode from that pointed out by the statute, the fee remains in the proprietor, burdened with the public easement; 13 Ill. 312.

TOWNSHIP. The public lands of the United States are surveyed first into tracts called townships, being in extent six miles square. The subdivisions of a township are called sections, each a mile square and containing six hundred and forty acres; these are subdivided into quarter-sections, and from that into lots of forty acres each. This plan of subdividing the public lands was adopted by act of congress of May 18, 1796. See Brightly, Dig. U. S. Laws, 493.

TRADE. Any sort of dealings by way of sale or exchange; commerce, traffic. 101 U. S. 231. The dealings in a particular business: as, the Indian trade; the business of a particular mechanic: hence boys are said to be put apprentices to learn a trade: as, the trade of a carpenter, shoemaker, and the like. Bacon, Abr. Master and Servant (D 1). Trade differs from art.

It is the policy of the law to encourage trade; and therefore all contracts which restrain the exercise of a man's talents in trade are detrimental to the commonwealth and therefore void; though he may bind himself not to exercise a trade in a particular place; for in this last case, as he may pursue it in another place, the commonwealth has the benefit of it; 8 Mass. 223; 9 id. 522. See Ware, Dist. Ct. 257, 260; Comyns, Dig. Trade; Viner, Abr. Trade; RESTRAINT.

TRADE-MARK. A symbol, emblem, or mark, which a tradesman puts upon or attaches in some way to the goods he manufactures or has caused to be manufactured, so that they may be identified and known in the market. Brown, Trade-Marks, 53–93. The wrapper in which goods are put up may have the trade-mark stamped on it, but the design of the wrapper itself (a peculiar box, tinpail, or bright-colored paper) cannot be converted into a trade-mark; 14 Blatch. 128.

It may be in any form of letters, words, vignettes, or ornamental design. Newly-coined words may form a trade-mark; Brown, Trade-Marks, 151. But a mere geographical name cannot be so used. The word "Lackawanna," which is the name of a region of country, cannot by combination with the word "coal," make a trade-mark, because every one who mines coal in Lackawanna has a right to say that his product is Lackawanna coal. But any fraudulent use of a geographical name will be restrained in equity. In the case of the Akron Cement Co., the plaintiffs manufactured cement at Akron, in New York, and sold it under the name of "Akron Cement," the defendants made the same sort of cement at Syracuse and labelled it "Onondaga Akron Cement," etc. The court held that though all the world had a right to manufacture cement at Akron and call it Akron Cement, yet the action of the defendants in calling their cement made at Syracuse, Akron Cement, was a fraud on the plaintiffs and on the public, and should accordingly be restrained; 13 Wall. 311; 49 Barb. 588; Brown, Trade-Marks, 123.

The ownership of trade-marks is generally considered as a right of property; Upton, Trade-Marks, 10. It is on this ground that equity often protects by injunction against their infringement. In such cases proof of fraud is not necessary, the mere fact of violating a right of property being a sufficient reason for the exercise of equitable jurisdiction; 1 De G. J. & S. 185. At law the proper remedy is an action for deceit; and here proof of fraud is necessary. But equity will not interfere by injunction except in aid of a legal right; and if the fact of a plaintiff's property in a trade-mark or of the defendant's interference with it appears at all doubtful, the plaintiff will be left to first establish his case by an action at law; 4 E. D. Sm. 387; Brown, Trade-Marks, 23.

If goods derive their chief value from the personal skill of the adopter of the trade-mark, he will not be allowed to assign it; 1 H. & M. 271.

A man can always put his own name on his own goods, notwithstanding that another of the same name already manufactures and sells the same goods. In other words, a man cannot make a trade-mark out of his name alone. But no one can use in connection with his own name devices or symbols which have become the property of another person of the same name. Thus an injunction to restrain the use of the words "Burgess Essence of Anchovies," was refused, although there was another person named Burgess who made essence of anchovies. But an injunction was granted to restrain the use of the words "Burgess Fish Sauce Warehouse late of 107 Strand," which the court held had become the peculiar property of the first Burgess; 17 E. L. & E. 257; 12 Am. Rep. 410. A man will be restrained from using his own name fraudulently; 22 L. J. Ch. 675; 3 B. & C. 541.

The trade-name of a firm, a corporate name, and the name of a publication, though not strictly trade-marks, are nevertheless a species of property of the same nature as trade-marks, and will be protected in like manner; 21 Am. L. Reg. 644; 33 Am. Rep. 335; 9 id. 331. See NAME.

So a tradesman may adopt a fictitious name, and sell his goods under it as a trade-mark, and the property right he thus acquires in the fanciful name will be protected; 6 Thomp. & C. 133.

No property can be acquired in words, marks, or devices which denote the mere nature, kind, and quality of articles, and do not indicate origin or ownership; 17 Barb. 608; 2 Sandf. 599; 101 U. S. 51.

Thus "snow-flake" as applied to bread and crackers and "rye and rock" as applied to a liquor were held to be descriptions. But "insurance oil" as applied to an illuminating, non-explosive oil was held to be a valid trade-mark; 46 N. Y. 542; 39 Am. Rep. 285, 290.

In the examination of conflicting trade-marks the courts will judge as would the public. Mere variations of arrangement, with secondary additions and omissions, will justify an injunction; and while there may be striking differences between two trade-marks, yet if in the last made there is an ingenuity which would deceive, the court will interfere; 18 Beav. 164; 10 Beav. 297.

A party may affect his right to a trade-mark by non-use, by a forbearance in suing protectively, and by adopting a new one. But the question of abandonment is always a question of intention; Brown, Trade-Marks, 536. Equity, however, will not in general refuse an injunction on account of delay in seeking relief where the proof of infringement is clear, even though the delay may be such as to preclude the party from any right to an account for past profits; 31 Law Times, 285; 45 L. Jour. pt. 1, 505.

As it is often difficult to prove exactly when a certain trade-mark was adopted, Congress provided for the registration of trade-marks in the patent office, and for the punishment of the fraudulent use, sale, and counterfeiting of them; 16 Stat. at L. 198; 19 id. 141. This legislation has been declared unconstitutional, because a trade-mark is not a writing or invention, and because the acts in question applied to all commerce, and were not limited to trade-marks used only in commerce between the states or with foreign nations, or with the Indian tribes; 100 U. S. 82; 13 Am. L. Rev. 390. But although no indictments can be maintained under these acts, yet registration under them will be good evidence in state courts of the adoption of a trade-mark. The act of March 3, 1881, is supposed to avoid the constitutional difficulty by providing for the registration of trade-marks only when used in foreign commerce, or in commerce with the Indian tribes; 21 Am. L. Reg. 648.

Trade-mark treaties.—The United States has entered into numerous trade-mark treaties. Those with Germany and Russia declare that the citizens of each country shall enjoy in the other the same protection as native citizens. The treaties with Austria, Belgium, and France forbid the people of either country from counterfeiting the trade-marks of the other, and give to the injured merchant the same action for damages that he would have if he were a citizen of the country where the imitation is committed. The treaty with Great Britain provides that the citizens of each party shall have in the possessions of the other the same rights as native citizens, "or as are now granted or may hereafter be granted to the citizens of the most favored nation."

The treaties with Germany and Russia require no legislation on the part of the United States to carry them into effect. But the treaties with Austria, Belgium, France, and England can hardly be carried out unless Congress has power to legislate on the subject of trade-marks; Brown, Trade-Marks, 557.

See, generally, Brown, Upton, Coddington, and Sebastian, on Trade-Marks.

TRADER. One who makes it his business to buy merchandise, or goods and chattels, and to sell the same for the purpose of making a profit. The quantum of dealing is immaterial, when an intention to deal generally exists; 3 Stark. 56; 2 C. & P. 135; 1 Term, 572. The principal question is whether the person has the intention of getting a living by his trading; if this is proved, the extent or duration of the trading is not material; 3 Camp. 233.

Questions as to who is a trader most frequently arise under the bankrupt laws; and the most difficult among them are those cases where the party follows a business which is not that of buying and selling principally, but in which he is occasionally engaged in purchases and sales.

A farmer who, in addition to his usual business, occasionally buys a horse not calculated for his usual occupation, and sells him again to make a profit, and who in the course of two years had so bought and sold five or six horses, two of which had been sold, after he had bought them, for the sake of a guinea profit, was held to be a trader; 1 Term, 537, n.; 1 Price, 20. Another farmer, who bought a large quantity of potatoes, not to be used on his farm, but merely to sell again for a profit, was also declared to be a trader; 1 Strs. 513. See 5 B. & P. 78; 11 East, 274.

A butcher who kills only such cattle as he has reared himself, is not a trader, but if he buy them and kill and sell them with a view to profit, he is a trader; 4 Burr. 21, 47.

A brickmaker who follows the business for the purpose of enjoying the profits of his real estate merely is not a trader; but when he buys the earth by the load or otherwise, and manufactures it into bricks and sells them with a view to profit, he is a trader; 7 East, 442; 3 C. & P. 500; Mood. & M. 263; 2 Rose, 422; 2 Gl. & J. 183; 1 Bro. C. C. 173.

One who is engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber is a trader; 1 B. R. 281; so is one engaged in buying and selling goods for the purpose of gain, though but occasionally; 2 id. 15; but the keeper of a livery stable is not; 3 N. Y. Leg. Obs 282; nor is one who buys and sells shares; 2 Ch. App. 466.

TRADES UNIONS. A combination of workmen in the same or like trades, associated to maintain, and, if possible, enlarge their rights and privileges of whatever kind. The English Trades Union Act of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 31, provides that the purposes of any trades union shall not by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade be deemed unlawful so as to render any member of such trade union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise, and shall not by reason merely, as aforesaid, be unlawful so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust. Provisions are also made for the registration and for registered offices, of trades unions; Whart. Dict. See CONSPIRACY; STRIKE.

TRADITIO BREVIS MANUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The delivery of a thing by the mere consent of the parties; as, when Peter holds the property of Paul as bailee, and afterwards he buys it, it is not necessary that Paul should deliver the property to Peter and he should re-deliver it to Paul; the mere consent of the parties transfers the title to Paul. 1 Duverg. n. 252; 21 Me. 231; Pothier, Pand. lib. 50, CDLXXIV.; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 944.

TRADITION (Lat. trans, over, do, dare, to give). In Civil Law. The act by which a thing is delivered by one or more persons to one or more others.

The delivery of possession by the proprietor with an intention to transfer the property to the receiver. Two things are, therefore, requisite in order to transmit property in this way: the intention or consent of the former owner to transfer it, and the actual delivery in pursuance of that intention.

Tradition is either real or symbolical. Real tradition takes place where the ipsa corpora of movables are put into the hands of the receiver. Symbolical tradition is used where the thing is incapable of real delivery, as, in immovable subjects, such as lands and houses, or such as consist in jure (things incorporeal), as, things of fishing, and the like. The property of certain movables, though they are capable of real delivery, may be transferred by symbol. Thus, if the subject be under lock and key, the delivery of the key is considered as a legal tradition of all that is contained in the repository. Cujas, Observations, liv. 11, ch. 10; Inst. 2. 1. 40; Dig. 41. 1. 9; Erskine, Inst. 2. 1. 10. 11; La. Civ. Code, art. 2452 et seq. See DELIVERY; SYMBOLICAL DELIVERY.

TRAFFIC. Commerce; trade; sale or exchange of merchandise, bills, money, and the like.

TRAFFIC RATES. Unjust discriminations by a common carrier exist where two or more persons desire identical or very similar transportation services to be performed for each of them by such carrier, and he charges one or more of such persons a higher price, or affords to them inferior facilities of transportation, than he charges or gives to the other of such persons; 16 Am. L. Rev. 818. The question is not merely whether the service or the price is absolutely unequal in the narrowest sense, but also whether the inequality is unreasonable and injurious. A certain inequality of terms, facilities, or accommodations may be reasonable, and, therefore, not an infringement of the common right; 52 N. H. 430.

Variations in the quantity of transportation service warrant corresponding variations in the prices chargeable for it; 16 Am. L. Rev. 821: as where the shipper furnishes his own cars; 1 Nev. & Mac. 63; or where by reason of gradients or otherwise, the cost of carriage is greater on one part of a line than on the other; 2 Nev. & Mac. 39, 105.

A discrimination resting exclusively upon the amount of freight supplied by the respective shippers will not be sustained; 12 Fed. Rep. 311, per Baxter, Circ. J.; but it may be if the amount is great enough to enable the company to perform the service at less expense.

A carrier may contract to carry cattle at lower rates, on condition of being liable only for negligence; 25 W. R. 63; and extra fare may be charged to passengers who pay their fare upon the cars; 30 N. Y. 505; 46 Ind. 293; 53 Me. 279; provided the company has afforded reasonable opportunity to passengers to purchase tickets before entering the cars; 38 Ind. 116; 43 Ill. 364; but the extra fare must itself be reasonable in amount; 43 Ill. 176; 34 N. H. 230. See TICKET.

A carrier cannot discriminate in favor of another carrier, or any of the public; 62 Penn. 218; nor between different localities; 67 Ill. 11; but see 47 Penn. 341 (per Strong, J., as to a discrimination in favor of domestic articles).

It has been said, obiter, that a company might make discriminations between intermediate and terminal traffic on the ground of competition at the terminal point, 1 Nev. & Mac. 103; but it appears that no case has decided that competition is per se a valid reason for reducing rates, even to the public; 16 Am. L. Rev. 836; see 67 Ill. 11.

When an unjust discrimination in prices is shown to exist, the common carrier guilty of it will be enjoined by a court of chancery not to continue it; and one who has been unjustly discriminated against may recover the excessive freights he has paid by an action at law; 16 Am. L. Rev. 839 (where this subject is fully treated). See also 15 id. 186.

TRAITOR. One guilty of treason. See TREASON.

TRAITOROUSLY. In Pleading. A technical word, which is essential in an indictment for treason in order to charge the crime, and which cannot be supplied by any other word or any kind of circumlocution. Having been well laid in the statement of the treason itself, it is not necessary to state every overt act to have been traitorously committed.

See Bacon, Abr. Indictment (G 1); Comyns, Dig. Indictment (G 6); 1 East, Pl. Cr. 115; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 172, 184; 4 Bla. Com. 307; 3 Inst. 15; Cro. Car. 37; 4 Hargrave, St. Tr. 701; 2 Ld. Raym. 870; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 104, note (b).

TRAMP. One who roams about from place to place, begging or living without labor or visible means of support; a vagrant. Many of the states have recently adopted suitable legislation upon the subject, corresponding to the English vagrant acts. A single act of vagrancy is sufficient, according to the laws of Massachusetts, 1880; New York, 1880, and North Carolina, 1879. Females, minors, and blind persons are expressly excepted from the acts of some of the states, as New York, Delaware, North Carolina, and Nebraska. The object of these statutes is accomplished by arresting offenders and setting them to work on municipal improvements, or hiring them out to private employers, for a limited time, in Delaware for a month, for which they receive food, lodging, and reasonable wages. For entering a dwelling house, kindling a fire in a public highway or on private land without the owner's permission, for carrying dangerous weapons, or doing or threatening to do any injury to any one or to his property, they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment. See 1 N. Y. Laws, 1880, 296, ch. 176, § 1. See VAGRANT.

TRANSACTION (from Lat. trans and ago, to carry on). In Civil Law. An agreement between two or more persons, who, for the purpose of preventing or putting an end to a lawsuit, adjust their difference, by mutual consent, in the manner which they agree on. In Louisiana this contract must be reduced to writing. La. Civ. Code, art. 3038.

Transactions regulate only the differences which appear to be clearly comprehended in them by the intentions of the parties, whether they be explained in a general or particular manner, unless it be the necessary consequence of what is expressed; and they do not extend to differences which the parties never intended to include in them. La. Civ. Code, art. 3040.

To transact, a man must have the capacity to dispose of the things included in the transaction. 1 Domat. Lois Civiles, 1, 13, 1; Dig. 2. 15. 1; Code, 2. 4. 41. In the common law this is called a compromise. See COMPROMISE.

TRANSCRIPT. A copy of an original writing or deed.

TRANSFER. (Lat. trans, over, fero, to bear or carry). The act by which the owner of a thing delivers it to another person, with the intent of passing the rights which he has in it to the latter.

As to the transfer of stocks, see STOCK.

TRANSFEREE. He to whom a transfer is made.

TRANSFERENCE. In Scotch Law. The name of an action by which a suit which was pending at the time the parties died is transferred from the deceased to his representatives, in the condition in which it stood formerly. If it be the pursuer who is dead, the action is called a transference active; if the defender, it is a transference passive. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 32.

TRANSFEROR. One who makes a transfer.

TRANSGRESSION (Lat. trans, over, gressus, a stepping). The violation of a law.

TRANSHIPMENT. In Maritime Law. The act of taking the cargo out of one ship and loading it in another.

When this is done from necessity, it does not affect the liability of an insurer on the goods; 1 Marsh. Ins. 166; Abbott, Shipp. 240. But when the master tranships goods without necessity, he is answerable for the loss of them by capture by public enemies; 1 Gall. 443.

TRANSIRE. In English Law. A warrant for the custom-house to let goods pass; a permit. See, for a form of a transire, Hargrave, Law Tr. 104.

TRANSITORY ACTION. An action the cause of which might have arisen in one place or county as well as another.

In general, all personal actions, whether ex contractu; 5 Taunt. 25; 6 East, 352; 2 Johns. Cas. 335; 2 Caines, 374; 3 S. & R. 500; 1 Chitty, Pl. 243; or ex delicto; 1 Chitty, Pl. 243; are transitory.

Such an action may at common law be brought in any county which the plaintiff elects; but, by statute, in many states of the United States provision is made limiting the right of the plaintiff in this respect to a county in which some one or more of the parties has his domicil.

TRANSITUS (Lat.). A transit. See STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

TRANSLATION. The reproduction in one language of what has been written or spoken in another.

In pleading, when a libel or an agreement written in a foreign language must be averred, it is necessary that a translation of it should also be given.

In evidence, when a witness is unable to speak the English language so as to convey his ideas, a translation of his testimony must be made. In that case an interpreter should be sworn to translate to him, on oath, the questions propounded to him, and to translate to the court and jury.

See INTERPRETER.

The bestowing of a legacy which had been given to one, on another: this is a species of ademption; but it differs from it in this, that there may be an ademption without a translation, but there can be no translation without an ademption. Bacon, Abr. Legacies (C).

The transfer of property; but in this sense it is seldom used. 2 Bla. Com. 294.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The removal from one place to another; as, the bishop was translated from the diocese of A to that of B. In the civil law, translation signifies the transfer of property. Clef des Lois Rom.

See COPYRIGHT.

TRANSMISSION (Lat. trans, over, mitto, to send). In Civil Law. The right which heirs or legatees may have of passing to their successors the inheritance or legacy to which they were entitled, if they happen to die without having exercised their rights. Domat, liv. 3, t. 1, s. 10; 4 Toullier, n. 186; Dig. 50. 17. 54; Code, 6. 51.

TRANSPORTATION (Lat. trans, over, beyond, porto, to carry). In English Law. A punishment inflicted by virtue of sundry statutes: it was unknown to the common law. 2 H. Blackst. 223. It is a part of the judgment or sentence of the court that the party shall be transported or sent into exile. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 789; Princ. of Pen. Law, c. 4, § 2.

TRAVAIL. The act of child-bearing.

A woman is said to be in her travail from the time the pains of child-bearing commence until her delivery; 5 Pick. 63; 6 Me. 460.

In some states, to render the mother of a bastard child a competent witness in the prosecution of the alleged father, she must have accused him of being the father during the time of her travail; 1 Root, 107 (a case of maintenance); 2 Mass. 443; 6 Me. 460; 3 N. H. 135. But when the state prosecutes, the mother is competent although she did not accuse the father during her travail; 1 Day, 278.

TRAVELLING. See Rogers, Wrongs and Rights of a Traveller; SUNDAY.

TRAVERSE (L. Fr. traverser, to turn over, to deny). To deny; to put off.

In Civil Pleading. To deny or controvert any thing which is alleged in the previous pleading. Lawes, Pl. 116. A denial. Willes, 224. A direct denial in formal words: "Without this, that, etc." (absque hoc). 1 Chitty, Pl. 523, n. a. A traverse may deny all the facts alleged; 1 Chitty, Pl. 525; or any particular material fact; 20 Johns. 406.

A common traverse is a direct denial, in common language, of the adverse allegations, without the absque hoc, and concluding to the country. It it not preceded by an inducement, and hence cannot be used where an inducement is requisite; 1 Saund. 103 b, n. 1.

A general traverse is one preceded by a general inducement and denying all that is last before alleged on the opposite side, in general terms, instead of pursuing the words of the allegation which it denies; Gould, Pl. vii. 5, 6. Of this sort of traverse the replication de injuria sua propria absque tali causa, in answer to a justification, is a familiar example; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (H 1); Steph. Pl. 171; Gould, Pl. c. 7, § 5; Archb. Civ. Pl. 194.

A special traverse is one which commences with the words absque hoc, and pursues the material portion of the words of the allegation which it denies; Lawes, Pl. 116. It is regularly preceded by an inducement consisting of new matter; Gould, Pl. c. 7, §§ 6, 7; Steph. Pl. 188. A special traverse does not complete an issue, as does a common traverse; 20 Viner, Abr. 339; Yelv. 147, 148; 1 Saund. 22, n. 2.

A traverse upon a traverse is one growing out of the same point or subject-matter as is embraced in a preceding traverse on the other side; Gould, Pl. c. 7, § 42, n. It is a general rule that a traverse well intended on one side must be accepted on the other. And hence it follows, as a general rule, that there cannot be a traverse upon a traverse if the first traverse is material. The meaning of the rule is that when one party has tendered a material traverse the other cannot leave it and tender another of his own to the same point upon the inducement of the first traverse, but must join in that first tendered; otherwise the parties might alternately tender traverses to each other in unlimited succession, without coming to an issue; Gould, Pl. c. 7, § 42. The rule, however, does not apply where the first traverse is immaterial, nor where it is material if the plaintiff would thereby be ousted of some right or liberty which the law allows; Poph. 101; F. Moore, 850; Hob. 104; Cro. Eliz. 99, 418; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (G 18); Bacon, Abr. Pleas (H 4).

In Criminal Practice. To put off or delay the trial of an indictment till a succeeding term. More properly, to deny or take issue upon an indictment. 4 Bla. Com. 351.

TREASON. In Criminal Law. This word imports a betraying, treachery, or breach of allegiance; 4 Bla. Com. 75. In England, treason was divided into high and petit treason. The latter, originally, was of several forms, which, by 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, were reduced to three: the killing, by a wife, of her husband; by a servant, of his master; and the killing of a prelate by an ecclesiastic owing obedience to him. These kinds of treason were abolished in 1828. In America they were unknown; here treason means high treason.

The constitution of the United States, art. 3, s. 3, defines treason against the United States to consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort. By the same article of the constitution, no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

By the same article of the constitution, no "attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood except during the life of the person attainted." Every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason; R. S. § 5331. The penalty is death, or, at the discretion of the court, imprisonment at hard labor for not less than five years and a fine of not less than ten thousand dollars; and every person convicted of treason is rendered incapable of holding any office under the United States; R. S. § 5332.

The term enemies, as used in the constitution, applies only to subjects of a foreign power in a state of open hostility with us. To constitute a "levying of war" there must be an assemblage of persons with force and arms to overthrow the government or resist the laws. All who aid in the furtherance of the common object of levying war against the United States, in however minute a degree, or however remote from the scene of action, are guilty of treason; 4 Sawy. 457, per FIELD, J.

Treason may be committed against a state; 1 Story, 614; 11 Johns. 549.

See, generally, 3 Story, Const. 39, p. 667; Sergeant, Const. c. 30; United States vs. Fries, Pamph.; 1 Tucker, Bla. Com. App. 275, 276; 3 Wilson, Law Lect. 96; Foster, Disc. (I); Burr's Trial; 4 Cra. 126, 469; 1 Dall. 35; 2 id. 246, 355; 3 Wash. C. C. 284; 1 Johns. 553; 11 id. 549; Comyns, Dig. Justices (K); 1 East, Pl. Cr. 37–158; 23 Law Reporter, 597, 705; Bish. TREASURE TROVE. Found treasure.

This name is given to such money or coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion, which, having been hidden or concealed in the earth, or other private place so long that its owner is unknown, has been discovered by accident. Should the owner be found, it must be restored to him; and in case of not finding him, the property, according to the English law, belongs to the king. In the latter case, by the civil law, when the treasure was found by the owner of the soil he was considered as entitled to it by the double title of owner and finder; when found on another's property, one-half belonged to the owner of the estate and the other to the finder; when found on public property, it belonged one-half to the public treasury and the other to the finder. Leçons du Dr. Rom. §§ 350–352. This includes not only gold and silver, but whatever may constitute riches: as vases, urns, statues, etc.

The Roman definition includes the same things under the word pecunia; but the thing found must have a commercial value; for ancient tombs would not be considered a treasure. The thing must have been hidden or concealed in the earth, and no one must be able to establish his right to it. It must be found by a pure accident, and not in consequence of search; Dalloz, Dict. Propriété, art. 3, s. 3.

According to the French law, le trésor est toute chose cachée ou enfouie, sur laquelle personne ne peut justifier sa propriété, et qui est découverte par le pur effet du hasard. Code, Civ. 716. See 4 Toullier, n. 34. See, generally, 20 Viner, Abr. 414; 7 Comyns, Dig. 649; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 237; 1 Bla. Com. 295; Pothier, Traité du Droit de Propriété, art. 4.

TREASURER. An officer intrusted with the treasures or money either of a private individual, a corporation, a company, or a state.

It is his duty to use ordinary diligence in the performance of his office, and to account with those whose money he has.

TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES. This officer is appointed by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate. Before entering on the duties of his office, the treasurer is required to give bond, with sufficient sureties, approved by the secretary of the treasury and the first comptroller, in the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, payable to the United States, with condition for the faithful performance of the duties of his office and for the fidelity of the persons by him employed.

His principal duties are—to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the secretary of the treasury, countersigned by either comptroller and recorded by the register; to take receipts for all moneys paid by him; to render his account to the first comptroller quarterly, or oftener if required, and transmit a copy thereof, when settled, to the secretary of the treasury; to lay before each house, on the third day of every session of congress, fair and accurate copies of all accounts by him from time to time rendered to and settled with the first comptroller, and a true and perfect account of the state of the treasury; to submit at all times to the secretary of the treasury and the comptroller, or either of them, the inspection of the moneys in his hands. R. S. §§ 301–311.

TREASURY. The place where treasure is kept; the office of a treasurer. The term is more usually applied to the public than to a private treasury. See DEPARTMENT.

TREASURY NOTES. The treasury notes of the United States payable to holder or to bearer at a definite future time are negotiable commercial paper, and their transferability is subject to the commercial law of other paper of that character. Where such a paper is overdue a purchaser takes subject to the rights of antecedent holders to the same extent as in other paper bought after its maturity; 21 Wall. 138. See, also, 57 N. Y. 573; s. c. 15 Am. Rep. 534.

TREATY. A compact made between two or more independent nations with a view to the public welfare. Treaties are for a perpetuity, or for a considerable time. Those matters which are accomplished by a single act and are at once perfected in their execution are called agreements, conventions, and pactions.

Personal treaties relate exclusively to the persons of the contracting parties, such as family alliances, and treaties guaranteeing the throne to a particular sovereign and his family. As they relate to the persons, they expire of course on the death of the sovereign or the extinction of his family.

Real treaties relate solely to the subject-matters of the convention, independently of the persons of the contracting parties, and continue to bind the state although there may be changes in its constitution or in the persons of its rulers. Vattel, Law of Nat. b. 2, c. 12, §§ 183–197; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law, § 29.

On the part of the United States, treaties are made by the president, by and with the consent of the senate, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur. Const. art. 2, s. 2, n. 2.

No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; Const. art. 1, s. 10, n. 1; nor shall any state, without the consent of congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power; id. art. 1, sec. 10, n. 2; 3 Story, Const. § 1395.

A treaty is declared to be the supreme law of the land, and is, therefore, obligatory on courts; 1 Cra. 103; 1 Wash. C. C. 322; 1 Paine, 55; whenever it operates of itself without the aid of a legislative provision; but when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, and either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not to the judicial, department, and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule of the court; 2 Pet. 314. It need hardly be said that a treaty cannot change the constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. The effect of treaties and acts of congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of congress, and an act of congress may supersede a prior treaty; and this is true both of treaties with Indians and foreign nations; per Swayne, J., in 11 Wall. 620; so in 8 Op. Atty.-Gen. 354. A treaty changes the pre-existing laws, and must be so regarded by the courts; 1 Cra. 37; 6 Op. Atty.-Gen. 291.

As affecting the rights of contracting governments, a treaty is binding from the date of its signature, and the exchange of signatures has a retroactive effect, confirming the treaty from its date; but a different rule prevails when the treaty operates on individual rights; 9 Wall. 32.

The law of the interpretation of treaties is substantially the same as in the case of other contracts; Woolsey, Int. Law, 185.

See Story, Const.; Sergeant, Const. Law; 4 Hall, L. J. 461; Wheat. 161; 3 Dall. 199; 1 Kent, *165, *284; see 3 Law Mag. & Rev., 4 series, 91 (On the Obligation of Treaties).

TREATY OF PEACE. A treaty of peace is an agreement or contract made by belligerent powers, in which they agree to lay down their arms, and by which they stipulate the conditions of peace and regulate the manner in which it is to be restored and supported. Vattel, b. 4, c. 2, § 9.

TREBLE COSTS. In English Practice. The taxed costs and three-fourths the same added thereto. It is computed by adding one-half for double costs, and in addition one-half of one-half for treble costs. 1 Chitty, Bail, 137; 1 Chitty, Pr. 27.

In American Law. In Pennsylvania the rule is different: when an act of assembly gives treble costs, the party is allowed three times the usual costs, with the exception that the fees of the officers are not to be trebled when they are not regularly or usually payable by the defendant; 2 Rawle, 201.

And in New York the directions of the statute are to be strictly pursued, and the costs are to be trebled; 2 Dunl. Pr. 731.

TREBLE DAMAGES. In actions arising ex contractu, some statutes give treble damages; and these statutes have been liberally construed to mean actually treble damages: for example, if the jury give twenty dollars damages for a forcible entry, the court will award forty dollars more, so as to make the total amount of damages sixty dollars; 4 B. & C. 154; M'Clel. 567. See PATENT.

The construction on the words treble damages is different from that which has been put on the words treble costs. See 6 S. & R. 288; 1 Browne, Penn. 9; 1 Cow. 160, 175, 584; 8 id. 115.

TREBUCKET. The name of an engine of punishment, said to be synonymous with tumbrel.

TREE. A woody plant, which in respect of thickness and height grows greater than any other plant.

Trees are part of the real estate while growing and before they are severed from the freehold; but as soon as they are cut down they are personal property.

Some trees are timber-trees, while others do not bear that denomination. See TIMBER; 2 Bla. Com. 281.

Trees belong to the owner of the land where they grow; but if the roots go out of one man's land into that of another, or the branches spread over the adjoining estates, such roots or branches may be cut off by the owner of the land into which they thus grow; Rolle, 394; 3 Bulstr. 198; Viner, Abr. Trees (E), Nuisance (W 2); 1 Suppl. to Ves. Jr. 138; 2 Suppl. Ves. Ch. 162, 448; 6 Ves. Ch. 109.

When the roots grow into the adjoining land, the owner of such land may lawfully claim a right to hold the tree in common with the owner of the land where it was planted; but if the branches only overshadow the adjoining land, and the roots do not enter it, the tree wholly belows to the owner of the estate where the roots grow; 1 Ld. Raym. 737. See 1 Pick. 224; 6 N. H. 430; 7 Conn. 125; 11 Co. 50; Hob. 310; 2 Rolle, 141; 5 B. & Ald. 600; Washb. Easem.;

Code Civ. art. 671; Pardessus, Tr. des Servitudes, 297; Dalloz, Dict. Servitudes, art. 3, § 8; F. Moore, 812; Plowd. 470; 5 B. & C. 897. When the tree grows directly on the boundary-line, so that the line passes through it, it is the property of both owners, whether it be marked as a boundary or not; 12 N. H. 454.

TRESAILE, or TRESAYLE. The grandfather's grandfather. 1 Bla. Com. 186.

TRESPASS. Any misfeasance or act of one man whereby another is injuriously treated or damnified. 3 Bla. Com. 208; 7 Conn. 125.

Any unlawful act committed with violence, actual or implied, to the person, property, or rights of another.

Any unauthorized entry upon the realty of another to the damage thereof.

The word is used oftener in the last two somewhat restricted significations than in the first sense here given. In determining the nature of the act, neither the amount of violence or the intent with which it is offered, nor the extent of the damage accomplished or the purpose for which the act was committed, are of any importance: since a person who enters upon the land of another without leave, to lead off his own runaway horse, and who breaks a blade of grass in so doing, commits a trespass; 2 Humphr. 325; 6 Johns. 5.

It is said that some damage must be committed to make an act a trespass. It is undoubtedly true that damage is required to constitute a trespass for which an action will lie; but, so far as the tort itself is concerned, it seems more than doubtful if the mere commission of an act affecting another, without legal authority, does not constitute trespass, though until damage is done the law will not regard it, inasmuch as the law does not regard trifles.

The distinction between the different classes of trespass is of importance in determining the nature of the remedy.

A trespass committed with force is said to be done vi et armis; one committed by entry upon the realty, by breaking the close.

In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover damages for the injury sustained by the plaintiff, as the immediate consequence of some wrong done forcibly to his person or property, against the person committing the same.

The action lies for injuries to the person of the plaintiff: as, by assault and battery, wounding, imprisonment, and the like; 9 Vt. 352; 6 Blackf. 375.

It lies, also, for forcible injuries to the person of another, whereby a direct injury is done to the plaintiff in regard to his rights as parent, master, etc.; 2 Aik. 465; 2 Caines, 292; 8 S. & R. 36. It does not lie for mere non-feasance, nor where the matter affected was not tangible.

The action lies for injuries to personal property, which may be committed by the several acts of unlawfully striking, chasing if alive, and carrying away to the damage of the plaintiff, a personal chattel; 1 Wms. Saund. 84, nn. 2, 3; Fitzh. N. B. 86; Cro. Jac. 362; of which another is the owner and in possession; 2 Root, 209; 5 Vt. 97; and for the removal or injury of inanimate personal property; 12 Me. 122; 13 Pick. 139; 5 Johns. 348; of which another has the possession, actual or constructive; 21 Pick. 369; 13 Johns. 141; 1 N. H. 110; 4 J. J. Marsh. 18; 2 Bail. So. C. 466; 4 Munf. 444; 6 Blackf. 136; 4 Ill. 9; 6 W. & S. 323; without the owner's assent. A naked possession or right to immediate possession is sufficient to support this action; 1 Term, 480; 7 Johns. 535; 5 Vt. 274; 1 Penn. 238; 17 S. & R. 251; 11 Mass. 70; 11 Vt. 521; 1 Ired. 163; 10 Vt. 165. See TRESPASSER.

The action lies also for injuries to the realty consequent upon entering without right upon another man's land (breaking his close). The inclosure may be purely imaginary; 3 Bla. Com. 209; 1 D. & B. 371; but reaches to the sky and to the centre of the earth; 19 Johns. 381.

The plaintiff must be in possession with some title; 5 East, 485; 9 Johns. 61; 1 N. & M'C. 356; 10 Conn. 225; 6 Rand. 8, 556; 4 Watts, 377; 4 Pick. 305; 4 Bibb, 218; 2 Hill, So. C. 466; 1 Harr. & J. Md. 295; 31 Penn. 304; 5 Harr. Del. 320; 11 Ired. 417; though mere title is sufficient where no one is in possession; 2 Ala. 229; 1 Wend. 466; 1 Vt. 485; 8 Pick. 333; 4 D. & B. 68; as in case of an owner to the centre of a highway; 4 N. H. 36; 1 Penn. 336; see 17 Pick. 357; and mere possession is sufficient against a wrong-doer; 9 Ala. 82; 1 Rice, 368; 23 Ga. 590; see 22 Pick. 295; and the possession may be by an agent; 3 M'Cord, 422; but not by a tenant; 8 Pick. 235; 1 Hill, So. C. 260; see 13 Ind. 64; other than a tenant at will; 15 Pick. 102.

An action will not lie unless some damage is committed; but slight damage only is required; 2 Johns. 357; 4 Mass. 266.

Some damage must have been done to sustain the action; 2 Bay, 421; though it may have been very slight: as, breaking glass; 4 Mass. 140.

The action will not lie where the defendant has a justification sufficient to excuse the act committed, though he acted without authority from the owner or the person affected; 8 Law Rep. 77. See JUSTIFICATION; TRESPASSER. Accident may in some cases excuse a trespass; 7 Vt. 62; 4 M'Cord, 61; 12 Me. 67.

The declaration must contain a concise statement of the injury complained of, whether to the person, personal or real property, and it must allege that the injury was committed vi et armis and contra pacem. See CONTINUANDO.

The plea of not guilty raises the general issue, and under it the defendant may give in evidence any facts which show that the property was not in possession of the plaintiff rightfully as against the defendant at the time of the injury, or that the injury was not committed by the defendant with force.

Other matters must, in general, be pleaded specially. See TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM. Matters in justification, as, authority by law; 3 Hill, N. Y. 619; 4 Mo. 1; defence of the defendant's person or property, taking a distress on premises other than those demised, etc.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 439; custom to enter; 4 Pick. 145; right of way; 7 Mass. 385; etc., must be specially pleaded.

Judgment is for the damages assessed by the jury when for the plaintiff, and for costs when for the defendant.

TRESPASS DE BONIS ASPORTATIS (Lat. de bonis asportatis, for goods which have been carried away).

In Practice. A form of action brought by the owner of goods to recover damages for unlawfully taking and carrying them away. 1 Me. 117.

It is no answer to the action that the defendant has returned the goods; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 36 (H).

TRESPASS FOR MESNE PROFITS. A form of action supplemental to an action of ejectment, brought against the tenant in possession to recover the profits which he has unlawfully received during the time of his occupation. 3 Bla. Com. 205; 4 Burr. 1668. The person who actually received the profits is to be made defendant, whether defendant to the ejectment or not; 11 Wheat. 280. It lies after a recovery in ejectment; 5 Cow. 33; 11 S. & R. 55; or entry; 6 N. H. 391; but not trespass to try title; Const. 102; 1 M'Cord, 264; and the judgment in ejectment is conclusive evidence against the defendant for all profits which have accrued since the date of the demise stated in the declaration in ejectment; 1 Blackf. 56; 2 Rawle, 49; but suit for any antecedent profits is open to a new defence, and the tenant may plead the statute of limitations as to all profits accruing beyond the period fixed by law; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 205, n.; 2 Root, 440.

TRESPASS ON THE CASE. The form of action by which a person seeks to recover damages caused by an injury unaccompanied with force or which results indirectly from the act of the defendant. It is more generally called, simply, case. See CASE.

TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT (Lat. quare clausum fregit, because he had broken the close). The form of action which lies to recover damages for injuries to the realty consequent upon entry without right upon the plaintiff's land.

Mere possession is sufficient to enable one having it to maintain the action; 12 Wend. 488; 14 Pick. 297; 3 A. K. Marsh. 331; 1 Harr. N. J. 335; 22 Me. 350; 5 Blackf. 465; 1 Hawks, 485; 7 Gill & J. 321; see 1 Halst. 1; except as against one claiming under the rightful owner; 6 Halst. 197; 6 N. H. 9; 2 Ill. 181; 7 Mo. 333; 3 Metc. Mass. 239; and no one but the tenant can have the action; 13 Me. 87; 19 Wend. 507; 9 Vt. 383; except in case of tenancies at will or by a less secure holding; 8 Pick. 333; 15 id. 102; 7 Metc. Mass. 147; 1 Dev. 435.

The action lies where an animal of the defendant breaks the plaintiff's close, to his injury; 7 W. & S. 367; 31 Penn. 328.

TRESPASS VI ET ARMIS (Lat. vi et armis, with force and arms). The form of action which lies to recover damages for an injury which is the immediate consequence of a forcible wrongful act done to the person or personal property; 2 Const. 294. It is distinguished from case in this, that the injury in case is the indirect result of the act done. See CASE.

TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE. The name of the action used in South Carolina for the recovery of the possession of real property and damages for any trespass committed upon the same by the defendant.

It was substituted by the act of 1791 in place of the action of ejectment, and is in form an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, with the single exception that upon the writ of capias ad respondendum and the copy writ a notice must be indorsed that "the action is brought to try the title as well as for damages." The action must be brought in the name of the real owner of the land; and he can only recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of his adversary's. It is usual to appoint one or more surveyors, who furnish at the trial a map or plot of the land in dispute; and with reference to that the verdict is rendered by the jury. A trespass must be proved to have been committed by the defendant or his agent; and the plaintiff, if he recovers at all, is entitled to a verdict for the value of the rent down to the time of the trial. The judgment for the plaintiff is only for the damages; but upon that he is entitled to a writ of habere facias possessionem.

TRESPASSER. One who does an unlawful act, or a lawful act in an unlawful manner, to the injury of the person or property of another.

Any act which is injurious to the property of another renders the doer a trespasser, unless he has authority to do it from the owner or custodian; 14 Me. 44; 5 Blackf. 237; 8 N. H. 220; 18 Pick. 110; or by law; 2 Conn. 700; 3 Binn. 215; 10 Johns. 138; 6 Ohio, 144; 12 Ala. 257; 1 N. H. 339; 13 Me. 250; 6 Ill. 401; 1 Humphr. 272; and in this latter case any defect in his authority, as, want of jurisdiction by the court; 11 Conn. 95; 3 Cow. 206; defective or void proceedings; 16 Me. 33; 12 N. H. 148; 12 Vt. 661; 2 Dev. 370; misapplication of process; 6 Monr. 296; 14 Me. 312; 17 Vt. 412; renders him liable as a trespasser.

So, too, the commission of a legal act in an illegal manner, as, the execution of legal process illegally; 2 Johns. Cas. 27; 5 Me. 291; 8 Pick. 455; abuse of legal process; Breese, 143; 16 Ala. 67; exceeding the authority conferred by the owner; 13 Me. 115; or by law; 13 Mass. 520; 10 S. & R. 399; 17 Vt. 609; renders a man a trespasser.

In all these cases, where a man begins an act which is legal by reason of some authority given him, and then becomes a trespasser by subsequent acts, he is held to be a trespasser ab initio (from the beginning); q. v.

A person may be a trespasser by ordering such an act done as makes the doer a trespasser; 14 Johns. 406; 16 Ov. 13; 10 Pick. 543; or by subsequently assenting, in some cases; 1 Rawle, 121; 1 B. Monr. 96; or assisting, though not present; 2 Litt. 240.

TRESPASSER AB INITIO. A term applied to denote that one who has commenced a lawful act in a proper manner, has performed some unlawful act, or some lawful act in an unlawful manner, so connected with the previous act that he is to be regarded as having acted unlawfully from the beginning. See 6 Carpenters' Case, 8 Co. 146; s. c. 1 Sm. L. C. *216; 5 Taunt. 198; 7 Ad. & E. 176; 11 M. & W. 740; 15 Johns. 401. See AB INITIO.

TRET. An allowance made for the water or dust that may be mixed with any commodity. It differs from tare, q. v.

TRIAL. In Practice. The examination before a competent tribunal, according to the laws of the land, of the facts put in issue in a cause, for the purpose of determining such issue. 4 Mas. 232.

"Trial," as used in the acts of congress of July 27, 1866, and March 2, 1867, appropriately designates a trial by the jury of an issue which will determine the facts in an action at law; and "final hearing," in contradistinction to hearings upon interlocutory matters, the hearing of a cause upon its merits by a judge sitting in equity; 112 Mass. 343; 19 Wall. 214.

Trial by certificate is a mode of trial allowed by the English law in those cases where the evidence of the person certifying is the only proper criterion of the point in dispute. For, when the fact in question lies out of the cognizance of the court, the judges must rely on the solemn averments or information of persons in such station as affords them the most clear and complete knowledge of the truth.

As, therefore, such evidence, if given to a jury, must always be conclusive, the law, to save trouble and circuity, permits the fact to be determined upon such certificate merely; 3 Bla. Com. 333; Steph. Pl. 122.

Trial by grand assize is a peculiar mode of trial allowed in writs of right. See ASSIZE; GRAND ASSIZE.

Trial by inspection or examination is a form of trial in which the judges of the court, upon the testimony of their own senses, decide the point in dispute.

This trial takes place when, for the greater expedition of a cause, in some point or issue being either the principal question or arising collaterally out of it, being evidently the object of sense, the judges of the court, upon the testimony of their own senses, shall decide the point in dispute. For where the affirmative or negative of a question is matter of such obvious determination, it is not thought necessary to summon a jury to decide it,—who are properly called in to inform the conscience of the court in respect of dubious facts; and, therefore, when the fact from its nature must be evident in the court either from ocular demonstration or other irrefragable proof, there the law departs from its usual resort, the verdict of twelve men, and relies on its judgment alone. For example, if a defendant pleads in abatement of the suit that the plaintiff is dead, and one appears and calls himself the plaintiff, which the defendant denies, in this case the judges shall determine by inspection and examination whether he be plaintiff or not; 9 Co. 30; 3 Bla. Com. 331; Steph. Pl. 128.

Judges of courts of equity frequently decide facts upon mere inspection. The most familiar examples are those of cases where the plaintiff prays an injunction on an allegation of piracy or infringement of a patent or copyright; 5 Ves. Ch. 709; and the cases there cited. And see 2 Atk. 141; 2 B. & C. 80; 4 Ves. 681; 2 Russ. Ch. 385; 1 Ves. & B. 67; Cro. Jac. 230; 1 Dall. 166.

Trial by jury is that form of trial in which the facts are determined by twelve men impartially selected from the body of the county. See JURY.

To insure fairness, this mode of trial must be in public: the parties to the suit, or, in a criminal trial, the prisoner, must be present; but the continuance of the trial and the taking of testimony during the brief absence of the prisoner from the court-room on business connected with the trial, has been held not to be error; 25 Alb. L. J. 303; 43 N. Y. 1. See PRESENCE. Prisoners may be manacled during the trial, at the discretion of the court; 1 So. Law Jour. 348; although it has been rarely done in modern times; and any reasonable means may be taken to insure the safety of the prisoner; but his counsel must be allowed free access to him at the trial. See 15 Am. L. Rev. 809. The trial is conducted by selecting a jury in the manner prescribed by the local statutes, who must be sworn to try the matter in dispute according to law and the evidence. Evidence is then given by the party on whom rests the onus probandi or burden of the proof: as the witnesses are called by a party they are questioned by him, and after they have been examined, which is called an examination in chief, they are subject to a cross-examination by the other party as to every part of their testimony. Having examined all his witnesses, the party who supports the affirmative of the issue closes; and the other party then calls his witnesses to explain his case or support his part of the issue; these are in the same manner liable to a cross-examination.

In case the parties should differ as to what is to be given in evidence, the judge must decide the matter, and his decision is conclusive upon the parties so far as regards the trial; but bills of exceptions may be taken; see BILL OF EXCEPTIONS; Wells, Law & F.; motion in arrest of judgment made, or other proper means adopted, so that the matter may be examined before another tribunal. When the evidence has been closed, the counsel for the party who supports the affirmative of the issue then addresses the jury, by recapitulating the evidence and applying the law to the facts and showing on what particular points he rests his case. The opposite counsel then addresses the jury, enforcing in like manner the facts and the law as applicable to his side of the case; to which the other counsel has a right to reply. It is then the duty of the judge to sum up the evidence and explain to the jury the law applicable to the case; this is called his charge. See CHARGE; Thompson, Ch. Jury. The jurors then retire to deliberate upon their verdict, and, after having agreed upon it, they come into court and deliver it in public.

In case they cannot agree, they may, in cases of necessity, be discharged; but it is said in capital cases they cannot be. See DISCHARGE OF A JURY; JEOPARDY.

A trial by jury in criminal cases does not essentially differ from the trial of a civil action; but the accused is entitled to some privileges in the selection of jurors who are to try him, in the former case, which do not exist in the latter. Of these the right of challenge, or of taking exception to the jurors, is much the most extensive. See CHALLENGE. He has a right to be distinctly informed of the nature of the charge against him, with a copy of the indictment. He is also entitled to a list of the jurors who are to pass upon his case, and of the names of the witnesses who will testify, a certain number of days before the trial. And the jury must deliberate and decide upon the principle that every man is to be presumed innocent until he is proved to be guilty; and, as a necessary consequence, they cannot convict him if they have any reasonable doubt of his guilt. See Worthington, Juries; Archb. N. P; Graham & W. New Trials; 3 Bla. Com. c. 22; 15 S. & R. 61; DUE PROCESS OF LAW; JURY.

Trial at nisi prius. Originally, a trial before a justice in eyre. Afterwards, by Westm. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 30, before a justice of assize; 3 Bla. Com. 353. See NISI PRIUS. At nisi prius there is, generally, only one judge, sometimes more. 3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 39. In the United States, a trial before a single judge.

Trial by the record. This trial applies to cases where an issue of nul tiel record is joined in any action. If on one side a record be asserted to exist, and the opposite party deny its existence under the form of traverse, that there is no such record remaining in court, as alleged, and issue be joined thereon, this is called an issue of nul tiel record; and the court awards, in such a case, a trial by inspection and examination of the record. Upon this the party affirming its existence is bound to produce it in court on a day given for the purpose, and if he fail to do so, judgment is given for his adversary.

The trial by record is not only in use when an issue of this kind happens to arise for decision, but it is the only legitimate mode of trying such issue; and the parties cannot put themselves upon the country; Steph. Pl. 122; 2 Bla. Com. 330.

Trial by wager of battel. In the old English law, this was a barbarous mode of trying facts, among a rude people, founded on the supposition that heaven would always interpose and give the victory to the champions of truth and innocence. This mode of trial was abolished in England as late as the stat. 59 Geo. III. c. 46, A.D. 1818. It never was in force in the United States. See 3 Bla. Com. 337; 1 Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 188. See a modern case, 1 B. & Ald. 405. See WAGER OF BATTEL.

Trial by wager of law. This mode of trial has fallen into complete disuse; but, in point of law, it seems in England to be still competent in most cases to which it anciently applied. The most important and best-established of these cases is the issue of nil debet, arising in action of debt on simple contract, or the issue of non detinet, in an action of detinue. In the declaration in these actions, as in almost all others, the plaintiff concludes by offering his suit (of which the ancient meaning was followers or witnesses, though the words are now retained as mere form) to prove the truth of his claim. On the other hand, if the defendant, by a plea of nil debet or non detinet, deny the debt or detention, he may conclude by offering to establish the truth of such plea "against the plaintiff and his suit, in such manner as the court shall direct." Upon this the court awards the wager of law; Co. Ent. 119 a; Lilly, Ent. 467; 3 Chitty, Pl. 479; and the form of this proceeding, when so awarded, is that the defendant brings into court with him eleven of his neighbors and for himself makes oath that he does not owe the debt or detain the property alleged; and then the eleven also swear that they believe him to speak the truth; and the defendant is then entitled to judgment; 3 Bla. Com. 343; Steph. Pl. 124. Blackstone compares this mode of trial to the canonical purgation of the catholic clergy, and to the decisory oath of the civil law. See OATH, DECISORY; WAGER OF LAW.

Trial by witnesses is a species of trial by witnesses, or per testes, without the intervention of a jury.

This is the only method of trial known to the civil law, in which the judge is left to form in his own breast his sentence upon the credit of the witnesses examined; but it is very rarely used in the common law, which prefers the trial by jury in almost every instance.

In England, when a widow brings a writ of dower and the tenant pleads that the husband is not dead, this, being looked upon as a dilatory plea, is in favor of the widow, and, for greater expedition, allowed to be tried by witnesses examined before the judges; and so, says Finch, shall no other case in our law; Finch, Law, 423. But Sir Edward Coke mentions others: as, to try whether the tenant in a real action was duly summoned; or, the validity of a challenge to a juror: so that Finch's observation must be confined to the trial of direct and not collateral issues. And, in every case, Sir Edward Coke lays it down that the affirmative must be proved by two witnesses at least; 3 Bla. Com. 336.

Trial at bar. A species of trial now seldom resorted to, and, as to civil causes, abolished by the Judicature Act, 1875, was one held before all the judges of one of the supreme courts of Westminster, or before a quorum representing the full court. The celebrated case of Reg. vs. Castro, otherwise Tichborne vs. Orton, L. R. 9 Q. B. 350, was a trial at bar; Brown, Dict. The rules of English practice in trials in the high court of justice will be found in the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. xxxvi., amended by rules of the court of Dec. 1, 1875. 2 Tidd's Pr. 747; 1 Archbold, Pr. 874.

TRIAL LIST. A list of cases marked down for trial for any one term.

TRIBUNAL. The seat of a judge; the place where he administers justice. The whole body of judges who compose a jurisdiction. The jurisdiction which the judges exercise.

The term is Latin, and derives its origin from the elevated seat where the tribunes administered justice.

TRIBUNAUX DE COMMERCE. In French Law. Certain courts composed of a president, judges and substitutes, which take cognizance of all cases between merchants, and of disagreements among partners. Appeals lie from them to the courts of justice. Brown, Dict.

TRIBUTE. A contribution which is sometimes raised by the sovereign from his subjects to sustain the expenses of the state. It is also a sum of money paid by one nation to another under some pretended right. Wolff, § 1145.

TRINEPOS (Lat.). In Roman Law. Great-grandson of a grandchild.

TRINEPTIS (Lat.). Great-granddaughter of a grandchild.

TRINITY HOUSE. See ELDER BRETHREN.

TRINITY SITTINGS. See LONDON AND MIDDLESEX SITTINGS.

TRINITY TERM. In English Law. One of the four terms of the courts: it begins on the 22d day of May and ends on the 12th of June. Stat. 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV. c. 70. It was formerly a movable term. See TERM.

TRINODA NECESSITAS (Lat.). The threefold necessary public duties to which all lands were liable by Saxon law,—viz., for repairing bridges, for maintaining castles or garrisons, and for expeditions to repel invasions. In the immunities enumerated in kings' grants, these words were inserted, "exceptis his tribus, expeditione, pontis et arcis constructione." Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 46; 1 Bla. Com. 263.

TRIORS. In Practice. Persons appointed according to law to try whether a person challenged to the favor is or is not qualified to serve on the jury. They do not exceed two in number, without the consent of the prosecutor and defendant, or unless some special case is alleged by one of them, or when only one juror has been sworn and two triors are appointed with him. Co. Litt. 158 a; Bacon, Abr. Juries (E 12).

The method of selecting triors is thus explained. Where the challenge is made to the first juror, the court will appoint two indifferent persons to be triors; if they find him indifferent, he shall be sworn and join the triors in determining the next challenge. But when two jurors have been found impartial and have been sworn, then the office of the triors will cease, and every subsequent challenge will be decided upon by the jurymen. If more than two jurymen have been sworn, the court may assign any two of them to determine the challenges. To the triors thus chosen no challenges can be admitted.

The triors examine the juryman challenged, and decide upon his fitness; 3 Park. Cr. Cas. 467; 5 Cal. 347; 1 Mich. 451; 10 Ired. 295. Their decision is final. They are liable to punishment for misbehavior in office; 4 Sharws. Bla. Com. 353, n. 8; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 549; 15 S. & R. 156; 21 Wend. 509; 2 Green, N. J. 195. The office is abolished in many of the states, the judge acting in their place; 23 Ga. 57; 43 Me. 11.

The lords also chosen to try a peer, when indicted for felony, in the court of the Lord High Steward, q. v., are called triors. Mox. & W.

TRIPARTITE. Consisting of three parts: as, a deed tripartite, between A of the first part, B of the second part, and C of the third part.

TRIPLICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The reply of the plaintiff (actor) to the rejoinder (duplicatio) of the defendant (reus). It corresponds to the surrejoinder of common law. Inst. 4. 14; Bracton, l. 5, t. 5, c. 1.

TRITAVUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. The male ascendant in the sixth degree. For the female ascendant in the same degree the term is tritavia. In forming genealogical tables this convenient term is still used.

TRITHING (Sax. trithinga). The third part of a county, consisting of three or four hundreds.

A court within the circuit of the trithing, in the nature of a court-leet, but inferior to the county court. Camd. 102. The ridings of Yorkshire are only a corruption of try-things. 1 Bla. Com. 116: Spelm. Gloss. 52; Cowel.

TRIUMVIRI CAPITALES, or TRE-VIRI, or TRESVIRI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Officers who had charge of the prison, through whose intervention punishments were inflicted. Sallust, in Catilin. They had eight lictors to execute their orders. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

TRIVIAL. Of small importance. It is a rule in equity that a demurrer will lie to a bill on the ground of the triviality of the matter in dispute, as being below the dignity of the court. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4237. See 4 Johns. Ch. 183; 4 Paige, Ch. 364. See MAXIMS, De minimis, etc.

TRONAGE. In English Law. A customary duty or toll for weighing wool: so called because it was weighed by a common trona, or beam. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 12.

TROVER (Fr. trouver, to find). In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover damages against one who has, without right, converted to his own use goods or personal chattels in which the plaintiff has a general or special property.

The action was originally an action of trespass on the case where goods were found by the defendant and retained against the plaintiff's rightful claim. The manner of gaining possession soon came to be disregarded, as the substantial part of the action is the conversion to the defendant's use; so that the action lies whether the goods came into the defendant's possession by finding or otherwise, if he fails to deliver them upon the rightful claim of the plaintiff. It differs from detinue and replevin in this, that it is brought for damages and not for the specific articles; and from trespass in this, that the injury is not necessarily a forcible one, as trover may be brought in any case where trespass for injury to personal property will lie; but the converse is not true. In case possession was gained by a trespass, the plaintiff by bringing his action in this form waives his right to damages for the taking, and is confined to the injury resulting from the conversion; 17 Pick. 1; 17 Me. 434; 7 T. B. Monr. 209.

The action lies for one who has a general or absolute property; Bull. N. P. 33; 2 Hill, So. C. 587; 25 Me. 220; 7 Ired. 418; 23 Ga. 484; 22 Mo. 495; together with a right to immediate possession; 1 Ry. & M. 99; 22 Pick. 585; 15 Wend. 474; 6 Blackf. 470; 9 Yerg. 262; 1 Brev. 495; 4 D. & B. 323; 5 Penn. 466; 11 Ala. 859; 42 Me. 197; 19 N. H. 419; as, for example, a vendor of property sold upon condition not fulfilled; 2 Brev. 324; 1 Meigs, 76; 19 Vt. 371; as to the effect of an intervening lien, see 7 Term, 12; 2 Cr. M. & R. 659; 1 Wash. C. C. 174; 1 Hayw. 193; 15 Mass. 242; 6 S. & R. 300; 2 N. H. 319; 6 Wend. 603; or a special property, including actual possession as against a stranger; 2 Saund. 47; 1 B. & Ad. 159; 6 Johns. 195; 12 id. 403; 13 Wend. 63; 15 Mass. 242; 2 N. H. 66, 319; 11 Vt. 351; 4 Blackf. 395; as, for example, a sheriff holding under rightful process; 1 Pick. 232, 389; 9 id. 164; 1 N. H. 289; 7 Johns. 32; 4 Vt. 81; 12 Me. 328; 2 Murph. 19; a mortgagee in possession; 5 Cow. 323; 6 Harr. & J. 100; 3 Brev. 68; and see 12 N. H. 382; 31 Ala. N. S. 447; 23 Conn. 70; a simple bailee, 15 Mass. 242; Wright, Ohio, 744; or even a finder merely; 9 Cow. 670; 2 Ala. 320; 3 Bibb, 284; 3 Harr. Del. 608; and including lawful custody and a right of detention as against the general owner of the goods or chattels; 2 Taunt. 268; 8 Wend. N. Y. 445; 3 Blackf. 419; 2 Rich. 13. An executor or administrator is held an absolute owner by relation from the death of the decedent; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 641; 9 Metc. 504; 2 Ga. 119; 1 Rice, 264, 285; 3 Sneed, 484; and he may maintain an action for a conversion in the lifetime of the decedent; T. U. P. Charlt. 261; 1 Root, 289; 6 Mass. 394; and is liable for a conversion by the decedent; 1 Hayw. 21, 308, 362.

The property affected must be some personal chattel; 3 S. & R. 513; 3 N. H. 484; 2 D. Chipm. 116; specifically set off as the plaintiff's; 4 B. & C. 948; 6 id. 360; 3 Pick. 38; 7 Ired. 370; 5 Jones, No. C. 16; 20 Vt. 144; including title deeds; 2 Yeates, 537; a copy of a record; Hardr. 111; 11 Pick. 492; money, though not tied up; 4 Taunt. 24; 4 E. D. Smith, 162; negotiable securities; 4 B. & Ald. 1; 3 B. & C. 45; 3 Johns. 432; 1 Root, 125, 221; 1 Pick. 503; 3 Vt. 99; 5 Blackf. 419; 27 Ala. N. S. 228; animals ferœ naturæ, but reclaimed; 10 Johns. 102; trees and crops severed from the inheritance; 1 Term, 55; 3 Mo. 137, 393; 7 Cow. 95; 15 Mass. 204; 8 Penn. 244; 4 Cal. 184. It will not lie for property in custody of the law; 9 Johns. 381; if rightfully held; see 2 Ala. 576; 1 Add. Penn. 376; or to which the title must be determined by a court of peculiar jurisdiction only; 1 Cam. & N. 115; see 14 Johns. 273; or where the bailee has lost the property, or had it stolen, or it has been destroyed by want of due care; 2 Ired. 98. See CONVERSION.

There must have been a conversion of the property by the defendant; 5 T. B. Monr. 89; 8 Ark. 204. And a waiver of such conversion will defeat the action; 20 Pick. 90. For what constitutes a conversion, see CONVERSION; also an article on Conversion by Purchase in 15 Am. L. Rev. 363; and on Demand and Refusal in 6 So. L. Rev. 822.

The declaration must state a rightful possession of the goods by the plaintiff; Hempst. 160; must describe the goods with convenient certainty, though not so accurately as in detinue; Bull. N. P. 32; 5 Gray, 12; must formally allege a finding by the defendant, and must aver a conversion; 12 N. Y. 313. It is not indispensable to state the price or value of the thing converted; 2 Wash. Va. 192.

The plea of not guilty raises the general issue.

Judgment when for the plaintiff is that he recover his damages and costs, or, in some states, in the alternative, that the defendant restore the goods or pay, etc.; 19 Ga. 579; when for the defendant, that he recover his costs. The measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest; 17 Pick. 1; 7 T. B. Monr. 209; 38 Me. 174; 26 Ala. N. s. 213; 21 Barb. 92; 30 Vt. 307; 19 Mo. 467.

TRUCE. In International Law. An agreement between belligerent parties by which they mutually engage to forbear all acts of hostility against each other for some time, the war still continuing. Burlamaqui, N. & P. Law, pt. 4, c. 11, § 1.

Truces are of several kinds: general, extending to all the territories and dominions of both parties; and particular, restrained to particular places: as, for example, by sea, and not by land, etc. Id. part 4, c. 11, § 5. They are also absolute, indeterminate, and general; or limited and determined to certain things: for example, to bury the dead. Ib. idem. See 1 Kent, 159; Halleck, Int. Law, 654; Wheaton. Int. Law, 682.

During the continuance of a truce, either party may do within his own territory or the limits prescribed by the armistice, whatever he could do in time of peace, e. g. levy and march troops, collect provisions, receive reinforcements from his allies, or repair the fortifications of a place not actually besieged; but neither party can do what the continuance of hostilities would have prevented him from doing, e. g., repair fortifications of a besieged place; and all things, the possession of which was especially contested when the truce was made, must remain in their antecedent places; Vattel, Dr. des Gens. §§ 245, 251; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law, § 403.

TRUCE OF GOD (Law L. treuza Dei; Sax. treuge or trewa, from Germ. treu; Fr. trêve de Dieu). In the middle ages, a limitation of the right of private warfare introduced by the church. This truce provided that hostilities should cease on holidays, from Thursday evening to Sunday evening of each week, the whole season of Advent and Lent, and the octaves of great festivals. The penalty for breach of the truce was excommunication. The protection of this truce was also extended constantly to certain places, as, churches, convents, hospitals, etc., and certain persons, as, clergymen, peasants in the field, crusaders, and, in general, all defenceless persons. It was first introduced into Acquitaine in 1041, and into England under Edward the Confessor. 1 Rob. Charles V. App. n. xxi.

TRUE BILL. In Practice. Words indorsed on a bill of indictment when a grand jury, after having heard the witnesses for the government, are of opinion that there is sufficient cause to put the defendant on his trial. Formerly the indorsement was Billa vera when legal proceedings were in Latin; it is still the practice to write on the back of the bill Ignoramus when the jury do not find it to be a true bill; the better opinion is that the omission of the words a true bill does not vitiate an indictment; 11 Cush. 473; 13 N. H. 488. See 5 Me. 432; GRAND JURY.

TRUST. A right of property, real or personal, held by one party for the benefit of another.

A trust is merely what a use was before the statute of uses. It is an interest resting in conscience and equity, and the same rules apply to trusts in chancery now which were formerly applied to uses; 10 Johns. 506. A trust is a use not executed under the statute of Hen. VIII.; 3 Md. 505. The words use and trust are frequently used indifferently; see 3 Jarm. Wills, 531.

The party holding is called the trustee, and the party for whose benefit the right is held is called the cestui que trust, or, using a better term, the beneficiary.

Sometimes the equitable title of the beneficiary, sometimes the obligation of the trustee, and, again, the right held, is called the trust.

But the right of the beneficiary is in the trust; the obligation of the trustee results from the trust; and the right held is the subject-matter of the trust. Neither of them is the trust itself. All together they constitute the trust.

An equitable right, title, or interest in property, real or personal, distinct from its legal ownership.

A personal obligation for paying, delivering, or performing any thing where the person trusting has no real right or security, for by that act he confides altogether to the faithfulness of those intrusted.

An obligation upon a person, arising out of a confidence reposed in him, to apply property faithfully and according to such confidence; 4 Kent, 295; 2 Fonbl. Eq. 1; 1 Saunders, Uses and Tr. 6; Cooper, Eq. Pl. Introd. 27; 3 Bla. Com. 431.

The Roman fidei-commissa were, under the name of uses, first introduced by the clergy into England in the reign of Richard II. or Edward III., and while perseveringly prohibited by the clergy and wholly discountenanced by the courts of common law, they grew into public favor, and gradually developed into something like a regular branch of law, as the court of chancery rose into importance and power. For a long time the beneficiary, or cestui que trust, was without adequate protection; but the statute of uses, passed in 27 Henry VIII., gave adequate protection to the interests of the cestui que trust. Prior to this statute the terms use and trust were used, if not indiscriminately, at least without accurate distinction between them. The distinction, so far as there was one, was between passive uses, where the feoffee had no active duties imposed on him, and active trusts, where the feoffee had something to do in connection with the estate. The statute of uses sought to unite the seisin with the use, making no distinction between uses and trusts, the result being that, by a strict construction, both uses and trusts were finally taken out of its intended operation and were both included under the term trust. The statute was passed in 1538; but trusts did not become settled on their present basis till Lord Nottingham's time, in 1676; 2 Wash. R. P. Index, Trust; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 338.

A late writer shows clearly the distinction between the fidei commissa and a trust, that in the former there was no separation of the equitable and legal title, but there was simply a request, which afterwards became a duty imposed upon the gravatus to convey the inheritance to another person, either immediately or after a certain event; whereas, in the trust, the perfect ownership is decomposed into its constituent elements of legal title and beneficial interest, which are vested in different persons at the same time. Besides the fidei commissa arose out of testamentary dispositions; whereas English trusts, until the statute of Wills, were created only by conveyances inter vivos; Bisp. Eq. § 50; see 15 How. 367.

Active or special trusts are those in which the trustee has some duty to perform, so that the legal estate must remain in him or the trust be defeated.

Express trusts are those which are created in express terms in the deed, writing, or will. The terms to create an express trust will be sufficient if it can be fairly collected upon the face of the instrument that a trust was intended. Express trusts are usually found in preliminary sealed agreements, such as marriage articles, or articles for the purchase of land; in formal conveyances, such as marriage settlements, terms for years, mortgages, assignments for the payment of debts, raising portions, or other purposes; and in wills and testaments, when the bequests involve fiduciary interests for private benefit or public charity. They may be created even by parol; 6 W. & S. 97; except so far as forbidden by the Statute of Frauds.

Implied trusts are those which, without being expressed, are deducible from the nature of the transaction as matters of intent, or which are superinduced upon the transaction by operation of law, as matters of equity, independently of the particular intention of the parties. The term is used in this general sense, including constructive and resulting trusts (q. v.), and also in a more restricted sense, excluding those classes.

Constructive trusts are those which arise purely by construction of equity, and are entirely independent of any actual or presumed intention of the parties. Such trusts have not, technically, any element of fraud in them; Bisp. Eq. § 91. Under this branch of trusts it has been said that "wherever one person is placed in such relation to another, by the act or consent of that other, or the act of a third person, or the law, that he becomes interested for him, or interested with him in any subject of property or business, he is prohibited from acquiring rights in that subject antagonistic to the person with whose interest he has become associated." Note by Judge Hare to 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 62. The rule as to such trusts applies not only to persons standing in a direct fiduciary position towards others, such as trustees, attorneys, etc., but also to those who occupy any position out of which a similar duty ought in equity and good morals to arise: as against partners (4 Seld. 236); tenants in common (72 Penn. 442); mortgagees (43 Mo. 231), etc.; Bisp. Eq. § 93.

A trustee who buys at his own sale, even if public, will still be considered, at the option of the cestui que trust, a trustee; see 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 248. This is not upon the ground of fraud, but of public policy; see 13 Allen, 419. So if a person obtains from a trustee trust property without paying value for it, although without notice of the trust, he will in such case be held a trustee by construction; Bisp. Eq. § 95. And in case of a contract for the sale of land, equity considers the vendor as a trustee of the legal title for the purchaser; ibid.

Implied trusts do not come within the Statute of Frauds; 66 Penn. 237.

A passive or dry or simple trust is one which requires the performance of no duty by the trustee to carry out the trust, but by force of which the mere legal title rests in the trustee.

As to executory and executed trusts, see those titles.

Trusts may also be distinguished as public and private trusts. The former are constituted for the benefit either of the public at large or some particular portion of it answering to a particular description; while the latter are those wherein the beneficial interest is vested absolutely in one or more individuals who are, or may be within a certain time, definitely ascertained. Bisp. Eq. § 59.

A trust arises when property has been conferred upon one person and accepted by him for the benefit of another. The former is a trustee, and holds the legal title, and the latter is called the cestui que trust, or beneficiary. In order to originate a trust, two things are essential,—first, that the ownership conferred be connected with a right, or interest, or duty for the benefit of another; and, second, that the property be accepted on these conditions.

The modern trust includes not only those technical uses which were not executed by the Statute of Uses, but also equitable interests which never were considered uses, and did not therefore fall within the provisions of this statute. These equitable interests, in common with the unexecuted uses, received the name of trusts; Bisp. Eq. § 52; see 7 De G. M. & G. 422. The Statute of Uses provided that where one was seized to the use of another, the cestui que use should be deemed to be in lawful seizin and possession of the same estate in the land itself as he had in the use; ibid.

A trust which at the time of its creation is a passive trust will be executed by this statute, although the word trust instead of use is employed. But where a trust which has once been active becomes passive, such a trust is not necessarily executed by the statute. If the mere fact that the trustee had active duties to perform was the only circumstance that prevented the statute from operating, the trust will be executed when the active duties have ceased. But if the non-execution of the trust by the statute did not originally and solely depend upon the activity of the trust, the fact that the trust has ceased to be active will not of itself cause the statute to apply; but the trustee is then bound to convey the legal estate at the request of the cestui que trust; and after a great lapse of time, and in support of long-continued possession on the part of the person holding the beneficial interest, such a conveyance will be presumed; Bisp. Eq. § 55.

In Pennsylvania the courts have regarded some trusts not to be active which in England would have been considered active, and have held (59 Penn. 396) that whenever the entire beneficial interest is in the cestui que trust, there is no reason why the trust should not be considered as actually executed. No formal conveyance to him is necessary, though it will be decreed in order to dissipate a useless cloud upon the title. These subjects have of late years been very frequently investigated in that state. See Bisp. Eq.; Husb. Marr. Women.

When active duties are to be performed by the trustee, they will, generally, not be executed; Bisp. Eq. § 56; 5 Wall. 119, 168; though when there was a separate use for a feme sole not in contemplation of marriage, it was held that as this separate use was void, the trust fell, although the trustee had active duties to perform; 70 Penn. 201.

Before the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, §§ 7, 9, a trust, either in regard to real or personal estate, might have been created by parol as well as by writing. The statute required all trusts as to real estate to be in writing; 4 Kent, 305; Adams, Eq. 27; 5 Johns. 1; 15 Vt. 525.

No particular form of words is requisite to create a trust. The court will determine the intent from the general scope of the language; 10 Johns. 496; 4 Kent, 305.

The facts, however, to warrant the inference of a trust, must be more than loose and general declarations; but, on the other hand, parol declarations will not be received to contradict the inference of a trust in land fairly deducible from written declarations; 5 Johns. Ch. 2.

A trust, as to personal property, may be proved by parol evidence; 1 Bail. Ch. So. C. 510; 1 Hare, 158; Adams, Eq. 28; 3 Bla. Com. 431. A cestui que trust cannot, generally, hold the beneficial enjoyment of property free from the rights of his creditors; 1 Sm. L. C. 119; though a limitation over to another in case of the insolvency of the cestui que trust, is valid; Bisp. Eq. 61; 5 Wall. 441. But in Pennsylvania it is settled that the interest of the cestui que trust may be exempted from liability for his debts; 2 Rawle, 33; 7 W. & S. 19; 86 Penn. 276; see, also, 21 Conn. 8; 11 Gratt. 570; 42 Mo. 45; Bisp. Eq. § 61; 91 U. S. 716.

If a trustee dies, or fails or refuses to execute or accept the trust, or no trustee is named, the trust does not for that reason fail. It is a settled rule that the court of chancery will provide a trustee or attend to the execution of the trust; 2 Vern. 97; 4 Ves. Ch. 108; 10 Sim. 256; Adams, Eq. 36.

Trusts are interpreted by the ordinary rules of law, unless the contrary is expressed in the language of the trust; 15 Ind. 269; 3 Des. 256. Most of the states have special legislation upon the subject, making the systems of the different states too various for fuller development here.

The rules for the devolution of equitable estates are the same as those for the descent of legal titles; and fall under the operation of the various intestate acts; Bisp. Eq. § 60. If the legal title to real estate cannot be taken by an alien, the beneficial ownership cannot be enjoyed by him; 1 Beav. 79; 5 How. 270. In some states, as New York, Michigan, and Louisiana, the operation of trusts has been much narrowed; Bisp. Eq. § 56.

See 4 Kent, 290–295; Hill, Trustees; Lewin, Perry, Trusts; Greenleaf, Cruise, Dig.; Washburn, Real Prop.; Story, Eq. Jur.; Spence, Eq. Jur.; Adams, Bispham, Eq.; Executed Trusts; Executory Trusts; Precatory Words; Resulting Trusts; Trustee.

TRUSTEE. A person in whom some estate, interest, or power in or affecting property of any description is vested for the benefit of another.

One to whom property has been conveyed to be held or managed for another.

To a certain extent, executors, administrators, guardians, and assignees are trustees, and the law of trusts so far is applicable to them in their capacity of trustees; Hill, Trust. 49.

Trusts are not strictly cognizable at common law, but solely in equity; 16 Pet. 25.

Any reasonable being may be a trustee. The United States or a state may be a trustee; 15 How. 367. So may a corporation; 7 Wall. 1; Perry, Trusts, § 42.

A trustee after having accepted a trust cannot discharge himself of his trust or responsibility by resignation or a refusal to perform the duties of the trust; but he must procure his discharge either by virtue of the provisions of the instrument of his appointment, or by the consent of all interested, or by an order of a competent court; 4 Kent, 311; 11 Paige, Ch. 314.

Trustees are not allowed to speculate with the trust-property, or to retain any profits made by the use of the same, or to become the purchasers upon its sale. See Trust. If beneficial to the parties in interest, the purchase by the trustee may be retained or confirmed by the court. And the trustee may be compelled to account for and pay over to the cestui que trust all profits made by any use of the trust property; 4 Kent, 438; 2 Johns. Ch. 252; 4 How. 503.

A court of equity never allows a trust to fail for want of a trustee; 5 Paige, Ch. 46; 6 Whart. 571; 5 B. Monr. 113; 2 How. 188.

Whenever it becomes necessary, the court will appoint a new trustee, and this though the instrument creating the trust contain no power for making such appointment. The power is inherent in the court; 7 Ves. Ch. 480; 2 Sandf. Ch. 336; 1 Beav. 467. So the court may create a new trustee on the resignation of the former trustee; 11 Paige, Ch. 314; 3 Barb. Ch. 76; Hill, Trust. 190.

The mere naming a person trustee does not constitute him such. There must be an acceptance, express or implied. See 14 Wall. 139. But if the person named trustee does not wish to be held responsible as such, he should, before meddling with the duties of a trustee, formally disclaim the trust; 7 Gill & J. 157; 1 Pick. 370; Hill, Trust. 214.

Ordinarily, no writing is necessary to constitute the acceptance of even a trust in writing; 12 N. H. 432.

The duties of trustees have been said, in general terms, to be; "to protect and preserve the trust property, and to see that it is employed solely for the benefit of the cestui que trust." Bisp. Eq. § 138.

He must take possession of the trust property, and call in debts, and convert such securities as are not legal investments. Personal securities are not legal investments although the investment was made by the testator himself; 40 N. Y. 76; 18 Penn. 303; unless, by the terms of the trust, they are allowed; Bisp. Eq. § 139.

He will not be liable for the failure of a bank in which he has deposited trust funds, unless he has permitted them to be there for an unreasonable length of time; 29 Beav. 211; but he must not mix them with his own funds; 8 Penn. 431; 41 Ala. 709.

A trustee should not invest trust funds in trade or speculation; nor in bank stock, or stock of public companies; 4 Barb. 626; 18 Penn. 303; but see 9 Pick. 446; he may invest in mortgages.

A recent writer has deduced the following rules as to investments by trustees (see 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 210). Where there is no express power of sale in the instrument creating a trust, and none is necessarily implied, and the discretion of the trustee is the sole restriction upon investments, he will generally be protected where he has acted bona fide and with reasonable diligence and prudence. But in a state where the trustee is protected from loss which may arise from certain specified and so-called legal investments, the rule is much more stringent, and extraordinary care and diligence are required of the trustee as well as bona fides, and it is dangerous to invest trust funds in any other securities than those thus indicated.

But where there is no express power of sale given, and where none such can necessarily be implied from the nature of the trustee's duties, the only safe means of changing an insecure investment left so by the creator of the trust, is to make the change under the direction of the proper court, and if done without such authority, the trustee will be liable to the cestui que trust for breach of trust.

Where there is no such power of sale and the trustee leaves unchanged an investment made by the testator and loss ensues, he will generally be protected if acting with bona fides, even in cases where, if there had been a power of sale and he had neglected to sell, he would have been liable under the first rule laid down above.

The office and duties of trustees being matters of personal confidence, they are not allowed to delegate these powers unless such a power is expressly given by the authority by which they were created; and where one of several trustees dies, the trust, as a general rule, in the United States, will devolve on the survivor, and not on the heirs of the deceased; Hill, Trust. 175; 2 Moll. 276; 3 Mer. 412; 11 Paige, Ch. 314; but a trustee may appoint an agent where it is usual to do so in the ordinary course of business; 10 Penn. 285; 8 Cow. 543.

While the law allows any person named as trustee to disclaim or renounce, he cannot, if he has by any means accepted and entered upon the trust, rid himself of the duties and responsibilitis after such acceptance, except by a legal discharge by competent authority; 4 Johns. Ch. 136; 11 Paige, Ch. 314; 1 My. & K. 195.

The trustee is in law generally regarded as the owner of the property, whether the same be real or personal; Hill, Trust. 229. Yet this rule is subject to material qualifications when taken in connection with the doctrines of powers and uses, and the legislation of the several states; 2 Atk. 223; 1 How. 134; 4 Kent, 321; Cruise, Dig. tit. 12, c. 1, § 25; Sugd. Pow. 174; Hill, Trust. 229–239.

The quality and continuance of the estate of a trustee will be determined by the purpose and exigency of the trust, rather than by the phraseology employed in the description of the estate conveyed; and, therefore, if the language be that the estate goes to the trustee and his heirs, it may be limited to a shorter period if thereby the purposes of the creation of the trust are satisfied; 8 Hare, 156; 4 Denio, 385; 2 Exch. 593; 11 B. Monr. 233.

Where there are several trustees, they are considered to hold as joint-tenants, and on the death of any one the property remains vested in the survivor or survivors; and on the death of the last, the property, if personal (at common law), went to the heir or personal representative of the last-deceased trustee. But the rule as to trust-property going to heirs and executors is changed in most of the states, so that in theory the court of chancery assumes the control and it appoints a new trustee on the decease of former trustees; 13 Sim. 91; 4 Kent, 311; 11 Paige, Ch. 13; 10 Mo. 755; 16 Ves. Ch. 27.

Each trustee has equal interest in and control over the trust estate; and hence, as a general rule, they cannot (as executors may) act or bind the trust separately, but must act jointly; 4 Ves. Ch. 97; 3 Ark. 384; 8 Cow. 544; 20 Me. 504; 11 Barb. 527.

A trustee is, generally, not responsible for the conduct of his co-trustee; see 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 858, 865; where several trustees join in a receipt, primâ facie, all will be considered to have received the money, but one of them may show that he did not in fact receive the money, but joined in the receipt for conformity; Bisp. Eq. § 146. A trustee who stands by and sees a fraud on the trust committed by his co-trustee, will be held responsible for it; 17 Penn. 268.

A trustee may come into equity to obtain advice and assistance in the execution of his trust; Hill, Trust. 298.

One trustee may be held responsible for losses which he has enabled a co-trustee to cause, though there was no actual participation by him; 18 Ohio, 509; 5 How. 233; 10 Penn. 149; 3 Sandf. Ch. 99.

Where the legal estate is vested in trustees, all actions at law relative to the trust-property must be brought in their name, but the trustee must not exercise his legal powers to the prejudice of a cestui que trust, and third persons must take notice of this limitation of the legal rights of a trustee; 2 Vern. 197; Hill, Trust. 503.

Where there are several trustees, all must concur in any business of the trust; otherwise if it be a public trust, where the acts of a majority are binding; Bisp. Eq. § 147.

The trustee (and also his personal representatives to the extent of any property received from the trustee) is responsible in suit for any breach of trust, and will be compelled to compensate what his negligence has lost of the trust estate. He is not only chargeable with the principal and income of the trust-property he has received, but is liable for an amount equal to what, with good management, he might have received; and this includes interest on a sum he has needlessly allowed to remain where it earned no interest; 11 Ves. Ch. 60; 2 Beav. 430; 4 Russ. 195; 2 Johns. Ch. 62; 1 Bradf. Surr. 325.

See COMMISSIONS; Tud. L. Cas. R. P. 497 (trusts for accumulation); 49 N. Y. 76 (as to investment in government bonds and real estate); also an article on Trustees as Tort-feasors, in 14 Am. L. Rev. 36, and 15 id. 159.

TRUSTEE PROCESS. A means of reaching goods, property, and credits of a debtor in the hands of third persons, for the benefit of an attaching creditor.

It is a process, so called, in the New England states, and similar to the garnishee process of others. It is a process given by statute 15 of the statutes of Massachusetts. All goods, effects, and credits so intrusted or deposited in the hands of others that the same cannot be attached by ordinary process of law, may by an original writ or process, the form of which is given by the statute, be attached in whose hands or possession soever they may be found, and they shall, from the service of the writ, stand bound and be held to satisfy such judgment as the plaintiff may recover against the principal defendant; Cushing, Trustee Pr. 2.

The trustees on sueing out and service of the process, according to statute, and its entry in court, may come into court and be examined on oath as to property of the principal in their hands. If the plaintiff recovers against the principal, and there are any trustees who have not discharged themselves under oath, he shall have execution against them; Cushing, Trustee Pr. 4; 2 Kent, 497, n.

TRUTH. The actual state of things.

In giving his testimony, a witness is required to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; for the object in the examination of matters of fact is to ascertain truth.

In actions for slander and libel, the truth of the statements may be given in evidence in some cases. The matter has been made the subject of statutory regulation. See Heard, Libel & S.; LIBEL.

TUB. In Mercantile Law. A measure containing sixty pounds of tea, and from fifty-six to eighty-six pounds of camphor. Jacob, Law Dict.

TUB-MAN. In English Law. A barrister who has a pre-audience in the exchequer, and also one who has a particular place in court, is so called.

TUG. A steam vessel built for towing; practically synonymous with towboat. Tugs are subject to the ordinary rules of navigation touching collisions. Where a schooner was being towed by a tug lashed to her port side, the fact that the schooner had a pilot on board, did not make the tug the mere servant of the schooner, so as to exempt the tug from responsibility; 11 Fed. Rep. 319; 93 U. S. 302.

As to whether tugs are common carriers, see Lawson, Contr. of Carriers, p. 3, n.; TOWBOAT.

TUMBREL. An instrument of punishment made use of by the Saxons, chiefly for the correction of scolding women by ducking them in water, consisting of a stool or chair fixed to the end of a long pole.

In Domesday it is called cathedra stercoris, and is described as cathedra in quo rixosæ mulieres sedentes aquis demergebantur, and seems to be no other than what has more recently been called a ducking or cucking stool. Bracton writes it tymborella, of which perhaps tumbrel is a corruption. It was sometimes also called a trebucket, from the stool or bucket in which the prisoner was placed when put down into the water being fixed to the end of a tree or piece of timber. Lord Coke, however, says it properly signifies a dung-cart, and that every lord of a leet or market ought to have a pillory and tumbrel, and that the leet could be forfeited for the want of either.

This antique punishment was also inflicted upon bakers, brewers, and other transgressors of the sumptuary laws, who were placed upon such a stool and immerged in stercore—that is, in filthy water. By a statute of Henry III., in the year 1250, entitled the statute of the pillory and tumbrel, a baker or brewer offending against the assize of bread or of malt shall suffer bodily punishment; that is, a baker in the pillory and a brewer to the tumbrel, pistor patiatur collistrigium braciatrix trebuccetum.

The last attempt on record, by legal process, seems to have been on the 27th of April, 1745, of which we find the following account in the London Evening Post of that day. "Last week a woman that keeps the Queen's Head alehouse, at Kingston in Surrey, was ordered by the court to be ducked for scolding, and was accordingly placed in a chair and ducked in the river Thames, under Kingston bridge, in the presence of two thousand or three thousand people." The statute authorizing such punishments was finally repealed by a statute of 1 Vict., in 1837.

TUMULTUOUS PETITIONING. Under stat. 13 Car. II., st. 1, c. 5, this was a misdemeanor, and consisted in more than twenty persons signing any petition to the crown or either house of parliament for the alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the contents thereof had been approved by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at assizes or quarter sessions. No petition could be delivered by more than ten persons. 4 Bla. Com. 147; Moz. & W.

TUN. A measure of wine or oil, containing four hogsheads.

TUNGREVE (Sax. tungaraeva, i. e. villæ præpositus). A reeve or bailiff. Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel.

One who in estates, which we call manors, sustains the character of master, and in his stead disposes and arranges every thing. Qui in villis (quæ dicimus maneriis) domini personam sustinet, ejusque vice omnia disponit atque moderatur.

TURBARY. In English Law. A right to dig turf; an easement.

TURN or TOURN. See SHERIFF'S TOURN.

TURNED TO A RIGHT. This phrase means that a person whose estate is divested by usurpation cannot expel the possessor by mere entry, but must have recourse to an action, either possessory or droitural; 3 Steph. Com. 390, n.; 3 Bla. Com. 191; Moz. & W.

TURNKEY. A person under the superintendence of a jailer, whose employment is to open and fasten the prison-doors and to prevent the prisoners from escaping.

It is his duty to use due diligence; and he may be punished for gross neglect or wilful misconduct in permitting prisoners to escape.

TURNPIKE. A gate set across a road, to stop travellers and carriages until toll is paid for passage thereon. In the United States, turnpike-roads are often called turnpikes: just as mail-coach, hackney-coach, stage-coach, are shortened to mail, hack, and stage. Encyc. Am. See TURNPIKE ROAD.

TURNPIKE-ROAD. A road or highway over which the public have the right to travel upon payment of toll, and on which the parties entitled to such toll have the right to erect gates and bars to insure its payment. 6 M. & W. 428; 1 Railw. Cas. 665; 22 E. L. & E. 113; 16 Pick. 175.

Turnpike-roads are usually made by corporations under legislative authority; and, the roads being deemed a public use, such corporations are usually armed with the power to take private property for their construction, upon making just compensation. In the execution of this power, they are bound to a strict compliance with the terms upon which it is given, and are subject to the rules which govern the exercise of the right of eminent domain under the constitutions of the several states; 7 Dana, 81; 3 Humphr. 456; 6 Ohio, 15; 10 id. 396; 25 Penn. 229; 18 Ga. 607; 19 id. 427. In estimating the damages to be awarded for lands taken for a turnpike-road, the rule is to allow the value of the land and its improvements, deducting therefrom the benefits from the road and the additional value given by it to the remaining property; 20 Penn. 91. The legislature may authorize the conversion of an existing highway into a turnpike-road; 11 Vt. 198; 18 Conn. 32; 3 Barb. 159; 4 Humphr. 467; without any pecuniary equivalent to the owner of the fee, such road still remaining a public highway; 2 Ohio St. 419. Under the power to take land for this purpose, the corporation may take land for a toll-house and a cellar under it and a well for the use of the family of the toll-keeper; 9 Pick. 109. A turnpike road being a highway, any obstruction placed thereon renders the author of it liable as for a public nuisance; 16 Pick. 175; 8 Wend. 555.

Turnpike companies, so long as they continue to take toll, are bound to use ordinary care in keeping their roads in suitable repair, and for any neglect of this duty are liable to action on the case for the damages to any person specially injured thereby; 6 Johns. 90; 7 Conn. 86; 11 Wend. 597; 11 Ohio, 197; 6 N. H. 147; 10 Pick. 35; 9 Penn. 20; 5 Ind. 286; 11 Vt. 531; 24 id. 480; 1 Spencer, 323; and to an indictment on the part of the public; 11 Wend. 597; 10 Yerg. 525; 4 Ired. 16; 10 Humphr. 97; 26 Ala. N. S. 88; 1 Harr. N. J. 222; 9 Barb. 161; 2 Gray, 58.

The law of travel upon turnpike-roads is the same as upon ordinary roads, except as regards the payment of tolls. If there be any ambiguity in the authority granted to a turnpike company to take toll, it will be construed rather in favor of the public than of the grantee: 2 B. & Ad. 792; 2 Mann. & G. 134. Travellers are liable for toll though they avoid the gates; 2 Root, 524; 10 Vt. 197; but not for travel between the gates without passing the same; 2 B. Monr. 30; 10 Ired. 30; 11 Vt. 381. Exemptions from toll are construed most liberally in favor of the community; Ang. Highw. § 359.

A road or turnpike laid out by an individual or by the selectmen of the town to facilitate the evasion of toll by travellers upon a turnpike-road will entitle the turnpike company to an action on the case for the damages, or to an injunction ordering the same to be closed; 10 N. H. 133; 18 Conn. 451; 8 Humphr. 286; 1 Johns. Ch. 315; 12 Barb. 553. And see 4 Johns. Ch. 150. And such company is entitled to compensation for the injury to their franchise by a highway which intersects their road at two distinct points and thereby enables travellers to evade the payment of tolls, though such highway be regularly established by the proper authorities to meet the necessities of public travel; 1 Barb. 286. But see 2 N. H. 199; 10 id. 133; 12 La. An. 649.

If a turnpike company abuses its powers, or fails to comply with the terms of its charter, it is liable to be proceeded against by quo warranto for the forfeiture of its franchise; 23 Wend. 193, 223, 254; 1 Zabr. 9; 2 Swan, 282.

TURPIS CAUSA (Lat.). A base or vile consideration, forbidden by law, which makes the contract void: as, a contract the consideration of which is the future illegal cohabitation of the obligee with the obligor.

TURPITUDE (Lat. turpitudo, from turpis, base). Every thing done contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals, is said to be done with turpitude.

TUTELA (Lat.). A power given by the civil law over a free person to defend him when by reason of his age he is unable to defend himself. Women by the civil law could only be tutors of their own children. A child under the power of his father was not subject to tutelage, because not a free person, caput liberum. D. lib. 26, tit. 1, ff. de tutelis; Inst. lib. 1, tit. 13, de tutelis; Inst. lib. 3, tit. 28, de obligationibus quæ ex quasi cont. nascuntur. Novellæ, 72. 94. 155. 118.

Legitima tutela was where the tutor was appointed by the magistrate. Leg. 1, D. ff. de leg. tut.

Testamentaria tutela was where the tutor was appointed by will. D. lib. 26, tit. 2, ff. de testament. tut.; C. lib. 5, tit. 28, de testament. tut.; Inst. lib. 1, tit. 14, qui testamento tutores dari possunt.

TUTELAGE. See TUTELA.

TUTEUR OFFICIEUX. In French law, a person whose duties are analogous to those of a guardian in English law; he must however, be over fifty years of age, and appointed with the consent of the parents, or, in their default, of the conseil de famille, and is only appointed for a child over fifteen years of age.

TUTEUR SUBROGÉ. In French law, the title of a second guardian appointed for an infant under guardianship; his functions are exercised in case the interests of the infant and his principal guardian conflict. Code Nap. 420; Brown, Dict.

TUTOR. In Civil Law. One who has been lawfully appointed to the care of the person and property of a minor.

By the laws of Louisiana, minors under the age of fourteen years, if males, and under the age of twelve years, if females, are, both as to their persons and their estates, placed under the authority of a tutor. La. Civ. Code, art. 263. Above that age, and until their majority or emancipation, they are placed under the authority of a curator. Id.

TUTOR ALIENUS (Lat.). In English Law. The name given to a stranger who enters upon the lands of an infant within the age of fourteen, and takes the profits.

He may be called to an account by the infant and be charged as guardian in socage; Littleton, s. 124; Co. Litt. 89 b, 90 a; Hargrave, Tracts, n. 1.

TUTOR PROPRIUS (Lat.). The name given to one who is rightly a guardian in socage, in contradistinction to a tutor alienus.

TUTORSHIP. The power which an individual, sui juris, has to take care of the person of one who is unable to take care of himself. Tutorship differs from curatorship. See PROCURATOR; PROTUTOR.

TUTRIX (Lat.). A woman who is appointed to the office of a tutor.

TWELFHINDI. The highest rank of men in the Saxon government, who were valued at 1200*s*. For any injury done to them, satisfactien was to be made according to their worth. Cowel; Whart. Dict.

TWELVE TABLES, LAWS OF THE. Laws of ancient Rome, composed in part from those of Solon and other Greek legislators, and in part from the unwritten laws and customs of the Romans.

These laws first appeared in the year of Rome 303, inscribed on ten plates of brass. The following year two others were added, and the entire code bore the name of the Laws of the Twelve Tables. The principles they contained were the germ of all the Roman law, the original source of the jurisprudence of the greatest part of Europe.

See a fragment of the Law of the Twelve Tables in Coop. Justinian, 650; Gibbon, Rome, c. 44; Maine, Anc. L. 14, 33; CODE.

TWELVEMONTH, in the singular, includes the whole year, but in the plural, twelve months of twenty-eight days each; 6 Co. 62; 2 Bla. Com. 140, n.; Bish. Writt. Laws, 97.

TWICE IN JEOPARDY. See JEOPARDY.

TWYHINDI. The lower order of Saxons, valued at 200*s*. Cowel. See TWELFHINDI.

TYBURN TICKET. In English Law. A certificate given to the prosecutor of a felon to conviction.

By the 10 & 11 Will. III. c. 23, the original proprietor or first assignee of such certificate is exempted from all and all manner of parish and ward offices within the parish or ward where the felony shall have been committed; Bacon, Abr. Constable (C).

TYRANNY. The violation of those laws which regulate the division and the exercises of the sovereign power of the state. It is a violation of its constitution.

TYRANT. The chief magistrate of the state, whether legitimate or otherwise, who violates the constitution to act arbitrarily, contrary to justice. Toullier, tit. prél. n. 32.

The terms tyrant and usurper are sometimes used as synonymous, because usurpers are almost always tyrants; usurpation is itself a tyrannical act, but, properly speaking, the words usurper and tyrant convey different ideas. A king may become a tyrant, although legitimate, when he acts despotically; while a usurper may cease to be a tyrant by governing according to the dictates of justice.

This term is sometimes applied to persons in authority who violate the laws and act arbitrarily towards them. See DESPOTISM.

U.

UBERRIMA FIDES (Lat. most perfect good faith). A phrase used to express the perfect good faith, concealing nothing, with which a contract must be made; for example, in the case of insurance, the insured must observe the most perfect good faith towards the insurer. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 317; 3 Kent, 283.

UDAL. Allodial. See ALLODIUM.

UKAAS, UKASE. The name of a law or ordinance emanating from the czar of Russia.

ULLAGE. In Commercial Law. The amount wanting when a cask on being gauged is found only partly full.

ULNAGE. Alnage. See ALNAGER.

ULTIMATUM (Lat.). The last proposition made in making a contract, a treaty, and the like: as, the government of the United States has given its ultimatum, has made the last proposition it will make to complete the proposed treaty. The word also means the result of a negotiation, and it comprises the final determination of the parties concerned in the object in dispute.

ULTIMUM SUPPLICIUM (Lat.). The last or extreme punishment; the penalty of death.

ULTIMUS HÆRES (Lat.). The last or remote heir; the lord. So called in contradistinction to the hæres proximus and the hæres remotior. Dalr. Feud. Pr. 110.

ULTRA VIRES (Lat.). The modern technical designation, in the law of corporations, of acts beyond the scope of their powers, as defined by their charters or acts of incorporation.

A term used to express the action of a corporation which is beyond the powers conferred upon it by its charter, or the statutes under which it was instituted. 13 Am. L. Rev. 682.

This doctrine is of modern growth; its appearance dates from about the year 1845, being first prominently mentioned in 10 Beav. 1 and 11 C. B. 775; see Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, vii.

In 22 N. Y. 291, it is said: "There are three classes of cases in England in which the question of ultra vires arises, viz., 1st, cases in which one or more of the shareholders seeks to restrain the officers of the corporation from engaging in transactions unauthorized by the charter; 2d, actions brought by third persons against corporations, to enforce their contracts, in which the defence relied upon is, that in making the contract the corporation exceeded its corporate powers; and 3d, similar actions in which the defence is that the directors had exceeded, not the powers conferred upon the entire corporation by law, but those conferred by the shareholders upon the directors by deed." It is said that the true and primary meaning of the doctrine is, that a corporation has certain powers only, and that it can be bound only when acting within the limits of these powers; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 35. When acts of corporations are spoken of as ultra vires, it is not intended that they are unlawful, or even such as the corporation cannot perform, but merely those which are not within the powers conferred upon the corporation by the act of its creation, etc.; 63 N. Y. 68. A corporate act is said to be ultra vires when it is not within the scope of the powers of the corporation to perform it under any circumstances, or for any purpose; or, with reference to the rights of certain parties, when the corporation is not authorized to perform it without their consent; or, with reference to some specific purpose, when it is not authorized to perform it for that purpose, though fully within the scope of the general powers of the corporation, with the consent of the parties interested, or for some other purpose; 43 Iowa, 48. See 35 L. J. Ch. 156; 125 Mass. 333; 37 Cal. 543.

As a general rule, such acts are void, and impose no obligation upon the corporation although they assume the form of contracts; inasmuch as all persons dealing with a corporation, especially in the state or country in which and under whose laws it was created, are chargeable with notice of the extent of its chartered powers. It is otherwise as to laws imposing restraints upon it not contained in its charter where the contract is made or the transaction takes place without the limits of the state or country under whose laws the corporation exists; 8 Barb. 233.

If, however, the corporation receives any money or other valuable consideration under such a transaction or contract, it is not doubted that upon rescinding or repudiating the act or contract under which it was paid or delivered it could be recovered back in an appropriate action; 14 Penn. 81.

So, too, the artificial body—the corporation—is liable to be proceeded against by quo warranto for the usurpation of powers in its name by its officers and agents, and its charter may be taken away as a penalty for permitting such acts—the defence of a want of power to bind the corporation not being available in such cases, since it would lead to entire corporate irresponsibility; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 649; 1 Blackf. 267.

Among the rules laid down by a recent writer as the leading principles of this doctrine are these: A corporation has all the capacities for engaging in transactions and for management which are given it expressly by its charter, etc., or impliedly given it by reasonable implication from the language thereof. Capacities or powers for management may be given by wide general language. Beyond these powers, they have no capacities or powers, and cannot legally or validly engage in other transactions.

Corporations cannot be rendered directly liable upon ultra vires transactions, but must account for benefits received therefrom. As long as the transaction remains executory, it is established that it cannot be enforced. But if it be executed, though in England it cannot be enforced or sued on, yet in the United States there seems some doubt whether the corporation will be allowed to set up the defence of ultra vires. In both countries, however, unquestionably the corporation must account for benefits derived. Special proceedings, in themselves ultra vires, will sometimes be upheld as having been rendered necessary by unexpected circumstances. Any party to an ultra vires transaction may set up the defence thereof, and any one corporator may call upon the courts to restrain the corporation from engaging therein; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 41–43.

In the United States the defence of ultra vires interposed against a contract wholly or in part executed has very generally been looked upon with disfavor. The result has been that in some cases a liberal construction has been applied so as to destroy the foundation of the defence; in others the courts have allowed the recovery of the money paid, not upon the contract, but because of the money received and the benefits enjoyed; while in still another class of cases, the doctrine of estoppel in pais has been applied to exclude the defence. The courts may be said, generally, to be tending towards the doctrine—certainly so far as business corporations are concerned—that corporations are to be held liable upon executed contracts, where the contracts involved are not expressly or by necessary implication prohibited by their charters or the general law; Judge Green's note to Brice, Ultra Vires, 729.

There is said to be a tendency of the courts, based upon the strongest principles of justice, to enforce contracts against corporations, although in entering into them they have exceeded their chartered powers, where they have received the consideration and the benefit of the contract; 13 Am. L. Rev. 654, citing 55 Ill. 413; 7 Wall. 392; 98 U. S. 621. The doctrine of ultra vires, when invoked for or against a corporation, should not be allowed to prevail where it would defeat the ends of justice or work a legal wrong; 96 U. S. 258. The executed dealings of corporations should be allowed to stand for and against both parties, when good faith so requires; 22 N. Y. 258, 494; 63 N. Y. 62. Where a corporation has entered into a contract which has been fully executed on the other part, and nothing remains but the payment by the corporation of the consideration, it will not be allowed to set up that the contract was ultra vires; 83 Penn. 160. Corporations should be restricted so far as courts can, in the exercise of their powers, limit them; but the plea is not a gracious one, that a contract which they have deliberately made, and of which they have received the full benefit, is void for want of power in them to make it.

It has been held ultra vires for a railway company to guarantee to the shareholders of a steam packet company a dividend upon their paid-up capital; 10 Beav. 1; to engage in the coal trade; 6 Jur. N. S. 1006; for a company to assume the debt of another; 34 Vt. 144; or to make or indorse accommodation paper; 11 Ind. 104; or to engage as surety for another in a business in which it has no interest; 26 Barb. 568; for one railroad company to unite with another like company, and both conduct their business under one management; 21 How. 441; or to run a line of steamboats in connection with its road; 39 Mo. 451; but a railway company may contract to carry beyond its own lines; 54 Penn. 77; 45 N. Y. 525; 96 U. S. 258; but see 22 Conn. 502. Where a corporation is incompetent to take real estate, a conveyance to it is only voidable; Morawetz, Corp. § 117. A railroad company has implied authority to erect a refreshment room; L. R. 7 Eq. 116; a corporation authorized to erect a market has authority to purchase land for that purpose; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 372; where a corporation had authority to keep steam vessels for the purposes of a ferry, they could use these vessels, when otherwise unemployed, for excursion trips; 30 Beav. 40; 11 Allen, 326. Corporations generally have authority to borrow money to carry out the objects for which they were created, and to execute their obligations therefor; Field, Corp. § 249; including irredeemable bonds; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 713; they may, generally, by virtue of implied powers, make promissory notes; 13 Am. L. Rev. 641; 15 Wall. 566; 35 N. Y. 505; 46 Ala. 98. Where a railroad company, without legislative authority, leased its road to three persons, for twenty years, this was held ultra vires; 101 U. S. 71. A railroad company cannot guarantee the expenses of a musical festival, though the guarantee be signed by a majority of the directors with the reasonable belief that the festival would increase the proper business of the company; 131 Mass. 258; the same ruling applies to a company organized to manufacture and sell organs; ibid.

It is said to be now well settled that a power granted to a corporation to engage in certain business carries with it the authority to act precisely as an individual would act in carrying on such business, and that it would possess for this purpose the usual and ordinary means to accomplish the objects of its creation, in the same manner as though it were a natural person; Field, Corp. § 271.

The result of the English authorities is, that corporations,—certainly those for commercial purposes, and probably all corporations to which the doctrine applies,—have by implication all capacities and powers which, being reasonably incidental to their enterprise or operations, are not forbidden, either expressly by their constating instruments or by necessary inference therefrom; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 40. The American decisions seem to be tending towards this doctrine; id. note a. Prima facie, all the contracts of a corporation are valid, and it lies in those who impeach any contract to make out that it is avoided; 3 Macq. 382. Corporations are presumed to contract within their powers; 96 U. S. 267.

A court of equity, at the suit of the stockholders of the corporation, will restrain the commission of acts beyond the corporate power, by injunction operating upon the individual officers and directors as well as the corporation. This is now an acknowledged head of equity jurisdiction; Redf. Railw. 400; 6 id. 289; 18 Wall. 626; 10 Beav. 1; 12 id. 339; creditors have the same right in this respect as stockholders; 13 Am. L. Rev. 659.

Acquiescence for any considerable time in the exercise of excessive powers, after they come to the knowledge of the stockholders, would, however, be a decisive objection to such a remedy; 19 E. L. & E. 7.

In regard to municipal corporations, the rule is stricter against the validity of ultra vires contracts. See 19 Wall. 468; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 881, 749.

It has been said that a corporation is liable for the negligence and other torts of its agents and servants, even when related to and connected with the acts of the corporation that are ultra vires; even if done in the execution of usurped powers and of purposes clearly ultra vires; 13 Am. L. Rev. 658; but as to whether a corporation is liable for such wrongs by its agents as are beyond the scope of corporate authority, see L. R. 2 Q. B. 534; 7 H. & N. 172; 47 N. Y. 122.

See Green's Brice, Ultra Vires; Field, Angell & A. on Corp.; and articles in 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 513, and 13 Am. L. Rev. 632; Cooley, Torts, 119; Morawetz, Priv. Corp.

ULTRONEUS WITNESS. In Scotch Law. A witness who offers his testimony without being regularly cited. The objection only goes to his credibility, and may be removed by a citation at any time before the witness is sworn. See Bell, Dict. Evidence.

UMPIRAGE. The decision of an umpire. This word is used for the judgment of an umpire, as the word award is employed to designate that of arbitrators.

UMPIRE. A person selected by two or more arbitrators who cannot agree as to the subject-matter referred to them, for the purpose of deciding the matter in dispute. Sometimes the term is applied to a single arbitrator selected by the parties themselves; Kyd, Awards, 6, 7*b*, 77; Cald. Arb. 38; Dane, Abr. Index; 3 Viner, Abr. 93; Comyns, Dig. Arbitrament (F); 4 Dall. 271, 432; 4 Scott, N. S. 378. The jurisdiction of the umpire and arbitrators cannot be concurrent: if the arbitrators make an award, it is binding; if not, the award of the umpire is binding; T. Jones, 167. If the umpire sign the award of the arbitrators, it is still their award, and vice versâ; 6 Harr. & J. 403. Arbitrators may appoint an umpire after their term of service has expired, if the time is not gone within which the umpire was to make his award; 2 Johns. 57. Subsequent dissent of the parties, without just cause, will have no effect upon the appointment; but they should have notice; 11 East, 367; 12 Metc. 293; 1 Harr. & J. 362, n. If an umpire refuse to act, another may be appointed toties quoties; 11 East, 367. See 2 Saund. 133 a, note.

An umpire has not the privilege of reviewing the declarations of the tribunals of a country as to the intrepretation of its laws: as, where a competent tribunal in the United States has decided that a foreigner has been duly naturalized; Morse, Citizenship, 79, 86.

UNA VOCE (Lat.). With one voice; unanimously.

UNALIENABLE. Incapable of being sold.

Things which are not in commerce, as, public roads, are in their nature unalienable. Some things are unalienable in consequence of particular provisions in the law forbidding their sale or transfer: as, pensions granted by the government. The natural rights of life and liberty are unlienable.

UNANIMITY (Lat. unus, one, animus, mind). The agreement of all the persons concerned in a thing, in design and opinion.

Generally, a simple majority of any number of persons is sufficient to do such acts as the whole number can do: for example, a majority of the legislature can pass a law; but there are some cases in which unanimity is required: for example, a traverse jury composed of twelve individuals cannot decide an issue submitted to them unless they are unanimous.

UNCERTAINTY. That which is unknown or vague. See CERTAINTY.

UNCIA TERRÆ (Lat.). This phrase often occurs in charters of the British kings, and denotes some quantity of land. It was twelve modii, each modius possibly one hundred feet square. Mon. Angl. tom. 3, pp. 198, 205.

The twelfth part of the Roman as. Dess. Dict. du Dig. As. The as was used to express an integral sum: hence uncia for one-twelfth of any thing, commonly one-twelfth of a pound, i.e. an ounce. Id.; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 462, note m.

UNCLE. The brother of a father or mother. See AVUNCULUS; PATRUUS.

UNCONSCIONABLE BARGAIN. A contract which no man in his senses, not under delusion, would make, on the one hand, and which no fair and honest man would accept, on the other. 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3848. See USURY.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL. That which is contrary to the constitution. See CONSTITUTIONAL.

UNCORE PRIST (L. Fr. still ready). In Pleading. A plea or replication that the party pleading is still ready to do what is required. Used in connection with the words tout temps prist, the whole denotes that the party always has been and still is ready to do what is required, thus saving costs where the whole cause is admitted, or preventing delay where it is a replication, if the allegation is made out. 3 Bla. Com. 303.

UNDE NIHIL HABET. See DOWER.

UNDEFENDED. A term sometimes applied to one who is obliged to make his own defence when on trial, or in a civil cause. A cause is said to be undefended when the defendant makes default, in not putting in an appearance to the plaintiff's action; in not putting in his statement of defence; or, in not appearing at the trial either personally or by counsel, after having received due notice. Lush's Prac. 548–9; Judicature Act, 1875; Moz. & W.

UNDER AND SUBJECT. Words frequently used in conveyances of land which is subject to a mortgage, to show that the grantee takes subject to such mortgage. See MORTGAGE; 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 337, 401.

UNDERLEASE. An alienation by a tenant of a part of his lease, reserving to himself a reversion: it differs from an assignment, which is a transfer of all the tenant's interest in the lease. 3 Wils. 234; W. Blackst. 766. And even a conveyance of the whole estate by the lessee, reserving to himself the rent, with a power of re-entry for non-payment, was held to be not an assignment, but an underlease; 1 Stra. 405. In Ohio it has been decided that the transfer of a part only of the lands, though for the whole term, is an underlease; 2 Ohio, 216. In Kentucky, such a transfer, on the contrary, is considered as an assignment; 4 Bibb, 538. See LEASE; ASSIGNMENT.

UNDERLIE THE LAW. In Scotch criminal procedure, an accused person, in appearing to take his trial, is said "to compear and underlie the law." Moz. & W.

UNDER-SHERIFF. See SHERIFF.

UNDERTAKING. An engagement by one of the parties to a contract to the other, and not the mutual engagement of the parties to each other; a promise. 5 East, 17; 2 Leon. 224; 4 B. & Ald. 595. It does not necessarily imply a consideration; 3 N. Y. 335.

UNDER-TENANT. One who holds by virtue of an underlease. See SUB-TENANT.

UNDERTOOK. Assumed; promised.

This is a technical word which ought to be inserted in every declaration of assumpsit charging that the defendant undertook to perform the promise which is the foundation of the suit; and this though the promise be founded on a legal liability or would be implied in evidence. Bacon, Abr. Assumpsit (F); 1 Chitty, Pl. 88, note p.

UNDER-TUTOR. In Louisiana. In every tutorship there shall be an under-tutor whom it shall be the duty of the judge to appoint at the time letters of tutorship are certified for the tutor.

It is the duty of the under-tutor to act for the minor whenever the interest of the minor is in opposition to the interest of the tutor; La. Civ. Code, art. 300, 301; 1 Mart. La. N. S. 462; 9 Mart. La. 643; 11 La. 189; Pothier, Des Personnes, partie prém. tit. 6, s. 5, art. 2. See PROCURATOR; PRO-TUTOR; TUTEUR SUBROGÉ.

UNDERWRITER. The party who agrees to insure another on life or property, in a policy of insurance. He is also called the insurer.

The title is almost exclusively confined to insurers of marine risks, and is derived from the method of obtaining such insurance formerly in vogue, usually as follows: A premium having been agreed upon between the insured and an insurance broker, a statement of such premium and of the ship or cargo, and the voyage or time, was written at the head of a sheet which was laid on the broker's table. Then such merchants as were willing to insure such property on such terms subscribed their names to the statement above mentioned, stating the amount they were willing to insure; and so on until the desired amount of insurance was obtained. 1 Pars. Mar. Ins. 14. For the liability of underwriters, see AVERAGE; INSURANCE; LLOYDS; MARINE INSURANCE; RISKS AND PERILS; TOTAL LOSS.

UNDIVIDED. Held by the same title by two or more persons, whether their rights are equal as to value or quantity, or unequal.

Tenants in common, joint-tenants, and partners hold an undivided right in their respective properties until partition has been made. The rights of such owner of an undivided thing extend over the whole and every part of it, totum in toto, et totum in qualibet parte. See PARTITION; PER MY ET PER TOUT.

UNDUE INFLUENCE. That degree of improper influence exercised by one standing in a confidential, fiduciary, or other relation towards another, as will invalidate a gift, a will, or a contract, made by the latter to the advantage of the former. "The principle runs through all the various relations where, from disparity of years, intellect, or knowledge, one of the parties . . . has an ascendency, which prevents the other from exercising an unbiased judgment. It may therefore apply as between parent and child, guardian and ward, husband and wife, counsel and client; 2 Hagg. 187; 15 Beav. 278, 299; 57 Ill. 186; . . . or wherever weakness, ignorance, or an implicit reliance on the good faith of another gives an occasion for an abuse of influence; 9 Hare, 540; 17 Ohio, 484, 505; Note to Huguenin vs. Baseley, 2 L. C. Eq. 1193." As a rule, equity will afford relief in all transactions in which "influence has been acquired and abused, in which confidence has been betrayed;" 7 H. L. Cas. 750. For cases which were held not to fall under the doctrine of Huguenin vs. Baseley, supra, see 4 Ir. Ch. 330; 101 Mass. 494; Bisp. Eq. 231 et seq. The influence to invalidate a will must be such as in some degree to destroy free agency; not merely that produced by natural affection, or a wish to please another; see 1 Cox, 355.

Under English statutes, any person using "undue influence," to induce any one to vote or refrain from voting, at an election, is guilty of a misdemeanor and forfeits £50; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87; Whart. Dict.

UNGELD. An outlaw. Toml.

UNICA TAXATIO (Lat.). The ancient language of a special award of venire, where of several defendants one pleads, and one lets judgment go by default, whereby the jury who are to try and assess damages on the issue are also to assess damages against the defendant suffering judgment by default. Lee, Dict.

UNIFORMITY OF PROCESS. In English Law. An act providing for uniformity of process in personal actions in his majesty's courts of law at Westminster, 2 Will. IV. c. 39, 23d May, 1832; 3 Chit. Stat. 494. The improved system thus established was more fully amended by the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852, 1854, and 1860, and by the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875. 3 Steph. Com. 490; Moz. & W.

UNILATERAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. When the party to whom an engagement is made makes no express agreement on his part, the contract is called unilateral, even in cases where the law attaches certain obligations to his acceptance. La. Civ. Code, art. 1758; Code Nap. 1103. A loan of money and a loan for use are of this kind. Pothier, Obl. part 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2; Leç. Elémen. § 781.

In the Common Law. According to Professor Langdell, every binding promise not in consideration of another promise is a unilateral contract. For example, simple-contract debts, bonds, promissory notes, and policies of insurance. A bilateral contract, which consists of two promises given in exchange for and consideration of each other, becomes a unilateral contract when one of the promises is fully performed; Langdell, Sum. Cont. § 183.

UNINTELLIGIBLE. That which cannot be understood.

When a law, a contract, or will is unintelligible, it has no effect whatever. See CONSTRUCTION.

UNIO PROLIUM (Lat. union of offspring). A species of adoption used among the Germans, which takes place when a widower having children marries a widow who also has children. These parents then agree that the children of both marriages shall have the same rights to their succession as those which may be the fruits of their marriage. Leç. Elém. § 187.

UNION. A popular term for the United States of America: as, the Union must and shall be preserved

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS. Each circuit court of the United States may appoint, in different parts of the district for which it is held, as many discreet persons as it may deem necessary, who shall be called "commissioners of the circuit court," and shall exercise the powers which are or may be conferred upon them; R. S. § 627.

These officers are authorized to hold to security of the peace, and for good behavior arising under the constitution and laws of the United States; R. S. § 727.

They have also the power to carry into effect, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, the award or arbitration, or decree of any consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent, to sit as judges or arbitrators in such differences as may arise between the captains and crews of vessels, application for the exercise of such power being first made by petition of such consul, etc.; R. S. § 728.

They have power also to take bail and affidavits when required or allowed in any circuit or district court of the United States; R. S. § 945.

They may imprison or bail offenders; R. S. § 1010; may discharge poor convicts imprisoned; R. S. § 1042; may administer oaths and take acknowledgments; R. S. § 1778; may institute proceedings under the civil rights laws; R. S. §§ 1982, 1984; may issue warrants for the arrest of foreign seamen, in case of dispute or desertion; R. S. § 4079; may summon the master of a vessel in cases of seamen's wages; may apprehend fugitives from justice; R. S. § 5270.

The district court of the United States may appoint commissioners before whom appraisers of vessels or goods and merchandise seized for breaches of any law of the United States may be sworn; and such oaths so taken are as effectual as if taken before the judge in open court; R. S. § 570.

The court of claims has power to appoint commissioners, before whom examinations may be made upon oath of witnesses touching all matters pertaining to claims; R. S. §§ 1071, 1080.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. The nation occupying the territory between British America on the north, Mexico on the south, the Atlantic Ocean and Gulf of Mexico on the east, and the Pacific Ocean on the west; and including the territory of Alaska in the extreme northwest of the American continent; being the republic whose organic law is the constitution adopted by the people of the thirteen states which declared their independence of the government of Great Britain on the fourth day of July, 1776.

When they are said to constitute one nation, this must be understood with proper qualifications. Our motto, E pluribus unum, expresses the true nature of that composite body which foreign nations regard and treat with in all their communications with our people. No state can enter into a treaty, nor make a compact with any foreign nation, nor grant letters of marque or reprisal. Art. 1, § 10; art. 4, § 4. To foreigners we present a compact unity, an undivided sovereignty. No state can do a national act nor legally commit the faith of the Union.

In our inter-state and domestic relations we are far more a complex body. In these we are for some purposes one. We are so as far as our constitution makes us one, and no further; and under this we are so far a unity that one state is not foreign to another. Art. 4, § 2. A constitution, according to the original meaning of the word, is an organic law. It includes the organization of the government, the grant of powers, the distribution of these powers into legislative, executive, and judicial, and the names of the officers by whom these are exercised. And with these provisions a constitution, properly so called, terminates. But ours goes further. It contains restrictions on the powers of the government which it organizes.

The writ of habeas corpus, the great instrument in defence of personal liberty against the encroachment of the government, shall not be suspended but in case of rebellion or invasion, and when the public safety requires it. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; no money shall be drawn from the treasury where there is not a regular appropriation; no title of nobility shall be granted; and no person holding office shall receive a present from any foreign government. Art. 1, § 9. To these, which are in the original constitution, may be added the eleven first amendments. These, as their character clearly shows, had their origin in a jealousy of the powers of the general government. All are designed more effectually to guard the rights of the people, and would properly, together with the restrictions in the original constitution, have a place in a bill of rights. Any act or law of the United States in violation of these, with whatever formality enacted, would be null and void, as an excess of power.

The restrictions on state sovereignty, besides those which relate to foreign nations, are that no state shall coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts, pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility. These prohibitions are absolute. In addition to these restrictions, the results of the rebellion of 1861–1865 caused the adoption of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments, which lay still further restrictions upon the power of the states, so far as relates to slavery and the regulation of the right of suffrage. The 13th amendment provides that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction, and confers power upon congress to enforce this article by appropriate legislation; the 14th amendment provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and defines who shall be so considered; the 15th amendment specifically provides that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Without the consent of congress no state shall lay any duties on imports or exports, or any duty on tonnage, or keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, or enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or engage in war unless actually invaded, or in imminent danger of being so.

What constitutes a duty on exports or imports has been a matter of frequent litigation in the supreme court. It has been finally decided that the term "import" as used in the constitution does not refer to articles imported from one state to another, but only to articles imported from foreign states; 8 Wall. 123; but the prohibition contained in those provisions of the constitution which ordain that congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states; that no state shall levy any imposts or duties on imports or exports; that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the immunities and privileges of citizens of the several states, have been construed together by the supreme court; and various statutes of the different states have been declared unconstitutional because they violated them. Thus a statute allowing an additional fee to port-wardens for every vessel entering a port; 6 Wall. 31; a tax on passengers introduced from foreign countries; 7 How. 286; a tax on passengers going out of a state; 6 Wall. 35; a tax levied upon freight brought into or through one state into another; 15 Wall. 232; a tonnage tax on vessels entering the harbors of a state, either from foreign or domestic ports; 12 Wall. 204; 19 id. 581; 20 id. 577; 100 U. S. 434; have all been so decided. It is said that wherever subjects, in regard to which a power to regulate commerce is asserted, are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they are exclusively within the regulating control of congress. But the mere grant of the commercial power to congress does not forbid the states from passing laws to regulate pilotage. The power to regulate commerce includes various subjects, upon which there should be some uniform rule, and upon others different rules in different localities. The power is exclusive in congress in the former, but not so in the latter class; 12 How. 297.

Whatever these restrictions are, they operate on all states alike, and if any state laws violate them, the laws are void; and without any legislation of congress the supreme court has declared them so; 6 Cra. 100; 4 Wheat. 122, 518; 16 How. 304; cases supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 729.

The United States have certain powers, the principal of which are enumerated in art. 1, § 8, running into seventeen specific powers. Others are granted to particular branches of the government: as, the treaty-making power to the president and senate. These have an equal effect in all the states, and so far as an authority is vested in the government of the Union or in any department of it, and so far as the states are prohibited from the exercise of certain powers, so far in our domestic affairs we are a unity.

Within these granted powers the sovereignty of the United States is supreme. The constitution, and the laws made in pursuance of it, and all treaties, are the supreme law of the land. Art. 6. And they not only govern in their words, but in their meaning. If the sense is ambiguous or doubtful, the United States, through their courts, in all cases where the rights of an individual are concerned, are the rightful expositors. For without the authority of explaining this meaning the United States would not be sovereign.

In these matters, particularly in the limitation put on the sovereignty of the states, it has been sometimes said that the constitution executes itself. This expression may be allowed; but with as much propriety these may be said to be laws which the people have enacted themselves, and no laws of congress can either take from, add to, or confirm them. They are rights, privileges, or immunities which are granted by the people, and are beyond the power of congress or state legislatures; and they require no law to give them force or efficiency. The members of congress are exempted from arrest, except for treason, felony, and breach of the peace, in going to and returning from the seat of government. Art. 1, § 6. It is obvious that no law can affect this immunity. On these subjects all laws are purely nugatory, because if they go beyond or fall short of the provisions of the constitution, that may always be appealed to. An individual has just what that gives him,—no less and no more. It may be laid down as a universal rule, admitting of no exception, that when the constitution has established a disability or immunity, a privilege or a right, these are precisely as that instrument has fixed them, and can be neither augmented nor curtailed by any act or law either of congress or a state legislature. We are more particular in stating this principle because it has sometimes been forgotten both by legislatures and theoretical expositors of the constitution.

It has been justly thought a matter of importance to determine from what source the United States derive their authority. 4 Wheat. 402. When the constitution was framed, the people of this country were not an unformed mass of individuals. They were united into regular communities under state governments, and to these had confided the whole mass of sovereign power which they chose to intrust out of their own hands. The question here proposed is whether our bond of union is a compact entered into by the states, or the constitution is an organic law established by the people. To this question the preamble gives a decisive answer: We, the people, ordain and establish this constitution. The members of the convention which formed it were indeed appointed by the states. But the government of the states had only a delegated power, and, if they had an inclination, had no authority to transfer the allegiance of the people from one sovereign to another. The great men who formed the constitution were sensible of this want of power, and recommended it to the people themselves. They assembled in their own conventions and adopted it, acting in their original capacity as individuals, and not as representing states. The state governments are passed by in silence. They had no part in making it, and, though they have certain duties to perform, as, the appointment of senators, are properly not parties to it. The people in their capacity as sovereign made and adopted it; and it binds the state governments without their consent. The United States as a whole, therefore, emanates from the people, and not from the states, and the constitution and laws of the states, whether made before or since the adoption of that of the United States, are subordinate to it and the laws made in pursuance of it.

It has very truly been said that out of the mass of sovereignty intrusted to the states was carved a part and deposited with the United States. But this was taken by the people, and not by the states as organized communities. The people are the fountain of sovereignty. The whole was originally with them as their own. The state governments were but trustees acting under a derived authority, and had no power to delegate what was delegated to them. But the people, as the original fountain, might take away what they had lent and intrust it to whom they pleased. They had the whole title, and, as absolute proprietors, had the right of using or abusing,—jus utendi et abutendi.

A consequence of great importance flows from this fact. The laws of the United States act directly on individuals, and they are directly and not mediately responsible through the state governments. This is the most important improvement made by our constitution over all previous confederacies. As a corollary from this, if not more properly a part of it, the laws act only on states through individuals. They are supreme over persons and cases, but do not touch the state; they act through them; 1 Wheat. 368. If a state passes an ex post facto law, or passes a law impairing the obligation of contracts, or makes any thing but gold or silver a tender in payment of debts, congress passes no law which touches the state: it is sufficient that these laws are void, and when a case is brought before the court, it, without any law of congress, will declare them void. They give no person an immunity, nor deprive any of a right. Again: should a state pass a law declaring war against a foreign nation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, arm troops or keep ships of war in time of peace, individuals acting under such laws would be responsible to the United States. They might be treated and punished as traitors or pirates. But congress would and could pass no law against the state; and for this simple reason, because the state is sovereign. And it is a maxim consecrated in public law as well as common sense and the necessity of the case, that a sovereign is answerable for his acts only to his God and to his own conscience.

The constitution and laws made in pursuance of it,—that is, laws within their granted powers,—and all treaties, are the supreme law of the land, art. 6; and the judicial power, art. 3, § 1, gives to the supreme court the right of interpreting them. But this court is but another name for the United States, and this power necessarily results from their sovereignty; for the United States would not be truly sovereign unless their interpretation as well as the letter of the law governed. But this power of the court is confined to cases brought before them, and does not embrace principles independent of these cases. They have no power analogous to that of the Roman prætor of declaring the meaning of the constitution by edicts. Any opinion, however strongly expressed, has no authority beyond the reasoning by which it is supported, and binds no one. But the point embraced in the case is as much a part of the law as though embraced in the letter of the law or constitution, and it bin is public functionaries, whether of the states or United States, as well as private persons; and this of necessity, as there is no authority above a sovereign to which an appeal can be made.

Another question of great practical importance arose at an early period of our government. The natural tendency of all concentrated power is to augment itself. Limitations of authority are not to be expected from those to whom power is intrusted; and such is the infirmity of human nature that those who are most jealous when out of power and seeking office are quite as ready practically to usurp it as any other. A general abrogation commonly precedes a real usurpation, to lull suspicion if for no other purpose. When the constitution was new, and before it had been fully considered, this diversity of opinion was not unnatural, and was the subject of earnest argument, but is, we think, now settled, and rightly, both on technical reasoning and on that of expediency. The question is between incidental and constructive or implied powers. The government of the United States is one of delegated power. No general words are used from which a general power can be inferred. Incidental and implied are sometimes used as synonymous; but in accurate reasoning there is a plain distinction between them, and the latter, in common use, comes nearer to constructive than to incidental.

The interpretation of powers is familiar to courts of justice, as a great part of landed property in England and much in this country is held under powers. A more frequent example is that of common agency, as every agent is created by a power. Courts whose professed object is to carry into effect the intentions of parties have, on this subject, established general rules. Among these no one is more immovably fixed than this, that the interpretation is strict and not liberal. 2 Kent, 617; 4 id. 330. But this strictness does not exclude incidental powers. These are included in a general and express power, both in the common and technical use of language. To take a familiar example. A merchant of Philadelphia or Boston has a cargo of tea arrive at New York, and by letter authorizes his correspondent to sell it. This is the whole extent of the power. But it necessarily and properly includes that of advertising, of removing and exhibiting the goods, etc. But it would not authorize the sale of sugar, a horse, and much less a store or real estate. These powers are not incidental to the general power, nor included in it. Or we may take an example directly from the constitution itself. The United States has power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." This includes the power to create and appoint all inferior officers and to do all subordinate acts necessary and proper to execute the general power: as, to appoint assessors, collectors, keepers and disbursers of the public treasures. Without these subordinate powers the general power could not be executed. And when there is more than one mode by which this general power may be executed, it includes all. The agent is not confined to any one, unless a particular mode is pointed out. 4 Wheat. 410. All that the constitution requires is that it should be necessary and proper. One consequence of this doctrine is that there must be a power expressly granted as a stock to bear this incidental power, or otherwise it would be ingrafted on nothing.

A constructive power is one that is inferred, not from an express power, but from the general objects to be obtained from the grant, and, perhaps, in private powers sometimes from the general language in which they are granted. The broad distinction between them may be illustrated by two cases that came before the United States Court. The first is one we have already quoted, 4 Wheat. 317. The question in that case was whether the act incorporating the Bank of the United States was constitutional, or whether it lay beyond the limits of the delegated powers and was, therefore, merely void as usurped or an excess of power. The authority to create a corporation is nowhere expressly given, and if it exists it must be sought as incidental to some power that is specifically granted. The court decided that it was incidental to that of laying taxes as a keeper and disburser of the public treasure. This power could be executed only by the appointment of agents; and the United States might as well create an agent for receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public money as appoint a natural person or an artificial one already created. In the case of Osborn vs. The United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 859, the general question was presented again, and reargued, and the court reaffirmed their former decision, but, more distinctly than before, adding an important qualification. They might not only create an artificial person, but clothe it with such powers and qualities as would enable it with reasonable convenience to perform its specific duties. The taxes are collected at one end of the country and paid out at another, and the bank instead of removing the specie might pay it where collected, and repay themselves by purchasing a bill of exchange in another place, and this could be conveniently and economically done only by a power of dealing in exchange generally, which when reduced to its last analysis is merely buying specie at one place and paying for it at another. It is in this way, and this only, that the bank got its general power of dealing in exchange,—that it is essential and proper to enable it to perform its principal duty, that of transferring the funds of the United States. Thus, the authority to create a bank is incidental to that of receiving, keeping, and paying out the taxes, and is comprehended under the specific power. The argument is principally derived from Hamilton's report on a bank, which proved satisfactory to Washington, as that of Chief-Justice Marshall has to the public at large.

This is very different from a constructive power which is inferred not as included in any special grant, but from the general tenor of the power and the general objects to be obtained. The objects of the constitution are stated in the preamble, and they are to promote the common weal. But this is followed by the grant of specific powers. And it is the dictate of common sense as well as technical reasoning that this object is to be obtained by the due exercise of these powers. Where these fall short, none are granted; and if they are inadequate, the same consequence follows. No one would infer from a power to sell a ship one to sell a store, though the interest of the principal would thereby be promoted. The general power to regulate commerce is useful, and it is given, and it may be carried to its whole extent by having incidental powers ingrafted upon it. A general power to regulate the descent and distribution of intestate estates and the execution and proof of wills would be on many accounts useful, but it is not granted. The utility of a power is never a question. It must be expressly granted, or incidental to an express power,—that is, necessary and proper to carry into execution one expressly granted,—or it does not exist.

The other illustrative case is that of 16 Pet. 539–674. It will be found on a careful examination that in this a constructive power only is claimed. The only point involved in the case was the constitutionality of the statute of Pennsylvania under which Prigg was indicted as a kidnapper. The court decided this to be unconstitutional; and here its judicial functions properly terminated. But to arrive at this conclusion it was deemed necessary to determine that the general power of arresting and returning fugitives from labor and service was intrusted to the United States. It was not pretended that this power was expressly given, nor that it was incidental to any that was expressly given,—that is, conducive or proper to the execution of such a power. The court say that "in the exposition of this part of the constitution we shall limit ourselves to the considerations which appropriately and exclusively belong to it, without laying down any rules of interpretation of a more general nature." 16 Pet. 610. They do not, as in McCulloch's case, quote the express authority to which this is incidental; but a general argument is offered to prove that this power is most safely lodged with the United States, and that, therefore, it has been placed there exclusively. If the canon of criticism which we have endeavored to establish, and which is generally admitted, is correct, the existence of such a power cannot be inferred from its utility.

It will be seen, also, that this case stands in strong contrast with that of Martin vs. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304–326, in which the opinion was delivered by the same judge. This was on the validity of the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, authorizing an appeal from a final judgment of a state court to the supreme court of the United States; and perhaps in no case has the extent of the powers granted by the constitution been more fully and profoundly examined. In this case the court say that "the government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted by the constitution; and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication;"—that is, as the reasoning of the court in the whole opinion proves, such as are included in the express powers, and are necessary and proper to carry them into execution. Such was the uniform language of the court whenever this question was presented previously to the rebellion. The doctrine as now held, however, is somewhat broader, finding its exposition in the decision of the supreme court in the Legal Tender Cases; 12 Wall. 457. It is there said that it is not indispensable to the existence of any power claimed for the federal government that it can be found specified in the words of the constitution, or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantial powers expressly defined, or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred. Before any act of congress can be held to be unconstitutional, the court must be convinced that the means adopted were not appropriate or conducive to the execution of any or all of the powers of congress, or of the government,—not appropriate in any degree; and of the degree, the court is not to judge, but congress.

We have seen that the constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance of it are the supreme law of the land, and that of the true meaning of these the supreme court, which is nothing else than the United States, is the rightful expositor. This necessarily results from their sovereignty. But the United States government is one of delegated powers; and nothing is better established, both by technical reasoning and common sense, than this,—that a delegate can exercise only that power which is delegated to him. All acts beyond are simply void, and create no obligation. It is a maxim also of constitutional law that the powers of sovereignty not delegated to the United States are reserved to the states. But in so complex an affair as that of government, controversies will arise as to what is given and what is reserved,—doubts as to the dividing line. When this is the case, who is to decide? This is a difficulty which the convention did not undertake to settle.

To avoid all controversy as far as possible, the plainest words in granting powers to the United States were used which the language affords. Still further to preclude doubts, the convention added, at the close of the seventeen powers expressly given, this clause: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." Art. 1, § 8. This clause contains no grant of power. But in the Articles of Confederation, which was a compact between the states as independent sovereignties, the word EXPRESSLY was used; and a doubt troubled congress how far incidental powers were included. Articles of Confederation, art. 2. This clause was introduced to remove that doubt. It covered incidental, but not constructive, powers.

Strange as it may appear, both those who wished larger powers granted to the United States, and, in the language of that day, thought that things must be worse before they could be better, and those who honestly feared that too much power was granted, fixed their eyes on this clause; and perhaps no part of the constitution gave greater warmth to the controversy than this. To disarm the designing and counteract the fears of the timid, the tenth amendment was offered by the friends of the constitution. But so jealous were parties of each other that it was offered in the convention of Massachusetts by Governor Hancock, who favored and had the confidence of the opposition, though it was in the handwriting of Mr. Parsons, afterwards chief-justice. Life of Chief-Justice Parsons. That amendment is in these words: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or the people." Were the words of the original constitution and the amendment both stricken out, it would leave the true construction unaltered. Story, Const. § 1232. Both are equally nugatory in fact; but they have an important popular use. The amendment formally admits that certain rights are reserved to the states, and these rights must be sovereign.

We have seen that, within their limited powers, the United States are the natural expositors of the constitution and laws; that when a case affecting individual rights arises, the supreme court stands for the United States, and that they have the sole right to explain and enforce the laws and constitution. But their power is confined to the facts before them, and they have no power to explain them in the form of an edict to affect other rights and cases. Beyond these powers the states are sovereign, and their acts are equally unexaminable. Of the separating line between the powers granted and the powers withheld, the constitution provides no judge. Between sovereigns there can be no common judge, but an arbiter mutually agreed upon. If that power is given to one party, that may draw all power to itself, and it establishes a relation not of equal sovereignties, but of sovereign and subject. On this subject the constitution is silent. The great men who formed it did not undertake to solve a question that in its own nature could not be solved. Between equals it made neither superior, but trusted to the mutual forbearance of both parties. A larger confidence was placed in an enlightened public opinion as the final umpire; and not until the war of the rebellion was this conflict between the two sovereignties finally settled by the ultima ratio regum. The status of the states and their political rights under the constitution have been considered at large by the supreme court in the case of Texas vs. White, 7 Wall. 700. The student of constitutional law will find in the opinion of the court a masterly discussion of the delicate question of the relations of the state and federal governments. It is there held that authority to suppress rebellion is found in the constitutional power to suppress insurrection, and carry on war; authority to provide for the restoration of state governments under the constitution when suspended and overthrown is derived from the obligation of the United States to guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government. The unity of the states never was a purely artificial and arbitrary relation. It began among the colonies, and grew out of common origin, mutual sympathies, kindred principles, similar interests, and geographical relations. It was confirmed and strengthened by the necessities of war, and received definite form and character and sanction from the Articles of Confederation. By these the Union was solemnly declared to be perpetual; and when these articles were found to be inadequate to the exigencies of the country, the constitution was ordained "to form a more perfect union." But the perpetuity and indissolubility of the Union by no means imply the loss of distinct and individual existence, or of the right of self-government by the states. On the contrary, it may, not unnecessarily, be said that the preservation of the states and the maintenance of their government are as much within the design and care of the constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the national government. The constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible states.

UNITY. An agreement or coincidence of certain qualities in the title of a joint-estate or an estate in common.

In a joint-estate there must exist four unities: that of interest, for a joint-tenant cannot be entitled to one period of duration or quantity of interest in lands, and the other to a different; one cannot be tenant for life and the other for years: that of title, and, therefore, their estates must be created by one and the same act; that of time, for their estates must be vested at one and the same period, as well as by one and the same title; and, lastly, the unity of possession: hence joint-tenants are seised per my et per tout, or by the half or moiety and by all: that is, each of them has an entire possession as well of every parcel as of the whole. 2 Bla. Com. 179; Co. Litt. 188.

Coparceners must have the unities of interest, title, and possession.

In tenancies in common, the unity of possession is alone required; 2 Bla. Com. 192. See ESTATE IN COMMON; ESTATE OF COPARCENARY; ESTATE OF JOINT-TENANCY; TENANT; Tud. L. Cas. R. P. 876.

UNITY OF POSSESSION. This term is used to designate the possession by one person of several estates or rights. For example, a right to an estate to which an easement is attached, or the dominant estate, and to an estate which an easement incumbers, or the servient estate, in such case the easement is extinguished; 3 Mas. 172; Poph. 166; Latch, 153. And see Cro. Jac. 121. But a distinction has been made between a thing that has its being by prescription, and one that has its being ex jure naturæ: in the former case unity of possession will extinguish the easement; in the latter, for example, the case of a watercourse, the unity will not extinguish it; Pothier, Contr. 166.

By the Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 801, every servitude is extinguished when the estate to which it is due and the estate owing it are united in the same hands. But it is necessary that the whole of the two estates should belong to the same proprietor; for if the owner of one estate only acquires the other in part or in common with another person, confusion does not take effect. See MERGER.

UNIVERSAL AGENT. One appointed to do all the acts which the principal can personally do, and which he may lawfully delegate the power to another to do. Such an agency may potentially exist; but it is difficult to conceive of its practical existence, since it puts the agent completely in the place of the principal; Story, Ag. § 21.

UNIVERSAL LEGACY. In Civil Law. A testamentary disposition by which the testator gives to one or several persons the whole of the property which he leaves at his decease. La. Civ. Code, art. 1606; Code Civ. art. 1003; Pothier, Donations testamentaires, c. 2, s. 1, § 1.

UNIVERSAL PARTNERSHIP. The name of a species of partnership by which all the partners agree to put in common all their property, universorum bonorum, not only what they then have, but also what they shall acquire. Pothier, Du Contr. de Société, n. 29.

In Louisiana, universal partnerships are allowed: but property which may accrue to one of the parties after entering into the partnership, by donation, succession, or legacy, does not become common stock, and any stipulation to that effect, previous to the obtaining the property aforesaid, is void. La. Civ. Code, art. 2829–2834. See PARTNERSHIP.

UNIVERSAL REPRESENTATION. In Scotch Law. The heir universally represents his ancestor, i.e. is responsible for his debts. Originally, this responsibility extended only to the amount of the property to which he succeeded; but afterwards certain acts on the part of the heir were held sufficient to make him liable for all the debts of the ancestor. Bell, Dict. Passive Titles.

UNIVERSITAS JURIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A quantity of things of various kinds, corporeal and incorporeal, taken together as a whole, e.g. an estate. It is used in contradistinction to universitas facti, which is a whole made up of corporeal units. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 149.

UNIVERSITAS RERUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Several things not mechanically united, but which, taken together, in some legal respects are regarded as one whole. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 149.

UNIVERSITY. The name given to certain societies or corporations which are seminaries of learning where youth are sent to finish their education. Among the civilians, by this term is understood a corporation.

UNIVERSITY COURT. See CHANCELLOR'S COURTS IN THE TWO UNIVERSITIES.

UNJUST. That which is done against the perfect rights of another; that which is against the established law; that which is opposed to a law which is the test of right and wrong. 1 Toul. tit. prél. n. 5; Aust. Jur. 276, n.; Hein. Leç. El. § 1080.

UNKNOWN. When goods have been stolen from some person unknown, they may be so described in the indictment; but if the owner be really known, an indictment alleging the property to belong to some person unknown is improper. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 651; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 512; 8 C. & P. 773; 12 Pick. 174.

In an indictment, where the name of the defendant is unknown, and he refuses to disclose it, he may be described as a person whose name is to the jurors unknown, but who is personally brought before them by the keeper of the prison; 7 Ired. 27; but an indictment against him as a person to the jurors unknown, without something to ascertain whom the grand jury meant to designate, will be insufficient; R. & R. 489. The practice is to indict the defendant by a specific name, as, John No-name, and if he pleads in abatement, to send in a new bill, inserting the real name, which he then discloses, by which he is bound. This course is in some states prescribed by statute; 5 Iowa, 484. So matters of fact not vital to the accusation, may be proximately described; 53 N. H. 484; 125 Mass. 387, 394. See Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. §§ 104, 111, 156. See INDICTMENT.

UNLAGE (Sax.). An unjust law. Cowel.

UNLAW. In Scotch Law. A witness was formerly inadmissible who was not worth the king's unlaw,—i. e. the sum of £10 Scots, then the common fine for absence from court and for small delinquencies. Bell, Dict.

UNLAWFUL. That which is contrary to law.

There are two kinds of contracts which are unlawful,—those which are void, and those which are not. When the law expressly prohibits the transaction in respect of which the agreement is entered into, and declares it to be void, it is absolutely so; 3 Binn. 533. But when it is merely prohibited, without being made void, although unlawful it is not void; 12 S. & R. 237; 8 East, 236; 3 Taunt. 244. See CONDITION; VOID.

UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY. In Criminal Law. A disturbance of the public peace by three or more persons who meet together with an intent mutually to assist each other in the execution of some unlawful enterprise of a private nature, with force and violence. If they move forward towards its execution, it is then a rout; and if they actually execute their design, it amounts to a riot; 4 Bla. Com. 140; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 65, s. 9; Comyns, Dig. Forcible Entry (D 10); Viner, Abr. Riots, etc. (A).

UNLAWFULLY. In Pleading. This word is frequently used in indictments in the description of the offence: it is necessary when the crime did not exist at common law, and when a statute, in describing an offence which it creates, uses the word; 1 Mood. C. C. 339; but is unnecessary whenever the crime existed at common law and is manifestly illegal: 1 Chit. Cr. L. *241; 2 Rolle, Abr. 82; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); 1 Ill. 199; 2 id. 120; L. R. 2 Cr. Cas. Res. 161.

UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES. Such damages as are unascertained. In general, such damages cannot be set off. No interest will be allowed on unliquidated damages; 1

Bouv. Inst. n. 1108. See LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

UNQUES (L. Fr.). Still; yet. This barbarous word is frequently used in pleas: as, Ne unques executor, Ne unques guardian, Ne unques accouple; and the like.

UNSEATED LAND. A phrase used in Pennsylvania to designate uncultivated land subject to taxation. A tract of land ceases to be unseated as soon as it is actually occupied with a view to permanent residence; 7 W. & S. 248; 5 Watts, 382. See 1 Pennypacker (Pa.) 57.

UNSEAWORTHY SHIP. A shipowner's warranty of seaworthiness implies that his vessel is in a fit condition to proceed on the voyage for which she is chartered with safety to her cargo and crew. Unseaworthiness may arise from lack of necessary charts, nautical instruments, cordage, sails, anchors, or provisions; from defect or rottenness in timbers; if a steamer, from defective or insufficient machinery; or from being undermanned; Foard, Merch. Shipp. 339–350; Flanders, Shipp. 62–84.

See SEAWORTHINESS.

UNSOLEMN WAR. That war which is not carried on by the highest power in the states between which it exists, and which lacks the formality of a declaration. Grotius, de Jure Bel. et Pac. l. 1, c. 3, § 4. A formal declaration to the enemy is now disused, but there must be a formal public act proceeding from the competent source: with us, it has been said, it must be an act of congress; 1 Kent, 55.

UNSOUND MIND, UNSOUND MEMORY. These words have been adopted in several statutes, and sometimes indiscriminately used, to signify not only lunacy, which is periodical madness, but also a permanent adventitious insanity as distinguished from idiocy. 1 Ridg. P. C. 518; 3 Atk. 171.

The term unsound mind seems to have been used in those statutes in the same sense as insane; but they have been said to import that the party was in some such state as was contradistinguished from idiocy and from lunacy, and yet such as made him a proper subject of a commission to inquire of idiocy and lunacy; Shelf. Lun. 5; Ray, Med. Jur. prél. § 8; 8 Ves. 66; 12 id. 447; 19 id. 286; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 573; Coop. Ch. Cas. 108. INSANITY.

UNSOUNDNESS. See SOUNDNESS.

UNTIL. When a charter continues the incorporation of a company until a day named, until is exclusive in its meaning, unless the context show that the contrary is intended; 17 N. Y. 502; 120 Mass. 94; Ang. & A. Corp. § 778 a.

UNWHOLESOME FOOD. Food not fit to be eaten; food which if eaten would be injurious.

Although the law does not, in general, consider a sale to be a warranty of goodness of the quality of a personal chattel, yet it is otherwise with regard to food and liquor when sold for consumption; 1 Rolle, Abr. 90, pl. 1, 2. See ADULTERATION; HEALTH.

UPLIFTED HAND. When a man accused of a crime is arraigned, he is required to raise his hand, probably in order to identify the person who pleads. Perhaps for the same reason when a witness adopts a particular mode of taking an oath, as, when he does not swear upon the gospel, but by Almighty God, he is requested to hold up his hand.

UPPER BENCH. The king's bench was so called during Cromwell's protectorate, when Rolle was chief-justice. 3 Bla. Com. 202.

URBAN SERVITUDES. All servitudes are established either for the use of houses or for the use of lands. Those of the first kind are called urban servitudes, whether the buildings to which they are due be situated in the city or in the country. Those of the second kind are called rural servitudes.

The principal kinds of urban servitudes are the following: the right of support; that of drip; that of drain, or of preventing the drain; that of view or of lights, or of preventing the view or lights from being obstructed; that of raising buildings or walls, or of preventing them from being raised; that of passage; and that of drawing water. See 3 Toullier, 441; La. Civ. Code, arts. 710, 711.

URBS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A walled city. Often used for civitas. Ainsworth, Dict. It is the same as oppidum, only larger. Urbs, or urbs aurea, meant Rome. Du Cange. In the case of Rome, urbs included the suburbs. Dig. 50. 16. 2. pr. It is derived from urbum, a part of the plough by which the walls of a city are first marked out. Ainsworth, Dict.

URE. Custom, habit. Toml.

USAGE. Uniform practice.

This term and custom are now used interchangeably, though custom seems to have been originally confined to local usages immemorially existing; Browne, Us. & Cust. 13.

A usage must be established; that is it must be known, certain, uniform, reasonable, and not contrary to law; but it may be of very recent origin; 3 Wash. C. C. 150; 5 Binn. 287; 9 Pick. 426; 4 B. & Ald. 210; 3 Duer, 264; 15 How. 539; 69 Penn. 374; 80 Ill. 493; 49 N. Y. 464.

The usages of trade afford ground upon which a proper construction may be given to contracts. By their aid the indeterminate intention of parties and the nature and extent of their contracts arising from mere implications or presumptions, and acts of an equivocal character may be ascertained; and the meaning of words and doubtful expressions may become known; 13 Pick. 182; 2 Sumn. 569; 2 Gill & J. 136; 5 Wheat. 326; 2 C. & P. 525; 1 Caines, 45; 1 N. & M'C. 519; 5 Ohio, 436; 6 Pet. 715; 15 Ala. 123; 26

Vt. 136; 13 Wis. 198; 15 Ark. 491; 67 N. Y. 338; 25 Me. 401.

Modern English cases incline to extend the functions of usages, but in America the authorities vary greatly; Lawson, Us. & Cust. 25; 7 E. & B. 266; 32 Vt. 616; 15 Mich. 206; 2 Sumn. 377; 10 W. N. C. Pa. 347. See CUSTOM; Lawson, Browne, Us. & Cust.

USANCE. In Commercial Law. The time which, by usage or custom, is allowed in certain countries for the payment of a bill of exchange. Pothier, Contr. du Change. n. 15.

The time of one, two, or three months after the date of the bill, according to the custom of the places between which the exchanges run.

Double or treble is double or treble the usual time, and half usance is half the time. Where it is necessary to divide a month upon a half usance (which is the case when the usance is for one month or three), the division, notwithstanding the difference in the length of the months, contains fifteen days. Byles, Bills, *80, *205.

USE. A confidence reposed in another, who was made tenant of the land, or terre tenant, that he would dispose of the land according to the intention of the cestui que use, or him to whose use it was granted, and suffer him to take the profits. Plowd. 352; Gilb. Uses, 1; Cornish, Uses, 13; Saund. Uses, 2; Co. Litt. 272 b; 1 Co. 121; 2 Bla. Com. 328.

A right in one person, called the cestui que use, to take the profits of land of which another has the legal title and possession, together with the duty of defending the same and of making estates thereof according to the direction of the cestui que use.

Uses have been said to have been derived from the fidei commissa of the Roman law; but see TRUST. It was the duty of a Roman magistrate, the prætor fidei commissarius, whom Bacon terms the particular chancellor for uses, to enforce the observance of this confidence. Inst. 2. 23. 2. They were introduced into England by the ecclesiastics in the reign of Edward III., before 1377, for the purpose of avoiding the statutes of mortmain; and the clerical chancellors of those times held them to be fidei commissa, and binding in conscience. To obviate many inconveniences and difficulties which had arisen out of the doctrine and introduction of uses, the Statute of 27 Henry VIII. c. 10, commonly called the Statute of Uses, or, in conveyances and pleadings, the statute for transferring uses into possession, was passed. It enacts that "when any person shall be seised of lands, etc. to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or body politic, the person or corporation entitled to the use in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life, or years, or otherwise, shall from thenceforth stand and be seised or possessed of the land, etc. of and in the like estate as they have in the use, trust, or confidence; and that the estates of the persons so seised to the uses shall be deemed to be in him or them that have the use, in such quality, manner, form, and condition as they had before in the use." The statute thus executes the use,—that is, it conveys the possession to the use, and transfers the use to the possession, and, in this manner, making the cestui que use complete owner of the lands and tenements, as well at law as in equity; 2 Bla. Com. 333.

A modern use has, therefore, been defined to be an estate of right which is acquired through the operation of the statute of 27 Henry VIII. c. 10; and which, when it may take effect according to the rules of the common law, is called the legal estate, and when it may not is denominated a use, with a term descriptive of its modification; Cornish, Uses, 35.

The common-law judges decided, in the construction of this statute, that a use could not be raised upon a use; Dy. 155 (A); and that on a feoffment to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs in trust for C and his heirs, the statute executed only the first use, and that the second was a mere nullity. The judges also held that as the statute mentioned only such persons as were seised to the use of others, it did not extend to a term of years, or other chattel interests, of which a termer is not seised but only possessed. Bacon, Law Tr. 335; Poph. 76; Dy. 369; 2 Bla. Com. 336. The rigid literal construction of the statute by the courts of law again opened the doors of the chancery courts; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 448.

Uses and trusts are often spoken of together by the older and some modern writers, the distinction being those trusts which were of a permanent nature and required no active duty of the trustee being called uses; those in which the trustee had an active duty to perform, as, the payment of debts, raising portions, and the like, being called special or active trusts, or simply trusts; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 448.

For the creation of a use, a consideration either valuable, as, money, or good, as relationship in certain degrees, was necessary; 3 Swanst. 591; 7 Co. 40; 17 Mass. 257; 4 N. H. 229, 397; 14 Johns. 210. See RESULTING USE. The property must have been in esse, and such that seisin could be given; Crabb, R. P. § 1610; Cro. Eliz. 401. Uses were alienable, although in many respects resembling choses in action, which were not assignable at common law; 2 Bla. Com. 331: when once raised, it might be granted or devised in fee, in tail, for life, or for years; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 455.

The effect of the Statute of Uses was much restricted by the construction adopted by the courts: it practically resulted, it has been said, in the addition of these words, to the use, to every conveyance; Will. R. P. 133. The intention of the statute was to destoy the estate of the feoffee to use, and to transfer it by the very act which created it to the cestui que use, as if the seisin or estate of the feoffee, together with the use, had, uno flatu, passed from the feoffor to the cestui que use. A very full and clear account of the history and present condition of the law of uses is given by Professor Washburn, 2 Real Prop. 91–156, which is of particular value to the American student. See, as to a use upon a use, Tudor, Lead. Cas. on Real Prop. 335. Consult, also, Spence, Eq. Jur.; Bispham, Eq.; Cornish, Uses; Bac. Law Tr.; Greenl. Cruise, Dig.; see CHARITABLE USES; TRUSTS.

In its untechnical sense, the word use has been variously construed; 20 Ind. 398; 59 Me. 582; 107 Mass. 290, 324; 11 Rich. 621; thus, "to use a port" means to enter it, so as to derive advantage from its protection; 48 N. Y. 624.

In Civil Law. A right of receiving so much of the natural profits of a thing as is necessary to daily sustenance. It differs from usufruct, which is a right not only to use, but to enjoy. 1 Bro. Civ. Law, 184.

USE AND OCCUPATION. When a contract has been made, either by express or implied agreement, for the use of a house or other real estate, where there was no amount of rent fixed and ascertained, the landlord can recover a reasonable rent in an action of assumpsit for use and occupation; 2 Aik. 252; 7 J. J. Marsh. 6; 4 Day, 228; 13 Johns. 240, 297; 4 Hen. & M. 161; 15 Mass. 270; 10 S. & R. 251. This is under the Stat. of Westm. 2.

The action for use and occupation is founded not on a privity of estate, but on a privity of contract; 3 S. & R. 500; therefore it will not lie where the possession is tortious; 2 N. & M'C. 156; 3 S. & R. 500; 6 N. H. 298; 6 Ohio, 371; 14 Mass. 95. It will lie for the occupation of land in another state; 3 S. & R. 502. See Jacks. & G. Landl. & T. 178.

USEFUL. That which may be put into beneficial practice.

The Patent Act of Congress of July 8, 1870, sect. 6, in describing the subjects of patents, mentions "new and useful art," and "new and useful improvement." To entitle the inventor to a patent, his invention must, to a certain extent, be beneficial to the community, and not be for an unlawful object, or frivolous, or insignificant; 1 Mas. 182; 1 Pet. C. C. 322; Baldw. 303; 14 Pick. 217; Paine, 203. See PATENT.

USER. The enjoyment of a thing.

USES, STATUTE OF. See TRUSTS; USES.

USHER. This word is said to be derived from huissier, and is the name of an inferior officer in some English courts of law. Archb. Pr. 25. The office of usher of the court of chancery was abolished is 1852.

USQUE AD MEDIUM FILUM VIÆ (Lat.). To the middle thread of the way. See AD MEDIUM FILUM; 7 Gray, 22.

USUCAPTION, or USUCAPION (Lat. usucaptio, or usucapio). In Civil Law. The manner of acquiring property in things by the lapse of time required by law.

It differs from prescription, which has the same sense, and means, in addition, the manner of acquiring and losing, by the effect of time regulated by law, all sorts of rights and actions. Merlin, Répert. Prescription; Ayliffe, Pand. 320; Vattel, b. 2, c. 2, § 140. See PRESCRIPTION.

USUFRUCT. In Civil Law. The right of enjoying a thing the property of which is vested in another, and to draw from the same all the profit, utility, and advantage which it may produce, provided it be without altering the substance of the thing.

Perfect usufruct is of things which the usufructuary can enjoy without altering their substance, though their substance may be diminished or deteriorated naturally by time or by the use to which they are applied; as, a house, a piece of land, animals, furniture, and other movable effects.

Imperfect or quasi usufruct is of things which would be useless to the usufructuary if he did not consume and expend them or change the substance of them: as, money, grain, liquors. In this case the alteration may take place; Pothier, Tr. du Douaire, n. 194; Ayliffe, Pand. 319; Pothier, Pand. tom. 6, p. 91.

USUFRUCTUARY. In Civil Law. One who has the right and enjoyment of a usufruct.

Domat, with his usual clearness, points out the duties of the usufructuary, which are—to make an inventory of the things subject to the usufruct, in the presence of those having an interest in them; to give security for their restitution when the usufruct shall be at an end; to take good care of the things subject to the usufruct; to pay all taxes and claims which arise while the thing is in his possession as a ground-rent; and to keep the thing in repair at his own expense. Lois Civ. liv. 1, t. 11, s. 4. See ESTATE FOR LIFE.

USURA MARITIMA. See FOENUS NAUTICUM.

USURPATION. Torts. The unlawful assumption of the use of property which belongs to another; an interruption or the disturbing a man in his right and possession. Toml.

According to Lord Coke, there are two kinds of usurpation: first, when a stranger, without right, presents to a church and his clerk is admitted; and, second, when a subject uses a franchise of the king without lawful authority. Co. Litt. 277 b.

In Governmental Law. The tyrannical assumption of the government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country.

USURPED POWER. In Insurance. An invasion from abroad, or an internal rebellion, where armies are drawn up against each other, when the laws are silent, and when the firing of towns becomes unavoidable. These words cannot mean the power of a common mob; 2 Marsh. Ins. 390. By an article of the printed proposals which are considered as making a part of the contract of insurance, it is provided that "no loss of damage by fire, happening by any invasion, foreign enemy, or any military or usurped power whatsoever, will be made good by this company."

USURPER. One who assumes the right of government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country. Toul. Droit Civ. n. 32.

USURY. The excess over the legal rate charged to a borrower for the use of money. Originally, the word was applied to all interest reserved for the use of money; and in the early ages taking such interest was not allowed. In the later Roman law usury was sanctioned; and it is said that taking usury was not an offence at common law; Tyler, Usury, 64; but see Ord. Usury, 17.

Unless there is a law limiting the rate of interest that can be charged for money, there can be no usury; 31 Ark. 484.

"The shifts and devices of usurers to evade the statutes against usury have taken every shape and form that the wit of man could devise, but none have been allowed to prevail. Courts have been astute in getting at the true intent of the parties and giving effect to the statute;" 62 N. Y. 346. Thus the supreme court of Vermont decided where the lender obtained from the borrower, before the loan was made, a release under seal of all claims and demands against himself, that the borrower might recover back usurious interest, on the ground that the release, to be effective, must be free from the element of pressure; 15 C. L. J. 341; 72 Penn. 54.

There must be a loan in contemplation of the parties; 7 Pet. 109; 1 Iowa, 252; 14 N. Y. 93; 6 Ind. 232; and if there be a loan, however disguised, the contract will be usurious, if it be so in other respects. Where a loan was made of depreciated bank-notes, to be repaid in sound funds, to enable the borrower to pay a debt he owed, dollar for dollar, it was considered as not being usurious; 1 Meigs, 585. The bonâ fide sale of a note, bond, or other security at a greater discount than would amount to legal interest is not per se a loan, although the note may be indorsed by the seller and he remains responsible; 9 Pet. 103; 1 Iowa, 30; 6 Ohio St. 19; 29 Miss. 212; 10 Md. 57. But if a note, bond, or other security be made with a view to evade the laws of usury, and afterwards sold for a less amount than the interest, the transaction will be considered a loan; 15 Johns. 44; 12 S. & R. 46; 6 Ohio St. 19; 4 Jones, No. C. 399; and a sale of a man's own note indorsed by himself will be considered a loan. It is a general rule that a contract which in its inception is unaffected by usury can never be invalidated by any subsequent usurious transaction; 7 Pet. 109; 10 Md. 57. On the other hand, when the contract was originally usurious, and there is a substitution by a new contract, the latter will generally be considered usurious; 15 Mass. 96.

There must be a contract for the return of the money at all events; for if the return of the principal with interest, or the principal only, depend upon a contingency, there can be no usury; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 715; 1 Wall. 604; but if the contingency extend only to interest, and the principal be beyond the reach of hazard, the lender will be guilty of usury if he receive interest beyond the amount allowed by law; but see these cases. Where the principal is put to hazard in insurances, annuities, and bottomry, the parties may charge and receive greater interest than is allowed by law in common cases, and the transaction will not be usurious; Ord, Usury, 23, 39, 64; 2 Pet. 537. See 18 Wall. 375.

To constitute usury, the borrower must not only be obliged to return the principal at all events, but more than lawful interest: this part of the agreement must be made with full consent and knowledge of the contracting parties; 3 B. & P. 154. When the contract is made in a foreign country, the rate of interest allowed by the laws of that country may be charged, and it will not be usurious, although greater than the amount fixed by law in this; Story, Confl. of Laws, § 292. Parties may contract for interest according to the place of the contract or the place of performance; 1 Wall. 298; 12 id. 226; 64 N. C. 33. Where there is no agreement made, the law of the place of the contract governs, in the absence of any intent to evade the usury laws; 57 Ga. 370; 72 N. Y. 472; 32 Ind. 16. A note made, dated, and payable in New York, without intent of maker that it should be elsewhere discounted, if negotiated in another state at a rate of interest lawful there, but excessive in New York, is usurious; 77 N. Y. 573.

To constitute usury, both parties must be cognizant of the facts which make the transaction usurious; 44 Barb. 521; but a mistake in law will not protect the parties; 9 Mass. 49; though a miscalculation will, it seems; 2 Cow. 770. An agreement by a mortgagor to pay taxes on the mortgage debt is not necessarily usurious; 24 Md. 62; nor is a clause in a bill of exchange, providing attorney fees for collection; 34 Ind. 149; and so of a mortgage; 30 Iowa, 131; s. c. 6 Am. Rep. 663.

A bona fide sale by one person of a bond of another, at an exorbitant rate of discount, is not illegal; 3 Stockt. 362. A sale of a note or mortgage for less than its face, with a guarantee of payment in full, is not usurious; 35 Barb. 484; nor is a contract to pay a bushel and a half of corn within a year, for the loan of a bushel; 12 Fla. 552. An agreement to pay interest on accrued interest is not invalid; 10 Allen, 32; 55 N. Y. 621; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 352; but it has been held that compounding interest on a note is usurious; 76 N. C. 314.

The ordinary commissions allowed by the usages of trade may be charged without tainting a contract with usury; but it must plainly appear that the commissions are charged for other services, and are not merely a device to evade the law; 2 Pat. & H. 110. Commission may be charged by a merchant for accepting a bill; 18 Ark. 456; but a commission charged in addition to interest for advancing money is usurious; 12 La. An. 660. Where a banker discounts a bill payable in a distant place, he may charge the usual rate of exchange on that place; but if such charge be an excess of the usual rate it will be considered a device to cover usurious interest; 3 Ind. 53; see 93 U. S. 344.

Where the payment of usurious interest depends upon the will of the borrower, as, where he may discharge himself from it by prompt payment of the principal, it is considered in the light of a penalty, but does not make the contract usurious; 6 Cow. 653. Where a gratuity is given to influence the making of a loan, it will be considered usurious; 7 Ohio St. 387. Where a bank which by its charter is prohibited from making loans at over six per cent. makes one at seven, such a contract being prohibited, the courts will not assist the bank in enforcing it; 26 Barb. 595. The burden of proof is on the person pleading usury; 22 Ga. 193; and where the contract is valid on its face, affirmative proof must be made that the agreement was corruptly made to evade the law; 97 U. S. 13. Where parties exchange their notes for mutual accommodation, and both or either are sold at a higher than the legal rate, they are usurious; Hill & D. 65.

The common practice of reserving the interest on negotiable paper at the time of making the loan, although its effect is to cause the borrower to pay more than the legal rate, is very ancient, having been practised by the Athenian bankers, and is sanctioned by law; Sewell, Banking.

The offence of taking usury is not condoned by the absence of intent to violate the statute; 50 N. Y. 437; but see 20 Wisc. 407.

The one who has contracted to pay usury may set up the defence; 55 Ind. 341; 17 Kans. 355; and so may his privies; 49 N. Y. 636; 47 Ala. 362; and his surety; 39 Ind. 106; but see 50 Vt. 105; 35 N. J. 285; or a guarantor; 20 Me. 28; but one who buys an equity of redemption cannot set up the defence against the mortgage; 24 N. J. Eq. 120; nor can a second mortgagee set up usury as a defence to a prior mortgage; 17 Kans. 355; but see 26 Ind. 94; 59 Barb. 239. A usurer cannot take advantage of his own usury to avoid his contract; 33 N. Y. 31.

The defence of usury must be supported by clear proof; 57 Ill. 138; 36 Wisc. 390; which may be extrinsic to the contract; 9 Pet. 418; an express agreement for usury need not be proved; 2 Pick. 145.

Congress has adopted the following legislation on this subject for the government of national banks: Any association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state, territory, or district where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such state under this title. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the state, or territory, or district, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. And the purchase, discount, or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount, or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest. 3d June, 1864, § 30, R. S. § 5197.

The taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the preceding section, when knowingly done, shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. In case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives, may recover back, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same, provided such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious action occurred. 3d June, 1864, § 30, R. S. 5198. That suits, actions, and proceedings against any association under this title may be had in any circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases. 18th Feb. 1875, c. 80, v. 18, R. S. § 5198.

National banks may take the rate of interest allowed by the state to natural persons generally, and a higher rate, if state banks of issue are authorized by the laws of the state to take it; 18 Wall. 409.

If no rate of interest is established by the laws of the state, national banks are prohibited from charging more than seven per cent. interest. This is also the law where the state law expressly forbids a corporation to interpose the defence of usury to any action; 11 Blatch. 243. It is now conclusively settled that the penalty declared in sec. 30 of the act of 1864 for the exaction by a national bank of usurious interest is superior to and exclusive of any state penalty. Congress, which is the sole judge of the necessity for the creation of national banks, having brought them into existence, the states can exercise no control over them, or in any wise affect their operation, except so far as it may see proper to permit; 91 U. S. 29; 72 Penn. 209; 78 id. 228; 44 Ind. 298; 115 Mass. 539; contra, 57 N. Y. 100. A national bank is not justified in charging a usurious rate of interest because the statutes of the state permit usurious interest to be taken only by certain specified banks; 11 Bank. Mag. 787. The party entitled to recover may have judgment for twice the amount of all interest which he has paid within two years next preceding the date of beginning suit; 64 N. Y. 212. UTAH. One of the territories of the United States. The act establishing the territory was approved Sept. 9, 1850. The territory consists of that portion of the territory of the United States "bounded west by the state of California, on the north by the territory of Oregon, on the east by the summit of the Rocky Mountains, on the south by the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude." It is provided in the organic act that the United States may divide the territory into two or more territories in such manner and at such times as congress shall deem convenient and proper, or may attach any portion thereof to any other state or territory of the United States. The distribution of powers under the act is precisely the same as in the case of New Mexico. See NEW MEXICO.

UTERINE (Lat. uterus). Born of the same mother.

UTFANGTHEF. The right of a lord to punish a thief dwelling out of his liberty, and committing theft without the same, if taken within the jurisdiction of the manor. Cowel.

UTI POSSIDETIS (Lat. as you possess). In International Law. A phrase used to signify that the parties to a treaty are to retain possession of what they have acquired by force during the war. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law, 627.

UTRUBI. In Scotch Law. An interdict as to movables, by which the colorable possession of a bonâ fide holder is continued until the final settlement of a contested right: corresponding to uti possidetis as to heritable property. Bell, Dict.

UTTER. In Criminal Law. To offer; to publish.

To utter and publish a counterfeit note is to assert and declare, directly or indirectly, by words or actions, that the note offered is good. It is not necessary that it should be passed in order to complete the offence of uttering; 2 Binn. 338. It seems that reading out a document, although the party refuses to show it, is a sufficient uttering; Jebb, Cr. Cas. 282. See Leach, 251; Russ. & R. 113; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 301. The merely showing a false instrument with intent to gain a credit, when there was no intention or attempt made to pass it, it seems, would not amount to an uttering; Russ. & R. 200. And where the defendant placed a forged receipt for poor-rates in the hands of the prosecutor, for the purpose of inspection only, in order, by fraudulently representing himself as a person who had paid his poor-rates, to induce the prosecutor to advance money to a third person for whom the defendant proposed to become a surety for its repayment, this was held to be an uttering within the statute; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 475. And the rule there laid down is that a using of the forged instrument in some way, in order to get money or credit upon it, or by means of it, is sufficient to constitute an uttering.

The word uttering, used of notes, does not necessarily import that they are transferred as genuine; the terms include any delivery of a note for value (as by a sale of the notes as spurious) to another with the intent that they should be passed upon the public as genuine; 1 Abb. U. S. 135 (West. Dist. of Mich.).

The offence of uttering is complete when a forged instrument is offered; it need not be accepted; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 605; 48 Mo. 520. Recording a forged deed is uttering it; 27 Mich. 386; so is bringing suit on a forged paper; 20 Gratt. 733. The legal meaning of the word utter is in substance to offer; Bish. Cr. L. § 607.

UTTER BARRISTER. In English Law. Those barristers who plead without the bar, and are distinguished from benchers, or those who have been readers and who are allowed to plead within the bar, as the king's council are. See BARRISTER.

UXOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. A woman lawfully married.

V.

VACANCY. A place which is empty. The term is principally applied to cases where the office is not filled.

By the constitution of the United States, the president has the power to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate. See TENURE OF OFFICE; OFFICE; RESIGNATION; 1 So. L. Rev. N. S. 184.

VACANT POSSESSION. A term applied to an estate which has been abandoned by the tenant: the abandonment must be complete in order to make the possession vacant, and, therefore, if the tenant have goods on the premises it will not be so considered; 2 Chitty, Bail. 177; 2 Stra. 1064; Comyn, Landl. & T. 507, 517.

A dwelling-house furnished throughout, from which the owner has removed for a season, intending to return and resume possession, was held not vacant, within the meaning of a policy of insurance; 81 N. Y. 184.

VACANT SUCCESSION. An inheritance for which the heirs are unknown.

VACANTIA BONA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Goods without an owner. Such goods escheat.

VACATE. To annul; to render an act void: as, to vacate an entry which has been made on a record when the court has been imposed upon by fraud or taken by surprise.

VACATION. That period of time between the end of one term and beginning of another. During vacation, rules and orders are made in such cases as are urgent, by a judge at his chambers.

The Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 have made some changes in the vacations of the English Courts; see Whart. Lex; TERM.

VACATION BARRISTER. See BARRISTER.

VACCARIA (Lat. vacca, a cow). In Old English Law. A dairy-house. Co. Litt. 5 b.

VACCINATION. The Vaccination Act of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, requires that every child born in England shall be vaccinated within three months of its birth.

VADIUM MORTUUM (Lat.). A mortgage or dead pledge: it is a security given by the borrower of a sum of money, by which he grants to the lender an estate in fee, on condition that if the money be not repaid at the time appointed, the estate so put in pledge shall continue to the lender as dead or gone from the mortgagor. 2 Bla. Com. 257; 1 Powell, Mortg. 4.

VADIUM PONERE. To take bail for the appearance of a person in a court of justice. Toml.

VADIUM VIVUM (Lat.). A species of security by which the borrower of a sum of money made over his estate to the lender until he had received that sum out of the issues and profits of the land; it was so called because neither the money nor the lands were lost, and were not left in dead pledge, but this was a living pledge, for the profits of the land were constantly paying off the debt. Littleton, § 206; 1 Powell, Mortg. 3; Termes de la Ley.

VAGABOND. One who wanders about idly, who has no certain dwelling. The ordonnances of the French define a vagabond almost in the same terms. Dalloz, Dict. Vagabondage. See Vattel, liv. 1, § 219, n.

VAGRANT. A person who lives idly, without any settled home. A person who refuses to work, or goes about begging. This latter meaning is the common one in statutes punishing vagrancy. See 1 Wils. 331; 8 Term, 26. See TRAMP.

VAGRANT ACT. In English Law. The statute 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, which is an act for the punishment of idle and disorderly persons. 2 Chit. Stat. 145.

VAGUENESS. Uncertainty.

Certainty is required in contracts, wills, pleadings, judgments, and, indeed, in all the acts on which courts have to give a judgment, and if they be vague so as not to be understood, they are, in general, invalid; 5 B. & C. 583. A charge of frequent intemperance and habitual indolence is vague and too general; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 530. See CERTAINTY; NONSENSE; UNCERTAINTY.

VALESHERIA. See ENGLESHIRE.

VALOR BENEFICIORUM (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. The value of every ecclesiastical benefice and preferment, according to which the first-fruits and tenths are collected and paid. The valuation by which the clergy are at present rated was made 26 Hen. VIII., and is commonly called The King's Books. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 284*, n. 5.

VALOR MARITAGII (Lat.). The amount forfeited under the ancient tenures by a ward to a guardian who had offered her a marriage without disparagement, which she refused. It was so much as a jury would assess, or as any one would give bona fide, for the value of the marriage. Littleton, 110.

A writ which lay against the ward, on coming of full age, for that he was not married by his guardian, for the value of the marriage, and this though no convenient marriage had been offered. Termes de la Ley.

VALUABLE CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

VALUATION. The act of ascertaining the worth of a thing. The estimated worth of a thing.

It differs from price, which does not always afford a true criterion of value; for a thing may be bought very dear or very cheap. In some contracts, as in the case of bailments or insurances, the thing bailed or insured is sometimes valued at the time of making the contract, so that, if lost, no dispute may arise as to the amount of the loss; 2 Marshall, Inst. 620; 1 Caines, 80. Actual cost may be looked to as one element with others, in the ascertainment of value; 12 Heisk. 133. See POLICY.

VALUE. The utility of an object. The worth of an object in purchasing other goods. The first may be called value in use; the latter, value in exchange.

Value differs from price, q. v. The latter is applied to live cattle and animals; in a declaration, therefore, for taking cattle, they ought to be said to be of such a price; and in a declaration for taking dead chattels, or those which never had life, it ought to lay them to be of such a value; 2 Lilly, Abr. 629. See 119 Mass. 126.

VALUE RECEIVED. A phrase usually employed in a bill of exchange or promissory note, to denote that a consideration has been given for it. These words are not necessary; 11 A. & E. 702; 21 Wisc. 607; though it is otherwise in some states if the bill or note be not negotiable; 19 Conn. 7; 29 Ill. 104; extrinsic evidence is admissible between immediate parties to prove absence, failure, or illegality of consideration; 5 Allen, 589; 9 id. 45, 253.

The expression value received, when put in a bill of exchange, will bear two interpretations; the drawer of the bill may be presumed to acknowledge the fact that he has received value of the payee; 3 Maule & S. 351; 2 McLean, 213; or when the bill has been made payable to the order of the drawer and accepted, it implies that value has been received by the acceptor; 5 Maule & S. 65; 19 Barb. 409. In a promissory note, the expression imports value received from the payee; 5 B. & C. 360. See Parsons, Notes & B.

VALUED POLICY. A valued policy is one where the value has been set on the ship or goods insured, and this value has been inserted in the policy in the nature of liquidated damages, to save the necessity of proving it in case of loss. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1230. See POLICY.

VARIANCE. In Pleading and Practice. A disagreement or difference between two parts of the same legal proceeding which ought to agree together. Variances are between the writ and the declaration, and between the declaration, or bill in equity, and the evidence.

Variance in matter of substance is fatal to the action; 4 Ala. 319; 7 B. Monr. 271; 1 Ohio, 504; 10 Johns. 141; and is ground for demurrer or arrest of judgment; 3 Denio, 356; 3 Brev. 42; 7 T. B. Monr. 290; see 12 N. H. 396; but if in matter of form merely, must be pleaded in abatement; 1 Ill. 298; 1 McLean, 319; 3 Ala. 741; or special demurrer; 2 Hill, So. C. 585; and a variance between the allegations and evidence upon some material points only is as fatal as if upon all; 7 Taunt. 385; but, if it be merely formal or immaterial matter, will be disregarded; 7 Cra. 408; 11 Ala. 542. Slight variance from the terms of a written instrument which is professedly set out in the words themselves is fatal; Hempst. 294.

VASSAL. In Feudal Law. The name given to the holder of a fief bound to perform feudal service: this word was then always correlative to that of lord, entitled to such service.

The vassal himself might be lord of some other vassal.

In after-times, this word was used to signify a species of slave who owed servitude and was in a state of dependency on a superior lord. 2 Bla. Com. 53.

VAVASOUR (diminutive from vasalus, or, according to Bracton, from vas sortitus ad valitudinem). One who was in dignity next to a baron. Britton, 109; Bracton, lib. 1, c. 8. One who held of a baron. Encyc. Brit.

VECTIGALIA. In Roman Law. Duties which were paid to the prince for the importation and exportation of certain merchandise. They differed from tribute, which was a tax paid by each individual. Code, 4. 61. 5. 13.

VEJOURS. An obsolete word, which signified viewers or experts.

VENAL. Something that is bought. The term is generally applied in a bad sense; as, a venal office is an office which has been purchased.

VENDEE. A purchaser; a buyer.

VENDITION. A sale; the act of selling.

VENDITIONI EXPONAS (Lat.). That you expose to sale.

In Practice. The name of a writ of execution, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to sell goods or chattels, and in some states lands, which he has taken in execution by virtue of a fieri facias, and which remain unsold.

Under this writ the sheriff is bound to sell the property in his hands, and he cannot return a second time that he can get no buyers; Cowp. 406.

VENDITOR REGIS (Lat.). The king's salesman, or person who exposes to sale goods or chattels seized or distrained to answer any debt due to the king. Cowel. This office was granted by Edw. I. to Philip de Lordiner, but was seized into king's hands for abuse thereof. 2 Edw. II.

VENDOR. The seller; one who disposes of a thing in consideration of money.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT. The act of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 78, which substitutes forty for sixty years as the root of title, and amends in other ways the law of vendor and purchaser. Moz. & W.

VENDOR'S LIEN. An equitable lien allowed the vendor of land sold for the purchase-money, where the deed expresses, contrary to the fact, that the purchase-money is paid. Unless waived, the lien remains till the whole purchase-money is paid; 16 Ves. 329; 2 P. Wms. 291; 1 Vern. 267.

The lien exists against all the world except bonâ fide purchasers without notice; 1 Johns. Ch. 308; 9 Ind. 490; 34 Am. Rep. 612; s. c. 12 R. I. 92. If security is taken for the purchase-money, the court will look into the substance of the transaction and see if it was taken in lieu of the purchase-money; 3 Russ. 488. As a general rule, the lien does not prevail against creditors of purchaser; 7 Wheat. 46; 10 Barb. 626. This lien is recognized in New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Alabama, Arkansas, California, Georgia, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Kentucky, Tennessee, Texas. But to have effect it must be expressly reserved in Ohio, and the courts of the United States. In Kansas, Maine, Pennsylvania, North and South Carolina, the doctrine has been exploded; in Vermont and Virginia, abolished by statute. In Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire the doctrine has not been recognized by judicial decision. See notes to Mackreth vs. Symmons, 1 White & T. L. C. Eq. 447; 2 Washb. R. P. 509, n. 6; Perry, Trusts, § 232, n. See LIEN.

VENIRE FACIAS (Lat.). That you cause to come. According to the English law, the proper process to be issued on an indictment for any petit misdemeanor, on a penal statute, is a writ called venire facias.

It is in the nature of a summons to cause the party to appear; 4 Bla. Com. 18, 351. See Thomp. & M. Juries; 62.

VENIRE FACIAS JURATORES (Lat.). (Frequently called venire simply.)

The name of a writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to cause to come from the body of the county, before the court from which it issued, on some day certain and therein specified, a certain number of qualified citizens who are to act as jurors in the said court. Steph. Pl. 104; see 6 S. & R. 414; 3 Chitty, Pr. 797; JURY.

VENIRE FACIAS DE NOVO (Lat.). The name of a new writ of venire facias; this is awarded when, by reason of some irregularity or defect in the proceeding on the first venire, or the trial, the proper effect of the venire has been frustrated, or the verdict become void in law; as, for example, when the jury has been improperly chosen, or an uncertain, ambiguous, or defective verdict has been rendered. Steph. Pl. 120.

VENTE A REMERE. In French Law. A sale made, reserving a right to the seller to repurchase the property sold by returning the price paid for it.

The term is used in Canada and Louisiana. The time during which a repurchase may be made cannot exceed ten years, and, if by the agreement it so exceed, it shall be reduced to ten years. The time fixed for redemption must be strictly adhered to, and cannot be enlarged by the judge, nor exercised afterwards. La. Civ. Code, art. 1545–1549.

VENTER, VENTRE (Lat. the belly). The wife; for example, a man has three children by the first and one by the second venter. A child is said to be in ventre sa mère before it is born; while it is a fœtus.

VENTRE INSPICIENDO (Lat.). In English Law. A writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him that, in the presence of twelve men and as many women, he cause examination to be made whether a woman therein named is with child or not, and if with child, then about what time it will be born, and that he certify the same. It is granted in a case when a widow, whose husband had lands in fee-simple, marries again soon after her husband's death, and declares herself pregnant by her first husband, and, under that pretext, withholds the lands from the next heir; Cro. Eliz. 506; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 15.

VENUE (L. Lat. visnetum, neighborhood. The word was formerly spelled visne. Co. Litt. 125 a).

The county in which the facts are alleged to have occurred, and from which the jury are to come to try the issue. Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 102; Cowp. 176; 1 How. 241. Some certain place must be alleged as the place of occurrence for each traversable fact; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 20). Generally, in modern pleading, in civil practice, no special allegation is needed in the body of the declaration, the venue in the margin being understood to be the place of occurrence till the contrary is shown; Hempst. 236. See statutes and rules of court of the various states, and Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 4 Wm. IV.

In local actions the true venue must be laid; that is, the action must be brought in the county where the cause of action arose, being that where the property is situated, in actions affecting real property; 2 Zabr. 204; and see 18 Ga. 719; and there can be no change of venue in such cases; 3 N. Y. 204. Thus, in actions on a lease at common law, founded on privity of contract, as debt or covenant by lessor or lessee; 1 Saund. 241*b*; 3 S. & R. 500; venue is transitory, but when founded in privity of estate, as in case of assignment, the venue is local; 1 Saund. 257. By various early statutes, however, actions on leases have become generally transitory. In such action, some particular place, as, a town, village, or parish, must formerly have been designated; Co. Litt. 125. But it is said to be no longer necessary except in replevin; 2 East, 503; 1 Chitty, Pl. 251. As to where the venue is to be laid in case of a change of county lines, see 18 Ga. 690; 16 Penn. 3.

In transitory actions the venue may be laid in any county the plaintiff chooses; that is, he may bring suit wherever he may find the defendant, and lay his cause of action to have arisen there, even though the cause of action arose in a foreign jurisdiction; Steph. Pl. 306; 18 Ga. 690; 1 How. 241; 17 Pet. 245. In case the cause was to be tried in a different county from that in which the matter actually arose, the venue was anciently laid by giving the place of occurrence, with a scilicet giving the place of trial; 1 Chitty, Pl. 250; 1 How. 241; 3 Zabr. 279. In some cases, however, by statutes, the venue in transitory actions must be laid in the county where the matter occurred or where certain parties reside; 3 Bla. Com. 294. And generally, by statute, it must be in the county where one of the parties resides, when between citizens of the same state.

In criminal proceedings the venue must be laid in the county where the occurrence actually took place; 4 C. & P. 363; and the act must be proved to have occurred in that jurisdiction; Archb. Cr. Pl. 40, 95; 26 Penn. 513; 4 Tex. 450; 6 Cal. 202; 6 Yerg. 364. Statement of venue in the margin and reference thereto in the body of an indictment is a sufficient statement of venue; 39 Me. 78; 4 Ind. 141; 8 Mo. 283; and see 20 Mo. 411; 39 Me. 291; and the venue need not be stated in the margin if it appears from the indictment; 5 Gray, 478; 25 Conn. 48; 2 McLean, 580.

Want of any venue is a cause for demurrer; 5 Mass. 94; or abatement; Archb. Civ. Pl. 78; or arrest of judgment; 4 Tex. 450. So defendant may plead or demur to a wrong venue; 13 Me. 130. Change of venue may be made by the court to prevent, and not to cause a defeat of justice; 3 Bla. Com. 294; 32 E. L. & E. 358; 20 Mo. 400; 2 Wisc. 397; 20 Ill. 259; 3 Zabr. 63; both in civil; 7 Ind. 110; 31 Miss. 490; 27 N. H. 428; and criminal cases; 7 Ind. 160; 28 Ala. N. S. 28; 4 Iowa, 505; 5 Harr. Del. 512; and such change is a matter of right on compliance with the requirements of the law; 9 Tex. 358; 7 Ind. 110; 2 Wisc. 419; 15 Ill. 511; 8 Mo. 606. That such change is a matter of discretion with the court below, see 28 Ala. N. S. 28; 31 Miss. 490; 3 Cal. 410; 8 Ind. 439; 5 Harr. Del. 512; 13 La. An. 191.

VERAY. An ancient manner of spelling vrai, true. In the English law there are three kinds of tenants: veray, or true tenant, who is one who holds in fee-simple; veray tenant by the manner, who is the same as tenant by the manner, q. v., with this difference only, that the fee-simple, instead of remaining in the lord, is given by him or by the law to another. Hamm. N. P. 394.

VERBAL. Parol: by word of mouth: as, verbal agreement; verbal evidence. Sometimes incorrectly used for oral.

VERBAL NOTE. In diplomatic language, a memorandum or note, not signed, sent when an affair has continued a long time, without any reply, in order to avoid the appearance of an urgency which perhaps the affair does not require, and, on the other hand, not to afford any ground for supposing that it is forgotten, or that there is no intention of prosecuting it any further, is called a verbal note.

VERBAL PROCESS. In Louisiana. A written account of any proceeding or operation required by law, signed by the person commissioned to perform the duty, and attested by the signature of witnesses. See PROCÈS VERBAL.

VERDEROR (fr. French verdeur, fr. vert or verd, green; Law L. viridarius). An officer in king's forest; whose office is properly to look after the vert, for food and shelter for the deer. He is also sworn to keep the assizes of the forest, and receive and enroll the attachments and presentments of trespasses within the forest, and certify them to the swainmote or justice-seat. Cowel; Manwood, For. Law, 332.

VERDICT. In Practice. The unanimous decision made by a jury and reported to the court on the matters lawfully submitted to them in the course of a trial of a cause.

A general verdict is one by which the jury pronounce at the same time on the fact and the law, either in favor of the plaintiff or defendant. Co. Litt. 228; 4 Bla. Com. 461. The jury may find such a verdict whenever they think fit to do so.

A partial verdict in a criminal case is one by which the jury acquit the defendant of a part of the accusation against him, and find him guilty of the residue.

The following are examples of this kind of a verdict, namely: when they acquit the defendant on one count and find him guilty on another, which is indeed a species of general verdict, as he is generally acquitted on one charge and generally convicted on another; when the charge is of an offence of a higher, and includes one of an inferior degree, the jury may convict of the less atrocious by finding a partial verdict. Thus, upon an indictment for burglary, the defendant may be convicted of larceny and acquitted of the nocturnal entry; upon an indictment for murder, he may be convicted of manslaughter; robbery may be softened to simple larceny; a battery into a common assault; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 638, and the cases there cited.

A privy verdict is one delivered privily to a judge out of court. A verdict of this kind is delivered to the judge after the jury have agreed, for the convenience of the jury, who, after having given it, separate. This verdict is of no force whatever; and this practice, being exceedingly liable to abuse, is seldom if ever allowed in the United States. The jury, however, are allowed in some states, in certain cases, to seal their verdict and return it into court, as, for example, where a verdict is agreed upon during the adjournment of the court for the day. When this is done in criminal cases it is usually the right of the defendant to have the jury present in court when the verdict is opened; 10 Fed. Rep. 269. See PRESENCE.

A public verdict is one delivered in open court. This verdict has its full effect, and unless set aside is conclusive on the facts, and, when judgment is rendered upon it, bars all future controversy, in personal actions. A private verdict must afterwards be given publicly in order to give it any effect.

A special verdict is one by which the facts of the case are put on the record, and the law is submitted to the judges. 1 Litt. 376; 4 Rand. 504; 1 Wash. C. C. 499; 2 Mas. 31. The jury may find a special verdict in criminal cases, but they are not obliged in any case to do so; Cooley, Const. Lim. 398.

The jury have an option, instead of finding the negative or affirmative of the issue, as in a general verdict, to find all the facts of the case as disclosed by the evidence before them, and, after so setting them forth, to conclude to the following effect: "that they are ignorant, in point of law, on which side they ought upon those facts to find the issue; that if upon the whole matter the court shall be of opinion that the issue is proved for the plaintiff, they find for the plaintiff accordingly, and assess the damages at such a sum, etc.; but if the court are of an opposite opinion, then they find vice versâ. This form of finding is called a special verdict. In practice they have nothing to do with the formal preparation of the special verdict. When it is agreed that a verdict of that kind is to be given, the jury merely declare their opinion as to any fact remaining in doubt, and then the verdict is adjusted without their further interference. It is settled under the correction of the judge, by the counsel and attorneys on either side, according to the state of the facts as found by the jury, with respect to all particulars on which they have delivered an opinion, and, with respect to other particulars, according to the state of facts which it is agreed that they ought to find upon the evidence before them. The special verdict, when its form is thus settled, is, together with the whole proceedings on the trial, then entered on record; and the question of law, arising on the facts found, is argued before the court in banc, and decided by that court as in case of a demurrer. If either party be dissatisfied with their decision, he may afterwards resort to a court of error; Steph. Pl. 113; 1 Archb. Pr. 189; 3 Bla. Com. 377.

There is another method of finding a special verdict: this is when the jury find a verdict generally for the plaintiff, but subject nevertheless to the opinion of the judges or the court above on a special case, stated by the counsel on both sides, with regard to a matter of law; 3 Bla. Com. 378. And see 10 Mass. 64; 11 id. 358.

A juror may dissent at any time from a verdict to which he had before agreed until the same is recorded; 15 Am. L. Rev. 423.

Where a jury being equally divided in opinion come to an agreement by lot, it was formerly held that its verdict was legitimate; 1 Keble, 811; but such verdicts are now held to be illegal, and will be set aside. The "quotient" verdict is so called from the fact that the jurors, having agreed to find for the plaintiff, further agree that their verdict shall be in such sum as is ascertained by each juror privately marking down the sum of money to which he thinks the plaintiff entitled, the total of these sums being divided by twelve. This method is exceedingly common in actions for unliquidated damages, and is almost universally condemned, the ground of the objection being that such an agreement cuts off all deliberation on the part of the jurors, and places it in the power of one of their number by naming a sum extravagantly high or ridiculously low to make the quotient unreasonably large or small; Thomp. & Merr. Juries, §§ 408, 409; 6 Sneed. & M. 55; 1 Wash. Ty. 329; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 808. But where the calculation is purely informal, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the jury, the objection is obviated, and the verdict will stand; 1 Humph. 399; 93 Ill. 410. See LOT; JURY.

VERGE. An uncertain quantity of land, from fifteen to thirty acres. Toml. See COURT OF THE MARSHALSEA; VIRGA.

VERIFICATION (Lat. verum, true, facio, to make). In Pleading. An averment by the party making a pleading that he is prepared to establish the truth of the facts which he has pleaded.

Whenever new matter is introduced on either side, the plea must conclude with the verification or averment, in order that the other party may have an opportunity of answering it; Dougl. 60; 2 Term, 576; 1 Saund. 103, n. 1. This applies only to pleas. Replications and subsequent proceedings for counts and avowries need not be verified; Co. Litt. 362 b.

In one instance, however, new matter need not conclude with a verification, and then the pleader may pray judgment without it: for example, when the matter pleaded is merely negative; Willes, 5; Lawes, Pl. 145. The reason of it is evident: a negative requires no proof; and it would, therefore, be impertinent or nugatory for the pleader, who pleads a negative matter, to declare his readiness to prove it.

The usual form of verification of a plea containing matter of fact is, "And this he is ready to verify," etc. See 3 Bla. Com. 309.

In Practice. The examination of the truth of a writing; the certificate that the writing is true. See AUTHENTICATION.

VERMONT. One of the New England states. Its name is derived from the Green Mountains, which traverse the state from north to south.

HISTORY.—The early history of Vermont is peculiar and unique. Its territory was originally claimed, under conflicting and ambiguous titles from the crown of Great Britain, by both New York and New Hampshire. Claimed on the one side as within the established boundaries of the province of New Hampshire, it was granted in townships to the first settlers, by Benning Wentworth, governor of that province. Claimed on the other hand to be covered by the charter of Charles II. to the Duke of York, the Wentworth grants were treated by the New York authorities as void, and the lands were re-granted to other parties, under the New York title. Which of these titles was in law the best, was never judicially determined. And as a century of undisturbed possession has now superseded them both, the question is no longer important. The better opinion appears to be in favor of the claim of New Hampshire.

The early settlers of Vermont, who were emigrants from Massachusetts and Connecticut—mainly the latter—took possession under the New Hampshire title. The settlements commenced about 1764, and rapidly increased, and the state was first called New Connecticut. A conflict of jurisdiction and of title immediately sprang up. Surveys were attempted to be made and settlements established under the New York titles, and many ejectment suits were commenced at Albany against the settlers in possession, judgments were recovered, and process issued to carry them into effect. The officers and claimants were, however, in every instance driven off by the inhabitants, the process of the courts of that province set at defiance and successfully resisted until service of it became impossible, and the possession under the New Hampshire grants was maintained. Finally, in 1771, a bod[y] of militia were sent from New York to aid the sheriff in executing a writ of possession, but were overpowered and returned without effecting their purpose.

The struggle between the authorities of New York and the inhabitants of Vermont continued for more than ten years preceding the commencement of the Revolution. It forms an interesting and romantic chapter in early American history, and will be found narrated with fulness and accuracy in Hiland Hall's Early History of Vermont. (Munsell, Albany, 1868.) Through the whole controversy the Vermonters, who were organized in a simple way for mutual protection, maintained a condition of practical independence, acknowledging general allegiance to the British Crown, but otherwise self-governed and self-sustained.

At the outbreak of the Revolution the people of Vermont joined their brethren in the contest, though independent of the federal government. In 1777 they declared their territory to be "a free independent jurisdiction," and adopted a constitution which with subsequent amendments is still the constitution of the state. Under this constitution the state maintained its government and its independence for fourteen years, until its admission to the Union, by act of congress, in 1791.

GOVERNMENT.—The institutions of Vermont were modelled in large part from those of Connecticut. They are characterized by great simplicity and economy. The offices are few, of short tenure, small compensation, simple duties, and no patronage.

The original constitution was prefaced by a "declaration of rights," which still remains a part of it. In addition to the usual guarantee of the right to life, liberty, property, justice, trial by jury, freedom of speech, of the press, of popular assembly, and of elections, it prohibits slavery, secures liberty of conscience and of worship, and absolute equality of civil rights, to all persons, without the distinction of religious belief, restricts the application of martial law to those in actual military service, prohibits the suppression of the writ of habeas corpus, and subordinates the military to the civil power. The constitution further declares, that, "as every freeman to preserve his independence (if without a sufficient estate) ought to have some profession, calling, trade, or farm, whereby he may honestly subsist, there can be no necessity for, nor use in, establishing offices of profit, the usual effects of which are dependence and servility unbecoming freemen in the possessors or expectants, and factious contention and discord among the people. But if any man is called into public service to the prejudice of his private affairs, he has a right to a reasonable compensation; and whenever an office, through increase of fees or otherwise, becomes so profitable as to occasion many to apply for it, the profits ought to be lessened by the legislature. And if any officer shall wittingly and willingly take greater fees than the law allows him, it shall ever after disqualify him from holding any office in this state, until he shall be restored by act of legislature." (Art. 25.)

Every man of the age of twenty-one years, born in the United States or naturalized, who has resided one year in the state, is of quiet and peaceable behavior, and takes the oath of allegiance, becomes a freeman of the state.

The constitution was amended in 1786, 1793, 1828, 1836, 1850, and 1870. Under its present provisions it may be amended in the following manner: The senate, by a two-thirds vote, may propose amendments, which, if concurred in by a majority of the house of representatives, shall be entered on the journal, and submitted to the next legislature. If then adopted by a majority of both houses, they shall be submitted to a vote by the freemen of the state; and if they receive a majority of votes, they become part of the constitution.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER of the state is vested in the governor, lieutenant-governor, and treasurer, who are elected by the freemen bi-annually. The governor receives a salary of $1000 per annum without other allowances; he has no power of appointment to office except of his own secretary, unless in case of vacancies occurring during the recess of the legislature, and then only to fill such vacancies until the legislature convenes; he signs bills passed by the legislature, and has a veto power; but if the bill vetoed is again passed by a majority of both houses, it becomes a law; and unless the bill is returned by the governor within five days after its presentation to him, it becomes a law, unless the legislature adjourns within three days after such presentation. He has power to grant pardons except in cases of impeachment, with the penalties of which he cannot interfere, and of treason and murder in which he may reprieve but not pardon until after the next session of the legislature, and cannot commute; he may lay embargoes or prohibit the exportation of commodities in the recess of the legislature, for a period not exceeding thirty days; may convene the legislature in special session; and is commander-in-chief of the forces of the state, but may not command in person except when advised thereto by the senate, and then only so long as they shall approve thereof. The lieutenant-governor presides over the senate, and in the absence or disability of the governor acts in his place. The treasurer has charge of the finances of the state. All other state officers are elected by the legislature.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER is exercised by a senate of thirty members, elected by the counties in proportion to population, each county electing at least one; and by a house of representatives of about two hundred and thirty members, of whom each town in the state elects one and no more. Impeachments are voted by the house of representatives, tried by the senate, conviction had only by vote of two-thirds, and the penalties extend only to removal from office and disqualification for future office. But the judgment constitutes no bar to a prosecution at law.

THE JUDICIARY POWER is vested in a supreme court, courts of chancery, county courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. The supreme court consists of a chief justice and six assistant justices, who are elected by the legislature biennially. It holds one term each year in every county in the state, and one general term of the whole court each year at the capital for hearing causes of special importance. It has original jurisdiction in cases of mandamus, quo warranto, and petitions for new trials, and appellate jurisdiction from all final decrees in the courts of chancery, and by writ of error on exceptions upon questions of law in all cases in the county courts. The courts of chancery are holden twice a year in each county by a justice of the supreme court, and have the general powers of the English courts of chancery. The county courts are holden twice in each year in every county by a justice of the supreme court and two assistant judges elected by the people for the county biennially. They have general original jurisdiction in all actions for recovery of lands or involving the title thereto; in actions for divorce, audita querela, and upon money demands above the sum of two hundred dollars, and in certain cases below that sum; and in proceedings for establishing or discontinuing roads and bridges, removal of paupers, etc.; and they have appellate jurisdiction from the probate courts, and from the judgments of justices of the peace in all criminal cases, and in all civil cases where the demand exceeds ten dollars, or if upon note, twenty dollars. The probate courts are holden by judges of probate, elected by the freemen biennially for the probate districts, each of which is either a county or a division of a county. The probate courts are always open, and have exclusive original jurisdiction of the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, of guardianship, and of proceedings in insolvency. Justices of the peace are elected from the towns by the freemen thereof biennially, in numbers proportioned to the population. They have jurisdiction of minor criminal offences, and of civil actions where the demand does not exceed two hundred dollars, except slander, false imprisonment, and actions in which the title to land is concerned. In replevin, or trespass on the freehold, the jurisdiction is limited to twenty dollars.

All the courts except those of justices of the peace are courts of record.

The common-law system of pleading is preserved, though with a course of practice very simple and inexpensive. The statutes of the state are comprehended in the revised statutes of 1880. The law reports are Nat. Chipman, 1 vol.; Jas. Chipman, 1 vol.; Tyler, 2 vols.; Brayton, 1 vol.; Aiken, 2 vols.; Vermont Reports, 51 vols. Those prior to Aiken are now only of historic value.

The local government of Vermont is almost entirely in the towns. The counties exercise municipal powers only for the election of senators and for judicial purposes, including the election of state attorneys, sheriffs, and bailiffs, and the maintenance of court-houses and jails.

VERSUS. Against; as, A B versus C D. This is usually abbreviated v. or vs. See TITLE.

VERY LORD AND VERY TENANT. They that are immediate lord and tenant one to another. Cowel.

VESSEL. In Maritime Law. A ship, brig, sloop, or other craft used in navigation. 1 Boulay-Paty, tit. 1, p. 100. The term is rarely applied to any water-craft without a deck; 3 Mas. 137; but has been used to include every thing capable of being used as a means of transportation by water; 27 La. An. 607. See SHIP; PART-OWNERS.

By an act of congress, approved July 29, 1850, it is provided that any person, not being an owner, who shall on the high seas, wilfully, with intent to burn or destroy, set fire to any ship or other vessel, or otherwise attempt the destruction of such ship or other vessel, being the property of any citizen or citizens of the United States, or procure the same to be done, with the intent aforesaid, and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer imprisonment to hard labor for a term not exceeding ten years nor less than three years according to the aggravation of the offence.

VEST. To give an immediate fixed right of present or future enjoyment. An estate is vested in possession when there exists a right of present enjoyment; and an estate is vested in interest when there is a present fixed right of future enjoyment. Fearne, Cont. Rem. 2. See Roper, Leg. 757; Comyns, Dig. Vest; Vern. 323, n.; 5 Ves. 511; 6 McLean, 422; 29 N. C. 321.

VESTED INTEREST. See next title.

VESTED REMAINDER. An estate by which a present interest passes to the party, though to be enjoyed in futuro, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate has been spent. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1831. See REMAINDER; Tudor, L. Cas. R. P. 820.

VESTED RIGHT. See RIGHT.

VESTING ORDER. An order which may be granted by the chancery division of the high court of justice (and formerly by chancery) passing the legal estate in lieu of a conveyance. Commissioners also, under modern statutes, have similar powers; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55. Whart. Lex.

He who has the vesture of land has a right, generally, to exclude others from entering upon the superficies of the soil. Co. Litt. 4 b; Hamm. N. P. 151. See 7 East, 200.

VETERA STATUTA (Lat.). The name of vetera statuta—ancient statutes—has been given to the statutes commencing with Magna Charta and ending with those of Edward II. Crabb, Eng. Law, 222.

VETITUM NAMIUM (Law Lat. vetitum, forbidden, namium, taking). Where the bailiff of a lord distrains beasts or goods of another, and the lord forbids the bailiff to deliver them when the sheriff comes to make replevin, the owner of the cattle may demand satisfaction in placitum de vetito namio. Co. 2d Inst. 140; Record in Thesaur. Scacc.; 2 Bla. Com. 148. See WITHERNAM.

VETO (Lat. I forbid). A term including the refusal of the executive officer whose assent is necessary to perfect a law which has been passed by the legislative body, and the message which is usually sent, stating such refusal and the reasons therefor.

By the constitution of the United States government, the president has a power to prevent the enactment of any law, by refusing to sign the same after its passage, unless it be subsequently enacted by a vote of two-thirds of each house. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 7. When a bill is engrossed, and has received the sanction of both houses, it is transmitted to the president for his approbation. If he approves of it, he signs it. If he does not, he sends it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, and that house enter the objections on their journal and proceeds to reconsider the bill. See Story, Const. § 878; 1 Kent, Comm. 239. Similar powers are possessed by the governors of many of the states.

The veto power of the British sovereign has not been exercised for more than a century. It was exercised once during the reign of Queen Anne. 10 Edinburgh Rev. 411; Parks, Lect. 126. But anciently the king frequently replied, Le roy s'avisera, which was in effect withholding his assent. In France the king had the initiative of all laws, but not the veto. See 1 Toullier, nn. 39, 42, 52, note 3.

VEXATION. The injury or damage which is suffered in consequence of the tricks of another.

VEXATIOUS SUIT. Torts. A suit which has been instituted maliciously, and without probable cause, whereby a damage has ensued to the defendant.

The suit is either a criminal prosecution, a conviction before a magistrate, or a civil action. The suit need not be altogether without foundation: if the part which is groundless has subjected the party to an inconvenience to which he would not have been exposed had the valid cause of complaint alone been insisted on, it is injurious; 4 Taunt. 616; 4 Co. 14; 1 Pet. C. C. 210; 4 S. & R. 19, 23.

To make it vexatious the suit must have been instituted maliciously. As malice is not in any case of injurious conduct necessarily to be inferred from the total absence of probable cause for exciting it, and in the present instance the law will not allow it to be inferred from that circumstance, for fear of being mistaken, it casts upon the suffering party the onus of proving express malice; 2 Wills. 307; 2 B. & P. 129. But see what Gibbs, C. J., says, in Berley vs. Bethune, 5 Taunt. 583; see, also, 1 Pet. C. C. 210; 2 Browne, Penn. Apx. 42, 49; Add. Penn. 270.

It is necessary that the prosecution should have been carried on without probable cause. The law presumes that probable cause existed until the party aggrieved can show to the contrary. Hence he is bound to show the total absence of probable cause; 5 Taunt. 580; 1 Camp. 199. See 3 Dowl. Parl. Cas. 160; 1 Term, 520; Bull. N. P. 14; 4 Burr. 1974; 2 B. & C. 693; 4 Dowl. & R. 107; 1 Gow, 20; 1 Wils. 232; Cro. Jac. 194. He is also under the same obligation when the original proceeding was a civil action; 2 Wils. 307; but see MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

The damage which the party injured sustains from a vexatious suit for a crime is either to his person, his reputation, his estate, or his relative rights. First, whenever imprisonment is occasioned by a malicious unfounded criminal prosecution, the injury is complete although the detention may have been momentary and the party released on bail; Carth. 416. Second, when the bill of indictment contains scandalous aspersions likely to impair the reputation of the accused, the damage is complete. See 12 Mod. 210; 2 B. & Ald. 494; 3 Dowl. & R. 669. Third, notwithstanding his person is left at liberty, and his character is unstained by the proceedings (as, where the indictment is for a trespass, Carth. 416), yet if he necessarily incurs expense in defending himself against the charge, he has a right to have his losses made good; 10 Mod. 148, 214; Gilb. 185. Fourth, if a master loses the services and assistance of his domestics in consequence of a vexatious suit, he may claim a compensation; Hamm. N. P. 275.

With regard to a damage resulting from a civil action, when prosecuted in a court of competent jurisdiction, the only detriment the party can sustain is the imprisonment of his person, or the seizure of his property; for, as to any expense he may be put to, this, in contemplation of law, has been fully compensated to him by the costs adjudged; 4 Taunt. 7; 1 Mod. 4; 2 id. 306. But where the original suit was coram non judice, the party, as the law formerly stood, necessarily incurred expense without the power of remuneration, unless by this action; because any award of costs the court might make would have been a nullity. However, by a late decision, such an adjudication was holden unimpeachable, and that the party might well have an action of debt to recover the amount; 1 Wils. 316. So that the law, in this respect, seems to have taken a new turn; and perhaps it would now be decided that no action can under any other circumstances but imprisonment of the person or seizure of the property be maintained for suing in an improper court. See Carth. 189.

VEXED QUESTION. A question or point of law often discussed or agitated, but not determined or settled.

VI ET ARMIS (Lat.). With force and arms. See TRESPASS.

VIA (Lat.). A cart-way,—which also includes a foot-way and a horse-way. See WAY.

VIABILITY (from the French vie). Capability of living. A term used to denote the power a new-born child possesses of continuing its independent existence.

That a child may be viable, it is necessary that not only the organs should be in a normal state, but likewise all the physiological and pathological causes which are capable of opposing the establishment or prolongation of its life be absent.

Although a child may be born with every appearance of health, yet, from some malformation, it may not possess the physical power to maintain life, but which must cease from necessity. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said to exist but temporarily,—no longer, indeed, than is necessary to prove that a continued existence is impossible.

It is important to make a distinction between a viable and a non-viable child, although the latter may outlive the former. The viable child may die of some disease on the day of its birth, while a non-viable child may live a fortnight. The former possesses the organs essential to life, in their integrity; while the latter has some imperfection which prevents the complete establishment of life.

As it is no evidence of non-viability that a child dies within a few hours of its birth, neither is it a proof of viability if a child appears to be well and the function of respiration be fully established.

There are many affections which a child may have at birth, that are not necessarily mortal: such as transposition of some of the organs, and other malformations. There are also many diseases which, without being necessarily mortal, are an impediment to the establishment of independent life, affecting different parts of the system: such as inflammation, in addition to many malformations. There is a third class, in which are many affections that are necessarily mortal: such as a general softening of the mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines, developed before birth, or the absence of the stomach, and a number of other malformations. These distinctions are of great importance; for children affected by peculiarities of the first order must be considered as viable; affections of the second may constitute extenuating circumstances in questions of infanticide; while those of the third admit of no discussion on the subject of their viability.

The question of viability presents itself to the medical jurist under two aspects: first, with respect to infanticide, and second, with respect to testamentary grants and inheritances. Billard on Infants, translation by James Stewart, M.D., Appendix; Briand, Méd. Lèg. 1ère partie, c. 6, art. 2. See 2 Savigny, Dr. Rom. Append. III., for a learned discussion of this subject.

VIABLE (Lat. vitæ habilis, capable of living). A term applied to a child who is born alive in such an advanced state of formation as to be capable of living. Unless he is born viable, he acquires no rights, and cannot transmit them to his heirs, and is considered as if he had never been born.

VICARAGE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The living or benefice of a vicar: usually consisting of the small tithes. 1 Burn, Eccl. Law, 75, 79.

VICE. A term used in the civil law and in Louisiana, by which is meant a defect in a thing; an imperfection. For example, epilepsy in a slave, roaring and crib-biting in a horse, are vices. Redhibitory vices are those for which the seller will be compelled to annul a sale and take back the thing sold. Pothier, Vente, 203; La. Civ. Code, art. 2498–2507.

VICE-ADMIRAL. The title of an officer in the navy: the next in rank after the admiral. Hereafter vacancies occurring in the grades of admiral and vice-admiral in the United States navy shall not be filled by promotion or in any other manner; and when the offices of said grades shall become vacant, the grade itself shall cease to exist; R. S. § 1362.

VICE-CHANCELLOR. A judge, assistant to the chancellor. He held a separate court, and his decrees were liable to be reversed by the chancellor. He was first appointed 53 Geo. III. In 1841 two additional vice-chancellors were appointed; and there were then three vice-chancellor's courts. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 54, n.

There is also a vice-chancellor of the county palatine of Lancaster; 3 Steph. Com. 331. By the Judicature Act of 1873, the vice-chancellors are transposed to the high courts of justice and appointed judges of the chancery division. On the death or retirement of any one of them, his successor will be styled a judge of her majesty's high court of justice. There is one vice-chancellor of the court of justice in Ireland. Whart. Lex; Moz. & W. See CHANCELLOR; CHANCELLOR'S COURTS IN THE TWO UNIVERSITIES.

VICE-CONSUL. An officer who performs the duties of a consul within a part of the district of a consul, or who acts in the place of a consul. See 1 Phill. Ev. 306; CONSUL.

VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. The title of the second officer, in point of rank, in the government of the United States. He is to be elected in the manner pointed out under the article PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. See, also, 3 Story, Const. § 1447 et seq. His office in point of duration is coextensive with that of the president. The constitution of the United States, art. i. s. 3, clause 4, directs that "the vice-president of the United States shall be president of the senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided." And by articles 2, s. 1, clause 6, of the constitution, it is provided that "in case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice-president."

When the vice-president exercises the office of president, he is called the President of the United States.

VICE VERSA (Lat.). On the contrary; on opposite sides.

VICECOMES (Lat.). The sheriff.

VICECOMES NON MISIT BREVE (Lat. the sheriff did not send the writ). An entry made on the record when nothing has been done by virtue of a writ which has been directed to the sheriff.

VICINAGE. The neighborhood; the venue.

VICINETUM (Lat.). The neighborhood; vicinage; the venue. Co. Litt. 158 b.

VICIOUS INTROMISSION. In Scotch law, a meddling with the movables of a deceased, without confirmation or probate of his will or other title. Whart. Lex.

VICONTIEL. Belonging to the sheriff.

VIDELICET (Lat.). A Latin adverb, signifying to wit, that is to say, namely; scilicet. This word is usually abbreviated viz.

The office of the videlicet is to mark that the party does not undertake to prove the precise circumstances alleged; and in such cases he is not required to prove them; Steph. Pl. 309; 7 Cow. 42; 8 Taunt. 107; Greenl. Ev. § 60; 1 Litt. Ky. 209. See Yelv. 94; 3 Saund. 291 a, note; 4 B. & P. 465; 2 Pick. 214; 47 Ill. 175.

VIDUITY. Widowhood.

VIEW. Inspection; a prospect.

Every one is entitled to a view from his premises; but he thereby acquires no right over the property of his neighbors. The erection of buildings which obstruct a man's view, therefore, is not unlawful, and such buildings cannot be considered a nuisance; 9 Co. 58 b. See ANCIENT LIGHTS; NUISANCE; VIEWERS; 16 Am. L. Rev. 628; 63 Me. 385.

VIEW, DEMAND OF. In Practice. In most real and mixed actions, in order to ascertain the identity of land claimed with that in the tenant's possession, the tenant is allowed, after the demandant has counted, to demand a view of the land in question, or, if the subject of claim be rent, or the like, a view of the land out of which it issues. Viner, Abr. View; Comyns, Dig. View; Booth, 37; 2 Saund. 45 b; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 435.

This right, however, is confined to real or mixed actions; for in personal actions the view does not lie. In the action of dower unde nihil habet, it has been much questioned whether the view be demandable or not; 2 Saund. 44, n. 4; and there are other real and mixed actions in which it is not allowed. The view being granted, the course of proceeding is to issue a writ commanding the sheriff to cause the defendant to have a view of the land. It being the interest of the demandant to expedite the proceedings, the duty of suing out the writ lies upon him, and not upon the tenant; and when, in obedience to its exigency, the sheriff causes view to be made, the demandant is to show to the tenant, in all ways possible, the thing in demand, with its metes and bounds. On the return of the writ into court, the demandant must count de novo—that is, declare again; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 Y 3); Booth, 40; and the pleadings proceed to issue.

This proceeding of demanding view is, in the present rarity of real actions, unknown in practice.

VIEW OF FRANKPLEDGE. In English Law. An examination to see if every freeman within the district had taken the oath of allegiance, and found nine freemen pledges for his peaceable demeanor. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 7. It took place, originally, once in each year, after Michaelmas, and subsequently twice, after Easter and Michaelmas, at the sheriff's tourn or court-leet at that season held. See COURT-LEET; SHERIFF'S TOURN.

VIEWERS. Persons appointed by the courts to see and examine certain matters and make a report of the facts, together with their opinion, to the court. In practice, they are usually appointed to lay out roads, and the like.

VIFGAGE. See VADIUM VIVUM.

VIGILANCE. Proper attention in proper time.

The law requires a man who has a claim to enforce it in proper time, while the adverse party has it in his power to defend himself; and if by his neglect to do so he cannot afterwards establish such claim, the maxim vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subserviunt acquires full force in such case. For example, a claim not sued for within the time required by the acts of limitation will be presumed to be paid; and the mere possession of corporeal real property as if in fee-simple, and without admitting any other ownership for sixty years, is a sufficient title against all the world, and cannot be impeached by any dormant claim. 3 Bla. Com. 196; n.; 4 Co. 11 b.

VILL. In England this word was used to signify the parts into which a hundred or wapentake was divided. Fortescue, de Laud. c. 24. See Co. Litt. 115 b. It also signifies a town or city. Barrington, Stat. 133.

VILLAIN. An epithet used to cast contempt and contumely on the person to whom it is applied.

To call a man a villain in a letter written to a third person will entitle him to an action without proof of special damages; 1 B. & P. 331.

VILLEIN (vilis, base, or villa, estate). A person attached to a manor, who was substantially in the condition of a slave, who performed the base and menial work upon the manor for the lord, and was, generally, a subject of property and belonging to him. 1 Washb. R. P. 26.

The feudal villein of the lowest order, unprotected as to property, and subject to the most ignoble services. But his circumstances were very different from the slave of the Southern states, for no person was in the eye of the law a villein except as to his master; in relation to all other persons he was a freeman. Littleton, Ten. ss. 189, 190; Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. 1, 122, 124; vol. 2, 139.

VILLEIN IN GROSS. A villein annexed to the person of the lord, and transferable by deed from one person to another. Littleton, § 181.

VILLEIN REGARDANT. A villein annexed to the manor or land; a serf.

VILLEIN SOCAGE (Sax. soc, free, or Lat. soca, a plough). The villeins, from living on one piece of land, came at last to be allowed to hold it by tenure of villeinage, e. g. uncertain menial services. These services at last became fixed; the tenure was then called villein socage. 1 Washb. R. P. 26.

VILLEINAGE. See VILLEIN SOCAGE.

VILLENOUS JUDGMENT. In Old English Law. A judgment given by the common law in attaint, or in cases of conspiracy.

Its effects were to make the object of it lose his liberam legem and become infamous. He forfeited his goods and chattels, and his lands during life; and this barbarous judgment further required that his lands should be wasted, his houses razed, his trees rooted up, and that his body should be cast into prison. He could not be a juror or witness. Burr. 996, 1027; 4 Bla. Com. 136.

VINCULO MATRIMONII. See A VINCULO MATRIMONII; DIVORCE.

VINDICATION. In Civil Law. The claim made to property by the owner of it. 1 Bell, Com. 281, 5th ed. See REVENDICATION.

VINDICTIVE DAMAGES. See DAMAGES; EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

VIOLATION. An act done unlawfully and with force. In the English statute of 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, it is declared to be high treason in any person who shall violate the king's companion; and it is equally high treason in her to suffer willingly such violation. This word has been construed under this statute to mean carnal knowledge; 3 Inst. 9; Bacon, Abr. Treason (E).

VIOLENCE. The abuse of force. Théorie des Lois criminelles, 32. That force which is employed against common right, against the laws, and against public liberty. Merl. Répert.

In cases of robbery, in order to convict the accused it is requisite to prove that the act was done with violence; but this violence is not confined to an actual assault of the person, by beating, knocking down, or forcibly wresting from him; on the contrary, whatever goes to intimidate or overawe, by the apprehension of personal violence or by fear of life, with a view to compel the delivery of property, equally falls within its limits; Alison, Pr. Cr. Law of Scotl. 228; 4 Binn. 379; 2 Russ. Cr. 61; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 553. When an article is merely snatched, as by a sudden pull, even though a momentary force be exerted, it is not such violence as to constitute a robbery; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 702; 2 Russ. Cr. 68; Dig. 4. 2. 2. 3.

VIOLENT PROFITS. In Scotch Law. The gains made by a tenant holding over are so called. Erskine, Inst. 2. 6. 54.

VIOLENTLY. In Pleading. This word was formerly supposed to be necessary in an indictment, in order to charge a robbery from the person; but it has been holden unnecessary; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 784; 1 Chitty Crim. Law, *244. The words "feloniously and against the will," usually introduced in such indictments, seem to be sufficient. It is usual, also, to aver a putting in fear; though this does not seem to be requisite.

VIRGA. An obsolete word, which signifies a rod or staff, such as sheriffs, bailiffs, and constables carry as a badge or ensign of their office. More commonly spelled verge, q. v.

Hence verger, one who carried a white wand before the judges. Toml. A verger now commonly signifies an inferior officer in a cathedral or parish church. Moz. & W.

The stick or wand with which persons are in England admitted as tenants.

VIRGINIA. One of the thirteen original United States.

The name was given in honor of Queen Elizabeth, the virgin queen of England. In 1606, James I. granted letters patent for planting colonies in Virginia. These grants in the letters patent embraced a country extending along the sea-coast between 34° and 45° north latitude, and were made to two companies: one of them to Sir Thomas Gates and others—named the First Colony of Virginia—the other "to Tho: Hanham and others, of the town of Plimouth," which was called the Second Colony of Virginia. The government prescribed for these colonies was that each should have a council, consisting of thirteen persons, appointed by the king, to govern and order all matters according to laws and instructions given them by the king. There was also a council in England, of thirteen persons, appointed by the crown to have the supervising, managing, and direction of all matters that should concern the government of the colonies. This charter was followed by royal instructions dated the 20th November, 1606. See 1 Hening, Va. Stat. 70, 571. Under this charter a settlement was made at Jamestown in 1607, by the first colony. Upon the petition of the company, a new charter was granted by king James, on the 23d May, 1609, to the treasurer and company of the first (or southern) colony, for the further enlargement and explanation of the privileges of that company. 1 Hening, Stat. 80.

This charter granted to the company in absolute property the lands extending from Cape or Point Comfort (at the mouth of James River) along the sea-coast two hundred miles to the northward, and from the same point along the sea-coast two hundred miles to the southward, and up into the land throughout, from sea to sea, west and northwest, and, also, all islands lying within one hundred miles of the coast of both seas of the precinct aforesaid. A new council in England was established, with power to the company to fill all vacancies therein by election.

On the 12th of March, 1611, king James granted a third charter to the first company, enlarging its domain so as to include all islands within three hundred leagues from its borders on the coast of either sea. In 1612, a considerable proportion of lands previously held and cultivated in common was divided into three-acre lots and a lot appropriated in absolute right to each individual. Not long afterwards, fifty acres were surveyed and delivered to each of the colonists. In 1618, by a change of the constitution of the colony, burgesses elected by the people were made a branch of the legislature. Up to this time the settlement had been gradually increasing in number, and in 1624, upon a writ of quo warranto, a judgment was obtained dissolving the company and re-vesting its powers in the crown. In 1651 the plantation of Virginia came, by formal act, under the obedience and government of the commonwealth of England, the colony, however, still retaining its former constitution. A new charter was to be granted, and many important privileges were secured. In 1680 a change was made in the colonial government, divesting the burgesses of the exercise of judicial power in the last resort, as had before that time been practised by that body, and allowing appeals from judgments of the general courts, composed of the governor and council, to the king in council, where the matter in controversy exceeded the value of £300 sterling. Marshall, Col. 163; 1 Campb. 337.

By the treaty of 1763, all the conquests made by the French in North America, including the territory east of the Mississippi, were ceded to Great Britain.

The constitution of the colonial government of Virginia seems never to have been precisely fixed and accurately adjusted in any written memorials that are now accessible. The powers exercised by the burgesses varied at different periods. The periods of their election and the length of time they continued in office it is difficult to ascertain from the records of colonial history, and the qualifications of voters to elect them varied much at different periods. See Rev. Code, 38, Leigh's note; 2 Burk, App. 1. On the 12th of June, 1776, was unanimously adopted by the convention a declaration of rights pertaining to the people, as a basis and foundation of government was adopted by the convention. This declaration still remains a part of the Virginia Code. On the 29th of June, 1776, Virginia adopted a constitution by a unanimous vote of the convention. The Articles of Confederation were not finally adopted by congress until the 15th of November, 1777, and were adopted, subject to the ratification of the states. These articles were laid before the Virginia Assembly on the 9th of December, 1777, and on the 15th unanimously assented to. In compliance with the recommendation of congress, by a resolution of September 6, 1780, Virginia, by an act passed the 2d of January, 1781, proffered a cession of her western lands. The cession was finally completed and accepted in 1784. Virginia as early as 1785 prepared to erect Kentucky into a state, and this was finally effected in June, 1792.

The state constitution framed and adopted by Virginia in 1776 gave way to a second that was framed in convention, adopted by the people, and went into operation in 1830. This second constitution was superseded by a third, which was framed in convention of 1851, and, being adopted by the people, took effect in 1852.

A convention assembled at Alexandria February 13, 1864, composed of delegates from such portions of Virginia as were then within the lines of the Union army and had not been included in the recently-formed state of West Virginia. This convention adopted a constitution April 11, 1864, but it was not submitted to the people for ratification. The present constitution of the state was framed by a convention called under the reconstruction act of congress which met at Richmond and completed its labors in 1868. Under the authority of an act of congress approved April 10, 1869, the instrument was submitted to the vote of the people and adopted.

Under this constitution, every male citizen of the commonwealth, of the age of twenty-one years, who has been a resident of the state for one year and of the county, city, or town where he offers to vote for three months next preceding an election, and no other person, shall be qualified to vote for members of the general assembly and all officers elective by the people; but no person in the military, naval, or marine service of the United States shall be deemed a resident of this state by reason of being stationed therein. And no person shall have the right to vote who is of unsound mind, or a pauper, or a non-commissioned officer, soldier, seaman, or marine, in the service of the United States, or who has been convicted of bribery in an election, or of any infamous offence, or who, while a citizen of this state, has, since the adoption of this constitution, fought a duel with a deadly weapon, or sent or accepted a challenge to fight a duel, either within or beyond the boundaries of the state.

All elections are by ballot, and all persons entitled to vote are eligible to any office within the gift of the people, except as restricted by the constitution. No one is entitled to sit as juror, except those entitled to vote and hold office.

Under the constitution a general registry law must be enacted by the general assembly, and every person applying for registration must take and subscribe an oath to the effect that he is not disqualified for voting under the constitution, and that he will support and defend the same to the best of his ability. No voter during the time of holding any election at which he is entitled to vote shall be compelled to perform military service, except in time of war or public danger, to work upon public roads, or to attend any court as suitor, juror, or witness, and no voter shall be subject to arrest under any civil process during his attendance at elections, or in going to or returning from them.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.—The legislative power of the commonwealth is vested in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of delegates. The house of delegates is elected biennially by the voters of the several cities and counties, on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November. Under the terms of the constitution it consists of 138 members.

The senators are elected for the term of four years, for the election of whom the counties, cities, and towns shall be divided into not more than forty districts. Under the constitution forty-three senators are elected, their terms ending at different times so that those bearing odd numbers vacate their office every alternate two years, their places being filled at the general election; and so with those bearing even numbers. After the census of the United States, and every tenth year thereafter, provision is made for a reapportionment.

Any person may be elected senator or representative who is actually a resident within his district and qualified to vote. The removal of any person elected from his district vacates the office. The general assembly meets, unless oftener convened by the governor, annually, but no session shall continue longer than ninety days without the concurrence of three-fifths of the members.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.—The chief executive power of the commonwealth is vested in a governor. He holds his office for the term of four years, to commence on the first day of January next succeeding his election, and is ineligible to the same office for the term next succeeding that for which he was elected, and to any other office during his term of service. He is elected by the voters at the times and places of choosing members of the general assembly. Returns of the election are to be transmitted under seal by the proper officer to the secretary of the commonwealth, who is to deliver them to the speaker of the house of delegates on the first day of the next session of the general assembly. The speaker of the house of delegates must within one week thereafter, in the presence of a majority of the senate and house of delegates, open the said returns; and the votes are then counted. The person having the highest number of votes is to be declared elected; but if two or more shall have the highest and an equal number of votes, one of them is to be chosen governor by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly. Contested elections for governor are decided by a like vote; and the mode of proceeding in such cases is prescribed by law.

No person is eligible to the office of governor unless he has attained the age of thirty years, has been a citizen of the United States for ten years next preceding his election, and has been a citizen of Virginia for three years next preceding his election.

The governor must reside at the seat of government, receives five thousand dollars for each year of his service, and, while in office, is to receive no other emolument from this or any other government.

He is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed; communicate to the general assembly, at every session, the condition of the commonwealth; recommend to their consideration such measures as he may deem expedient; and convene the general assembly, on application of a majority of the members of both houses thereof, or when in his opinion the interest of the commonwealth may require it. He is commander-in-chief of the land and naval forces of the state; has power to embody the militia to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, and enforce the execution of the laws; conduct, either in person or in such other manner as is prescribed by law, all intercourse with other and foreign states; and, during the recess of the general assembly, fill pro tempore all vacancies in those offices for which the constitution and laws make no provision: but his appointments to such vacancies are by commissions to expire at the end of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of the general assembly. He has power to remit fines and penalties in such cases and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law; and, except when the prosecution has been carried on by the house of delegates, or the law shall otherwise particularly direct, to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction; to remove political disabilities consequent upon conviction for offences committed prior or subsequently to the adoption of this constitution; and to commute capital punishment. But he must communicate to the general assembly, at each session, the particulars of every case of fine or penalty remitted, of reprieve or pardon granted, and of punishment commuted, with his reasons for remitting, granting, or commuting the same.

He may require information in writing from the officers in the executive department upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and may also require the opinion in writing of the attorney-general upon any question of law connected with his official duties.

Commissions and grants run in the name of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and must be attested by the governor, with the seal of the commonwealth annexed.

A Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, and for the same term, as the governor; and his qualifications and the manner of his election in all respects are the same.

In case of the removal of the governor from office, or of his death, failure to qualify, resignation, or removal from the state, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the office, the said office, with its compensation, devolves upon the lieutenant-governor; and the general assembly is to provide by law for the discharge of the executive functions in other necessary cases.

The lieutenant-governor is president of the senate, but has no vote, and, while acting as such, receives a compensation equal to that allowed to the speaker of the house of delegates.

A secretary of the commonwealth, treasurer, and auditor of public accounts are elected by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly, and continue in office for the term of two years unless sooner relieved.

JUDICIARY DEPARTMENT.—The judiciary department consists of a supreme court of appeals' circuit courts, and county courts.

The Supreme Court of Appeals consists of five judges, any three of whom may hold a court. It has appellate jurisdiction only, except in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition. It has no jurisdiction in civil cases where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is less in value or amount than five hundred dollars, except in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land, the bequests of a will, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator, or concerning a mill, roadway, ferry, or landing; or the right of a corporation or of a county to levy tolls or taxes, and except in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition, or the constitutionality of a law. Provided, that the assent of a majority of the judges elected to the bench shall be required to declare any law null and void by reason of its repugnance to the federal constitution or to the constitution of this state. The judges are chosen by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly, and hold their office for twelve years; they shall, when chosen, have held a judicial station in the United States, or shall have practised law in this or some other state for five years.

Special courts of appeals, to consist of not less than three nor more than five judges, may be formed of the judges of the supreme court of appeals, and of the circuit courts, or any of them, to try any cases remaining on the dockets of the present court of appeals when the judges thereof cease to hold their offices; or to try any cases which may be on the dockets of the supreme court of appeals established by this constitution, in respect to which a majority of the judges of said court may be so situated as to make it improper for them to sit on the hearing thereof; and also to try any cases on the said dockets which cannot be otherwise disposed of with convenient dispatch.

When a judgment or decree is reversed or affirmed by the supreme court of appeals, the reasons therefor must be stated in writing, and preserved with the record of the case.

Circuit Courts.—The state is divided into sixteen judicial circuits, which may be rearranged or their number increased or diminished by the general assembly, whenever the public interests require it. For each circuit a judge is chosen by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly, who holds office for a term of eight years, unless sooner removed in the manner prescribed by the constitution. He must possess the same qualifications as a judge of the supreme court of appeals, and reside in the circuit of which he is judge. A circuit court is held at least twice a year by the judges of each circuit.

County Courts.—In each county of the commonwealth there is a county court, held monthly, by a judge learned in the law of the state. Counties having less than eight thousand inhabitants are attached to adjoining counties for the formation of districts. These judges are chosen in the same manner as circuit court judges. They hold their office for the term of six years, and during their continuance in office must reside in their district.

All the judges are commissioned by the governor, and receive such salaries and allowances as may be determined by law, the amount of which is not to be diminished during their terms of office. These begin on the first day of January next following their appointment.

Judges may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the general assembly; but a majority of all the members elected to each house must concur in such vote; and the cause of removal must be entered on the journal of each house. The judge against whom the general assembly may be about to proceed receives notice thereof, accompanied by a copy of the causes alleged for his removal, at least twenty days before the day on which either house of the general assembly acts thereupon.

An Attorney-General is elected by the voters of the commonwealth for the term of four years, at every election of a governor. He is commissioned by the governor, performs such duties and receives such compensation as the law prescribes, and is removable in the manner prescribed for the removal of judges.

Writs run in the name of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and are attested by the clerks of the several courts. Indictments conclude against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth.

VIRILIA (Lat.). The privy members of a man, to cut off which was felony at common law, though the party consented to it. Bract. lib. 3, p. 144.

VIRTUTE OFFICII (Lat.). By virtue of his office. A sheriff, a constable, and some other officers may virtute officii apprehend a man who has been guilty of a crime in their presence.

VIS (Lat. force). Any kind of force, violence, or disturbance relating to a man's person or his property.

VIS IMPRESSA (Lat.). Immediate force; original force. This phrase is applied to cases of trespass when a question arises whether an injury has been caused by a direct force or one which is indirect. When the original force, or vis impressa, had ceased to act before the injury commenced, then there is no force, the effect is mediate, and the proper remedy is trespass on the case.

When the injury is immediate consequence of the force, or vis proxima, trespass vi et armis lies; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3483; 4 id. n. 3583.

VIS MAJOR (Lat.). A superior force. In law it signifies inevitable accident.

This term is used in the civil law in nearly the same way that the words act of God (q. v.) are used in the common law. Generally, no one is responsible for an accident which arises from the vis major; but a man may be so where he has stipulated that he would, and when he has been guilty of a fraud or deceit; 2 Kent, 448; Pothier, Prêt a Usage, n. 48, n. 60; Story, Bailm. § 25.

VISA. In Civil Law. The formula put upon an act; a register; a commercial book, in order to approve of it and authenticate it.

VISCOUNT (Lat. vice-comes). This name was made use of as an arbitrary title of honor, without any office pertaining to it, by Henry VI. for the first time. The sheriff or earl's deputy holds the office of vice-comes, of which viscount is a translation, but used, as we have just seen, in a different sense. The dignity of a viscount is next to an earl. 1 Bla. Com. 397.

VISITATION. The act of examining into the affairs of a corporation.

The power of visitation is applicable only to ecclesiastical and eleemosynary corporations. 1 Bla. Com. 480; 2 Kyd, Corp. 174. The visitation of civil corporations is by the government itself, through the medium of the courts of justice. See 2 Kent, 240. In the United States, the legislature is the visitor of all corporations founded by it for public purposes; 6 Pick. 427; 18 id. 328; 4 Wheat. 518. See Ang. & A. Corp. § 684; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 47 n.

VISITATION BOOKS. Compilations made out or collected by the heralds in the circuits which their commissions authorized them to make, for the purpose of inquiring into the state of families and registering marriages and descents which were verified to them by oath. They are good evidence of pedigree. 3 Bla. Com. 105; 3 Steph. Com. 335, n.

VISITER, OR VISITOR. An inspector of the government, of corporations, or bodies politic. 1 Bla. Com. 482. See Dane, Abr. Index; 7 Pick. 303; 12 id. 244.

VISNE. The neighborhood; a neighboring place; a place near at hand; the venue.

Formerly the visne was confined to the immediate neighborhood where the cause of action arose, and many verdicts were disturbed because the visne was too large, which becoming a great grievance, several statutes were passed to remedy the evil. The 21 James I. c. 13, gives aid after verdict, where the visne is partly wrong,—that is, where it is warded out of too many or too few places in the county named. The 16 & 17 Charles II. c. 8, goes further, and cures defects of the visne wholly, so that the cause is tried by a jury of the proper county. See VENUE.

VIVA VOCE (Lat. with living voice). Verbally. It is said a witness delivers his evidence viva voce when he does so in open court: the term is opposed to deposition. It is sometimes opposed to ballot: as, the people vote by ballot, but their representatives in the legislature vote viva voce.

VIVARY. A place where living things are kept: as, a park on land; or, in the water, as a pond.

VIVUM VADIUM. See VADIUM VIVUM.

VOCATIO IN JUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. According to the practice in the legis actiones of the Roman law, a person having a demand against another verbally cited him to go with him to the prætor: in jus eamus; in jus te voco. This was denominated vocatio in jus. If a person thus summoned refused to go, he could be compelled by force to do so, unless he found a vindex,—that is, procurator, or a person to undertake his cause. When the parties appeared before the prætor, they went through the particular formalities required by the action applicable to the cause. If the cause was not ended the same day, the parties promised to appear again at another day, which was called vadimonium. See Matt. v. 25.

VOID. That which has no force or effect. Contracts, bequests, or legal proceedings may be void. See those titles.

VOIDABLE. That which has some force or effect, but which, in consequence of some inherent quality, may be legally annulled or avoided.

As a familiar example, may be mentioned the case of a contract made by an infant with an adult, which may be avoided or confirmed by the former on his coming of age. See PARTIES.

Such contracts are, generally, of binding force until avoided by the party having a right to annul them. Bacon, Abr. Infancy (I 3); Comyns, Dig. Enfant; 3 Burr. 1794; 1 Nels. Ch. 55; 1 Atk. 354; Strn. 937; Perkins, § 12.

VOIR DIRE. A preliminary examination of a witness to ascertain whether he is competent.

When a witness is supposed to have an interest in the cause, the party against whom he is called has the choice to prove such interest by calling another witness to that fact, or he may require the witness produced to be sworn on his voir dire as to whether he has an interest in the cause or not; but the party against whom he is called will not be allowed to have recourse to both methods to prove the witness's interest. If the witness answers he has no interest, he is competent, his oath being conclusive; if he swears he has an interest, he will be rejected.

Though this is the rule established beyond the power of the courts to change, it seems not very satisfactory. The witness is sworn on his voir dire to ascertain whether he has an interest which would disqualify him, because he would be tempted to perjure himself if he testified when interested. But when he is asked whether he has such an interest, if he is dishonest and anxious to be sworn in the case, he will swear falsely he has none, and, his answer being conclusive, he will be admitted as competent; if, on the contrary, he swears truly he has an interest, when he knows that will exclude him, he is told that for being thus honest he must be rejected.

See 1 Dall. 375; INTEREST.

VOLUNTARY. Willingly; done with one's consent; negligently. Wolff, § 5.

To render an act criminal or tortious, it must be voluntary. If a man, therefore, kill another without a will on his part while engaged in the performance of a lawful act, and having taken proper care to prevent it, he is not guilty of any crime. And if he commit an injury to the person or property of another, he is not liable for damages, unless the act has been voluntary or through negligence; as, when a collision takes place between two ships without any fault in either. 2 Dods. Adm. 83; 3 Hagg. Adm. 320, 414.

When the crime or injury happens in the performance of an unlawful act, the party will be considered as having acted voluntarily.

VOLUNTARY ASSIGNMENT. See VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE.

VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE. A conveyance without any valuable consideration.

Voluntary conveyances are discussed most frequently with reference to the statutes 13 Eliz. c. 5 (for the protection of creditors) and 27 Eliz. c. 4 (for the protection of subsequent purchasers). A voluntary conveyance, however, is not within these statutes unless it is fraudulent; Cowp. 434. And as between the parties a voluntary conveyance is generally good.

In determining whether a voluntary conveyance is fraudulent and within the stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5, a distinction is made between existing (or previous) and subsequent creditors. An existing creditor, so called, is one who is a creditor at the time of the conveyance; and it was at one time held that, as against him, every voluntary conveyance by the debtor is fraudulent; 8 Wheat. 229; without regard to the amount of the debts, the extent of the property in settlement, or the circumstances of the debtor; 3 Johns. Ch. 500; but this rule is now subject to great modifications both in England and in the United States; see 1 Am. L. Cas. 37–40; and the conclusion to be drawn from the more recent cases is that the whole question depends in great measure on the ratio of the debts, not so much to the property the debtor parts with, as to that which he retains; 24 Penn. 511; 2 Beav. 344; 4 Drew. 632. A subsequent creditor is one who becomes a creditor after the conveyance; and, as against him, a voluntary conveyance is not void unless actually fraudulent; 1 Am. L. Cas. 40; but there is great diversity in the definition of the fraud of which he may avail himself; see 3 De G. J. & S. 293; L. R. 5 Ch. Ap. 518; 3 Johns. Ch. 501; 39 Penn. 499; 9 W. N. C. (Pa.) 353.

Whenever a voluntary conveyance is made, a presumption of fraud properly arises upon the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 4, which presumption may be repelled by showing that the transaction on which the conveyance was founded virtually contained some conventional stipulations, some compromise of interests, or reciprocity of benefits, that point out an object and motive beyond the indulgence of affection or claims of kindred, and not reconcilable with the supposition of intent to deceive a purchaser. But, unless so repelled, such a conveyance, coupled with a subsequent negotiation for sale, is conclusive evidence of statutory fraud.

The principles of these statutes, though they may not have been substantially re-enacted, prevail throughout the United States. General reference may be made to Hunt, Fraud. Conv.; May, Stats. of Eliz.; Bump, Fraud. Conv.; Note to Twyne's Case, 1 Sm. L. Cas. (cases to 1879 discussed in 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 137); Note to Sexton vs. Wheaton, 1 Am. L. Cas.; Story, Eq. Jurisp. §§ 350–436.

VOLUNTARY DEPOSIT. In Civil Law. A deposit which is made by the mere consent or agreement of the parties. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1054.

VOLUNTARY ESCAPE. The giving to a prisoner voluntarily any liberty not authorized by law. 5 Mass. 310; 2 Chipm. 11; 3 Harr. & J. 559. See ESCAPE.

VOLUNTARY JURISDICTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. That kind of jurisdiction which requires no judicial proceedings: as, the granting letters of administration and receiving the probate of wills.

VOLUNTARY NONSUIT. In Practice. The abandonment of his cause by a plaintiff, and an agreement that a judgment for costs be entered against him. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3306.

VOLUNTARY SALE. One made freely, without constraint, by the owner of the thing sold. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 974.

VOLUNTARY WASTE. That which is either active or wilful: in contradistinction to that which arises from mere negligence, which is called permissive waste. 2 Bouvier, Inst. 2394 et seq. See WASTE.

VOLUNTEERS. Persons who receive a voluntary conveyance.

It is a general rule of the courts of equity that they will not assist a mere volunteer who has a defective conveyance. Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 5, s. 2; and see the note there for some exceptions to this rule. See, generally, 1 Madd. 271; 1 Supp. to Ves. Ch. 320; 2 id. 321; Powell, Mortg.

In Military Law. Persons who, in time of war, offer their services to their country and march in its defence.

Their rights and duties are prescribed by the municipal laws of the different states. But when in actual service they are subject to the laws of the United States and the articles of war.

One who freely enlists in the place of another, and becomes his substitute of his own free will and accord, is a volunteer within the spirit and intent of the statutes; 43 Barb. 239.

VOTE. Suffrage; the voice of an individual in making a choice by many. The total number of voices given at an election: as, the presidential vote.

Votes are either given by ballot or viva voce; they may be delivered personally by the voter himself, or in some cases, by proxy. A majority of votes given carries the question submitted, unless in particular cases when the constitution or laws require that there shall be a majority of all the voters, or when a greater number than a simple majority is expressly required: as, for example, in the case of the senate, in making treaties by the president and senate, two-thirds of the senators present must concur.

When the votes are equal in number, the proposed measure is lost. The presumption of the legality of a vote in no way depends upon the omission to challenge or object to it, or any presumed knowledge of the judge of election; but it arises from the fact of its having been deposited in the ballot-box. When once deposited, it will be presumed to be a legal vote until the contrary is proved; 88 Ill. 498. See ELECTION; BALLOT; SUFFRAGE; VOTER.

VOTER. One entitled to a vote; an elector. The qualifications of voters are similar in all the states, but not uniform. They have been summarized as follows: 1. Citizenship, either by birth or naturalization; 2. Residence for a given period of time in the state, county, and voting precinct; 3. Age, the limit is twenty-one years in all the states; 4. The payment of taxes, in some states, and in many states, registration; 5. Freedom from infamy, of having committed an infamous crime; 6. Freedom from idiocy or lunacy; McCrary, Elect. § 4. A person who is capable of transacting the ordinary business of life, even though laboring under some hallucination or delusion, unless it be shown to extend to political matters, cannot be denied the privilege of voting on the ground of want of mental capacity; 88 Ill. 499. The right to fix the qualifications of voters is in the states, except so far as it is limited by the 15th amendment to the constitution of the United States, which provides that the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. See McCrary, Elections; Morse, Citizenship; VOTE.

VOUCHEE. In common recoveries, the person who is called to warrant or defend the title is called the vouchee. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2093.

VOUCHER. In Accounts. An account-book in which are entered the acquittances or warrants for the accountant's discharge. Any acquittance or receipt which is evidence of payment or of the debtor's being discharged. See 3 Halst. 299; 1 Mete. Mass. 218.

In Old Conveyancing. The person on whom the tenant to the præcipe calls to defend the title to the land, because he is supposed to have warranted the title to him at the time of the original purchase.

The person usually employed for this purpose is the crier of the court, who is therefore called the common voucher. See Cruise, Dig. tit. 36, c. 3, s. 1; 22 Viner, Abr. 26; RECOVERY.

VOUCHER TO WARRANTY. The calling one who has warranted lands, by the party warranted, to come and defend the suit for him. Co. Litt. 101 b.

VOYAGE. In Maritime Law. The passage of a ship upon the seas from one port to another, or to several ports. The term includes the enterprise entered upon and not merely the route; 113 Mass. 326.

Every voyage must have a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem. When the insurance is for a limited time, the two extremes of that time are the termini of the voyage insured. When a ship is insured both outward and homeward, for one entire premium, this, with reference to the insurance, is considered but one voyage, and the terminus a quo is also the terminus ad quem; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 7, s. 1–5. As to the commencement and ending of the voyage, see RISK.

The voyage, with reference to the legality of it, is sometimes confounded with the traffic in which the ship is engaged, and is frequently said to be illegal only because the trade is so; but a voyage may be lawful, and yet the transport of certain goods on board the ship may be prohibited; or the voyage may be illegal, though the transport of the goods be lawful; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 6, s. 1. See Lex Merc. Amer. c. 10, s. 14; Park. Ins. c. 12; Weskett, Ins. Voyages; DEVIATION.

In the French law, the voyage de conserve is the name given to designate an agreement made between two or more sea-captains that they will not separate in their voyage, will lend aid to each other, and will defend themselves against a common enemy or the enemy of one of them in case of attack. This agreement is said to be a partnership; 3 Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 656; 4 id. 984; 20 Toullier, n. 17.

VULGO CONCEPTI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Bastards whose father was unknown. Leg. 53, ff. de statu hominum. Those, also, whose fathers, though known, could not lawfully be recognized as such: viz., the offspring of incest and adultery. Code, Civ. 3. 7. 1.

W.

WADSET. In Scotch Law. The old term for a mortgage. A right by which lands or other heritable subjects are impignorated by the proprietor to his creditor in security of his debt. Like other heritable rights, it is protected by seisin.

Wadsets are commonly made out in the form of mutual contracts, in which one party sells the land and the other grants the right of reversion. Erskine, Inst. 2. 8. 1. 2.

Wadsets are proper, where the use of the land shall go for the use of the money; improper, where the reversor agrees to make up the deficiency; and where it amounts to more, the surplus profit of the land is applied to the extinction of the principal. Erskine, Inst. 2. 8. 12. 13.

WADSETTER. In Scotch Law. A creditor to whom a wadset is made, corresponding to a mortgagee. See REVERSOR.

WAGE. To give a pledge or security for the performance of any thing: as, to wage or gage deliverance, to wage law, etc. Co. Litt. 294. This word is but little used.

WAGER. A bet; a contract by which two parties or more agree that a certain sum of money, or other thing, shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening or not happening of an uncertain event.

A contract upon a contingency by which one may lose but cannot gain, or the other can gain but cannot lose, is a wager; 15 Gratt. 653; but it has been decided that to constitute a wager there must be a risk by both parties; 5 Humph. 561. In 1 Bosw. 207, it was said: "A wager is something hazarded on the issue of some uncertain event; a bet is a wager, though a wager is not necessarily a bet." As to difference between wager and contract of indemnity, see 89 Penn. 89.

At common law, wagers were not, per se, void; 2 Term, 610; 37 Cal. 670; 3 McLean, 100; 25 Tex. 586. By an English statute passed in 1845, wagers were prohibited, and similar statutes have been passed in many of the states; see Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 409.

As to wagering contracts in the sale of stocks, etc., the same writer lays down the following proposition as conceded in all the cases: If the contract between the parties is a bona fide contract to buy and sell, the law will sustain it; but where it appears from the evidence that there is no real contract of sale, and that the whole transaction is to be settled by the payment of "differences," the contract will be set aside; id. 410. He also says: There is a marked distinction between those cases which have arisen between the direct parties to the contract, as, for instance, a vendor and vendee, and those in which a broker, acting for a principal, has entered into agreements with third persons on behalf of his principal and then seeks indemnity from the latter for money laid out, etc. and commissions in the transactions. In the former class, if the intention of the parties is not to deliver or receive property but to settle by the mere payment of differences, the contract is a wager. But a broker may be ignorant of the unlawful intentions of his principals, and may then recover for money paid out and commissions, although the principals would be unable to enforce the contracts as between themselves; id. 410.

Where a contract is a mere device to avoid the statute, it is illegal, but the burden of proving its illegality is upon the defendant; 70 N. Y. 202; and the intention of the parties is for the jury; 20 E. L. & E. 290; 72 Penn. 155; but see 89 Penn. 250; and it has been held that, to uphold a contract in writing for the sale and delivery of grain at a future day for a certain price, it must affirmatively and satisfactorily appear that it was made with an actual view to the recovery and receipt of the grain, and not as a cover for a gambling transaction; 3 Wisc. Leg. News, 338.

A purchase of grain at a certain price per bushel, made in good faith, to be delivered in the next month, giving the seller until the last day of the month, at his option, in which to deliver, is not a gambling contract; the purchaser would be entitled to its benefit, no matter what may have been the secret intention of the seller; 79 Ill. 351.

A usage by which merchants usually settle contracts for the sale of grain by "differences" does not necessarily render such a contract void; per Gresham, D. J., in 12 Ch. L. News, 241.

Contracts for the sale of property to be delivered at a future time at the plaintiff's option, when it was not the intention of the parties that the property should be delivered either by consignment or the delivery of warehouse receipts, but that the contracts should be settled by the payment of differences, are void; per Love, D. J., in 11 Fed. Rep. 193; but it is said that the mere fact that an option is reserved does not vitiate. There are many circumstances under which an option is the only way in which can be consumated transactions beneficial to both sides. If all options were prohibited, all conditional contracts would have to be prohibited; see Dr. Wharton's note to case last cited; also 70 N. Y. 202.

When one loses a wager and gets another to pay the money for him, an action lies for the recovery of the money; 15 C. B. N. S. 316; see 4 Q. B. 75; but see 97 Penn. 202, 298. So it is said that where an agent advances money to his principal to pay losses incurred in an illegal transaction, the contract between them, made after the illegal contract is closed, is binding; 2 Woods, 554: see 98 Mass. 161. Where a broker sued his principal for advances and commissions on the purchase of property, it was held that the fact that persons from whom the broker bought the property for his principal had not the goods on hand when the contract was made, and that they had no reasonable expectation of acquiring them except by purchase, did not defeat the broker's right to recover; 14 Bush, 727; see, also, 5 M. & W. 462.

Optional contracts, where the seller has the privilege of delivering or not delivering, and the buyer of calling or not calling for, the grain, just as they choose, and which on the maturity of the contracts were to be settled by differences, are illegal; 79 Ill. 328.

The writer above quoted (Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 477) gives the general result of the cases:—

1. Where a contract is made for the delivery or acceptance of securities at a future day at a price named, and neither party, at the time of the making of the contract, intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay differences according to the rise or fall of the market, the contract is void either by virtue of statute or as contrary to public policy.

2. In each transaction the law looks primarily at the intention of the parties, which intention is a matter of fact for the jury to determine.

3. The form of the transaction is not conclusive, and oral evidence may be given of the surrounding circumstances and condition of the parties to show their intention; a contract purporting on its face to be a contract of sale is a mere gambling device, although the contract is in writing under seal.

4. Option contracts, viz. "puts," "calls," and "straddles," are not prima facie gambling contracts.

5. To make a contract a gambling transaction, both parties must concur in the illegal intent.

6. The defence of wager must be affirmatively pleaded, and the burden of proof is upon the party asserting the same.

7. A broker who makes real contracts with third persons in behalf of his client with the understanding between the client and broker that the former shall never be called upon to pay or receive more than differences, can recover the amount paid out for his client in the transactions, together with his commissions. See Biddle, Stock Brokers; Lewis, Stocks; article by Dr. Wharton in 3 Cr. L. Mag. 1, on Political Economy and Criminal Law.

Wagers on the event of an election laid before the poll is open; 1 Term, 56; 4 Johns. 426; 4 H. & McH. 284; or after it is closed; 8 Johns. 147, 454; 2 Browne, Pa. 182; are unlawful. See 117 Mass. 558; McCreary Elect. § 149. And wagers are against public policy if they are in restraint of marriage; 10 East, 22; if made as to the mode of playing an illegal game; 2 H. Blackst. 43; 1 N. & M'C. 180; 7 Taunt. 246; or on an abstract speculative question of law or judicial practice, not arising out of circumstances in which the parties have a real interest; 12 East, 247, and Day's notes. But see 1 Cowp. 37.

Wagers as to the sex of an individual; Cowp. 729; or whether an unmarried woman had borne or would have a child; 4 Camp. 152; are illegal, as necessarily leading to painful and indecent considerations. The supreme court of Pennsylvania have laid it down as a rule that every bet about the age, or height, or weight, or wealth, or circumstances, or situation of any person, is illegal; and this, whether the subject of the bet be man, woman, or child, married or single, native or foreigner, in this country or abroad; 1 Rawle, 42. And it seems that a wager between two coach-proprietors, whether or not a particular person would go by one of their coaches, is illegal, as exposing that person to inconvenience; 1 B. & Ald. 683.

There has been some diversity of opinion as to what should be considered a wager on a horse race. Simple bets upon a race are unlawful both in England and this country. In England contributions towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner are not regarded in that light; Oliph. 391. And this view has been taken in several decisions in this country. In 81 N. Y. 532, in an action by a jockey for his wages for driving in races, the court held that the contract of employment was not in violation of the statute against betting on horse races; nor was money paid for the entrance of horses in a race. So in 63 Ind. 58, a premium offered by a trotting association for the "best and quickest time," was held clearly distinguishable from a wager. So in Wisconsin; 25 Alb. L. J. 405. But in Pennsylvania, a check given to an agricultural society, to enable the drawer to enter his horse in a "trial of speed," was held void, and putting up a purse to be trotted for was held to be gambling, under the laws of that state; 94 Penn. 132; to the same effect, 24 Mich. 441.

In the case even of a legal wager, the authority of a stakeholder, like that of an arbitrator, may be rescinded by either party before the event happens. And if, after his authority has been countermanded and the stake has been demanded, he refuse to deliver it, trover or assumpsit for money had and received is maintainable; 1 B. & Ald. 683. And where the wager is in its nature illegal, the stake may be recovered, even after the event, on demand made before it has been paid over; 4 Taunt. 474. But see 12 Johns. 1. See, further, on this subject, 7 Johns. 434; 10 id. 406, 468; 11 id. 23; 12 id. 376; 13 id. 88; 15 id. 5; 17 id. 192; STAKEHOLDER.

WAGER OF BATTEL. A superstitious mode of trial, at one time common throughout Christendom, introduced into England by William the Conqueror.

It was resorted to in three cases only: in the court martial or court of chivalry; in appeals of felony and upon approvements; and, upon issue joined in a writ of right. On appeals parties fought in their own proper persons, on a writ of right by their champions. But if the appellant or approver were a woman, a priest, an infant, or of the age of sixty, or lame or blind, or a peer of the realm, or a citizen of London; or if the crime were notorious; in such cases wager of battel might be declined by the appellant or approver. But where the wager of battel was allowed, the appellee pleaded not guilty, and threw down his glove, declaring he would defend the same with his body. The appellant took up the glove, replying that he was ready to make good his appeal, body for body. Thereupon the appellee, taking the Bible in his right hand, and in his left the right hand of his antagonist, swore to this effect: "Hear this, O man, whom I hold by the hand, who callest thyself John by the name of baptism, that I, who call myself Thomas by the name of baptism, did not feloniously murder thy father, William by name, nor am anywise guilty of the said felony; so help me God and the saints; and this I will defend against thee by my body, as this court shall award." The appellant replied with a like oath, declaring also that the appellee had perjured himself. Then followed oaths by both parties against amulets and sorcery as follows: "Hear this, ye justices, that I have this day neither eat, drank, nor have upon me neither bones, stones, nor grass, nor any enchantment, sorcery, or witchcraft, whereby the law of God may be abased, or the law of the devil exalted; so help me God and his saints." The battle was then begun; and if the appellee were so far vanquished as not to be able or willing to fight any longer, he was adjudged to be hanged immediately; but if he killed the appellant, or could maintain the fight from sunrising till the stars appeared in the evening, he was acquitted. Also if the appellant became recreant, and pronounced the word craven, he lost his liberam legem, and became infamous, see CRAVEN, and the appellee recovered his damages, and was forever quit of any further proceedings for the same offence. The proceedings in wager of battel in a writ of right were similar to the above except that the battle was by champions. It was the only mode of determining a writ of right until Henry II. introduced the grand assize, q. v. The prevalence of judicial combats in the Middle Ages is attributed by Mr. Hallam to systematic perjury in witnesses, and want of legal discrimination on the parts of judges. Moz. & W.

The last case of this kind was commenced in the year 1817, but not proceeded in to judgment; and at the next session of the British parliament an act was passed to abolish appeals of murder, treason, felony, or other offences, and wager of battel, or joining issue or trial by battel, in writs of right. 59 Geo. III. c. 46. For the history of this species of trial see 3 Bla. Com. 337; 4 id. 347; Encyclopédie, Gage de Bataille; Steph. Pl. 122, and App. note 35.

WAGER OF LAW. In Old Practice. An oath taken by a defendant in an action of debt that he does not owe the claim, supported by the oaths of eleven neighbors.

When an action of debt is brought against a man upon a simple contract, and the defendant pleads nil debet, and concludes his plea with this plea, with this formula, "And this he is ready to defend against him the said A B and his suit, as the court of our lord the king here shall consider," etc., he is then put in sureties (vadios) to wage his law on a day appointed by the judge. The wager of law consists in an oath taken by the defendant on the appointed day, and confirmed by the oaths of eleven neighbors or compurgators. This oath had the effect of a verdict in favor of the defendant, and was only allowed in the actions of debt on simple contract, and detinue; nor was it allowed to any one not of good character. In consequence of this privilege of the defendant, assumpsit displaces debt as a form of action on simple contracts, and instead of detinue, trover was used. But in England wager of law was abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 13. And even before its abolition it had fallen into disuse. It was last used as a method of defence in 2 B. & C. 538, where the defendant offered to wage his law, but the plaintiff abandoned the case. This was in 1824. If it ever had any existence in the United States, it is now completely abolished: 8 Wheat. 642.

The name (in law Latin, vadiatio legis) comes from the defendant's being put in pledges (vadios) to make his oath on the appointed day. There was a similar oath in the Roman law, and in the laws of most of the nations that conquered Rome. It was very early in use in England, as Glanville distinctly describes it. Glanville, lib. 1, c. 9, 12. See Steph. Pl. 124, 250, and notes xxxix.; Co. 2d Inst. 119; Mod. Entr. 179; Lilly, Entr. 467; 3 Chitty, Pl. 497; 13 Viner, Abr. 58; Bacon, Abr.; Dane, Abr. Index. For the origin of this form of trial, see Steph. Plead. notes xxxix.; Co. Litt. 394, 395; 3 Bla. Com. 341.

WAGER POLICY. One made when the insured has no insurable interest.

It has nothing in common with insurance but the name and form. It is usually in such terms as to preclude the necessity of inquiring into the interest of the insured: as, "interest or no interest," or, "without further proof of interest than the policy."

Such contracts, being against the policy of the law, are void: 1 Marsh. Ins. 121. See 1 Sumn. 451; 2 Mass. 1; 3 Caines, 141. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

WAGES. A compensation given to a hired person for his or her services. As to servants' wages, see Chitty, Contr. 171; as to sailors' wagers, Abbott, Shipp. 473. See MASTER.

WAIFS. Stolen goods waived or scattered by a thief in his flight in order to effect his escape.

Such goods, by the English common law, belong to the king; 1 Bla. Com. 296; 5 Co. 109; Cro. Eliz. 694. This prerogative has never been adopted here against the true owner, and never put in practice against the finder, though against him there would be better reason for adopting it; 2 Kent, 292. See Comyns, Dig. Waif; 1 Bro. Civ. Law, 289, n.

WAINAGIUM (Sax. woeg, Lat. vagina). What is necessary to the farmer for the cultivation of his land. Barrington, Stat. 12; Magna Charta, c. 14. According to Selden and Lord Bacon, it is not the same as contenementum, used in the same chapter of Magna Charta, meaning the power of entertaining guests, or countenance, as common people say.

WAITING CLERKS IN CHANCERY. It was the duty of these officers to wait in attendance on the court of chancery. The office was abolished in 1842.

WAIVE. A term applied to a woman as outlaw is applied to a man. A man is an outlaw; a woman is a waive. Crabb, Tech. Dict.

To abandon or forsake a right.

To abandon without right: as, "if the felon waives,—that is, leaves any goods in his flight from those who either pursue him, or are apprehended by him so to do,—he forfeits them, whether they be his own goods, or goods stolen by him." Bacon, Abr. Forfeiture (B).

WAIVER. The relinquishment or refusal to accept of a right.

In practice, it is required of every one to take advantage of his rights at a proper time; and neglecting to do so will be considered as a waiver. If, for example, a defendant who has been misnamed in the writ and declaration pleads over, he cannot afterwards take advantage of the error by pleading in abatement; for his plea amounts to a waiver.

In seeking for a remedy, the party injured may, in some instances, waive a part of his right and sue for another: for example, when the defendant has committed a trespass on the property of the plaintiff by taking it away, and afterwards he sells it, the injured party may waive the trespass and bring an action of assumpsit for the recovery of the money thus received by the defendant; 1 Chitty, Pl. 90.

In contracts, if, after knowledge of a supposed fraud, surprise, or mistake, a party performs the agreement in part, he will be considered as having waived the objection; 1 Bro. P. C. 289.

When a constitutional provision is designed for the protection solely of the property rights of the citizen, it is competent for him to waive the protection, and to consent to such action as would be invalid if taken against his will: Cooley, Const. Lim. 219. See 3

N. Y. 511; 6 Hill, 147. In criminal cases this doctrine must be true only to a very limited extent; Cooley, Const. Lim. 220. In capital cases the accused stands upon his rights and waives nothing; 47 Ill. 325; 1 Neb. 385. The weight of authority on this subject is with the doctrine that in prosecutions for crime, at least when the crime charged is other than more misdemeanor, the defendant cannot waive his right to trial by a jury of twelve men; 1 Cr. L. Mag. 64; see, also, 48 Cal. 257; 16 Ind. 496; 41 Mo. 470; 18 N. Y. 128; but see 1 Cr. L. Mag. 57 (S. C. of Iowa).

It is a rule of the civil law, consonant with reason, that any one may renounce or waive that which has been established in his favor. Regula est juris antiqui omnes licentiam habere his quæ pro se introducta sunt, renunciare. Code, 2. 3. 29. As to what will amount to a waiver of a forfeiture, see 1 Conn. 79; 7 id. 45; 1 Johns. Cas. 125; 14 Wend. 419; 8 Pick. 292; 2 N. H. 120, 163; 1 Ohio, 21; CONDITION.

WAKENING. In Scotch Law. The revival of an action.

An action is said to sleep when it lies over, not insisted on for a year, in which case it is suspended. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 33. With us a revival is by scire facias.

WAND OF PEACE. In Scotch Law. The wand which the messenger carries along with his blazon, in executing a caption, and with which he touches the prisoner. A sliding along this staff of a movable ring, or the breaking of the staff, is a protest that the officer has been resisted or deforced. Burton, Law of Scotl. 572; Bell, Dict. Imprisonment.

WANTON AND FURIOUS DRIVING. An offence against public health, which, under the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 56, is punishable as a misdemeanor by fine or imprisonment. In this country, the offence is usually provided for by state, county, or municipal legislation.

WANTONNESS. A licentious act by one man towards the person of another, without regard to his rights: as, for example, if a man should attempt to pull off another's hat against his will, in order to expose him to ridicule, the offence would be an assault, and if he touched him it would amount to a battery.

In such case there would be no malice, but the wantonness of the act would render the offending party liable to punishment.

WAPENTAKE (from Sax. wapen, i. e. armatura, and tac, i. e. tactus). A Saxon court, held monthly by the alderman for the benefit of the hundred.

It was called a wapentake from wapen, arms, and tac, to touch; because when the chief of the hundred entered upon his office he appeared in the field on a certain day, on horseback, with a pike in his hand, and all the principal men met him with lances. Upon this he alighted, and they all touched his pike with their lances, in token of their submission to his authority. In this court causes of great moment were heard and determined, as Mr. Dugdale has shown from several records. Besides which it took cognizance of theft, trials by ordeal, view of frankpledge, and the like; whence after the conquest it was called the sheriff's tourn, and, as regarded the examination of the pledges, the court of the view of frankpledge. These pledges were no other than the freemen within the liberty, who, according to an institution of king Alfred, were mutually pledged for the good behavior of each other. Fortescue, de Laud. c. 24; Dugdale, Orig. Jur. 27; 4 Bla. Com. 273. Sir Thomas Smith derives it from the custom of taking away the arms at the muster of each hundred, from those who could not find sureties for good behavior. Rep. Angl. lib. 2, c. 16.

WAR. An armed contest between nations. Grotius, de Jur. Bell, l. 1, c. 1. The state of nations among whom there is an interruption of all pacific relations, and a general contention by force, authorized by the sovereign. Mann. Comm. 98; 1 Kent, *61, n. (h.). A civil war is one confined to a single nation. It is public on the part of the established government, and private on the part of the people resisting its authority, but both the parties are entitled to all the rights of war as against each other, and even as respects neutral nations; Wheat. Int. L. § 296.

The right of making war belongs in every civilized nation to the supreme power of the state. The exercise of this right is regulated by the fundamental laws in each country, and may be delegated to its inferior authorities in remote possessions, or even to a commercial corporation. A contest by force between independent sovereign states is called a public war. If it is declared in form, or duly commenced, it entitles both the belligerent parties to all the rights of war against each other. In this respect there is no distinction between a just and an unjust war. A formal declaration of war to the enemy was once considered necessary to legalize hostilities between nations, and was uniformly practised until about the middle of the 17th century, but the present usage is to publish a manifesto within the territory of the state declaring war, announcing the existence of hostilities and the motives for commencing them. A civil war is never declared; Boyd's Wheat. Int. L. § 294 et seq.

The war between Great Britain and the United States was a civil war until the declaration of independence, when it became a public war between independent governments; 3 Dall. 199, 224. So the late war of secession in this country was a civil war after the president's proclamation of August 16, 1861. See 37 Ga. 482; 23 Am. L. Reg. 129; SECESSION. The general doctrines applicable to the subjects of belligerent nations have been held by the supreme court of the United States to be applicable to the hostile parties in that war; 2 Black, 635.

The constitution of the United States (art. 1, sec. 8) provides that congress shall have power to declare war. See 2 Wall. 404; 11 id. 268, 331.

As to war claims against the United States, see 29 Am. L. Reg. 26.

The effect of the late war upon contracts of life insurance has been much discussed. The supreme court has held, though in a divided opinion, that "a policy of life insurance forfeitable on non-payment of any annual premium, is not an insurance from year to year, like a common fire policy, but that the premiums constitute an annuity, the whole of which is the consideration for the entire insurance for life, and the condition is a condition subsequent making void the policy by its non-performance; that the time of payment in such policies is of the essence of the contract, failure wherein involves a forfeiture which equity cannot relieve against; and that if war intervenes, and makes intercourse between the parties unlawful, the policy is nevertheless forfeited if the insurers insist upon it, in which case, however, the insured is entitled to recover the difference between the cost of a new policy and the present value of the premiums yet to be paid on the old policy at the time the forfeiture occurred,—being the equitable value of the policy arising out of the premiums actually paid; and that it would be inequitable to compel a revival of the policies subverted by the war, as none but the sick or wounded would probably elect to have them revived;" 93 U. S. 24. To the same effect was 41 Conn. 372. But a different view has been taken by the state courts generally and by the inferior courts of the United States, holding that, as the intervention of war cuts off all intercourse between the contracting parties, a failure to pay under such circumstances does not avoid the policy; 59 Barb. 557; 50 N. Y. 626; 7 Bush, 179; 20 Gratt. 614; 9 Blatch. 234; 13 Wall. 158; May, Ins. § 350. The opinion above cited in 93 U. S. 24, has been severely criticized, and the question cannot be considered as finally settled. See 23 Am. L. Reg. 129; 25 id. 651; 11 Am. L. Rev. 221; 19 Am. Rep. 495, 512; 22 Gratt. 628; 9 Blatch. 234; 2 Ins. L. J. 863.

WAR OFFICE. In England. A department of state from which the sovereign issues orders to his forces. Whart. Lex.

WARD. An infant placed by authority of law under the care of a guardian.

While under the care of a guardian, a ward can make no contract whatever binding upon him, except for necessaries. When the relation of guardian and ward ceases, the latter is entitled to have an account of the administration of his estate from the former. During the existence of this relation the ward is under the subjection of his guardian, who stands in loco parentis. See GUARDIAN.

The English Judicature Act of 1873 assigns the wardship of infants and the care of infants' estates to the chancery division of the high court of justice. Whart. Lex.

A subdivision of a city to watch in the daytime, for the purpose of preventing violations of the law. It is the duty of all police officers and constables to keep ward in their respective districts.

WARD IN CHANCERY. An infant who is under the superintendence of the chancellor. See WARD.

WARD-HOLDING. In Old Scotch Law. Military tenure by which lands were held. It was so called from the yearly tax in commutation of the right to hold vassals' lands during minority. It was abolished in 1747. Burton, Law of Scotl. p. 375; Bell, Dict.

WARDEN. A guardian; a keeper. This is the name given to various officers: as, the warden of the prison, the wardens of the port of Philadelphia, church-wardens. As to the latter, see Baum.

WARDEN OF THE CINQUE PORTS. Governor of the ports of England lying next France, with the authority of admiral, and power of sending out writs in his own name, etc. The constable of Dover Castle is the warden of the Cinque Ports, and was first appointed by William the Conqueror; but John I. granted to the wardens their privileges on condition that they should provide a certain number of vessels for forty days, as often as the king should require them. See CINQUE PORTS.

WARDMOTE (from ward, and Sax. mote, or gemote, a meeting).

In English Law. A court held in every ward in London.

The wardmote inquest has power to inquire into and present all defaults concerning the watch and police doing their duty, that engines, etc., are provided against fire, that persons selling ale and beer be honest and suffer no disorders, nor permit gaming, etc., that they sell in lawful measures, and searches are to be made for beggars, vagrants, and idle persons, etc., who shall be punished. Chart. Hen. II.; Lex Lond. 185; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Wharton, Law Dict. 2d Lond. ed. Wardmote. See Cowel; Co. 4th Inst. 249; 2 Show. 525.

WARDSHIP. In English Law. The right of the lord over the person and estate of the tenant, when the latter was under a certain age.

When a tenant by knight's service died, and his heir was under age, the lord was entitled to the custody of the person and the lands of the heir, without any account, until the ward, if a male, should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and, if a female, at eighteen. Wardship was also incident to a tenure in socage; but in this case not the lord, but the nearest relation to whom the inheritance could not descend, was entitled to the custody of the person and estate of the heir till he attained the age of fourteen years; at which period the wardship ceased, and the guardian was bound to account. Wardship in copyhold estates partook of that in chivalry and that in socage. Like the former, the lord was the guardian; like the latter, he was required to account. 2 Bla. Com. 67, 87, 97; Glanville, lib. 7, c. 9; Grand Cout. c. 33; Reg. Maj. c. 42.

WAREHOUSE. A place adapted to the reception and storage of goods and merchandise. 23 Me. 47.

A radical change was made in the revenue laws of the United States by the establishment, under the act of congress of Aug. 6, 1846, Stat. at L. 53, of the warehousing system. This statute is commonly called the Warehousing Act. Its evident object is to facilitate and encourage commerce by exempting the importer from the payment of duties until he is ready to bring his goods into market; 13 How. 295. Previous to the passage of that act, no goods chargeable with cash duties could be landed at the port of delivery until the duties were paid at the port of entry. The importer had no right to land them anywhere until they had passed through the custom-house. Before that act, the only provisions existing in relation to the warehousing of goods were merely applicable to special cases, such as where the vessel in which the goods were imported was subject to quarantine regulations, or where the entry might have been incomplete, or the goods had received damage, or where a landing was compelled at a port other than the one to which the vessel was destined, on account of distress of weather or other necessity, or in case of the importation of wines or distilled spirits. Andrews, Rev. Laws, 72.

The warehousing system was extended by the establishment of private bonded warehouses. Act of Mar. 28, 1854, 10 Stat. at L. 270; R. S. §§ 2964, 2965.

Where warehouses are situated in a state, and their business carried on therein exclusively, a state statute prescribing regulations for their governance is not unconstitutional, it being a matter of purely domestic concern, and even where their business affects inter-state as well as state commerce, such a statute can be enforced until congress acts in reference to their inter-state relations; 94 U. S. 113; s. c. 69 Ill. 80. See POLICE POWER; WAREHOUSEMAN.

WAREHOUSEMAN. A person who receives goods and merchandise to be stored in his warehouse for hire.

He is bound to use ordinary care in preserving such goods and merchandise, and his neglect to do so will render him liable to the owner; 1 Esp. 315; Story, Bailm. § 444; Jones, Bailm. 49, 96; 7 Cow. 497; 12 Johns. 232; 2 Wend. 593; 9 id. 268; 2 Ala. 284. The warehouseman's liability commences as soon as the goods arrive and the crane of the warehouse is applied to raise them into the warehouse; 4 Esp. 262.

Warehousemen have a lien on property left in their custody, for their hire, labor, and services; 1 Esp. 109; 3 id. 81; 7 W. & S. 466; though in some cases this lien has been looked upon only as specific, and not general; 13 Ark. 446; see Story, Bailm. 452–3; 3 Kent, §§ 635–641; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 465. WHARFINGER.

Warehouse Receipts.—Receipts given by a warehouseman for chattels placed in his possession for storage purposes. 40 Ill. 320. They are not in a technical sense negotiable instruments, but have been made so in many of the states by special statute; 2 Ames, Bills & Notes, 782. It has been held, that, even where no statute has been enacted on this subject, inasmuch as these instruments have come to be considered the representatives of property, and an assignment is equivalent to the delivery of property, the warehouseman is estopped, as against an assignee for value without notice, to set up facts or agreements contradictory to their terms; 14 Cent. L. J. 432 (S. C. of Tenn.). In order that receipts should be construed as warehouse receipts the special statutes on the subject must be strictly complied with; 9 Biss. 396; 101 U. S. 557. The holder of such receipts takes the same title to the goods as if the goods themselves had been delivered to him; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 303 (Ky.). See 43 Wisc. 267; BILLS OF LADING.

WARRANDICE. In Scotch Law. A clause in a charter of heritable rights, by which the grantor obliges himself that the right conveyed shall be effectual to the receiver. It is either personal or real. A warranty. Erskine, Inst. 2. 3. 11.

WARRANT. A writ issued by a justice of the peace or other authorized officer, directed to a constable or other proper person, requiring him to arrest a person therein named, charged with committing some offence, and to bring him before that or some other justice of the peace.

A bench-warrant is a process granted by a court, authorizing a proper officer to apprehend and bring before it some one charged with some contempt, crime, or misdemeanor. See BENCH-WARRANT.

A search-warrant is a process issued by a competent court or officer authorizing an officer therein named or described to examine a house or other place for the purpose of finding goods which it is alleged have been stolen. See SEARCH-WARRANT.

A warrant should regularly bear the hand and seal of the justice, and be dated. It should contain a command to the officer to make a return thereof and of his doings thereon. But the want of such a command does not excuse him from the obligation of making a proper return; 3 Cush. 438. And it is no ground for discharging a defendant that the warrant does not contain such a command; 2 Gray, 74. No warrant ought to be issued except upon the oath or affirmation of a witness charging the defendant with the offence; 3 Binn. 88.

The reprehensible practice of issuing blank warrants, which once prevailed in England, was never adopted here. 2 Russ. Cr. 512; Ld. Raym. 546; 1 Salk. 175; 1 H. Blackst. 13; Doctr. Pl. 529; Wood, Inst. 84; Comyns, Dig. Forcible Entry (D 18, 19), Imprisonment (H 6), Pleader (3 K 26), (3 M 23). See SEARCH-WARRANT.

WARRANT OF ATTORNEY. In Practice. An instrument in writing, addressed to one or more attorneys therein named, authorizing them, generally, to appear in any court, or in some specified court, on behalf of the person giving it, and to confess judgment in favor of some particular person therein named, in an action of debt, and usually containing a stipulation not to bring any writ of error, or file a bill in equity, so as to delay him.

This general authority is usually qualified by reciting a bond which commonly accompanies it, together with the condition annexed to it or by a written defeasance stating the terms upon which it was given and restraining the creditor from making immediate use of it.

In form, it is, generally, by deed; but it seems it need not necessarily be so; 5 Taunt. 264.

This instrument is given to the creditor as a security. Possessing it, he may sign judgment and issue an execution, without its being necessary to wait the termination of an action. See 14 East, 576; 2 Term, 100; 1 H. Blackst. 75; 1 Stra. 20; 2 W. Blackst. 1193; 2 Wils. 3; 1 Chitty, Bail, 707.

A warrant of attorney given to confess a judgment is not revocable, and notwithstanding a revocation, judgment may be entered upon it; 2 Ld. Raym. 766, 850; 2 Esp. 563. The death of the debtor is, however, generally speaking, a revocation; Co. Litt. 52 b; 1 Vent. 310. In Pennsylvania, judgment may be entered up by the prothonotary on such a warrant without the intervention of an attorney; 4 Sm. L. 278; Purd. Dig. 825; but the instrument must show on its face the amount due, unless it can be rendered certain by mere calculation; 73 Penn. 354.

The virtue of a warrant of attorney is spent by the entry of one judgment, and a second judgment entered on the same warrant is irregular; 6 S. & R. 296; 14 id. 170; 3 Wash. C. C. 558. See, generally, 1 Salk. 402; 1 Sell. Pr. 374; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (E 1, 2), Attorney (B 7, 8); 2 Archb. Pr. 12; Bingham, Judgm. 38.

WARRANTEE. One to whom a warranty is made. Sheppard, Touchst. 181.

WARRANTIA CHARTÆ. An ancient and now obsolete writ, which was issued when a man was enfeoffed of land with warranty and then he was sued or impleaded in assize or other action, in which he could not vouch or call to warranty.

It was brought by the feoffor pending the first suit against him, and had this valuable incident, that when the warrantor was vouched, and judgment passed against the tenant, the latter obtained judgment simultaneously against the warrantor, to recover other lands of equal value. Fitzh. N. B. 134; Dane, Abr. Index; 2 Rand. 141, 156; 11 S. & R. 115; Co. Litt. 100; Hob. 22, 217.

WARRANTOR. One who makes a warranty. Shepp. Touchst. 181.

WARRANTY. In Insurance. A stipulation or agreement on the part of the insured party, in the nature of a condition.

An express warranty is a particular stipulation introduced into the written contract by the agreement of the parties.

An implied warranty is an agreement which necessarily results from the nature of the contract: as, that the ship shall be seaworthy when she sails on the voyage insured.

An express warranty usually appears in the form of a condition, expressed or directly implied in the phraseology of the policy, stipulating that certain facts are or shall be true, or certain acts are or shall be done by the assured, who by accepting the insurance ratifies the stipulation.

Where the stipulation relates wholly to the future, it is a promissory condition or warranty; 1 Phill. Ins. § 754.

An express warranty must be strictly complied with; and the assured is not permitted to allege, in excuse for non-compliance, that the risk was not thereby affected, since the parties have agreed that the stipulated fact or act shall be the basis of the contract; 1 Phill. Ins. § 755; unless compliance is rendered illegal by a subsequent statute; 1 Phill. Ins. § 769.

The more frequent express warranties in marine policies are—time of sailing, and, in time of hostilities, the national character of the insured subject, and neutral insignia and conduct. In fire and life policies they are quite numerous, comprehending all the facts stated by the applicant in his application when incorporated, as it usually is, into the policy and expressly contracted by reference. In fire insurance, express reference is often made to the charter of the company, especially in mutual companies, and, in such companies, to rules and regulations, and conditions indorsed upon the policy; 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 28, 63. A policy of insurance, no less than any other contract, is subject to the condition against fraud.

The doctrine of the divers warranties and conditions in the different species of insurance has been the subject of a great mass of jurisprudence: viz.,—

In fire policies, with reference to assignments of the insured property, or the policy; 17 N. Y. 424, 509; 6 Gray, 160; 30 Penn. 311; 26 Conn. 165; 3 Dutch. 163; 25 Ala. 353; 1 Sneed, 444; 19 E. Y. 253; value; 11 Cush. 324; waiver of compliance with a warranty; 4 N. J. 67; 6 Gray, 192.

In life policies, with reference to assignment; 5 Sneed, 259; representation, or other stipulations; 11 Cush. 448; 3 Gray, 180; 1 Bosw. 338; 3 Md. 341; 21 Penn. 134; 13 La. An. 504; 19 Mo. 506; 2 C. B. N. S. 257.

In marine policies, with reference to assignments; 33 La. 338; contraband trade; 43 Me. 460; other insurance; 17 N. Y. 401; seaworthiness; 3 Ind. 23; 1 Wheat. 399; 1 Binn. 592; 1 Johns. 241; 7 Pick. 259; 4 Mas. 439; 1 Pet. 170; Dougl. 781; 1 Camp. 1; 2 B. & Ald. 320; 5 M. & W. 414; Roccus, n. 22; suspension of risk; 3 Gray, 415; title; 19 N. Waiver of the right to insist upon the performance of a condition may occur under a policy of this description: as, of the condition relative to assignment; 32 N. H. 95; or answers to questions; 7 Gray, 261; or distance of buildings; 6 Gray, 175; 7 id. 261; going out of limits; 33 Conn. 244; limitation of action; 14 N. Y. 253; offer of arbitration; 6 Gray, 192; payment of premium or assessment; 19 Barb. 440; 25 Conn. 442; 38 Me. 439; 31 Penn. 438; proof of loss; 21 Mo. 81; 17 N. Y. 428; seaworthiness; 37 Me. 137; title; 35 N. H. 328.

A clause in a policy of insurance against fire, that nothing but a distinct specific agreement clearly expressed and endorsed on the policy shall operate as a waiver of any printed or written condition, warranty, or restriction thereon, is construed to refer to those conditions which enter into and form a part of the contract of insurance, and not to those stipulations which are to be performed after a loss has occurred, such as giving notice and furnishing preliminary proof of loss; 36 Ind. 102; May, Ins. 626.

See DEVIATION; POLICY; REPRESENTATION; SEAWORTHINESS.

In Sales of Personal Property. A warranty is an express or implied statement of something which a party undertakes shall be part of a contract, and, though part of the contract, collateral to the express object of it. Benj. Sales, § 600. See 60 N. Y. 450.

An express warranty is one by which the warrantor covenants or undertakes to insure that the thing which is the subject of the contract is or is not as there mentioned: as, that a horse is sound; that he is not five years old.

An implied warranty is one which, not being expressly made, the law implies by the fact of the sale. Cro. Jac. 197.

In general, there is no implied warranty of the quality of the goods sold; 2 Kent, 374; Co. Litt. 102 a; 2 Bls. Com. 452; Dougl. 20; 1 Pet. 317; 1 Johns. 274; 20 id. 196; 4 Conn. 428; 10 Mass. 197; 18 Pick. 59; 12 S. & R. 181; 72 Penn. 229; 1 Hard. 531; 1 Murph. 138; 4 Hayw. 227; especially in cases of a specific chattel already existing which the buyer has inspected; 4 M. & W. 64; 42 N. H. 165.

But where a chattel is to be made or supplied to the order of the purchaser, there is an implied warranty that it is fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used, or for which it has been specially made; Benj. Sales, § 645; 53 N. Y. 515. Thus where a party conveyed a ship to another by deed, but at the time of the conveyance the ship was ashore in a wrecked and ruinous condition, it was held that there was an implied warranty that the article conveyed should be a ship, and not a mere "bundle of timber"; 3 M. & W. 390. Another exception is in the sale of goods by sample. There is a warranty that their quality is equal to the sample; 13 Mass. 139; 9 Wend. 20; 2 Sandf. 89; 3 Rawle, 37; 44 N. Y. 289. See SAMPLE. An implied warranty may also result from the usage of a particular trade; 2 Disney, 482; 4 Taunt. 847. In a sale by description of goods not inspected by the buyer, there is an implied warranty that the goods are saleable or merchantable; Benj. Sales, § 656; 24 Wisc. 508; 21 Iowa, 508; 53 N. Y. 518; 4 Camp. 144; but see 23 Me. 212. It has been held that words of description constitute a warranty that the articles sold are of the quality and description so described; 11 Pick. 99; 3 Rawle, 23; but the better opinion has been said to be that the words of description constitute not a warranty of the description, but a condition precedent to the seller's right of action, that the thing which he offers to deliver, or has delivered, should answer the description; 4 M. & W. 39 a; Benj. Sales, § 600. Where the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment to supply him an article, there is an implied warranty that the article will suit the desired purpose; 2 M. & G. 279; Benj. Sales, § 661. Finally, it is said that there is always an implied warranty in sales of provisions for household use; 18 Pick. 57; 10 Mass. 197; 18 Mich. 51; 50 Barb. 116. But see Benj. Sales, § 670.

The rule of the civil law was that a fair price implied a warranty of quality; Dig. 21. 2. 1. This rule has been adopted in Louisiana; 1 La. An. 27; and in South Carolina; 1 Bay, 324. There may be an implied warranty as to character; 18 Mass. 139; 2 Pick. Mass. 214; 2 Harr. & G. 495; 2 M. & G. 279; 20 Johns. 204; 4 B. & C. 108; and even as to quality, from statements of the seller; 40 Me. 9; 24 Barb. 549.

It is settled that in an executory agreement the vendor warrants, by implication, his title to the goods which he promises to sell, and that in the sale of an ascertained specific chattel, an affirmation by the vendor that the chattel is his is equivalent to a warranty of title, and that this affirmation may be implied from his conduct as well as his words. It is further said that the present rule in England is, in the absence of such implication or affirmation, that the sale of a personal chattel implies an affirmation by the vendor that the chattel is his, and, therefore, he warrants the title, unless it be shown by the facts and circumstances of the sale that the vendor did not intend to assert ownership, but only to transfer such interest as he might have in the chattel sold; Benj. Sales, §§ 627, 639.

As to goods in the possession of the vendor, there is an implied warranty of title; but where the goods sold are in possession of a third party at the time of the sale, then there is no such warranty; 36 Me. 501; 28 Miss. 772; Story, Sales, 459; 2 Kent, 478; contra, 3 Term, 58; 17 C. B. N. S. 708.

A vendor knowing he has no title, and concealing the fact from the vendee, is liable on the ground of fraud; Benj. Sales, § 627.

Antecedent representations, made as an inducement to the buyer, but not forming part of the contract when concluded, are not warranties; it is not, however, necessary that the representation should be made simultaneously with the bargain, but only that it should enter into it; 15 C. B. 130; Benj. Sales, § 610. No special form of words is necessary to constitute a warranty; 45 Cal. 573; 75 Ill. 81; 4 Daly, 277; 3 Mod. 261. The question is for the jury; to be inferred from the sale and the circumstances of the particular case; 8 Cow. 25; 9 N. H. 111; even if the contract is written; Benj. Sales, § 614; but see 10 Allen, 242. The rule is simplex commendatio non obligat; see 2 Esp. 572. A warranty made after a sale requires a new consideration; 3 Q. B. 234; 100 Mass. 532.

See, generally, Campbell on Sales.

In Sales of Real Property. A real covenant, whereby the grantor of an estate of freehold and his heirs were bound to warrant the title, and, either upon voucher or by judgment in a writ of warrantia chartæ, to yield other lands to the value of those from which there has been an eviction by a paramount title. Co. Litt. 365 a.

Collateral warranty existed when the heir's title was not derived from the warranting ancestor, and yet it barred the heir from claiming the land by any collateral title, upon the presumption that he might thereafter have assets by descent from or through the ancestor; and it imposed upon him the obligation of giving the warrantee other lands in case of eviction, provided he had assets. 2 Bla. Com. 301.

Lineal warranty existed when the heir derived title to the land warranted, either from or through the ancestor who made the warranty.

The statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, annulled these collateral warranties, which had become a great grievance. Warranty in its original form has never, it is presumed, been known in the United States. The more plain and pliable form of a covenant has been adopted in its place; and this covenant, like all other covenants, has always been held to sound in damages, which, after judgment, may be recovered out of the personal or real estate, as in other cases. And in England the matter has become one of curious learning and of little or no practical importance. See 4 Kent, 469; 3 Rawle, 67, n.; 2 Wheat. 45; 4 Dall. Penn. 442; 1 Sumn. 358; 17 Pick. 14; 1 Ired. 509; 2 Saund. 38, n. 5.

Mr. Rawle, in his work on Covenants for Title, p. 205, says there is no evidence that the covenants of warranty as employed in the United States ever had a place in English conveyancing. In the earlier conveyances which remain on record in the colonies, are to be found some or all of the covenants which were coming into use in the mother country, together with a clause of warranty, sometimes with and sometimes without the addition of words of covenant. Later the words of covenant became more general, and at the present day their use is almost universal. As to the extent and scope of the American covenant of warranty, the sounder view is that it is merely a covenant for quiet enjoyment, the only difference being that under the latter, a recovery may sometimes be had where it would be denied under the former.

WARRANTY, VOUCHER TO. In Old Practice. The calling a warrantor into court by the party warranted (when tenant in a real action brought for recovery of such lands), to defend the suit for him; Co. Litt. 101 b; Comyns, Dig. Voucher (A 1); Booth, R. A. 43; 2 Saund. 32, n. 1; and the time of such voucher is after the demandant has counted.

It lies in most real and mixed actions, but not in personal. Where the voucher has been made and allowed by the court, the vouchee either voluntarily appears, or there issues a judicial writ (called a summons ad warrantizandum), commanding the sheriff to summon him. Where he, either voluntarily or in obedience to this writ, appears and offers to warrant the land to the tenant, it is called entering into the warranty; after which he is considered as tenant in the action, in the place of the original tenant. The demandant then counts against him de novo, the vouchee pleads to the new count, and the cause proceeds to issue.

WARREN (Germ. wahren, French garenne). A place privileged by prescription or grant of the king for the preservation of hares, conies, partridges, and pheasants, or any of them. An action lies for killing beasts of warren inside the warren; but they may be killed damage feasant on another's land; 5 Co. 104. It need not be inclosed; Co. 4th Inst. 318.

WASHINGTON. One of the territories of the United States of America.

This territory, lying between the Columbia river and the 46th parallel of latitude on the south and the 49th parallel on the north, the Rocky Mountains on the east, and the Pacific ocean on the west, and formerly constituting a part of Oregon, was established by an act of congress of March 2, 1853, which act is the fundamental law of the territory. 10 Stat. at Large. The limits upon the north were settled by treaty of the United States with Great Britain signed June 15, 1846. Proclamation thereof was made by the president August 5, 1846. The organic act erecting the territory was approved March 2, 1853. The territory includes that part of the territory of Oregon lying north of the Columbia river to the point where said river crosses the 46th parallel of north latitude, thence on said parallel to the summit of the Rocky Mountains. The provisions of the organic act, with a few exceptions, are similar to those of the act erecting the territory of New Mexico. See NEW MEXICO.

This territory exercises concurrent jurisdiction with the state of Oregon over all offences committed on the Columbia river, where that river forms a common boundary between the state and territory; R. S. 1950.

The laws now in force in the territory, by virtue of the legislation of congress in reference to Oregon, when that state was a territory, which were enacted and passed subsequently to Sept. 1, 1848, applicable to the territory, together with the legislative enactments of Oregon while a territory prior to March 2, 1853 and not inconsistent with the provisions of congress, are continued in force in this territory, excepting where repealed by subsequent legislation; R. S. 1952.

WASTE. Spoil or destruction, done or permitted, to lands, houses, or other corporeal hereditaments, by the tenant thereof, to the prejudice of the heir or of him in reversion or remainder.

Permissive waste consists in the mere neglect or omission to do what will prevent injury: as, to suffer a house to go to decay for the want of repair. And it may be incurred in respect to the soil, as well as to the buildings, trees, fences, or live stock on the premises. See infra.

Voluntary waste consists in the commission of some destructive act: as, in pulling down a house or ploughing up a flower-garden. 1 Paige, Ch. 573.

Voluntary waste is committed upon cultivated fields, orchards, gardens, meadows, and the like, whenever a tenant uses them contrary to the usual course of husbandry or in such a manner as to exhaust the soil by negligent or improper tillage; 6 Ves. Ch. 328; 2 Hill, N. Y. 157; 2 B. & P. 86. It is, therefore, waste to convert arable into wood land, or the contrary; Co. Litt. 53 b. Cutting down fruit-trees, although planted by the tenant himself, is waste; 2 Rolle, Abr. 817; and it was held to be waste for an outgoing tenant of garden-ground to plough up strawberry-beds which he had bought of a former tenant when he entered; 1 Camp. 227. When lands are leased on which there are open mines of metal or coal, or pits of gravel, lime, clay, brick-earth, stone, and the like, the tenant may dig out of such mines or pits; but he cannot open any new mines or pits without being guilty of waste; Co. Litt. 53 b. See MINES. Any carrying away of the soil is also waste; Comyns, Dig. Waste (D 4); 6 Barb. 13; Co. Litt. 53 b; 1 Sch. & L. 8.

It is committed in houses by pulling them down, or by removing wainscots, floors, benches, furnaces, windows, doors, shelves, and other things once fixed to the freehold, although they may have been erected by the lessee himself, unless they are mere fixtures. See FIXTURES. And this kind of waste may take place not only in pulling down houses or parts of them, but also in changing their forms: as, if the tenant pull down a house and erect a new one in its place, whether it be larger or smaller than the first; 2 Rolle, Abr. 815; or convert a parlor into a stable, or a grist-mill into a fulling-mill; ibid.; or turn two rooms into one; ibid. The building of a house where there was none before was, by the strict rules of the common law, said to be waste; Co. Litt. 53 a; and taking it down after it was built was waste also; 1 B. & Ad. 161; 8 Mass. 416; 4 Pick. 310; 19 N. Y. 234; 16 Conn. 322; 2 M'Cord, 329; 1 Harr. & J. 289; 1 Watts, 378.

Voluntary waste may also be committed upon timber; and in those countries where timber is scarce and valuable, the law is strict in this respect. But many acts which in England would amount to waste are not so here. The law of waste accommodates itself to the varying wants and conditions of different countries: that will not, for instance, be waste in an entire woodland country which would be so in cleared one. The clearing up of land for the purposes of tillage in a new country where trees abound is no injury to the inheritance, but, on the contrary, is a benefit to the remainderman, so long as there is sufficient timber left and the land cleared bears a proper relative proportion to the whole tract; 4 Kent, 316; 4 Watts, 463; 6 Munf. 134; 2 South. 552; 6 T. B. Monr. 342; 6 Yerg. 334; 5 Mas. 13; 2 Hayw. 339; 26 Wend. 122.

The extent to which wood and timber on such land may be cut without waste, is a question of fact for a jury to determine under the direction of the court; 7 Johns. 227. A tenant may always cut trees for the repair of the houses, fences, hedges, stiles, gates, and the like; Co. Litt. 53 b; and for making and repairing all instruments of husbandry: as, ploughs, carts, harrows, rakes, forks, etc.; Wood, Inst. 344. See ESTOVERS. And he may, when unrestrained by the terms of the lease, cut timber for firewood, if there be not enough dead timber for such purposes; Comyns, Dig. Waste (D 5). But where, under such circumstances, he is entitled to cut down timber, he is restrained, nevertheless, from cutting ornamental trees or those planted for shelter; 6 Ves. Ch. 419; or to exclude objects from sight; 16 Ves. Ch. 375; 7 Ired. Eq. 197; 6 Barb. 9.

A tenant of a dove-house, warren, park, fish-pond, or the like, would also be guilty of waste if he took away animals therefrom to such an extent as not to leave as large a stock of them as he found when he came in; Co. Litt. 53.

In New York it has been held that it was waste for a tenant for life to neglect to pay the interest on a mortgage whereby the land was sold to the prejudice of the remainderman; 16 Hun, 226.

Windfalls are the property of the landlord; for whatever is severed by inevitable necessity, as, by a tempest, or by a trespasser, and by wrong, belongs to him who has the inheritance; 3 P. Wms. 268; 11 Co. 81.

In general, a tenant is answerable for waste although it is committed by a stranger; for he is the custodian of the property, and must take his remedy over; 2 Dougl. 745; 1 Taunt. 198; 1 Denio, 104. But he is not liable when the damage is caused by lightning, tempest, or a public enemy; Co. 2d Inst. 303; 5 Co. 21; 4 Kent, 77. He was also liable, at common law, for all damages done by fire, accidental or otherwise, upon the premises; but the English statute of 14 Geo. III. c. 78, first enacted that no action should be had against any person in whose house, chamber, or other building or on whose estate a fire shall accidentally begin; and this statute has been very generally re-enacted throughout the United States. The protection afforded by these statutes, however, extends only to a case of accidental fire—that is, to one which cannot be traced to any particular or wilful cause—and stands opposed to the negligence of either servants or masters. And therefore an action still lies against a person upon whose premises a fire commences through the negligence of himself or his servants and is productive of injury to his neighbor; 1 Denio, 207; 8 Johns. 421; 2 Harr. Del. 443; 21 Pick. 378; 1 Halst. 127; 6 Taunt. 44; Tayl. Landl. & T. 196.

Permissive waste to buildings consists in omitting to keep them in tenantable repair; suffering the timbers to become rotten by neglecting to cover the house; or suffering the walls to fall into decay for want of plastering, or the foundation to be injured by neglecting to turn off a stream of water, and the like; Co. Litt. 53 a. See LANDLORD AND TENANT. At common law, the mere suffering of a house to remain unroofed, if it was so at the commencement of the lease, would not be waste, but a tenant assumed the responsibility of any other part of the house thereby becoming ruinous or decayed. And so, although the injury or destruction of a house by lightning, tempest, or a public enemy would not be waste, yet to suffer it to remain ruined would be; 2 Rolle, Abr. 818; F. Moore, 69; 10 Ad. & E. 398. Permissive waste in houses, however, as a general rule, is now only punishable when a tenant is bound to repair, either expressly or by implication; 4 B. & P. 298; 10 B. & C. 312.

The redress for this injury is of two kinds, preventive and corrective. A reversioner or remainderman, in fee, for life, or for years, may now recover, by an ordinary action at law, all damages he has sustained by an act of voluntary waste committed by either his tenant or a stranger, provided the injury affects his reversion. But as against a tenant for years, or from year to year, he can only sustain an action for damages for permissive waste if his lease obliges the tenant to repair; 2 Saund. 252 d, note; 3 East, 38; 10 B. & C. 312. The statutes of the several states also provide special relief against waste in a great variety of cases, following, in general, the English Statute of Gloucester, which not only forfeits the premises, but gives exemplary damages for all the injury done. These legal remedies, however, are still so inadequate, as well to prevent future waste as to give redress for waste already committed, that they have in a great measure given way to the remedy by bill in equity, by which not only future waste, whether voluntary or permissive, will be prevented, but an account may be decreed and compensation given for past waste in the same proceeding; 2 Mer. 408; 1 Ves. Ch. 93; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 179; Tayl. Landl. & T. 690.

The reversioner need not wait until waste has actually been committed before filing his bill; for if he ascertains that the tenant is about to commit any act which would operate as a permanent injury to the estate, or if he threatens or shows any intention to commit waste, the court will at once interfere and restrain him by injunction from doing so; Atk. 182; 18 Ves. Ch. 355; 2 V. & B. 349; 1 Johns. Ch. 435; 1 Jac. & W. 653.

Sometimes a tenant, whether for life or for years, by the instrument creating his estate, holds his lands without impeachment of waste. This expression is equivalent to a general permission to commit waste, and at common law would authorize him to cut timber, or open new mines and convert the produce to his own use; Co. Litt. 220; 11 Co. 81 b; 15 Ves. 425. But equity puts a limited construction upon this clause, and only allows a tenant those powers under it which a prudent tenant in fee would exercise, and will, therefore, restrain him from pulling down or dilapidating houses, destroying pleasure-houses, or prostrating trees planted for ornament or shelter; 2 Vern. 739; 3 Atk. 215; 6 Ves. 110; 16 id. 375.

As to remedies against waste by injunction, see 5 P. Wms. 268, n. F; 6 Ves. Ch. 107, 419, 787; 8 id. 70; 16 id. 375; Jac. Ch. 70: Drewry, Inj. 134; Kerr, Inj. 235. As WASTE-BOOK. A book used among merchants. All the dealings of the merchants are recorded in this book in chronological order as they occur.

WATCH. To stand sentry and attend guard during the night time. Certain officers called watchmen are appointed in most of the United States, whose duty it is to arrest all persons who are violating the law or breaking the peace. See 1 Bla. Com. 356; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 14, 20.

WATCH AND WARD. A phrase used in the English law to denote the superintendence and care of certain officers whose duties are to protect the public from harm.

WATCHMAN. An officer in many cities and towns, whose duty it is to watch during the night and take care of the property of the inhabitants.

He possesses, generally, the common-law authority of a constable to make arrests, where there is reasonable ground to suspect a felony, though there is no proof of a felony having been committed. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 24; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 96; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 13, s. 1, etc.; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 303; Co. 2d Inst. 52; Comyns, Dig. Imprisonment (H 4); Dane, Abr. Index; 3 Taunt. 14; 1 B. & Ald. 227; Peake, 89; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 334; 1 Esp. 294. See ARREST.

WATER. That liquid substance of which the sea, the rivers, and creeks are composed.

A pool of water, or a stream or water-course, is considered as part of the land: hence a pool of twenty acres would pass by the grant of twenty acres of land, without mentioning the water; 2 Bla. Com. 18; 2 N. H. 255, 391; 1 Wend. 255; 5 Conn. 497; 8 Metc. 466; 2 Harr. & J. 195; 8 Penn. 13. A mere grant of water passes only a fishery; Co. Litt. 4 b; 5 Cow. 216. But the owner of land over which water flows may grant the land, reserving the use of all the water to himself, or may grant the use of all or a portion of the water, reserving the fee of the land to himself; 26 Vt. 64; 3 Hill, N. Y. 418; 6 Metc. 131; 18 E. L. & E. 164.

WATER BAILIFF. In English Law. An officer appointed to search ships in ports. 10 Hen. VII. 30.

WATER-COURSE. This term is applied to the flow or movement of the water in rivers, creeks, and other streams.

A water-course is a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, in a definite channel, and discharging into some other stream or body of water; and the term does not include surface-water conveyed from a higher to a lower level for limited periods during the melting of snow, or during or soon after the fall of rain, through hollows or ravines, which at other times are dry; 27 Wisc. 656.

In a legal sense, property in a water-course is comprehended under the general name of land: so that a grant of land conveys to the grantee not only fields, meadows, and the like, but also all the rivers and streams which naturally pass over the surface of the land; 1 Co. Litt. 4; 2 Brownl. 142; 2 N. H. 255; 5 Wend. 423. See WATER.

Those who own land bounding upon a water-course are denominated by the civilians riparian proprietors; and this convenient term has been adopted by judges and writers on the common law; Ang. Wat.-Courses, 3; 3 Kent, 354; 4 Mas. 397.

In the United States all navigable water-courses are a species of highway, and come under the control of the states, except when they are used in foreign or inter-state commerce, and then congress has authority over them; Cooley, Const. Lim. 589. See NAVIGABLE WATER. The public cannot, in the United States, gain any proprietary right in streams of inland water too small to be used for the transportation of property; Ang. Water-C. § 2; 11 Me. 278. In the United States a navigable stream means a stream navigable in fact. The common-law definition confining the word navigable to rivers where the tide ebbs and flows, has not been adopted; 10 Am. Dec. 699. The riparian proprietor owns to high-water mark on all navigable rivers; 21 Am. Dec. 707. See NAVIGABLE WATERS. Water-courses above the flow of the tide are private, but, if sufficiently large to be of public use in transporting property, are highways over which the public have a common right in subservience to which the private ownership of the soil is to be enjoyed; 26 Am. Dec. 525.

By the rules of the common law, all proprietors of lands have precisely the same rights to waters flowing through their domains, and one can never be permitted so to use the stream as to injure or annoy those situated on the course of it, either above or below him. They have no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct; aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat, is the language of the law. Accordingly, while each successive riparian proprietor is entitled to the reasonable use of the water for the supply of his natural wants and for the operation of mills and machinery, he has no right to flow the water back upon the proprietor above; Cro. Jac. 556; 9 N. H. 502; 20 Penn. St. 85; 3 Rawle, 84; 4 E. L. & E. 265; 1 B. & Ald. 874; 3 Green, N. J. 116; 4 Ill. 452; 38 Me. 243; nor to discharge it so as to flood the proprietor below; 17 Johns. 306; 5 Vt. 371; 3 Harr. & J. 231; nor to divert the water; 17 Conn. 288; 13 Johns. 212; 24 Ala. N. S. 130; 28 Vt. 670; 38 E. L. & E. 526; 22 Am. Dec. 745; 2 Disn. 400; even for the purpose of irrigation, unless it be returned without essential diminution; 38 E. L. & E. 241; 13 Mass. 420; 5 Pick. 175; 8 Me. 253; 12 Wend. 330; 4 Ill. 496; nor to obstruct or detain it, except for some reasonable purpose, such as to obtain a head of water for a mill and to be again discharged, so as to allow all on the same stream a fair participation; 17 Barb. 654; 10 Cush. 367; 6 Ind. 324; 28 Vt. 459; 29 Penn. 98; 4 Mas. 401; 17 Johns. 306; 13 Conn. 303; see DAM; nor to corrupt the quality of the water by unwholesome or discoloring impurities; 24 Penn. 298; 22 Barb. 297; 3 Rawle, 397; 8 E. L. & E. 217; 4 Ohio, 833; as to turning surface-water off one's own land on to a neighbor's, see 31 Am. Rep. 216; 35 id. 431. But, while such are the rights of the riparian proprietors when unaffected by contract, these rights are subject to endless modifications on the part of those entitled to their enjoyment either by grant; 3 Conn. 373; 13 Johns. 525; 17 Me. 281; 6 Metc. 131; 7 id. 94; 7 Penn. 348; 18 E. L. & E. 164; 9 N. H. 282; 3 N. Y. 253; or by reservation; 6 N. Y. 33; 20 Vt. 250; or by a license; 2 Gill, 221; 13 Conn. 303; 1 Metc. Mass. 331; 14 S. & R. 267; 4 East, 107; or by agreement; 19 Pick. 449; Ang. Water-C. § 141; 3 Harr. & J. 282; 17 Wend. 136; or by twenty years' adverse enjoyment from which a grant or contract will be implied; 1 Camp. 463; 4 Mas. 397; 6 Scott, 167; 9 Pick. 251; Ang. Water-C. § 200; in such a way as to adapt the uses of the water to the complex and multiplying demands and improvements of modern civilization.

Wherever a water-course divides two estates, each estate extends to the thread or central line of the stream; but the riparian owner of neither can lawfully carry off any part of the water without the consent of the other opposite, each riparian proprietor being entitled not to half or other proportion of the water, but to the whole bulk of the stream, undivided and undivisible, or per my et per tout; 13 Johns. 212; 8 Me. 253; 3 Sumn. 189; 13 Mass. 507; 1 Paige, Ch. 447; 2 Am. Dec. 574; 16 id. 342. If the bed of a water-course is suddenly changed, former boundaries and possessions are not altered; but if the stream gradually gain on a person's land, the loser of the soil has no remedy; 2 Bla. Com. 262; 17 Vt. 387; Ang. Water-C. § 57. A grant bounded by a navigable water-course extends only to high-water mark; but one bounded by a non-navigable stream extends to the middle thereof; 16 Am. Dec. 447; 10 id. 356; 30 id. 278, 286. When an island is on the side of a river, so as to give the riparian owner of that side only one-fourth of the water, he has no right to place obstructions at the head of the island to cause one-half of the stream to descend on his side of the river, but the owner opposite is entitled to the flow of the remaining three-fourths; 10 Wend. 260.

Artificial water-courses, canals, sewers, water-works, etc., are wholly the creatures of statute, except when a man has a drain across another's land, and there it is generally a question of grant or easement.

As to under-ground flow of water, see SUBTERRANEAN WATER. And see, generally, Washburn, Easements; Angell, Water-Courses; 3 Kent, Comm. 439, 441; Woolrych, Waters; Schultes, Aquatic Rights; Coulson & Forbes, Law of Waters; 1 So. L. Rev. N. s. 59; Lois des Bât. pt. 1, c. 3, sec. 1, art. 3; also RIVER; STREAM; LAKE; POOL; POND; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS.

WATERGANG (Law Lat. watergangium). A Saxon word for a trench or course to carry a stream of water, such as are commonly made to drain water out of marshes. Ordin. Marisc. de Romn. Chart. Hen. III.

WATERGAVEL. A rent paid for fishing in, or other benefit from, some river. Chart. 15 Hen. III.

WAVESON. Such goods as appear upon the waves after shipwreck. Jacob, Law Dict.

WAY. A passage, street, or road.

A right of way is the privilege which an individual, or a particular description of individuals, as, the inhabitants of a villlage or the owners or occupiers of certain farms, have of going over another's ground. It is an incorporeal hereditament of a real nature, entirely different from a common highway. Cruise, Dig. tit. xxiv. s. 1.

A right of way may arise by prescription and immemorial usage, or by an uninterrupted enjoyment for twenty years under a claim of right; Co. Litt. 113; 1 Rolle, Abr. 936; 5 Harr. & J. 474; 4 Gray, 177, 547; 20 Penn. 331, 458; 4 Barb. 60; 4 Mas. 402; 8 Pick. 504; 24 N. H. 440. By grant: as, where the owner grants to another the liberty of passing over his land; 3 Lev. 305; 1 Ld. Raym. 75; 19 Pick. 250; 20 id. 291; 7 B. & C. 257; Crabb, R. P. § 366. If the grant be of a freehold right it must be by deed; 5 B. & C. 221; 4 R. I. 47. By necessity: as, where a man purchases land accessible only over land of the vendor, or sells, reserving land accessible only over land of the vendee, he shall have a way of necessity over the land which gives access to his purchase or reservation; 5 Taunt. 311; 23 Penn. 333; 2 Mass. 203; 3 Rawle, 495; 11 Mo. 513; 29 Me. 499; 27 N. H. 448; 19 Wend. 507; 15 Conn. 39; 126 Mass. 445; 55 Cal. 350. The necessity must be absolute, not a mere convenience; 2 M'Cord, 445; 24 Pick. 102; 8 Rich. 158; 69 Me. 323; and when it ceases the way ceases with it; 18 Conn. 321; 1 Barb. Ch. 353. By reservation expressly made in the grant of the land over which it is claimed; 10 Mass. 183; 25 Conn. 331. By custom: as, where navigators have a right of this nature to tow along the banks of navigable rivers with horses; 3 Term, 253. By acts of legislature; though a private way cannot be so laid out without the consent of the owner of the land over which it is to pass; 15 Conn. 39, 83; 4 Hill, 47, 140; 4 B. Monr. 57.

A right of way may be either a right in gross, which is a purely personal right incommunicable to another, or a right appendant or annexed to an estate, and which may pass by assignment with the estate to which it is appurtenant; 3 Kent, 420; 2 Ld. Raym. 922; 1 Watts, 35; 19 Pick. 250. A right of way appurtenant to land is appurtenant to all and every part of the land, and if such land be divided and conveyed in separate parcels, a right of way thereby passes to each of the grantees; 1 Cush. 285; 1 S. & R. 229.

Ways may be abandoned by agreement, by evident intention, or by long non-user. Twenty years' occupation of land adverse to a right of way and inconsistent therewith bars the right; 2 Whart. 123; 16 Barb. 184; 23 Pick. 141; 5 Gray, 409.

Ways may be assigned, except when they are in gross, which is a mere personal right, and cannot be granted to another; 19 Ill. 558.

The owner of a right of way may disturb the soil to pave and repair it. But a way granted for one purpose cannot be used for another; 10 Gray, 61; 11 id. 150.

Lord Coke, adopting the civil law, says there are three kinds of ways: a footway, called iter; a footway and horseway, called actus; a cartway, which contains the other two, called via; Co. Litt. 56 a. To which may be added a driftway, a road over which cattle are driven; 1 Taunt. 279; Pothier, Pandectæ, lib. 8, t. 3, § 1; Dig. 8. 3; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 177.

See 3 Kent, 419; Washb. Easem.; Crabb, R. P.; Cruise, Dig.; HIGHWAY; STREET; THOROUGHFARE.

WAY-BILL. A writing in which are set down the names of passengers who are carried in a public conveyance, or the description of goods sent with a common carrier by land; when the goods are carried by water, the instrument is called a bill of lading.

WAY-GOING CROP. In Pennsylvania. By the custom of the country, a tenant for a term certain is entitled, after the expiration of his lease, to enter and take away the crop of grain which he had put into the ground the preceding fall. This is called the way-going crop; 5 Binn. 289; 2 S. & R. 14; 1 Penn. 224. See AWAY-GOING CROP; EMBLEMENTS.

WAYS AND MEANS. In legislative assemblies, there is usually appointed a committee whose duties are to inquire into and propose to the house the ways and means to be adopted to raise funds for the use of the government. This body is called the committee of ways and means.

WHAR. A great dam made across a river, accommodated for the taking of fish or to convey a stream to a mill. Jacob. See DAM.

WED. A covenant or agreement: whence a wedded husband.

WEEK. Seven days of time.

The week commences immediately after twelve o'clock on the night between Saturday and Sunday, and ends at twelve o'clock, seven days of twenty-four hours each, thereafter. See 4 Pet. 361.

The first publication of a notice of a sale, under a power contained in a mortgage, which requires the notice to be published "once each week for three successive weeks" need not be made three weeks before the time appointed for the sale; 117 Mass. 480. See 4 Pet. 361; TIME.

WEIGHAGE. In English Law. A duty or toll paid for weighing merchandise: it is called tronage for weighing wool at the king's beam, or pesage for weighing other avoirdupois goods. 2 Chitty, Com. Law, 16.

WEIGHT. A quality in natural bodies by which they tend towards the centre of the earth.

Under the police power, weights and measures may be established and dealers compelled to conform to the fixed standards under a penalty; Cooley, Const. Lim. 749.

Under the article Measure, it is said that by the constitution congress possesses the power "to fix the standard of weights and measures," and that this power has not been exercised.

The weights now generally used in the United States are the same as those of England; they are of two kinds.

AVOIRDUPOIS WEIGHT.

First, used in almost all commercial transactions, and in the common dealings of life.

27 11/32 grains = 1 dram.
16 drams = 1 ounce.
16 ounces = 1 pound (lb.).
25 or 28 pounds = 1 quarter. (qr.).
4 quarters = 1 hundredweight (cwt.).
20 hundredweight = 1 ton.

Second, used for meat and fish.

8 pounds = 1 stone.

Third, used in the wool-trade.

			Cwt.	qr.	lb.
7 pounds	= 1 clove.
14 pounds	= 1 stone.	=	0	0	14
2 stones	= 1 tod.	=	0	1	0
6½ tods	= 1 wey.	=	1	3	14
2 weys	= 1 sack.	=	3	1	0
12 sacks	= 1 last.	=	39	0	0

Fourth, used for butter and cheese.

8 pounds = 1 clove.
56 pounds = 1 firkin.

TROY WEIGHT.

24 grains = 1 pennyweight.
20 pennyweights = 1 ounce.
12 ounces = 1 pound.

These are the denominations of troy weight when used for weighing gold, silver, and precious stones, except diamonds. Troy weight is also used by apothecaries in compounding medicines; but by them the ounce is divided into eight drams, and the dram into three scruples, so that the latter is equal to twenty grains. For scientific purposes (when the metric system is not employed, as it now usually is), the grain only is used, and sets of weights are used constructed in decimal progression from 10,000 grains downward to one-hundredth of a grain. The carat used for weighing diamonds is three and one-sixth grains. See GRAMME.

A short account of the French weights and measures is given under the article MEASURE.

WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE. This phrase is used to signify that the proof on one side of a cause is greater than on the other.

When a verdict has been rendered against the weight of the evidence, the court may, on this ground, grant a new trial; but the court will exercise this power not merely with a cautious but a strict and sure judgment, before they send the case to a second jury.

The general rule, under such circumstances, is that the verdict once found shall stand: the setting aside is the exception, and ought to be an exception of rare and almost singular occurrence. A new trial will be granted on this ground for either party: the evidence, however, is not to be weighed in golden scales; 3 Bingh. N. C. 109; Gilp. 356; 3 Me. 276; 8 Pick. 122; 5 Wend. 595; 7 id. 380; 2 Va. Cas. 235.

WELL. A hole dug in the earth in order to obtain water.

The owner of the estate has a right to dig in his own ground at such a distance as is permitted by law from his neighbor's land: he is not restricted as to the size or depth, and is not liable to any action for rendering the well of his neighbor useless by so doing. Lois des Bât. pt. 1, c. 3, sect. 2, art. 2, § 2. See SUBTERRANEAN WATERS.

WELL KNOWING. In Pleading. Words used in a declaration when the plaintiff sues for an injury which is not immediate and with force, and the act or nonfeasance complained of was not prima facie actionable. Not only the injury, but the circumstances under which it was committed, ought to be stated: as, where the injury was done by an animal. In such case the plaintiff, after stating the injury, continues, the defendant, well knowing the mischievous propensity of his dog, permitted him to go at large. See SCIENTER.

WELSH MORTGAGE. In English Law. A species of security which partakes of the nature of a mortgage, as there is a debt due, and an estate is given a security for the repayment, but differs from it in the circumstances that the rents and profits are to be received without account till the principal money is paid off, and there is no remedy to enforce payment, while the mortgagor has a perpetual power of redemption. It is now rarely used.

It is a species of vivum vadium. Strictly, however, there is this distinction between a Welsh mortgage and a vivum vadium: in the latter the rents and profits of the estate are applied to the discharge of the principal after paying the interest; while in the former the rents and profits are received in satisfaction of his interest only. 1 Powell, Mortg. 373 a; 1 Br. & Had. Com. 607; Jones, Mtg. § 1153.

WERE. The name of a fine among the Saxons imposed upon a murderer.

The life of every man, not excepting that of the king himself, was estimated at a certain price, which was called the were, or æstimatio capitis. The amount varied according to the dignity of the person murdered. The price of wounds was also varied according to the nature of the wound, or the member injured.

WERGILD, WEREGILD. In Old English Law. The price which, in a barbarous age, a person guilty of homicide or other enormous offence was required to pay, instead of receiving other punishment. 4 Bla. Com. 188.

See, for the etymology of this word, and a tariff which was paid for the murder of the different classes of men, Guizot, Essais sur l'Histoire de France, Essai 4ème, c. 2, § 2.

WEST SAXON LAGH. The law of the West Saxons, which was observed in the counties in the south and west of England, from Kent to Devonshire, in the beginning of the eleventh century; supposed by Blackstone to have been much the same as the laws of Alfred. 1 Bla. Com. 65.

WEST VIRGINIA. The name of one of the United States of America.

This state was formed in 1861 of the western counties of Virginia, owing to their non-concurrence in the ordinance of secession passed by the legislature of that state. A constitution was framed by a convention which met at Wheeling on November 26, 1861. This was submitted to the people on April 3, 1862, and ratified almost unanimously. The consent of the body recognized by the Federal government as the legislature of Virginia was given, and congress then passed an act approved December 31, 1862, providing for the admission of the new state into the Union upon condition of the adoption of an amendment to the constitution providing for emancipation of slaves. This was done, and the state was admitted to the Union. The first constitution remained in force until 1872, when the present constitution was framed by a convention which met on January 16, 1872, and completed its labors on April 9 of that year. It was submitted to the people and ratified by them on August 22, 1872.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative power is vested in a senate and house of delegates, their official designation being "the Legislature of West Virginia." For the election of senators, the state was divided into twelve districts, with the proviso that this number might be increased in proportion to the population after each census taken by the authority of the United States, but could not be diminished. Every district shall elect two senators, but where the district is composed of more than one county, both shall not be chosen from the same county. The first house of delegates consisted of sixty-five members, provision being made for an increased number in proportion to the increase of population.

The legislature assembles biennially, and not oftener, unless convened by the governor. A majority of the members elected to each house constitute a quorum; but a smaller number may meet and adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of members.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The executive power is vested in a Governor, Secretary of State, State Superintendent of Free Schools, Auditor, Treasurer, and Attorney-General, who is ex officio Reporter of the court of appeals. Their terms of office are respectively for four years, and commence on the fourth day of March next after the election. Excepting the attorney-general they are required to reside at the seat of government during the continuance of their terms of office.

The chief executive power is vested in the governor. He is ineligible for re-election to the succeeding term of his office. It is his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the legislature at his own instance, but when so convened, it shall enter upon no business other than that stated in the proclamation convening it.

He has the power of appointment to fill offices, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; to fill vacancies during recesses of the senate; to remove appointees for incompetency, neglect of duty, gross immorality, or malfeasance in office; to remit fines and penalties; to commute capital punishment; reprieve or pardon offenders after conviction, excepting where the prosecution has been carried on by the house of delegates. He is commander-in-chief of the military forces of the state, except when they are called into the actual service of the United States, and may call out the same to execute the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. In case of the governor's death, resignation, or inability to serve, the president of the senate shall assume his office until the vacancy is filled, or the disability removed. And in case of the inability of the president of the senate, the duty shall devolve upon the speaker of the house of delegates. In all other cases where there is no one to act as governor, one shall be chosen by the joint vote of the legislature.

THE JUDICIARY DEPARTMENT.—The judiciary power is vested in a supreme court of appeals, in circuit courts and the judges thereof, in county and corporation courts, and in justices of the peace.

The supreme court of appeals consists of four judges, any three of whom constitute a quorum. They are elected by the people and hold office for twelve years. This court has original jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition; and appellate jurisdiction in civil cases, where the matter in controversy exclusive of costs is of greater value than one hundred dollars; in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land, the probate of wills, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator; or concerning a mill, roadway, ferry, or landing; or the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls or taxes; and, also, in cases of quo warranto, habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition, and in cases involving freedom, or the constitutionality of a law; also in criminal cases where there has been a conviction of felony, or misdemeanor in a circuit court, and where a conviction has been had in any inferior court and affirmed in a circuit court.

At least two terms of the court must be held annually.

Circuit Courts.—The state is divided into nine circuits, and for each circuit a judge is elected by the voters thereof, who holds his office for eight years. The circuit courts have the supervision of all proceedings before the county courts, and other inferior tribunals, by mandamus, prohibition, or certiorari. They have, except in cases confined by the constitution exclusively to some other tribunal, original and general jurisdiction of all matters of law where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest, exceeds fifty dollars; in cases of quo warranto, habeas corpus, mandamus, or prohibition; in all cases in equity, and of all felonies and misdemeanors. They have appellate jurisdiction, upon petition, and assignment of error, in all cases of judgments, decrees, and final orders rendered by the county court, and such other inferior courts as may be appointed by law, where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is of greater value than twenty dollars; in controversies respecting the title or boundaries of land, the probate of wills, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator, or concerning a mill, roadway, ferry, or landing, or the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls or taxes, and also in cases of habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari, and in cases involving freedom, or the constitutionality of a law; and in all cases of conviction under criminal prosecutions in said court. It has such original jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law.

County Courts.—There is in each county of the state a county court, composed of a president and two justices of the peace; the president of the court is elected by the voters of the county, and holds his office for four years. Whenever he is unable to attend as president of the court, any justice may be added to make the court, who, in conjunction with the other two, may designate one of their own number to preside in his absence.

The Justices of the Peace are classified by law for the performance of their duties in court.

The county court has original jurisdiction in all actions at law where the amount in controversy exceeds twenty dollars; and also in all cases of habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari, and in all suits in equity, in all matters of probate, the appointment and qualification of personal representatives, guardians, committees, and curators, and the settlement of their accounts, and in all matters relating to apprentices, and of all criminal cases, under the grade of felony, except as above provided. It has the custody, through its clerks, of all writs, deeds, and other papers presented for probate or record in the county. It has also the superintendence and administration of the internal police and fiscal affairs of the county. It has jurisdiction of all appeals from the judgment of the justices, and its decision is final upon such appeals, except such as involve the title, right of possession, or boundaries of lands, the freedom of a person, the validity of a law, or an ordinance of any corporation, or the right of a corporation to levy tolls or taxes.

Upon the application of any county the legislature shall reform, modify, or alter the county court, established by the constitution, in such county, and in lieu thereof, with the assent of a majority of the voters of the county at an election held for that purpose, create another court, or other tribunal, as well for judicial as for police and fiscal purposes, either separate or combined, which shall conform to the wishes of the county making the application, but with the same power and jurisdiction herein conferred on the county court, and with compensation to be made from the county treasury; Const. art. VIII. sec. 34.

WETHER. A castrated ram, at least one year old: in an indictment it may be called a sheep; 4 C. & P. 216.

WHALER. A vessel employed in the whale fishery.

It is usual for the owner of the vessel, the captain, and crew, to divide the profits in just proportions, under an agreement similar to the contract Di Colouna.

WHARF. A space of ground artificially prepared for the reception of merchandise from a ship or vessel, so as to promote the convenient loading and discharge of such vessel.

At common law, the soil of all tide-waters below high-water mark being vested in the crown as the conservator of the public rights of navigation and fishing, the erection of a wharf thereon without the consent of the crown is an encroachment upon the royal domain of that kind which has been denominated a purpresture, and, as such, may be either abated, or, if more beneficial to the crown, seized and arrested, unless indeed it be likewise a public nuisance; Ang. Tide-Wat. 196; 10 Price, 350, 378; 18 Ves. 214; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 920 et seq. But if it obstruct navigation to such a degree as to be a public nuisance, neither the crown nor its grantee has authority to erect or maintain it without the sanction of an act of parliament; 8 Ad. & E. 336; 4 B. & C. 598; 5 M. & W. 327; 11 Ad. & E. 223; Phear, Rights of Water, 54. It is not every wharf erected in navigable water, however, which is a nuisance, for it may be a benefit rather than an injury to the navigation; and it is for the jury to determine, in each particular case, whether such a wharf is a nuisance or not, the question being whether it occasions any substantial hindrance to the navigation of the river by vessels of any description, and not whether it causes a benefit to navigation in general; 2 Stark. 511; 1 C. & M. 496; 4 Ad. & E. 384; 6 id. 143; 15 Q. B. 276.

In this country, the several states, being the owners of the soil of the tide-waters within their respective territories, may by law authorize and regulate the erection of wharves thereon, at least until the general government shall have legislated upon the subject; 4 Ga. 26; 7 Cush. 53; 2 H. & M'H. 244; 11 Gill & J. 351; and may grant to a municipal corporation the exclusive right to make and control wharves on the banks of a navigable river; 95 U. S. 80. In Massachussetts and Maine, by a colonial ordinance, the provisions of which are still recognized as the law of those states, the property of the shores and flats between high and low water mark, for one hundred rods, subject to the rights of the public, was transferred to the owners of the upland, who may, therefore, wharf out to that distance, if by so doing they do not unreasonably interrupt navigation; 1 Cush. 313, 395; 13 Pick. 255; 17 id. 357; 36 Me. 16; 39 id. 451; 42 id. 9. If without legislative sanction they extend a wharf beyond that distance, such extension is prima facie a nuisance, and will be abated as such, unless it can be shown that it is no material detriment to navigation; 3 Am. Jur. 185; Ang. Tide-Wat. 206; 20 Pick. 186; 10 R. I. 477. In Connecticut, and probably in other states, by the law of the state founded upon immemorial usage, the proprietor of the upland has the right to wharf out to the channel,—subject to the rights of the public; 9 Conn. 38; 25 id. 345; 16 Pet. 369; 1 Dutch. 525; 6 Ind. 223. See 46 Wisc. 237; 27 Gratt. 430; 23 Minn. 18. In Pennsylvania, the riparian proprietor is held to be the owner of the soil between high and low water mark, and to be entitled to erect wharves thereon; 1 Whart. 131; 2 id. 539; but not without express authority from the state; 61 Penn. 21. In the same state it has been held that wharves are not the private property of him who erects them, and persons who go upon and fasten vessels to them are not trespassers: 39 Leg. Int. 32; and that in an action for the use and occupation of a wharf, a contract express or implied must be proved; 28 Am. L. Reg. 145.

In the great navigable fresh-water rivers of this country, the riparian proprietors, being the owners of the bed of the stream, have undoubtedly the right to wharf out to the channel—subject only to the condition that they do not materially interrupt the navigation. See, generally, 2 Sandf. 258; 3 id. 487; 3 How. 212; 1 Edw. Ch. 579; 2 id. 220; 1 Sandf. Ch. 214; 1 Gill & J. 249; 11 id. 351; 8 Term, 606; 28 Am. L. Reg. 145, n.; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; RIVERS.

WHARFAGE. The money paid for landing goods upon, or loading them from, a wharf. Dane, Abr. Index; 4 Cal. 41.

Wharfingers in London are not entitled to wharfage for goods unloaded into lighters out of barges fastened to their wharves; 3 Burr. 1409; 1 W. Blackst. 248. And see 5 Sandf. 48. It has been held that, owing to the interest which the public have in the matter, rates of wharfage may be regulated by statute; 11 Ala. N. s. 586. And see 5 Hill, 71; 7 id. 429; 21 Wend. N. Y. 110; 1 E. D. Smith, N. Y. 80, 294; 2 Rich. 370; 8 B. & C. 42; 2 Mann. & R. 107.

Claims for wharfage are cognizable in admiralty, and, if the vessel is a foreign one or from another state, the claim of the wharfinger is a maritime lien against the vessel, which may be enforced by a proceeding in rem, or by a libel in personam against the owner of such vessel; 95 U. S. 13. A state statute conferring a remedy for such claims by proceedings in rem is void; 43 N. Y. 554. But as to domestic vessels, the lien of the wharfinger is only enforceable as a common law lien; 1 Newb. 553; 9 Phila. 364. In the absence of any agreement between the parties, reasonable wharfage will be allowed; 95 U. S. 68. A lease giving the lessee "the sole and exclusive right to use the public wharf for his ferry boat," does not authorize the collection of toll for wharfage; 1 Newb. 541. A municipal corporation cannot exact a charge upon vessels for entering or leaving a port or remaining therein and using the wharves or landings, for the general revenue of such corporation; 20 Wall. 577; 95 U. S. 80; but it may collect from parties using its wharves, such reasonable fee as will fairly remunerate it for the use of its property; 100 U. S. 423; id. 430. That such fees are regulated by the tonnage of the vessel will not constitute them a tonnage tax under the constitution, art. 1, paragraph 3, § 10; 20 Gratt. 419. See 9 Fed. Rep. 679; 25 Alb. L. J. 254.

WHARFINGER. One who owns or keeps a wharf for the purpose of receiving and shipping merchandise to or from it for hire.

A wharfinger stands in the situation of an ordinary bailee for hire, and therefore, like a warehouseman, he is responsible for ordinary neglect, and is required to take ordinary care of the goods intrusted to him as such; 2 Barb. 328; 4 Ind. 368; 10 Vt. 56; 4 Term, 581; 2 Stark. 400. The wharfinger is not an insurer of the safety of his dock, but he must use reasonable care to keep it in safe condition, for vessels which he invites to enter it; 127 Mass. 236; 7 Blatch. 290; 15 Wall. 649. He is not, like an innkeeper or carrier, to be considered an insurer unless he superadd the character of carrier to that of wharfinger; 1 Stark. 72; 4 Camp. 225; 5 Burr. 2825; 12 Johns. 232; 7 Cow. 497; 5 Mo. 97. The responsibility of a wharfinger begins when he acquires and ends when he ceases to have the custody of the goods in that capacity.

When he begins and ceases to have such custody depends, generally, upon the usages of trade and of the business. When goods are delivered at a wharf, and the wharfinger has agreed, expressly or by implication, to take the custody of them, his responsibility commences; but a mere delivery at the wharf, without such assent, does not make him liable; 3 Camp. 414; 4 id. 72; 6 Cow. 757; 10 Vt. 56; 2 Stark. 400; 14 M. & W. 28. When goods are in the wharfinger's possession to be sent on board of a vessel for a voyage, as soon as he delivers the possession and the care of them to the proper officers of the vessel, although they are not actually removed, he is, by the usages of trade, deemed exonerated from any further responsibility; 5 Esp. 41; Story, Bailm. § 453; Dig. 9. 4. 3; 1 M. & W. 174; 16 id. 119; 1 Gale, 420. The wharfinger does not, however, discharge his duty by delivering them to one of the crew, but should deliver them to the captain of the vessel, or some other person in authority on board of it; 1 C. & P. 638. And see 10 Bingh. 246; 2 C. & M. 531; 7 Scott, 876; 4 Q. B. 511.

A wharfinger has a general lien upon all goods in his possession for the balance of his account; 1 Esp. 109; 3 id. 81; 6 East, 519; 7 id. 224; 4 B. & Ald. 50; 12 Ad. & E. 639; 7 B. & C. 212; and in respect to the right of lien there is no distinction between the wharfinger and the warehouseman; 23 Am. L. R. 465, 468. A wharfinger has equally a lien on a vessel for wharfage; Ware, 354; Gilp. 101; 1 Newb. 553. See WHARFAGE.

WHEEL. The punishment of the wheel was formerly to put a criminal on a wheel, and then to break his bones until he expired. This barbarous punishment was never used in the United States; and it has been abolished in every civilized country.

WHELPS. The young of certain animals of a base nature or ferœ naturæ.

It is a rule that when no larceny can be committed of any creatures of a base nature which are ferœ naturæ, though tame and reclaimed, it cannot be committed of the young of such creatures in the nest, kennel, or den; Co. 3d Inst. 109; 1 Russ. Cr. 153.

The owner of the land is, however, considered to have a qualified property in such animals, ratione impotentiæ; 2 Bla. Com. 394.

WHEN. At which time.

In wills, standing by itself unqualified and unexplained, this is a word of condition denoting the time at which the gift is to commence; 6 Ves. Jr. 243; 10 Co. 50; 16 C. B. 59. The context of a will may show that the word when is to be applied to the possession only, not to the vesting of a legacy; but to justify this construction there must be circumstances, or other expressions in the will, showing such to have been the testator's intent; 7 Ves. 422; 11 id. 489; Coop. 145; 3 Bro. C. C. 471. See 2 Jar. Wills, 417–421, notes. For the effect of the word when in contracts and in wills in the French law, see 6 Toullier, n. 520. See DEVISE; TIME.

WHEN AND WHERE. Technical words in pleading, formerly necessary in making full defence to certain actions. See 1 Chit. Pl. *445; DEFENCE.

WHEREAS. This word implies a recital, and, in general, cannot be used in the direct and positive averment of a fact in a declaration or plea. Those facts which are directly denied by the terms of the general issue, or which may, by the established usage of pleading, be specially traversed, must be averred in positive and direct terms; but facts, however material, which are not directly denied by the terms of the general issue, though liable to be contested under it, and which, according to the usage of pleading, cannot be specially traversed, may be alleged in the declaration by way of recital, under a whereas; Gould, Pl. c. 43, § 42, c. 3, § 47; Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (B 5, 4); 2 Chitty, Pl. 151, 178, 191.

WHIPPING. The infliction of stripes.

This mode of punishment, which is still practised in some of the states, has yielded in most of the states to the penitentiary system.

Whipping has been held to be punishment worse than death; 7 Tex. 69; but see 2 Rich. 418.

The punishment of whipping, so far as the same was provided by the laws of the United States, was abolished by the act of congress of February 28, 1839, s. 5. See 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 796; Dane, Abr. Index. See CORRECTION.

This punishment has never been altogether abolished in England. At common law it was inflicted on inferior persons for petty larceny, etc., but by the usage of the star chamber, never on a gentleman. By 1 Geo. IV. c. 57, it was abolished as to females. By 5 & 6 Vict. striking or firing at the present queen is punishable with whipping thrice or fewer times. The Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 authorize the whipping of males below 16 who have been convicted of various offences; but it must be done in private and only once, and the court must specify the number of strokes and the instrument. By 25 Vict. c. 18, for boys under 14 the number shall not exceed twelve with a birch rod. For the offences of robbery accompanied with personal violence, and of attempting by any means to strangle or to render insensible any one with intent to enable himself or others to commit an indictable offence, in addition to imprisonment, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 96, direct that the offender, if a male, be once, twice, or thrice privately whipped. See Whart. Lex.

WHITE BONNET. In Scotch Law. A fictitious bidder at an auction. Where there is no upset price, and the auction is not stated to be without reserve, there is no authority for saying that employment of such person is illegal. Burton, Law of Scotl. 362.

WHITE RENTS. In English Law. Rents paid in silver, and called white rents, or redditus albi, to distinguish them from other rents which were not paid in money. Co. 2d Inst. 19. See ALBA FIRMA.

WHOLE BLOOD. Being related by both the father and mother's side: this phrase is used in contradistinction to half blood, which is relation only on one side. See BLOOD.

WHOLESALE. To sell by wholesale is to sell by large parcels, generally in original packages, and not by retail. See WORDS.

WIDOW. An unmarried woman whose husband is dead.

In legal writings, widow is an addition given to a woman who is unmarried and whose husband is dead. The addition of spinster is given to a woman who never was married. Lovelace, Wills, 269. See ADDITION. As to the rights of a widow, see DOWER; QUARANTINE.

WIDOW BENCH. The share of her husband's estate which a widow is allowed besides her jointure. Whart. Lex.

WIDOW'S CHAMBER. In London, the apparel of a widow and the furniture of her chamber, left by her deceased husband, is so called, and the widow is entitled to it. 2 Bla. Com. 518.

WIDOWER. A man whose wife is dead. A widower has a right to administer to his wife's separate estate, and, as her administrator, to collect debts due to her, generally for his own use.

WIDOWHOOD. The state of a man whose wife is dead, or of a woman whose husband is dead. In general, there is no law to regulate the time during which a man must remain a widower, or a woman a widow, before they marry a second time. The term widowhood is mostly applied to the state or condition of a widow.

WIFE. A woman who has a husband.

The relation confers upon her certain rights, imposes on her certain obligations, and deprives her of certain powers and privileges.

At Common Law. A wife has a right to share the bed and board of her husband. She can call upon him to provide her with necessary food and clothing according to her position in life, and if he neglects or refuses to do it she can procure them on his account. See NECESSARIES. She is entitled, on his death, to dower in all the real estate of which he is seised at any time during coverture. See DOWER.

As to her contracts made before coverture and her liability for torts while married, see HUSBAND.

She is bound to follow him wherever in the country he may choose to go and establish himself, provided it is not, for other causes, unreasonable. She is under obligation to be faithful in chastity to her marriage vow; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 50. See DIVORCE; ADULTERY.

The wife cannot bind herself by contract, express or implied, by parol or under seal.

A wife can gain rights of a political character: these rights stand on the general principles of the law of nations; 2 Hard. Ky. 5; 3 Pet. 242. When she commits a crime in the presence of her husband, unless it is of a very aggravated character, she is presumed to act by his coercion, and, unless the contrary is proved, she is irresponsible. Under other circumstances she is liable, criminally, as if she were a feme sole. See WILL; COERCION; DURESS.

As to the control of the husband over her estate, see HUSBAND.

As to the property of a wife in trust for her sole and separate use, see SEPARATE ESTATE.

As to a wife's equity to a settlement, see that title.

Settlements.—As a general rule, a contract made between parties who subsequently intermarry is, both at law and in equity, extinguished by the marriage; 1 Bla. Com. 442; but when articles are entered into or a settlement is executed whereby the wife is to have a certain provision in lieu of her fortune, the husband becomes virtually a purchaser of her fortune, and she becomes entitled to her provision, though there may be no intervention of trustees, and equity will enforce the contract; 2 Ves. Sen. 675; Husbands on Married Women, 125; MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

Under Statutes. A great change in favor of the wife has been produced by recent statutes in a majority of the United States.

In Alabama, all property of the wife, held by her previous to marriage, or to which she may become entitled in any manner after marriage, becomes her separate estate, and not subject to the debts of the husband; it is vested in the husband as trustee, but he is not answerable for the rents and profits. Her right to the rents and profits is not liable to be taken in execution for his debts; Ala. Code, § 2704 et seq.

In Arizona, all the property of the wife held by her previous to marriage, and that acquired subsequent thereto, either by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, becomes her separate property. She may sue and be sued concerning her separate property as if unmarried. An inventory of her property filed and recorded in the recorder's office of the county wherein she resides, is notice of her title; Com. Laws, §§ 1969–1971.

In Arkansas, the property of a wife, whether real or personal, or whether acquired before or after marriage, in her own right, cannot be sold to pay the debts of the husband. In accordance with art. xiv. sec. 8 of the constitution, an act has been passed providing a time and mode of scheduling the separate property of married women. Unless this is complied with, the burden of proof is on the wife to show her ownership; Acts 1875, p. 172.

In California, all property, both real and personal, owned by the wife before marriage, and that acquired after marriage by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, becomes her separate property; and all property, both real and personal, owned by the husband before marriage, or acquired by him afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, becomes his separate property; Cal. Code, 8162.

All other property acquired during coverture by either husband or wife becomes the common property of both; and the rents and profits of the same are the common property of both; Cal. Code, 8164.

In Colorado, the wife's separate property acquired by her, or left to her by will, either before or after her marriage, is not liable for her husband's debts. She may transact any business and give notes in settlement of her debts the same as if she were sole, and bind her separate estate both real and personal. She may sue and be sued without joining her husband's name.

In Connecticut, all personal property of the wife owned by the wife before marriage, and all that accrues during marriage to her by gift or bequest, or by distribution to her as heir at law, or that accrues to her by reason of patent-rights, copy-right, or pensions issued on her account, vests in the husband as trustee for the wife.

The husband is entitled, however, during the coverture to take and use the rents, profits, and interests; but such rents, profits, and interests are not liable to be taken for his debts, except for debts contracted for the support of the wife and her children, arising after the vesting of the title in the husband. Real estate conveyed to the wife during coverture in consideration of her personal services is held by her as her separate estate.

The income of the wife's real estate, when vested in her name or that of a trustee for her, continues to be her property, and is not liable to be taken for the husband's debts.

Where the wife acquires personal property while absent from her husband by his abandonment or in consequence of his abuse, it is held by her to her sole and separate use. Other statutes have been passed to secure to the wife the enjoyment of her property; Conn. Gen. Stat. 186.

In Dakota, the wife owns, in her own right, all property, whether real or personal, which she has acquired by descent, gift, or purchase, and may manage, sell, convey, and devise the same to the same extent and in the same manner as if she were unmarried. She may make contracts and incur liabilities which will be enforced by or against her to the same extent and in the same manner as if she were unmarried. In Delaware, the real and personal property of the wife, whose marriage has taken place since April 9, 1873, or that which she may acquire by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any one other than her husband, is her sole and separate property, free from her husband's control or debts. She may sue and be sued in respect to her own property, as if unmarried, and may make any contracts necessary thereto; 14 Laws of Del. ch. 550.

In the District of Columbia, the real and personal property of the wife, acquired before or after marriage, otherwise than by gift or conveyance from her husband, is her sole and separate property, and is not liable for her husband's debts, and she may convey, devise, and bequeath it the same as if she were unmarried. She may contract, sue and be sued in respect to her separate estate, as if she were unmarried; R. S. of D. C. § 727.

In Florida, the constitution provides that all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned by her before marriage, or acquired afterwards by gift, devise, descent, or purchase, shall be her separate property, and not liable for the debts of her husband; art. iv. § 26; and it is enacted that when any female, a citizen of this state, shall marry, or when any female shall marry a citizen of this state, the female being seised or possessed of real or personal property, her title to the same shall continue separate, independent, and beyond the control of her husband, notwithstanding her coverture, and shall not be taken in execution for his debts: provided, however, that the property of the female remain in the care and management of her husband.

All property acquired either by husband or wife, except such as may be acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, is common property, of which the husband has entire control, with power of disposition. The wife may by contract bind her separate estate.

Stat. ch. 52, art. II. § 2.

In Louisiana, the wife's separate property cannot be sold by her husband, and she may administer it herself unless there is an antenuptial contract to the contrary. In Minnesota, the real and personal property of the wife continues to be her separate property during coverture, and she may receive, hold, and enjoy property of every description free from the control of her husband, and from any liability for his debts. WIFE'S EQUITY. The equitable right of a wife to have settled upon her and her children a suitable provision out of her estate whenever the husband cannot obtain it without the aid of a court of equity. Shelf. Marr. & D. 605.

By the marriage the husband acquires an interest in the property of his wife, in consideration of the obligation which he contracts by the marriage of maintaining her and their children. The common law enforces this duty thus voluntarily assumed by him, by an action, and, therefore, allows him to alien the property to which he is thus entitled jure mariti, or in case of his bankruptcy or insolvency it would vest in his assignee for the benefit of his creditors, and the wife would be left, with her children, entirely destitute, notwithstanding her fortune may have been great. To remedy this evil, courts of equity, in certain cases, give a provision to the wife, which is called the wife's equity.

The principle upon which courts of equity act is, that he who seeks the aid of equity must do equity; and that will be withheld until an adequate settlement has been made; 1 P. Wms. 459, 460. See 5 My. & C. 105; 11 Sim. 569; 4 Hare, 6.

Where the property is equitable and not recoverable at law, it cannot be obtained without making a settlement upon a wife and children, if one be required by her; 2 P. Wms. 639; and where, though the property be legal in its nature, it becomes from collateral circumstances the subject of a suit in equity, the wife's right to a settlement will attach; 5 My. & C. 97. See 2 Ves. 607, 680; 3 id. 166, 421; 9 id. 87; 5 Madd. 149; 13 Me. 124; 10 Ala. N. S. 401; 9 Watts, 90; 5 Johns. Ch. 464; 2 Bland, Ch. 545.

The wife's equity to a settlement is binding not only upon the husband, but upon his assignee, under the bankrupt or insolvent laws; 2 Atk. 420; 3 Ves. 607; 6 Johns. Ch. 25; 1 Paige, Ch. 620; 4 Mete. Mass. 486; 4 Gill & J. 283; 5 T. B. Monr. 338; 10 Ala. N. S. 401; 1 Ga. 637. And even where the husband assigned the wife's equitable right for a valuable consideration, the assignee was considered liable; 4 Ves. 19.

As to the amount of the rights of the wife, the general rule is that one-half of the wife's property shall be settled upon her; 2 Atk. 423; 3 Ves. Ch. 166. But it is in the discretion of the court to give her an adequate settlement for herself and children; 5 Johns. Ch. 464; 6 id. 25; 3 Cow. 591; 1 Des. Eq. 263; 2 Bland, Ch. 546; 1 Cox, N. J. 153; 5 B. Monr. 31; 3 Ga. 193; 9 S. & S. 597.

Whenever the wife insists upon her equity, the right will be extended to her children; but the right is strictly personal to the wife, and her children cannot insist upon it after her death; 2 Ed. Ch. 337; 1 J. & W. 472; 1 Madd. 467: 11 Bligh, N. S. 104; 2 Johns. Ch. 206; 3 Cow. 591; 10 Ala. N. S. 401.

The wife's equity will be barred by an adequate settlement having been made upon her; 2 Ves. Ch. 675; by living in adultery apart from her husband; 4 Ves. Ch. 146; but a female ward of court, married without its consent, will not be barred although she should be living in adultery; 1 Ves. & B. Ch. 302.

See White & T. L. C. Eq.

WILD ANIMALS. Animals in a state of nature; animals ferœ naturæ. See ANIMALS; FERÆ NATURÆ.

WILFULLY. Intentionally.

In charging certain offences, it is required that they should be stated to be wilfully done. Archb. Cr. Pl. 51, 58; Leach, 556.

It is distinguished from maliciously in not implying an evil mind; L. R. 2 Cr. Cas. Res. 161.

In Pennsylvania, it has been decided that the word maliciously was an equivalent for the word wilfully, in an indictment for arson; 5 Whart. 427.

WILL (last will and testament). The disposition of one's property, to take effect after death. Swinb. Wills, pt. 1, § 2; Godolphin, pt. 1, c. 1, s. 2.

The testator's body cannot be disposed of by his will, because the law recognizes no property in a dead body, and it is the duty of the executor to bury it; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 508.

The term will, as an expression of the final disposition of one's property, is confined to the English law and those countries which derive their jurisprudence from that source. The term testamentum, or testament, is exclusively used in the Roman civil law and by the continental writers upon that subject. Some controversy seems to exist whether the word testamentum is strictly derived from testatum or from that in combination with mentis. There does not seem to be much point in this controversy, for in either view the result is the same. It is the final declaration of the person in regard to the disposition of his property. It is his testimony upon that subject, and that is the expression of his mind and will in relation to it.

The practice of allowing the owner of property to direct its destination after his death is of very ancient date. Genesis, xlviii. 22; Gal. iii. 15; Plutarch's Life of Solon; Roman Laws of the Twelve Tables. But wills are not, like succession, a law of nature. A stage where they are not recognized always, in every society, precedes the time when they are allowed. In their early growth they were not regarded as a method of distributing a dead man's goods, but as a means of transferring the power and authority of a family to a new chief. It is not until the later portion of the middle ages that they become a mode of diverting property from the family or of distributing it according to the fancy of the owner. Maine, Anc. Law, 171–217. Nor is the power to dispose of property by will a constitutional right. It depends almost wholly on statute; 100 Mass. 234.

The right of disposing of property by will did not exist in early times among the ancient Germans, or with the Spartans under the laws of Lycurgus, or the Athenians before the time of Solon. 4 Kent, 502, and note.

And in England, until comparatively a recent period, this right was to be exercised under considerable restrictions, even as to personal estate. 2 Bla. Com. 492.

Until the statute of 32 & 34 Henry VIII., called the Statute of Wills, the wife and children were each entitled to claim of the executor their reasonable portion of the testator's goods, i. e. each one-third part. So that if one had both a wife and children, he could only dispose of one-third of his personal estate, and if he had either a wife or child, but not both, he could dispose of one-half; Fitzh. N. B. 122 H (b), 9th ed.; 2 Saund. 66, n. (9); 2 Bla. Com. 492. All restrictions are now removed from the disposition of property by will, in England, whether real or personal, by the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26. 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 731. And in the Roman civil law the children were always entitled to their share, or legitime, being one-fourth part of the estate, of which they could not be deprived by the will of their father. The legitime was by the emperor Justinian increased to one-third part of the estate where there were four or a less number of children, and if more than four then they might claim one-half the estate, notwithstanding the will. Novell. 18, c. 1; 2 Domat, Civil Law, 15.

And by the existing law of the state of Louisiana, one is restrained of disposing of his whole estate if he have children. One child may claim one-thirds of the estate, two may claim half, and three two-thirds, as their legitime, or reasonable part of the estate. See Louisiana Code.

According to the civil law, the naming of an executor was of the essence of a will; and that constituted the essential difference between a will and a codicil; the latter, not making any such appointment, was, on that account, called an inofficious testament, or will. Swinb. Wills, pt. 1, § 5, pl. 2. 3; 1 Will. Exec. 7. The executor under a Roman will succeeded to the entire legal position of the deceased. He continued the legal personality of the testator, taking all the property as his own, and becoming liable for all the obligations. Maine, Anc. Law, 126.

In the United States the homestead laws in some states affect the validity of wills by making void a husband's devise of homestead land; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 740. See same citation for regulations in various states as to devises to corporations, or for charitable purposes.

Wills are unwritten or nuncupative, and written. The former are called nuncupative from nuncupare, to name or make a solemn declaration, because wills of this class were required to be made in solemn form before witnesses, and by the naming of an executor. Swinb. Wills, pt. 1, § 12, pl. 1; Godolphin, pt. 1, c. 4, § 6. But it has been held that appointing an executor is not essential to a nuncupative will; 8 N. Y. 196.

To make a nuncupative will the person must be in extremis, and in immediate prospect of death; and his words must have been intended as a will; 20 Johns. 502; 2 Stew. (Ala.) 364.

This class of wills is liable to much temptation to fraud and perjury. The statute of 29 Charles II. c. 3 laid them under several restrictions; and that of 1 Vict. c. 26 rendered them altogether invalid except as to "any soldier in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman, being at sea," who may dispose of personal estate the same as before the act; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 755, note, et seq.

By the insertion of the clause "in actual military service," it has been held to include only such as were on an expedition, and not to include those quartered in barracks, either at home or in the colonies; 3 Curt. 522, 818; 39 Vt. 111. But see, also, 2 Curt. 368, 341.

So the exception does not extend to the commander-in-chief of the naval force in Jamaica, who lived on shore at the official residence with his family. The Earl of Easton v. Seymour, cited by the court in 2 Curt. Eccl. 339; 3 id. 530. The statutes of most of the American states have either placed nuncupative wills under special restrictions, or else reduced them within the same narrow limits as the English statutes. In many of the states they still exist much as they did in England before the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26, being limited to a small amount of personal estate; 1 Jarm. Wills, Perk. ed. 136, and note.

A will may be written in pencil. But it is a strong indication that the will so written was not a final act, but merely a deliberative one. This indication may, however, be overcome by proof; 84 Penn. 510; 1 Hagg. 219; 3 Moo. P. C. 223; 23 Beav. 195.

Written Wills.

The Testator's Capacity. He must be of the age of discretion, which, by the common law of England, was fixed at twelve in females, and fourteen in males; Swinburne, pt. 2, § 2, pl. 6; Godolphin, pt. 1, c. 8, § 1; 1 Will. Ex. 13; 1 Jarm. Wills, 29. This is now regulated by statute, both in England and most of the United States. The period of competency to execute a will, in England, is fixed at twenty-one years, and the same rule is adopted in many of the United States, and the disposition is strongly manifested in that direction throughout the states; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 748, note.

Aliens. By the common law in England, an alien could not devise nor take by devise real estate; and an alien enemy could not devise personalty until 33 Vict. c. 14, § 2.

This rule is now, in the United States, much altered by statute; 1 Redf. Wills, 8–14; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 743, note. Indians, in the absence of statute on the subject, are governed by the same law as resident aliens; p. 745 of last citation. See same citation as to convicts, for whom the regulations are mostly statutory. Coverture is a disability to the execution of a will, unless by the consent of the husband; 2 Bla. Com. 498; 4 Kent, 505; 1 Will. Ex. 42. But a married woman cannot, even with her husband's consent, devise land, because she would thereby exclude her heir; otherwise with chattels; 12 Mass. 525; 16 N. H. 194; 10 S. & R. 445; 15 N. J. Eq. 384. In the United States the disability as to coverture has been largely changed by statute; 1 Redf. Wills, 22–29; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 752, note. Blindness is so far an incapacity that it requires express and satisfactory proof that the testator understood the contents of the will, in addition to what is required in other cases; 1 Rob. Eccl. 278; 3 Strobh. 297; 1 Jarm. Wills, 49. Deaf and dumb persons will labor under a similar inconvenience, and especially in communicating with the witnesses, unless they have been educated so as to be able to write; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 13. But the witnesses must, to be present with the testator, be within the possible cognizance of his remaining senses; Richardson, J., in 1 Spears, 256. Persons deaf, dumb, and blind were formerly esteemed wholly incapable of making a will; but that class of persons are now placed upon the same basis as the two former, with only the additional embarrassment attending the defect of another sense; 1 Will. Ex. 17, 18; 1 Redf. Wills, 53.

Idiots are wholly incapable of executing a will, whether the defect of understanding is congenital or accidental. Lunatics are incapable of executing a last will and testament, except during such a lucid interval as allow the exercise of memory and judgment. It must be an absolute, but not necessarily a perfect, restoration to reason and reflection, and not a mere temporary remission; Tayl. Med. Jur. 642; 3 Bro. C. C. 441; Pothier, Obl. Evans ed. App. 579; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 255; Rush, Mind, 162; Ray, Med. Jur. § 279; Combe, Ment. Der. 241; 9 Ves. Ch. 611: 13 id. 87; 12 Am. L. Reg. 385; 1 Phila. 90; 31 N. J. Eq. 633; 94 Ill. 560; 26 Wend. 255; 1 Redfield on Wills, 107, 120. But mere weakness of understanding is not sufficient to invalidate a will, if the testator is capable of comprehending the object in view; 17 Ark. 292; 2 Bradf. 42; 2 J. J. Marsh. 340; 10 S. & R. 84. Monomania, or partial insanity. This is a mental or moral perversion, or both, in regard to a particular subject or class of subjects, while in regard to others the person seems to have no such morbid affection; Tayl. Med. Jur. 626. It consists in the belief of facts in regard to the particular subject of the affection, which no sane person would or could believe; 1 Add. Eccl. 279; 3 id. 79. When it appears that the will is the direct offspring of this morbid affection, it should be held invalid, notwithstanding the general soundness of the testator; 6 Ga. 324; 7 Gill, 10; 8 Watts, 70. See, also, 6 Moore, P. C. 341, 349; 12 Jurist, 947, where Lord Brougham contends for the extreme notion that every person laboring under any form of partial insanity or monomania is incompetent to execute a valid will, because the mind being one and entire, if unsound in any part it is an unsound mind. This extreme view will scarcely gain final acceptance in the courts; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 18, contra.

Delirium from disease, or stimulus. This, while the paroxysm continues to such an extent as to deprive a person of the right exercise of reason, is a sufficient impediment to the execution of a will; Ray, Ins. §§ 253, 254, 390; Tayl. Med. Jur. 626; Rush, Mind, 282; 18 Ves. Ch. 12; 17 Jur. 1045; 1 Ves. Sen. 19. See, also, 2 Aik. Vt. 167; 1 Bibb, 168. But there is not the same presumption of the continuance of this species of mental perversion, whether it proceed from the intoxication of stimulus or the delirium of fever, as in ordinary insanity; 3 Hill, So. C. 68; 4 Metc. Mass. 545. Senile dementia. This is a defect of capacity which comes very frequently in question in courts of justice in testing the validity of wills. If the testator has sufficient memory remaining to be able to collect the elements of the transaction—viz., the amount and kinds of property he had, and the number of his children, or other persons entitled to his bounty—and to hold them in mind sufficiently to form an understanding judgment in regard to them, he may execute a valid will; Ray, Ins. § 243; Tayl. Med. Jur. 650; 21 Vt. 168; 1 Redf. Wills, 94–107; 31 Ala. 59; 2 Bradf. 360; 32 N. J. Eq. 701. Age itself is no sure test of incapacity; 2 Phill. 261, 262. But when one becomes a child again, he is subject to the same incapacities as in his first childhood; 1 Williams, Ex. 35; 3 Madd. Ch. 191; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 211; 6 Ga. 324. Fraud. If a person is induced by fraud or undue influence to make a will or legacy, such will or legacy is void; 4 Ves. 802; 6 H. L. Cas. 2; 35 N. Y. 559, 50 Md. 466, 480; 1 Jarm. Wills (5th ed.) 35; 1 Redf. Wills, 507–537.

THE MODE OF EXECUTION. This depends upon the particular form of the statute requirements; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 763, note, et seq.

Under the English Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II., as "signing" only was required, it was held that a mark was sufficient; 3 Nev. & P. 228; 8 Ad. & E. 94; 10 Paige, Ch. N. Y. 85. And under the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26, the same form of execution is required so far as signing is concerned. But sealing seems not to be sufficient where signing is required; 1 Wils. 313; 1 Jarm. Wills, 69, 70, and cases cited. So, it was immaterial in what part of the will the testator signed. It was sufficient if the instrument began, I, A B, etc., and was in the handwriting of the testator, and he treated that as signing or did not regard the instrument as incomplete, as it evidently would be so long as he intended to do some further act to authenticate it; 3 Lev. 1; Freem. 538; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 403, pl. 9; Prec. in Chanc. 184; 21 Vt. 256. But if it appear, from the form of attestation at the close, or in any other way, that the testator did not regard the instrument as complete, the introduction of the testator's name at the beginning, in his own handwriting, is not a sufficient signing; Dougl. 241; 1 Gratt. 454; 13 id. 664; 10 Paige, Ch. 85. See 7 Q. B. 450. It was not held necessary under the Statute of Frauds of Charles II. that the witnesses should subscribe in the presence of each other. They might attest the execution at different times; Prec. in Chanc. 184; 1 Ves. Ch. 12; 1 Will. Ex. 79. But the statute 1 Vict. requires both the witnesses to be present when the testator signs the will or acknowledges his signature; and they must afterwards attest in the presence of the testator, although not of each other; 3 Curt. Eccl. 659; 1 Will. Ex. 79, and note.

Holograph wills in general require no attestation; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 767, note.

The statutes in the different states differ to some extent, but agree substantially with the English statute of Charles II. The revised statutes of New York require the signature of the testator and of the witnesses to be at the end of the will; 4 Wend. 168; 13 Barb. 17; 20 id. 238. So, also, in Arkansas, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and probably some other of the American states; 1 Will. Ex. Perkins ed. 117, n.

The competency of witnesses and the validity of devises to witnesses, or to the husband or wife of a witness, are questions usually controlled by statute; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.), 775, note, et seq.

Publication. Questions have often arisen in regard to what declaration is requisite for the testator to make, to constitute a publication in the presence of the witnesses. But the later and best-considered cases, under statutes similar to that of Charles II., only require that the testator shall produce the instrument to the witnesses for the purpose of being witnessed by them, and acknowledge his own signature in their presence. The production of the instrument by the testator for the purpose of being attested by the witnesses, if it bear his signature, will be a sufficient acknowledgment; 11 Cush. 532; 1 Burr. 421; 3 id. 1775; 4 Burn, Eccl. Law, 102; 6 Bingh. 310; 7 id. 457; 7 Taunt. 361; 1 Cr. & M. 140; 3 Curt. Eccl. 181; 30 Ga. 808; 2 Barb. 385; 46 Ill. 61; 34 Me. 162; 3 Redf. 74; 44 Wisc. 392. Where a will or codicil refers to an existing unattested will or other paper, it thereby becomes a part of the will; 2 Ves. Ch. 228; 1 Ad. & E. 423; 1 Will. Ex. 86, and note; 1 Rob. Eccl. 81. Witnesses may attest by a mark; 8 Ves. Ch. 185, 504; 5 Johns. 144; 4 Kent, 514, n.

Revocation. The mode of revocation of a will provided in the Statute of Frauds, Car. II., is by "burning, cancelling, tearing, or obliterating the same." In the present English Statute of Wills, the terms used are, "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying." If the testator has torn off or effaced his seal and signature at the end of a will, it will be presumed to have been done animo revocandi; 1 Add. Eccl. 78; 1 Cas. temp. Lee, 444; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 568. So, too, where lines were drawn over the name of the testator; 2 Cas. temp. Lee, 84. So, also, where the instrument had been cut out from its marginal frame, although not otherwise defaced, except that the attestation clause was cut through, it was held to amount to a revocation; 1 Phill. Eccl. 375, 406.

It is not requisite in order to effect the revocation that the testator should effect the destruction of the instrument. It is sufficient if he threw it upon the fire with the intention of destroying it, although some one snatch it off after it is slightly burned, and preserve it without his knowledge; 2 W. Blackst. 1043. But it would seem that it must be an actual burning or tearing to some extent,—an intention merely to do the acts not coming within the statute; 6 Ad. & E. 209; 2 Nev. & P. 615. But, aside from the statute, a mere intention to revoke evidenced by any other act, will be effectual to revoke: as, burning or tearing, etc.; 8 Ad. & E. 1. How much the will must be burned or torn to constitute a revocation under the statute of frauds, was left by the remarks of the different judges in Doe v. Harris, 6 Ad. & E. 209, in perplexing uncertainty; 1 Williams, Ex. 121.

If the testator is arrested in his purpose of revocation before he regards it as complete, it will be no revocation, although he tore the will to some extent; 3 B. & Ald. 489.

A will may be revoked in part; 2 Rob. Eccl. 563, 572. But partial revocations which were made in anticipation of making a new will, and intended to be conditional upon that, are not regarded as complete until the new will is executed; 1 Add. Eccl. 409; 2 id. 316. See 8 Sim. 73. Thus a "memorandum of my intended will" was upheld as a will, and held not to be revoked by the drawing up of a new will which was not signed; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 225; 14 C. L. J. 248.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a testator wanted his will to be revoked in the event of a certain contingency happening before his death; 13 Rept. (Md.) 526; but see, contra, 3 Sw. & Tr. 282.

By the present English statute, every obliteration or interlineation or alteration of a will must be authenticated in the same mode that the execution of the will is required to be. Hence, unless such alterations are signed by the testator, and attested by two witnesses, they are not to be regarded as made, however obvious the intention of the testator may be. But if the words are so obliterated as to be no longer legible, they are treated as blanks in the will; 3 Curt. Eccl. 761. The mere act of defacing a will by accident and without the intention to revoke, or under the misapprehension that a later will is good, will not operate as a revocation; 1 P. Wms. 345; Cowp. 52; 1 Saund. 279 b, c; 1 Add. Eccl. 53. The revocation of a will is prima facie a revocation of the codicils; 4 Hagg. Eccl. 361. But it is competent to show that such was not the testator's intention; 2 Add. Eccl. 230; 1 Curt. Eccl. 289; 1 Will. Ex. 134. The same capacity is requisite to revoke as to make a will; 7 Dana, 94; 11 Wend. 227; 9 Gill, 169; 7 Humphr. 92.

The making of a new will purporting on its face to be the testator's last will, and containing no reference to any other paper, and being a disposition of all the testator's property, and so executed as to be operative, will be a revocation of all former wills, notwithstanding it contain no express words of revocation; 2 Curt. Eccl. 468; 18 Jur. 560; 4 Moore, P. C. 29; 2 Dall. 266. So the appointment of an executor is a circumstance indicating the exclusiveness of the instrument; 1 Macq. Hou. L. 163, 173. And the revocation will become operative, notwithstanding the second will becomes inoperative from the incapacity of the devisee; 1 Pick. 535, 548.

Where there are numerous codicils to a will, it often becomes a question of difficulty to determine how far they are intended as additions to, and how far as substitutes for, each other. In such cases, the English ecclesiastical courts formerly received parol evidence to show the animus of the testator. But it was held, in a later case of this kind, that parol evidence could not be received unless there was such doubt on the face of the papers as to require the aid of extrinsic evidence to explain it; 2 Curt. Eccl. 799.

It is regarded as the prima facie presumption from the revocation of a later will, a former one being still in existence and uncancelled, that the testator did intend its restoration without any formal republication; 4 Burr. 2512; Cowp. 92; 3 Phill. Eccl. 554; 2 Dall. 266. But it is still regarded as mainly a question of intention, to be decided by all the facts and circumstances of the case; 1 How. Miss. 336; 2 Add. Eccl. 125; 3 Curt. Eccl. 770; 1 Moore, P. C. 299, 301; 1 Will. Ex. 155, 156; 2 Dall. 266. An express revocation must be made in conformity with the statute, and proved by the same force of evidence requisite to establish the will in the first instance; 8 Bingh. 479; 1 Will. Ex. 160. If one republish a prior will, it amounts to a revocation of all later wills or codicils; 1 Add. Eccl. 38; 7 Term, 138.

Implied revocations were very common before the statute of frauds. But since the new statute of 1 Vict. c. 26, § 19, as to all estates real and personal, it is provided that no will shall be revoked on the ground of a presumed intention resulting from change of circumstances. Before that, it was held under the statute of frauds, by a succession of decisions, that, even as to lands, the marriage of the testator and the birth of children who were unprovided for was such a change of circumstances as to work an implied revocation of the will; 2 Show. 242; 4 Burr. 2171, in note, 2182; and, finally, by all the judges in England in the exchequer chamber; 8 Ad. & E. 14; 2 Nev. & P. 504. This latter case seems finally to have prevailed in England until the new statute; 2 Moore, P. C. 51, 63, 64; 2 Curt. Eccl. 854; 1 Rob. Eccl. 680. And the subsequent death of the child or children will not revive the will without republication; 1 Phill. Eccl. 342; 2 id. 266.

The marriage alone or the birth of a child alone is not always sufficient to operate a revocation; 4 Burr. 2171; Ambl. 487, 557, 721; 5 Term, 52, and note. The marriage alone of a woman will work a revocation; 4 Rep. 61. Not so the marriage alone of a man. But the birth of a child with circumstances favoring such a result may amount to an implied revocation; 5 Term, 52, and note; 1 Phill. Eccl. 147. For the history of the common law on this subject, see 4 Johns. Ch. 510 et seq. In the absence of statute this rule of the common law may be considered abrogated in those states which give a married woman unrestricted testamentary powers. This matter is controlled in most of the American states, more or less, by statute; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 783, note. In many of them a posthumous child unprovided for in the will of the father inherits the same as if no will had been made. In others, all children born after the execution of the will, and in some states all children not provided for in the will, are placed on the same ground as if no will existed; 1 Will. Ex. 170, n. 1, 171, n. 1. And by the express provisions of the act of 1 Vict. the marriage of the testator, whether man or woman, amounts to a revocation; 1 Jarm. Wills, 106–173.

Republication. This, under the statute of frauds, could only be done in the same manner a will of lands was required to be first executed. And the same rule obtains under the statute of 1 Vict., and in many, perhaps most, of the American states. The general rule may be said to be, that a will can be republished only by an instrument of as high a nature as that which revoked it. Thus a will once revoked by written declaration cannot be republished by parol; 2 Conn. 67; 9 Johns. 312; 12 Ired. L. 355; 7 Jones, (N. C.) L. 134. In Pennsylvania, a parol republication is allowed. But the intention of the testator to republish must be clearly proved; 1 Grant, Cas. 75; 2 Whart. 103. It is doubtful, however, if parol evidence alone is sufficient; 10 Ired. L. 459.

Constructive republication is effected by means of a codicil, unless neutralized by internal evidence of a contrary intention; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 406, D, pl. 5; 1 Ves. Sen. 437; 1 Jarm. Wills. 175, and notes; 3 Pick. 213.

PROBATE OF WILLS. The proof of a will of personal property must always be made in the probate court. But in England the probate of the will is not evidence in regard to real estate. In most of the American states the same rule obtains in regard to real as to personal estate,—as the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction, in most of the states, in all matters pertaining to the settlement of estates; 9 Co. 36, 38 a; 4 Term, 260; 1 Jarm. Wills, 118; 8 N. H. 124; 12 Metc. 421; 8 Ohio, 5; 3 Gill, 198; 20 Miss. 134; 23 Conn. 1. See PROBATE OF WILLS.

The probate of a will has no effect out of the jurisdiction of the court before which probate is made, either as to persons or property in a foreign jurisdiction; 8 Ves. Ch. 44; 1 Johns. Ch. 153; 12 Vt. 589; Story, Confl. Laws, §§ 512–517. In regard to the probate of wills passing realty, the lex rei sitæ governs; personalty is controlled by the lex domicilii; Whart. Confl. Laws, §§ 570, 587, 592; 3 Bradf. 379; Story, Confl. Laws, §§ 69, 431; 10 Moore, P. C. 306. But the indorsement of negotiable paper by the executor or administrator in the place of his appointment will enable the indorsee to maintain an action in a foreign state upon the paper in his own name; 9 Wend. 425. But see 5 Me. 261; 2 N. H. 291, where the rule is held otherwise. The executor may dispose of bank-shares in a foreign state without proving the will there; 12 Metc. 421.

Any person interested in the will may compel probate of it by application to the probate court, who will summon the executor or party having the custody of it; 4 Pick. 33; 3 Bacon, Abr. 34, Executors. The judge of probate may cite the executor to prove the will at the instance of any one claiming an interest; 4 Pick. 33; 1 Will. Ex. 201; 1 Jarm. Wills, 224. The attesting witnesses are indispensable, if the contestants so insist, as proof of the execution and authenticity of the will and the competency of the testator, when they can be had; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 691; 1 Jarm. Wills, 226, and note. But if all or part of the subscribing witnesses are absent from the state, deceased, or disqualified, then their handwriting must be proved; 9 Ves. Ch. 381; 19 Johns. 186; 1 Jarm. Wills, 226, and notes. And see 17 Ga. 364; 9 Pick. 350; 6 Rand. 33. It will be presumed that the requisite formalities were complied with when the attestation is formal, unless the contrary appear; 8 Md. 15; 11 N. Y. 220; 30 Penn. 218; 1 Jarm. Wills, 228, and notes. But it has sometimes been held that no such presumption will be made in the absence of a subscribing witness who might be called; 19 Johns. 386. Wills over thirty years old, and appearing regular and perfect, and coming from the proper custody, are said to prove themselves; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 21, 570; 2 Kay & J. 112. See, also, 2 N. & M'C. 400. Wills lost, destroyed, or mislaid at the time of the testator's death may be admitted to probate upon proper proof of the loss and of the execution; 1 Phill. Eccl. 149; 1 Green, Ch. N. J. 220; 1 Jarm. Wills, 231, note. In the case of Sugden vs. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 P. D. 154, the daughter of the deceased was allowed to prove from memory the contents of the lost will; and written and oral declarations of the testator, both before and after the execution of the will, were admitted as evidence. A lost or destroyed will may be proved by parol; 87 Penn. 67.

In most of the United States statutory provision has been made for proving foreign wills by exemplified copy; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's edition), 725, note.

For statutory and other regulations, in regard to probate, see p. 729 of last citation.

TIME FROM WHICH A WILL SPEAKS. In general, a will speaks from the death of a testator, that being the point of time at which it becomes operative; 21 Conn. 550, 616. But often the language of the testator, as when he uses the word "now" or a verb in the present tense, requires to be taken with reference to the time it is used; Ambl. 397; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 201; 2 Atk. 597; 1 Jarm. Wills, 318. But it will receive the former interpretation if it can reasonably be made to bear it; 2 Cox, Ch. 384.

GIFTS VOID FOR UNCERTAINTY. Where the subject-matter of the gift is not so defined in the will as to be ascertained with reasonable certainty; 25 Penn. 460; 12 Gratt. 196; 1 Jarm. Wills, 317; 1 Swanst. 201; the person intended to be benefited may not be so described or named that he can be identified. But, in general, by rejecting obvious mistakes, this kind of uncertainty is overcome; 1 Jarm. Wills, 330–348, and notes. Determinate meanings have now been assigned to numerous doubtful words and phrases, and rules of construction adopted by the courts, which render devises void for uncertainty less frequent than formerly; 1 Jarm. Wills, 356–383.

PAROL EVIDENCE, HOW FAR ADMISSIBLE. The rule in regard to the admissibility of parol evidence to vary, control, or to render intelligible the words of a will, is not essentially different from that which obtains in regard to contracts. It may be received to show the state of the testator, the nature and condition of his property, his relation to the contestants, and all the surrounding circumstances. But this is done to place the court in the condition of the testator, in order as far as practicable to enable them the more fully to understand the sense in which he probably used the language found in his will; 1 Nev. & M. 524; 15 Pick. 400; 1 Phill. Ev. 532–547; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 287–289; 1 Jarm. Wills, 349, and notes; 2 Ired. 192. Letters and oral declarations of the testator are not admissible to show the intention of the testator; 2 Vern. 625; 14 Johns. 1; 2

W. & S. 455. But see 22 Wend. 148. Parol evidence is not admissible to supply any word or defect in the will; 7 Gill & J. 127; 8 Conn. 254; 23 Barb. 285; 27 Ala. N. S. 489. Parol declarations of the testator about the time of making the will are often admitted to show the state of mind, capacity, and understanding of the testator; but they are not to be used to show his intention; that must be learned from the language used; 8 Conn. 254. See, generally, Tud. Lead. Cas.; R. P. 918; Wigram, Wills.

Courts of equity cannot reform a will upon proof of mistake, as they do a contract; 5 Madd. 364; 1 Moore & S. 352; 6 Conn. 34; 23 Vt. 336; 19 Am. L. Reg. 353. Parol evidence is admissible to explain and remove a latent ambiguity; 1 Maule & S. 345; 4 B. & Ad. 787; 6 Metc. 404; 2 Jones, Eq. 377; 6 Md. 224; 1 Cr. & M. 235; 1 Mer. 384; 1 Paige, Ch. 291; 5 M. & W. 369. So, also, to rebut a resulting trust; 14 Johns. 1; 1 Jarm. Wills, 157. Also to show fraud, or to decipher peculiar characters, or to explain local or technical terms; 8 Term, 147; 3 B. & Ad. 728; 1 P. Wms. 421; 5 Ad. & E. 302; 1 Jarm. Wills, 415, 421. But where a wrong name is inserted in the will by mistake of the scrivener, or where the name is left wholly blank, parol evidence is not admissible in order to carry into effect the purpose of the testator; 7 Metc. 188; 3 Bro. C. C. 311. But a partial blank may be supplied; 4 Ves. Ch. 680. See 1 Jarm. Wills, 349–384; 2 Will. Ex. 1037, 1049, 1050, 1080–1082, 1164–1166; 5 M. & W. 363. But where the residuary legatee was described by a wrong Christian name, parol evidence was received to show who was intended; 1 Paige, Ch. 291. See, also, 4 Johns. Ch. 607; 12 Law Reporter, 658.

Contradictory Provisions. As a general rule, where there are portions of a will wholly incapable of standing with other portions (and where they cannot both be allowed to operate so as to give the persons to be benefited a joint estate in the thing), the latter provision must control, as being the latest declaration of the intention of the testator; 5 Ves. Ch. 247; 6 id. 100; 2 Taunt. 109; 2 My. & K. 149; 2 Metc. Mass. 202; 22 Me. 430; 6 Pet. 84; 1 Jarm. Wills, 472; L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 17.

See, generally, as to statutory provisions, the very full and learned note, at the end of Randolph & Talcott's edition of Jarm. Wills (vol. 3).

In Criminal Law. The power of the mind which directs the action of a man.

In criminal jurisprudence, the necessity of the concurrence of the will is deemed so far indispensable that, in general, those persons are held not amenable as offenders against the law who have merely done the act prohibited, without the concurrence of the will. This has reference to different classes of persons who are regarded as laboring under defect of will, and are, therefore, incapable of committing crime.

Infants, who, from want of age, are excused from punishment. The age of discretion, or capacity for crime, is fixed, by the common law of England, at fourteen years; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 1, s. 1; 1 Russ. Cr. 2–6. Below the age of fourteen years all persons, both male and female, are presumed incapable of committing felony or other crime. For, although the law makes a distinction in regard to the age of consent to marriage between males and females, fixing it at fourteen in the former and twelve in the latter, no such distinction is made in regard to capacity for crime; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29.

Below the age of seven years, infants are presumed so incapable of any malicious design as not to incur the guilt of felony or of any other crime. Hence an infant below the age of seven years, whatever art or malice he may exhibit in the act constituting the corpus delicti, is nevertheless to go acquit, on account of his presumed incapacity to incur the guilt of crime; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 1, § 1; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. supra.

Between the ages of seven and fourteen years, an infant, although presumed, prima facie, incapable of incurring the guilt of crime, is, nevertheless, liable to trial and to be proved guilty upon the facts of the particular case evincing guilty consciousness. The reports abound with cases where clear evidences of criminal consciousness were shown, and of very marked atrocity, from the age of nine years and upward; 1 Russ. Cr. 2–6; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29. See Infant.

Persons laboring under mental imbecility are not amenable for crime. This class of persons has been subdivided according to the character of the malady and the permanency or continuity of its operation. An idiot, or one who suffers an entire defect of mind from birth. The writers upon this subject have attempted to define idiocy as an incapacity "to count twenty, to tell who was his father or mother, or how old he was." Fitzh. N. B. 582 b.

One rendered non compos by sickness or other cause, and where the malady is, therefore, not congenital, but accidental. This, if it produce an entire defect of mind and will, either permanently or temporarily, is, during its continuance, a bar to all criminal responsibility; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 26–29; 1 Russ. Cr. 7, and cases cited by these writers.

Lunacy, which is much the same as the last above, except that it is attended with lucid intervals, during the continuance of which the person is responsible criminally. But care should be exercised to discriminate correctly between a lucid interval, where the mind is fully restored, and a mere remission of the paroxysm, where the patient seems comparatively but not absolutely restored; Taylor, Med. Jur. 642; Redf. Wills, c. iii. sect. xii. § 14.

Persons subject to the power of others. This exemption from crime, in the English common law, extends to the wife while in the immediate presence and under the power of the husband, but not to a child or servant. And in respect of the enormity of the offences of treason and murder, the wife even is not excused by the command of the husband; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 44, 516; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 1, s. 14. The wife is liable, too, for all offences committed not in the presence of the husband, and also where she is the principal party concerned; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 1, § 14; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 44, 516. The distinction between the wife and the child and especially the servant, where the relation of master and servant is of a permanent character, or where the law gives the master unlimited control over the acts of the servant, seems not to rest upon any well-founded basis in present social relations. The English law does not regard one in the power of robbers or of an armed force of rebels as responsible, criminaliter, for his acts. No more should one be who is wholly under the power of another, as a child or servant may be: 1 Russ. Cr. 14. See Ch. J. Howe, 18 St. Trials, 293. These questions should, in strictness, be referred to the jury as matters of fact. See DURESS; COERCION.

Ignorance of law will not excuse any one. But ignorance of fact sometimes renders that innocent which would otherwise be a crime: as, where one kills an innocent person, mistaking him for an assassin or robber; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. c. 6; 1 Russ. Cr. 19, 20.

WINCHESTER, STATUTE OF. An English statute, 13 Edw. I. relating to the internal police of the kingdom. It required every man to provide himself with armor to aid in keeping the peace; and if it did not create the offices of high and petty constables, it recognized and regulated them, and charged them with duties answering somewhat to those of our militia officers. The statute took its name from the ancient capital of the kingdom. It was repealed by the statute of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

WINDFALL. See TIMBER; WOODS.

WINDING UP. The process of liquidating the assets of a partnership or corporation, for purposes of distribution. In England a number of statutes, known as the Winding-up Acts, have been passed to facilitate the settlement of partnership affairs; Lind. Part. book iv. c. 3; Bisph. Eq. 3514, n.

WINDOW. An opening made in the wall of a house to admit light and air, and to enable those who are in to look out.

The owner has a right to make as many windows in his house, when not built on the line of his property, as he may deem proper, although by so doing he may destroy the privacy of his neighbors; Bacon, Abr. Actions in General (B).

In cities and towns it is evident that the owner of a house cannot open windows in the party wall, q. v., without the consent of the owner of the adjoining property, unless he possesses the right of having ancient lights, which see. The opening of such windows and destroying the privacy of the adjoining property is not, however, actionable; the remedy against such encroachment is by obstructing them, without encroaching upon the rights of the party who opened them, so as to prevent a right from being acquired by twenty years' use; 3 Camp. 82. A bay- or bow-window that projects over the land of another is a nuisance, and actionable as though it was an actual invasion of the soil; 107 Mass. 234; 16 S. & R. 390; Wood, Nuisance, 119. Where it projects beyond the street line, it has been held in Pennsylvania a purpresture, and the erection of it may be restrained by injunction, although authorized by a special city ordinance; 10 W. N. C. Pa. 10; whether the window reached to the ground; id.; or was built out of the second story; 39 Leg. Int. Pa. 108. See AIR; ANCIENT LIGHTS; HIGHWAY; LIGHT.

WIRTA. A measure of land among the Saxons, containing sixty acres.

WISBUY, LAWS OF. See CODE.

WISCONSIN. One of the states of the United States.

It was originally a part of the Northwest territory, and subject to the ordinance of July 13, 1787, establishing that territory. It was made a separate territory, with the name of Wisconsin, by act of congress approved April 20, 1836. Said territory was afterwards divided, and the territory of Iowa set off, June 12, 1838. It was admitted into the Union as a state May 29, 1848, with the following boundaries,—viz.: beginning at the northeast corner of the state of Illinois, i. e. a point in the centre of lake Michigan where the line of forty-two degrees and thirty minutes crosses the same, thence running with the boundary-line of the state of Michigan, through lake Michigan and Green Bay, to the mouth of Menomonee river, thence up the channel of said river to the Brule River, thence up said last-mentioned river to lake Brule, thence along the southern shore of lake Brule in a direct line to the centre of the channel between Middle and South Islands in the lake of the Dessert, thence in a direct line to the head-waters of the Montreal River, as marked upon the survey made by Captain Crawm, thence down the main channel of Montreal river to the middle of lake Superior, thence through the centre line of lake Superior to the mouth of the St. Louis river, thence up the main channel of said river to the first rapids in the same above the Indian village, according to Nicollet's map, thence due south to the main branch of the river St. Croix, thence down the main channel of said river to the Mississippi, thence down the centre of the main channel of that river to the northwest corner of the state of Illinois, thence due east with the northern boundary of the state of Illinois to the place of beginning.

The constitution of Wisconsin was adopted by a convention at Madison, on the first day of February, 1848. This constitution, as modified by amendments, adopted by the people of the state, is still in force. The constitution is prefaced by a bill of rights, which declares that all men are born free and equal; that there shall be no slavery or involuntary servitude but for crime; that there shall be freedom of speech and of the press; that the rights of petition ought to exist; that indictment must precede trial; that there should be remedies for injury to property or person; that there shall be security from unreasonable searches of house or person; defines treason; makes all tenures allodial; gives aliens the same rights of property as subjects; abolishes imprisonment for debts; forbids religious tests of fitness for office and citizenship. Every male person, twenty-one years old or more, who has resided in the state one year next preceding an election, and who is a white citizen of the United States, or a white person of foreign birth who has declared his intention to become a citizen, or a person of Indian blood who has once been declared by law of congress to be a citizen of the United States, any subsequent act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding, or a civilized person of Indian descent not a member of any tribe, is entitled to the right of suffrage. And the right may be extended to other persons by act of legislature approved by a majority of the voters at a general election. All persons under guardianship, non compos mentis, or insane, all persons convicted of treason or felony, unless restored to civil rights, are excluded. No soldier, seaman, or marine in the army or navy of the United States shall be deemed a resident in consequence of being stationed within the state.

The Legislative Power.—The Senate is to be composed of not more than one-third nor less than one-fourth the number of the representatives. They are elected by the people of their respective districts for one year. A senator must be a qualified voter, and have lived in the state one year next preceding the election.

The Assembly is to be composed of not less than fifty-four and not more than one hundred members, elected annually in each of the districts into which the state is divided for the purpose. The qualifications to be the same as those of the senators.

An apportionment of members of both houses is to be made every tenth year from 1855. The members are exempt from arrest on civil process during the session of the legislature and fifteen days before and after. The constitution contains the usual provisions for organization of the two houses; for giving each house the regulation and control of the conduct of its members and judging of their qualification; for keeping and publishing a journal of its proceedings; for open sessions.

The Executive Power.—The Governor is elected by the people, for the term of two years. In case two have an equal number of votes and the highest number, the two houses of legislature by joint ballot designate which of the two shall be governor. He must be a citizen of the United States, and a qualified voter in the state. The governor is commander-in-chief of the military and naval forces of the state; has power to convene the legislature on extraordinary occasions, and in case of invasion or danger from the prevalence of contagious disease at the seat of government, to convene them at any other suitable place within the state; must communicate to the legislature at every session the condition of the state, and recommend such matters to them for their consideration as he may deem expedient; transacts all necessary business with the officers of the government, civil and military; must expedite all such measures as may be resolved upon by the legislature, and take care that the laws be faithfully executed; has the power to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons after conviction for all offences except treason and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper, subject to such regulations as may provided by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons. Upon conviction for treason he has the power to suspend the execution of the sentence until the case is reported to the legislature at its next meeting, when the legislature may either pardon or commute the sentence, direct the execution of the sentence, or grant a further reprieve. He must annually communicate to the legislature each case of reprieve, commutation, or pardon granted, stating the name of the convict, the crime of which he was convicted, the sentence and its date, and the date of the commutation, pardon, or reprieve, with his reasons for granting the same.

The governor may also veto any bill, returning it to the legislature with his objections: if it is then passed by a vote of two-thirds in each house, it becomes a law.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time as the governor, for the same term, and must possess the same qualifications as the governor. He is president of the senate, but has only a casting vote. In case of the impeachment of the governor, or of his removal from office, death, inability from mental or physical disease, resignation, or absence from the state, the powers and duties of the office devolve upon him for the residue of the term, until the governor absent or impeached has returned, or the disability ceases. But when the governor, with the consent of the legislature, is out of the state in time of war, at the head of the military force thereof, he continues commander-in-chief of the military forces of the state. If during a vacancy in the office of governor the lieutenant-governor is impeached, displaced, resign, die, or from mental or physical disease becomes incapable of performing the duties of his office, or is absent from the state, the secretary of the state is to act as governor until the vacancy is filled or the disability ceases.

The secretary of state, the treasurer, and the attorney-general are chosen by the people for two years. Sheriffs, coroners, registers of deeds, and district attorneys are chosen by the people in each county for two years.

The Judicial Power.—The Supreme Court consists of one chief and four associate justices, elected by the people for the term of ten years. It is a court of appellate jurisdiction only, but may issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus, quo warranto, procedendo, and supersedeas.

The Circuit Court is composed of judges elected one from each judicial district for the term of six years, by the people. A judge must be at least twenty-five years old, a citizen of the United States, and a qualified elector. Two terms of the court are to be held by the judges annually in each county, and special law terms also as the statutes may provide. This court has original jurisdiction of all civil and criminal matters, and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals, and a supervisory power over the same.

County Courts are held in each county. Their jurisdiction extends to the probate of wills, and granting letters testamentary and of administration on the estates of all persons deceased, who were at the time of their decease inhabitants of or residents in the same county, and of all who die without the state having any estate to be administered within such county; to all matters relating to the settlement of estates of deceased persons and of minors and others under guardianship; and to all cases of trusts created by will admitted to probate in such court; and such other jurisdiction as may be conferred by law.

Justices of the Peace are elected in each town for two years, by the people. They have a general jurisdiction in civil cases arising from contracts, injury to persons where personal property is sought to be recovered, of forcible entry and detainer, and to recover statute penalties where the amount involved does not exceed one hundred dollars, with an appellate jurisdiction to the circuit or county court. They have a criminal jurisdiction concurrent with the circuit court where the fine imposed is less than one hundred dollars.

WITCHCRAFT. Under 33 Hen. VIII. c. 8, and 1 Jac. I. c. 12, the offence of witchcraft, or supposed intercourse with evil spirits, was punishable with death. These acts were not repealed till 1736. 4 Bla. Com. 60.

WITENA-GEMOTE (spelled, also, witena-gemot, gewitena-gemote; from the Saxon wita, a wise man, gemote, assembly,—the assembly of wise men).

An assembly of the great men of the kingdom in the time of the Saxons, to advise and assist in the government of the realm.

It was the grand council of the kingdom, and was held, generally, in the open air, by public notice or particular summons, in or near some city or populous town. These notices or summonses were issued upon determination by the king's select council, or the body met without notice, when the throne was vacant, to elect a new king. Subsequently to the Norman conquest it was called commune concilium regni, curia magna, and, finally, parliament; but its character had become considerably changed. It was a court of last resort, more especially for determining disputes between the king and his thanes, and, ultimately, from all inferior tribunals. Great offenders, particularly those who were members of or might be summoned to the king's court, were here tried. The casual loss of title-deeds was supplied, and a very extensive equity jurisdiction exercised. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 73–76; 1 Bla. Com. 147; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 7; 9 Co. Preface.

The principal duties of the witena-gemote, besides acting as high court of judicature, was to elect the sovereign, assist at his coronation, and co-operate in the enactment and administration of the laws. It made treaties jointly with the king, and aided him in directing the military affairs of the kingdom. Examinations into the state of churches, monasteries, their possessions, discipline, and morals, were made before this tribunal. It appointed magistrates, and regulated the coin of the kingdom. It also provided for levying upon the people all such sums as the public necessities required; and no property of a freeman was, in fact, taxable without the consent of the gemote. Bede, lib. 2, c. 5; 3 Turner, Angl.-Sax. 209; 1 Dugdale, Mon. 20; Sax. Chron. 126, 140.

WITH STRONG HAND. In Pleading. A technical phrase indispensable in describing a forcible entry in an indictment. No other word or circumlocution will answer the same purpose. 8 Term, 357.

WITHDRAWING A JUROR. An agreement made between the parties in a suit to require one of the twelve jurors impanelled to try a cause to leave the jury-box; the act of leaving the box by such a juror is also called the withdrawing a juror.

This arrangement usually takes place at the recommendation of the judge, when it is obviously improper the case should proceed any further. And it seems now settled that in civil cases the court has power to do this, in the exercise of a sound discretion, without the consent of the parties, instead of nonsuiting the plaintiff; 8 Cow. 127.

The effect of withdrawing a juror puts an end to that particular trial, and each party must pay his own costs; 3 Term, 657; 2 Dowl. 721; 1 Cr. M. & R. 64. In Pennsylvania, the costs abide the event of the suit; Tr. & H. Pr. § 689.

But the plaintiff may bring a new suit for the same cause of action; Ry. & M. 402; 3 B. & Ad. 349. See 3 Chitty, Pr. 917.

In American practice, however, the same cause goes over, or is continued, without impairing the rights of either party, until the next term.

Where the plaintiff, at the suggestion of the judge, withdraws a juror, with the understanding of bringing the matter to a final conclusion, it amounts to an undertaking not to bring an action for the same cause; and if a second action be commenced, the court will stay the proceedings as against good faith; 1 Chit. Arch. Pr. 285. If, after a prisoner has pleaded to an indictment, and after the jury have been sworn and evidence offered, the public prosecutor, without the consent of the prisoner, withdraw a juror merely because he is unprepared with his evidence, the prisoner cannot afterwards be tried on the same indictment; 2 Cal. Cas. 304; Arch. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 347.

WITHDRAWING RECORD. The withdrawing by plaintiff's attorney of the nisi prius record filed in a cause, before jury is sworn, has the same effect as a motion to postpone; 2 C. & P. 185; 3 Camp. 333; Paine & Duer, Pr. 465.

WITHERNAM. In Practice. The name of a writ which issues on the return of elongata to an alias or pluries writ of replevin, by which the sheriff is commanded to take the defendant's own goods which may be found in his bailiwick, and keep them safely, not to deliver them to the plaintiff until such time as the defendant chooses to submit himself and allow the distress, and the whole of it to be replevied, and he is thereby further commanded that he do return to the court in what manner he shall have executed the writ; Hamm. N. P. 453; Co. 2d Inst. 140; Fitzh. N. B. 68, 69; Grotius, 3. 2. 4. n. 1.

WITHOUT DAY. This signifies that the cause or thing to which it relates is indefinitely adjourned: as, when a case is adjourned without day it is not again to be inquired into. When the legislature adjourn without day, they are not to meet again. This is usually expressed in Latin, sine die.

WITHOUT IMPEACHMENT OF WASTE. When a tenant for life holds the land without impeachment of waste, he is, of course, dispunishable for waste, whether wilful or otherwise. But still this right must not be wantonly abused so as to destroy the estate; and he will be enjoined from committing malicious waste; Dane, Abr. c. 78, a. 14, § 7; Bacon, Abr. Waste (N); 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. Waste (A, pl. 8); 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2402. See IMPEACHMENT OF WASTE; WASTE.

WITHOUT PREJUDICE. A phrase introduced into negotiations leading to a compromise of a dispute, for the purpose of saving him who makes the offer or proposition from any injury which might result from any admission of liability, etc., on his part. General admissions made for the purpose of compromise are not admissible in evidence against the party by whom made; 15 Beav. 388. An offer made in a letter "without prejudice," and accepted; L. R. 6 Ch. 822; or an admission made subject to a condition which has been performed; 19 W. R. 798; can be used against the writer; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1090. See ADMISSIONS; COMPROMISE.

WITHOUT RECOURSE. See SANS RECOURS; INDORSEMENT.

WITHOUT RESERVE. These words are frequently used in conditions of sale at public auction, that the property offered, or to be offered, for sale, will be sold without reserve. When a property is advertised to be sold without reserve, if a puffer be employed to bid, and actually bid at the sale, the courts will not enforce a contract against a purchaser, into which he may have been drawn by the vendor's want of faith; 5 Madd. 34. See PUFFER.

WITHOUT THIS, THAT. In Pleading. These are technical words used in a traverse (q. v.) for the purpose of denying a material fact in the preceding pleadings, whether declaration, plea, replication, etc. The Latin term is absque hoc (q. v.). Lawes, Pl. 119; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (G 1); 1 Saund. 103, n.; Ld. Raym. 641; 1 Burr. 320; 1 Chitty, Pl. 576, note a.

WITNESS (Anglo-Saxon witan, to know). One who testifies to what he knows. One who testifies under oath to something which he knows at first hand. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 98, 328.

One who is called upon to be present at a transaction, as, a wedding, or the making of a will. When a person signs his name to a written instrument, to signify that the same was executed in his presence, he is called an attesting witness.

The principal rules relating to witnesses are the same in civil and in criminal cases, and the same in all the courts, as well in those various courts whose forms of proceeding are borrowed from the civil law, as in those of the common law; 3 Greenl. Ev. §§ 249, 402; 2 Ves. Ch. 41; 17 Mass. 303; 4 T. B. Monr. 20, 157.

AS TO THE COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES. All persons, of whatever nation, may be witnesses; Bacon, Abr. Evidence (A); Jacob, Law Dict. Evidence. But in saying this we must, of course, except such as are excluded by the very definition of the term; and we have seen it to be essential that a witness should qualify himself by taking an oath. Therefore, all who cannot understand the nature and obligation of an oath, or whose religious belief is so defective as to nullify and render it nugatory, or whose crimes have been such as to indicate an extreme insensibility to its sanctions, are excluded. And, accordingly, the following classes of persons have been pronounced by the common law to be incompetent; 5 Mas. 18. See OATH.

Infants so young as to be unable to appreciate the nature and binding quality of an oath. A child under the age of fourteen is presumed incapable until capacity be shown, but the law fixes no limit of age which will of itself exclude. Whenever a child displays sufficient intelligence to observe and to narrate, it can be admitted to testify upon a due sense of the obligation of an oath being shown; 7 C. & P. 320; 2 Brewst. 404. See 63 Ala. 53; s. c. 35 Am. Rep. 4, note. A child five years old has been admitted to testify; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 367; 1 Phill. Ev. with Cowen and Hill's notes, 3d ed. 4; 3 C. & P. 598; 1 Mood. 86; 10 Mass. 225; 8 Johns. 98. The law presumes that all witnesses tendered in a court of justice are not only competent but credible. If a witness is incompetent, this must be shown by the party objecting to him; if he is not credible, this must be shown either from his examination, or by impeaching evidence aliunde; 1 Whart. Ev. § 392.

Idiots, lunatics, intoxicated persons, and, generally, those who labor under such privation or imbecility of mind that they cannot understand the nature and obligation of an oath. The competency of such is restored with the recovery or acquisition of this power; 10 Johns. 362; 28 Conn. 177; 16 Vt. 474; 7 Wheat. 453; 2 Leach, 482. And so a lunatic in a lucid interval may testify; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 365. Persons deaf and dumb from their birth are presumed to come within this principle of exclusion until the contrary be shown; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 366. See 1 Leach, 455; 3 C. & P. 127; 8 Conn. 93; 14 Mass. 207; 5 Blackf. 295. A witness unable to speak or hear is not incompetent, but may give his evidence by writing or by signs, or in any other manner in which he can make it intelligible; Steph. Ev. art. 107; see 11 Cush. 417. A person in a state of intoxication cannot be admitted as a witness; 15 S. & R.

235. See Ray, Med. Jur. c. 22, §§ 300–311; 16 Johns. 143. Deficiency in perception must go to the capacity of perceiving the matter in dispute, in order to operate as an exclusion, hence a blind man can testify to what he has heard, and a deaf man to what he has seen; 1 Whart. Ev. § 401.

Such as are insensible to the obligation of an oath, from defect of religious sentiment or belief. Atheists, and persons disbelieving in any system of divine rewards and punishments, are of this class. It is reckoned sufficient qualification in this particular if one believe in a God and that he will reward and punish us according to our deserts. It is enough to believe that such punishment visits us in this world only; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 369; 5 Mas. 18; 14 Mass. 184; 26 Penn. 274; 1 Swan, 44; 16 Ohio, 121; 7 Conn. 66.

It matters not, so far as mere competency is concerned, that a witness should believe in one God, or in one God rather than another, or should hold any particular form of religious belief, provided only that he brings himself within the rule above laid down. And, therefore, the oath may be administered in any form whatever, and with any ceremonies whatever, that will bind the conscience of the witness; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 371; 1 Atk. 21; Willes, 538; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 739. By statute in England and in most of the United States, religious disbelief no longer disqualifies, provision being made for an affirmation instead, and the witness, if testifying falsely, being subject to the penalties of perjury; Whart. Ev. § 395, n.

Persons infamous, i. e. those who have committed and been legally convicted of crimes the nature and magnitude of which show them to be insensible to the obligation of an oath. See INFAMY. Such crimes are enumerated under the heads of treason, felony, and the crimen falsi; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373; 2 Dods. Adm. 191. See CRIMEN FALSI.

The only method of establishing infamy is by producing the record of conviction. It is not even sufficient to show an admission of guilt by the witness himself; 9 Cow. 707; 2 Mass. 108; 97 id. 587; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 466; but in England a witness may be asked whether he has been convicted, etc.; Steph. Ev. art. 130. Pardon or the reversal of a sentence restores the competency of an infamous person, unless where this disability is annexed to an offence by a statute in express terms; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 378; 2 Salk. 513; 2 Hargr. Jurid. Arg. 221.

This exclusion on account of infamy or defect in religious belief applies only where a person is offered as a witness; 1 Bost. L. Rep. 347; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 374; 2 Q. B. 721. But wherever one is a party to the suit, wishing to make affidavit in the usual course of proceeding, and, in general, wherever the law requires an oath as the condition of its protection or its aid, it presumes conclusively and absolutely that all persons are capable of an oath; Stark. Ev. 393; Bacon, Abr. Evidence; 1 Phill. Ev. 1–25, and Cowen and Hill's Notes, nn. 1–18; 1 Ashm. 57. There is a conflict of authority as to how far a foreign judgment of an infamous offence disqualifies a witness. In New York, he is not disqualified; 77 N. Y. 400; s. c. 33 Am. Rep. 632, n. In Pennsylvania, he is held not to be disqualified unless the record of conviction be produced, and not then if he has served out his term of imprisonment; 3 Brewst. 461. In Massachusetts, the record is admitted merely to affect his credibility; 17 Mass. 575. In New Hampshire, the witness will be disqualified if the laws of his own state make him so, and the crime, if committed in New Hampshire, would have had the same effect; 10 N. H. 22. In Alabama; 23 Ala. 44; and Virginia; 6 Gratt. 706; the record is rejected altogether; but not so in North Carolina; 3 Hawks, 393. He is disqualified in Nevada; 15 Nev. 64. See Whart. Confl. Laws, §§ 107, 769; Whart. Ev. § 397, note.

Slaves were generally held incompetent to testify, by statutory provisions, in the slave states, in suits between white persons; 7 T. B. Monr. 91; 4 Ohio, 353; 5 Litt. 171; 3 Harr. & J. 97; 1 M'Cord, 430.

When it is said that all persons may be witnesses, it is not meant that all persons may testify in all cases. The testimony of such as are generally qualified and competent under other circumstances or as to other matters is sometimes excluded out of regard to their special relations to the cause in issue or the parties, or from some other circumstances not working a general disqualification.

Parties to the record were not competent witnesses, at common law, for themselves or their co-suitors. Nor were they compellable to testify for the adverse party; 7 Bingh. 395; 20 Johns. 142; 21 Pick. 57; 11 Conn. 342; but they were competent to do so; although one of several co-suitors could not thus become a witness for the adversary without the consent of his associates; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 354; 12 Pet. 149; 5 How. 91; 6 Humph. 405. Regard was had not merely to the nominal party to the record, but also to the real party in interest; and the former was not allowed to testify for the adverse side without the consent of the latter; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 329–364; 16 Pick. 501; 20 Johns. 142; 12 Conn. 134.

In some jurisdictions a party had the right of compelling his adversary to answer interrogatories under oath, as also to appear and testify. And, in equity, parties could reciprocally require and use each other's testimony; and the answer of a defendant as to any matters stated in the bill was evidence in his own favor; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 329; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 1528; Gresl. Eq. Ev. 243.

There were other exceptions to this rule. Cases where the adverse party had been guilty of some fraud or other tortious and unwarrantable act of intermeddling with the complainant's goods, and no other evidence than that of the complainant himself could be had of the amount of damage,—cases, also, where evidence of the parties was deemed essential to the purposes of public justice, no other evidence being attainable,—were exceptions; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 348; 1 Vern. 308; 1 Me. 27. See 12 Metc. 44; 3 Mich. 51; 10 Penn. 45.

On this same principle, persons directly interested in the result of the suit (see INTEREST), or in the record as an instrument of evidence, were excluded; and where the event of the cause turned upon a question which if decided one way would have rendered the party offered as a witness liable, while a contrary decision would have protected him, he was excluded; Stark. Ev. 1730. But to this rule, also, there were exceptions; Stark. Ev. 1731; of which the case of agents testifying as to matters to which their agency extended, forms one; Stark. Ev. 83–91; 1 Phill. Ev. 81–161, and Cowen and Hill's Notes, nn. 74–138; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 386–431.

In both England and the United States, the rules of exclusion on the ground of interest have been abrogated. The object of the statutes has been to remove all artificial restraints to competency so as to put the parties upon a footing of equality with other witnesses, both in their admissibility to testify for themselves, and in their being compellable to testify for others; 21 Wall. 488; 22 id. 350. In most of the statutes, however, cases are excepted where a suit is brought by or against executors or administrators. In these cases where one of the parties to a contract is dead, the survivor is not permitted to testify; 66 Penn. 297; 74 id. 476. But the exception does not make the surviving party incompetent, it only precludes him from testifying to communications with the deceased; 59 Me. 259; 64 Ill. 121. The test is the nature of the communications. The witness cannot testify to personal communications with the deceased party; 64 Barb. 189; 12 Gray, 459; but it has been held that if documents can be proved by independent evidence, the case is not within the exception; 21 Mich. 364. If the suit is brought against co-defendants, of whom only one is dead, when the contract was made either with the living co-defendants, or with the living and dead concurrently, the case is not within the exception; 9 Allen, 144; 22 Ohio St. 208. But when an action was brought against three partners, one of whom subsequently died, and his executors were substituted, the plaintiff is not a competent witness as to anything which occurred during the lifetime of the deceased partner, although the latter may have taken no part in the contract on which the action was brought; 87 Penn. 111.

Under these statutes, which confine the exception to suits against executors and administrators, the death of an agent of one party, through whom the contract was made, does not prevent the surviving party from testifying to the contract; 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 665; but under statutes which exclude the surviving party to a contract, the death of a contracting agent excludes the surviving party who contracted with him; 26 Wisc. 500. Unless the exception expressly covers all suits against executors and administrators, it does not exclude the plaintiff from proving matters occurring since the death of the party of whom the defendant is executor; 48 N. H. 90. The exception in statutes where the exclusion relates only to the surviving party in contracts, does not include torts; 60 Mo. 214. When the deposition of a deceased party afterwards is put in evidence, the other party being still living, such other party should be admitted as a witness in reply; 52 Ga. 385.

Husband and wife were excluded at common law from giving testimony for or against each other when either was a party to the suit or interested. And neither was competent to prove a fact directly tending to criminate the other. This rule was founded partly on their identity of interest, and partly, perhaps chiefly, on the policy of the law which aims to protect the confidence between man and wife that is essential to the comfort of the married relation, and, through that, to the good order of society. Whether or not the disability of husband or wife may be removed by consent of the other is mattter of dispute; 1 Ves. Ch. 49; 4 Term, 679; 3 C. & P. 551; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 340. In England, by stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, consent removes the disability; Whart. Ev. § 428. But it is not removed by death, nor by the dissolution of the marriage relation, so far as respects information derived confidentially during marital intercourse; 47 N. H. 100.

The rule is not ordinarily affected by statutes permitting husband or wife to testify for or against each other; 60 Barb. 527; nor does the statute as to the evidence of parties in interest generally affect their common-law incapacity to testify; 18 Wall. 452.

Some exceptions to this rule; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 343; are admitted out of necessity for the protection of husband and wife against each other, and for the sake of public justice, as in prosecutions for violence committed by either of them upon the other; see Bacon, Abr. Evidence (A); 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 334–347; 1 Phill. Ev. 69–81, and Cowen and Hill's Notes, nn. 53–74; 1 Ves. Ch. 49; Ry. & M. 253.

Parties to negotiable instruments are, in some jurisdictions, held incompetent to invalidate these instruments to which they have given currency by their signature. Such seems to be the prevailing, but not universal, rule in the United States; while in England such testimony is admitted, the objection going only to its credibility; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 383–386, note; 1 Term, 296; 9 Metc. 471; 12 Pet. 149; 3 How. 73; 5 N. H. 147; 4 Me. 191, 374; 20 Penn. 469; 24 Vt. 459; 18

Ohio, 579; 1 Miss. 541; 3 Rand. 316; 1 Conn. 260; 3 M'Cord, 71; 4 Tex. 371; 3 Harr. & J. 172; 2 Harr. N. J. 192.

And, finally, there are certain confidential communications; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 236–255; to which the recipient of them, from general considerations of policy, is not allowed to testify. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Judges are not compellable to testify to what occurred in their consultations; but they may be examined as to what took place before them on trial in order to identify the case, or prove the testimony of a witness; 1 Whart. Ev. § 600; see 4 Sandf. 120; but in England there is a doubt as to the latter proposition; Steph. Ev. art. 111; and it is said that in England a barrister cannot be compelled to testify as to what he said in court in his character of barrister; id.

Persons in possession of secrets of state or matters the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interests, are not allowed to testify thereto; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 250–252 (A).

Grand jurors and persons present before a grand jury; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 252; are not permitted to testify to the proceedings had before that body; 1 Phill. Ev. 177–184. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE MEANS OF SECURING THE ATTENDANCE AND TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES. In general, all persons who are competent may be compelled to attend and testify. Yet it would seem that experts who are permitted to testify to their opinion in cases where the inference to be drawn by the jury "is one of skill and judgment," cannot be compelled to give their opinion, unless in pursuance of a special contract for their time and services; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310, n. 3; 1 C. & K. 23; 1 Whart. Ev. § 376. See EXPERTS.

Provision has been made by statute, in most if not in all of the states, for the case of persons living at an inconvenient distance from the place of trial, as well as for the case of such as are sick or about to leave the state, or otherwise likely to be put to great inconvenience by a compulsory attendance, and also for such as are already in a foreign jurisdiction, by allowing the taking of their deposition in writing before some magistrate near at hand, to be read at the trial; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 321.

In criminal cases, where the state itself is the plaintiff prosecuting an offence committed against the public, all persons are compellable to appear and testify without any previous tender of their fees; and any bystander in court may be compelled to testify without a previous summons or tender of fees; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 311; 4 Cow. 49; 13 Mass. 501; 4 Cush. 249; 2 Lew. Cr. Cas. 259.

But in civil suits which are between man and man, a party is allowed to compel the attendance and testimony of a witness only on condition of a prepayment or tender of his fees for travel to the place of trial, and for one day's attendance there. This seems, as a general rule, to be the least that can be tendered; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310; 4 Johns. 311; 1 Metc. Mass. 293; 8 Mo. 288; 41 N. H. 121. In the courts of the United States, as well as in England, a witness may require his fees for travel both ways; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310; 1 Stark. Ev. 110; 6 Taunt. 88. And in civil cases a person cannot be compelled to testify, although he chance to be present in court, unless regularly summoned and tendered his fees; 1 Phil. Ev., Cowen & Hill's Notes, n. 338. Being in attendence in obedience to a summons, he may, nevertheless, refuse to testify from day to day, unless his daily fees are paid or tendered; 2 Phill. Ev. § 376. Whether or not he may refuse to attend from day to day without the prepayment or tender of his daily fees, is a matter about which there are different decisions; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310; 10 Vt. 493; 14 East, 15. A witness may maintain an action against the party summoning him for his fees; Stark. Ev. 1727.

Witnesses are also compellable to produce papers in their custody to which either party has a right as evidence, on the same principle that they are required to testify what they know; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 558. But there is this difference between the obligation of a witness to testify to facts and the obligation to produce papers—to wit: that in the latter case he is not compellable to produce title-deeds or other documents belonging to him or to one for whom he holds them as agent, where the production would prejudice his own or his principal's civil rights,—an exemption which is not allowed in reference to oral testimony; 1 Stark. Ev. 1722. But in all cases the witness must bring the documents, if regularly summoned to do so, and the court will decide as to the question of producing them. See DISCOVERY.

This rule as to title-deeds appears to be peculiar to England. In this country, it is said that a witness, not a party, may be compelled to produce any of his private papers. Whether the court, on inspection, will require them to be put in evidence may be a matter of discretion; May's Steph. Ev. art. 118 n.; see 14 Gray, 226.

The attendance of witnesses is ordinarily procured by means of a writ of subpœna; sometimes, when they are in custody, by a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum; and sometimes, in criminal cases, by their own recognizance, either with or without sureties; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 309, 312; 2 Phill. Ev. 370, 374. If a witness disobey the summons, process of attachment for contempt will issue to enfore his attendance, and an action also lies against him at common law; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 319; 1 Stark. Ev. 1727; 2 Phill. Ev. 376.

Nor can any third party intervene to prevent the attendance of a witness. Neither can he take advantage of a witness's attendance at the place of trial to arrest him. Witnesses are protected from arrest while going to the place of trial, while attending there for the purpose of testifying, and on their return,—eundo, morando, et redeundo,—it being the policy of the law as well to encourage and facilitate, as to enforce the attendance of witnesses; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 316; 1 Stark. Ev. 119. Where a non-resident of a state is in attendance on a trial in a circuit court of the United States as a witness in a case therein pending, he is privileged from service of summons in a civil action issued from a state court of such state, and the privilege extends to a reasonable time after the disposition of the cause to enable him to return to his own state; 11 Fed. Rep. 582. See, as to immunity of witnesses from process, 25 Alb. L. J. 424; 53 Vt. 694; s. c. 38 Am. Rep. 713. See ARREST.

AS TO THE EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES. In the common-law courts, examinations are had viva voce, in open court, by questions and answers. The same course is now adopted to a great extent in equity and admiralty courts, and others proceeding according to the forms of the civil law. But the regular method of examining in these last-named courts is by deposition taken in writing out of court; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 721; 2 Conkl. Adm. Pr. 284; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1527; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 251.

On motion, in civil and criminal cases, witnesses will generally be excluded from the court-room while others are undergoing examination in the same case: this, however, is not matter of right, but within the discretion of the court; 1 Stark. Ev. 1733; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 432; 4 C. & P. 585; 7 id. 632; 2 Swan, 237; 3 Wisc. 214.

Witnesses are required to testify from their own knowledge and recollection. Yet they are permitted to refresh their memory by reference, while on the stand, to papers written at or very near the time of the transaction in question,—even though they were not written by themselves and though the writing in itself would be inadmissible in evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 436–440; 20 Pick. 441; 2 C. & P. 75; 10 N. H. 544.

The fact that the witness has no recollection independent of the notes, does not exclude his testimony as to the facts stated therein, when he testifies that it has been his uniform practice to make true notes of events of the character noted immediately after the occurrence of events, and that the memoranda are parts of such notes; 1 Whart. Ev. § 578. The notes need not be written by the witness, if he has verified their accuracy shortly after the event, or if they were made by a clerk under his direction and in his presence; 12 Cush. 98; 37 Me. 246. The fact that memoranda are not made contemporaneously with the event is fatal to their admissibility unless made when the memory is fresh; 1 Whart. Ev. § 523. See REFRESHING MEMORY.

Being once in attendance, a witness may, in general, be compelled to answer all questions that may legally be put to him. See EVIDENCE.

Yet there are exceptions to this rule. He is not compellable where the answer would have a tendency to expose him to a penal liability or any kind of punishment, or to a criminal charge or a forfeiture of his estate. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 451, 453; 2 Phill. Ev. 417. See PRIVILEGE.

The court, it is said, decides as to the tendency of the answer, and will instruct the witness as to his privilege; 2 Phill. Ev. 417; 4 Cush. 594; 1 Denio, 319. It has been held that the question whether an answer would have this tendency is to be determined by the oath of the witness; 17 Jur. 393. And in point of fact, out of the necessity of the case, it is a matter which the witness may be said practically to decide for himself. The witness may answer if he chooses; and if he do answer after having been advised of his privileges, he must answer in full; and his answer may be used in evidence against him for all purposes; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 451, 453; 4 Wend. 252; 11 Cush. 437; 12 Vt. 491; 20 N. H. 540.

Whether a witness be compellable to answer to his own degradation or infamy is a point as to which some distinctions are to be taken: a witness cannot refuse to testify simply because his answer would tend to disgrace him; it must be seen to have that effect certainly and directly; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 456. He cannot, it would seem, refuse to give testimony which is material and relevant to the issue, for the reason that it would disgrace him, or expose him to civil liability. A witness is not the sole judge whether a question put to him, if answered, may tend to criminate him. The court must see from the circumstances of the case that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer, in order to excuse him. But if the fact once appear, that the witness is in danger, great latitude will be allowed him in judging for himself the effect of any particular question; 26 Ch. Div. 294; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 454; 1 Whart. Ev. § 537; 1 Mood. & M. 108; 4 Wend. 250; 2 Ired. 346; 15 Cent. L. J. 305.

But it would appear that he may refuse where the question (being one put on cross-examination) is not relevant and material, and does not in any way affect the credit of the witness; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 458; 3 Camp. 519; 13 N. H. 92; 1 Gray, 108. Whether a witness, when a question is put on the cross-examination which is not relevant and material to the issue, yet goes to affect his credit, will be protected in refusing to answer, simply on the ground that his answer would have a direct and certain effect to disgrace him, is a matter not clearly agreed upon. There is good reason to hold that a witness should be compelled to answer in such a case; 1 Stark.

Ev. 144–147; 2 Phillips, Ev. 421–431; 1 C. & P. 85; 2 Swanst. 216; 2 Camp. 637; 3 Yeates, 429.

But the whole matter is one that is largely subject to the discretion of the courts; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 431, 449.

There seems no doubt that a witness is in no case competent to allege his own turpitude, or to give evidence which involves his own infamy or impeaches his most solemn acts, if he be otherwise qualified to testify; Stark. Ev. 1737. See 15 Cent. L. J. 343 et seq., where this subject is fully treated in an article from the Irish Law Times.

The course of examination is, first, a direct examination by the party producing the witness; then, if desired, a cross-examination by the adverse party, and a re-examination by the party producing; 1 Starkie, Ev. 123, 129. As to the direct examination, the general rule is that leading questions, i.e. such as suggest the answer expected or desired, cannot be put to a witness by the party producing him. But this rule has some reasonable exceptions; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 434. A court of error will not reverse because a leading question was allowed; 87 Penn. 124; 22 N. J. 372; 3 Allen, 466; contra, 99 Ill. 368. See Leading Question.

Leading questions, however, are allowed upon cross-examination. Nor are the rules against questions not relevant and material to the issue always enforced upon cross-examination,—a stage of the trial at which great latitude in the form and subject-matter of questions is generally allowed, in order that juries may be fully apprized of "the situation of the witness with respect to the parties and to the subject of litigation, his interest, his motives, his inclination and prejudices, his means of obtaining correct and certain knowledge of the facts to which he bears testimony, the manner in which he has used those means, his powers of discernment, memory, and description." 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 446, 449; 1 Stark. Ev. 129.

Yet witnesses cannot be cross-examined as to collateral and irrelevant matters for the purpose of contradicting them by other evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 449. Their testimony as to such matters is always conclusive against the party questioning. "If, by an unfortunate or unskilful question put on cross-examination, a fact be extracted which need not have been evidence upon an examination in chief, it then becomes evidence against the party so cross-examining." 1 Stark. Ev. 144; 2 Phill. Ev. 398, 429.

The right of cross-examination, which is that of treating a person as the witness of the opposing party and examining him by leading questions, is confined by some courts to matters upon which he has already been examined in chief, e. g. by the courts of the United States and of Pennsylvania; 14 Pet. 448; 6 W. & S. 75. By others, e. g. those of England, Massachusetts, and New York; 1 Stark. Ev. 131; 17 Pick. 490; 1 Cow. 238; it is extended to the whole case; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 445. In any view, a witness may be cross-examined as to his examination in chief in all its bearings. Thus a subscribing witness to a will may be cross-examined as to the testator's sanity; 78 Penn. 326. Yet a party is not permitted to introduce his own case by cross-examining the witnesses of his adversary; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 447.

It is to be considered, however, that the cross-examination of witnesses is a matter depending much upon the discretion of the court, which will sometimes permit one to cross-examine his own witness, when he appears to be in the interest of the adverse party; 1 Stark. Ev. 132; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 447; 2 Phill. Ev. 403, 406.

The right of re-examination extends to all topics upon which a witness has been cross-examined; but the witness cannot at this stage, without permission of the court, be questioned as to any new facts unconnected with the subject of the cross-examination and not tending to explain it; 1 Stark. Ev. 150; 2 Phill. Ev. 407; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 467.

But the court may in all cases permit a witness to be called either for further examination in chief, or for further cross-examination; Steph. Ev. art. 126; and may itself recall a witness at any stage of the proceedings, and examine or cross-examine, at its discretion; 6 C. & P. 653. If new matter is introduced on the re-examination, by permission of the court, the adverse party may further cross-examine upon that matter; Steph. Ev. art. 127.

A party cannot impeach the credit of his own witness. But he is sometimes, in cases of hardship, permitted to contradict him by other testimony; 1 Stark. Ev. 147; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 442, 443. And a party bona fide surprised at the unexpected testimony of his witness may be permitted to interrogate him, as to previous declarations alleged to have been made by him, inconsistent with his testimony, the object being to prove the witness's recollection, and to lead him, if mistaken, to review what he has said; 1 Whart. Ev. § 549. See infra.

The credit of an adversary's witness may be impeached by cross-examination, or by general evidence affecting his reputation for veracity (but not by evidence of particular facts which otherwise are irrelevant and immaterial), and by evidence of his having said or done something before which is inconsistent with his evidence at the trial. Also, of course, he may be contradicted by other testimony; Stark. Ev. p. iv. 1753; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 461. In some states evidence may be given of a witness's general character; 4 Wend. 257; 2 Dev. 209. See 29 Mich. 173.

In order to test a witness's accuracy, veracity, or credibility, he may be cross-examined as to "his relations to either of the parties or the subject matter in dispute; his interest, his motives, his way of life, his associations, his habits, his prejudices, his physical defects and infirmities, his mental idiosyncrasies, if they affect his capacity; his means of knowledge and powers of discernment, memory, and description—may all be relevant." May's Steph. Ev. art. 129. But it has been said that questions otherwise irrelevant, cannot be asked for the purpose of testing his moral sense; 4 Cush. 593.

Generally, where proof is to be offered that a witness has said or done something inconsistent with his evidence, a foundation must first be laid and an opportunity for explanation offered, by asking the witness himself whether he has not said or done what it is proposed to prove, specifying particulars of time, place, and person; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 462; 2 Phill. Ev. 433; 2 Br. & B. 313; 16 How. 38; 76 Penn. 83; but in other cases it has been held that no foundation need first be laid; 17 Mass. 160; 58 Mo. 35; 22 Conn. 622; 31 Vt. 443.

In England and Massachusetts, by statute, the same course may be taken with a witness on his examination in chief, if the judge is of opinion that he is hostile (see 11 Am. L. Rev. 261) to the party by whom he was called, and permits the question. Apart from statute such evidence has not generally been considered as admissible; May's Steph. Ev. art. 131; 56 N. Y. 585; 49 Cal. 384; if the sole effect is to discredit; but if the purpose be to show the witness he is in error, it is admissible; 15 Ad. & E. 378; 53 N. Y. 230.

Proof of declarations made by a witness out of court in corroboration of the testimony given by him at the trial is, as a general rule, inadmissible. But when a witness is charged with having been actuated by some motive prompting him to a false statement, or that the story is a recent fabrication, it may be shown that he made similar statements before any such motive existed; 68 Ill. 514; 48 Cal. 85; 11 How. 480; May's Steph. Ev. art. 131, n.

Evidence of general good reputation may be offered to support a witness, whenever his credit is impeached, either by general evidence affecting his character, or on cross-examination; 1 Stark. Ev. 1757; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 469.

MODIFICATIONS OF THE COMMON LAW. There have been various important modifications of the common law as to witnesses, in respect to their competency and otherwise, as well in England as in this country. A general and strong tendency is manifest to do away with the old objections to the competency of witnesses, and to admit all persons to testify that can furnish to courts and juries any relevant and material evidence,—leaving these to judge of the credibility of the witnesses.

England. By various statutes, 7 & 8 Will. III. c. 34, 1698; 8 Geo. I. c. 6, 1721; and 9 Geo. IV. c. 32, 1828, Quakers and Moravians are allowed to testify under affirmation, subject to the penalties of perjury.

Incompetency from interest is done away with in various specified cases, by special statutes.

By 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 26, it is declared that no witness shall be incompetent on the ground that the verdict or judgment would be admissible in evidence for or against him; and such verdict or judgment for his party shall not be admissible for him or any one claiming under him; nor shall a verdict or judgment against his party be admissible against him or any one claiming under him.

By the statutes 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85 (1843), and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99 (1851), incompetency by reason of being a party, or one in whose behalf a suit is brought or defended, or by reason of crime or interest, is removed. But no person charged with a criminal offence is competent or compellable to give evidence for or against himself; nor is a husband or wife of such a one competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other; nor is one compellable to criminate himself; nor does the provision as to parties apply to proceedings instituted on account of adultery or for breach of promise of marriage.

By statutes of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 27 (1852), and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 20, similar changes are made in the law of Scotland.

By statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83 (1853), the husband or wife of a party, or one in whose behalf a suit is brought or defended, is made admissible in all cases and before all tribunals, excepting in criminal proceedings or any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery: but neither is compellable to disclose the conversation of the other during marriage.

By the statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, known as the Evidence Further Amendment Act (1869), the parties to any action for breach of promise of marriage, or to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, excepted in the previous acts, are made competent to give evidence therein. See Taylor, Ev. § 1221.

The United States. By the Judiciary Act (Sept. 24, 1789), s. 34, it is provided that the laws of the several states, excepting where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be the rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply.

This is held to include the statute and common law of the several states; Curtis, Const. s. 30 a; to embrace statutes relating to the law of evidence in civil cases at common law, including those passed subsequently to the Judiciary Act; M'Neil vs. Holbrook, 12 Pet. 84; but not to apply to criminal cases: as to which, the laws of the several states as existing at the time this act was passed are the rules of decision; 12 How. 361.

In accordance with this provision, parties and others formerly disqualified are allowed to testify in the district and circuit courts of the United States, in civil cases at common law, in states which admit such testimony before their own courts.

By various acts of congress it is now provided that in the courts of the United States no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, provided that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court. In all other respects, the laws of the state in which the court is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law, and in equity and admiralty; R. S. § 858.

A provision is made in a statute passed 24th January, 1857, 11 Stat. at L. 155, as to witnesses testifying before either house of congress or any committee of either,—to the effect that no person shall be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or be subject to any penalty or forfeiture, for any fact or act touching which he shall be required to testify as aforesaid; and no statement made or paper produced by him as aforesaid shall be competent evidence against him in any criminal proceeding in any court of justice. By the same statute, no person so testifying can refuse to answer, or produce a paper, on the ground that it would tend to disgrace or render him infamous,—a provision, however, which seems to effect no change in the law; R. S. § 859.

But the subject of witnesses before legislative bodies has not come within the scope of this article.

In all of the United States and territories, excepting Delaware and New Mexico, statutes to the same general effect and purpose, though differing in their terms from that adopted by congress, have been enacted; Steph. Ev. art. 107; 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 464–472. The Pennsylvania law on the subject may be found in Miller on Evidence. In many states defendants in criminal cases have been allowed by statute to testify in their own behalf. In some states homicide cases are excepted from the provisions of the act.

WOLF'S HEAD. In Old English Law. A term applied to outlaws. They who were outlawed in old English law were said to carry a wolf's head; for if caught alive they were to be brought to the king, and if they defended themselves they might be slain and their heads carried to the king, for they were no more to be accounted of than wolves. Termes de la Ley, Woolforthfod.

WOMEN. All the females of the human species. All such females who have arrived at the age of puberty. Mulieris appellatione etiam virgo viri potens continetur. Dig. 50. 16. 13.

A woman by the fact of marriage invests herself with the nationality of her husband; 13 Op. Att. Gen. 128; 14 id. 402; contra, 2 Knapp, P. C. 364. See DOMICIL.

Single or unmarried women have all the civil rights of men: they may, therefore, enter into contracts or engagements; sue and be sued; be trustees or guardians; they may be witnesses, and may for that purpose attest all papers; but they are, generally, not possessed of any political power: hence they cannot vote at any election, nor can they be elected representatives of the people, nor be appointed to the offices of judge, sheriff, constable, or any other office, unless expressly authorized by law.

A woman is a citizen, but is not as such eligible to public office or entitled to vote; 16 How. 287; 21 Wall. 162; nor has she any constitutional right to practise law; 48 Md. 28; 16 Wall. 36; id. 130; 14 Chic. L. News, 69. In Massachusetts, she may vote for a school committee; Rev. Stat. of Mass. 1882, p. 68; and the evident tendency of modern legislation in this country is towards the admission of women to the bar, decisions in Illinois, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and District of Columbia, denying this privilege, having been followed recently by statutes extending it to them; 55 Ill. 535; 16 Wall. 130; 131 Mass. 376; 39 Wisc. 232; 48 id. 693; see 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 728.

The act of February 15, 1879, admits to practice before the supreme court of the United States any woman of good character who shall have been a member of the bar of the highest court of any state or territory, or of the supreme court of the District of Columbia for three years; Suppl. to Rev. Stat. p. 410. In Connecticut women may practise law under a statute of 1875; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 728; 26 Alb. L. J. 333; and in California they may pursue any lawful business or profession; Cons. of Cal. art. 20, § 18. In Illinois, a woman may be a master in chancery; 99 Ill. 501; and in Iowa, a county recorder; Laws of 1880, c. 40; see 25 Alb. L. J. 104. In England a woman may be elected to the office of sexton; 7 Mod. 263; or governor of a workhouse; 2 Ld. Raym. 1014; or overseer; 3 Term, 395; but a woman is not entitled to vote at elections for members of parliament; 38 L. J. C. P. 25; Whart. Lex.; Morse on Citizenship; she may act as postmistress in the United States. See MARRIAGE; NATURALIZATION.

WOODGELD. In Old English Law. To be free from the payment of money for taking of wood in any forest. Co. Litt. 233. a. The same as PUDZELD.

WOODMOTE. The court of attachment. Cowel.

WOODS. A piece of land on which forest-trees in great number naturally grow. According to Lord Coke, a grant to another of omnes boscos suos, all his woods, will pass not only all his trees, but the land on which they grow. Co. Litt. 4 b.

WOOLSACK. The seat of the lord chancellor of England in the house of lords, being a large square bag of wool, without back or arms, covered with red cloth. Webster, Dict. The judges, king's counsel-at-law, and masters in chancery sit also on woolsacks. The custom arose from wool being a staple of Great Britain from early times. Encyc. Amer.

WORDS. "Words for the most part do not represent distinct thoughts, but only the parts into which a thought or conception has been divided by an analytic process. No mistake has been productive of more confusion, or has been more frequently taken advantage of for the purposes of deceit and fallacy, than the . . . assumption that each word in a sentence must have a clear and complete meaning, independent of the connection in which it stands. The sentence, the clause, the proposition, are the units of thought, and must be interpreted as units." Lieber, Hermen. 3d ed. 14, n.; see Sir W. Hamilton, 8th sec. vol. iii. p. 188.

Words are to be understood in a proper or figurative sense, and they are used both ways in law. They are also used in a technical sense. It is a general rule that contracts and wills shall be construed as the parties understood them: every person, however, is presumed to understand the force of the words he uses, and, therefore, technical words must be taken according to their legal import even in wills, unless the testator manifests a clear intention to the contrary; 1 Bro. C. C. 33; 3 id. 234; 5 Ves. Ch. 401; 8 id. 306.

Every one is required to use words in the sense they are generally understood; for, as speech has been given to man to be a sign of his thoughts for the purpose of communicating them to others, he is bound, in treating with them, to use such words or signs in the sense sanctioned by usage,—that is, in the sense in which they themselves understand them,—or else he deceives them. Heineccius, Prælect. in Puffendorff, lib. 1, cap. 17, § 2; Heineccius, de Jure Nat. lib. 1, § 197; Wolff, Inst. Jur. Nat. § 798. See Bishop on the Written Law.

Formerly, indeed, in cases of slander, the defamatory words received the mildest interpretation of which they were susceptible; and some ludicrous decisions were the consequence. It was gravely decided that to say of a merchant, "he is a base broken rascal, has broken twice, and I will make him break a third time," furnished no ground for maintaining an action because it might be intended that he had a hernia: ne poet dar porter action, car poet estre intend de burstness de belly. Latch, 104. But now they are understood in their usual signification; Comb. 37; Hamm. N. P. 282. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; LIBEL; SLANDER. WORK AND LABOR. In actions of assumpsit it is usual to put in a count, commonly called a common count, for work and labor done and materials furnished by the plaintiff for the defendant; and when the work was not done under a special contract the plaintiff will be entitled to recover on the common count for work, labor, and materials. 4 Tyrwh. 43; 2 Carr. & M. 214. See ASSUMPSIT; QUANTUM MERUIT.

WORKHOUSE. A prison where prisoners are kept in employment; a penitentiary. A house where the poor are taken care of and kept in employment.

WORKING DAYS. In settling lay-days, or days of demurrage, sometimes the contract specifies "working days;" in the computation, Sundays and custom-house holidays are excluded; 1 Bell, Com. 577. See DEMURRAGE; LAY-DAYS.

Working or lay-days, by the general rule, do not commence until the vessel has arrived at the usual place for unloading; 1 H. & C. 388. But where such place is a dock, it has been held that they begin when she enters the dock, and not when she reaches her place of discharge in the dock; 1 Bing. N. C. 283. The parties may, however, stipulate as they please as to the time when they shall commence; 5 Bing. N. C. 71. And it sometimes depends on the usage of the port; 24 E. L. & Eq. 305. Usage, however, cannot be admitted to vary the express terms of the contract; Pars. Ship. & Adm. 313.

WORKMAN. One who labors; one who is employed to do business for another.

The obligations of a workman are to perform the work he has undertaken to do, to do it in proper time, to do it well, to employ the things furnished him according to his contract.

His rights are to be paid what his work is worth, or what it deserves, and to have all the facilities which the employer can give him for doing his work; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1000.

WORSHIP. Honor and homage rendered to God.

In the United States this is free, every one being at liberty to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience. See 20 Alb. L. J. 124; CHRISTIANITY; DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP; RELIGION.

In English Law. A title or addition given to certain persons. Co. 2d Inst. 666; Bacon, Abr. Misnomer (A 2).

WORTHIEST OF BLOOD. An expression used to designate that in descent the sons are to be preferred to daughters, which is the law of England. See some singular reasons given for this, in Plowd. 305.

WOUND. Any lesion of the body.

In this it differs from the meaning of the word when used in surgery. The latter only refers to a solution of continuity; while the former comprises not only these, but also every other kind of accident, such as bruises, contusions, fractures, dislocations, and the like. Cooper, Surg. Dict.; Dunglison, Med. Dict. See Dictionnaire des Sciences médicales, mot Blessures; 3 Fodére, Méd. Lég. §§ 687-811.

Under the statute 9 Geo. IV. c. 21, s. 12, it has been held in England that to make a wound, in criminal cases, there must be an injury to the person by which the skin is broken; 6 C. & P. 684. See 6 Metc. 565; Beck, Med. Jur. c. 15; Ryan, Med. Jur. Index; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 652; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 278, 318; 4 C. & P. 381, 558; Guy, Med. Jur. c. 9, p. 446; Merlin, Répert. Blessure.

When a person is found dead from wounds, it is proper to inquire whether they are the result of suicide, accident, or homicide. In making the examination, the greatest attention should be bestowed on all the circumstances. On this subject some general directions have been given under the article DEATH. The reader is referred to 2 Beck, Med. Jur. 68-93. As to wounds on the living body, see id. 188.

WRECK (called in law Latin wreccum maris, and in law French wrec de mer).

Such goods as after a shipwreck are cast upon the land by the sea, and left there within some country so as not to belong to the jurisdiction of the admiralty, but to the common law. Co. 2d Inst. 167; 1 Bla. Com. 290.

A ship becomes a wreck when, in consequence of injuries received, she is rendered absolutely unnavigable, or unable to pursue her voyage, without repairs exceeding the half of her value; 6 Mass. 479; s. c. 4 Am. Dec. 163. A sunken vessel is not a wreck, but derelict; wreck applies to property cast upon land by the sea; 7 N. Y. 555.

Goods found at low water, between high and low water mark, and goods between the same limits partly resting on the ground, but still moved by the water, are wreck; The King vs. Forty-Nine Casks of Brandy, 3 Hagg. Adm. 257, 294. Wreck, by the common law, belongs to the king or his grantee; but if claimed by the true owner within a year and a day the goods, or their proceeds, must be restored to him, by virtue of stat. Westm. I., 3 Edw. I. c. 4. Ships and goods found derelict or abandoned at sea belonged until lately to the office of the lord high admiral, by a grant from the crown, but now belong to the national exchequer, subject, however, to be claimed by the true owner within a year and a day; 1 Hagg. 383; The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, § 475.

But in America the king's right in the sea-shore was transferred to the colonies, and therefore wreck cast on the sea-shore belongs to the owner of the shore, as against a mere stranger, if not reclaimed; 13 Pick. 255; s. c. 24 Am. Dec. 678; see, also, 113 Mass. 377.

In this country, the several states bordering on the sea have enacted laws providing for the safe keeping and disposition of property wrecked on the coast. In one case, Peabody vs. 28 Bales of Cotton, decided in the district court of Massachusetts, and reported in the American Jurist for July, 1829, it was held that the United States have succeeded to the prerogative of the British crown, and are entitled to derelict ships or goods found at sea and unclaimed by the true owner; but in the southern district of Florida it is held that such derelicts, in the absence of any act of congress on the subject, belong to the finder or salvor, subject to the claim of the true owner for a year and a day. Marvin, Wreck and Salvage. Stealing, plundering, or destroying any money or goods from or belonging to any vessel, boat, or raft, in distress, lost, or stranded, wilfully obstructing the escape of any person endeavoring to save his life from such ship, boat, or raft, holding out or showing any false light or lights, or extinguishing any true one, with intention to bring any vessel, boat, or raft on the sea into danger, or distress, or shipwreck, are made felony, punishable by fine and imprisonment, by act of congress of the 3d March, 1825, 4 Stat. at L. 115; R. S. § 5358; 12 Pet. 72. Wrecked goods upon a sale or other act of voluntary importation become liable to duties; 9 Cra. 387; 4 id. 347. See SALVAGE; TOTAL LOSS.

WRIT. A mandatory precept, issued by the authority and in the name of the sovereign or the state, for the purpose of compelling the defendant to do something therein mentioned.

It is issued by a court or other competent jurisdiction, and is returnable to the same. It is to be under seal and tested by the proper officer, and is directed to the sheriff or other officer lawfully authorized to execute the same. Writs are divided into—original, of mesne process, of execution. See 3 Bla. Com. 273; 1 Tidd, Pr. 93; Gould, Pl. c. 2, s. 1.

WRIT OF ASSISTANCE. A writ issuing out of chancery in pursuance of an order, commanding the sheriff to eject the defendant from certain lands and to put the plaintiff in possession. Cowel; 3 Steph. Com. 602; also an ancient writ issuing out of the exchequer. Mog. & W.

WRIT OF ASSOCIATION. In English Practice. A writ whereby certain persons (usually the clerk of assize and his subordinate officers) are directed to associate themselves with the justices and sergeants; and they are required to admit the said persons into their society in order to take the assizes. 3 Bla. Com. 59. See ASSIZE.

WRIT DE BONO ET MALO. See DE BONO ET MALO; ASSIZE.

WRIT OF CONSPIRACY. The name of an ancient writ, now superseded by the more convenient remedy of an action on the case, which might have been sued against parties guilty of a conspiracy. Fitzh. N. B. 260. See CONSPIRACY.

It did not lie at common law, in any case, except when the conspiracy was to indict the party either of treason or felony; all the other cases of conspiracy in the books were but actions on the case; 7 Hill, N. Y. 104.

WRIT OF COVENANT. A writ which lies where a party claims damages for breach of covenant, i. e. of a promise under seal.

WRIT OF DEBT. A writ which lies where the party claims the recovery of a debt, i. e. a liquidated or certain sum of money alleged to be due to him.

This is debt in the debet, which is the principal and only common form. There is another species mentioned in the books, called the debt in the detinet, which lies for the specific recovery of goods under a contract to deliver them. 1 Chitty, Pl. 101.

WRIT OF DECEIT. The name of a writ which lies where one man has done any thing in the name of another, by which the latter is damnified and deceived. Fitzh. N. B. 217.

The modern practice is to sue a writ of trespass on the case to remedy the injury. See DECEIT.

WRIT OF DETINUE. A writ which lies where a party claims the specific recovery of goods and chattels, or deeds and writings, detained from him. This is seldom used: trover is the more frequent remedy, in cases where it may be brought.

WRIT OF DOWER. A writ which lies for a widow claiming the specific recovery of her dower, no part having been yet assigned to her. It is usually called a writ of dower unde nihil habet. 3 Chitty, Pl. 393; Booth, 166.

There is another species, called a writ of right of dower, which applies to the particular case where the widow has received a part of her dower from the tenant himself, and of land lying in the same town in which she claims the residue. Booth, 166; Glanville, lib. 6, c. 4, 5. This latter writ is seldom used in practice.

WRIT DE EJECTIONE FIRMÆ. See EJECTMENT.

WRIT OF EJECTMENT. The name of a process issued by a party claiming land or other real estate, against one who is alleged to be unlawfully in possession. See EJECTMENT.

WRIT OF ENTRY. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

WRIT OF ERROR. A writ issued out of a court of competent jurisdiction, directed to the judges of a court of record in which final judgment has been given, and commanding them, in some cases, themselves to examine the record, in others to send it to another court of appellate jurisdiction, therein named, to be examined, in order that some alleged error in the proceedings may be corrected. Steph. Pl. 138; 2 Saund. 100, n. 1; Bacon, Abr. Error.

The first is called a writ of error coram nobis or vobis. When an issue in fact has been decided, there is not, in general, any appeal except by motion for a new trial; and although a matter of fact should exist which was not brought into the issue, as, for example, if the defendant neglected to plead a release, which he might have pleaded, this is no error in the proceedings, though a mistake of the defendant; Steph. Pl. *118. But there are some facts which affect the validity and regularity of the proceeding itself: and to remedy these errors the party in interest may sue out the writ of error coram vobis. The death of one of the parties at the commencement of the suit, the appearance of an infant in a personal action by an attorney and not by guardian, the coverture of either party at the commencement of the suit, when her husband is not joined with her, are instances of this kind; 1 Saund. 101; 1 Arch. Pr. 212; 2 Tidd, Pr. 1033; Steph. Pl. *119; 1 Browne, Pa. 75.

The second species is called, generally, writ of error, and is the more common. Its object is to review and correct an error of the law committed in the proceedings, which is not amendable or cured at common law or by some of the statutes of amendment or jeofail. See, generally, Tidd, Pr. 43; Bacon, Abr. Error; 1 Vern. 169; Yelv. 76; 1 Salk. 322; 2 Saund. 46, n. 6, and 101, n. 1; 3 Bla. Com. 405.

It lies only to remove causes from a court of record. It is in the nature of a suit or action when it is to restore the party who obtains it to the possession of anything which is withheld from him, not when its operation is entirely defensive; 3 Story, Const. § 1721. And it is considered, generally, as a new action; 15 Ala. 9. See APPEAL.

WRIT OF EXECUTION. A writ to put in force the sentence that the law has given. See EXECUTION.

WRIT OF EXIGI FACIAS. See EXIGENT; EXIGI FACIAS; OUTLAWRY.

WRIT OF FORMEDON. This writ lies where a party claims the specific recovery of lands and tenements as issue in tail, or as remainder-man or reversioner, upon the determination of an estate in tail. Co. Litt. 236 b; Booth, R. A. 139, 151, 154. See FORMEDON.

WRIT DE HÆRETICO COMBURENDO. In English Law. The name of a writ formerly issued by the secular courts, when a man was turned over to them by the ecclesiastical tribunals after having been condemned for heresy.

It was founded on the statute 2 Hen. IV. c. 15; it was first used A.D. 1401, and as late as the year 1611. By virtue of this writ, the unhappy man against whom it was issued was burned to death; see 12 Co. 92.

WRIT DE HOMINE REPLEGIANDO. See DE HOMINE REPLEGIANDO.

WRIT OF INQUIRY. See INQUISITION; INQUEST.

WRIT OF MAINPRIZE. In English Law. A writ directed to the sheriff (either generally, when any man is imprisoned for a bailable offence and bail has been refused, or specially, when the offence or cause of commitment is not properly bailable below), commanding him to take sureties for the prisoner's appearance, commonly called mainpernors, and to set him at large. 3 Bla. Com. 128. See MAINPRIZE.

WRIT OF MESNE. In Old English Law. A writ which was so called by reason of the words used in the writ, namely, Unde idem A qui medius est inter C et præfatum B; that is, A, who is mesne between C, the lord paramount, and B, the tenant paravail. Co. Litt. 100 a.

WRIT DE ODIO ET ATIA. See DE ODIO ET ATIA; ASSIZE.

WRIT OF PRÆCIPE. This writ is also called a writ of covenant, and is sued out by the party to whom lands are to be conveyed by fine,—the foundation of which is a supposed agreement or covenant that the one shall convey the land to the other. 2 Bla. Com. 349.

WRIT OF PREVENTION. This name is given to certain writs which may be issued in anticipation of suits which may arise. Co. Litt. 100. See QUIA TIMET.

WRIT OF PROCESS. See PROCESS; ACTION.

WRIT OF PROCLAMATION. A writ which issues at the same time with the exigi facias, by virtue of stat. 31 Eliz. c. 3, s. 1, by which the sheriff is commanded to make proclamations in the statute prescribed.

When it is not directed to the same sheriff as the writ of exigi facias is, it is called a foreign writ of proclamation. Lee, Dict.; 4 Reeve, H. E. L. 261.

WRIT OF QUARE IMPEDIT. See QUARE IMPEDIT.

WRIT DE RATIONABILI PARTE BONORUM. A writ which was sued out by a widow when the exectors of her deceased husband refused to let her have a third part of her late husband's goods, after the debts were paid. Fitzh. N. B. 284.

WRIT OF RECAPTION. A writ which lies where, pending an action of replevin, the same distrainer takes, for the same supposed cause, the cattle or goods of the same distrainee. See Fitzh. N. B. 169.

This writ is nearly obsolete, as trespass, which is found to be a preferable remedy, lies for the second taking; and, as the defendant cannot justify, the plaintiff must necessarily recover damages proportioned to the injury.

WRIT OF REPLEVIN. See REPLEVIN.

WRIT OF RESTITUTION. A writ which is issued on the reversal of a judgment commanding the sheriff to restore to the defendant below the thing levied upon, if it has not been sold, and, if it has been sold, the proceeds. Bacon, Abr. Execution (Q). See RESTITUTION.

WRIT PRO RETORNO HABENDO. In Practice. The name of a writ which recites that the defendant was summoned to appear to answer the plaintiff in a plea whereof he took the cattle of the said plaintiff (specifying them), and that the said plaintiff afterwards made default, wherefore it was then considered that the said plaintiff and his pledges of prosecuting should be in mercy, and that the said defendant should go without day, and that he should have return of the cattle aforesaid. It then commands the sheriff that he should cause to be returned the cattle aforesaid to the said defendant without delay, etc. 2 Sell. Pr. 168.

WRIT OF RIGHT. The remedy appropriate to the case where a party claims the specific recovery of corporeal hereditaments in fee-simple, founding his title on the right of property, or mere right, arising either from his own seisin or the seisin of his ancestor or predecessor. Fitzh. N. B. 1 (B); 3 Bla. Com. 391.

At common law, a writ of right lies only against the tenant of the freehold demanded; 8 Cra. 239.

This writ brings into controversy only the rights of the parties in the suit; and a defence that a third person has better title will not avail; 7 Wheat. 27; 3 Pet. 133; 3 Bingh. N. S. 434; 4 Scott, 209; 6 Ad. & E. 103; 2 B. & P. 570; 4 id. 64; 2 C. & P. 187, 271; 8 Cra. 229; 11 Mc. 312; 7 Wend. 250; 3 Bibb, 57; 3 Rand. 563; 2 J. J. Marsh. 104; 4 Mass. 64; 17 id. 74.

WRIT OF SUMMONS. See SUMMONS.

WRIT OF TOLL. In English Law. The name of a writ to remove proceedings on a writ of right patent from the court-baron into the county court. 3 Bla. Com. App. No. 1, § 2.

WRIT OF TRIAL. In English Law. A writ directing an action brought in a superior court to be tried in an inferior court or before the under-sheriff, under stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42. It is now superseded by the County Courts Act of 1867, c. 142, s. 6, by which a defendant in certain cases is enabled to obtain an order that the action be tried in a county court; 3 Steph. Com. 515, n.; Moz. & W.

WRIT OF WASTE. The name of a writ to be issued against a tenant who has committed waste of the premises. There are several forms of this writ. That against a tenant in dower differs from the others. Fitzh. N. B. 125. See WASTE.

WRITER OF THE TALLIES. In England. An officer of the exchequer whose duty it was to write upon the tallies the letters of tellers' bills. The office has long been abolished. See TALLY.

WRITERS TO THE SIGNET. In Scotch Law. Anciently, clerks in office of the secretary of state, by whom writs passing the king's signet were prepared. Their duty now is to prepare the warrants of all lands flowing from the crown, and to sign almost all diligencies of the law affecting the person or estate of a debtor, or for compelling implement of decree of superior court. They may act as attorney or agent before court of sessions, and have various privileges. Bell, Dict. Clerk to Signet. Under the Stamp Act of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, any writer to the signet practising in any court without having taken out an annual certificate, will forfeit the sum of £50. Moz. & W.

WRITING. The act of forming by the hand letters or characters of a particular kind, on paper or other suitable substance, and artfully putting them together so as to convey ideas.

It differs from printing, which is the formation of words on paper or other proper substance by means of a stamp. Sometimes by writing is understood printing, and sometimes printing and writing mixed. See 9 Pick. 312.

Many contracts are required to be in writing; all deeds for real estate must be in writing, for it cannot be conveyed by a contract not in writing, yet it is the constant practice to make deeds partly in printing and partly in writing. Wills, except nuncupative wills, must be in writing, and signed by the testator; and nuncupative wills must be reduced to writing by the witnesses within a limited time after the testator's death.

Records, bonds, bills of exchange, and many other engagements must, from their nature, be made in writing.

See ALTERATION; FORGERY; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; LANGUAGE.

WRITING OBLIGATORY. A bond; an agreement reduced to writing, by which the party becomes bound to perform something, or suffer it to be done.

WRITTEN INSTRUMENT. A judgment and a tax duplicate have been held not to be written instruments, within the meaning of a statute requiring a copy to be filed with the pleadings; 88 Ind. 48; 39 id. 172.

WRONG. An injury; a tort; a violation of right.

In its most usual sense, wrong signifies an injury committed to the person or property of another, or to his relative rights unconnected with contract; and these wrongs are committed with or without force. But in a more extended signification, wrong includes the violation of a contract; a failure by a man to perform his undertaking or promise is a wrong or injury to him to whom it was made. 3 Bla. Com. 158.

A public wrong is an act which is injurious to the public generally, commonly known by the name of crime, misdemeanor, or offence; and it is punishable in various ways, such as indictments, summary proceedings, and, upon conviction, by death, imprisonment, fine, etc.

Private wrongs, which are injuries to individuals, unaffecting the public; these are redressed by actions for damages, etc. See REMEDIES; TORT.

WRONG-DOER. One who commits an injury; a tort-feasor. See Dane, Abr. Index.

WRONGFULLY INTENDING. In Pleading. Words used in a declaration when in an action for an injury the motive of the defendant in committing it can be proved; for then his malicious intent ought to be averred. This is sufficiently done if it be substantially alleged, in general terms, as wrongfully intending. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2875.

WYOMING. One of the territories of the United States.

By act of congress, approved July 25, 1868, the territory of Wyoming is constituted and described as follows: All that part of the United States commencing at the intersection of the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington, with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; and running thence west to the thirty-fourth meridian of west longitude; thence south to the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence east to the twenty-seventh meridian of west longitude, and thence north to the place of beginning. The distribution of powers under the organic act creating the territory does not differ materially from that of the other territories. See MONTANA; NEW MEXICO.

By the Act of March 1, 1872, congress has enacted that the tract of land in the territories of Montana and Wyoming, lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River, commencing at the junction of Gardiner's River with the Yellowstone River, and running east to the meridian passing ten miles to the eastward of the most eastern point of Yellowstone Lake; thence south along said meridian to the parallel of latitude passing ten miles south of the most southern point of Yellowstone Lake; thence west along said parallel to the meridian passing fifteen miles west of the most western point of Madison Lake; thence north along said meridian to the latitude of the junction of the Yellowstone and Gardiner's Rivers; thence east to the place of beginning,—shall be reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasuring ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior; R. S. §§ 2474, 2475.

Y.

YARD. A measure of length, containing three feet, or thirty-six inches.

A piece of land inclosed for the use and accommodation of the inhabitants of a house. In England it is nearly synonymous with backside. 1 Chitty, Pr. 176; 1 Term, 701.

YARDLAND. In Old English Law. A quantity of land containing twenty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a.

YEAR. The period in which the revolution of the earth round the sun, and the accompanying changes in the order of nature, are completed.

The civil year differs from the astronomical, the latter being composed of three hundred and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-eight seconds and a fraction, while the former consists sometimes of three hundred and sixty-five days, and at others, in leap-years, of three hundred and sixty-six days.

The year is divided into half-year, which consists, according to Co. Litt. 135 b, of one hundred and eighty-two days; and quarter of a year, which consists of ninety-one days. Id.; 2 Rolle, Abr. 521, l. 40. It is further divided into twelve months.

The civil year commences immediately after twelve o'clock at night of the thirty-first day of December, that is, the first moment of the first day of January, and ends at midnight of the thirty-first day of December twelve months thereafter. See Comyns, Dig. Annus; 2 Chitty, Bla. Com. 140, n.; Chitty, Pr. Index, Time. Before the alteration of the calendar from old to new style in England (see BISSEXTILE) and the colonies of that country in America, the year in chronological reckoning was supposed to commence with the first day of January, although the legal year did not commence until March 25, the intermediate time being doubly indicated; thus February 15, 172¼, and so on. This mode of reckoning was altered by the statute 24 Geo. II. c. 23, which gave rise to an act of assembly of Pennsylvania, passed March, 11, 1752, 1 Smith, Laws, 217, conforming thereto, and also to the repeal of the act of 1710.

In New York it is enacted that whenever the term "year" or "years" is or shall be used in any statute, deed, verbal or written contract, or any public or private instrument whatever, the year intended shall be taken to consist of three hundred and sixty-five days; half a year, of a hundred and eighty-two days; and a quarter of a year, of ninety-two days; and the day of a leap year, and the day immediately preceding, if they shall occur in any period so to be computed, shall be reckoned together as one day. Rev. Stat. vol. 2; c. 19, t. 1, § 3. See AGE; YEARS; ALLOWANCE.

The omission of the word "year" in an indictment is not important, provided the proper numerals are written after the month and day of the month; 22 Minn. 67. An indictment which states the year of the commission of the offence in figures only, without prefixing "A. D." is insufficient; 5 Gray, 91; but it has been held otherwise in Maine under a statute; 47 Me. 388.

YEAR AND DAY. A period of time much recognized in law.

It is not in all cases limited to a precise calendar year. In Scotland, in computing the term, the year and day is to be reckoned, not by the number of days which go to make up a year, but by the return of the day of the next year that bears the same denomination; 1 Bell, Com. 721; 2 Stair, Inst. 842. See Bacon, Abr. Descent (I 3); Erskine, Inst. 1. 6. 22. In the law of all the Gothic nations, it meant a year and six weeks.

It is a term frequently occurring: for example, in case of an estray, if the owner challenged it not within a year and a day, it belonged to the lord; 5 Co. 108. So of a wreck; Co. 2d Inst. 168. This time is given to prosecute appeals and for actions in a writ of right, and, after entry or claim, to avoid a fine; Plowd. 357 a. And if a person wounded die in that time, it is murder; Co. 3d Inst. 53; 6 Co. 107. So, when a judgment is reversed, a party, notwithstanding the lapse of time mentioned in the statute of limitations pending that action, may commence a fresh action within a year and a day of such reversal; 3 Chitty, Pr. 107. Again, after a year and a day have elapsed from the day of signing a judgment no execution can be issued till the judgment be revived by scire facias; Bacon, Abr. Execution (H); Tidd, Pr. 1108.

Protection lasted a year and a day; and if a villein remain from his master a year and a day in an ancient demesne, he is free; Cunningham, Dict. If a person is afraid to enter on his land, he may make claim as near as possible,—which is in force for a year and a day; 3 Bla. Com. 175. In case of prize, if no claim is made within a year and a day, the condemnation is to captors as of course; 2 Gall. 388. So, in case of goods saved, the court retains them till claim, if made within a year and a day, but not after that time; 8 Pet. 4.

The same period occurs in the Civil Law, in Book of Feuds, the Laws of the Lombards, etc.

YEAR-BOOKS. Books of reports of cases in a regular series from the reign of the English King Edward II., inclusive, to the time of Henry VIII, which were taken by the prothonotaries or chief scribes of the courts, at the expense of the crown, and published annually,—whence their name Year-Books. They consist of eleven parts, namely:—Part 1. Maynard's Reports temp. Edw. II.; also divers Memoranda of the Exchequer temp. Edward I. Part 2. Reports in the first ten years of Edw. III. Part 3. Reports from 17 to 39 Edward III. Part 4. Reports from 40 to 50 Edward III. Part 5. Liber Assisarum; or, Pleas of the Crown temp. Edw. III. Part 6. Reports temp. Hen. IV. & Hen. V. Parts 7 & 8. Annals; or Reports of Hen. VI. during his reign, in 2 vols. Part 9. Annals of Edward IV. Part 10. Long Quinto; or Reports in 5 Edward IV. Part 11. Cases in the reigns of Edward V., Richard III., Henry VII., and Henry VIII. A reference to them by a learned judge as mere "lumber garrets of obsolete feudal law," indicates their practical value in modern times. Wallace, Reporters; 2 Wall. Jr. 309.

YEAR, DAY, AND WASTE (Lat. annus, dies, et vastum) is a part of king's prerogative, whereby he takes the profits of the lands and tenements of those attainted of petty treason or felony, for a year and a day, but, in the end, may waste the tenements, destroy the houses, root up the woods, gardens, and pasture, and plough up the meadows (except the lord of the fee agree with him for redemption of such waste); after which the lands are to be restored to the lord of the fee. Staundford, Prerog. c. 16, fol. 44. By Magna Charta, it would appear that the profits for a year and a day were given in lieu of the waste. 9 Hen. III. c. 22. But 17 Edw. II. declares the king's right to both.

YEARS, ESTATE FOR. See ESTATE FOR YEARS.

YEAS AND NAYS. The list of members of a legislative body voting in the affirmative and negative of a proposition.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, directs that "the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." See 2 Story, Const. 301.

Constitutional provisions in some states require the yeas and nays to be entered on the journal on the final passage of every bill. See 68 Ill. 160; 22 Mich. 104; 54 N. Y. 276. These directions are clearly imperative; Cooley, Const. Lim. 171.

The power of calling the yeas and nays is given by all the constitutions of the several states; and it is not, in general, restricted to the request of one-fifth of the members present, but may be demanded by a less number; and, in some, one member alone has the right to require the call of the yeas and nays.

YEOMAN. In the United States this word does not appear to have any very exact meaning. It is usually put as an addition to the names of parties in declarations and indictments. In England it signifies a free man who has land of the value of forty shillings a year. Co. 2d Inst. 668; 2 Dall. 92. The local volunteer militia, raised by individuals with the approbation of the queen are also called yeomen. The term yeomanry is applied to the small freeholders and farmers in general. Hallam, Cons. Hist. c. 1.

YIELDING AND PAYING. These words, when used in a lease, constitute a covenant on the part of the lessee to pay the rent; Platt, Cov. 50; 3 Penn. R. 464; 2 Lev. 206; 3 Term, 402; 1 B. & C. 416; 2 Dowl. & R. 670; but whether it be an express covenant or not seems not to be settled; 2 Lev. 206; T. Jones, 102; 3 Term, 402.

In Pennsylvania, it has been decided to be a covenant running with the land; 3 Penn. R. 464. See 1 Saund. 233, n. 1; 9 Vt. 191.

YORK, CUSTOM OF, is recognized by 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10, and 1 Jac. II. c. 17. By this custom, the effects of an intestate are divided according to the anciently universal rule of pars rationabilis. 4 Burn. Eccl. Law, 342.

YORK, STATUTE OF. The name of an English statute, passed 12 Edw. II., Anno Domini 1318, and so called because it was enacted at York. It contains many wise provisions and explanations of former statutes. Barrington, Stat. 174. There were other statutes made at York in the reign of Edward III., but they do not bear this name.

YOUNG ANIMALS. It is a rule that the young of domestic or tame animals belong to the owner of the dam or mother, according to the maxim, Partus sequitur ventrem. Dig. 6. 1. 5. 2; Inst. 2. 1. 9.

YOUNGER CHILDREN. When used with reference to settlements of land in England, this phrase signifies all such children as are not entitled to the rights of an eldest son, including daughters who are older than the eldest son; Moz. & W.

YOUTH. This word may include children and youth of both sexes; 2 Cush. 519, 528.

Z.

ZOLL-VEREIN. A union of German states for uniformity of customs, established in 1819. It continued until the unification of the German Empire, including Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, Hesse-Cassel, Brunswick, and Mecklenberg-Strelitz, and all intermediate principalities. It has now been superseded by the German Empire; and the Federal Council of the empire has taken the place of that of the zoll-verein. Whart. Lex.
